This episode was raised when my former master, the Old Buddha, was abbot of Mount Tiantong, and a donor from the Land of Goryeo visited the monastery, made a donation, had the assembly read the sūtras, and requested my former master to mount the seat.<sup>40</sup> After raising it, my former master swung his whisk once around in a big circle and said, “Today, Tiantong read and turned the great treasury of the sūtras for you.” Then he threw down his whisk and got down from the seat.

We should now “read and turn” what my former master said; we should not compare him with others.<sup>41</sup> While this may be so, in “reading and turning the great treasury of the sūtras” does he use one eye, or does he use half an eye? In what the Eminent Ancestor said and what my former master said, how many eyes were used and how many tongues? Try examining it thoroughly.

40 my former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): i.e., Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨. The source of this anecdote is unknown and may represent Dōgen’s memory of an event that took place at Tiantong during his study there with Rujing, 1225-1227.

mount the seat (shinzo 陞座): i.e., give a lecture from the altar.

41 we should not compare him with others (yosha ni hijun su bekarazu 餘者に比準すべからず): Here, perhaps, meaning “we should not make comparisons of his words with those of Dongshan.”

The Ancient Ancestor, Great Master Hongdao of Yaoshan, ordinarily did not permit people to read sūtras.<sup>42</sup> One day he was himself holding a sūtra and reading it. A monk asked, “The Reverend ordinarily doesn’t permit people to read sūtras; why, then, are you yourself reading one?”

The Master said, “I just need to shield my eyes.”<sup>43</sup>

The monk said, “And may I imitate the Reverend?”

The Master said, “If you were to read it, it would even pierce oxhide.”<sup>44</sup>

いま我要遮眼の道は、遮眼の自道處なり。遮眼は打失眼睛なり、打失經なり、渾眼遮なり、渾遮眼なり。遮眼は、遮中開眼なり、遮裏活眼なり、眼裏活遮なり、眼皮上更添一枚皮なり、遮裏拈眼なり、眼自拈遮なり。しかあれば、眼睛經にあらざれば、遮眼の功德いまだあらざるなり。牛皮也須穿は、全牛皮なり、全皮牛なり、拈牛作皮なり。このゆえに、皮肉骨髓・頭角鼻孔を、牛牴の活計とせり。學和尚のとき、牛爲眼睛なるを遮眼とす、眼睛爲牛なり。

The saying here, “I need to shield my eyes,” is said by the “shielded eyes” themselves. “Shielding the eyes” is “losing the eyes”; it is losing the sūtras; it is the entire eye shielding; it is the entire shielded eye.<sup>45</sup> “Shielding the eyes” is the opened eye within the “shielding”; it is the living eye in the “shielding”; it is the living shielding in the eye; it is adding another lid to the eyelid; it is taking up the eye in the “shielding”; it is the eye itself taking up the “shielding.”<sup>46</sup> Thus, if it is not an eye sūtra, there is no merit in “shielding the eyes.”

42 The Ancient Ancestor, Great Master Hongdao of Yaoshan (nōso Yakusan Gudō daishi 曩祖藥山弘道大師): i.e., Yaoshan Weiyan 藥山惟儼. This story can be found in the Jingde chuanglu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:312b5-8), the Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要 (ZZ.136:740a8-10), and elsewhere.

43 “shield my eyes” (shagen 遮眼): In ordinary parlance, to protect the eyes from the sun or dust; here, perhaps, to protect against the “dust” (jin 塵) of the defiling objects of the senses. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dust.”

44 “it would even pierce oxhide” (ni nyaku kan, gohi ya shu sen 爾若看、牛皮也須穿): i.e., even leather would not shield your eyes.

45 “losing the eyes” (tashitsu ganzei 打失眼睛): A fixed expression in Zen texts; here, perhaps an allusion to a verse by Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, in celebration of the Buddha’s awakening; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye.”

46 “adding another lid to the eyelid” (ganpi jō kō ten ichimai hi 眼皮上更添一枚皮): Perhaps reflecting the common use of the eyelid as an example of something too close to be seen.

“It would even pierce oxhide” is “the hide of the whole ox”; it is the ox of the whole hide; it is taking up the ox and making the hide.<sup>47</sup> Therefore, the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow, the horns on the head and the nose represent the livelihood of the cow.<sup>48</sup> When we “imitate the Reverend,” we take the ox forming the eyes as “shielding the eye”; it is the eyes forming the ox.

*Limitless the merit of millions of thousands of offerings to the buddhas;
How could it compare with the regular reading of the old teachings?
Characters written in black ink on white paper;
Gentlemen, please, open your eyes and look at what's in front of you.*

47 “the hide of the whole ox” (zengyūhi 全牛皮): “The whole ox” appears often in Zen texts, especially in recollection of the famous words of Cook Ding (Pao ding 庖丁), in Book 3 of the Zhuangzi 莊子 (Yangshengzhu 養生主, KR.5c0126.003.3a):

始臣之解牛之時，所見無非牛者。三年之後，未嘗見全牛也。方今之時，臣以神遇，而不以目。

When I first began to cut up an ox, what I saw was nothing but the ox. After three years, I no longer saw the whole ox. Now, I approach it with the spirit and don't look at it with my eyes.

48 skin, flesh, bones, and marrow (hi niku kotsu zui 皮肉骨髓): Dōgen is likely expanding here on the “hide” of the whole ox. This expression occurs very often throughout the Shōbōgenzō, in reference to the essence or truth or entirety of something or someone. From the famous story, found in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:230, case 201), of Bodhidharma's testing of four disciples, to whom he said of each in turn that he (or, in one case, she) had gotten his skin, flesh, bones, and marrow. See Supplementary Notes.

We should realize that making offerings to the old buddhas and looking at the old teachings must be of equal merit, must transcend merit. “The old teachings” are letters of black ink written on white paper, but who knows them as “the old teachings”? We should investigate such a principle.

In the words of the Great Master, “The thinking — what sūtra is it?” the single line of “thinking” is “the age is so remote,” is “I wouldn’t want to tell” the thinking.<sup>51</sup> On the road, he came across a dead snake, and thinking on a sūtra (nenkin 念經): i.e., “reading (or contemplating) a sūtra.” The semantic range of nen 念, as both “reading” and “thinking,” is crucial to the dialogue here.

51 is “the age is so remote,” is “I wouldn’t want to tell” the thinking (nendai jinnon nari, fu yoku ko ji o nen nari 年代深遠なり、不欲舉似於念なり): After a re-therefore his question, “what sūtra?” appears; meeting someone, he does not make a mistake, and therefore it is “the Vimalakīrti Sūtra.”<sup>52</sup>

In sum, sūtra reading is grasping and gathering the buddhas and ancestors in their entirety, and reading the sūtras with them as the eyes. At this very moment, the buddhas and ancestors immediately become buddhas, preach the dharma, preach the buddhas, and work as buddhas.<sup>53</sup> If it is not the time of this sūtra reading, there are not yet any heads or faces of the buddhas and ancestors.

Yang said, “There was. But the age is so remote that I wouldn’t want to tell it to the Reverend.”

52 On the road, he came across a dead snake (michi ni shite wa shija ni au 路にしては死蛇にあふ): Likely alluding to a story about Chinglin Shiqian 青林師虔 (d. 904) that appears as case 59 in the Congrong lu 從容錄 (T.2004.48:264a26-b4) and is recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:232, case 204):

後洞山師虔禪師<嗣洞山、號青林>、因僧問、學人徑往時如何。師云、死蛇當大路。勸子莫當頭。僧云、當頭時如何。師曰、亦喪子命根。僧曰、不當頭時如何。師曰、亦無迴避處。僧曰、正當恁麼時如何。師曰、却失也。僧曰、未審向甚麼處去也。師曰、草深無覓處。僧曰、和尚也須隄防始得。師撫掌云、一等是箇毒氣。

Dongshan’s follower Shiqian (succeeded Dongshan, named Chinglin) was once asked by a monk, “What about when a student takes a side path?”

The Master said, “There’s a dead snake on the great road. I urge you not to confront it.”

The monk said, “What if I do confront it?”

Lin said, “You lose your life.”

The monk said, “What if I don’t confront it?”

Lin said, “There’s still no place to avoid it.”

The monk said, “So, at this very moment, what?”

Lin said, “You’re lost.”

The monk said, “I don’t understand where to go.”

Lin said, “The grass is deep and there’s nowhere to find it.”

The monk said, “The Reverend should also take care.”

Lin clapped his hands and said, “This is the same poison.”

53 At this very moment (shōtō inmo ji 正當恁麼時): Perhaps reflecting the same phrase in the dead snake tale noted just above.

become buddhas, preach the dharma, preach the buddhas, and work as buddhas (sabutsu shi, seppō shi, setsubutsu shi, bussa suru 作佛し、說法し、説佛し、佛作する): Dōgen moves here, from the familiar sabutsu 作佛 (“become a buddha”) and seppō 說法 (“preach the dharma”), through the novel setsubutsu 説佛 (“preach the buddhas”), to the playful neologism bassa 佛作 (weakly translated as “work as buddhas”), which if read according to the verb-object construction of the other expressions in the list, would have to be rendered something like “buddha a becoming.”

In present day assemblies of the buddhas and ancestors, there are many types of ceremonial procedures for sūtra reading: sūtra reading in which the donor visits the monastery and makes a request of the great assembly; or sūtra reading in which the monks are requested to engage in perpetual turning; or sūtra reading initiated by monks of the assembly of their own accord; and so on. In addition, there is sūtra reading performed by the great assembly on behalf of a deceased monk.

For sūtra reading in which the donor visits the monastery and makes a request of the monks, on the appointed day following gruel time, in advance, the hall manager hangs up the “sūtra reading” placards in front of the saṃgha hall and in the various quarters. After breakfast, a prostration mat is laid out in front of the Sacred Monk.<sup>54</sup> When the appointed time arrives, three sequences are rung on the bell in front of the saṃgha hall — or one sequence, according to the directions of the abbot. After the bell-ringing, the head seat and the monks of the great assembly don their kāsāya, enter the cloud hall, take their assigned places, face forward, and sit.<sup>55</sup> Next, the abbot enters the hall, faces the Sacred Monk, bows with joined palms, burns incense, and when finished, sits at his or her place.

Then, the young postulants are made to distribute the sūtras. These sūtras are prepared and lined up ahead of time in the administration cloister and delivered for distribution when the time comes. The sūtras are either distributed while still in their sūtra boxes or are placed on stands and distributed. The monks of the great assembly, having received the sūtras, immediately open and read them.

At this point, the guest prefect at once leads the donor into the cloud hall. The donor takes the hand-held censer in the front of the cloud hall, and carries it raised up into the hall. The hand-held censer is the common property of the cloister.<sup>56</sup> It is filled with incense in advance and provided in the front of the cloud hall by a postulant.<sup>57</sup> When the donor is just about to enter the hall, it is handed to the donor upon request; this request for the hand-held censer is made by the guest prefect.<sup>58</sup> When entering the hall, the guest prefect goes first and the donor follows after. They enter through the south side of the front door of the cloud hall. The donor goes before the Sacred Monk, burns a pinch of incense, and makes three prostrations, holding the hand-held censer during the prostrations. During the prostrations, the guest prefect stands with folded hands to the north of the prostration mat, looking south and slightly facing the donor.<sup>59</sup>

54 Sacred Monk (shōsō 聖僧): I.e., Bodhisattva Mañjuśrī, a statue of which is installed in an altar in the saṃgha hall of a Zen monastery.

55 cloud hall (undō 雲堂): I.e., the saṃgha hall. In this and the following sentence, Dōgen slips in and out of Chinese.

56 carries it raised up (sasagete ささげて): I.e., raised with both hands above eye level.

common property of the cloister (inmon no kugai 院門の公界): I.e., belongs to the administration cloister (kuin 庫院) and lent to the donor for use in the ritual. For other meanings of the glyphs 公界 (kugai), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Public realm.”

57 in the front of the cloud hall (undō zen 雲堂前): Probably indicating the outer hall (gaidō 外堂) of the saṃgha hall.

58 upon request (meshi ni yorite めしによりて): Probably, when the donor is requested by the guest prefect to enter the hall.

59 looking south and slightly facing the donor (omote o minami ni shite, sukoshiki

When finished making prostrations, the donor turns to the right, faces the abbot, raises up the hand-held censer, and bends forward, bowing with hands clasped. The abbot, remaining in the chair, receives the bow by raising up a sūtra and bowing with palms together. The donor next faces north and bows with hands clasped. Having bowed, he or she passes in front of the head seat and tours the hall. During the touring of the hall, the guest prefect goes first, taking the lead. Touring the hall once around, and returning in front of the Sacred Monk, [the donor] faces the Sacred Monk again, raises up the hand-held censer, and bows with hands clasped. At this time, the guest prefect stands with folded hands inside the threshold of the cloud hall, to the south of the prostration mat, facing north. When finished bowing to the Sacred Monk, following the lead of the guest prefect, the donor exits to the front of the cloud hall, tours the front of the hall once around, again enters the cloud hall, faces the Sacred Monk, and makes three prostrations.

When finished making prostrations, [the donor] sits in a folding chair and bears witness to the sūtra reading. The folding chair is set up next to the pillar to the left of the Sacred Monk, facing south. Or, it is set up next to the south pillar, facing north. When the donor is seated, the guest prefect should face the donor, bow with hands clasped, and then take his or her own place. In some cases, while the donor is touring the hall, there is musical chanting.<sup>60</sup> Seats for musical chanting are either to the right of the Sacred Monk or to the left of the Sacred Monk, according to convenience.

The hand-held censer is filled with precious incense, such as aloes wood incense or jian incense, and lit.<sup>61</sup> The incense is personally provided by the donor.

seshu ni mukaite おもてを南にして、すこしき施主にむかひて): If the guest prefect is standing north of the donor facing south, the sense of “slightly facing the donor” is unclear; perhaps indicating that the guest prefect stands somewhat closer to the altar, facing the donor at an angle.

60 musical chanting (bonnon 梵音): Literally, “brahmanical sounds”; melodic chanting, sometimes accompanied by musical instruments. The “seats” mentioned here are likely for the chanters (and/or perhaps for musicians).

61 precious incense, such as aloes wood incense or jian incense (jinkō senkō tō no meikō 沈香・箋香等の名香): The exact referent of the term senkō 箋香 here is unclear. While in some contexts it may mean simply “stick incense,” here the glyph jian 箋 more likely refers to a particular substance. It is identified in one Song-dynasty source (Fan Chengda's 范成大, Guihai yuheng zhi 桂海虞衡志, zhi xiang 志香) as the product of a

Next, the sūtra-reading money is distributed. The amount of money follows the wishes of the donor. In some cases, goods, such as cloth or fans are distributed. The donor personally makes the distribution, or a steward makes the distribution, or a postulant makes the distribution. The procedure for distribution is to place the item in front of the monk, not to put it directly into the monk's hands. When the allotment of money is distributed in front of them, the monks of the assembly each receive it with palms joined. Allotments of money, alternatively, may be distributed at the main meal time on the day [of the sūtra reading]. If the distribution is at the main mealtime, after the head seat's "Food Offering" is finished, the block is struck with the mallet once again, and the head seat does "Giving Wealth."<sup>62</sup> fragrant tree of Hainan; it is often read as equivalent to zhan 棧 and taken as referring to a fragrant tree said in Chinese sources to grow in northern Vietnam. Dōgen uses these same two terms for incense in his "Shōbōgenzō darani" 正法眼藏陀羅尼.

62 head seat's "Food Offering" (shuso sejiki 首座施食): I.e., the head seat's chanting of the "Gāthā of Food Offering" (Sejiki ge 施食偈):

三徳六味、施佛及僧、法界有情、普同供養。

This food of three virtues and six flavors

Is given to the Buddha and his saṃgha.

May sentient beings throughout the dharma realm

Be equally nourished by this offering.

the block is struck with the mallet once again (sara ni tatsui ichige shite さらに打槌一下して): Reference to the percussion instrument known as the "mallet and block" (tsuichin 槌砧) used to signal stages in the formal meal service in the saṃgha hall; an octagonal wooden pillar, standing on the floor, the top of which is struck by a wooden mallet. The block is struck before the chanting of the "Gāthā of Food Offering."

the head seat does "Giving Wealth" (shuso sezai su 首座施財す): I.e., the head seat chants the "Gāthā of Giving Wealth" (sezai no ge 施財の偈):

財法二施、功德無量、檀波羅蜜、具足圓滿。

The two gifts, of wealth and dharma,

Are incalculable in their merit.

When sūtra reading takes place inside the cloud hall, one does not raise the voice to read, but reads in a low voice. Or, one may open the sūtra scroll and just look at the words. One simply reads the sūtra without punctuating it.

For this kind of sūtra reading, some hundreds or thousands of scrolls are kept ready in the administrative wing — generally, the Diamond Prajñā Sūtra, the “Universal Gate Chapter” and “Pleasant Practice Chapter” of the Lotus Sūtra, the Golden Light Sūtra, and so on.<sup>64</sup> One scroll is distributed to each monk. When the sūtra reading is finished, the 63 The aim of the donor's dedication of merit (seshu ekō no shishu 施主回向の旨趣): A verse for the dedication of merit (ekōmon 回向文) typically states how the merit was generated, to whom the merit is dedicated, and what the donor hopes to receive in return, as expressed in a formal prayer at the end of the verse. This last is the “aim” (shishu 旨趣) of the dedication.

64 administrative wing (jōjū 常住): Literally, “ever abiding,” the term is used for the permanent property of the monastery, here extended to the administration hall (kudō 庫堂) and nearby adjoining administrative offices, in which lived and worked the monastic officers (kusu 庫司) in charge of such property.

Both when taking and when depositing it, one puts palms together. When taking it, one first puts palms together and then takes it; when depositing it, one first puts it down and then puts palms together. After that, each one puts palms together and recites the dedication of merit in a low voice.

In the event that sūtra reading is held in a common area in the administrative wing, the monk serving as prior burns incense, makes bows, tours the hall, and distributes money — all in the same way as a donor. The raising up of the hand-held censer, too, is the same as with a donor. If there is someone within the assembly of monks who, as a donor, requests that the monks of the great assembly read sūtras, [the procedure] is the same as for a lay donor, with the burning of incense, bows, hall touring, distribution of money, and so on. The procedure of the guest prefect leading [the donor] should be the same as for a lay donor.

There is a service called the imperial holiday sūtra reading. If, for example, the current emperor's birthday is the fifteenth day of the first month, then the imperial holiday sūtra reading begins from the fifteenth day of the preceeding twelfth month. On this day, there is no convocation.<sup>65</sup> In the buddha hall, two rows of long seating platforms are set up in front of Buddha Śākyamuni. That is to say, they are set up in rows that Several monks are invited each day from the inner hall saṃgha, and a snack is provided before the midday meal. Sometimes, each monk is given a bowl of noodles and a cup of soup. Or, each monk is given six or seven steamed dumplings and a portion of soup. The steamed dumplings are also piled in a bowl; chopsticks are provided but a spoon is not provided. When performing the rite, the monks take their sūtra-reading seats and perform without moving from their seats. The snacks are lined up on the stands where the sūtras are placed, and no additional tables are brought in. While the snacks are being served, the sūtras remain on the stands. When snack service is finished, the monks rise from their seats, rinse their mouths, return, and take their seats. Then they do the sūtra reading. The sūtra reading continues from the close of morning gruel to the time of the main meal. With the sound of the drum struck three times to signal the time of the main meal, [the monks] stand up from their seats. The day's sūtra reading is brought to an end at the main meal time.

From the opening day on, an “establishing practice place for imperial prayers” placard is hung under the eaves on the east side of the front of the buddha hall. It is a horizontal placard. The abbot's name is written on red paper or white paper. The two Chinese characters of the Sūtra reading in this manner is continued up until the imperial birthday, when the abbot ascends to the dharma hall and performs prayers for the emperor. This has been the custom from ancient times, and even now it is not out of fashion.

Shoaku makusa

INTRODUCTION

This work represents one of the earlier texts of the Shōbōgenzō. It was composed in 1240, while Dōgen was living at Kōshōji. The chapter occurs as number 10 in the Honzan edition of the Shōbōgenzō and as number 31 in the sixty- and seventy-five-chapter compilations.

The title comes from the famous verse that Dōgen quotes at the start of the work. This verse, sometimes referred to as “the precepts of the seven buddhas,” probably represents one of the earliest and most often quoted sayings of the Buddha preserved in the Buddhist canon. It appears in the very earliest layers of Buddhist scriptures as well as in the later Mahāyāna texts.

The verse was widely cited by Buddhists in China and Japan and was no less important in the Zen tradition. It is quoted in the recorded sayings of numerous Chinese teachers and forms the opening lines of the Shukke taikō 出家大綱 (Essentials for Monastics), written by Dōgen's older contemporary Eisai 榮西 (1141-1215) for his new Zen community at Kenninji 建仁寺. Eisai's essay might very well have been the first textbook that Dōgen studied when he entered Kenninji in 1217. Elsewhere Dōgen also quotes this verse in the “Gabyō” 畫餅 chapter of the Shōbōgenzō and in the Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄.

Dōgen comments at length here on each line of the verse, often on each word in each line. He then takes up the popular story of Niaoke Daolin's 鳥窠道林 teaching to the famous Tang poet and official Bai Juyi 白居易 that, while a child of three might be able to recite the verse, an elder of eighty can't put it into practice.

古佛云、諸惡莫作、衆善奉行、自淨其意、是諸佛教。

The old buddhas say,

To do no evil,

Practice the good,

And purify one's own mind:

これ七佛祖宗の通戒として、前佛より後佛に正傳す、後佛は前佛に相嗣せり。ただ七佛のみにあらず、是諸佛教なり。この道理を功夫參究すべし。いはゆる、七佛の法道、かならず七佛の法道のごとし。相傳相嗣、なほ箇裏の通消息なり。すでに是諸佛教なり、百千萬佛の教・行・證なり。

As the common precept of our ancestors, the seven buddhas, this is directly transmitted from prior buddhas to later buddhas; the later buddhas have inherited it from the prior buddhas.<sup>2</sup> It is not just of the seven buddhas: “this is the teaching of the buddhas.” We should investigate this truth with concentrated effort. That is, the dharma words of the seven buddhas must be like the dharma words of the seven buddhas.<sup>3</sup> Trans-evil (shoaku 諸惡); good (shūzen 衆善): The translation here takes a certain liberty with the verse, which has these terms as plurals: i.e., “evil deeds” and “good deeds.” The plural forms will be used below where more appropriate to the context.

2 common precept (tsūkai 通戒): I.e. “the precept shared among.” Some MS witnesses read “the common admonishment” (tsūkai 通誡).

seven buddhas (shichi butsu 七佛): The traditional story of the Zen lineage often begins with the ancient Buddhist legend of a series of seven buddhas of the past, through Buddha Śākyamuni; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas.”

3 the dharma words of the seven buddhas must be like the dharma words of the mitted and inherited, it is still the common circumstances in here.<sup>4</sup> Since it is “this is the teaching of the buddhas,” it is the teaching, practice, and verification of hundreds of thousands of myriads of buddhas.

いまいふところの諸悪は、善性・悪性・無記性のなかに悪性あり。その性、これ無生なり。善性・無記性等もまた無生なり、無漏なり、實相なりといふとも、この三性の裏箇に、許多般の法あり。諸悪は、此界の悪と他界の悪と同・不同あり、先時と後時と同・不同あり、天上の悪と人間の悪と同・不同なり。いはんや佛道と世間と、道悪・道善・道無記、はるかに殊異あり。善悪は時なり、時は善悪にあらず。善悪は法なり、法は善悪にあらず。法等・悪等なり、法等・善等なり。

The “evils” mentioned here belong to the evil nature listed among the good nature, evil nature, and indeterminate nature.<sup>5</sup> This nature is unborn. The good nature and indeterminate nature are also unborn, are uncontaminated, are the real mark; yet there are many kinds of dharmas here within these three natures.<sup>6</sup> Among the “evils,” there are similarities and dissimilarities between the evil of this world and the evil of other worlds; similarities and dissimilarities between prior and later times; similarities and dissimilarities between the evil of the devas and the evil of humans. Even greater still is the divergence between what is called seven buddhas (shichi butsu no hōdō, kanarazu shichi butsu no hōdō no gotoshi 七佛の法道、かならず七佛の法道のごとし): I.e., the seven buddhas all have the same teachings.

4 it is still the common circumstances in here (nao kori no tsū shōsoku nari なほ箇裏の通消息なり): The location of “in here” (kori 箇裏) is unclear but suggests “within the individual.” The translation “common circumstances” for the expression tsū shōsoku 通消息 assumes that Dōgen is playing on the description of the verse as the “common precept” (tsūkai 通戒) of the seven buddhas; while this expression does not occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, it is common enough in Zen literature in the sense “communicating information.”

5 good nature, evil nature, and indeterminate nature (zenshō akushō mukishō 善性・悪性・無記性): I.e., the three moral qualities of karma (S. kuśala, akuśala, avyākṛta, respectively); the last refers to karma that is neither good nor evil.

6 are also unborn, are uncontaminated, are the real mark (mushō nari, muro nari, jissō nari 無生なり、無漏なり、實相なり): Characteristics commonly attributed to dharmas (phenomena) in Mahāyāna literature. “Unborn” (mushō 無生) (or “un arisen”; S. anutpatti) is regularly used to express the doctrine that phenomena are “empty” and, therefore, do not really occur. “Uncontaminated” (muro 無漏) expresses the doctrine that all states of mind are ultimately pure (or “untainted”; S. anāsrava). “The real mark” (or “marked by reality”; jissō 實相) is a technical term, used especially in the Tiantai 天台 literature, for the ultimate reality of the dharmas.

here within these three natures (kono sanshō no riko ni この三性の裏箇に): The translation follows most MS witnesses in reading the familiar kori 箇裏 (“in here”), rather than the unusual riko 裏箇. If we were to render the latter, we might get something like, “in ‘the here’ [i.e., actual working in the world?] of these three natures.”

“evil,” what is called “good,” and what is called “indeterminate” in the way of the buddhas and the secular world. Good and evil are temporal, but time is neither good nor evil. Good and evil are dharmas, but dharmas are neither good nor evil. It is the dharmas are equal, the evils are equal; it is the dharmas are equal, the goods are equal.<sup>7</sup>

しかあるに、阿耨多羅三藐三菩提を學するに、聞教し、修行し、證果するに、深なり、遠なり、妙なり。この無上菩提を或從知識してきき、或從經卷してきく。はじめは、諸惡莫作ときこゆるなり。諸惡莫作ときこへざるは、佛正法にあらず、魔説なるべし。

Thus, when we study anuttara-samyak-sambodhi, when we hear the teachings, cultivate the practice and realize the fruit, it is deep, it is distant, it is wondrous.<sup>8</sup> This unsurpassed bodhi, we hear whether from a wise friend, we hear whether from a sūtra scroll.<sup>9</sup> In the very beginning, we hear “do no evil.” If we do not hear “do no evil,” it is not the true dharma of the buddhas; it is the talk of Māra.<sup>10</sup>

7 It is the dharmas are equal, the evils are equal; it is the dharmas are equal, the goods are equal (hōtō akutō nari, hōtō zentō nari 法等・惡等なり、法等・善等なり): A common rhetorical pattern, seen, for example, in the saying of Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709-788) (e.g., at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:440a12-13):

The names are equal, the meanings are equal, and all the dharmas are equal, pure and unadulterated.

Dōgen quotes this line in his Fushukuhānpō 赴粥飯法 (DZZ.6:46) and uses a variant of the pattern in his “Shōbōgenzō shinjin gakudō” 正法眼藏身心學道 (DZZ.1: 49):

語等なり、心等なり、法等なり。

The words are equal, the minds are equal, the dharmas are equal.

See also “Shōbōgenzō gabyō” 正法眼藏畫餅 (DZZ.1:270):

The paintings are equal, the cakes are equal, the dharmas are equal.

8 it is deep, it is distant, it is wondrous (jin nari, on nari, myō nari 深なり、遠なり、妙なり): From the expression “deep, distant, and wondrous” (jin on myō 深遠妙), typically used in reference to the voice.

9 whether from a wise friend (waku jū chishiki 或從知識); whether from a sūtra scroll (waku jū kyōkan 或從經卷): I.e., whether from a teacher or from a text. Fixed expressions occurring together several times in the Shōbōgenzō; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Whether from a wise friend, whether from a sūtra scroll.”

10 talk of Māra (masetsu 魔説): Or “demonic preachings.” I.e., false teachings by the god Māra, who seeks to prevent the spread of the dharma.

[31:5]

しるべし、諸惡莫作ときこゆる、これ佛正法なり。この、諸惡つくることなかれ、といふ、凡夫のはじめて造作してかくのごとくあらしむるにあらず、菩提の説となれるを聞教するに、しかのごとくきこゆるなり。しかのごとくきこゆるは、無上菩提のことばにてある道著なり。すでに菩提語なり、ゆえに語菩提なり。無上菩提の説著となりて聞著せらるるに轉ぜられて、諸惡莫作とねがひ、諸惡莫作とおこなひもてゆく。諸惡すでにつくられずなりゆくところに、修行力たちまちに現成す。この現成は、盡地・盡界・盡時・盡法を量として現成するなり。その量は、莫作を量とせり。

We should realize that hearing “do no evil” is the true dharma of the buddhas. This [phrase], “do not do evil,” is not something first created and made to be like this by the common person; we hear it like this when we hear the teaching that is bodhi become talk.<sup>11</sup> What we hear like this is speech that is unsurpassed bodhi in words. Since it is the words of bodhi, it is the bodhi of words. Being turned by what is heard when unsurpassed bodhi becomes talk, we aspire to “do no evil” and continue practicing “do no evil.” And where evils are no longer done, the power of practice suddenly appears. This appearance appears taking as its measure all the earth, all the worlds, all time, all dharmas. This measure takes “do no” as its measure.

正當恁麼時の正當恁麼人は、諸惡つくりぬべきところに住し、往來し、諸惡つくりぬべき縁に對し、諸惡つくる友にまじわるににたりといへども、諸惡さらにつくられざるなり、莫作の力量現成するゆえに。諸惡みづから諸惡と道著せず、諸惡にさだまれる調度なきなり。一拈一放の道理あり。正當恁麼時、すなはち惡の、人ををかさざる道理しられ、人の、惡をやぶらざる道理あきらめらる。

Just such a person at just such a time, though staying or traveling in places where evil might be done, or encountering situations in which evil might be done, or mixing with friends who do evil, can no longer do evil; for there appears the power of “do no.”<sup>12</sup> “Evils” do not themselves speak of “evils,” and there are no fixtures fixed as “evils.”<sup>13</sup> There is the 11 Bodhi become talk (bodai no setsu to nareru 菩提の説となれる): I.e., the awakening of the buddhas expressed in words.

This [phrase], “do not do evils” (kono, shoaku tsukuru koto nakare to iu この、諸惡つくることなかれといふ): Dōgen here translates the Chinese phrase into a Japanese imperative form.

12 for there appears the power of “do no” (makusa no rikiryō genjō suru yue ni 莫作の力量現成するゆえに): The translation follows Kawamura’s punctuation. This phrase is sometimes read with the following sentence, yielding, “. . . can no longer do evil. Because there appears the power of ‘do no,’ ‘evils’ do not speak of ‘evils,’ and there are no fixtures fixed as ‘evils.’” principle of one taken up and one let go.<sup>14</sup> At just such a time, the principle that evil does not violate the person is known, and the principle that the person does not destroy evil is clarified.<sup>15</sup>

みづからが心を擧して修行せしむ、身を擧して修行せしむるに、機先の八九成あり、腦後の莫作あり。なんぢが身心を拈來して修行し、たれの身心を拈來して修行するに、四大五蘊にて修行するちから、驀地に見成するに、四大五蘊の自己を染汚せず、今日の四大五蘊までも修行せられもてゆく。如今の修行なる四大五蘊のちから、上項の四大五蘊を修行ならしむるなり。山河大地・日月星辰にても修行せしむるに、山河大地・日月星辰、かへりてわれらを修行せしむるなり。一時の眼睛にあらず、諸時の活眼なり。眼睛・活眼にてある諸時なるがゆえに、諸佛諸祖をして修行せしむ、聞教せしむ、證果せしむ。諸佛諸祖、かつて教・行・證を染汚せしむることなきがゆえに、教・行・證いまだ諸佛諸祖を罣礙することなし。このゆえに、佛祖をして修行せしむるに、過・現・當の機先・機後に廻避する諸佛諸祖なし。衆生、作佛・作祖の時節、ひごろ所有の佛祖を罣礙せずといへども、作佛祖する道理を、十二時中の行・住・坐・臥に、つらつら思量すべきなり。作佛祖するに衆生をやぶらず、うばはず、うしなふにあらず。しかあれども、脱落しきたれるなり。

When we ourselves take up our minds and put them into practice, take up our bodies and put them into practice, there are eight or nine tenths complete before the function, there is “do no” behind the head.<sup>16</sup> As you bring your body and mind to practice, as you bring anyone’s body and mind to practice, as the power of practicing with the four elements and “evils” (shoaku mizukara shoaku to dōjaku sezu, shoaku ni sadamareru chōdo naki nari 諸惡みづから諸惡と道著せず、諸惡にさだまれる調度なきなり): I.e., nothing “announces itself” as evil; our world is not “furnished” with evils.

14 There is the principle of one taken up and one let go (ichinen ippō no dōri ari 一拈一放の道理あり): The phrase ichinen ippō 一拈一放 is not in fact a common idiom, though one does sometimes encounter the similar nen'ichi hōichi 拈一放一 (“take one up and let one go”). The sense may be that we define some things as evil (“take them up”) but do not take the definitions as fixed properties (“let them go”).

15 the principle that evil does not violate the person (aku no, hito o okasazaru dōri 惡の、人ををかさざる道理); the principle that the person does not destroy evil (hito no, aku o yaburazaru dōri 人の、惡をやぶらざる道理): This would seem to reverse the order of the previous sentence: one “takes up” evil and does not “destroy” it; one “lets go” of evil and is not “violated” by it.

16 there are eight or nine tenths complete before the function, there is “do no” behind the head (kisen no hakku jō ari, nōgo no makusa ari 機先の八九成あり、腦後の莫作あり): Perhaps to be understood, “the deed is almost done before we start, while the ‘not doing’ of it remains long after.” Dōgen is playing here with the “before” and “after” of kisen 機先, used in the sense, “before anything happens,” and nōgo 腦後 (literally, “the back of the head [or brain]”), likely used here in the sense “beyond memory,” “long forgotten.” For the expression hakku jō 八九成, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eight or nine tenths complete.”

five aggregates instantly appears, it does not defile the self of the four elements and five aggregates, and even today's four elements and five aggregates are made to carry on the practice.<sup>17</sup> The power of today's four elements and five aggregates as practice makes practice of our old four elements and five aggregates. It also causes the mountains, rivers, and the whole earth, the sun, moon, and stars to practice; and then the mountains, rivers, and the whole earth, the sun, moon, and stars in turn cause us to practice. It is not the eye of one time; it is the living eye of all times.<sup>18</sup> Because they are times that are the eye, the living eye, they cause the buddhas and the ancestors to practice, to hear the teachings, to verify the fruit. Because the buddhas and the ancestors have never defiled the teachings, practice, and verification, the teaching, practice, and verification do not obstruct the buddhas and the ancestors.<sup>19</sup> Therefore, as they make the buddhas and ancestors practice, there are no buddhas or ancestors who have avoided them, whether before the function or after the function in past, present or future. When living beings become buddhas and become ancestors, it does not obstruct the buddha and ancestor they have long possessed; yet the principle of becoming a buddha and ancestor, we should think on deeply throughout the standing, walking, sitting, and reclining of the twelve times.<sup>20</sup> When we become a buddha and ancestor, we do not destroy or rob or lose the living being; nevertheless, we have sloughed it off.<sup>21</sup>

17 it does not defile the self of the four elements and five aggregates (shidai goun no jiko o zenna sezu 四大五蘊の自己を染汚せず): This rendering takes the no の here as genitive ("of"), with the grammatical subject being chikara ちから ("power"). It is also possible to take no の as marking the agent — a reading that would yield, "the four major elements and five aggregates do not defile the self." "The four elements [earth, water, fire, and wind] and the five aggregates [form, sensation, perception, formations, and consciousness]" is a combination used often by Dōgen for the individual as psychophysical organism; roughly synonymous with the more familiar "body and mind" (shinjin 身心). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Four elements and five aggregates."

18 It is not the eye of one time; it is the living eye of all times (ichiji no ganzei ni arazu, shoji no katsugan nari 一時の眼睛にあらず、諸時の活眼なり): Perhaps meaning, "this is not a one-time experience; it is the way we always see things (or, perhaps, ought to see things)." For the meanings of "eye" (ganzei 眼睛) in Zen texts, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Eye."

19 the buddhas and the ancestors have never defiled the teachings, practice, and verification (shobutsu shoso, katsute kyō gyō shō o zenna seshimuru koto naki 諸佛諸祖、かつて教・行・證を染汚せしむることなき): A turn on one of Dōgen's most famous teachings, that practice and verification are "not defiling" (fuzenna 不染汚) for the buddhas and ancestors; see Supplemental Notes, s.v. "Practice and verification" and "Not defiled."

善惡・因果をして修行せしむ。いはゆる、因果を動ずるにあらず、造作するにあらず。因果、あるときはわれらをして修行せしむるなり。この因果の本来面目、すでに分明なる、これ莫作なり、無生なり、無常なり、不昧なり、不落なり、脱落なるがゆえに。かくのごとく参究するに、諸惡は、一條にかつて莫作なりけると現成するなり。この現成に助發せられて、諸惡莫作なりと見得徹し、坐得斷するなり。

We cause good and evil, cause and effect, to practice. This is not moving, is not creating, cause and effect. Cause and effect at times cause us to practice. That the original face of cause and effect is already clearly discerned — this is “do no,” is unborn, is impermanent, is “not in the dark,” is “not fallen”; for it is sloughed off.<sup>22</sup> When we investigate them like this, [the truth that] the “evils,” in one strip, have always been “do no” appears to us. Aided by this appearance, we can see through, can sit and cut off, [the truth that] the “evils” are “do no.”<sup>23</sup> niscent of the expression “body and mind sloughed off” (shinjin datsuraku 身心脱落), that, in several places, Dōgen attributes to his teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Slough off” and “Body and mind sloughed off.”

22 is unborn, is impermanent, is not in the dark, is “not fallen” (mushō nari, mujō nari, fumai nari, furaku nari 無生なり、無常なり、不昧なり、不落なり): Two sets of contrasting approaches to cause and effect. The second set recalls the famous tale of Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 (749-814) and the teacher who was reborn as a fox for saying that the person of great practice “does not fall into cause and effect” (furaku inga 不落因果); Baizhang released him from his fox body by teaching that the person “is not in the dark about (or does not ignore) cause and effect” (fumai inga 不昧因果). (See, e.g., Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要, ZZ.136:495a9-b2; shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:178, case 102.)

23 we can see through, can sit and cut off, [the truth that] the “evils” are “do no” (shoaku makusa nari to kentokutetsu shi, zatokudan suru 諸惡莫作なりと見得徹し、坐得斷する): I.e., we can clearly discern and transcend the view that “do no evil” means that evils are doing nothing. Dōgen has here read the imperative makusa 莫作 (“do not do”) as a predicate nominative. “Can sit and cut off” represents one interpretation of the expression zatokudan 坐得斷, from the more common zadan 坐斷, a term used in Zen texts in the sense “to break completely,” “to reject totally” (where za 坐 is taken as za 挫), but often interpreted in Sōtō literature as “sitting completely” or “just sitting.”

conditions; they are just “do no.” If the “evils” are equal, the dharmas are equal.<sup>24</sup> Those that know “evils” as born of causes and conditions, not seeing that these causes and conditions are themselves “do no,” are a pitiful lot. Since “the seeds of buddhahood sprout from conditions,” conditions sprout from the seeds of buddhahood.<sup>25</sup>

諸惡なきにあらず、莫作なるのみなり。諸惡あるにあらず、莫作なるのみなり。諸惡は、空にあらず、莫作なり。諸惡は、色にあらず、莫作なり。諸惡は、莫作にあらず、莫作なるのみなり。たとへば、春松は、無にあらず、有にあらず、つくらざるなり。秋菊は、有にあらず、無にあらず、つくらざるなり。諸佛は、有にあらず、無にあらず、莫作なり。露柱燈籠・拂子拄杖等、あるにあらず、なきにあらず、莫作なり。自己は、有にあらず、無にあらず、莫作なり。

It is not that “evils” do not exist; it is just that they are “do no.” It is not that “evils” do exist; it is just that they are “do no.” “Evils” are not emptiness; they are “do no.” “Evils are not form; they are “do no.”<sup>26</sup> “Evils” are not “do no”; it is just that they are “do no.” For example, the spring pine is not non-existent and is not existent; “it does not do.”<sup>27</sup> The autumn chrysanthemum is not existent and is not non-existent; “it does not do.” The buddhas are not existent and are not non-existent; they are “do no.” The pillars and lanterns, the whisk and staff, neither exist nor do not exist; they are “do no.”<sup>28</sup> The self is not existent and is not non-existent; it is “do no.”

24 If the evils are equal, the dharmas are equal (shoaku moshi tō nareba, shohō mo tō nari 諸惡もし等なれば、諸法も等なり): See above, Note 7.

25 “the seeds of buddhahood sprout from conditions” (busshu jū en gi 佛種從緣起): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:9b8-9):

諸佛兩足尊、知法常無性、佛種從緣起、是故說一乘。

The buddhas, honored among the two-legged,

Know that the dharmas are always without natures,

And that the seeds of buddhahood sprout from conditions;

Therefore, they preach the one vehicle.

26 not emptiness (kū ni arazu 空にあらず); not form (shiki ni arazu 色にあらず): Reminiscent of the famous formula of the Heart Sūtra; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Form is itself emptiness; emptiness is itself form.”

27 “it does not do” (tsukurazaru nari つくらざるなり): Dōgen here and in the following sentence translates the term makusa 莫作 (“not doing”) into the negative of the Japanese verb tsukuru (“to do,” “to make”).

28 The pillars and lanterns, the whisk and staff (rochū tōrō hōssu shujō tō 露柱燈籠・拂子拄杖等): Examples drawn from the monastic setting regularly used in Zen texts for the inanimate objects of the world around us; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Pillars and lanterns,” “Whisk,” and “Staff.”

恁麼の參學は、見成せる公案なり、公案の見成なり。主より功夫し、賓より功夫す。すでに恁麼なるに、つくられざりけるをつくりけるとくやしむも、のがれず、さらにこれ莫作の功夫力なり。

This kind of study is the kōan realized, is the realization of the kōan.<sup>29</sup> We work at it from the host, and we work at it from the guest.<sup>30</sup> Since it is like this, we cannot escape regretting that we have done what was not done, and this too is the power of our working at “do no.”<sup>31</sup>

しかあれば、莫作にあらばつくらまし、と趣向するは、あゆみをきたにして越にいたらんとまたんがごとし。諸惡莫作は、井の驢をみるのみにあらず、井の井をみるなり。驢の驢をみるなり、人の人をみるなり、山の山をみるなり。説箇の應底道理あるゆえに、諸惡莫作なり。佛眞法身、猶若虚空、應物現形、如水中月なり。應物の莫作なるゆえに、現形の莫作あり。猶若虚空、左拍右拍なり。如水中月、被水月礙なり。これらの莫作、さらにうたがふべからざる現成なり。

Thus, to proceed with the view that, if it's “do no,” then let us do it, would be like walking north expecting to get to Yue.<sup>32</sup> “Do no evil” is not only “the well looking at the donkey”: it is the well looking at the well; it is the donkey looking at the donkey; it is the person looking at the person; it is the mountain looking at the mountain.<sup>33</sup> Because there is “explaining the principle of this response,” it is “do no evil.” It is:

30 We work at it from the host, and we work at it from the guest (shu yori kufū shi, hin yori kufū su 主より功夫し、賓より功夫す): Probably meaning, “we consider ‘not doing evils’ in terms of ‘not doing’ and in terms of ‘evils.’” “Host” (shu 主) and “guest” (hin 賓) are typically used in reference respectively to “subject” and “object,” though here they may well refer respectively to “the kōan realized” and “the realization of the kōan.”

31 we cannot escape regretting that we have done what was not done (tsukura-rezarikeru o tsukurikeru to kuyashimu mo, nogarezu つくられざりけるをつくりけるとくやしむも、のがれず): Seemingly an ironic response to the fact that we do in fact the “evils” that are said to be “not doing.”

32 like walking north expecting to get to Yue (ayumi o kita ni shite etsu ni itaran to matan ga gotoshi あゆみをきたにして越にいたらんとまたんがごとし): I.e., heading in exactly the wrong direction (“Yue” 越 here referring to the territory south of China); from the Chinese idiom bei yuan shi yue 北轅適楚 (“pointing your cart thills north to get to Yue”), a simile Dōgen uses more than once in the Shōbōgenzō.

33 “the well looking at the donkey” (i no ro o miru 井の驢をみる): From a dialogue, featuring Caoshan Benzhi 曹山本寂 (840-901) and the Senior Seat De 德上座 (dates unknown), recorded in Dōgen's shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:194, case 125); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Like the well looking at the donkey.”

*The true dharma body of the buddha
Is just like empty space.
It manifests its shape in response to beings,
Like the moon in the water.*<sup>34</sup>

Because “in response to beings” is “do no,” there is the “do no” of “it manifests its shape.” “Just like empty space” is clapping on the left, clapping on the right.<sup>35</sup> “Like the moon in the water” is the moon obstructed by the water.<sup>36</sup> These [examples of] “do no” are phenomena not to be further doubted.

“Practice the good.” These “good deeds” are the good nature among the three natures.<sup>37</sup> Although there may be “good deeds” within the good nature, there are no “good deeds” that appear in advance and await a person to practice them: there are no “good deeds” that do not come about at the very moment that the good is done. Although the myriad goods may be formless, in doing good they accumulate faster than iron to a magnet. Their power exceeds that of the vairambha wind.<sup>38</sup> The mountains and rivers of the whole earth, the countries of the world, the generative power of karma, cannot obstruct the accumulation of good.

34 The true dharma body of the buddha (butsu shin hosshin 佛眞法身): Quoting the Jin guangming jing 金光明經, T.663.16:344b3-4. Dōgen also quotes these lines at the opening of his “Shōbōgenzō tsuki” 正法眼藏都機.

35 clapping on the left, clapping on the right (sa haku u haku 左拍右拍): An unusual expression, perhaps suggesting unimpeded action.

36 “Like the moon in the water” is the moon obstructed by the water (nyo suichū getsu, hi sui getsu ge nari 如水中月、被水月礙なり): This could also be parsed, “‘Like the moon in the water’ is being obstructed by the water moon.”

37 the good nature among the three natures (sanshō no naka no zenshō 三性のなかの善性): See above, section 3.

38 vairambha wind (biranpū 毘嵐風): The great destructive wind that blows at the beginning and end of a kalpa.

Be that as it may, the principle that the recognition of good differs according to each world is because it is the same recognition that determines the good — “in the manner that the buddhas of the three times preach the dharma.”<sup>39</sup> “The same” means that their preaching the dharma while in the world is just [a matter of] the time. 39 the principle that the recognition of good differs according to each world is because it is the same recognition that determines the good (sekai ni yorite zen o ninzuru koto onajikazararu dōri, onaji nintoku o zen to seru ga yue ni 世界によりて善を認ずることおなじからざる道理、おなじ認得を善とせるがゆえに): The translation follows the punctuation of Kawamura’s edition, though the resulting construction, “the principle is because” hardly seems satisfactory. Others would read the passage, “Because it is the same recognition that determines the good, the principle that the recognition of good differs according to each world is ‘in the manner that the buddhas of the three times preach the dharma.’” In either reading, the passage is difficult to interpret but seems to claim that, while what is recognized as good may vary from world to world, the good is always what is recognized as such.

“in the manner that the buddhas of the three times preach the dharma” (nyo sanze shobutsu seppō shi gishiki 如三世諸佛說法之儀式): I.e., the buddhas of past, present, and future. Quoting Buddha Śākyamuni in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:10a22-23):

衆善、これ因縁生・因縁滅にあらず。衆善は諸法なりといふとも、諸法は衆善にあらず。因縁と生滅と衆善と、おなじく頭正あれば尾正あり。衆善は奉行なりといへども、自にあらず、自にしられず、他にあらず、他にしられず。自・他の知見は、知に自あり、他あり、見の自あり、他あるがゆえに、各各の活眼睛、それ日にもあり、月にもあり、これ奉行なり。奉行の正當恁麼時に、現成の公案ありとも、公案の始成にあらず、公案の久住にあらず、さらにこれを本行といはんや。

“Good deeds” are not born of causes and conditions and do not cease by causes and conditions. “Good deeds” may be dharmas, but the dharmas are not “good deeds.” Cause and condition, arising and ceasing, and “good deeds” are the same in that, when the head is right, the tail is right. We may say “good deeds” are “to practice,” but it is not self and is not known by the self; it is not other and is not known by the other. Because, in the knowing and seeing of self and other, there is self and other in knowing and self and other in seeing, the living eye of each is in the sun and in the moon.<sup>42</sup> This is “to practice.” Precisely at the moment of “to practice,” although there is the realized kōan, it is not that the kōan is initially realized, nor that the kōan long abides; can we further call this “original practice”?<sup>43</sup>

those of higher capacity, who practice based on personal understanding of the teachings; a standard distinction in Buddhist literature.

41 the śrāvaka's keeping the precepts is the bodhisattva's breaking the precepts (shōmon no jikai wa bosatsu no hakai naru 聲聞の持戒は菩薩の破戒なる): I.e., what is “good” for those of the Small Vehicle is not necessarily good for the bodhisattva. A view appearing also in the “Sanjūshichi hon bodai bunnō” chapter, where it is attributed to the Buddha.

42 the living eye of each is in the sun and in the moon (kakukaku no katsu ganzei, sore hi ni mo ari, tsuki ni mo ari 各各の活眼睛、それ日にもあり、月にもあり): Perhaps meaning that the perceptions of the subjective “self” are everywhere present in the objective “other.” An alternative form of the “living eye” (katsu ganzei 活眼睛) has appeared above, section 7. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye.”

43 can we further call this “original practice”? (sara ni kore o hongyō to iwanya さらにこれを本行といはんや): Some MS witnesses read bugyō 奉行 (“to practice”; “to practice reverently”) for hongyō 本行 (“original practice”). The latter, a term occurring several times in the Shōbōgenzō, evokes a famous passage in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:42c22-23):

Good sons, the lifespan attained by my original practice of the bodhisattva path is even now still not exhausted; it is twice the above number.

作善の、奉行なりといへども、測度すべきにはあらざるなり。いまの奉行、これ活眼睛なりといへども、測度にはあらず、法を測度せんために現成せるにあらず。活眼睛の測度は、餘法の測度とおなじかるべからず。

Doing good may be “to practice,” but it is not to be calculated. “To practice” here may be the living eye, but it is not calculating. It has not appeared in order to calculate dharmas. The calculation of the living eye cannot be the same as the calculation of other dharmas.<sup>44</sup>

衆善、有・無・色・空等にあらず、ただ奉行なるのみなり。いづれのところの現成、いづれの時の現成も、かならず奉行なり。この奉行に、かならず衆善の現成あり。奉行の現成、これ公案なりといふとも、生滅にあらず、因縁にあらず。

“Good deeds” are not existent or non-existent, form or emptiness, or the like; they are just “to practice.” Wherever they appear, whenever they appear, they are always “to practice.” In this “to practice,” there will always be the realization of “good deeds.” The realization of “to practice” may be a kōan, but it is not arising and ceasing, it is not causes and conditions.

奉行の入・住・出等も、又かくのごとし。衆善のなかの一善、すでに奉行するところに、盡法・全身・眞實地等、ともに奉行せらるるなり。

The entering, abiding, and exiting of “to practice” is also like this. Where we “practice” a single good among the “good deeds,” all dharmas, the whole body, the true land, and the like, are all “practiced.”<sup>45</sup>

この善の因果、おなじく奉行の現成公案なり。因はさき、果はのちなるにあらざれども、因圓滿し、果圓滿す。因等法等、果等法等なり。因にまたれて果感ずといへども、前・後にあらず前後等の道あるがゆえに。

The cause and effect of this good is similarly the realized kōan of “to practice.” It is not that the cause is before and the effect after, but the cause is perfectly complete, and the effect is perfectly complete. It is the causes are equal, the dharmas are equal; the effects are equal, the dharmas are equal.<sup>46</sup> While the response of effects may be expected by

唐の白居易は、佛光如滿禪師の俗弟子なり。江西大寂禪師の孫子なり。杭州の刺史にてありしとき、鳥窠の道林禪師に参じき。ちなみに居易とふ、如何是佛法大意。道林いはく、諸惡莫作、衆善奉行。居易いはく、もし恁麼にてあらんは、三歳の孩兒も道得ならん。道林いはく、三歳孩兒縦道得、八十老翁行不得なり。恁麼いふに、居易すなはち拜謝してさる。

Daolin said, “Do no evil, practice the good.”

Juyi said, “If it were that, even a child of three could say it.”

Daolin said, “A child of three might be able say it, but an elder of eighty can’t practice it.”

That being said, Juyi bowed and departed.

52 “The donkey business isn’t gone yet, and the horse business has already arrived” (roji miko baji tōrai 驢事未去馬事到來): Although normally carrying a sense akin to English “one damned thing after another,” here no doubt suggesting that “do no” and “to practice” overlap or are continuous. The saying, attributed to Lingyun Zhiquan 靈雲志勤 (dates unknown), appears in several Zen sources (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:285b12-13; and Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:206, case 156):

The Master [Changqing Huileng (854-932)] asked, “What is the great meaning of the buddha dharma?”

Yun said, “The donkey business isn’t gone yet, and the horse business has already arrived.”

54 While governor of Hangzhou (Kōshū no shishi nite arishi toki 杭州の刺史にてありしとき): Bai served as governor of Hangzhou 822-824.

Truly, Juyi, though he may have been a descendant of General Bai, was a poet immortal, rare for ages.<sup>55</sup> It was said of him that he was a literatus of twenty-four lives.<sup>56</sup> He was called Mañjuśrī; he was called Maitreya. There is no one who has not heard of his taste; there is no one in the literary world who does not attend upon him.<sup>57</sup> Nevertheless, on the way of the buddhas, he was a beginner, he was a latecomer. Needless to say, when it comes to this “do no evil, practice the good,” it was as if he had never seen its meaning even in his dreams.

Juyi thought that Daolin, recognizing only conscious intention, was saying, “do not do evil deeds; you should practice the good”; the principle of “do no evil, practice the good” that has been on the way of the buddhas for a thousand, for a myriad ages past, that spans the past and spans the present — of this, he knows nothing, has heard nothing. And because he has not set foot in the place of the buddha dharma and lacks the power of the buddha dharma, he talks like this. Even to warn against “evils” intentionally committed, even to encourage “the good” intentionally committed, must be “do no” realized.

56 a literatus of twenty-four lives (nijūshi shō no bungaku 二十四生の文學): i.e., a literatus over twenty-four lifetimes.

57 there is no one in the literary world who does not attend upon him (hikkai no chō-sezaru nakaru beshi 筆海の朝せざるなかるべし): More literally, “no one of the ocean of the brush who does not flow [to him].” The image is drawn from courtiers attending the morning session of the court, likened to rivers flowing to the ocean.

In sum, in the buddha dharma, what one first hears in the company of a wise friend and the ultimate fruit are the same. This is called “right at the head, right at the tail”; it is called “marvelous cause, marvelous effect”; it is called “buddha cause, buddha effect.” Since the cause and effect on the way of the buddhas are not such theories as differentiated maturation or continuity, if it is not a buddha cause, we cannot experience a buddha effect.<sup>58</sup> Because Daolin expressed this principle, he had the buddha dharma.

諸惡、たとひいくかさなりの盡界に彌綸し、いくかさなりの盡法を吞却せりとも、これ莫作の解脱なり。衆善、すでに初・中・後、善にてあれば、奉行の性・相・體・力等を如是せるなり。居易、かつてこの蹤跡をふまざるによりて、三歳の孩兒も道得ならんとはいふなり。道得をまさしく道得するちからなくて、かくのごとくいふなり。

Even if “evils” have filled to the brim all the worlds of however many layers, and swallowed up all the dharmas of however many layers, this is the liberation of “do no.” And since “good deeds” are “good at the beginning, middle, and end,” it makes “such” the nature, marks, substance, power, and so on, of “to practice.”<sup>59</sup> Juyi, because he has never set foot in these traces, says that even a three-year-old child could say it. Lacking the power himself really to make a statement, he says this.

あはれむべし、居易、なんぢ道甚麼なるぞ、佛風いまだきかざるがゆえに。三歳の孩兒をしれりやいなや、孩兒才生せる道理をしれりやいなや。もし三歳の孩兒をしらんものは、三世諸佛をもしるべし。いまだ三世諸佛をしらざらんもの、いかでか三歳の孩兒をしらん。對面せるはしれり、とおもふことなかれ、對面せざればしらざる、とおもふことなかれ。一塵をしれるものは盡界をしり、一法を通ずるものは萬法を通ず。萬法に通ぜざるもの、一法に通ぜず。通を學せるもの通徹のとき、萬法をもみる、一法

58 differentiated maturation or continuity (ijuku tōru 異熟・等流): Technical terms in Buddhist theories of cause and effect. The former expression (elsewhere rendered simply “ripened”), is used to render Sanskrit vipāka (“ripen”), in reference to karma as effect, distinct from the karma that is its cause; the latter, used for Sanskrit niṣyanda (“streaming”), refers to what cause and effect have in common. Dōgen’s point is that such distinctions do not apply to “buddha cause” and “buddha effect.”

59 “good in the beginning, middle, and end” (sho chū go, zen 初・中・後、善): Standard praise of a buddha’s teachings; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Good in the beginning, middle, and end.”

it makes “such” the nature, marks, substance, power, and so on, of “to practice” (bugyō no shō sō tai riki tō o nyoze seru nari 奉行の性・相・體・力等を如是せるなり): After a famous passage on “the ten suchnesses” (jū nyoze 十如是) in Kumārajīva’s translation of the Lotus Sūtra; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas.”

をもみるがゆえに、一塵を學するもの、のがれず盡界を學するなり。三歳の孩兒は佛法をいふべからず、とおもひ、三歳の孩兒のいはんことは容易ならん、とおもふは、至愚なり。そのゆえは、生をあきらめ、死をあきらむるは、佛家一大事の因縁なり。

How pitiful. Juyi, what are you saying? It is because you have not heard of the style of the buddhas.<sup>60</sup> Do you know the “child of three”? Do you know the principle of the child just born? Those who know the “child of three” must know the buddhas of the three times; those who do not yet know the buddhas of the three times, how could they know the “child of three”?

Do not think that facing something is knowing it; do not think that, if you do not face it, you do not know it. One who knows a single dust mote knows all the worlds; one who penetrates a single dust mote penetrates all the worlds. One who has not penetrated the myriad dharmas has not penetrated a single dharma. Because when those who study penetration fully penetrate it, they see the myriad dharmas and see the single dharma, those who study a single dust mote study all the worlds without remainder.

It is the utmost stupidity to think that the “child of three” could not speak the buddha dharma, or that what the “child of three” would say is easy. Therefore, to clarify birth and to clarify death are the “cause of the one great matter” in the house of the buddhas.<sup>61</sup>

古徳いはく、なんちがはじめて生下せりしとき、すなはち師子吼の分あり。師子吼の分とは、如來轉法輪の功德なり、轉法輪なり。

An ancient worthy said, “When you were first born, you had the allotment of the lion’s roar.”<sup>62</sup> “The allotment of the lion’s roar” means the virtue of the tathāgatas’ turning the dharma wheel, means turning the dharma wheel.

60 It is because you have not heard of the style of the buddha (buppū imada kikazaru ga yue ni 佛風いまだきかざるがゆえに): The punctuation here follows Kawamura’s edition; others would read this clause with the sentence following: “Because you have never heard of the style of the buddhas, do you know the three-year-old child?”

61 “the cause of the one great matter” in the house of the buddhas (bukke ichi daiji no innen 佛家一大事の因縁): I.e., the single reason that Buddhism exists. From a passage in the Lotus Sūtra, in which Śākyamuni announces that the purpose of Buddhism is to lead beings to buddhahood. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas, the world-honored ones, appear in the world for the reason of one great matter alone.”

62 An ancient worthy (kotoku 古徳): The source of this quotation is unidentified.

又、古徳いはく、生死去來、眞實人體なり。

Again, an ancient worthy said, “Birth and death, coming and going, are the true human body.”<sup>63</sup>

しかあれば、眞實體をあきらめ、師子吼の功德あらん、まことに一大事なるべし、たやすかるべからず。かるがゆえに、三歳孩兒の因縁行履、あきらめんとするに、さらに大因縁なり。それ三世諸佛の行履因縁と、同・不同あるがゆえに。

Thus, to clarify “the true body,” to have the virtue of “the lion’s roar” — this is surely the “one great matter”; this is surely not easy. Therefore, when we would clarify the cause and the conduct of the “child of three,” this is even more the great cause; for it has similarities and dissimilarities with the conduct and the cause of the buddhas of the three times.

居易おろかにして、三歳の孩兒の道得をかつてきかざれば、あるらんとだにも疑著せずして、恁麼道取するなり。道林の道聲の、雷よりも顯赫なるをきかず。道不得をいはんとしては、三歳孩兒還道得、といふ。これ、孩兒の師子吼をもきかず、禪師の轉法輪をも蹉過するなり。

Foolishly, Juyi, never having heard what a child of three could say, without even suspecting that it had anything [to say], spoke like this. He did not hear Daolin’s voice, more obvious than thunder. As if to say, “You couldn’t say anything,” he said, “Even a child of three could say it.” This does not hear the child’s “lion’s roar”; it totally misses the Chan master’s “turning the dharma wheel.”

禪師、あはれみをやむるにあたはず、かさねていふしなり、三歳の孩兒はたとひ道得なりとも、八十老翁は行不得ならん、と。

The Chan master, unable to restrain his pity, spoke again, “A child of three might be able say it, but an elder of eighty can’t practice it.”

いふところは、三歳の孩兒に道得のことばあり、これをよくよく參究すべし。八十の老翁に行不得の道あり、よくよく功夫すべし。孩兒の道得は、なんちに一任す、しかあれども孩兒に一任せず、老翁の行不得は、なんちに一任す、しかあれども、老翁に一任せず、といひしなり。

What he is saying is this. The “child of three” has words “able to say it”; you should investigate this well. The eighty-year old elder has words that “can’t practice it”; you should work at them well.<sup>64</sup> What the child is “able to say” is entirely left up to you; nevertheless, it is not entirely left up to the child.<sup>65</sup> What the elder cannot practice is entirely left up to you; nevertheless, it is not entirely left up to the elder. This is what he said.

The buddha dharma takes as its principle distinguishing and revering the meaning like this.<sup>66</sup>

INTRODUCTION

The colophon of this work states that it was composed at Kōshōji, on October 17, 1240, the same date given for the “Uji” 有時 chapter of the Shōbōgenzō, as well as for the “Kesa kudoku” 袈裟功德, a text of the twelve-chapter Shōbōgenzō. The “Den’e” represents number 32 of the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō and number 13 of the Honzan edition; it does not occur in the sixty-chapter compilation but appears in the twenty-eight-text Shōbōgenzō collection as number 1 of fascicle 2.

The title theme of this lengthy essay derives especially from the tradition with which Dōgen opens the piece: that the robe of Bodhidharma was handed down, together with his dharma, through the first generations of Chinese Chan ancestors till it reached the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能. Dōgen expands on this tradition to make the broader claim that, while Bodhidharma’s robe itself may have been preserved at the Sixth Ancestor’s monastery at Caoxi 曹溪, the formal vestment (kāśāya) worn by Zen monks uniquely represents, or embodies, the orthodox type of robe transmitted by all the buddhas and ancestors.

Unlike most of the representative essays in the Shōbōgenzō, the “Den’e” is not a collection of comments on Zen sayings. Rather, it draws on various sources to offer Dōgen’s personal vision of the history, characteristics, and spiritual significance of the Buddhist robe. The religious emotion behind that vision is palpable in a remarkable passage toward the end of the essay, in which the author recalls the tears of joy that moistened his gown when, as a young pilgrim to China, he first witnessed the veneration of the robe by the monks in the saṃgha hall at Mount Tiantong 天童山 and vowed to carry the practice back to his native land. The practice he carried back is still followed by Sōtō monks in Japan today.

佛佛正傳の衣法、まさに震旦に正傳することは、少林の高祖のみなり。高祖は、すなはち釋迦牟尼佛より第二十八代の祖師なり。西天二十八代、嫡嫡あひつたはれ、震旦に六代、まのあたり正傳す。西天・東地、都盧三十三代なり。

The direct transmission to Cīnasthāna of the robe and dharma directly transmitted by buddha after buddha was truly done only by the Eminent Ancestor of Shaolin.<sup>1</sup> The Eminent Ancestor is the ancestral master in the twenty-eighth generation after Buddha Śākyamuni. Passed down from successor to successor through twenty-eight generations in Sindh in the West, they were directly transmitted in person through six generations in Cīnasthāna. In Sindh in the West and the Land of the East, it is thirty-three generations in all.<sup>2</sup>

第三十三代の祖、大鑑禪師、この衣法を黄梅の夜半に正傳し、生前護持してきたる。いまなほ曹溪寶林寺に安置せり。諸代の帝王、あひつぎて内裏に請入して供養す。神物護持せるものなり。

The Ancestor in the thirty-third generation, Chan Master Dajian, received the direct transmission of this robe and dharma in the middle of the robe and dharma (e hō 衣法): From the tradition, dating from the eighth century, that the early ancestors of Chan in China handed down the kāṣāya of Bodhidharma as a token of the inheritance of his dharma.

1 Cīnasthāna (Shintan 震旦): Dōgen uses here the Chinese transliteration of a Sanskrit term for China meaning “Land of the Qin.”

the Eminent Ancestor of Shaolin (Shōrin no kōso 少林の高祖): I.e., the First Ancestor in China, Bodhidharma, said to have resided at the Shaolin Monastery 少林寺.

2 In Sindh in the West and the Land of the East, it is thirty-three generations in all (Saiten Tōchi, toro sanjūsan dai nari 西天・東地、都盧三十三代なり): The total of thirty-three generations results from the standard practice of counting Bodhidharma as both the twenty-eighth Indian and first Chinese ancestor.

the night from Huangmei and guarded them throughout his life.<sup>3</sup> Even now, it is preserved in the Baolin Monastery at Caoxi.<sup>4</sup> Generations of emperors in succession welcomed it into the imperial palace and made offerings to it. It is something guarded by spiritual beings.

唐朝の中宗・肅宗・代宗、しきりに歸内供養しき。請するにも、おくるにも、勅使をつかはし、詔をたまふ。すなはちこれ、おもくする儀なり。代宗皇帝、あるとき佛衣を曹溪山におくる詔にいはく、今遣鎮國大將軍劉崇景頂戴而送。朕爲之國寶。卿可於本寺安置、令僧衆親承宗旨者、嚴加守護勿令遺墜。

The Tang-dynasty emperors Zhongzong, Suzong, and Daizong repeatedly recalled it to court and made offerings to it.<sup>5</sup> When requesting it and when returning it, they dispatched an imperial envoy and handed down an imperial edict. This is a rite showing how seriously they regarded it. When, on one occasion, the Emperor Daizong sent the buddha robe back to Caoxi, his imperial edict said:<sup>6</sup>

We now dispatch Liu Chongjing, Great Defender-General of the State, reverently to receive and escort [the robe]. We regard it as a national treasure. Our liege [Liu Chongjing] is to place it for safekeeping in its original monastery and have those of the monks who have personally received the essential import strictly protect it and not allow it to be lost.

in the middle of the night from Huangmei (Ôbai no yahan ni 黃梅の夜半に): From the legend that the Fifth Ancestor, Hongren 弘忍 (602-675), whose monastery was on Mount Huangmei 黃梅山 (in present-day Hubei), transmitted the robe and dharma to Huineng secretly, in the middle of the night.

4 it is preserved in the Baolin Monastery at Caoxi (Sôkei Hôrinji ni anchi seri 曹溪寶林寺に安置せり): I.e., Huineng's monastery in present-day Guangdong. The grammatical subject here, though unexpressed, must be "the robe" (rather than "the robe and dharma"). This claim reflects a common tradition in Zen literature.

5 The Tang-dynasty emperors Zhongzong, Suzong, and Daizong (Tôchô no Chûsô Shukusô Daisô 唐朝の中宗・肅宗・代宗): Based on a tradition, found in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:236c25-237a2), that, in the year 760, the Emperor Suzong 肅宗 (r. 756-763) requested that Huineng's robe and begging bowl be installed in the palace and given offerings. In 765, the Emperor Daizong 代宗 (r. 763-780), after a dream in which Huineng requested the return of his robe and bowl, sent them back to Caoxi, with the edict quoted here. The Emperor Zhongzong 中宗, though he is said to have honored Huineng, was assassinated in 710, three years before Huineng's death.

6 the buddha robe (butsue 佛衣): A term normally meaning "Buddhist robe," used synonymously with kāṣāya; it can also have the sense "the robe of the buddhas (or of Buddha Śākyamuni)." See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Robe of the Tathāgata."

しかあればすなはち、數代の帝者、ともに、くにの重寶とせり。まことに無量恒河沙の三千大千世界を統領せんよりも、この佛衣、くににたもてるは、ことにすぐれたる大寶なり。卞璧に準ずべからざるものなり。たとひ傳國璽となるとも、いかでか傳佛の奇寶とならん。大唐よりこのかた、瞻禮せる緇白、かならず信法の大機なり。宿善のたすくるにあらずよりは、いかでかこの身をもちて、まのあたり佛佛正傳の佛衣を瞻禮することあらん。信受する皮肉骨髓は、よろこぶべし、信受することあたはざらんは、みづからなりといふとも、うらむべし、佛種子にあらざることを。

Thus, each of several generations of emperors regarded it as a major treasure of the state. Truly the preservation of this buddha robe in one's land is a great treasure far surpassing even the rule over trichiliocosms equal to the incalculable sands of the Ganges.<sup>7</sup> It is not to be compared to Bian's jade disc: even if the latter is taken as the signet of the transmission of the state, how could it be regarded as the rare treasure of the transmission of the buddhas.<sup>8</sup> From the time of the Great Tang, the black- and the white-robed who have venerated it have always been those of great capacities for faith or dharma.<sup>9</sup> Without the help of good karma from previous lifetimes, how could one, with this body, venerate the buddha robe directly transmitted in person by buddha after buddha? The skin, flesh, bones, and marrow who believe will surely rejoice; those

7 trichiliocosms (sanzen daisen sekai 三千大千世界): A term used to render the Sanskrit trisāhasra-mahāsāhasra-lokadhātu ("three-thousandfold great thousandfold world system"), equaling one billion Mount Sumeru world systems; a standard measure of the domain of a buddha.

8 Bian's jade disc (Benpeki 卞璧): Reference to the legend of a jade annulus, discovered by a certain Bian He 卞和, of the ancient kingdom of Chu 楚, and presented to King Wen of Zhou 周文王. The disc, better known as the "jade disk of He" (He shi bi 和氏璧), was supposed to have been used by Qin Shihuang 秦始皇, founder of the Qin dyanasty, to create the signet of imperial succession that was the token of the "mandate of heaven" for emperors down through the Tang. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Bian's jade disc."

the rare treasure of the transmission of the buddhas (denbutsu no kihō 傳佛の奇寶): Or "of the transmission of buddhahood." Dōgen here draws an analogy between "the signet of the transmission of the state" (denkoku ji 傳國璽) as token of political authority and the buddha robe as marker of Buddhist legitimacy; on this analogy, just as the holder of the signet in each generation is the reigning monarch, so the owner of the robe is a buddha.

9 the black- and the white-robed (shihaku 緇白): I.e., clerics and Buddhist laity, respectively.

those of great capacities for faith or dharma (shinpō no daiki 信法の大機): The expression shinpō 信法 can refer either to "faith in the dharma" or to two types of Buddhists: "those who advance by faith" (zuishingyō 隨信行; S. śraddhānusārin) and "those who advance by [study of] dharma" (zuihōgyō 隨法行; S. dharmānusārin); given that Dōgen will introduce the two types below (section 11), the latter reading seems preferable here.

who cannot believe, though it is of their own doing, should regret their failing to be seeds of buddhahood.<sup>10</sup>

俗なほいはく、その人の行李をみるは、すなはちその人をみるなり。いま佛衣を瞻禮せんは、すなはち佛をみたてまつるなり。百千萬の塔を起立して、この佛衣に供養すべし。天上・海中にも、こころあらんはおもくすべし。人間にも、轉輪聖王等のまことをしり、すぐれたるをしらんは、おもくすべきなり。

Even in the secular world, it is said, “To see the person’s belongings is to see the person.”<sup>11</sup> Now, to venerate the buddha robe is to see the buddha. We should erect hundreds of thousands of myriads of stūpas and offer them to the buddha robe. Even in the heavens above or the depths of the sea, any being with a heart must surely value it. Among humans as well, the wheel-turning sage kings, who would know what is true and know what is excellent, must surely value it.<sup>12</sup>

あはれむべし、よよに國主となれるやから、わがくにに重寶のあるをしるること。ままだ道士の教にまどはされて、佛法を廢せるおほし。そのとき、袈裟をかけず、圓頂に葉巾をいただく。講ずるところは、延壽長年の方なり。唐朝にもあり、宋朝にもあり。これらのたぐひは、國主なりといへども、國民よりもいやしかるべきなり。

How sad that, over the generations, those who became monarchs have not known that there is a major treasure in their own land. Periodically seduced by the teachings of the Daoists, many abolished the buddha dharma.<sup>13</sup> At those times, instead of wearing the kāṣāya, they wore caps on their round heads; and the lectures were on methods for extending the 10 skin, flesh, bones, and marrow (hi niku kotsu zui 皮肉骨髓): Allusion to the four disciples of Bodhidharma, of whom he famously said they had got, in turn, his “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow” (see Supplementary Notes). Here, perhaps, referring to anyone who has got even a part of Bodhidharma’s teachings.

11 “To see the person’s belongings” (sono hito no anri o miru wa その人の行李をみるは): “Belongings” renders anri 行李 (also written 行履 and read kōri), a term often used in Chan texts for “conduct” or “observance.” Given the context, the sense is more likely the common meaning of “parcel” or “luggage” — here, perhaps to be understood more broadly as “accoutrements” or “gear.”

12 wheel-turning sage kings (tenrin jōō 轉輪聖王): The cakravartin, the ideal Buddhist monarch. Here, no doubt, in contrast to the benighted emperors of China criticized in the next section.

13 many abolished the buddha dharma (buppō o hai seru ooshi 佛法を廢せるおほし): A bit of an exaggeration: there were several persecutions of Buddhism in China, the most serious in the years following the death of Huineng and supposed enshrinement of his robe occurring in 845, under the Tang Emperor Wuzong 武宗 (r. 840-846).

life span and lengthening the years.<sup>14</sup> They were in the Tang dynasty and in the Song dynasty. These types, though they may have been monarchs, were surely more vulgar than their own people.

しづかに觀察しつべし、わがくにに佛衣とどまりて現在せり。衣佛國土なるべきか、とも思惟すべきなり。舍利等よりもすぐれたるべし。舍利は、輪王にもあり、師子にもあり、人にもあり、乃至辟支佛等にもあり。しかあれども、輪王には袈裟なし、師子に袈裟なし、人に袈裟なし。ひとり諸佛のみに袈裟あり、ふかく信受すべし。

They should have quietly reflected that the buddha robe had come to rest and still existed in their own land. They should even have considered whether theirs might be the robe buddha land.<sup>15</sup> It is surely more excellent than relics or the like. With relics, wheel-turning kings have them, lions have them, humans have them, and so on down to pratyeka-buddhas, and the like, have them.<sup>16</sup> However, wheel-turning kings do not have the kāśāya, lions do not have the kāśāya, humans do not have the kāśāya: only the buddhas have the kāśāya.<sup>17</sup> This we should firmly believe.

extending the life span and lengthening the years (enju chōnen 延壽長年): Favorite topics of the Daoists. Ironically, it is thought that the Emperor Wuzong 武宗 shortened his life by ingesting Daoist elixirs of immortality.

15 the robe buddha land (e butsu kokudo 衣佛國土): A novel expression apparently coined by Dōgen; probably to be understood as “a buddha land of the robe,” though it might also be parsed “the land of the robe buddha.”

16 With relics, wheel-turning kings have them, lions have them (shari wa, rinnō ni mo ari, shishi ni mo ari 舍利は、輪王にもあり、師子にもあり): It is possible that “lion” (shishi 師子) here refers not (or not only) to the animal but to great teachers. Elsewhere, in his “Shōbōgenzō nyorai zenshin,” Dōgen gives a longer list of beings that produce relics:

There are relics of old buddhas, there are relics of present buddhas, there are relics of pratyeka-buddhas, there are relics of wheel-turning kings, there are relics of lions; or there are relics of wooden buddhas, and there are relics of painted buddhas; or there are relics of humans.

17 only the buddhas have the *kāśāya (hitori shobutsu nomi ni kesa ari ひとり諸佛のみに袈裟あり): Presumably, by kāśāya here, Dōgen is still referring to what he calls above the “buddha robe” — i.e., the robe handed down from the buddhas to Huineng. As he continues below, however, Dōgen’s use of this term becomes more ambiguous, seeming to expand to cover the kāśāya worn by the clerics in the Zen lineage as a token of (or avatar of?) the robe of the buddha.

いまの愚人、おほく舍利はおもくすといへども、袈裟をしらず、護持すべきとしれるもまれなり。これすなはち、先來より袈裟のおもき、これをきけるものまれなり、佛法正傳いまだきかざるがゆえに、しかあるなり。

Stupid people today, while they may often value relics, do not know about the kāśāya; those who recognize that it is to be preserved are also rare. This is so because, to begin with, those who have heard of the importance of the kāśāya are rare; for they have yet to hear of the direct transmission of the buddha dharma.

When we carefully reflect on the time when Śākya, the Honored One, was in the world, it is a mere two thousand plus years ago.<sup>18</sup> Many national treasures and imperial regalia handed down to the present are older than this. This buddha dharma and buddha robe are recent and new.<sup>19</sup> Their successive handing on, “whether in fields or in villages,” even when passed on fifty times, has a benefit sure to be marvelous.<sup>20</sup> Even they have a merit that is phenomenal; and this buddha robe is surely like them.<sup>21</sup> Yet they are not directly transmitted from a direct heir, while this has been directly transmitted from a direct heir.

18 two thousand plus years ago (nisen yo nen 二千餘年): Dōgen is calculating here from 949 BCE, the date traditionally used in East Asia for the parinirvāṇa of Buddha Śākyamuni.

19 recent and new (chikaku arata ちかくあらた): The advantage of being “recent and new” (as is suggested in the Lotus Sūtra passage alluded to in the next sentence) derives from a principle that, the closer to the original source, the greater the merit.

20 “whether in fields or in villages” (nyaku den nyaku ri 若田・若里): Allusion to an oft-cited passage in the Lotus Sūtra, in which Buddha Śākyamuni exhorts his followers to go forth and preach what they have heard from him; see Supplementary Notes.

21 Even they have a merit that is phenomenal (kare, nao kudoku arata nari かれ、なほ功德あらたなり): Taking the antecedent of “they” (kare かれ) here and in the next sentence as “national treasures and imperial regalia,” in contrast to “this” (kore これ) buddha robe.

しるべし、四句偈をきくに得道す、一句子をきくに得道す。四句偈および一句子、なにとしてか恁麼の靈驗ある。いはゆる、佛法なるによりてなり。いま一頂衣・九品衣、まさしく佛法より正傳せり。四句偈よりも劣なべからず、一句法よりも驗なかるべからず。

We should realize that we may gain the way upon hearing a four-line gāthā or gain the way upon hearing a single line.<sup>22</sup> How could the four-line gāthā or the single line have such spiritual efficacy? It is because they are the buddha dharma. The one robe, or robe of nine grades, here has certainly been transmitted directly from the buddha dharma.<sup>23</sup> It could not be inferior to the four-line gāthā; it could not be less efficacious than the dharma of a single line.

このゆえに、二千餘年よりこのかた、信行・法行の諸機、ともに隨佛學者、みな袈裟を護持して身心とせるものなり。諸佛の正法にくらきたぐひは、袈裟を崇重せざるなり。いま釋提桓因、および阿那跋達多龍王等、ともに在家の天主なりといへども、龍王なりといへども、袈裟を護持せり。

Therefore, for over two thousand years, those who study as followers of the buddha, those of the capacities both that proceed by faith and proceed by dharma, have all preserved the kāśāya and regarded it as the body and mind.<sup>24</sup> The types that are ignorant of the true dharma of the 22 four-line *gāthā (shiku ge 四句偈): Likely a reference to the famous Verse of Impermanence (Mujō ge 無常偈) from the story in the Nirvāṇa Sūtra (Da banniepan jing 大般涅槃經, T.374.12:449b8ff), to which Dōgen will allude again below (section 61), in which Buddha Śākyamuni in a previous life received a four-line verse from a rākṣasa (“hungry demon”):

諸行無常、是生滅法、生滅滅已、寂滅爲樂。

All things are impermanent:

This is the law of arising and ceasing.

When the arising and ceasing have ceased,

Their cessation is ease.

a single line (ikkusu 一句子): In Chan texts, regularly used in reference especially to any spiritually insightful utterance.

23 the one robe, or robe of nine grades, here (ima itchō e kubon e いま一頂衣・九品衣): I.e., the buddha robe under discussion here. The glyph chō 頂 is used as a numerical classifier for robes; “nine grades” (kubon 九品) refers to nine levels of the formal kāśāya, or saṃghāti (sōgyari 僧伽梨) robe, according to the number of panels, from nine to twenty-five, from which it is assembled (see below, section 21). Dōgen is using the numbers one and nine here in parallel with the “four” and “one” in the sentences just preceding.

24 the capacities both that proceed by faith and proceed by dharma (shingyō hōgyō no shoki 信行・法行の諸機): See above, Note 9.

buddhas do not respect the kāśāya. Now, beings like Śakra-devānām-indra and the dragon king Anavatapta, though householder lord of devas and dragon king both may be, still preserve the kāśāya.<sup>25</sup>

しかるに、剃頭のたぐひ、佛子と稱するともがら、袈裟におきては、受持すべきものとしらず。いはんや體・色・量をしらんや、いはんや著用の法をしらんや、いはんやその威儀、ゆめにもいまだみざるところなり。

Yet the types who shave their heads, those who call themselves “children of the Buddha,” when it comes to the kāśāya, do not know that it is something to receive and keep.<sup>26</sup> How much less do they know its material, color, or dimensions; how much less do they know how to put it on; how much less have they seen, even in their dreams, the proper deportment [when wearing it].

袈裟をば、ふるくよりいはく、除熱惱服となづく、解脱服となづく。おほよそ功德、はかるべからざるなり。龍鱗の三熱、よく袈裟の功德より解脱するなり。諸佛成道するとき、かならずこの衣をもちひるなり。まことに、邊地にむまれ、末法にあふといへども、相傳あると、相傳なきと、たくらぶことあらば、相傳の正嫡なるを信受護持すべし。

The kāśāya has long been called “the vestment that removes the torments,” or called “the vestment of liberation.”<sup>27</sup> Put more generally, its regarded it as the body and mind (shinjin to seru 身心とせる): Probably, to be understood as “their own body and mind,” though it might also be read as “the buddha’s body and mind.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Body and mind.”

25 Śakra-devānām-indra and the dragon king Anavatapta (Shakudaikan'in, oyobi Anabadatta ryūō 釋提桓因、および阿那跋達多龍王): I.e., the deva Indra, or Śakra, and the dragon king who lives in Lake Anavatapta, imagined to be north of the Himalayas.

though householder lord of devas and dragon king both may be (zaike no tenshu nari to iedomo, ryūō nari to iedomo 在家の天主なりといへども、龍王なりといへども): The force of the modifier “householder” (zaike no 在家の) here is probably that (in contrast to the monks in the following section), even though they are not themselves clerics, the gods and dragons preserve the clerical robe.

26 when it comes to the kāśāya, do not know that it is something to receive and keep (kesa ni okite wa, juji su beki mono to shirazu 袈裟におきては、受持すべきものとしらず): The robe in question here could be the buddha robe preserved at Caoxi; but it seems more likely that Dōgen is here criticizing his fellow monks for their indifference toward and ignorance of their own robes. The verb juji 受持 (“receive and keep”), while it may refer simply to the acts of receiving and wearing the robe, is here more likely the attitude of accepting and bearing in mind the robe’s significance as symbol of the buddha.

27 “the vestment that removes the torments” (jo netsunō fuku 除熱惱服); “the vestment of liberation” (gedappuku 解脱服): The first expression has not been found in extant sources and is likely meant simply to introduce the following “three torments merits are incalculable. It is the merit of the kāṣāya that brings about liberation from the three torments of the dragon.<sup>28</sup> When the buddhas attain the way, they always make use of this robe. Truly, though we may be born in a marginal land and are encountering the end of the dharma, if we compare what has the transmission and what lacks the transmission, we should believe and preserve that which is the legitimate successor of the transmission.<sup>29</sup>

いづれの家門にか、わが正傳のごとく、まさしく釋尊の衣法ともに正傳せる。ひとり佛道のみにあり。この衣法にあはんとし、たれか恭敬供養をゆるくせん。たとひ一日に無量恒河沙の身命をすてて供養すべし、生生世世値遇頂戴をも發願すべし。われら、佛生國をへだつること十萬餘里の山海のほかにもまれて、邊邦の愚蒙なりといへども、この正法をきき、この袈裟を一日一夜なりといへども受持し、一句一偈なりといへども參究する、これただ一佛二佛を供養せる福德のみにあらず、無量百千億のほとけを供養・奉觀せる福德なるべし。たとひ自己なりといへども、たうとぶべし、愛すべし、おもくすべし。

In what other houses have both the robe and dharma of Śākyā, the Honored One, truly been directly transmitted, as they have in our direct transmission? Only in the way of the buddhas alone.<sup>30</sup> Upon encountering this robe and dharma, who would be casual in venerating and making of the dragon.” The second expression is well known from the four-line verse still recited by monks when donning the kāṣāya; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Robe of the Tathāgata.”

28 the three torments of the dragon (ryūrin no sannetsu 龍鱗の三熱): From the well-known tradition that dragons are subject to three afflictions: hot winds and sands that burn them, evil winds that expose them, and garuḍas (giant mythical birds) that eat them. The claim (repeated in “Shōbōgenzō kesa kudoku” 正法眼藏袈裟功德) that the dragons are liberated from these torments by the kāṣāya doubtless reflects the tradition that a thread from the Tathāgata’s robe will protect dragons from the garuḍa (see, e.g., Sāgara-nāga-rāja-paripṛcchā-sūtra; Fo shuo hailongwang jing 佛說海龍王經, T.598.15:151a6-16). The term ryūrin 龍鱗 (“dragon scales”) normally refers to the pattern of the dragon’s scales, rather than to the dragon itself; but elsewhere Dōgen uses it as synecdoche for “dragon,” by analogy with kinrin 金鱗 (“gold scales”) for “golden fish” (see Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄, DZZ.3:86, no. 139):

In the clear ocean, we can catch a dragon and a golden fish.

29 we should believe and preserve that which is the legitimate successor of the transmission (sōden no shōteki naru o shinju goji su beshi 相傳の正嫡なるを信受護持すべし): Dōgen treats the robe here in anthropomorphic terms, as a legitimate heir (shōchaku 正嫡) in the lineage of the buddhas and ancestors.

30 Only in the way of the buddhas alone (hitori butsudō nomi ni ari ひとり佛道のみにあり): As is often the case in his writing, Dōgen here identifies “the way of the buddhas” (butsudō 佛道) with the tradition of the buddhas and ancestors of his Bodhidharma lineage. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas and ancestors.”

offerings to them? Even for one day, casting aside lives numerous as the incalculable sands of the Ganges, we should make offerings to them; we should make a vow to encounter and receive them in life after life, through age after age. Though we may be simpletons from a marginal land, born beyond the mountains and seas, more than a hundred thousand miles from the land of the Buddha's birth, to hear this true dharma, to receive and keep this kāṣāya even for a single day and night, to investigate even one line or one gāthā — these are surely not the merit of offerings made to one buddha or two buddhas; they are surely the merit of having made offerings to and paying respects before incalculable hundreds of thousands of koṭis of buddhas. Though it may be of our own doing, we should honor it; we should love it; we should value it.<sup>31</sup>

祖師傳法の大恩、ねんごろに報謝すべし。畜類なほ恩を報ず、人類いかでか恩をしらざらん。もし恩をしらずば、畜類よりも劣なるべし、畜類よりも愚なるべし。

We should sincerely repay the great beneficence of the transmission of the dharma by the ancestral masters.<sup>32</sup> Even animals repay beneficence; how could humans fail to recognize beneficence?<sup>33</sup> If we fail to recognize beneficence, we must be inferior to animals; we must be stupider than animals.

この佛衣の功德、その傳佛正法の祖師にあらざる餘人は、ゆめにもいまだしらざるなり。いはんや體・色・量をあきらむるにおよばんや。諸佛のあとをしたふべくは、まさにこれをしたふべし。たとひ百千萬代ののちも、この正傳を正傳せん、まさに佛法なるべし。證驗これあらたなり。

The merit of this buddha robe, those other than these ancestral masters who transmit the true dharma of the buddhas have never seen even in their dreams. How much less could they achieve an understanding of its material, color, and dimensions. Should we yearn for the traces of the buddhas, truly we should yearn for this. Even a hundred thousand myriads of generations later, to transmit directly this direct transmission would still truly be the buddha dharma. The evidence for this is obvious.<sup>34</sup>

31 Though it may be of our own doing (tatoi jiko nari to iedomo たとひ自己なりといへども): The antecedent of “it” here is likely the “merit” (fukutoku 福德) of accepting the robe and studying the dharma.

32 the transmission of the dharma by the ancestral masters (soshi denbō 祖師傳法): The term soshi 祖師 (“ancestral master”) may refer here specifically to Bodhidharma.

33 Even animals repay beneficence (chikurui nao on o hōzu 畜類なほ恩を報ず): In “Shōbōgenzō gyōji” 正法眼藏行持, part 2, Dōgen refers to two famous Chinese stories, in which a sparrow and a tortoise express their gratitude for help given them by humans.

Even in the secular world it is said, “If they are not the raiment of the prior kings, they do not wear them; if they are not the laws of the prior kings, they do not promulgate them.”<sup>35</sup> The way of the buddhas is also like this: if it is not the dharma garment of the prior buddhas, we should not use it. If it is something other than the dharma garment of the prior buddhas, what could we wear to practice the way of the buddhas, to pay our respects to the buddhas? Those who do not wear this, will surely find it difficult to enter a buddha assembly.

buddha dharma, but only of names and appearances learned from treatise masters or scholars of the tripiṭaka. As a result, they do not even report that the buddha robe should be directly transmitted; they do not say that they met with anyone who had directly received transmission of the buddha robe; they do not state that they saw or heard of anyone transmitting the robe. It is clear that they did not enter the inner sanctum of the house of the buddhas. These types recognize [the robe] solely as clothing and do not know it as something esteemed by the buddha dharma. Truly pitiful.

Among the direct descendants of the transmission of the treasury of the buddha dharma, the buddha robe is also transmitted and inherited. The point that there are no ancestral masters of the direct transmission of the treasury of the dharma that have not seen and heard of the buddha robe is something widely known among humans and in the heavens. This being the case, truly it is only in the family business of the direct transmission that the material, color, and dimensions of the buddha kāṣāya have been directly transmitted and correctly seen and heard; that the great merit of the buddha kāṣāya was transmitted; that the mind and body, bones and marrow of the buddha kāṣāya were directly transmitted — these are not something known in the various house styles of the teachings of the āgamas.<sup>38</sup> What they set up by themselves, from their own ideas, is not the direct transmission, is not a direct descendant.<sup>39</sup>

わが大師釋迦牟尼如來、正法眼藏無上菩提を摩訶迦葉に附授するに、佛衣ともに傳附せりしより、嫡嫡相承して、曹溪山大鑑禪師にいたるに、三十三代なり。その體・色・量を親見・親傳せること、家門、ひさしくつたはれて、受持、いまにあらたなり。すなはち五宗の高祖、おのおの受持せる、それ正傳なり。あるいは五十餘代、あるひは四十餘代、おのおの師資みだることなく、先佛の法によりて搭し、先佛の法によりて製すること、唯佛與佛の相傳し證契して、代代をふるに、おなじくあらたなり。

When our Great Master, Tathāgata Śākyamuni, bequeathed the treasury of the true dharma eye, the unsurpassed bodhi, to Mahākāśyapa, he passed it on together with the buddha robe; and thereafter, it was inherited by successor after successor, until it reached Chan Master Dajian of Mount Caoxi, in the thirty-third generation. The personal experience and personal transmission of its material, color, and dimensions have long been handed down in our house, and the receiving and keeping of them are apparent even now. That is, what each of the eminent ancestors of the five lineages received and kept is the direct transmission.<sup>40</sup> Whether for fifty-odd generations or forty-odd generations, without disruption, the masters and disciples donned it in accordance with the dharma of the prior buddhas and tailored it in accordance with the dharma of the prior buddhas; and this, too, transmitted and verified by “only buddhas with buddhas,” remains apparent through generation after generation.<sup>41</sup> selves, from their own ideas” or “those who set up something by themselves, from their own ideas.”

40 the eminent ancestors of the five lineages (goshū no kōso 五宗の高祖): I.e., the ancestral masters of the five houses (goke 五家) into which the Song-dynasty historians organized the Chan tradition: Weiyang 滄仰, Linji 臨濟, Caodong 曹洞, Yunmen 雲門, and Fayen 法眼. The term kōso 高祖 is used most often in reference to a founding ancestor, but Dōgen uses it also as a term of respect for other eminent monks. The point here seems to be that, while of course the members of the five houses did not transmit the original robe of the buddha, what they did “receive and keep” was “the direct transmission” of that robe — either in the sense that their robes replicate it or that their teachings preserve its tradition.

42 In the instructions of the buddha directly transmitted by successor after successor (tekiteki shōden suru bukkun ni 嫡嫡正傳する佛訓に): The source of the list that follows is unknown, and its content differs from standard descriptions of the nine levels of robe, which typically describe the 9-, 11-, and 13-panel robes as composed of two long strips and one short strip of cloth in each panel, with 15-, 17-, and 19-panel robes having three long and one short, and 21-, 23-, and 25-panel robes having four long and one short. Such is the description, quoted from the Yiqie you bu baiyi jiemo 一切有部百一羯磨, that Dōgen provides in his “Shōbōgenzō kesa kudoku” 正法眼藏袈裟功德. The Chan monks’ practice of wearing a nine-panel kāśāya of three or four long sections is criticized by the Song-dynasty vinaya scholar Yuanzhao 元照 (1048-1116) at Fozhi biqiu liuwu tu 佛制比丘六物圖 (T.1900.45:899a2-4).

two-hundred-fifty-panel robe: four long, one short (nihyakugojū jō e shichō ittan 二百五十條衣四長一短); eighty-four-thousand-panel robe: eight long, one short (hachiman shisen jō e hatchō ittan 八萬四千條衣八長一短); Dōgen here playfully extends his list to include what is doubtless meant to suggest a robe composed of the two hundred fifty precepts of the Buddhist monk and a robe of the eighty-four thousand teachings of the Buddha (or, perhaps, simply “countless things”).

いま略して擧するなり。このほか、諸般の袈裟あるなり、ともにこれ僧伽梨衣なるべし。

I give here an abbreviated summary. There are, in addition to these, various kinds of kāṣāya, all of which should be considered saṃghāti robes.

あるひは在家にしても受持し、あるひは出家にしても受持す。受持するといふは、着用するなり。いたづらに、たたみもちたらんずるにあらざるなり。たとひ、かみ・ひげをそれども、袈裟を受持せず、袈裟をにくみいとひ、袈裟をおそるは、天魔外道なり。

Some receive and keep [the robe] as householders; some receive and keep it as renunciants. To “receive and keep it” means to wear it; it does not mean merely keeping it folded up to no avail. Even if they shave off their hair and beards, those who do not receive and keep the kāṣāya, who abhor and reject the kāṣāya, who fear the kāṣāya, are Deva Māras and followers of other paths.

百丈大智禪師いはく、宿殖の善種なきものは、袈裟をいむなり、袈裟をいとふなり、正法をおそれいとふなり。

Chan Master Dazhi of Baizhang said, “Those without good seeds planted in former lives shun the kāṣāya, reject the kāṣāya, fear and hate the kāṣāya.<sup>43</sup>

佛言、若有衆生、入我法中、或犯重罪、或墮邪見、於一念中、敬心尊重僧伽梨衣、諸佛及我、必於三乘、授記此人當得作佛。若天・若龍・若人・若鬼、若能恭敬此人袈裟少分功德、即得三乘不退不轉。若有鬼神及諸衆生、能得袈裟乃至四寸、飲食充足。若有衆生、共相違反、欲墮邪見、念袈裟力、依袈裟力、尋生悲心、還得清淨。若有人在兵陣、持此袈裟少分、恭敬尊重、當得解脫。

43 Chan Master Dazhi of Baizhang (Hyakujō Daichi zenji 百丈大智禪師): i.e., Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 (749-814). The source of this saying, given in Japanese, is unknown.

If there is a living being who, having entered my dharma, either commits grave offenses or sinks into false views, but who for even a single thought reverently respects the saṃghāti robe, then all the other buddhas and I, [for those] in the three vehicles, will certainly confer a prediction that this person will become a buddha. Whether devas, dragons, humans, or demons, if they can venerate the merit of even a small part of this person's kāṣāya, they will attain non-regression in the three vehicles.<sup>45</sup> If there are demons and spirits or other living beings who can obtain even so much as four inches of the kāṣāya, they will have plenty to eat and drink. If there are living beings opposing one another, about to fall into false views, if they think on the power of the kāṣāya and rely on the power of the kāṣāya, they will quickly give rise to the thought of compassion and gain purity. If there people in the military, if they keep even a small part of this kāṣāya, respecting and valuing it, they will attain liberation.

しかあればしりぬ、袈裟の功德、それ無上不可思議なり。これを信受護持するところに、かならず得授記あるべし、得不退あるべし。ただ釋迦牟尼佛のみにあらず、一切諸佛、またかくのごとく宣説しますなり。

44 The Buddha said (Butsu gon 佛言): Abbreviated version of a vow, found in the Karuṇā-puṇḍarīka-sūtra (Peihua jing 悲華經, T.157.3:220a10-b6), that Dōgen also quotes in his “Shōbōgenzō kesa kudoku” 正法眼藏袈裟功德. The version here, given in Chinese, is akin to (though not identical with) summaries of the sūtra passage found in the Shishi yaolan 釋氏要覽, by Daocheng 道誠 (T.2127.54:269c21-28), and the Lüzong xinxue mingju 律宗新學名句, by Weixian 惟顯 (ZZ.105:638b8-13); the latter reads:

袈裟五種功德(悲華經)。一入我法中、或犯重邪見、於一念中、敬心尊重、必於三乘授記。二天龍人鬼、若能恭敬此人袈裟少分、即得三乘不退。三若有鬼神諸人、得袈裟乃至四寸、飲食充足。四若衆生共相違反、念袈裟力、尋生悲心。五若在兵陣、持此少分恭敬尊重、當得解脫。

The five kinds of merit of the kāṣāya (from the Peihua jing): (1) If there are those who, having entered my dharma, have a grave offense or false view, but who for even a single thought reverently respect it, then [for those] in the three vehicles, I will certainly confer a prediction. (2) If there are devas, dragons, humans, or demons who can venerate even a small part of this person's kāṣāya, then they will attain non-regression in the three vehicles. (3) If there are demons, spirits, or humans who obtain even so much as four inches of the kāṣāya, they will have plenty to eat and drink. (4) If there are living beings opposing one another who think on the power of the kāṣāya, they will quickly give rise to the thought of compassion. (5) If there are those in the military who keep even a small part of it, respecting and valuing it, they will attain liberation.

45 non-regression in the three vehicles (sanjō futai futen 三乘不退不轉): I.e., will not backslide on the spiritual paths of śrāvaka, pratyeka-buddha, and bodhisattva; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Three vehicles.”

Thus, we know that the merit of the kāśāya is unsurpassed, is inconceivable. Where we believe and preserve it, we shall surely get a prediction, surely attain non-regression. Not only Buddha Śākyamuni but all the buddhas explain it like this.

しるべし、ただ諸佛の體相、すなはち袈裟なり。かるがゆえに、佛言、當墮惡道者、厭惡僧伽梨。

We should recognize that the substance and characteristics of the buddhas are just this kāśāya. That is why the Buddha said, “Those who will fall into the evil paths, hate the saṃghāti.”<sup>46</sup>

しかあればすなはち、袈裟を見聞せんところに、厭惡の念おこらんには、當墮惡道のわがみなるべし、と悲心を生ずべきなり、慚愧懺悔すべきなり。

Thus, when hateful thoughts arise upon our seeing or hearing of the kāśāya, we should produce the thought of remorse that we “will fall into the evil paths” and should feel ashamed and repent.

Not to mention Buddha Śākyamuni. It is said that, on the occasion when he first left the royal palace and was entering the mountains, a tree spirit held up a saṃghāti robe and said to Buddha Śākyamuni, “By placing this robe on your head, you will avoid every sort of confusion caused by Māra.” Whereupon, Buddha Śākyamuni received the robe, placed it on his head, and spent twelve years without ever setting it aside even for a moment. This is an account in the āgama sūtras.<sup>47</sup>

46 The Buddha said (butsu gon 佛言): The source is unknown. The “evil paths” (akudō 惡道) refers to the three lower realms of rebirth: animal, hungry ghost, and hell-being; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Six paths.”

47 This is an account in the āgama sūtras (kore agon gyō tō no setsu nari これ阿含經等の説なり): Just what sūtra Dōgen may have had in mind here is uncertain. His account, given in Japanese, is likely based on a passage in the seventh-century encyclopedia Fayuan zhulin 法苑珠林 (T.2122.53:560a26ff). The reference to “twelve years” reflects the tradition, found, e.g., in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:205b12-24), that Prince Siddhārtha spent six years in ascetic practice and another six in meditation; the Fayuan zhulin version gives the standard “six years of ascetic practice” (rokunen kugyō 六年苦行).

あるいはいふ、袈裟はこれ吉祥服なり。これを服用するもの、かならず勝位にいたる。おほよそ世界に、この僧伽梨衣の現前せざる時節なきなり。一時の現前は、長劫中事なり、長劫中事は、一時來なり。袈裟を得するは、佛標幟を得するなり。このゆえに、諸佛如來の、袈裟を受持せざる、いまだあらず。袈裟を受持せしともがらの、作佛せざる、あらざるなり。

It is also said that the kāṣāya is a “vestment of felicity”; those who wear it invariably reach high position.<sup>48</sup> More generally, there is never a time when this saṃghāti robe does not appear in the world. Its appearance at one time is an event of long kalpas; the event of long kalpas comes at one time.<sup>49</sup> To obtain a kāṣāya is to obtain the banner of the buddhas. Therefore, there has never been a case in which the buddhas, the tathāgatas, failed to receive and keep the kāṣāya; and there are none among those who have received and kept the kāṣāya who do not become buddhas.

搭袈裟法

偏袒右肩は常途の法なり。通兩肩搭の法もあり。兩端ともに左の臂肩にかさねかくるに、前頭を表面にかさね、前頭を裏面にかさね、後頭を表面にかさね、後頭を裏面にかさぬること、佛威儀の一時あり。この儀は、諸聲聞衆の見聞し、相傳するところにあらず、諸阿笈摩教の經典に、もらしとくにあらず。おほよそ佛道に袈裟を搭する威儀は、現前せる傳正法の祖師、かならず受持せるところなり。受持、かならずこの祖師に受持すべし。

Procedure for donning the kāṣāya:

Baring the right shoulder is the usual procedure.<sup>50</sup> There is also a procedure for wearing it over both shoulders. When doubling it up, so that the two ends are both over the left arm and shoulder, the front edge is folded over the front surface; or the front edge is folded over the back surface; or the back edge is folded over the front surface; or the back edge is folded over the back surface — depending on the occasion, this is the deportment of a buddha. These forms are not seen or heard of, are not something transmitted by, communities of śrāvakas; they are omitted and not explained in the scriptures that contain the teachings of the āgamas. More generally, the deportment for donning the kāṣāya in the way of the buddhas is something always received and kept by the ancestral masters, right before us, who transmit the true dharma. In receiving and keeping it, we should always receive and keep it with these ancestral masters.<sup>51</sup>

48 “vestment of felicity” (kichijō fuku 吉祥服): Or “auspicious vestment”; the expression does not, in fact, seem to be a common one, and Dōgen’s source for it is unclear.

49 an event of long kalpas (chōgōchū ji 長劫中事): An unusual expression, here probably meaning “a thing that lasts forever” (rather than “a thing extremely rare”).

50 Baring the right shoulder (hendān uken 偏袒右肩): A fixed expression for the standard practice of draping the kāṣāya over the left shoulder only.

佛祖正傳の袈裟は、これすなはち佛佛正傳みだりにあらず。先佛後佛の袈裟なり、古佛新佛の袈裟なり。道を化し、佛を化す。過去を化し、現在を化し、未來を化するに、過去より現在に正傳し、現在より未來に正傳し、現在より過去に正傳し、過去より過去に正傳し、現在より現在に正傳し、未來より未來に正傳し、未來より現在に正傳し、未來より過去に正傳して、唯佛與佛の正傳なり。

The kāṣāya directly transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors — this is directly transmitted by buddha after buddha without disruption. It is the kāṣāya of prior buddhas and later buddhas; it is the kāṣāya of old buddhas and new buddhas. It converts the way; it converts the buddhas.<sup>52</sup> In converting the past, converting the present, and converting the future, it is the direct transmission of “only buddhas with buddhas” that is directly transmitted from past to present, directly transmitted from present to future, directly transmitted from present to past, directly transmitted from past to past, directly transmitted from present to present, directly transmitted from future to future, directly transmitted from future to present, directly transmitted from future to past.

このゆえに、祖師西來よりこのかた、大唐より大宋にいたる數百歳のあひだ、講經の達者、おのれが業を見徹せるものおほく、教家・律教等のともがら、佛法にいますとき、從來舊巢の弊衣なる袈裟を抛却して、佛道正傳の袈裟を正受するなり。かの因縁、すなはち傳・廣・續・普燈等の錄につらなれり。教・律局量の小見を解脱して、佛祖正傳の大道をたふとみし、みな佛祖となれり。いまの人も、むかしの祖師をまなぶべし。

For this reason, from the time that the Ancestral Master came from the west, for several hundred years from the Great Tang to the Great Song, there were many adepts in lecturing on the sūtras who saw into their own deeds, those of the teaching houses and vinaya teachings who, when they entered the buddha dharma, abandoned the kāṣāya of the tattered robe of their previous old nest and properly received the kāṣāya directly transmitted in the way of the buddhas.<sup>53</sup> Their cases appear one after another in the records of the Chuan, Guang, Xu, Pudeng, and the like.<sup>54</sup> Liberating themselves from the small views confined to the teachings and vinaya, they esteemed the great way directly transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors, and all became buddhas and ancestors. People now as well should learn from the ancestral masters of old.

51 we should always receive and keep it with these ancestral masters (juji, kanarazu kono soshi ni juji su beshi 受持、かならずこの祖師に受持すべし): The exact sense is uncertain. The antecedent of “it” here could be either the kāṣāya or the “deportment” of the previous sentence, while the particle ni に, translated “with” here, might also be rendered “from,” “by,” “in accordance with,” etc.

52 It converts the way; it converts the buddhas (dō o keshi, butsu o kesu 道を化し、佛を化す): The verb ke 化 (“to change,” “to transform,” etc.) is usually understood here as kyōke 教化 (“to teach,” “to guide,” “to convert,” etc.); hence, the claim seems to be that the robe teaches the dharma to Buddhism and to the buddhas.

If we are to receive and keep the kāṣāya, we should directly transmit and believe in the directly transmitted kāṣāya; we should not receive and keep a counterfeit kāṣāya. The “directly transmitted kāṣāya” means the present one that was directly transmitted from Shaolin and Caoxi, the inheritance of which by successor after successor from the Tathāgata has not lapsed for even a single generation.<sup>55</sup> For this reason, it depends on our truly accepting the work of the way and personally laying hands on the buddha robe.

the teaching houses and vinaya teachings (kyōke ritsukyō 教法・律教): In Dōgen's day, elite, state-supported Buddhist monasteries in China were commonly divided into three types, according to the lineages of their abbots: Teachings (jiao 教), Vinaya (lǜ 律), and Zen (chan 禪).

the tattered robe of their previous old nest (jūrai kyūsō no heie 從來舊巢の弊衣): I.e., the ragged or improper (hei 弊) robes of their previous Buddhist commitments. “Old nest” (kyūsō 舊巢) is likely a synonym for the more common “old den” (kyūka 舊窠), regularly used for old or habitual ways of thinking; here, perhaps, “former sectarian affiliations.”

54 records of the Chuan, Guang, Xu, Pudeng, and the like (Den Kō Zoku Futō tō no roku 傳・廣・續・普燈等の録): I.e., the major collections of Chan hagiography: the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (compiled in 1004), Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄 (1036), Jianzhong Jingguo xudeng lu 建中靖國續燈錄 (1101), and Jiatai pudeng lu 嘉泰普燈錄 (1204).

55 directly transmitted from Shaolin and Caoxi (Shōrin Sōkei yori shōden seru 少林・曹溪より正傳せる): I.e., passed down in the lineage descended from Bodhidharma and the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能.

佛道は佛道に正傳す、閑人の傳得に一任せざるなり。俗諺にいはく、千聞は一見にしかず、千見は一經にしかず。これをもてかへりみれば、千見萬聞たとひありとも、一得にしかず、佛衣正傳せるにしくべからざるなり。正傳あるをうたがふべくは、正傳をゆめにもみざらんは、いよいようたがふべし。佛經を傳聞せんよりは、佛衣正傳せらんはしたしかるべし。千經萬得ありとも、一證にしかじ。佛祖は證契なり、教・律の凡流にならふべからず。

The way of the buddhas is directly transmitted in the way of the buddhas; it is not left to dissemination by the idle. A secular adage says, “Hearing it a thousand times is not like seeing it once; seeing it once is not like experiencing it once.”<sup>56</sup> If we consider this, even seeing it a thousand times and hearing it ten thousand times are not like getting it once; they could not be like having received the direct transmission of the buddha robe. If one is to doubt that there is a direct transmission, those who do not see the direct transmission even in their dreams will surely be even more doubtful. Those who directly transmit the buddha robe are surely more familiar with it than those who would spread rumors about the sūtras of the buddhas. Even experiencing it a thousand times and getting it ten thousand times are not like verifying it once. The buddhas and ancestors are the verification and accordance; we should not learn from the common followers of the teachings and precepts.

おほよそ祖門の袈裟の功德は、正傳まさしく相承せり、本様まのあたりつたはれり。受持、あひ嗣法して、いまにたえず。正受せる人、みなこれ證契傳法の祖師なり、十聖三賢にもすぐる。奉觀恭敬し、禮拜頂戴すべし。

In sum, regarding the merit of the kāśāya of the ancestral tradition, its direct transmission has truly been inherited, and its original appearance has been handed down right before us. The receiving and keeping of it are [passed down in] inheritance of the dharma and are not cut off even now. The people who have directly received it are all ancestral masters who verify the accord and transmit the dharma; they surpass even the ten sages and three worthies.<sup>57</sup> We should attend and venerate them, pay obeisance to them and hold them aloft.

56 A secular adage says (zokugen ni iwaku 俗諺にいはく): The usual form of the Chinese proverb is simply “Hearing a thousand times is not like seeing once” (qianwen buru yijian 千聞不如一見).

57 ten sages and three worthies (jisshō sanken 十聖三賢): Advanced bodhisattvas on the ten stages (S. bhūmi) of the path and the three bhadra levels preceding them.

ひとたびこの佛衣正傳の道理、この身心に信受せられん、すなはち値佛の兆なり、學佛の道なり。不堪受是法ならん、悲生なるべし。この袈裟を、ひとたび身體におほはん、決定成菩提の護身符子なりと深肯すべし。一句一偈を信心にそめつれば、長劫の光明にして、虧闕せずといふ。一法を身心にそめん、亦復如是なるべし。

To believe even once, with this body and mind, the truth of the direct transmission of the buddha robe is itself a sign of meeting the buddhas, is the way of studying the buddhas. To be “incapable of receiving this dharma” is surely to have a pitiful life.<sup>58</sup> We should deeply affirm that this kāṣāya, once draped over our body, is a protective talisman that makes one certain to achieve bodhi.<sup>59</sup> It is said that, if one line or one gāthā is dyed into the believing mind, it stays bright for long kalpas without dimming. To dye the body and mind with one dharma is surely also like this.

かの心念も無所住なり。我有にかかはれずといへども、その功德、すでにしかあり。身體も無所住なりといへども、しかあり。袈裟、無所從來なり、亦無所去なり。我有にあらず、他有にあらずといへども、所持のところに現住し、受持の人に加す。所得功德も、またかくのごとくなるべし。

That thought is without abode.<sup>60</sup> Although it has nothing to do with the self's possessions, its merit is like this.<sup>61</sup> Although the body, too, is without abode, it is like this. The kāṣāya is “without any place whence it comes,” and is “without any place where it goes.”<sup>62</sup> Although it is not 58 “incapable of receiving this dharma” (fukan ju ze hō 不堪受是法): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:7c17), said by Buddha Śākyamuni of the five thousand followers who withdrew from his assembly before he preached the sūtra:

These people are lacking in merit and incapable of receiving this dharma.

59 certain to achieve bodhi (ketsujō jō bodai 決定成菩提): A fixed phrase for the bodhisattva assured of attaining buddhahood.

60 That thought is without abode (kano shinnen mo mushojū nari かの心念も無所住なり): The antecedent of “that thought” is uncertain. Given its juxtaposition with the following “body” (shintai 身體), it likely refers to the “believing mind” of the “body and mind.” “Without abode” is a standard term in Buddhist literature for the “emptiness” of the referents of our conceptual thought.

61 Although it has nothing to do with the self's possessions (gau ni kakawarezu to iedomo 我有にかかはれずといへども): The unexpressed grammatical subject is likely “that thought”: i.e., while our belief in the kāṣāya may not belong to us, the merit of such belief is as described above.

62 “without any place whence it comes,” and is “without any place where it goes” (mu sho jūrai nari, yaku mu sho ko nari 無所從來なり、亦無所去なり): A fixed phrase the possession of the self, and not the possession of the other, it presently abides where it is maintained and empowers the person who receives and keeps it.<sup>63</sup> The merit obtained from it must also be like this.

The “making” involved in making the kāṣāya is not the “making” of common people or sages.<sup>64</sup> Its essential point is not something exhaustively investigated by the ten sages and three worthies. Those without seeds of the way planted in former lives, though they pass through one lifetime or two lifetimes or even incalculable lifetimes, will not see the kāṣāya, will not hear of the kāṣāya, will not know of the kāṣāya. How much less could they receive and keep it? The merit of having it once touch one’s body, some get and others do not. Those who have already got it should rejoice; those who have not yet got it should hope for it; those who cannot get it should grieve.

大千界の内外に、ただ佛祖の門下のみに佛衣つたはれること、人天ともに見聞普知せり。佛衣の様子をあきらむることも、ただ祖門のみなり、餘門にはしらず。これをしらざらんもの、自己をうらみざらんは愚人なり。たとひ八萬四千の三昧陀羅尼をしれりとも、佛祖の衣法を正傳せず、袈裟の正傳をあきらめざらんは、諸佛の正嫡なるべからず。

Inside and out of the great chiliocosm, that the buddha robe is passed down only in the tradition of the buddhas and ancestors is seen, heard, in Mahāyāna literature, best known, perhaps, from the Diamond Sūtra (Jingang bore boluomi jing 金剛般若波羅蜜經, T.235.8:752b3-5), where it is used in a play on the term tathāgata:

須菩提、若有人言如來若來若去若坐若臥、是人不解我所說義。何以故。如來者無所從來亦無所去、故名如來。

Subhūti, if there were a person who said, “The tathāgata [‘thus-come one’] may come or may go, may sit or may recline,” that person would not understand the meaning of what I have preached. Why? Because the tathāgata has no place whence he comes and has no place where he goes; therefore, he is called the “thus-come one.”

63 empowers the person who receives and keeps it (juji no hito ni ka su 受持の人に加す): Taking ka 加 as kabi 加被 (“to empower,” “to protect”).

64 common people or sages (bonshō 凡聖): The two categories of Buddhists: ordinary people (bonbu 凡夫; S. prthagjana) and the advanced “nobles” (shōja 聖者; S. ārya).

and widely known by humans and devas alike.<sup>65</sup> The understanding of the design of the buddha robe, too, is limited to the tradition of the ancestors and is not known in other traditions. Those who do not know it and yet do not regret their state are fools. Even though they know eighty-four thousand samādhi and dhāraṇī, those who do not directly transmit the robe and dharma of the buddhas and ancestors, and are not clear about the direct transmission of the kāśāya, are surely not direct descendants of the buddhas.<sup>66</sup>

他界の衆生は、いくばくかねがふらん、震旦國に正傳せるがごとく、佛衣まさしく正傳せんことを。おのれがくにに正傳せざること、はづるおもひあるらん、かなしむころふかかるらん。

How the living beings of other realms must wish that the buddha robe had truly been directly transmitted to them, as it has been directly transmitted to the Land of Cīnasthāna. They must have feelings of shame and a deep sense of sorrow that it has not been directly transmitted to their land.

まことに如來世尊の衣法正傳せる法に値遇する、宿殖般若の大功德種子によるなり。いま末法惡時世は、おのれが正傳なきことをはぢず、正傳をそねむ魔儻おほし。おのれが所有・所住は、眞實のおのれにあらざるなり。ただ正傳を正傳せん、これ學佛の直道なり。

Truly, to encounter the dharma in which the robe and dharma of the Tathāgata, the World-Honored One, has been directly transmitted depends on seeds of great merit from the prajñā of former lives. In the present evil age at the end of the dharma, there are many minions of Māra who detest the direct transmission and feel no shame that they lack the direct transmission. Their possessions and abode are not their true self.<sup>67</sup> Only to transmit directly the direct transmission — this the direct path to the study of Buddhism.

65 the great chiliocosm (dai sen kai 大千界): A buddha's realm, consisting of one billion worlds.

66 eighty-four thousand samādhi and dhāraṇī (hachiman shisen no zanmai darani 八萬四千の三昧陀羅尼): The expression zanmai darani 三昧陀羅尼 occurs with some frequency in Buddhist literature as a pair; some readers take it here (and in the “Shōbōgenzō darani” 正法眼藏陀羅尼) as a tatpuruṣa referring to a particular type of dhāraṇī.

67 Their possessions and abode are not their true self (onore ga sho'u shojū wa, shinjitsu no onore ni arazaru nari おのれが所有・所住は、眞實のおのれにあらざるなり): Presumably, harking back to the “possessions” (sho'u 所有) and “abode” (shojū 所住) introduced in section 38, above. The translation takes this as a reference to the “minions of Māra,” but it could also be read as a general statement.

おほよそしるべし、袈裟はこれ佛身なり、佛心なり。また解脱服と稱し、福田衣と稱す。忍辱衣と稱し、無相衣と稱し、慈悲衣と稱し、如來衣と稱し、阿耨多羅三藐三菩提衣と稱するなり。まさにかくのごとく受持すべし。

In sum, we should realize that the kāṣāya is the buddha body, is the buddha mind. It is also called the “vestment of liberation,” called the “robe that is a field of merit.”<sup>68</sup> It is called the “robe of forbearance,” called the “formless robe,” called the “robe of compassion,” called the “robe of the Tathāgata,” called the “robe of anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.”<sup>69</sup> We should receive and keep it in this way.

いま現在大宋國の律學と名稱するともがら、聲聞酒に酔狂するによりて、おのれが家門に、しらぬいえを傳來することを慚愧せず、うらみず、覺知せず。西天より傳來せる袈裟、ひさしく漢唐につたはれることをあらためて、小量にしたがふる、これ小見によりてしかあり、小見のはづべきなり。もしいまなんぢが小量の衣をもちいるがごときは、佛威儀おほく虧闕することあらん。佛儀を學傳せることのあまねからざるによりて、かくのごとくあり。

Today, in the present Land of the Great Song, those who call themselves “vinaya scholars,” drunk on the wine of the śrāvaka, are not ashamed, do not regret, do not perceive, that, in their house, they have transmitted an ignorant tradition.<sup>70</sup> They revise the fact that the kāṣāya transmitted from Sindh in the West has long been handed down in the Han and Tang, and adopt a small size; this is due to their small view, and

69 “robe of forbearance” (ninniku e 忍辱衣): Likely reflecting a verse in the Lotus Sūtra; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Robe of the Tathāgata.”

70 drunk on the wine of the śrāvaka (shōmon shu ni suikyō suru 聲聞酒に酔狂する): I.e., under the influence of the Small Vehicle, a pejorative appearing elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō. The particular “vinaya scholars” (ritsugaku 律學) in question here have not been identified.

they should be ashamed of this small view.<sup>71</sup> You who use small robes must have many deficiencies in the deportment of the buddhas. Things are like this because the study and transmission of the observances of the buddhas are not widespread.

如來の身心、ただ祖門に正傳して、かれらが家業に流散せざること、あきらかなり。もし萬一も佛儀をしらば、佛衣をやぶるべからず。文なほあきらめず、宗いまだきくべからず。

It is clear that the body and mind of the Tathāgata are directly transmitted only in the tradition of the ancestors and have not been disseminated in their family enterprise. If they knew even one among the myriad observances of the buddhas, they would not destroy the buddha robe. Unclear even of the words, they could not have heard their meaning.

又、ひとへに麤布を衣財にさだむ、ふかく佛法にそむく。ことに佛衣をやぶれり、佛弟子きるべきにあらず。ゆえはいかん。布見を舉して、袈裟をやぶれり。あはれむべし、小乗聲聞の見、まさに迂曲かなしむべきことを。なんぢが布見やぶれてのち、佛衣見成すべきなり。いふところの絹・布の用は、一佛二佛の道にあらず、諸佛の大法として、糞掃を上品清淨の衣財とせるなり。そのなかに、しばらく十種の糞掃をつらぬるに、絹類あり、布類あり、餘帛の類もあり。絹類の糞掃をとるべからざるか。もしかくのごとくならば、佛道に相違す。絹すでにきはば、布またきらふべし。絹・布きらふべき、そのゆえなにかある。絹絲は殺生より生ぜるときらふ、おほきにわらふべきなり、布は生物の縁にあらざるか。情非情の情、いまだ凡情の情を解脱せず、いかでか佛袈裟をしらん。

Again, to stipulate only coarse plant fiber as the robe material seriously violates the buddha dharma. This has been particularly destructive of the buddha robe and is not something that disciples of the Buddha should wear. Why? By taking up views about plant fiber, they have destroyed the kāśāya.<sup>72</sup> How pitiful, that the views of the srāvaka of the Small Vehicle are truly twisted. After your views on plant fiber are refuted, the buddha robe will appear. The use of silk or plant fiber I am speaking of

72 views about plant fiber (fuken 布見): Or “views about cloth.” The term fu 布 can refer to cloth in general or, as in this discussion, to cloth made of plant fiber, as opposed to silk (or wool); the cloth in question can include cotton, linen, hemp, ramie, etc.

is not a saying of one buddha or two buddhas: as the great dharma of all the buddhas, discarded rags have been taken as high quality, pure robe material.<sup>73</sup> Among them, if for the moment we list the ten types of discarded rags, there are those of silk, there are those of plant fiber, there are those of other fibers.<sup>74</sup> Should we not take the discarded rags of silk? In that case, we contradict the words of the Buddha. If we were to hate silk, we should also hate plant fiber. What reason do we have to hate silk and plant fiber? To hate silk thread because it has been produced by taking life is hugely laughable: is not plant fiber connected with living things?<sup>75</sup> The sentience of sentient and insentient is still not liberated from the sentiment of the commoner's sentiment.<sup>76</sup> How could it know the buddha kāṣāya?

73 discarded rags (funzō 糞掃): Loose rendering of a term, meaning something like “soiled sweepings,” used for the Sanskrit pāṃsukūla (“dung heap”), to designate soiled cloth taken from refuse and used to make the Buddhist robe.

74 ten types of discarded rags (jisshu no funzō 十種の糞掃): A list, found in the Sifen lü 四分律, provided near the end of this chapter, section 66.

those of silk (kenrui 絹類); those of plant fiber (furui 布類); those of other fibers (yohaku no rui 餘帛の類): The list of ten types of rags does not, in fact, mention the fabrics from which they are made. It is not clear what “other fibers” Dōgen may have in mind here. The term haku 帛 (rendered “fiber” here) can refer both to fabrics in general and to silk in particular; hence, it may here indicate various types of silk.

75 To hate silk thread because it has been produced by taking life (kenshi wa sesshō yori shōzeru to kirau 絹絲は殺生より生ぜるときらふ): A standard Buddhist argument against the practice of wearing robes made from silk, the production of which requires the stifling of the pupae of the silkworms inside their cocoons.

is not plant fiber connected with living things? (fu wa shōbutsu no en ni arazaru ka 布は生物の縁にあらざるか): A tentative translation; the meaning of en 縁 (“connection,” “condition,” “occasion,” etc.) here is unclear. Buddhists have no prohibition against killing plants; so, it may be that Dōgen means simply that the agricultural process of producing plant fiber involves the taking of life (for which reason, it is said, monks are prohibited from farming).

76 The sentience of sentient and insentient is still not liberated from the sentiment of the commoner's sentiment (jō hijō no jō, imada bonjō no jō o gedatsu sezu 情非情の情、いまだ凡情の情を解脱せず): A play on the term jō 情 (“feeling”) used for both “sentient” and “insentient” beings, and for the “sentiment,” or “emotions,” of the ordinary person. Elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, Dōgen questions the distinction between sentient and insentient beings.

Again, there is the confused talk that introduces a theory of transformation thread; this is also laughable.<sup>77</sup> What is not a transformation? Although you trust the ears that hear of transformation, you doubt the eyes that see the transformation. It seems your eyes lack ears and your ears lack eyes. Where are your eyes and ears now?

Now, for a moment, let us recognize that, among the discarded rags that are picked up, there may be those that resemble silk and those that resemble plant fiber; [yet] when we use them, we should not call them “silk,” nor should we call them “plant fiber”: we should call them “discarded rags.” Because they are discarded rags, they are discarded rags and neither silk nor plant fiber. If there were humans or devas that had grown into discarded rags, we would not say [the rags] were sentient: they would just be discarded rags; if there were pines or chrysanthemums that had become discarded rags, we would not say [the rags] were insentient: they would just be discarded rags. When we understand the principle that discarded rags are not silk or plant fiber and are beyond pearls and jade, then the robe of discarded rags appears and is born with the robe of discarded rags.<sup>78</sup> When views of silk or plant fiber have not yet dropped off, we have not seen the discarded rags even in our dreams. Even if we were to receive and keep coarse plant fiber as our kāṣāya for an entire lifetime, as long as we retain views about the cloth, it is not the direct transmission of the buddha robe.

77 transformation thread (keshi 化絲): Likely a reference to the notion that the silk thread of the Buddha's kāṣāya does not involve injury because it does not come from the mouth of the silkworm, but rather emerges as a “transformation,” or “manifestation” (ke 化), or from the mouths of “transformation girls” (kenyo 化女; presumably, females born spontaneously, rather than from the womb) on another continent. (See Fayuan zhulin 法苑珠林, T.2122.53:561a16-23; b22-c8.)

the robe of discarded rags appears and is born with the robe of discarded rags (funzō e wa genjō suru nari, funzō e ni wa mumareau nari 糞掃衣は現成するなり、糞掃衣にはむまれあふなり): A tentative translation, taking the sense to be that the robe appears and is born as a robe of discarded rags; others would read the grammatical subject of the second predicate to be an unexpressed “we” (who have understood the principle).

又、數般の袈裟のなかに、布袈裟あり、絹袈裟あり、皮袈裟あり。ともに諸佛のもちいるところ、佛衣佛功德なり。正傳せる宗旨あり、いまだ斷□せず。しかるを、凡情いまだ解脱せざるともがら、佛法をかるくし、佛語を信ぜず、凡情に隨他去せんと擬する、附佛法の外道といふつべし、壞正法のたぐひなり。

Again, among the various types of kāṣāya, there are plant fiber kāṣāya, there are silk kāṣāya, there are skin kāṣāya.<sup>79</sup> They are all used by the buddhas and are buddha robes with the merits of the buddhas. They have an essential point that has been directly transmitted and even now is not cut off. Nevertheless, those who are not yet liberated from the sentiments of commoners, who make light of the buddha dharma, do not believe the word of the Buddha, and think to follow the sentiment of commoners, may surely be called followers of other paths attached to the buddha dharma, types who despoil the true dharma.

あるひはいふ、天人のおしへによりて佛衣をあらたむ、と。しかあらば、天佛をねがふべし、又天の流類となれるか。佛弟子は、佛法を天人のために宣説すべし、道を天人にとふべからず。あはれむべし、佛法の正傳なきは、かくのごとくなり。

Or they say that the buddha robe was altered according to the instructions of the devas.<sup>80</sup> If that were the case, they should seek deva buddhahood.<sup>81</sup> Or have they become followers of the devas? Disciples of the Buddha should expound the buddha dharma for the devas; they should not ask the devas about the way. How pitiful that those who lack the direct transmission of the buddha dharma are like this.

天衆の見と佛子の見と、大小はるかにことなることあれども、天くだりて法を佛子にとぶらふ。そのゆえは、佛見と天見と、はるかにことなるがゆえなり。律家聲聞の小見、すててまなぶことなかれ、小乗なりとするべし。

Although the view of the devas and the view of the children of the Buddha are vastly different in scope, the devas descend and ask the children of the Buddha about the dharma. The reason is that the view of the 79 skin kāṣāya (hi gesa 皮袈裟): The term hi 皮 (“skin”) may refer to hide, bark, etc.

80 according to the instructions of the devas (tennin no oshie ni yorite 天人のおしへによりて): Perhaps alluding to the tradition (found in the Lüxiang gantong zhuan 律相感通傳, T.1898) that the vinaya master Daoxuan 道宣 (596-667) was aided in his writings on the robe by heavenly beings.

81 deva buddhahood (ten butsu 天佛): A sarcastic neologism, presumably meaning a buddha who is a god (or, perhaps, a god who is a buddha).

buddhas and the view of the devas are vastly different. Throw away the small views of the śrāvaka vinaya masters and do not study them. We should realize that they are the Small Vehicle.

佛言、殺父殺母は懺悔しつべし、謗法は懺悔すべからず。

The Buddha said, “Patricide and matricide can be repented; denigrating the dharma cannot be repented.”<sup>82</sup>

おほよそ、小見狐疑の道は、佛本意にあらず。佛法の大道は、小乗、およぶところなきなり。諸佛の、大戒を正傳すること、付法藏の祖道のほかに、ありとしれるものなし。

In sum, the words of “small views and vulpine suspicions” are not the original intention of the Buddha.<sup>83</sup> The great way of the buddha dharma is not something the Small Vehicle can reach. No one has ever known of a direct transmission of the great precepts of the buddhas apart from the way of the ancestors who bequeath the treasury of the dharma.

むかし黄梅の夜半に、佛の衣法、すでに六祖の頂上に正傳す。まことにこれ、傳法傳衣の正傳なり、五祖の、人をしるによりてなり。四果・三賢のやから、および十聖等のたぐひ、教家の論師・經師等のたぐひは、神秀にさづくべし、六祖に正傳すべからず。しかあれども、佛祖の佛祖を選する、凡聖路を超越するがゆえに、六祖すでに六祖となれるなり。しるべし、佛祖嫡嫡の知人・知己の道理、なほざりに測量すべきところにあらざるなり。

Long ago, in the middle of the night on Huangmei, the robe and dharma of the Buddha were directly transmitted atop the head of the Sixth Ancestor. Truly, this was the direct transmission of the transmission of the dharma and transmission of the robe; it depended on the Fifth Ancestor’s knowing the person. Those of the four fruits or the three worthies, as well as types like the ten sages, types like the treatise masters and sūtra masters of the teaching houses, and the like — they would 82 The Buddha said (butsu gon 佛言): The source of this saying, given here in Japanese, is uncertain.

83 the words of “small views and vulpine suspicions” (shōken kogi no dō 小見狐疑の道): From a line in the Xinxin ming 信心銘, attributed to the Third Ancestor, Sengcan 僧璨 (d. 606) (T.2010.48:376c11-12):

大道體寬、無易無難。小見狐疑、轉急轉遲。

The great way, its substance vast,
With nothing easy, nothing hard;
Small views and vulpine suspicions,
Ever faster, ever slower.

have conferred them on Shenxiu and would not have directly transmitted them to the Sixth Ancestor.<sup>84</sup> However, because the selection of the buddhas and ancestors by the buddhas and ancestors transcends the paths of the common person and the sage, the Sixth Ancestor did become the Sixth Ancestor. We should realize that the principle that successor after successor of buddhas and ancestors knows the person and knows the self is not something to be casually measured.

のちに、ある僧、すなはち六祖にとふ、黄梅の夜半の傳衣、これ布なりとやせん、絹なりとやせん、帛なりとやせん、畢竟じてこれなにものとかせん。六祖いはく、これ布にあらず、これ絹にあらず、これ帛にあらず。

Later, a monk asked the Sixth Ancestor, “The robe transmitted in the middle of the night on Huangmei — do we take it as plant fiber, or take it as thick silk, or take it as fine silk?<sup>85</sup> After all, what do we take it as?”

The Sixth Ancestor said, “It wasn’t plant fiber; it wasn’t thick silk; it wasn’t fine silk.”

曹溪高祖の道、かくのごとし。しるべし、佛衣は絹にあらず、布にあらず、屈胸にあらざるなり。しかあるを、いたづらに絹と認じ、布と認じ、屈胸と認ずるは、謗佛法のたぐひなり、いかにして佛袈裟をしらん。いはんや善來得戒の機縁あり、かれらが所得の袈裟、さらに絹・布の論にあらざるは、佛道の佛訓なり。

Such were the words of the Eminent Ancestor of Caoxi. We should realize that the buddha robe is not thick silk, not plant fiber, not fine cotton.<sup>86</sup> Those who nevertheless regard it as thick silk, regard it as plant fiber, or regard it as fine cotton, are types who slander the buddha dharma; how could they know the buddha kāṣāya? Not to mention those with the opportunity to obtain the precepts with the welcome; that the kāṣāya they receive is not a matter of silk or plant fiber is the buddha instruction on the way of the buddhas.<sup>87</sup>

84 four fruits (shika 四果); three worthies (sanken 三賢); ten sages (jisshō 十聖): I.e., those still on the Buddhist path. The “four fruits” refers to the four stages on the path of the śrāvaka; the “three worthies and ten sages” refer to the stages of the bodhisattva path.

they would have conferred them on Shenxiu (Jinshū ni sazuku beshi 神秀にさづくべし): I.e., they would have chosen Hongren’s accomplished disciple Shenxiu 神秀 (d. 706) to inherit the robe and dharma.

85 a monk (aru sō ある僧): The source of this conversation, given in Japanese, is unknown.

86 fine cotton (kutsujun 屈胸): Reference to the tradition that the robe transmitted by Bodhidharma was made of a fabric called qushun 屈胸, said to be made from Indian cotton. (See, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:236c13.)

87 those with the opportunity to obtain the precepts with the welcome (zenrai tok-

Again, the robe of Śaṇavāsa was a secular garment when he was a householder and became a kāṣāya when he left home.<sup>88</sup> We should quietly make concentrated effort to think about the truth behind this. We should not set it aside as if we had never seen or heard of it. How much more [the fact that] there is an essential point that has been directly transmitted by buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor. The types who count words and letters could not perceive it, could not take its measure. Indeed, how could the thousand changes and a myriad transformations of the way of the buddhas be within the realm of the mediocre. They have samādhi, and they have dhāraṇī; but the bunch that counts sand cannot be expected to see the precious jewel in their robes.<sup>89</sup> kai no kien 善來得戒の機縁): The expression “obtain the precepts with the welcome” refers to the tradition that, at the time of Buddha Śākyamuni, disciples were considered to have been inducted into the order by the Buddha’s act of welcoming them. The term kien 機縁, taken here to mean “karmic circumstances,” or “opportunity,” is interpreted by some readers as “records,” or “episodes.” There is a common trope in the early Buddhist literature that reads,

When the Buddha said, “Welcome, bhikṣu,” his beard and hair fell off by themselves, and a kāṣāya cloaked his body.

In his “Shōbōgenzō senmen” 正法眼藏洗面 and “Shukke” 出家 chapters, Dōgen cites this trope in the case of Mahākāśyapa (from Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:206a2-3).

88 the robe of Śaṇavāsa (Shōnawashu ga e 商那和修が衣): Reference to the legend, recorded in Xuanzang’s 玄奘 Datang xiyu ji 大唐西域記 (T.2087.51:873b28-c5), that the Third Ancestor, Ānanda’s disciple Śaṇavāsa, was born wearing a miraculous robe, which enlarged as he grew, became a monk’s habit when he left home, and a nine-panel saṃghātī robe when he took the full precepts.

89 They have samādhi, and they have dhāraṇī (zanmai ari, darani ari 三昧あり、陀羅尼あり): Taking these as concessive: “[the mediocre] may have their samādhi and their dhāraṇī.” It is also possible to read this, “there are samādhis and there are dhāraṇīs [beyond the realm of the mediocre].”

the precious jewel in their robes (eri no hōjū 衣裏の寶珠): Play with the famous parable in the Lotus Sūtra of the man who is unaware that his friend had sewn a priceless jewel into the lining of his robe; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Jewel in the robe.” In the sūtra, the robe in question is not a monk’s habit, and the jewel represents the man’s unrecognized potential for buddhahood, not the unappreciated significance of the kāṣāya.

bunch that counts sand (sansha no tomogara 算砂のともがら): I.e., those obsessed

いま佛祖正傳せる袈裟の體・色・量を、諸佛の袈裟の正本とすべし。その例、すでに西天東地、古往今來ひさしきなり。正邪を分別せし人、すでに超證しき。祖道のほかに袈裟を稱するありとも、いまだ枝葉とゆるす本祖あらず。いかでか善根の種子をきざさん、いはんや果實あらんや。

The material, color, and dimensions of the present kāṣāya directly transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors should be considered the true original for the kāṣāya of the buddhas. Their precedent is age-old, from ancient times to the present, in Sindh in the West and the Land of the East. People who discriminated the true and false fully realized this.<sup>90</sup> While there may be those outside of the way of the ancestors who claim the kāṣāya, there has never been an original ancestor who acknowledged them as branches and leaves.<sup>91</sup> How could any seeds of good roots ever sprout from them, let alone ever bear fruit?

Now, not only have we seen and heard the buddha dharma that we had yet to meet for vast kalpas, but we have been able to see and hear about the buddha robe, to study the buddha robe, to receive and keep the buddha robe. This is precisely to look upon the Buddha; it is to hear the voice of the Buddha, to emit the radiance of the Buddha, to enjoy what the Buddha enjoys; it is uniquely to transmit the buddha mind; it is to get the buddha marrow.

90 People who discriminated the true and false fully realized this (shōja o funbetsu seshi hito, sude ni chōshō shiki 正邪を分別せし人、すでに超證しき): Probably meaning that those who knew right from wrong recognized this claim. The expression chōshō 超證 is often read as a verb-object compound, “to transcend verification”; but here, it would seem more likely to have the sense “abruptly verify,” or “immediately realize.”

91 an original ancestor who acknowledged them as branches and leaves (shiyō to yurusu honso 枝葉とゆるす本祖): I.e., accepted that they might be offshoots of the “true original” (shōhon 正本). The English “true original” for shōhon 正本 and “original ancestor” for honso 本祖 lose Dōgen’s play here with the botanical terms “root” (hon 本) and “branches and leaves” — a play that continues in the next sentence, with “seeds,” “roots,” and “fruit.”

When I was in the Song, making concentrated effort on the long platform, I observed that, every morning at the breaking of silence, my neighbors seated shoulder to shoulder on the platform would take up the kāṣāya, place it on their heads, and join their palms in veneration.<sup>93</sup> They would silently recite a gāthā. At the time, realizing this was something I had never seen before, I was overcome with joy, and tears of gratitude secretly fell, moistening my lapels. Although, when I had previously perused the āgama sūtras, I had seen the text on placing the kāṣāya on the head, it had not been clear to me.<sup>94</sup> Now, I saw it right before my very eyes. Whereupon, I thought, “What a pity, that when I was in my native land, I had no master to teach me this and met no wise friend to tell me about it. ときにひそかに發願す、いかにしてかわれ不肖なりといふとも、佛法の正嫡を正傳して、郷土の衆生をあはれむに、佛佛正傳の衣法を見聞せしめん。

At that time, I privately made a vow that, however inadequate I might be, I would somehow directly transmit the true succession of the buddha dharma and, out of pity for the living beings in my native land, would let them see and hear of the robe and dharma directly transmitted by buddha after buddha.

My true belief at the time was that, if there were some secret assistance, my vow would not be in vain.<sup>96</sup> Now, children of the Buddha who receive and keep the kāṣāya should without fail exert themselves day and night in the practice of placing it on their heads; this is surely real merit. In seeing and hearing one line or one gāthā, there is surely a case of “whether on trees or on rocks”; the merit of the direct transmission of the kāṣāya is hard to encounter anywhere in the ten directions.<sup>97</sup>

95 to be shoulder to shoulder with the saṃgha treasure (sōbō to, rinken naru 僧寶と、隣肩なる): I.e., sit next to members of the saṃgha, who represent one of the three treasures. Dōgen is playing in this sentence with “shoulder” (ken 肩).

96 if there were some secret assistance (hisoka ni sōshi suru koto araba ひそかに相資することあらば): Presumably meaning some help from the buddhas and ancestors or, perhaps, from other spiritual forces.

97 a case of “whether on trees or on rocks” (nyaku ju nyaku seki no innen 若樹・若石の因縁): Allusion to a well-known story, found in the Nirvāṇa Sūtra, of the “boy of the Himalayas” (Śākyamuni in a previous life) who wrote a Buddhist teaching on trees and rocks; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Whether on trees or on rocks.” Dōgen’s point here seems to be that, whereas one can encounter the Buddhist teachings everywhere, the merit of transmitting the robe is exceedingly rare.

In the winter of the junior water year of the sheep, the seventeenth year of the Jiading era of the Great Song, during the tenth month, there were two monks from the three Korean states who came to the Qingyuan Prefecture.<sup>98</sup> One was called Jihyeon; the other was Gyeongun. These two both spoke constantly of the doctrines of the sūtras of the buddhas and were gentlemen of letters as well. Nevertheless, they had no kāśāya and no bowls, like lay people. How pitiful, the fact that they had the appearance of the bhikṣu without the dharma of the bhikṣu must be due their small country in a peripheral land. When those with the appearance of the bhikṣu in our own domain venture to another land, they will be just like those two monks.

Buddha Śākyamuni kept [the kāśāya] on his head for twelve years, without setting it aside; as his distant descendants, we should learn from this. To turn this head that, for the sake of fame and profit, has bowed to devas, bowed to gods, bowed to kings, and bowed to ministers, toward now accepting the buddha robe on the head is a great felicity in which we should take delight.

These ten kinds are considered especially pure robe materials. They are cast away in the secular world but used in the way of the buddhas. The respective house enterprises of the worldly and the way of the buddhas should be gauged from this. Thus, when we seek what is pure, we should seek these ten types. Having obtained them, we should recognize purity and confirm impurity; we should recognize the mind and confirm the body. Having obtained these ten types, whether they are of silk or of plant fiber, we should consider their impurity and purity.

With regard to the use of discarded rag robes, to consider that it is for the sake of meaninglessly looking shabby in tattered robes is surely the height of stupidity. It is because they are splendid and elegant that they have been worn in the way of the buddhas. In the way of the buddhas, what we regard as shabby clothes are clothes of brocade, embroidery, damask, and gauze, with gold, silver, rare gems, and the like, that come from impurity — these, we call “shabby.” In sum, in the way of the buddhas of this land and other worlds, when we use what is pure and elegant, these ten types are it.<sup>101</sup> Not only have they transcended the boundaries of pure and impure; they are not in the realm of the contaminated or uncontaminated. Do not discuss them as form or mind; they have nothing to do with gain or loss. It is just that those who receive and keep the direct transmission are the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>102</sup> When one is a buddha or ancestor, because one accepts the direct transmission, the receiving and keeping of it as a buddha and ancestor, without depending on the appearance or non-appearance of the body and without depending on the presentation or non-presentation of the mind, goes on being directly transmitted.

However, in truth, it is lamentable that, in this Land of Japan, monks and nuns of recent times, have long neglected wearing the kāṣāya; we should rejoice that now we receive and keep it. Even among male and female householders, those who receive the buddha precepts should wear kāṣāya of five, seven, or nine panels. How much more, then, those who have gone forth from the household: how could they fail to wear one? It is said that, beginning with King Brahmā and denizens of the six heavens, and extending down to licentious men, licentious women, and male and female slaves — all should receive the buddha precepts and wear the kāṣāya; are bhikṣus and bhikṣunīs not to wear it?<sup>103</sup> It is said that even 101 the way of the buddhas of this land and other worlds (shido takai no butsudō 此土他界の佛道): I.e., Buddhism everywhere.

102 those who receive and keep the direct transmission (shōden juji suru wa 正傳受持するは): The unexpressed object of the transmission here and below is probably “the buddha robe” (rather than “the ten types”).

103 King Brahmā and denizens of the six heavens (bonnō rokuten 梵王・六天): I.e., the deva who rules the heavens of the first dhyāna in the realm of form (shikikai 色界; S. rūpa-loka); and the devas in the heavens of the realm of desire (yokukai 欲界; S. kāma-loka). These and the other members of Dōgen’s list here, and the “beasts” in the next sentence, probably reflect a passage in the Fanwang jing 梵網經 (T.1484.24:1004b7-10) listing those who should receive the precepts:

國王王子百官宰相、比丘比丘尼、十八梵天六欲天子、庶民黃門姪男姪女奴婢。

beasts should receive the buddha precepts and drape themselves in the kāṣāya; how could the children of the Buddha fail to wear the buddha robe?

しかあれば、佛子とならんは、天上・人間・國王・百官をとはず、在家・出家・奴婢・畜生を論ぜず、佛戒を受得し、袈裟を正傳すべし。まさに佛位に正入する直道なり。

Thus, those who would be children of the Buddha — without asking whether they are in the heavens or humans, kings of nations or the hundred officials, without discussing whether they are householders or renunciants, slaves or beasts — should receive the buddha precepts and directly transmit the kāṣāya. Truly, this is the direct path for proper entry into the buddha stage.

Dōtoku

INTRODUCTION

This essay was written at Kōshōji in the autumn of 1242. It appears as number 33 in the seventy-five and sixty-chapter compilations of the Shōbōgenzō and as number 39 in the Honzan edition.

The title theme, dōtoku 道得, refers both to the act of saying something and to the saying itself. For Dōgen, to have something to say is a defining characteristic of the Zen masters; as he says in his opening line here, “The buddhas and the ancestors are their sayings.” Indeed, elsewhere, Dōgen is often dismissive of those figures in Zen literature who have nothing significant to say for themselves. Yet, here, he reminds us to take a broad view of what it means to say something.

In the first section of the essay, Dōgen makes clear that not saying anything can also be the expression of a saying; and, in the subsequent section, he explores a saying by the famous Tang-dynasty monk Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 that recommends “sitting fixedly without saying anything.” Then, he ends his brief essay with the example of a hermit whose saying consisted in having his head shaved.

The buddhas and the ancestors are their sayings.<sup>1</sup> Therefore, when the buddhas and ancestors select buddhas and ancestors, they invariably ask whether or not they can say something. This question, they ask with their minds, they ask with their bodies, they ask with their staffs and whisks, they ask with the pillars and lanterns.<sup>2</sup> If they are not buddhas and ancestors, they have no question, they have no saying; for they have no place for them.

These sayings are not something got from another, not something expressing their own abilities; it is just that, when they truly have the thorough investigation of the buddhas and ancestors, the buddhas and ancestors have sayings. Amidst those sayings, they practice and fully verify in the past, they concentrate and pursue the way in the present. When the buddhas and ancestors, concentrating on the buddhas and ancestors, confirm a saying of the buddhas and ancestors, this saying, naturally becoming three years, eight years, thirty years, or forty years of concentrated effort, is said with all their might.<sup>3</sup>

2 staffs and whisks (shujō hōssu 拄杖・拂子); pillars and lanterns (rochū tōrō 露柱・燈籠): I.e., the regalia of the Zen master’s office and the free-standing columns and lanterns of the monastic buildings, items occurring regularly in Zen discourse; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Pillars and lanterns,” “Whisk,” and “Staff.”

このときは、その何十年の間も、道得の間隙なかりけるなり。しかあればすなはち、證究のときの見得、それまことなるべし。かのときの見得をまこととするがゆえに、いまの道得なることは、不疑なり。ゆえに、いまの道得、かのときの見得をそなへたるなり、かのときの見得、いまの道得をそなへたり。このゆえに、いま道得あり、いま見得あり。いまの道得と、かのときの見得と、一條なり、萬里なり。いまの功夫、すなはち道得と見得とに功夫せられゆくなり。

During this time, even over a period of some decades, there will have been no break in the saying.<sup>4</sup> This being the case, what they see when they fully verify will be its truth. Since what they see at that time is its truth, they have no doubt that it is the present saying. Therefore, the present saying is endowed with the seeing at that time; and the seeing at that time is endowed with the present saying. Therefore, there is the saying now; there is the seeing now. The present saying and the seeing at that time are one strip, are ten thousand miles.<sup>5</sup> The present concentration continues to be concentrated by the saying and the seeing.<sup>6</sup>

この功夫の把定の、月ふかく、年おほくかさなりて、さらに從來の年月の功夫を脱落するなり。脱落せんとするとき、皮肉骨髓おなじく脱落を辦肯す、國土山河ともに脱落を辦肯するなり。このとき、脱落を究竟の實所と

3 said with all their might (jinriki dōtoku 盡力道得): The agent is unspecified; presumably, the one who is concentrating on the saying.

The manuscripts include at this point in the text the following note:

裡書云、三十年、二十年は、みな道得のなれる年月なり。この年月、ちからをあはせて道得せしむるなり。

A note on the reverse says, “Thirty years or twenty years is the time it takes for the saying to be formed; these years combine to enable him to say it.”

4 there will have been no break in the saying (dōtoku no kenkyaku nakarikeru nari 道得の間隙なかりけるなり): I.e., the saying will always have been present in the person's practice.

5 are one strip, are ten thousand miles (ichijō nari, banri nari 一條なり、萬里なり): From the phrase, “one strip of iron for ten thousand miles” (banri ichijō tetsu 萬里一條鐵), a common Zen expression for the ultimate unity of the myriad phenomena; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “One strip of iron.”

6 The present concentration continues to be concentrated by the saying and the seeing (ima no kufū, sunawachi dōtoku to kentoku to ni kufū serareyuku nari いまの功夫、すなはち道得と見得とに功夫せられゆくなり): I.e., the spiritual effort to engage the saying is informed by both the saying and the insight into it.

して、いたらんと擬しゆくところに、この擬到はすなはち現出にてあるゆえに、正當脱落のとき、またざるに現成する道得あり。心のちからにあらず、身のちからにあらずといへども、おのづから道得あり。すでに道得せらるるに、めづらしく、あやしくおぼえざるなり。

Having accumulated long months and many years of holding fast to this concentrated effort, one goes on to slough off the efforts of the past months and years. When one is to slough them off, skin, flesh, bones, and marrow all confirm the sloughing off; the land, and the mountains and rivers all confirm the sloughing off. At this point, where we think to reach the sloughing off as the ultimate treasure trove, since this thinking to reach it is actually realized, just at the point of the sloughing off, there is a saying that occurs unexpectedly.<sup>7</sup> Though it is not by the power of the mind and not by the power of the body, of its own accord there is a saying. Once it has been said, it does not seem unusual or strange.

Nevertheless, when one says this saying, one does not say what is not said. Though one has recognized it as a saying, if one has not yet verified not saying as not saying, it is not the face of the buddhas and ancestors, it is not the bones and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>8</sup> This being the case, how could the saying of “making three bows and standing in place” be on the same level as the sayings of the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow bunch?<sup>9</sup> The sayings of the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow

7 the ultimate treasure trove (kukyō no hōsho 究竟の寶所): The metaphor of the “treasure trove” (hōsho 寶所) as the true goal of Buddhism comes from a famous parable in the Lotus Sūtra, in which the buddha is depicted as a caravan leader taking people to a treasure (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:25c26ff).

8 Though one has recognized it as a saying (dōtoku suru to nintoku seru mo 道得すると認得せるも): Some MS witnesses read here dōtoku ni dōtoku suru to nintoku seru mo 道得に道得すると認得せるも (“Though in saying one has recognized it as saying”).

not saying (fudōtokutei 不道得底): Generally taken here to mean to leave unsaid what cannot be said. The term fudōtoku 不道得 is also regularly used in the sense “cannot say [what needs to be said].”

9 “making three bows and standing in place” (sanpai e i ni ryū 三拜依位而立): Allusion to the famous story of Bodhidharma’s testing of his four disciples, in which the first three gave answers but Huike 慧可 simply bowed and stood in place. Bodhidharma bunch do not entertain, are not endowed with, the saying of “making three bows and standing in place.” The meeting here of self and other as “moving among different types” is the meeting of other and other as “moving among different types.”<sup>10</sup> The self has saying and has not saying; the other has saying and has not saying. Saying has self and other; not saying has self and other.

Great Master Zhenji of Zhaozhou addressed the assembly, saying, “If for a lifetime you don’t leave the grove, sitting fixedly without saying anything for ten years or five years, no one will call you a mute; after that, even the buddhas won’t reach you.”<sup>11</sup> said of each in turn that he (or, in one case, she) had “got his skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow bunch (hi niku kotsu zui no yakara 皮肉骨髓のやから): One would expect here a reference to the first three disciples to answer Bodhidharma, but the interpretation is complicated by the fact that Huike 慧可 was said to have received the marrow.

10 The meeting here of self and other as “moving among different types” (ima ware to ta to, irui chū gyō to shōken suru いまわれと他と、異類中行と相見する): The expression “moving among different types” (irui chū gyō 異類中行) is generally taken to indicate the salvific activities of the buddhas and bodhisattvas among the various forms of living beings. It is associated especially with a comment by Nanchuan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-835) about the monk Zongzhi 宗智, a saying widely repeated in Zen sources and quoted in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:154, case 57); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Move among different types.” The antecedents of the pronouns translated here as “self” (ware われ) and “other” (ta 他) are subject to various interpretations. Perhaps the most plausible takes Huike 慧可 as “self” and the other three disciples as “other.” Hence, the point becomes Huike’s not speaking and the others’ speaking are equally instances of “moving among different types.”

Thus, as we reside in “the grove” for “ten years or five years,” passing through frosts and flowers time and again, when we reflect on the concentrated effort to pursue the way “without leaving the grove for a lifetime,” the “fixed sitting” that has completely sat is so many sayings.<sup>12</sup> Walking about, sitting, and reclining “without leaving the grove” must be numerous instances of “no one will call you a mute.” Though we may not know whence “a lifetime” comes, once we have made it “not leaving the grove,” it is “not leaving the grove.” What kind of path through the clouds is there between “a lifetime” and “the grove”?<sup>13</sup> We should just confirm “fixed sitting”; do not say “without saying anything.”<sup>14</sup> “Without saying anything” is a saying true from head to tail.

兀坐は一生・二生なり、一時・二時にはあらず。兀坐して不道なる十年五載あれば、諸佛も、なんぢをないがしろにせんことあるべからず。まことにこの兀坐不道は、佛眼也覷不見なり、佛力也牽不及なり。諸佛也不奈爾何なるがゆえに。

“Fixed sitting” is for “a lifetime” or two lifetimes; it is not for one time or two times. When you have “ten years or five years” of “fixed sitting” “without saying anything,” even the buddhas will not ignore you. Truly, the “fixed sitting” that has completely sat (zadan seshi gotsuza 坐斷せし兀坐): For the meaning of the term gotsuza 兀坐, translated here as “fixed sitting,” see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Sit fixedly.” The term zadan 坐斷, rendered here somewhat awkwardly as “completely sat,” ordinarily means “to occupy,” “to control,” also “to press down,” “to oppress,” “to break,” “to reject” (zadan 挫斷), in which the element dan 斷 (“to cut off”) functions as a verbal suffix with the sense “completely.” Dōgen uses the term several times in the Shōbōgenzō, and commentators typically read it as “sitting completely” or, when used as a transitive verb, as it will be below, “sitting and cutting off.”

12 frosts and flowers (sōke 霜華): I.e. autumns and springs; the years.

13 path through the clouds (tsūshōro 通霄路): Or “road to the firmament.” A fixed expression, found in Song-dynasty Chan texts, indicating a “higher” way, beyond the standard understandings of Buddhist practice. The term shō 霄, translated here as “clouds,” can also refer to, and is probably more often interpreted as, the “heavens,” as well as the “night.”

14 do not say “without saying anything” (fudō o iu koto nakare 不道をいふことなかれ): Taking the term fudō 不道 to refer to Zhaozhou’s phrase, “sitting fixedly without saying anything” (gotsuza fudō 兀坐不道). Some versions of the text read fudō o itou koto nakare 不道をいとふことなかれ (“do not worry about ‘without saying anything’”).

this “fixed sitting without saying anything” is even the eye of a buddha cannot see it, is even the strength of a buddha cannot rein it in; for “even the buddhas won’t know what to make of you.”<sup>15</sup>

趙州のいふところは、兀坐不道の道取は、諸佛も、これを啞漢といふにおよばず、不啞漢といふにおよばず。しかあれば、一生不離叢林は、一生不離道得なり。兀坐不道十年五載は、道得十年五載なり。一生不離不道得なり、道不得十年五載なり、坐斷百千諸佛なり、百千諸佛坐斷爾なり。

What Zhaozhou says is that the saying, “sitting fixedly without saying anything” — even the buddhas “won’t reach” calling this “a mute,” “won’t reach” calling it “not a mute.”<sup>16</sup> Hence, “not leaving the grove for a lifetime” is “not leaving the saying for a lifetime”; “sitting fixedly without saying anything for ten years or five years” is “saying something for ten years or five years.” It is “not leaving not saying for a lifetime”; it is “not saying for ten years or five years”; it is sitting and cutting off hundreds of thousands of buddhas; it is hundreds and thousands of buddhas sitting and cutting off you.<sup>17</sup>

しかあればすなはち、佛祖の道得底は、一生不離叢林なり。たとひ啞漢なりとも、道得底あるべし、啞漢は道得なかるべし、と學することなかれ。道得あるもの、かならずしも啞漢にあらざるにあらず、啞漢また道得あるなり。啞聲きこゆべし、啞語きくべし。啞にあらずば、いかでか啞と相見せん、いかでか啞と相談せん。すでにこれ啞漢なり、作麼生相見、作麼生相談。かくのごとく參學して、啞漢を辨究すべし。

15 even the eye of a buddha cannot see it (butsugen ya chofuken 佛眼也覷不見); even the strength of a buddha cannot rein it in (butsuriki ya ken fugyū 佛力也牽不及); “even the buddhas won’t know what to make of you” (shobutsu ya fu na ni ka 諸佛也不奈何): Three phrases in Chinese. The first is a fixed expression found in Zen literature, referring to the “buddha eye” (butsugen 佛眼; S. buddha-cakṣus), the eye of omniscience; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye.” The second phrase, which seems to be Dōgen’s own variation on the linguistic pattern, is more literally, “even the strength of a buddha would try to rein it in without reaching it,” perhaps referring back to the final line of his quotation of Zhaozhou: “After that, even the buddhas won’t reach you.” Curiously enough, the third phrase here is a quotation of Zhaozhou’s words in the extant versions of his saying (rather than Dōgen’s version in section 6, above).

16 “won’t reach” calling this “a mute,” “won’t reach” calling it “not a mute” (kore o akan to iu ni oyobazu, fuakan to iu ni oyobazu これを啞漢といふにおよばず、不啞漢といふにおよばず): The awkward form “won’t reach” here tries to preserve what seems to be a reference to the last line of Dōgen’s quotation of Zhaozhou: “After that, even the buddhas won’t reach you.” The sense is simply that “the saying” cannot be described as either “a mute” or “not a mute.”

17 sitting and cutting off (zadan 坐斷): See above, Note 12.

This being the case, the sayings of the buddhas and ancestors are “not leaving the grove for a lifetime.” Even if they are “mutes,” they should have sayings; do not study that a “mute” has no saying. It is not the case that someone with a saying is necessarily not a “mute”: “mutes” also have sayings. We should hear their mute voices; we should listen to their mute words. Since they are “mutes,” how does one meet with them? How does one talk with them? Studying in this way, we should thoroughly investigate the “mute.”

雪峰の眞覺大師の會に一僧ありて、山のほとりにゆきて、草をむすびて庵を卓す。とし、つもりぬれど、かみをそらざりけり。庵裏の活計、たれかしらん、山中の消息、悄然なり。みづから一柄の木杓をつくりて、溪のほとりにゆきて、水をくみてのむ。まことに、これ飲溪のたぐひなるべし。かくて日往月來するほどに、家風ひそかに漏泄せりけるによりて、あるとき、僧きたりて庵主にとふ、いかにあらんかこれ祖師西來意。庵主云、溪深杓柄長。とふ僧、おくことあらず、禮拜せず、請益せず。山にのぼりて雪峰に舉似す。雪峰ちなみに舉をききていはく、也甚奇怪、雖然如是、老僧自去勘過始得。

In the community of Great Master Zhenzhue of Xuefeng, there was a monk who built a thatched hermitage in the vicinity of the mountain.<sup>18</sup> The years passed, but he never shaved his head. Who knows his life in the hermitage — so lonely was his situation in the mountains? He made himself a wooden ladle and scooped up water to drink at a nearby stream. Truly, he was the type who drinks from the stream.<sup>19</sup> In this way, as the days passed and the months came, his style of life secretly leaked out, and consequently one day a monk visited and asked the hermit, “What is the intention of the Ancestral Master coming from the west?”

The hermit said, “The stream is deep, the ladle handle long.”

18 Great Master Zhenzhue of Xuefeng (Seppō no Shinkaku daishi 雪峰の眞覺大師): i.e., Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908). A version of this story is recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:218, case 183), most likely taken from Dahui Zonggao’s 大慧宗杲 Zhengfayanrang 正法眼藏 (ZZ.118:7b12-17). Dōgen tells the story here in Japanese, with only some of the speech of the characters in Chinese.

in the vicinity of the mountain (yama no hotori ni 山のほとりに): i.e., near Yicun’s monastery on Xuefeng 雪峰, located in Fuzhou 福州 (modern Fujian).

19 the type who drinks from the stream (inkei no tagui 飲溪のたぐい): i.e., lives the simple life of the sage; more commonly described as “drinking from the river” (inka 飲河).

The monk who asked, unable to handle it, did not bow, and did not seek instruction.<sup>20</sup> He climbed the mountain and reported it to Xuefeng. Xuefeng listened to the report and said, “Very strange. Even so, this old monk had better go himself and investigate.”

雪峰のいふところは、よさは、すなはちあやしきまでによし、しかあれども、老僧みづからゆきてかんがへみるべし、となり。かくてあるに、ある日、雪峰たちまちに侍者に剃刀をもたせて率しゆく。直に庵にいたりぬ。わづかに庵主をみるに、すなはちとふ、道得ならば、なんぢが頭をそらじ。

What Xuefeng meant was that it sounded too good to be true; nevertheless, the old monk himself should go and investigate it.<sup>21</sup> Thus, one day, Xuefeng suddenly went to him with his acolyte carrying a razor. When they arrived at the hermitage, as soon as they saw the hermit, he questioned him, “If you can say something, I won’t shave your head.”

この問、こころうべし。道得不剃汝頭とは、不剃頭は道得なりときこゆ、いかん。この道得、もし道得ならんには、畢竟じて不剃ならん。この道得、きくちからありてきくべし。きくちからあるものために開演すべし。

We should understand this questioning. “If you can say something, I won’t shave your head” sounds like “not shaving your head” is “saying something.”<sup>22</sup> How about it? If this saying is a saying, in the end, he will not shave him. We should hear this saying with the power to hear it; we should expound it for the sake of those with the power to hear it.

20 unable to handle it (oku koto arazu おくことあらず): A tentative translation of a Japanese expression not appearing in the Chinese sources; taking oku おく as so 措 (“to deal with”). Other readers take it as “to be unconvinced,” “to be startled,” “to be unable to respond.”

21 the old monk himself should go and investigate it (rōsō mizukara yukite kangae-miru beshi 老僧みづからゆきてかんがへみるべし): Dōgen is here merely translating Xuefeng’s Chinese.

22 “If you can say something, I won’t shave your head” sounds like “not shaving your head” is “saying something” (dōtoku futei nyo tō to wa, futei tō wa dōtoku nari to kikoyu 道得不剃汝頭とは、不剃頭は道得なりときこゆ): Dōgen here gives Xuefeng’s words in Chinese syntax, which could be parsed, “My saying is ‘I won’t shave your head’”; hence, the following, “not shaving your head is a saying.” Dōgen seems here to be making the following sort of playful argument: (1) If there is a saying, he won’t shave his head; (2) “Not shaving your head” is a saying; (3) Therefore, he won’t shave his head.

ときに庵主、かしらをあらひて、雪峰のまへにきたれり。これも、道得にてきたれるか、不道得にてきたれるか。雪峰、すなはち庵主のかみをそる。

Thereupon, the hermit washed his head and came to Xuefeng. Did he come as [an act of] “saying something”? Or did he come as “not saying something”? Xuefeng immediately shaved the hermit’s head.

この一段の因縁、まことに優曇の一現のごとし。あひがたきのみにあらず、ききがたかるべし。七聖・十聖の境界にあらず、三賢・七賢の覩見にあらず。經師・論師のやから、神通變化のやから、いかにもはかるべからざるなり。佛出世にあふといふは、かくのごとくの因縁をきくをいふなり。

This single episode is truly like the singular appearance of the udumbara.<sup>23</sup> It is not only difficult to encounter; it is difficult to hear of. It is not in the realm of the seven sages or ten sages; it is not in the ken of the three worthies or seven worthies.<sup>24</sup> The sūtra master and treatise master types, the types who practice spiritual powers and transformations, have no way of fathoming it. Meeting a buddha who has appeared in the world means hearing a story like this.

しばらく雪峰のいふ道得不剃汝頭、いかにあるべきぞ。未道得の人、これをききて、ちからあらんは驚疑すべし、ちからあらざらんは茫然ならん。佛と問著せず、道といはず、三昧と問著せず、陀羅尼といはず。かくのごとく問著する、問に相似なりといへども、道に相似なり。審細に參學すべきなり。

For now, [let us consider,] what is this “If you can say something, I won’t shave your head”? People who cannot yet say something, upon hearing this, if they have ability will be startled, and if they lack ability

23 the singular appearance of the *udumbara (udon no ichigen 優曇の一現): I.e., the rare blossoming of a legendary plant, sometimes said in Buddhist texts to occur only once every three thousand years; a standard symbol of the rare good fortune of encountering the dharma.

24 the seven sages or ten sages (shichishō jissō 七聖・十聖); the three worthies or seven worthies (sanken shichiken 三賢・七賢): I.e., those on the various stages of the Buddhist path. Practitioners are typically divided into two basic stages: the “worthy” (ken 賢; S. bhadra), who are still “commoners” (bonbu 凡夫; S. prthagjana); and the “sages” (shō 聖; S. ārya), who have reached the more advanced stages of the “nobles.” The “three worthies” refers to three stages of development; the “seven worthies” refers to seven types of practitioners on these stages. The “seven sages” refers to the types of realization achieved by the seven types of practitioner; the “ten sages” refers to those on the ten stages (ji 地; S. bhūmi) of the bodhisattva path.

will be at a loss. He does not ask about the buddha; he does not speak of the way; he does not ask about samādhi; he does not speak of dhāraṇī. Posing this kind of question, though it may resemble a question, resembles a statement.<sup>25</sup> We should study it in detail.

しかあるに、庵主、まことあるによりて、道得に助發せらるるに、茫然ならざるなり。家風かくれず、洗頭してきたる。これ佛自智慧、不得其邊の法度なり。現身なるべし、説法なるべし、度生なるべし、洗頭來なるべし。

However, since the hermit was authentic, he was encouraged by the saying and not at a loss. Without obscuring the traditional style, he washed his head and came to him. This is a rule “the limits of which cannot be reached by the buddha’s own wisdom.”<sup>26</sup> He must be manifesting his body; he must be preaching the dharma; he must be delivering beings; he must be “washing his head and coming to him.”<sup>27</sup>

ときに雪峰、もしその人にあらずば、剃刀を放下して呵呵大笑せん。しかあれども、雪峰、そのちからあり、その人なるによりて、すなはち庵主のかみをそる。まことにこれ雪峰と庵主と、唯佛與佛にあらずよりは、かくのごとくならじ、一佛・二佛にあらずよりは、かくのごとくならじ、龍と龍とにあらずよりは、かくのごとくならじ。驪珠は驪龍のをしむころ懈倦なしといへども、おのづから解收の人の手にいるなり。

25 though it may resemble a question, resembles a statement (mon ni sōji nari to iedomo, dō ni sōji nari 問に相似なりといへども、道に相似なり): i.e., it might seem that Xuefeng is interrogating the hermit, but it appears rather that he is giving a teaching to the hermit. (Grammatically speaking, of course, Xuefeng’s words are a declarative sentence.)

26 “the limits of which cannot be reached by the buddha’s own wisdom” (butsu ji chie, futoku go hen 佛自智慧、不得其邊): Likely after a passage in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:54b19-21):

If one hears this Lotus Sūtra, if one copies it, if one has it copied, the limits of the merit acquired cannot be reached if the amount were to be calculated by the wisdom of a buddha.

27 manifesting his body (genshin 現身); preaching the dharma (seppō 説法); delivering beings (doshō 度生): Recalling the famous description of the thirty-three manifestations of Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara (Kannon 觀音); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Manifesting a body to preach the dharma.”

At this point, had Xuefeng not been that person, he would have thrown down the razor and given a great laugh, “ha, ha!”<sup>28</sup> However, since Xuefeng had the power, was that person, he immediately shaved the hermit’s head. Truly, were Xuefeng and the hermit not “only a buddha with a buddha,” it probably would not have been like this; were they not one buddha and two buddhas, it probably would not have been like this; were they not a dragon and a dragon, it probably would not have been like this.<sup>29</sup> The black dragon’s pearl, though the black dragon never flags in its determination to keep it, falls naturally into the hand of the one who can take it.<sup>30</sup>

しるべし、雪峰は庵主を勘過す、庵主は雪峰をみる。道得不道得、かみをそられ、かみをそる。しかあればすなはち、道得の良友は、期せざるにとぶらふみちあり。道不得のとも、またざれども知己のところありき。知己の參學あれば、道得の現成あるなり。

We should realize that Xuefeng investigated the hermit, and the hermit saw Xuefeng; one said something, and one did not say anything; one had his head shaved, one shaved his head. In this way, there is a path on which a good friend who can say something pays an unexpected visit. Although the friend who did not say anything was not expecting it, he had a chance to know himself. When there is the study of knowing oneself, there is the realization of a saying.

Sayings

28 had Xuefeng not been that person (Seppō, moshi sono hito ni arazu ba 雪峰、もしその人にあらずば): “That person” (sono hito そのひと) is a fixed expression, appearing frequently in the Shōbōgenzō, for an authentic Zen practitioner.

29 “only a buddha with a buddha” (yui butsu yo butsu 唯佛與佛): From a line in Kumārajīva’s translation of the Lotus Sūtra; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas.”

30 the black dragon’s pearl (rijū 驪珠): Reference to the precious pearl held under the chin of the black dragon; a symbol of a most precious treasure, best known from the miscellaneous chapters of the Zhuangzi 莊子 (Lie Yukou 列御寇, KR.5c0126.032.9a).

INTRODUCTION

This chapter occurs as number 34 in the seventy-five-chapter compilation of the Shōbōgenzō and as number 24 in the Honzan edition. The former version is undated, while the latter bears a colophon giving its composition as December 17, 1241, at Kōshōji. The work also appears as number 2 in fascicle 2 of the twenty-eight-text Himitsu collection of the Shōbōgenzō, with a colophon giving the date November 30, 1242, at the same monastery.

The content of the essay is a somewhat odd combination of elements. It begins with a critique of the claim, common in the Chinese Chan literature of Dōgen's day, that Bodhidharma's tradition is "a separate transmission outside the teachings." Ultimately, Dōgen argues, the buddhas' teachings and Bodhidharma's tradition are not two. He then comments on two Chan sayings on the teachings. The occurrence, in the second of these teachings, of the stock phrase, "the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings," leads to an extended excursus on the content of the śrāvaka, pratyeka-buddha, and bodhisattva vehicles, and the traditional division of the Buddhist canon into twelve (or nine) genres. The essay ends with comments on a passage in the Lotus Sūtra that mentions the ninefold teachings.

The realization of the sayings of the buddhas — these are the teachings of the buddhas.<sup>1</sup> Since the buddhas and ancestors do this for the sake of the buddhas and ancestors, their teachings directly transmit them for the sake of the teachings. This is turning the dharma wheel. Within the eye of this dharma wheel, it causes the buddhas and ancestors to appear; it causes the buddhas and ancestors to enter parinirvāṇa. The buddhas and ancestors always make their appearance in a single dust mote and enter nirvāṇa in a single dust mote, make their appearance throughout all the worlds and enter nirvāṇa throughout all the worlds; make their appearance in a single moment and make their appearance throughout many

1 The realization of the sayings of the buddhas — these are the teachings of the buddhas (shobutsu no dō genjō, kore bukkō nari 諸佛の道現成、これ佛教なり): The common term bukkō 佛教, translated throughout here as “the teachings of the buddhas,” could as well be (and doubtless more often is) rendered “the teaching of the Buddha” (i.e., the teaching of Buddha Śākyamuni); but, as the next sentence here makes clear, Dōgen is using the term in reference to teachings of the “buddhas and ancestors” of his tradition. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas and ancestors.”

oceans of kalpas.<sup>2</sup> However, their appearance in a single dust mote or single moment is quite without any lack of virtues, and their appearance in all the worlds and many oceans of kalpas is not at all an undertaking that compensates for deficiencies. Therefore, the buddhas who attain the way in the morning and enter nirvāṇa in the evening have never been said to lack any virtues.<sup>3</sup> If we say the virtues in one day are few, the eighty years of a human is not long; and when we compare the eighty years of a human with ten kalpas or twenty kalpas, one day is like eighty years.<sup>4</sup> It is hard to distinguish between the virtues of this buddha and that buddha: when we try to compare the virtues possessed by a lifespan of long kalpas and the virtues of eighty years, we cannot even conceive of it. Therefore, the teachings of the buddhas are the teaching buddhas, are the virtues exhaustively investigated by the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>5</sup> It is not that the buddhas are tall and broad, while their dharma teachings are narrow and scant: we should realize that where the buddha is great, his teachings are great; where the buddha is small, his teachings are small. Therefore, we should realize that a buddha and his teachings are not a quantity great or small, are not a nature good, evil, or neutral, are not for the sake of one's own teaching or teaching others.<sup>6</sup>

2 a single moment (ichi shuyu 一須臾): The term shuyu 須臾 is used for Sanskrit muhūrta, a very short period of time, sometimes reckoned as 216,000 kṣāṇa, or one thirtieth part of a day.

3 the buddhas who attain the way in the morning and enter nirvāṇa in the evening (ashita ni jōdō shite yūbe ni nehan suru shobutsu 朝に成道して夕に涅槃する諸佛): Reminiscent of the famous words of Confucius (Lunyu 論語, Li Ren 里仁, KR.1h0005.002.13a):

If one hears the way in the morning, one can die in the evening.

4 eighty years of a human (ningen no hachijū nen 人間の八十年): I.e., the lifespan of Buddha Śākyamuni.

5 the teachings of the buddhas are the teaching buddhas (bukkyō wa sunawachi kyōbutsu nari 佛教はすなはち教佛なり): The unusual expression kyōbutsu 教佛 here can be taken either as “the buddha that teaches” or as “the buddha that is the teachings.”

6 a quantity great or small (dai shō no ryō 大小の量): Possibly a reference to the Great and Small Vehicles (daijō shōjō 大乘小乘).

a nature good, evil, or neutral (zen aku muki tō no shō 善・悪・無記等の性): I.e., the three types of karma.

for the sake of one's own teaching or teaching others (ji kyō kyō ta no tame 自教・教他のため): The unusual phrase “one's own teaching or teaching others” (ji kyō kyō ta 自教教他) suggests a common division of the Buddhist path into “one's own benefit and benefiting others” (ji ri ri ta 自利利他), a distinction that can be applied either to two aspects of the bodhisattva's training or to a difference between the aspiration of the śrāvaka and the bodhisattva respectively.

[34:2] {1:381}

ある漢いはく、釋迦老漢、かつて一代の教典を宣説するほかに、さらに上乘一心の法を摩訶迦葉に正傳す、嫡嫡相承しきたれり。しかあれば、教は赴機の戲論なり、心は理性の眞實なり。この正傳せる一心を、教外別傳といふ。三乘十二分教の所談にひとしかるべきにあらず。一心上乗なるゆえに、直指人心、見性成佛なり、といふ。

Some fellows say that old man Śākya, besides preaching the scriptures throughout his lifetime, also directly transmitted to Mahākāśyapa the dharma of the one mind of the higher vehicle, which has been inherited by successor after successor.<sup>7</sup> Therefore, the teachings are frivolous discourse directed at capacities, while the mind is the true reality of the essential nature.<sup>8</sup> They call this one mind directly transmitted “a separate transmission outside the teachings.”<sup>9</sup> It should not be equated with what is talked about in the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings.<sup>10</sup> Because it is the higher vehicle of the one mind, they say it is “pointing directly at the person’s mind, seeing the nature and attaining buddhahood.”<sup>11</sup>

7 the dharma of the one mind of the higher vehicle (jōjō isshin no hō 上乘一心の法): I.e., the teaching of the one Buddha mind, as understood in the highest form of Buddhism. Often associated with a description of Bodhidharma’s Buddhism by Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709-788); see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:246a5-6):

Great Master Dharma came from a kingdom in the south of Sindhu, arriving in China and transmitting the dharma of the one mind of the higher vehicle.

8 frivolous discourse directed at capacities (fuki no keron 赴機の戲論): I.e., upāya, teachings accommodated to the spiritual needs and abilities of the audience but not ultimately true.

9 “a separate transmission outside the teachings” (kyōge betsuden 教外別傳): A common slogan of the Zen tradition, often combined with the phrases quoted below here, in the famous four-line “creed” traditionally (though spuriously) attributed to Bodhidharma:

教外別傳、不立文字、直指人心、見性成佛。

A separate transmission outside the teachings,

No dependence on words and letters,

Direct pointing at the person’s mind,

Seeing the nature and attaining buddhahood.

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “A separate transmission outside the teachings.”

10 the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings (sanjō jūnibun kyō 三乘十二分教): I.e., the Buddhism of the Buddhist canon, as opposed to the “mind dharma” (shinbō 心法) said to be transmitted by the Zen lineage; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Three vehicles and twelvefold teachings.” Dōgen will treat this topic below, beginning in section 14.

11 “pointing directly at the person’s mind, seeing the nature and attaining buddhahood” (jikishi ninshin, kenshō jōbutsu 直指人心、見性成佛): A famous Zen dictum; traditionally attributed to Bodhidharma; see Supplementary Notes.

These words are not in the family occupation of the buddha dharma; they lack the survival route for leaving the body; they are not the deportment of the body throughout.<sup>12</sup> We should realize that fellows like this, if they have such talk, have not clarified, have not penetrated, the buddha dharma or the way of the buddhas, even though they were calling themselves guides hundreds or thousands of years ago. Why? Because they do not know the “buddha,” they do not know the “teachings,” they do not know the “mind,” they do not know the “inside,” they do not know the “outside.” The reason that they do not know is that they have never heard the buddha dharma. They do not know what the roots and branches are of “the buddhas” spoken of here.<sup>13</sup>

Those who have studied nothing of the boundaries of their coming and going do not deserve to be called disciples of the buddhas. To say that only the one mind is directly transmitted, but the teachings of the buddhas are not directly transmitted, is not to know the buddha dharma.

12 the family occupation of the buddha dharma (buppō no kagō 佛法の家業): i.e., the spiritual practice in the “house” of the buddhas and ancestors.

the survival route for leaving the body (shusshin no katsuro 出身の活路): The term katsuro 活路 has the sense “escape route” — i.e., the way out of a dangerous situation; the term shusshin 出身, while having the colloquial sense “to advance one’s status,” is regularly used in Zen texts for “liberation.”

the deportment of the body throughout (tsūshin no iigi 通身の威儀): The term tsūshin 通身 occurs frequently in the Shōbōgenzō; it is most familiar from the saying, discussed in the “Shōbōgenzō Kannon” 正法眼藏觀音, that Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara’s “body throughout is hands and eyes” (tsūshin ze shugen 通身是手眼). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “His body throughout is hands and eyes.”

13 They do not know what the roots and branches are of “the buddhas” spoken of here (ima shobutsu to iu honmatsu, ikanaru to shirazu いま諸佛という本末、いかなるとしらず): Perhaps referring back to Dōgen’s discussion of “the buddhas” in section 1. “Roots and branches” (honmatsu 本末) is a standard expression for the “beginning and end,” or “nature and characteristics,” of something.

They do not know the one mind that is the teachings of the buddhas; they have not heard the teachings of the buddhas that are the one mind. Your one mind, of which you say there are teachings of the buddhas outside the one mind, is not yet the one mind; your teachings of the buddhas, of which you say there is one mind outside the teachings of the buddhas, is not yet the teachings of the buddhas. Though the erroneous talk of a “separate transmission outside the teachings” may have been transmitted to you, since you do not yet understand “inside” and “outside,” your words do not accord with reason.<sup>14</sup>

佛正法眼藏を單傳する佛祖、いかでか佛教を單傳せざらん。いはんや釋迦老漢、なにとしてか、佛家の家業にあるべからざらん教法を、施設することあらん。釋迦老漢、すでに單傳の教法をあらしめん、いづれの佛祖かなからしめん。このゆえに、上乘一心といふは、三乗十二分教、これなり、大藏・小藏、これなり。

How could the buddhas and ancestors, who uniquely transmit the treasury of the true dharma eye of the buddha, not uniquely transmit the teachings of the buddhas? Not to mention why old man Śākya would have provided teachings that are not supposed to be the family occupation of the house of the buddhas? Since old man Śākya brought into being the teachings uniquely transmitted, which buddha or ancestor would nullify them? Therefore, “the one mind of the higher vehicle” is the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings, is the great treasury and small treasury.<sup>15</sup>

しるべし、佛心といふは、佛の眼睛なり、破木杓なり、諸法なり、三界なるがゆえに、山海國土・日月星辰なり。佛教といふは、萬像森羅なり。外といふは、這裏なり、這裏來なり。正傳は、自己より自己に正傳するがゆえに、正傳のなかに自己あるなり、一心より一心に正傳するなり、正傳に一心あるべし。上乘一心は、土石砂礫なり、土石砂礫は、一心なるがゆえに、土石砂礫は、土石砂礫なり。もし上乘一心の正傳といはば、かくのごとくあるべし。

We should realize that, because the buddha mind is the eye of the buddha, is a broken wooden dipper, is the dharmas, is the three realms, it is the mountains, oceans, and lands, the sun, moon, and stars.<sup>16</sup> The teachings of the buddhas are the thicket of myriad images.<sup>17</sup> “Outside” is in here, is what comes in here.<sup>18</sup> Because direct transmission directly transmits from self to self, the self is within direct transmission; it directly transmits from one mind to one mind, so there must be the one mind in direct transmission. “The one mind of the higher vehicle” is earth, stones, sand, and pebbles; because earth, stones, sand, and pebbles are the one mind, earth, stones, sand, and pebbles are earth, stones, sand, and pebbles. If we talk of the direct transmission of “the one mind of the higher vehicle,” it should be like this.

14 your words do not accord with reason (gonri no fugō awazaru nari 言理の符合あはざるなり): Taking the somewhat unusual compound gonri 言理 (also appearing in “Shōbōgenzō busshō” 正法眼藏佛性) as “words and reason.”

15 the great treasury and small treasury (daizō shōzō 大藏・小藏): I.e., the scriptural canons of the Great and Small Vehicles.

16 a broken wooden dipper (ha mokushaku 破木杓): A common expression in Zen texts for something worthless; often used (as surely here) in an ironic positive sense.

Nevertheless, the fellows who say “a separate transmission outside the teachings” do not know its meaning. Therefore, do not misunderstand the teachings of the buddhas by believing in the erroneous talk of “a separate transmission outside the teachings.” If it were as you say, would you call the teachings “a separate transmission outside the mind”? If you say “a separate transmission outside the mind,” then not a single line or half a gāthā would have been transmitted; if you do not say “a separate transmission outside the mind,” you should not say “a separate transmission outside the teachings.”

摩訶迦葉、すでに釋尊の嫡子として法藏の教主たり、正法眼藏を正傳して佛道の住持なり。しかありとも、佛教は正傳すべからずといふは、學道の偏局なるべし。しるべし、一句を正傳すれば、一法の正傳せらるるなり、一句を正傳すれば、山傳・水傳あり。不能離却這裏なり。

Mahākāśyapa, since he was master of the teachings of the dharma treasury as the legitimate heir of Śākya, the Honored One, was maintainer of the way of the buddhas by directly transmitting the treasury of the true dharma eye.<sup>19</sup> In spite of this, to maintain that he would not have directly

17 the thicket of myriad images (banzō shinra 萬像森羅): A fixed expression (often written shinra banzō 森羅萬像) for the myriad things of the universe, based on the image of a dense growth of trees. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Myriad forms.”

18 “Outside” is in here, is what comes in here (ge to iu wa, shari nari, shari rai nari 外といふは、這裏なり、這裏來なり): The sense of “outside” here is unclear; the most obvious sense would seem to be “outside of the teachings,” though some take it as “outside the mind.” Similarly, “in here” and “what comes [from?] in here” are subject to interpretation.

transmitted the teachings of the buddhas, is a narrow, one-sided view in the study of the way. We should realize that, when we directly transmit one line, one dharma is directly transmitted; when we transmit one line, there are the transmission of mountains and the transmission of waters.<sup>20</sup> It is, we can't get free from here.<sup>21</sup>

釋尊の正法眼藏無上菩提は、ただ摩訶迦葉に正傳せしなり、餘子に正傳せず、正傳はかならず摩訶迦葉なり。このゆえに、古今に佛法の眞實を學する箇箇、ともにみな從來の教學を決擇するには、かならず佛祖に參究するなり、決を餘輩にとぶらはず。もし佛祖の正決をゑざるは、いまだ正決にあらず。依教の正不を決せんとおもはんは、佛祖に決すべきなり。そのゆえは、盡法輪の本主は、佛祖なるがゆえに。道有・道無、道空・道色、ただ佛祖のみこれをあきらめ、正傳しきたりて、古佛・今佛なり。

The unsurpassed bodhi of the treasury of the true dharma eye of Śākya, the Honored One, was directly transmitted only to Mahākāśyapa and was not directly transmitted to anyone else; the direct transmission was without doubt to Mahākāśyapa. For this reason, in past and present, all who study the truth of the buddha dharma always investigate it with the buddhas and ancestors in order to determine the teachings that have been handed down; they do not seek the determination from others. If they

Likely a reference to the tradition that Mahākāśyapa was responsible for the compilation of the sūtras following the death of the Śākyamuni.

20 one dharma is directly transmitted (ippō no shōden seraruru 一法の正傳せらるる): Or “the one dharma [in its entirety] is directly transmitted.”

21 We can't get free from here (funō rikyaku shari 不能離却這裏): Perhaps expressing the thought that the transmission is going on in the landscape all around us. This phrase in Chinese has no known source but may reflect an address recorded in the Dahui Pujue chanshi yulu 大慧普覺禪師語錄 (T.1998A.47:825b4-9):

上堂舉、鏡清問玄沙、學人乍入叢林。乞師指箇入路。沙云、還聞偃谿水聲麼。清云聞。沙云、從這裏入。鏡清於此得箇入處。五祖師翁云、果是得入、一任四方八面。若也未然、輒不得離却這裏。師云、若要眞箇得入、直須離却這裏。下座。

Ascending the hall, [Dahui] raised [the following]:

Jingqing asked Xuansha, “I’m just entering the grove. I beg the Master point out the entrance road.”

Sha said, “Do you hear Yanxi’s sound of water?”

Qing said, “I hear it.”

Sha said, “You enter from here.”

At this, Jinqing gained the entrance.

My master’s teacher, Wuzu, said, “If he really gained the entrance, it was entirely due to the four quarters and eight directions. If it wasn’t, he couldn’t get free from here.”

The Master [Dahui] said, “If you really want to gain the entrance, just get free from here.”

He got down from the seat.

have not received the correct determination of the buddhas and ancestors, it is not a correct determination. If we wish to determine what is correct or not according to the teachings we rely on, we should determine it with the buddhas and ancestors. The reason is that the original masters of the entire dharma wheel are the buddhas and ancestors. Whether speaking of existence, speaking of nonexistence, speaking of emptiness, speaking of form, only the buddhas and ancestors are the past buddhas and present buddhas who have clarified and directly transmitted them.

Baling was once asked by a monk, “The intention of the ancestors and the intention of the teachings — are they the same or different?”<sup>22</sup>

The Master said, “When the chicken’s cold, it goes up a tree; when the duck’s cold, it goes into the water.”

Studying these words, we should meet with the ancestors of the way of the buddhas and experience the teachings of the way of the buddhas. To ask here about “the intention of the ancestors” and “the intention of the teachings” is to ask, “the intention of the ancestors and the intention of the teachings — are they the same or are they different?” To say here, “when the chicken’s cold, it goes up in a tree; when the duck’s cold, it goes into the water,” may be speaking of sameness and difference; but it should not be a sameness and difference left entirely up to the experience of those who perceive sameness and difference. This being the case, since it is not a question of sameness or difference, he must have said, “same or different.”<sup>23</sup> Therefore, it is as if he said, “you should not ask about same or different.”

22 Baling (Haryō 巴陵): i.e., Baling Haojian 巴陵顥鑑 (dates unknown), a disciple of Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃 (864-949). This conversation is recorded at Jingde chuan-deng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:386a24-26.

23 he must have said, “same or different” (dō betsu to dōshu shitsu beki nari 同・別と道取しつべきなり): Or perhaps “He could have said, ‘same and different.’”

玄沙、因僧問、三乘十二分教即不要、如何是祖師西來意。師云、三乘十二分教總不要。

Xuansha was once asked by a monk, “The three vehicles and twelve-fold teachings are unnecessary, but what is the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west?”<sup>24</sup>

The Master said, “The three vehicles and twelvefold teachings are wholly unnecessary.”

As it is commonly thought, the monk’s question, “The three vehicles and twelvefold teachings are unnecessary, but what is the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west?” is saying that “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings” are so many branch roads, but there must be some other “intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west.” It does not recognize that the “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings” are “the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west,” much less realize that the aggregate of eighty-four thousand dharma gates is “the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from

24 Xuansha (Gensha 玄沙): i.e., Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 (835-908). This conversation is recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:150, case 45); the text found in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:416c9-11) has a slightly different version of the exchange: the monk said,

“I’m not asking about the three vehicles and the twelvefold teachings, but what is the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west?”

Xuansha said, “The three vehicles and twelvefold teachings are unnecessary.”

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Three vehicles and twelvefold teachings.”

the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west (soshi seirai i 祖師西來意): i.e., “the reason Bodhidharma came to China”; a common topic of Zen conversation and title theme of Dōgen’s “Shōbōgenzō soshi seirai i” 正法眼藏祖師西來意. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west.”

the west.”<sup>25</sup> We should investigate for a bit why “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings” are “unnecessary.” When they are necessary, what standard is there?<sup>26</sup> Does the study of “the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west” occur where “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings” are “unnecessary”? He probably did not produce this question idly.

玄沙いはく、三乗十二分教総不要。この道取は、法輪なり。この法輪の轉ずるところ、佛教の、佛教に處在することを參究すべきなり。その宗旨は、三乗十二分教は佛祖の法輪なり、有佛祖の時處にも轉ず、無佛祖の時處にも轉ず、祖前・祖後おなじく轉ずるなり、さらに佛祖を轉ずる功德あり。祖師西來意の正當恁麼時は、この法輪を総不要なり。総不要といふは、もちいざるにあらず、やぶるにあらず。この法輪、このとき、総不要輪の轉ずるのみなり。三乗十二分教なしといはず、総不要の時節を覷見すべきなり。総不要なるがゆえに、三乗十二分教なり、三乗十二分教なるがゆえに、三乗十二分教にあらず、このゆえに、三乗十二分教総不要と道取するなり。

Xuansha said, “The three vehicles and twelvefold teachings are wholly unnecessary.” These words are the dharma wheel. We should investigate the fact that, where this dharma wheel turns, the teachings of the buddhas are located in the teachings of the buddhas.<sup>27</sup> The essential point is that “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings” are the dharma wheel of the buddhas and ancestors, which turns in times and places where there are buddhas and ancestors, and turns in times and places where there are no buddhas and ancestors; it turns similarly before the ancestors and after the ancestors; and further, it has the virtue of turning the buddhas and ancestors. At the very time of “the intention of the Ancestral Master coming from the west,” this dharma wheel is “wholly unnecessary.” “Wholly unnecessary” does not mean “not used” or “broken.” It is just that this dharma wheel at this time turns the wheel of “wholly unnecessary.”<sup>28</sup> It

25 aggregate of eighty-four-thousand dharma gates (hachiman shisen hōmon'un 八萬四千法門蘊): I.e., the entirety of the Buddhist teachings. Usually, hachiman shisen hō'un 八萬四千法蘊 or hachiman shisen hōmon 八萬四千法門; the combination hōmon'un 法門蘊 is unusual.

26 what standard is there? (ikanaru kiku ka aru いかなる規矩かある): Presumably, what is the criterion on the basis of which “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings” would be necessary?

27 the teachings of the buddhas are located in the teachings of the buddhas (bukkyō no, bukyō ni shozai suru 佛教の、佛教に處在する): Perhaps, meaning something like, “Xuansha’s saying is a teaching of a buddha that belongs to the teachings of the buddhas.”

28 It is just that this dharma wheel at this time turns the wheel of “wholly unnecessary” (kono hōrin, kono toki, sōfuyō rin no tenzuru nomi nari この法輪、このとき、総不要輪の轉ずるのみなり): I.e., the dharma wheel being turned here by Xuansha is just does not say “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings” do not exist; we should see the time when they are “wholly unnecessary.” Because it is “wholly unnecessary, it is “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings”; because it is “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings,” it is not “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings.”<sup>29</sup> Therefore, he says, “The three vehicles and twelvefold teachings are wholly unnecessary.”

その三乗十二分教、そこばくあるなかの一隅をあぐるには、すなはちこれなり。三乗

Giving one corner of the several [versions of the] “three vehicles and twelvefold teachings,” they are as follows. “The three vehicles”:

[34:15]

First, the śrāvaka vehicle.

四諦によりて得道す。四諦といふは、苦諦・集諦・滅諦・道諦なり。これをきき、これを修行するに、生老病死を度脱し、般涅槃を究竟す。この四諦を修行するに、苦・集は俗なり、滅・道は第一義なりといふは、論師の見解なり。もし佛法によりて修行するがときは、四諦ともに唯佛與佛なり、四諦ともに法住法位なり、四諦ともに實相なり、四諦ともに佛性なり。このゆえに、さらに無生・無作等の論におよばず、四諦ともに総不要なるゆえに。

One gains the way on the basis of the four truths. “The four truths” means the truth of suffering, the truth of its cause, the truth of its extinction, and the truth of the path. By hearing these and putting them into practice, one is delivered from birth, old age, sickness, and death, and completes parinirvāṇa. The claim that, in practicing these four dharma, suffering and cause are conventional, while extinction and the path are ultimate truths, is the view of the treatise masters.<sup>30</sup> For those who the teaching of “wholly unnecessary.”

29 because it is “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings,” it is not “the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings” (sanjō jūni bun kyō naru ga yue ni, sanjō jūni bun kyō ni arazu 三乗十二分教なるがゆえに、三乗十二分教にあらず): Perhaps meaning something like, “when we understand the texts of the Buddhist canon as “wholly unnecessary,” we realize that the canon is something quite different from what we usually think it to be.

30 suffering and cause are conventional, while extinction and the path are ultimate truths (ku shū wa zoku nari, metsu dō wa daiichi gi nari 苦・集は俗なり、滅・道は第一義なり): Dōgen invokes here a standard Buddhist distinction between two levels of discourse: conventional truth (zokutai 俗諦; S. saṃvṛti-satya) and ultimate truth (shintai 眞諦; S. paramārtha-satya); but the use of this distinction in treatments of the four truths practice according to the buddha dharma, the four truths are all “only buddhas with buddhas”; the four truths are all “dharmas abiding in their dharma positions”; the four truths are all “the real marks”; the four truths are all the buddha nature.<sup>31</sup> Therefore, there is no question of their being unborn or unproduced, and the like; for the four truths are all “wholly unnecessary.”<sup>32</sup>

Second, the pratyeka-buddha vehicle.

十二因縁によりて般涅槃す。十二因縁といふは、一者無明、二者行、三者識、四者名色、五者六入、六者觸、七者受、八者愛、九者取、十者有、十一者生、十二者老死。

One attains parinirvāṇa on the basis of the twelve causes and conditions.<sup>33</sup> The “twelve causes” means (1) ignorance, (2) formations, (3) consciousness, (4) name and form, (5) the six senses, (6) contact, (7) sensation, (8) craving, (9) grasping, (10) becoming, (11) birth, (12) old age and death.

is not in fact so typical of the Buddhist treatises — which speak more often of the first two truths as “mundane” (seken 世間; S. laukika), or “defiled” (uro 有漏; S. sāsrava) and the last two as “transmundane” (shusseken), or “undefiled” (muro 無漏; S. anāsrava).

32 unborn or unproduced (mushō musa 無生・無作): Likely a reference to the classification, popular in Tiantai scholarship, of the four truths into four ways of understanding them: (1) as “arising and ceasing” (shōmetsu 生滅), (2) as not arising and ceasing (mushōmetsu 無生滅; i.e., “empty”), (3) as “incalculable” (myōō 無量; or both [1] and [2]), and (4) as “unproduced” (musa 無作; or neither [1] nor [2]).

33 One attains parinirvāṇa on the basis of the twelve causes and conditions (jūni innen ni yorite hatsunehan su 十二因縁によりて般涅槃す): A common claim in East Asian Buddhism, arising from the interpretation of the term pratyeka as derived from prataya (“condition”). “The twelve causes and conditions” (jūni innen 十二因縁) refers to the ancient Buddhist formula of the “twelfefold dependent origination” (jūni engi 十二緣起; S. dvadasāṅga-pratītya-samutpāda), the members of which Dōgen lists here.

In the practice of the twelve causes and conditions, while one may assign the causes and conditions to past, present, and future, and discuss the agent of contemplation and the object of contemplation, when we take up each of the causes and conditions and investigate them, they are the turning of the wheel of the “wholly unnecessary,” the “wholly unnecessary” causes and conditions.<sup>34</sup> We should realize that, since “ignorance” is the one mind, “formations, consciousness,” and the rest, are also the one mind. Since “ignorance” is “cessation,” “formations, consciousness,” and the rest, are also “cessation.”<sup>35</sup> Since “ignorance” is nirvāṇa, “formations, consciousness,” and the rest, are also nirvāṇa. Because “birth” is also “cessation,” we can say this.<sup>36</sup> “Ignorance” is also the single line of a saying; and “consciousness, name, and form,” and the rest, are also like this.<sup>37</sup> We should realize that “ignorance, formations,” and the rest, are, “I have an ax; I’ll give it to you, and you can live on this mountain.” “Ignorance, formations,” and the rest, are, “When I left, the Reverend honored me with the offer of an ax, which I now beg to take.”<sup>38</sup>

34 assign the causes and conditions to past, present, and future (kako genzai mirai ni innen seshimete 過去現在未來に因縁せしめて): Reference to a standard analysis of the twelve links that assigns the first two members to the past life, the next eight to the present life, and the last two to the future life.

36 “birth” is also “cessation” (shō mo metsu naru 生も滅なる): “Birth” (shō 生) here likely refers to the penultimate member of the twelvefold chain; it is unclear whether “cessation” (metsu 滅) here refers to nirvāṇa or to the final member of the chain, “old age and death.”

37 “Ignorance” is also the single line of a saying (mumyō mo dōjaku no ikku nari 無明も道著の一句なり): Probably meaning that we can also treat “ignorance” and the other members of the twelvefold chain as the words of the buddhas and ancestors — as in the following example.

38 “I have an ax; I’ll give it to you, and you can live on this mountain” (go u ko fusu yo nyo jūzan 吾有箇斧子與汝住山): “When I left, the Reverend honored me with the offer of an ax, which I now beg to take” (hotsuji mō oshō ko fusu ben shō shu 發時蒙和尚許斧子便請取): Lines from an exchange between Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思 (d. 740) and his follower Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (700-790). The former line is Qingyuan’s words to Shitou as the latter was leaving Qingyuan to visit Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744); the latter is Shitou’s request upon his return from the visit, in response to which Qingyuan let one leg hang down (an act to which Dōgen will refer below, section 29). The story can be found at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:240b18-27). The two statements may be intended as an example of the cause and effect relationships among the members of the twelvefold chain.

Third, the bodhisattva vehicle.

六波羅蜜の教行證によりて、阿耨多羅三藐三菩提を成就す。その成就といふは、造作にあらず、無作にあらず、始起にあらず、新成にあらず、久成にあらず、本行にあらず、無爲にあらず。ただ成就阿耨多羅三藐三菩提なり。

On the basis of the teaching, practice, and verification of the six pāramitās, one achieves anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi. That “achievement” is not constructed; it is not unconstructed; it is not initially arisen; it is not newly attained; it is not attained long ago; it is not originally practiced; it is not unconditioned: it is just anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi achieved.<sup>39</sup>

六波羅蜜といふは、檀波羅蜜・尸羅波羅蜜・羼提波羅蜜・毘梨耶波羅蜜・禪那波羅蜜・般若波羅蜜なり。これは、ともに無上菩提なり。無生・無作の論にあらず。かならずしも檀をはじめとし、般若をおはりとせず。

The six pāramitās are dāna-pāramitā, śīla-pāramitā, kṣānti-pāramitā, vīrya-pāramitā, dhyāna-pāramitā, and prajñā-pāramitā.<sup>40</sup> These are all unsurpassed bodhi; it is not a question of their being unborn or uncreated. Dāna is not necessarily made the first and prajñā the last.

39 it is not attained long ago; it is not originally practiced (kujō ni arazu, hongyō ni arazu 久成にあらず、本行にあらず): Perhaps reflecting a famous passage in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:42c19-23):

如是我成佛已來甚大久遠。壽命無量阿僧祇劫、常住不滅。諸善男子。我本行菩薩道所成壽命、今猶未盡、復倍上數。

In this way, since I attained buddhahood, it has been a very long time. My lifespan is incalculable asaṃkhyeya kalpas, constantly abiding without extinction. Good sons, the lifespan attained by my original practice of the bodhisattva path is even now still not exhausted; it is twice the above number.

it is just anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi achieved (tada jōju anokutara sanmyaku sanbo-dai nari ただ成就阿耨多羅三藐三菩提なり): Or “it is just achieving anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.”

40 The six pāramitās (roku haramitsu 六波羅蜜): Dōgen gives here the transliteration of the Sanskrit terms for the six perfections of the bodhisattva: dāna-pāramitā (dan haramitsu 檀波羅蜜; the perfection of giving), śīla-pāramitā (shira haramitsu 尸羅波羅蜜; the perfection of morality), kṣānti-pāramitā (sendai haramitsu 羼提波羅蜜; the perfection of patience), vīrya-pāramitā (biriya haramitsu 毘梨耶波羅蜜; the perfection of vigor), dhyāna-pāramitā (zenna haramitsu 禪那波羅蜜; the perfection of meditation), and prajñā-pāramitā (hannya haramitsu 般若波羅蜜; the perfection of wisdom).

經云、利根菩薩、般若爲初、檀爲終。鈍根菩薩、檀爲初、般若爲終。

It is said in a sūtra, “Bodhisattvas of keen faculties make prajñā first and dāna last; bodhisattvas of dull faculties make dāna first and prajñā last.”<sup>41</sup>

しかあれども、羂提もはじめなるべし、禪那もはじめなるべし。三十六波羅蜜の現成あるべし。籬籠より籬籠をうるなり。

However, kṣānti could be first, or dhyāna could be first. There could be the appearance of thirty-six pāramitās.<sup>42</sup> It is getting nets and cages from nets and cages.<sup>43</sup>

波羅蜜といふは、彼岸到なり。彼岸は去來の相貌蹤跡にあらざれども、到は現成するなり、到は公案なり。修行の、彼岸へいたるべしとおもふことなかれ。これ彼岸に修行あるがゆえに、修行すれば彼岸到なり。この修行、かならず徧界現成の力量を具足せるがゆえに。

43 It is getting nets and cages from nets and cages (rarō yori rarō o uru nari 籬籠より籬籠をうるなり): The idiom “nets and cages” (rarō 籬籠) is used very commonly in Zen, and in Dōgen’s writings, for spiritual or cognitive “traps,” or “snares”; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nets and cages.” Here, probably used ironically, for going from one perfection to another.

Some manuscript traditions include notes, also reflecting the Xuanyi, for some members of the list, possibly by the fifteenth-century monk Bonsei 梵清 (d. 1427), who was responsible for the 84-chapter Bonsei text of the Shōbōgenzō. Though they appear in the body of the Kawamura edition, they are relegated here to the annotation. 如來則爲直說陰界入等假實之法、是名修多羅。或四五六七八九言偈、重頌

A sūtra voluntarily preached without a question: when the sages preach the dharma, they normally wait to be asked a question; however, for the sake of living beings, they may act as a teacher without a request — hence, “voluntary preaching without a question.” Again, the buddha dharma is so difficult to know, it can be called “without anyone able to ask.” If [the sages] do not preach voluntarily, the beings would not know what he would preach for them that he did not preach, and they would never know what dharma he would preach to them — hence, “voluntary preaching without a question.” It is in order to make clear the extremely profound unique verification they preach that they rely on “voluntary preaching without a question” to make clear what is to be shown.

51 Nidāna (innen 因緣): An historical narrative, as in accounts of the circumstances leading to the formulation of a monastic rule. The note here reads:

因緣經者、欲明戒法、必因犯彰過、過相彰現、方得立制、此亦託因緣、以明所顯也

Scriptures of causes and conditions seek to explain the precepts, clarifying the error on the basis of the violation. Once the error is clearly shown, one can establish the regulation. This also makes use of “causes and conditions” to clarify what is to be shown.

52 Avadāna (badana 波陀那): Parable, allegory, and the like. The note here simply gives the full transliteration of the Sanskrit:

Avadāna.

53 Itivṛttaka (iteimokutaka 伊帝目多伽): “So it is said”; account of a past life or lives. The note here reads:

此云如是語、亦云本事

Here, it is called “thus is it said”; also called “former matter.”

54 Jātaka (jataka 闍陀伽): Account of a prior life of Buddha Śākyamuni. The note here reads:

本生事者、謂說前生菩薩行事。本事事者、謂說前世諸相應事

The material in a “former life” describes events in a previous life of the Bodhisattva; the material in a “former matter” describes various relevant events in former lives.

55 Vaipulya (biburyaku 毘佛略): “Extended,” or “extensive,” text; often used in reference to Mahāyāna (or certain Mahāyāna) scriptures.

56 Abhūta-dharma (abudadaruma 阿浮陀達磨): Something that “has never been”; an account of miracles.

57 Upadeśa (ubadaisha 優婆提舍): Doctrinal discussion.

analyzed; the eighteen factors (S. dhātu) involved in cognition: the six sense objects, six sense organs, and six sense consciousnesses; and the twelve bases (S. āyatana) of cognition: the six sense objects and the six sense organs.

59 This is his worldly *siddhānta (shi ze sekai shiddan 此是世界悉檀): i.e., teachings based on worldly understandings.

It is rare to hear the names of the twelvefold scripture. One hears them when the buddha dharma is spread throughout the world. One does not hear them when the buddha dharma has ceased; one does not hear them when the buddha dharma has not yet spread. Those who, having long since planted good roots, will be able to see the buddha, hear them. Those who have heard them will before long attain anuttara-samyak-sambodhi.

Each of these twelve is called a “scripture”; they are also called “the twelvefold teachings,” or called “the twelvefold scripture.” Because each of the twelvefold teachings is endowed with the twelvefold teachings, it is a one hundred forty-fourfold teaching. Because each of the twelvefold teachings combines the twelvefold teachings, it is just a one-fold teaching. However, it is not a matter of numbers, more or less than a hundred thousand: they are all the eyes of the buddhas and ancestors; they are the bones and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors; they are the family business of the buddhas and ancestors; they are the radiance of the buddhas and ancestors; they are the adornments of the buddhas and ancestors; they are the land of the buddhas and ancestors. To see the twelvefold teachings is to see the buddhas and ancestors; to say “the buddhas and ancestors” is to say “the twelvefold teachings.”

Because each of these nine divisions is endowed with the nine divisions, it is eighty-one divisions; because each of the nine divisions is endowed with the one division, it is nine divisions.<sup>62</sup> If they did not have the virtue of reducing to one division, they would not be nine divisions. Because they have the virtue of reducing to one division, it is one division reducing to one division. Therefore, it is the eighty-one divisions; it is “this” division; it is “I” division; it is the whisk division; it is the staff division; it is the treasury of the true dharma eye division.<sup>63</sup>

62 because each of the nine divisions is endowed with one division, it is nine divisions (kubu onoono ichibu o gusoku suru yue ni, kubu nari 九部おのおの一部を具足するゆえに、九部なり): Generally, interpreted to mean that the nine divisions are parts of a single whole; it could also be read to mean that each of the nine divisions is a single division.

63 it is “this” division; it is “I” division (shi bu nari, ga bu nari 此部なり、我部なり): From the lines, quoted just below, section 32: “I this ninefold dharma, in accordance with the living beings, preach.”

64 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): From a verse in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:8a6-7). Rendered awkwardly here according to the Chinese syntax, in deference to Dōgen’s play with the text below.

We should realize that “I this” is the Tathāgata, whose face, and body and mind have been revealed.<sup>65</sup> Since this “I this” is the “ninefold dharma,” the ninefold dharma must be “I this.” Because the single line, the single gāthā, here is the ninefold dharma, is “I this,” it is “in accordance with the living beings, preach.” Thus, that the living of all living beings lives from here is “I preach this sūtra”; that their dying dies from here is “I preach this sūtra,” and so on, to their hasty acts and demeanor are “I preach this sūtra,” and “I have converted all the living beings, causing them all to enter the way of the buddhas” is “I preach this sūtra.”<sup>66</sup> These “living beings” are “in accordance with” “I this ninefold dharma.” This “in accordance with” is “to go along with it,” is “to go along with one-self,” is “to go along with ‘beings’,” is “to go along with ‘living’,” is “to go along with ‘I’,” is “to go along with ‘this.’”<sup>67</sup> Because those “living beings” are invariably “I this,” they are passages of the ninefold dharma.

入大乘爲本、といふは、證大乘といひ、行大乘といひ、聞大乘といひ、說大乘といふ。しかあれば、衆生は天然として得道せり、といふにあらず、その一端なり。入は、本なり、本は、頭正尾正なり。ほとけ、法をとく、法、ほとけをとく。法、ほとけにとかる、ほとけ、法にとかる。火焰、ほとけをとく、法をとく。ほとけ、火焰をとく、法、火焰をとく。

To say, “the basis for entering the Great Vehicle” means “to verify the Great Vehicle,” means “to practice the Great Vehicle,” means “to hear the Great Vehicle,” means “to preach the Great Vehicle.” Therefore, it is 65 “I this” is the Tathāgata (ga shi wa nyorai nari 我此は如來なり): Dōgen here makes a compound term from the first two words of the sūtra sentence, “I this ninefold dharma . . . preach,” that expresses his claim that the Buddha and his dharma are one.

66 the living of all living beings lives from here (issai shujō no shō jū shari shō 一切衆生の生從這裏生); their dying dies from here (shi jū shari shi 死從這裏死): i.e., the living beings that are the audience of the preaching have their life and death in the preaching. The translation of the phrase shō jū shari shō 生從這裏生 as “the living lives from here” seeks to preserve Dōgen’s play with the word shō 生 in “living beings” (shujō 衆生); alternatively, the phrase could be rendered, “the ‘living’ [in ‘living beings’] is born from here.” The phrase is put in Chinese, as if a fixed saying, though no precedent for it has been identified.

“I have converted all the living beings, causing them all to enter the way of the buddhas” (ke issai shujō, kai ryō nyū butsudō 化一切衆生、皆令入佛道): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:8b7).

67 “to go along with it” (zui ta ko 隨他去): From a saying of Dasui Fazhen 大隋法眞 (834-919), recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:138, case 24), that “this” (shako 這箇) “goes along with it” when the chiliocosm is destroyed at the end of the kalpa; see Supplementary Notes.

“to go along with ‘beings’” (zui shu ko 隨衆去); “to go along with ‘living’” (zui shō ko 隨生去): An attempt to retain in English something of Dōgen’s play here with the two elements of the term “living beings” (shujō 衆生).

not the case that “the living beings” have spontaneously gained the way; it is one edge.<sup>68</sup> “Entering” is “the basis”; “the basis” is right from head to tail. The Buddha preaches the dharma; the dharma preaches the Buddha.<sup>69</sup> The dharma is preached by the Buddha; the Buddha is preached by the dharma. The flames preach the Buddha and preach the dharma; the Buddha preaches the flames; the dharma preaches the flames.

For “this sūtra,” there is surely good cause to preach its reason, there is good cause for [the Buddha to say] “for this reason I preach.” Even if he considered not preaching “this sūtra,” that would not be possible. Therefore, he says, “for this reason, I preach this sūtra.” “For this reason, I preach” is “across the heavens”; “across the heavens” is “for this reason, I preach.”<sup>70</sup> Both this buddha and that buddha praise “this sūtra”; both in our world and other worlds, “this sūtra” is “for this reason, I preach.”<sup>71</sup> Therefore, it is “I preach this sūtra.” “This sūtra” is the teachings of the buddhas. We should realize the teachings of the buddhas, as the sands of the Ganges, are a bamboo stick and a whisk; that the sands of Ganges, as the teachings of the buddhas, are a staff and a fist.<sup>72</sup>

68 it is one edge (sono ittan nari その一端なり): Or, perhaps, “one tip.” The grammatical subject is unexpressed and uncertain. A common interpretation is that the “living beings” are but one part of “attaining the way.” Alternatively, one could read the phrase to mean that those who “attain the way” are but one part of “living beings,” or that “attaining the way” is but one part of what is meant by “entering the great vehicle.”

69 The Buddha preaches the dharma; the dharma preaches the Buddha (hotoke, hō o toku, hō, hotoke o toku ほとけ、法をとく、法、ほとけをとく): This and the concluding sentences of this section seem to reflect lines from a verse by Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤 (1063-1135) (see Yuanwu Foguo chanshi yulu 圓悟佛果禪師語錄, T.1997.47:802b26-c2) that Dōgen discusses in “Shōbōgenzō gyōbutsu iigi” 正法眼藏行佛威儀:

Blazing flames across the heavens; the Buddha preaches the dharma.

Across the heavens blazing flames; the dharma preaches the Buddha.

70 “For this reason, I preach” is “across the heavens”; “across the heavens” is “for this reason, I preach” (ko setsu wa gōten nari, gōten wa ko setsu nari 故説は互天なり、互天は故説なり): “Across the heavens” (gōten 互天) alludes again to the verse by Yuanwu used in the preceding section; see above, Note 69.

71 our world and other worlds (jikai takai 自界・他界): Or “this world and the other world.” Terms of ambiguous reference but here probably meaning simply “everywhere.”

72 the teachings of the buddhas, as the sands of the Ganges (Gōsha no bukkyō 恆

おほよそしるべし、三乗十二分教等は、佛祖の眼睛なり。これを開眼せざらんもの、いかでか佛祖の兒孫ならん。これを拈來せざらんもの、いかでか佛祖の正眼を單傳せん。正法眼藏を體達せざるは、七佛の法嗣にあらざるなり。

In sum, we should realize that the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings are the eyes of the buddhas and ancestors. How could those who have not opened their eyes to this be the descendants of the buddhas and ancestors? How could those who have not taken this up uniquely transmit the true eye of the buddhas and ancestors? Those who have not personally realized the treasury of the true dharma eye are not the dharma heirs of the seven buddhas.

INTRODUCTION

This work was composed in the winter of 1241, at Kōshōji. It appears as number 35 in both the seventy-five and sixty-chapter compilations of the Shōbōgenzō and as number 25 in the Honzan edition.

As its title indicates, the theme of the work is the Buddhist teaching of the paranormal powers ascribed to the buddhas, bodhisattvas, and other adepts of the religion. This teaching was widespread throughout both the technical and popular literature of Buddhism and represented one of the common assumptions of the Buddhist community. Discussion of the powers also occurs with some frequency in the texts of the Chinese Chan masters, who often tended in one way or another to redefine, dismiss, or make light of the traditional understandings of the teaching.

Dōgen's text takes up several of the passages on the powers from the Chinese Chan literature, using them to develop his own vision of the higher meaning of what he calls "the great powers" and "the powers of the buddha." In this vision, the powers become the welling up of the world itself, the fundamental activity through which all things emerge and in celebration of which the Chan masters act out their own eccentric powers. Throughout the text, Dōgen has harsh words for those Buddhists who lack this vision and remain limited to what he calls "the small powers" of the thaumaturgical tradition.

Such spiritual powers are the tea and rice in the house of the buddhas.<sup>1</sup> The buddhas even now do not neglect them. Among them, there are the six spiritual powers; there is the one spiritual power; there is no spiritual power; there is the supreme spiritual power.<sup>2</sup> They have taken the tea and rice in the house of the buddhas (bukke no sahan 佛家の茶飯): I.e., the “everyday fare” in the “family” of the buddhas; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Everyday tea and rice.”

1 Such spiritual powers (kaku no gotoku naru jinzū かくのごとくなる神通): The use of the adjective kaku no gotoku naru かくのごとくなる (“such”) in the opening line here is odd, given that there is of course no antecedent. Presumably, Dōgen is indicating the sort of powers of which he will be speaking below, but Sōtō commentators have also given the phrase a more metaphysical reading: “the spiritual powers that are such” (i.e., are just as they are), or “the spiritual powers of suchness” (nyoze no jinzū 如是の神通). “Spiritual powers” is a loose translation for the standard term (jinzū 神通) in East Asian Buddhist usage for Sanskrit abhijñā, or “higher knowledges” (also sometimes Sanskrit ṛddhi, or “powers,” etc.); it may refer to a variety of paranormal powers held to be accessible to advanced spiritual adepts, several of which appear in the text below. The term jinzū has the connotation of “penetration” or “mastery” of matters of the “spirit” (or the “spirits”). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Spiritual powers.”

2 six spiritual powers (roku jinzū 六神通): A standard list of paranormal powers found throughout Buddhist literature; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Spiritual powers.”

the one spiritual power (ichi jinzū 一神通): Dōgen may here have in mind “that one power” (na ittū 那一通) discussed in the story of the Buddha and the seer that he will cite below, section 16.

no spiritual power (mu jinzū 無神通): No doubt a reference to the saying of Baizhang form of morning blows, three thousand; evening blows, eight hundred.<sup>3</sup> Though they were born together with the buddha, they are not known by the buddha; though extinguished together with the buddha, they do not destroy the buddha.<sup>4</sup> In ascending to the heavens, they do so together; in descending from the heavens, they do so together; cultivating the practice and getting the verification, they do so together.<sup>5</sup> They are the same as the Snowy Mountains, like trees and rocks.<sup>6</sup> The buddhas of the

the supreme spiritual power (saijō jinzū 最上神通): Though the reference is uncertain, Dōgen may have in mind the “one ‘surpassing’ spiritual power” (ichijō no jinzū 一上の神通) mentioned in the story of Weishan Lingyu 潯山靈祐 and Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂 introduced in the following sections and described there by Dōgen as “unsurpassed” (mujō 無上).

3 morning blows, three thousand; evening blows, eight hundred (chō da sanzen nari, bo da happyaku naru 朝打三千なり、暮打八百なる): A fixed expression in Zen literature; generally taken as an indication of strict training. Some readers prefer to take da 打 (“to beat”) here simply as a particle: “Mornings, three thousand; evenings, eight hundred.”

4 born together with the buddha (yo butsu dō shō 與佛同生); extinguished together with the buddha (yo butsu dō metsu 與佛同滅): Usually interpreted to mean that the buddha and his powers are indistinguishable.

5 ascending to the heavens (jōten 上天); descending from the heavens (geten 下天); cultivating the practice and getting the verification (shugyō shushō 修行・取證): Dōgen seems here to be tracing the Buddha’s career, from his penultimate birth as a bodhisattva in Tuṣṭā heaven and his subsequent descent into this Sāhā world, to his six years of ascetic practice and his awakening under the bodhi tree.

they do so together (dōjō 同條): I.e., the buddhas and the powers “do so together.” The translation follows the adverbial use of dōjō encountered in Chan expressions like, “born together, die together” (dōjō shō dōjō shi 同條生同條死). See, for example, Biyan lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:197a14:

Born together, die together. Morning, three thousand; evening, eight hundred.

6 They are the same as the Snowy Mountains, like trees and rocks (dō Sessen nari, nyo bokuseki nari 同雪山なり、如木石なり): The exact sense here is uncertain or, perhaps, multivalent. The juxtaposition of “Snowy Mountains” (Sessen 雪山) with “trees and rocks” (bokuseki 木石) suggests an allusion to the famous story, invoked elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, of the prior life of Śākyamuni as the so-called “boy of the Snowy Mountains [i.e., Himalayas]” (Sessen dōji 雪山童子), who wrote the Verse of Impermanence (Mujō ge 無常偈) on trees and rocks (nyaku ju nyaku seki 若樹若石). See Supplementary Note, s.v. “Whether on trees or on rocks.” At the same time, the phrase “like trees and rocks” (nyo bokuseki 如木石) seems to pick up the well-known expression, “a mind like trees and rocks” (shin nyo bokuseki 心如木石), as in the saying of Huangbo Xiyun 黃檗希運 (dates unknown) (Guzunsu yulu 古尊宿語錄, ZZ.118:188a9):

Only when your mind is like trees and rocks do you have the status to study the way.

past are the disciples of Buddha Śākyamuni.<sup>7</sup> They present him with a kāṣāya; they present him with a stūpa.<sup>8</sup> At this time, the Buddha said, “The spiritual powers of the buddhas are inconceivable.”<sup>9</sup> So, we know that the present and future are also such.<sup>10</sup>

* * * * *

7 The buddhas of the past are the disciples of Buddha Śākyamuni (kako no shobutsu wa, Shakamuni butsu no deshi nari 過去の諸佛は、釋迦牟尼佛の弟子なり): Likely reflecting a tradition found in the Zongmen tongyao ji 宗門統要集 (ZTS.1:10c7-10):

世尊嘗與阿難行次、見一古佛塔。世尊便作禮。阿難云、此是什麼人塔。世尊云、此是過去諸佛塔。阿難云、過去諸佛是什麼人弟子。世尊云、是吾弟子。阿難云、應當如是。

Once, when the World-Honored One was traveling with Ānanda, they saw an old Buddhist stūpa. The World-Honored One bowed to it. Ānanda said, “Whose stūpa is this?”

The World-Honored One said, “This is a stūpa of the buddhas of the past.”

Ānanda said, “Whose disciples were the buddhas of the past?”

The World-Honored One said, “They were my disciples.”

Ānanda said, “So it must be.”

Dōgen quotes a version of this exchange in his “Shōbōgenzō shisho” 正法眼藏嗣書 (DZZ.1:425). It also occurs at case number 245 in the Eishōin 永晶院 text of Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (see DZZ.5:254, case 245n).

8 They present him with a kāṣāya; they present him with a stūpa (kesa o sasagete kitari, tō o sasagete kitaru 袈裟をささげてきたり、塔をささげてきたる): It is not clear whether the gifts are singular or plural. Commentators have so far been unable to establish a likely source for this claim. The adverbial phrase immediately following, “at this time” (kono toki), suggests that the presentations took place on the occasion when the Buddha spoke the words subsequently quoted. Unfortunately, the quotation (see below) seems to be from the chapter on spiritual powers in the Lotus Sūtra, which, while it describes many gifts presented to Śākyamuni, does not include among them robes or stūpas.

9 “The spiritual powers of the buddhas are inconceivable” (shobutsu jinzū fukashigi 諸佛神通不可思議): Probably after a passage in Chapter 21 of the Lotus Sūtra, “The Spiritual Powers of the Tathāgata” (Julai shenli 如來神力) (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:52a14-15), in which the Buddhas Śākyamuni and Prabhūtaratna, and their entourage, demonstrate their spiritual powers, and Śākyamuni then declares:

The spiritual powers of the buddhas are thus incalculable, limitless, inconceivable.

10 such (nyoze 如是): Generally interpreted to mean that the powers of present and future buddhas are also inconceivable. The Chinese version of the term “such” (kaku no gotoku) with which Dōgen began this text (see Note 1, above).

Chan Master Dawei was an ancestor in the thirty-seventh generation in direct descent from the Tathāgata Śākyā; he was the dharma heir of Baizhang Dazhi.<sup>11</sup> The present buddhas and ancestors who have arisen throughout the ten directions, not the distant descendants of Dawei, are the distant descendants of Dawei.<sup>12</sup>

On one occasion, when Dawei was lying down, Yangshan came to visit him.<sup>13</sup> Dawei turned and lay facing the wall.

11 Chan master Dawei (Daii zenji 大滙禪師): I.e., Weishan Lingyu 滙山靈祐 (771-853).

Baizhang Dazhi (Hyakujō Daichi 百丈大智): I.e., Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 (749-814), disciple of Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709-788).

12 the ten directions (jippō 十方): I.e., everywhere (throughout China). The term “ten directions” designates the cardinal and ordinal compass points, plus the zenith and the nadir; but it is regularly used in a less cosmic sense to mean something like “the entire realm” — as, for example, in the expression, “monastery of the ten directions” (jippō setsu 十方刹; i.e., monastery the abbacy of which is open to everyone regardless of lineage).

not the distant descendants of Dawei (daii no onson ni arazaru 大滙の遠孫にあらざる): Presumably, this means those who are not themselves in Dawei's lineage. Some versions of the text read here arazaru nashi あらざるなし, which would yield something like, “Among the present buddhas and ancestors who have arisen throughout the ten directions, there are none who are not the distant descendants of Dawei; they are the distant descendants of Dawei.”

13 On one occasion, when Dawei was lying down (Daii, aru toki gaseru ni 大滙、あるとき臥せるに): Dōgen's Japanese rendering of a story, versions of which appear in Zongmen tongyao ji 宗門統要集 (ZTS.1:86a), Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:265c16-21), Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要 (ZZ.136:543b13-a1), etc. It is case number 61 in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:158).

Yangshan said, “Huiji is the Reverend’s disciple; no need for appearances.”

Dawei went to get up. As Yangshan was about to leave, Dawei stopped him, calling, “Master Hui.”

Yangshan came back. Dawei said, “Listen while this old monk tells you his dream.”

Yangshan lowered his head as if to listen. Dawei said, “Try interpreting it for me.”

Yangshan brought him a basin of water and a hand towel. Dawei washed his face. Just as he had finished washing his face and sat down, Xiangyan came in.<sup>14</sup>

Dawei said, “Master Ji and I just did a higher spiritual power.<sup>15</sup> It wasn’t like the little stuff.”<sup>16</sup>

Xiangyan said, “Zhixian was down there; I know all about it.”<sup>17</sup>

Dawei said, “Try saying something.”

Xiangyan went and made a bowl of tea.

Dawei praised them, saying, “The spiritual power and wisdom of these two masters far exceeds that of Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana.”<sup>18</sup>

Yangshan (Kyōzan 仰山): I.e., Weishan’s disciple Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂.

14 Xiangyan (Kōgen 香巖): I.e., Xiangyan Zhixian 香巖智閑 (d. 898).

15 “just did a higher spiritual power” (ichijō no jinzū o nasu 一上の神通をなす): The term ichijō 一上 (literally, “one up,” or “one higher”) may well be simply an idiom in the Chinese here for “one time” or “once” (like the colloquial yixia 一下); but Dōgen will play with the literal sense in his commentary below; hence, the English “higher” here.

17 “Zhixian was down there; I know all about it” (Chikan, amen ni arite, ryōryō ni tokuchi su 智閑、下面にありて、了了に得知す): Xiangyan is of course referring to himself as “Zhixian” here. The term amen 下面, translated here as “down there,” may be taken as “nearby” or “next door.” It is not clear whether we are supposed to understand that Zhixian simply overheard the conversation or he used spiritual powers to know about it.

18 “Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana” (Shūshi Mokuren 鷲子・目連): Two disciples of the Buddha, known respectively for their wisdom and spiritual powers.

佛家の神通をしらんとおもはば、大瀧の道取を參學すべし。不同小小のゆえに、作是學者、名爲佛學、不是學者、不名佛學なるべし。嫡嫡相傳せる神通智慧なり。さらに西天竺國の外道・二乗の神通、および論師等の所學を、學することなかれ。

If we wish to understand the spiritual powers of the house of the bud-dhas, we should study Dawei's saying. Because it "wasn't like the little stuff," to engage in its study is called Buddhist study; not to study it is not called Buddhist study.<sup>19</sup> It is the spiritual power and wisdom transmitted from heir to heir.<sup>20</sup> We are not to go on to study what is studied by such as the treatise masters or the spiritual powers of the other paths and the two vehicles in the Land of Sindhu in the West.<sup>21</sup>

Now, in studying Dawei's spiritual powers, though they may be unsurpassed, there are "higher" experiences: that is, beginning with "when he was lying down," we have "he turned and lay facing the wall"; we have "he went to get up"; we have "he called, 'Master Ji'"; we have "let me tell you of my dream"; we have "he had finished washing his face and sat down"; we have "Yangshan bent down to listen"; we have "he brought a basin of water and a wash cloth."<sup>22</sup>

19 to engage in its study is called Buddhist study; not to study it is not called Buddhist study (sa ze gaku sha, myō i butsugaku, fu ze gaku sha, fu myō butsugaku 作是學者、名爲佛學、不是學者、不名佛學): Or "One who engages in this study is called a student of Buddhism; one who does not study it is not called a student of Buddhism." For some reason, Dōgen here shifts to Chinese, as if this were a quotation. No one seems yet to have found precedent for it in the literature.

20 It is the spiritual power and wisdom transmitted from heir to heir (chakuchaku sōden seru jinzū chie nari 嫡嫡相傳せる神通智慧なり): The grammatical subject here is unstated; presumably, "Dawei's saying."

21 treatise masters (ronshi 論師): I.e., those who specialize in the Buddhist scholastic literature of the śāstras. A common target of Zen masters' criticism.

the other paths and the two vehicles (gedō nijō 外道二乗): I.e., those who follow non-Buddhist religions (S. tīrthika) and the two "lesser" Buddhist vehicles of the śrāva-ka and pratyeka-buddha (as opposed to the Mahāyāna); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Three vehicles."

Land of Sindhu in the West (Sai Tenjiku koku 西天竺國): I.e., the Indian subcontinent, the Chinese tianzhu 天竺 representing a transliteration of the Sanskrit sindhu.

22 though they may be unsurpassed, there are "higher" experiences (mujō nari to iedomo, ichijō no kenmon ari 無上なりといへども、一上の見聞あり): Dōgen plays here with the terms mujō ("unsurpassed") and ichijō 一上 (literally, "one higher") taken from

Of such [acts], Dawei says, “Master Ji and I just did a higher spiritual power.” We should study this spiritual power. The ancestral masters who correctly transmit the buddha dharma speak like this. Do not fail to say that [Weishan] was “telling his dream and washing his face”; we should be certain that this is “a higher spiritual power.” Since he says, “it wasn’t like the little stuff,” it must not be the same as the Small Vehicle, a small measure, a small view. It must not be the same as the ten sages and three worthies, and the like.<sup>23</sup> They all learn the small spiritual powers and only acquire small stature; they do not reach the great spiritual powers of the buddhas and ancestors. These are the spiritual powers of the buddhas and ancestors, the spiritual powers beyond the buddha.<sup>24</sup> Those who would learn these spiritual powers should not be moved by Māra or the other paths.<sup>25</sup> What the sūtra masters and treatise masters have never heard is hard [for them] to believe even when they do hear it. The two vehicles, the other paths, the sūtra masters and treatise masters, and the like, learn the small spiritual powers; they do not learn the great spiritual

Dawei’s line, “Master Ji and I just did ‘a higher’ (ichijō no 一上の) spiritual power.”

23 the ten sages and three worthies (jissshō sanken 十聖三賢): The ten ārya stages and three bhadra levels on the bodhisattva path. Notice that here Dōgen has extended Dawei’s reference to “the little stuff” from the “small vehicle” to the bodhisattvas of the “great vehicle.” Thus, the distinction Dōgen draws here between the “great” and “small” spiritual powers is not between Mahāyāna and Hīnayāna but between both of these and the “buddhas and ancestors.”

24 spiritual powers of the buddhas and ancestors (busso tsū 佛祖通); spiritual powers beyond the buddha (butsu kōjō jinzū 佛向上神通): The first expression picks up the Lotus Sūtra passage on a buddha’s powers quoted above (Note 9) and also points ahead to the saying of Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866) quoted below. The second expression is likely an allusion to the saying of Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 that Dōgen will also quote below. For the contrast drawn in Chan texts between “what is within the confines of the buddha” (buppen ji 佛邊事) and “what lies beyond the buddha” (butsu kōjōji 佛向上事), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Beyond the buddha.”

25 Māra or the other paths (mage 魔外): Taken as an abbreviation for tenma 天魔 (S. deva-māra) and gedō 外道 (S. tīrthika).

powers. The buddhas maintain the great spiritual powers; they transmit the great spiritual powers. These are the spiritual powers of a buddha. If they were not the spiritual powers of a buddha, [Yangshan] would not “bring a basin of water and a hand towel”; there would be no “he turned and lay facing the wall”; there would be no “after he had finished washing his face and sat down.”

Covered by the power of these great spiritual powers, there are also the small spiritual powers. The great spiritual powers take in the small spiritual powers; the small spiritual powers do not know the great spiritual powers. By “small spiritual powers,” we mean “a hair follicle swallowing the vast ocean, a mustard seed containing Sumeru.”<sup>26</sup> Or “emitting water from the upper body, emitting fire from the lower body,” and the like.<sup>27</sup> Further, the five powers or six powers are all small spiritual powers.

Puhua and Linji were at a meal at a donor’s home. Ji asked, “A hair follicle swallowing the vast ocean, a mustard seed containing Sumeru. Are these the spiritual powers and marvelous functions, or are they the dharma itself just as it is?”

The Master [Puhua] kicked over the table.

Linji’s question derives from a description in the Vimalakīrti Sūtra of the remarkable powers possessed by the bodhisattva who dwells in the liberation called “inconceivable” (Weimo jing 維摩經, T.475.14:546b25-c1):

若菩薩住是解脫者、以須彌之高廣內芥子中無所增減 . . . . 又以四大海水入一毛孔、不燒魚鼈黿鼉水性之屬。

Bodhisattvas abiding in this liberation can put Sumeru, so high and broad, into a mustard seed, without increasing [the seed] or decreasing [the mountain]. . . . Again, they can put the four great oceans into a single hair follicle, without injuring the fish, tortoises, sea turtles, crocodiles, and other forms of water life.

27 “emitting water from the upper body, emitting fire from the lower body” (shinjō shussui, shinge shukka 身上出水、身下出火): The ability to fly into the air and emit water and fire from the sides of the body is one of the earliest examples of Buddhist powers ers.<sup>28</sup> These types have never experienced the spiritual powers of a buddha even in their dreams.<sup>29</sup> To say that the five powers or six powers are small spiritual powers is [to say that] the five powers and six powers are defiled by practice and verification; they are cut off in time and place.<sup>30</sup> While one has them in life, one does not show them after the body. They belong to the self and not to others. Though they may appear in this land, they do not appear in other lands.<sup>31</sup> Though they may appear when we do in the literature, a feat said to have been demonstrated by Gautama himself in the famous “twin miracle” (S. yamakaprātihārya) at Śrāvastī. It became a standard motif in accounts of the rdzhi-pāda, the first of the six abhiññā. (See Note 2, above.) Commentators have singled out a passage in the Lotus Sūtra as a particularly likely source for Dōgen’s phrase here. It occurs in Chapter 27, on the king Śubhavyūha (Miao Zhuangyan Wang 妙莊嚴王), whose two sons convert their father to the buddha dharma by impressing him with their powers (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:60a5-7):

They leap into empty space to the height of seven tāla trees and show various spiritual transformations. They walk, stand, sit, and recline in empty space. They emit water from their upper bodies; they emit fire from their lower bodies. They emit water from their lower bodies; they emit fire from their upper bodies.

28 the five powers or six powers are all small spiritual powers (gotsū rokutsū mina shōjinzū nari 五通・六通みな小神通なり): The five powers are the first five of the six powers; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Spiritual powers.”

29 These types (korera no yakara これらのやから): A dismissive expression, the referent of which here is not entirely clear; from the context, presumably, those who cultivate the five or six spiritual powers.

30 defiled by practice and verification (shushō ni zenna serare 修證に染汚せられ): Likely reflecting the words of Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744) often quoted by Dōgen (see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Not defiled”): When asked by the Sixth Ancestor, “What thing is it that comes like this?” Nanyue replies, 説似一物即不中。祖曰、還假修證否。師曰、修證即不無、染汚即不得。

“To say it’s like any thing wouldn’t hit it.”

The Ancestor said, “Then does it depend on practice and verification?”

The Master [Nanyue] answered, “It’s not that it lacks practice and verification, but it can’t be defiled by them.”

they are cut off in time and place (saidan o jisho ni uru 際斷を時處にうる): A rough translation of an odd locution, generally interpreted to mean “they are temporally and spatially limited.” The compound expression saidan 際斷 occurs several times in the Shōbōgenzō, most often in the fixed Buddhist expression zengo saidan 前後際斷 (“before and after cut off”); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before and after cut off.”

31 Though they may appear in this land, they do not appear in other lands (shido ni gen zu to iedomo tado ni gen zezu 此土に現ずといへども他土に現ぜず): The exact nature of this claim is unclear. If, as is commonly done, we take Dōgen’s point here to be that expressions of spiritual powers in our Sahā world system (shido) do not extend to other systems (tado), it would seem to fly in the face of the many Mahāyāna sūtra accounts of miraculous acts that reach across countless world systems.

These great spiritual powers are not like this. The teaching, practice, and verification of the buddhas are equally brought to realization in the spiritual powers. They are not realized only in the vicinity of the buddhas; they are also realized beyond the buddhas. The manner of converting [beings] of the buddha of the spiritual powers is truly inconceivable.<sup>33</sup> It appears before he has a body; its appearance has nothing to 32 Though they may appear when we do not show them, they fail to appear when it is time to show them (fugen ni gen zu to iedomo, genji ni gen zuru koto o ezu 不現に現ずといへども、現時に現ずることをえず): A tentative translation of an obscure sentence, on which there is considerable difference of opinion. Some commentators take the gen 現 of fugen 不現 and genji 現時 to mean something like “the constant present”; hence, the small powers appear only occasionally (fugen ni) but cannot appear throughout all time (genji). Others have taken this gen as “real”; hence, the small powers seem to appear but do not really. Still others suggest the small powers appear when they are not expected to but not when they ought to. The present translation takes the verb gen 現 as both intransitive and transitive, as found in such Zen challenges as, “why not show your spiritual powers?” (ka fugen jinzū 何不現神通), or “try to show your spiritual powers” (shiki gen jinzū kan 試現神通看). Hence, on this reading, the small powers may appear even when one does not try to show them, but they may also fail to appear when one ought to show them. Whether Dōgen had examples of such failings in mind here is unclear.

33 The manner of converting [beings] (kegi 化儀): I.e., teaching methods; especially in the Tendai literature, used in contrast to kehō 化法, “the dharma for converting [beings]” (i.e., the doctrines taught).”

the buddha of the spiritual powers (jinzū butsu 神通佛): Dōgen has here reversed the syntax of the expected “spiritual powers of the buddha” (butsu jinzū 佛神通), no doubt to reinforce his identification of the two terms.

do with the three junctures.<sup>34</sup> If it were not for the spiritual powers of a buddha, there would never be the bringing forth of the mind [of bodhi], the practice, the bodhi, or the nirvāṇa of the buddhas.<sup>35</sup>

The ocean of this inexhaustible dharma realm, constant and unchanging, is all the spiritual powers of a buddha. It is not only that “a hair follicle swallows the vast ocean”: a hair follicle maintains the vast ocean, a hair follicle manifests the vast ocean, a hair follicle vomits the vast ocean, a hair follicle employs the vast ocean. When the entire dharma realm has been swallowed into and vomited forth by one hair follicle, we are not to learn that, since the one entire dharma realm has become like this, there must be no more dharma realm.<sup>36</sup> “A mustard seed containing Sumeru” is the same: a mustard seed vomiting Sumeru and a mustard seed expressing the dharma realm are also the ocean of the inexhaustible treasury.<sup>37</sup>

When a hair follicle vomits forth the vast ocean or a mustard seed vomits forth the vast ocean, they vomit it forth in a single moment; they vomit it forth in ten thousand kalpas. Since the ten thousand kalpas and the single moment have both been vomited forth from the hair follicle and the mustard seed, how are the hair follicle and mustard seed themselves obtained? They have been obtained from the spiritual powers. Since this obtaining is itself the spiritual powers, this is just the spiritual powers giving rise to the spiritual powers. We should learn that the three three junctures (sansai 三際): I.e., “the three times” (sansei 三世), or periods, of past, present, and future.

34 It appears before he has a body (ushin yori saki ni genzu 有身よりさきに現ず): Or “it appears before there is a body.” Dōgen may be alluding here to the line in Fu Dashi’s poem he will quote below (section 21): “Having a body is not the substance of his awakening.”

35 bringing forth of the mind (hosshin 發心): S. cittotpāda, the generation of the aspiration to achieve unsurpassed, perfect bodhi, which marks the start of the bodhisattva’s career; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bring forth the mind.”

36 there must be no more dharma realm (sara ni jinhokkai aru bekarazu さらに盡法界あるべからず): I.e., we should not think that the dharma realm disappears into the hair follicle.

37 a mustard seed vomiting Sumeru and a mustard seed expressing the dharma realm are also the ocean of the inexhaustible treasury (ke to Shumi oyobi ke gen hokkai mujinzō kai nite mo aru nari 芥吐須彌および芥現法界無盡藏海にてもあるなり): The “inexhaustible treasury” (mujinzō 無盡藏) is a common metaphor for the dharma realm, seen as the source of all things. The translation here takes nite mo aru as a copula (“are also”); it might also be read as a locative (“are also in”). Some interpreters take the term mujinzō kai 無盡藏海 (“ocean of the inexhaustible treasury”) in apposition to hokkai 法界 (“dharma realm”); hence, they would read the sentence, “A mustard seed also vomits Sumeru, and a mustard seed also expresses the dharma realm, the ocean of the inexhaustible treasury.”

times have no other persistence or perishing. The buddhas disport themselves only in these spiritual powers.<sup>38</sup>

Layman Pang, the Honorable Yun, was an extraordinary person of the ancestral seat.<sup>39</sup> He not only studied at the two seats of Jiangxi and Shitou, he met and encountered many masters possessed of the way.<sup>40</sup> Once he said, “The spiritual powers and the wondrous functions: bearing water and carrying firewood.”<sup>41</sup> We should investigate well the rationale [of this saying].

38 The buddhas disport themselves only in these spiritual powers (shobutsu wa kono jinzū nomi ni yuge suru nari 諸佛はこの神通のみに遊戲するなり): Dōgen is here recalling the common expression yuge jinzū 遊戲神通 (or jinzū yuge 神通遊戲), meaning “to play in, or enjoy, the spiritual powers;” also “to wander freely in, or by means of, the spiritual powers.”

ancestral seat (soseki 祖席): i.e., the Zen school, seen as the tradition of the Zen ancestors. The “two seats” (ryōseki 兩席) in the next sentence invokes the traditions descended from the Sixth Ancestor through his two major disciples, Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 and Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思 (d. 740).

40 Jiangxi and Shitou (Kōzei Sekitō 江西・石頭): The two leading eighth-century masters of the Nanyue 南嶽 and Qingyuan 青原 traditions respectively: Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一, disciple of Nanyue, and Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (700-790), disciple of Qingyuan.

masters possessed of the way (udō no shūshi 有道の宗師): i.e., accomplished Chan masters. The term udō (“having the way”) is usually understood as mastery of Buddhist training. The term shūshi 宗師, translated here simply as “master,” apart from its ordinary sense of an eminent teacher, can have the connotation, “master of the essential meaning” or “master of the essential gate” (shūmon 宗門; i.e., the Zen school), and be used in contrast to the terms ronshi 論師 (“treatise master”) or kyōshi 經師 (“sūtra master”) dismissed by Dōgen above.

41 “The spiritual powers and the wondrous functions: bearing water and carrying firewood” (jinzū hei myōyū, unsui gyū hansai 神通竝妙用、運水及搬柴): Famous lines from the poem addressed by Pang to Shitou 石頭; occurs at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:263b12). The term myōyū (“wondrous functions”) is a common designation for paranormal abilities or acts, especially of a buddha. The saying recalls a famous story in the Lotus Sūtra of the prior career of Buddha Śākyamuni, in which he “drew water and gathered firewood” (kyūsui shūshin 汲水拾薪) for his teacher, the future Devadatta (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:34c6).

“Yunshui” means to transport water.<sup>42</sup> Doing it oneself by oneself, another doing it by another, water is transported.<sup>43</sup> This is the buddha of spiritual powers. Although our knowledge of them may be at a certain time, the spiritual powers are the spiritual powers.<sup>44</sup> It is not that, when people do not know them, their dharma is destroyed, or their dharma is extinguished. Even though people do not know it, the dharma is the dharma as it is.<sup>45</sup> Even if we do not know that bearing water is the spiritual powers, that the spiritual powers are bearing water is irreversible.<sup>46</sup>

42 “Yunshui” means to transport water (iwayuru unsui to wa, mizu o unsai shikitaru nari いはゆる運水とは、水を運載しきたるなり): Dōgen is here merely defining the Chinese expression for his Japanese reader.

43 Doing it oneself by oneself, another doing it by another, water is transported (jisa jii ari, tasa kyōta arite mizu o unsai seshimu 自作自爲あり、他作教他ありて水を運載せしむ): A somewhat loose translation of a somewhat odd and ambiguous sentence. It is generally taken to mean that one carries water of one’s own accord or at the initiative of another. The identity of the agent of these actions is unclear: it could be anyone; it could be the “buddha of spiritual powers” in the next line; it could conceivably be the “water” itself.

44 Although our knowledge of them may be at a certain time, the spiritual powers are the spiritual powers (shiru koto wa uji nari to iedomo, jinzū wa kore jinzū nari しることは有時なりといへども、神通はこれ神通なり): I.e., the powers remain what they are whether we happen to experience (or recognize) them or not.

45 the dharma is the dharma as it is (hō wa hōni nari 法は法爾なり): The expression hōni 法爾, translated here as “the dharma as it is,” is a common Buddhist term for “the dharma itself,” “the natural state of, or nature of, the dharma,” etc. The claim here could be taken as a general one about the dharma (i.e., the Buddhist truth), a general one about dharmas (i.e., phenomena), or a specific one about the dharma (i.e., nature) of the spiritual powers.

46 irreversible (futai 不退): I.e., is permanently established; a term regularly used for the “irreversible” (or “non-regressing”; S. avaivartika) bodhisattva of the seventh stage (S. bhūmi), who can no longer fall back from the Mahāyāna.

“Banchai” means to carry firewood, as the Sixth Ancestor once did.<sup>47</sup> Although we may not recognize morning blows, three thousand as the spiritual powers, although we may not think of evening blows, eight hundred as the spiritual powers, they are the realization of the spiritual powers.<sup>48</sup>

Indeed, one who perceives the “spiritual powers and wondrous functions” of the buddhas, the tathāgatas, will inevitably gain the way; therefore, the gaining of the way of all the buddhas has always been achieved through these spiritual powers.<sup>49</sup> This being the case, while the emitting of water in the Small Vehicle may be a spiritual power, we should study the fact that the bearing of water is a great spiritual power. “Bearing water and carrying firewood” have never been discarded, nor have people neglected them. That they have, therefore, from ancient times to the present, been handed down from this one to that, without ever reverting for a moment, is the “spiritual powers and wondrous functions.” They are the great spiritual powers; they cannot be the same as “the little stuff.”

47 “Banchai” means to carry firewood, as the Sixth Ancestor once did (hansai to wa, takigi o hakobu nari, tatoeba, rokuso no mukashi no gotoshi 搬柴とは、たきぎをはこぶなり、たとへば、六祖のむかしのごとし): Again, Dōgen is defining the Chinese term. The reference to the Sixth Ancestor invokes the story that, as a youth, he sold firewood to support his mother. The story appears already in the Dunhuang manuscript of the Platform Sūtra (Liuzu tan jing 六祖壇經, T.2007.48:337a16) and is repeated throughout the later literature (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:235b13).

49 achieved through these spiritual powers (kono jinzūriki ni jōju seru この神通力に成就せる): Or “through the strength of these spiritual powers.” The term jinzūriki 神通力 is a common alternative for jinzū 神通. The logic here is, of course, technically invalid.

Truly, in this episode, there is “receiving the words, understanding their sense” of the spiritual powers; there is “things exist, box and lid matching” of the spiritual powers.<sup>53</sup> We should realize that the “spiritual powers and wondrous functions” must have their children and grandchildren, those who do not regress; they must have their eminent ancestors, those who do not advance.<sup>54</sup> Do not foolishly think that they should be the same as the other paths and the two vehicles.

51 joined his hands (shashū 叉手): I.e., the traditional polite Chinese gesture of placing one hand over the other at the breast.

52 paid his respects (chinchō 珍重; also read shinjū): A loose translation of the common Chinese polite farewell; akin to English, “Take good care of yourself.”

On the way of the buddhas, there are the spiritual transformations and spiritual powers of the upper body and the lower body.<sup>55</sup> This entire world of the ten directions is “the one true body of the śramaṇa.”<sup>56</sup> The [waters of] the nine mountains and eight oceans, down to the ocean of the nature and the waters of the ocean of sarvajña, are all water emitted from the upper body, lower body, and mid-body.<sup>57</sup> Again, they are the powers and functions have a family lineage, a posterity with its founding figures. Commentators take these two terms to refer to the disciple Dongshan and Master Yunyan, respectively.

those who do not regress (futai naru mono 不退なるもの); those who do not advance (fushin naru mono 不進なるもの): Dōgen is here continuing his play with the term futai (“not regress”) that he introduced in his discussion of Layman Pang’s saying. The exact sense of the predicates here is uncertain, but they suggest that both the “children and grandchildren” and the “eminent ancestors” are advanced adepts: the former are “irreversible” in their practice, the latter need no further “progress” in their practice. Some commentators take this passage to mean that, in the lineage of the “spiritual powers and wondrous functions,” the disciple (Dongshan) is not inferior and master (Yunyan) superior; master and disciple are on the same perfected plane.

55 spiritual transformations and spiritual powers of the upper body and the lower body (shinjō shinge no jinpen jinzū 身上・身下の神變神通): These terms come, of course, from the “small powers” of emitting water and fire from the body discussed above (section 7). Presumably, Dōgen is here associating Dongshan’s physical acts in the story with the tradition of these Buddhist paranormal physical transformations, which he will now go on to explore.

57 the nine mountains and eight oceans (kusen [or kyūsen, kyūzan] hakkai 九山八海): A reference to the topography surrounding Mount Sumeru in Buddhist cosmology. The central mountain is ringed by a series of eight mountains separated by seas.

down to the ocean of the nature (naishi shōkai 乃至性海): The term naishi 乃至 water emitted from the non-upper body, the non-lower body, the non-mid-body; and so on, down to the fire emitted [from the body, which] is also like this.<sup>58</sup>

This is not only [true of] water, fire, wind, and so on: not only are buddhas emitted from the upper body, and buddhas emitted from the lower body, and ancestors emitted from the upper body, and ancestors emitted from the lower body, and incalculable asaṃkhyeya-kalpas emitted from the upper body, and incalculable asaṃkhyeya-kalpas emitted from the lower body, and the ocean of the dharma realm emitted from the upper body, and the ocean of the dharma realm absorbed in the upper body; but also the vomiting out of seven or eight lands of this world and the swallowing up of two or three, are also like this.<sup>59</sup>

the ocean of *sarvajña (sabanya kai 薩婆若海): Sabanya transliterates the Sanskrit sarvajña, “all knowing,” or “omniscience.” Though not a common image in Chan texts, the “ocean of all knowing” occurs regularly in the Chinese Buddhist literature with a sense close to that of the “ocean of the nature” above — as is seen in passages, for example, such as, “thought after thought is quiescent and flows naturally into the ocean of sarvajña” (shinshin jakumetsu jinen runyū sabanya kai 心心寂滅自然流入薩婆若海). (Fahua xuanyi 法華玄義, T.1716.33:734b-3.)

down to the fire emitted (naishi shukka [also read suika] 乃至出火): Again, the list implied by the term naishi (“down to”) is unclear; perhaps Dōgen is signaling that the “fire emitted” from the body is also “like this” (kaku no gotoshi) in the sense that it can also be treated in all the ways he has just treated “water.”

59 water, fire, wind, and so on (sui ka fū tō 水・火・風等): Dōgen is here introducing the Buddhist list of physical “elements” he will discuss below.

buddhas emitted from the upper body (shinjō shutsu butsu 身上出佛): The term “buddha” (butsu 佛) could be read in the singular, but its pairing with “ancestor” (so 祖) in the next phrase suggests Dōgen’s common expression “buddhas and ancestors” (busso 佛祖).

incalculable *asaṃkhyeya-kalpas (muryō asōgikō 無量阿僧祇劫): A kalpa is an (almost) infinitely long period of time; asaṃkhyeya-kalpas are kalpas of “countless” number. Some texts define asaṃkhyeya as the specific number  $10^{59}$ .

ocean of the dharma realm (hokkai kai 法界海): The realm of all dharmas (S. dharma-dhātu) seen as an ocean; very similar in connotation to the “ocean of the nature” and the “ocean of sarvajña” seen above.

lands of this world (sekai kokudo 世界國土): Without an obvious technical Buddhist usage, this expression suggests merely the various countries of the world. It may be that Dōgen introduces it here to emphasize that the spiritual powers govern the activity not only of a sacred Buddhist realm but of the ordinary world.

The four elements, the five elements, the six elements, the various elements, the incalculable elements — all are the spiritual powers emitted and submerged, the spiritual powers swallowed and vomited forth.<sup>60</sup> The present whole earth and empty space, in every direction, are swallowed up and vomited forth.<sup>61</sup> Their strength is their being turned by the mustard seed; their strength is their being connected to the hair follicle.<sup>62</sup> Born together where knowledge does not reach; they abide where knowledge does not reach; they return where knowledge does not reach.<sup>63</sup> The marks of the transformations of the spiritual powers of the buddhas, which surely have nothing to do with short or long — how could we merely consider them in terms of [their] measurement?<sup>64</sup>

Long ago, when a seer with the five powers was serving the Buddha, the seer asked, “The Buddha has six powers; I have five powers. What is that one power?”<sup>65</sup>

60 The four elements, the five elements, the six elements (shidai godai rokudai 四大・五大・六大): The nested lists of Buddhist “elements” (S. mahābhūta) comprising the natural world. The four are earth, water, fire, and wind; the five add space; the six add consciousness. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four elements and five aggregates.”

61 The present whole earth and empty space, in every direction (ima no daichi kokū no menmen naru いまの大地虚空の面面なる): Taking menmen here as referring to hōmen 方面 (“direction”); some would take it as “in every instance” or “in every aspect.”

62 Their strength is their being turned by the mustard seed; their strength is their being connected to the hair follicle (ke ni tenzeraruru o rikiryō to seri, mō ni kakareru o rikiryō to seri 芥に轉ぜらるるを力量とせり、毛にかかれるを力量とせり): The subject here and in the following sentence is unexpressed; presumably, we are to understand the “great earth and empty space” of the preceding sentence.

63 Born together where knowledge does not reach (shikichi no oyobazaru yori dōshō shite 識知のおよばざるより同生して): The term dōshō 同生 (“born together”) recalls the discussion above of the powers “born together” with the buddha; here, however, it seems to suggest only that “the great earth and empty space” are “born together.”

64 how could we merely consider them in terms of [their] measurement? (hitoe ni shikiryō o ko shite gi suru nomi naran ya ひとへに測量を擧して擬するのみならずや): Although Dōgen often uses the term shikiryō (“measurement”) in a somewhat loose sense of intellectual “calculation,” its association here with “short and long” suggests he wants to retain its stricter sense of “to fathom,” “to survey.” Presumably his point here is that, when taken as “the spiritual powers of the buddha,” there is more to “the great earth and empty space” than spatial extension.

65 Long ago (mukashi むかし): A Japanese version of a story appearing in the Mingjue

The Buddha called the seer, saying, “Seer with the five powers.”

The seer responded. The Buddha said, “That one power, ask me about it.”<sup>66</sup>

We should study this episode very well. How could the seer know that the Buddha has six powers? The Buddha has incalculable spiritual powers and wisdom, not just six powers. Even if one looks only at his six powers, the six powers cannot be exhausted. Not to mention, when it comes to the rest of the [Buddha’s] spiritual powers, how could [he] see them even in his dreams?<sup>67</sup>

Now, let us ask something. We should ask, even if the seer may have seen Old Master Śākya, has he seen the Buddha or not?<sup>68</sup> Even if he has chanshi yulu 明覺禪師語錄 (T.1996.47:671a15-17) and elsewhere. Dōgen also cites this story in his Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ 3:264, no. 394).

seer with the five powers (gotsū sennin 五通仙人): The term sennin 仙人, translated here as “seer,” has the connotations in Chinese texts of a mysterious, transcendent being, of a solitary hermit with miraculous powers, a Daoist “immortal,” etc. In Buddhist texts, the term is often used to render Sanskrit terms like ṛṣi (often translated “seer”) or muni (often rendered “sage” or “ascetic”).

“that one power” (na ittū 那一通): For a list of the six powers, see above, Note 2. In traditional discussions of this list, the first five are considered available to any advanced yogi, Buddhist or otherwise; in contrast, the sixth power, the knowledge that one has eliminated the defilements, can only be accomplished by a realized Buddhist adept.

66 “That one power, ask me about it” (na ittū ni mon ga 那一通爾問我): The sense is uncertain and the commentaries varied here. Most follow some version of Dōgen’s view, expressed below, that the seer has not understood the meaning of “that one power” he has asked about. Some would see the exchange itself as demonstrations of “that one power,” in which case, we would want to read the last clause not as an imperative but as a declarative: “that one power [is] your asking me.”

67 how could [he] see them even in his dreams? (ikade ka ya yume ni mo min いかでかやゆめにもみん): Taking the unexpressed subject to be “the seer of the five powers.”

68 Old Master Śākya (Shaka rōshi 釋迦老子): Dōgen is here using a common Zen term of endearment for the Buddha, treating him as just one of the venerable teachers of the community.

seen the Buddha, has he seen Old Master Śākya or not? We should ask, even if he has seen Old Master Śākya, even if he has seen the Buddha, has he seen the seer with the five powers or not? In this questioning, one should study using entanglements; one should study entanglements cut off.<sup>69</sup> How much less does [the question of] the Buddha having six powers reach [the level of] counting the neighbor's valuables?<sup>70</sup>

いま釋迦老子道の那一通爾問我のころ、いかん。仙人に那一通あり、といはず、仙人になし、といはず。那一通の通塞はたとひとつとも、仙人いかでか那一通を通ぜん。いかんとなれば、仙人に五通あれど、佛有六通のなかの五通にあらず。仙人通は、たとひ佛通の所通に通破となるとも、仙通いかでか佛通を通ずることをえん。もし仙人、佛の一通をも通ずることあらば、この通より佛を通すべきなり。仙人をみるに、佛通に相似せるあり、佛儀をみるに、仙通に相似せることあるは、佛儀なりといへども、佛神通にあらずとしるべきなり。通ぜざれば、五通みな佛と同じからざるなり。

What about the point of the Old Master Śākya's saying here, "That one power, ask me about it"? He does not say the seer has "that one power"; he does not say the seer lacks it. Even if he explains the passage and blockage of "that one power," how can the seer penetrate "that one power"?<sup>71</sup> For, though the seer has the five powers, they are not the five seen the Buddha (kenbutsu 見佛): The exact distinction between "Old Master Śākya" and "the Buddha" here is not clear but suggests a difference between the buddha as historical figure and the buddha of more cosmic proportions that Dōgen is describing — in scholastic terms, between the buddha's "transformation body" (ōjin 應身; S. nirmāṇa-kāya) and "dharma body" (hosshin 法身; S. dharma-kāya).

69 one should study using entanglements; one should study entanglements cut off (yō kattō o gaku su beshi, kattō dan o gaku su beshi 用葛藤を學すべし、葛藤斷を學すべし): The subject here is unexpressed; it could be interpreted either as "we" or as "he" (i.e., the "seer" in the story). For the term kattō 葛藤, here translated "entanglements," see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Tangled vines." Dōgen's own language here is rather tangled and subject to somewhat varied interpretation.

70 counting the neighbor's valuables (rinchin o sansū suru 隣珍を算數する): I.e., the "seer's" concern with the six powers of the buddha is less productive than calculating another's property.

71 Even if he explains the passage and blockage of "that one power" (na ittō no tsūsoku wa tatoi toku tomo 那一通の通塞はたとひとつとも): The unexpressed subject here is probably "Old Master Śākya." "Passage and blockage" here translates tsūsoku 通塞, an expression that has the idiomatic sense of "things going well or not" (what we might call "the ups and downs" of life); but Dōgen is here beginning an extended play with the word tsū 通, the first element of tsūsoku and the second element of the term jinzū 神通, the translation of which by "spiritual powers" misses the connotation of "passage" (also "thorough understanding," "mastery") in its second element. Hence, some of Dōgen's play in this passage with that connotation is masked by the translation.

powers in “the Buddha has six powers.”<sup>72</sup> Even if the powers of the seer get utterly penetrated in what the powers of the buddha penetrate, how could the powers of the seer penetrate the powers of the Buddha?<sup>73</sup> If the seer could penetrate even one power of the Buddha, by this penetration he should penetrate the Buddha.

When we look at the seer, he has something resembling the powers of the Buddha; when we look at the deportment of the Buddha, it has something resembling the powers of the seer.<sup>74</sup> Though this may be [true of] the deportment of the Buddha, we should realize that [such deportment] is not the spiritual powers of the Buddha. Since they do not penetrate [the Buddha], none of the five powers is the same as [those of] the Buddha.

たちまちに那一通をとふ、なにの用かある、となり。釋迦老子のころは、一通をもとふべし、となり。那一通をとひ、那一通をとふべし、一通も仙人はおよぶところなしとなり。しかあれば、佛神通と餘者通とは、神通の名字おなじといへども、神通の名字はるかに殊異なり。ここをもて、

What is the use of his suddenly asking about “that one power”? The Old Master Śākya’s point is that he should be asking about even one of the powers. He should be asking about “that one power” and asking about “that one power.”<sup>75</sup> Even one of the powers is not something the sage could reach. This being the case, [when we speak of] “the spiritual powers of the Buddha” and the spiritual powers of others, while the term

72 they are not the five powers in “the Buddha has six powers” (butsu u rokutsū no naka no gotsū ni arazu 佛有六通のなかの五通にあらず): Or, “they are not the five powers among the six powers that the Buddha has.”

73 get utterly penetrated in what the powers of the Buddha penetrate (buttsū no shotsū ni tsūha to naru 佛通の所通に通破となる): An odd locution, presumably meaning simply “are fully penetrated by the powers of the Buddha.” The element ha 破 (“to break”) in the term tsūha 通破 should probably be taken as an emphatic; hence, “utterly.”

74 deportment of the Buddha (butsugi 佛儀): The glyph gi 儀 usually connotes formal or ritual action; here, it can probably be understood simply as the Buddha’s “manner,” or “way of behaving.” The point would seem to be that, while in their behavior, the Buddha and the seer may sometimes act alike in displaying powers, such displays are not the real powers of the Buddha.

75 he should be asking about even one of the powers. He should be asking about “that one power” and asking about “that one power” (ittsū o mo tou beshi, to nari. na ittō o toi, na ittō o tou beshi 一通をもとふべし、となり。那一通をとひ、那一通をとふべし): A confusing passage, generally interpreted to mean that, instead of asking about “that one power” distinctive of the Buddha, the seer should be asking again and again about any one of the powers. On this reading, Dōgen is using “that one power” (na ittō 那一通) here to mean, not the sixth power, but whichever power the seer may ask about.

“spiritual powers” may be the same, the term “spiritual powers” is very different.<sup>76</sup>

臨濟院慧照大師云、古人云、如來舉身相、爲順世間情。恐人生斷見、權且立虛名。假言三十二、八十也空聲。有身非覺體、無相乃眞形。儻道、佛有六通、是不可思議。一切諸天・神仙・阿修羅・大力鬼、亦有神通、應是佛否。道流莫錯、祇如阿修羅與天帝釋戰、戰敗領八萬四千眷屬、入藕孔中藏、莫是聖否。如山僧所舉、皆是業通・依通。夫如佛六通者不然。入色界不被色惑、入聲界不被聲惑、入香界不被香惑、入味界不被味惑、入觸界不被觸惑、入法界不被法惑。所以達六種色聲香味觸法皆是空相、不能繫縛此無依道人。雖是五蘊漏質、便是地行神通。道流、眞佛無形、眞法無相。儻祇麼幻化上頭、作模作樣。設求得者、皆是野狐精魅。竝不是眞佛、是外道見解。

76 while the term “spiritual powers” may be the same, the term “spiritual powers” is very different (jinzū no myōji onaji to iedomo, jinzū no myōji haruka ni shui nari 神通の名字おなじといへども、神通の名字はるかに殊異なり): Presumably to be understood, “though the term may be the same, its meaning in each case is very different.”

77 Great Master Huizhao of Linji Cloister (Rinzai in Eshō daishi 臨濟院慧照大師): I.e., Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄. This entire section is a quotation in Chinese of a passage from the Linji lu 臨濟錄, T.1985.47:49c29-50a14.

78 An ancient (kojin 古人): Linji is quoting here the Liang zhao Fu dashi song Jingang bore jing 梁朝傅大師頌金剛般若經 (T.2732.85:2b23-26; Stein 1846), preserved among the Dunhuang documents. Though traditionally attributed to the semi-legendary sixth-century figure Fu Dashi 傅大師, or Great Master Fu (497-569), it is thought to have been composed in the Tang. The verse quoted by Linji here is commenting on the Diamond Sūtra's famous discussion of the “marks” (xiang 相; S. lakṣaṇa) of a buddha. It is introduced in the original Fu Dashi text by two passages (T.2732.85:2b18-21) from Kumārajīva's translation of the Diamond Sūtra (Jingang bore boluomi jing 金剛般若波羅蜜經, T.235.8:750a20-23; T.235.8:749a23-25):

須菩提、於意云何、可以三十二相見如來不。不也世尊、不可以三十二相得見如來。何以故。如來說三十二相即是非相。是名三十二相。

“Subhūti, what do you think? Can one see the Tathāgata by his thirty-two marks?”

“No, World-Honored One, one cannot see the Tathāgata by his thirty-two marks. Why is this? The thirty-two marks spoken of by the Tathāgata are no-marks. These are called ‘the thirty-two marks.’”

He provisionally speaks of the thirty-two

And the eighty, just empty sounds.<sup>80</sup>

Having a body is not the substance of his awakening;

Having no marks is his true shape.<sup>81</sup>

You say that the buddha has six powers, and that they are inconceivable. All the devas, transcendent seers, asuras, and powerful spirits have spiritual powers.<sup>82</sup> Does this make them buddhas? Followers of the way, don't be mistaken. The asuras battled with Deva Lord Śakra; defeated in battle, they led their eighty-four thousand followers to hide inside a lotus root.<sup>83</sup> Are they not sages?

What this mountain monk has brought up are all karmic powers or dependent powers; they are not like the six powers of the buddha.<sup>84</sup>

The Buddha admonished Subhūti, “Whatever marks there are, they are all vain delusion. If one sees the marks as no-marks, that is seeing the Tathāgata.”

bodily marks (shinsō 身相): i.e., the extraordinary physical “marks” (S. lakṣaṇa) held to adorn the body of a buddha (and a cakravartin, or “wheel-turning” monarch).

79 annihilationist views (danken 斷見): S. uccheda-dṛṣṭi, the false view that denies the reality of karma and rebirth.

80 the thirty-two and the eighty (sanjūni, hachijū 三十二、八十): i.e., the traditional lists of thirty-two “marks” (sō 相; S. lakṣaṇa;) and eighty “auspicious signs” (kō 好; S. anuvyañjana) that scripture attributes to a buddha's body.

81 Having a body (ushin 有身); Having no marks (musō 無相): Or, perhaps, “his existing (i.e., physical) body”; “his nonexistent marks.”

82 All the devas, transcendent seers, asuras, and powerful spirits (issai shoten, shinsen, ashura, dairikiki 一切諸天、神仙、阿修羅、大力鬼): “devas” (shoten 諸天): i.e., the “gods” of the various buddhist “heavens.” “Transcendent seers” (shinsen 神仙): i.e., spiritual adepts like the “seer” who interviewed the Buddha in the story above; in Chinese context, often translated as “immortals.” “Asura” (ashura 阿修羅): sometimes translated “titans”; powerful beings of Indian mythology, sometimes pictured as warring with the devas. “Powerful spirits” (dairikiki 大力鬼): could refer to a variety of demonic beings; sometimes interpreted as powerful demons in the realm of the “hungry ghosts” (gaki 餓鬼; S. preta).

83 The asuras battled with Deva Lord Śakra (ashura yo Ten Taishaku sen 阿修羅與天帝釋戰): “Deva Lord Śakra” (Ten Taishaku 天帝釋) refers to the powerful Vedic god Indra, sometimes said to be the king of the devas. The example of the asura king hiding his troops in the lotus root can be seen at Huayan jing 華嚴經, T.279.10:220a25.

84 What this mountain monk has brought up (nyo sansō shokyo 如山僧所舉): i.e., “the powers I have just discussed.”

karmic powers or dependent powers (gōtsū etsū 業通依通): “Karmic powers” (gōtsū 業通) likely correspond to what are elsewhere called “recompensive powers” (hōtsū 報通) — i.e., powers derived from the karma of one's birth as a dragon, demon, etc. “Dependent powers” (etsū 依通) refer to paranormal events in the environment, such as “miraculous” cures, etc. For these definitions, see Baozang lun 寶藏論 (T.1857.45:127b1-9), and Zongjing lu 宗鏡錄 (T.2016.48:494b18ff).

He enters the realm of form without being deluded by form, enters the realm of sound without being deluded by sound, enters the realm of smell without being deluded by smell, enters the realm of taste without being deluded by taste, enters the realm of touch without being deluded by touch, enters the realm of dharma without being deluded by dharma.<sup>85</sup>

Therefore, when he realizes that the six types — form, sound, smell, taste, touch, and dharma — are all empty marks, they cannot bind this person of the way who depends on nothing.<sup>86</sup> Though his is the defiled quality of the five aggregates, it is yet the spiritual power of walking the earth.<sup>87</sup>

Followers of the way, the true buddha is without a shape; the true dharma is without marks. You are just making models and making patterns on top of phantom transformations. Even supposing you get something through your seeking, it will all be fox spirits.<sup>88</sup> None of it is the true buddha; it is the view of other paths.

しかあれば、諸佛の六神通は、一切諸天・鬼神、および二乗等のおよぶべきにあらず、はかるべきにあざるなり。佛道の六通は、佛道の佛弟子のみ單傳せり、餘人の相傳せざるところなり。佛六通は、佛道に單傳す、單傳せざるは、佛六通をしるべからざるなり。佛六通を單傳せざらんは、佛道人なるべからず、と參學すべし。

Thus, the six spiritual powers of the buddhas are not something that could be reached by, not something that could be reckoned by, any of the devas or demonic spirits, or by the two vehicles and the like. The

85 He enters the realm of form without being deluded by form (nyū shikikai fuhi shiki waku 入色界不被色惑): Linji is giving here the venerable list of the six “entrances” (nyū 入; S. āyatana, “sense field”). The “realm of dharma” here refers to the objects of the sixth sensory organ, the mind (i 意; S. manas). Though the association of the six sense fields with the six spiritual powers became common in Chan texts, there does not seem to have been any serious attempt actually to match the members of the two lists. “Deluded” (waku 惑) translates a term regularly used as a synonym for the “defilements” (bonnō 煩惱; S. kleśa).

86 empty marks (kūsō 空相): Or, “marked by emptiness”; in ordinary parlance, “an empty form.”

87 the defiled quality of the five aggregates (goun ro shitsu 五蘊漏質): I.e., the ordinary state of a human being. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four elements and five aggregates.”

the spiritual power of walking the earth (jigyō jinzū 地行神通): No doubt a play with the sense, “grounded,” in the term jigyō 地行 (“walking the earth”), as in the “grounded seer” (jigyō sen 地行仙), who has not yet mastered the art of flying.

six powers of the way of the buddhas have been uniquely transmitted only by the disciples of the buddha on the way of the buddhas; they are not something transmitted by others.<sup>89</sup> The six powers of the buddha are uniquely transmitted on the way of the buddhas; those that do not uniquely transmit them cannot be expected to know them. We should study that those who have not uniquely transmitted the six powers of the buddha are not people of the way of the buddhas.

89 uniquely transmitted (tanden 單傳): A term commonly used in Zen to describe the transmission of the dharma from master to disciple. Though the term suggests (and in some cases is used to indicate) a lineage in which there is only one legitimate representative, or “ancestor,” in each generation, it regularly appears in contexts where the element tan 單 is better understood as “unique,” “pure,” or “simple.”

90 Chan Master Baizhang Dazhi (Hyakujō Daichi zenji 百丈大智禪師): I.e., Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海. The quotation here is from a passage appearing in the Tiansheng guangdong lu 天聖廣燈錄, ZZ.135:681a17-b3. A portion of the passage is also quoted in the “Shōbōgenzō arakan” 正法眼藏阿羅漢 chapter.

91 “the four-line gāthā” (shiku ge 四句偈): Here, probably referring to the verse found throughout the Buddhist literature; see, e.g., the Nirvāṇa Sūtra (Da banniepan jing 大般涅槃經, T.7.1:204c23-24):

諸行無常、是生滅法、生滅滅已、寂滅爲樂。

All things are impermanent:

This is the law of arising and ceasing.

When the arising and ceasing have ceased,

Their cessation is ease.

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Whether on trees or on rocks.”

“the four fruits” (shika 四果): The four stages on the path of the śrāvaka: “stream entry” (yoru 預流; S. srotāpanna), “once-returning” (ichirai 一來; S. sakṛdāgami), “non-returning” (fugen 不還; S. anāgami), and “worthy” (arakan 阿羅漢; S. arhat).

92 six entrances (rokunyū 六入): The six sense spheres (S. āyatana) of eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind.

or non-being, and not to rely on the understanding — this is called “spiritual power.” Not to guard this spiritual power — this is called “no spiritual power.” Such is the bodhisattva of no spiritual powers, whose traces cannot be found. He is a person beyond the buddha, the most inconceivable person; he is himself a deva.<sup>93</sup>

いま佛佛祖祖相傳せる神通、かくのごとし。諸佛神通は、佛向上人なり、最不可思議人なり、是自己天なり、無神通菩薩なり、知解不依住なり、神通不守此なり、一切諸法不被礙なり。いま佛道に六神通あり、諸佛の傳持しきたれることひさし。一佛も傳持せざるなし、傳持せざれば諸佛にあらず。その六神通は、六入を無迹にあきらむるなり。

The spiritual powers transmitted here by buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor are like this. The spiritual powers of the buddhas are “the person beyond the buddha,” are “the most inconceivable person,” are “he is himself a deva,” are “the bodhisattva of no spiritual powers,” are the understanding not relying, are the spiritual powers not guarding this, are all the dharmas not being obstructed.<sup>94</sup> On the way of the buddhas, there are the six spiritual powers here. The buddhas have transmitted and kept them for a long time. Not a single buddha has failed to transmit and keep them. Those who do not transmit and keep them are not buddhas. Those six spiritual powers clarify “the six entrances” “without traces.”<sup>95</sup>

“Without traces,” [means what] an ancient has said:

93 person beyond the buddha (butsu kōjō nin 佛向上人): Or “human beyond the buddha,” in contrast to “deva.” The expression became a popular one in the Zen literature; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Beyond the buddha.”

he is himself a deva (ze jiko ten 是自己天): A tentative translation of an unusual locution; alternatively, it might be read “he is our own deva,” after jiko nin 自己人 (“our own people”). The interpretation is rendered more difficult by the fact that Dōgen has broken off the quotation in mid-sentence: the original (ZZ.135:681b2-3) reads,

He is a person beyond the buddha, the most inconceivable. The person is the self; the devas are the illumination of his wisdom.

94 the understanding not relying (chige fu ejū 知解不依住); the spiritual powers not guarding this (jinzū fushu shi 神通不守此); all the dharmas not being obstructed (issai shohō fuhige 一切諸法不被礙): Dōgen is here simply playing with the syntax of Baizhang’s Chinese.

95 clarify “the six entrances” “without traces” (rokunyū o mushaku ni akiramuru 六入を無迹にあきらむる): i.e., “clarify the six senses without leaving any traces”; again Dōgen is playing here with Baizhang’s expression “six entrances without traces.”

*The six spiritual functions, empty and not empty;

非内外は、無迹なるべし。無迹に修行し、參學し、證入するに、六入を動著せざるなり。動著せずといふは、動著するもの三十棒分あるなり。

“Neither inside nor outside” must be “without traces.” When, “without traces,” we practice, study, and enter verification, we do not move “the six entrances.” To say, “we do not move,” means, the one who moves deserves thirty blows.<sup>97</sup>

So, we should study the six spiritual powers in this way. Those who are not legitimate heirs of the house of the buddhas — which of them has even heard of this principle? They just mistake vainly chasing about outside for the conduct of coming home.<sup>98</sup> Further, while the “four fruits” may be implements on the way of the buddhas, there is no Tripiṭaka [master] who has correctly transmitted them. How could those who count sand, the types who wander abroad, get these fruits?<sup>99</sup> The types

The one circular light (ikka enkō 一顆圓光): A reference to the halo about the head of a buddha or bodhisattva.

97 the one who moves deserves thirty blows (dōjaku suru mono sanjū bō bun 動著するもの三十棒分): Echoing the stock Zen phrase, “If you move, thirty blows” (dōjaku sanjū bō 動著三十棒).

98 They just mistake vainly chasing about outside for the conduct of coming home (itazura ni kōge no chisō o, kika no anri to ayamareru nomi nari いたづらに向外の馳走を、歸家の行履とあやまれるのみなり): “Chasing about” (chisō 馳走) and “coming home” (kika or kike 歸家) are terms often used in Zen in a psychological sense, for seeking the goals of Buddhism “outside” and “within” the self, respectively. The term anri 行履 (“conduct”) is a common expression for Buddhist religious activities.

99 those who count sand (sansha no yakara 算沙のやから); the types who wander abroad (reihei no tagui 鈴餅のたぐひ): “Counting sand” (sansha 算沙) is a common pejorative for those who merely study the details of doctrine; see Supplementary Notes, who get a little and consider it enough — their investigations have not mastered it; it is something only buddha after buddha inherits.<sup>100</sup>

The “four fruits” are “to receive and keep the four-line gāthā.” “To receive and keep the four-line gāthā” means, in regard to “all dharmas, whether being or non-being,” “the eyes, ears, nose, and tongue are each without the stain of craving.” “Without the stain of craving” is “undefiled.” “Undefiled” means the ordinary mind, means “I’m always close to this.”<sup>101</sup>

s.v. “Counting sand.” “Wander abroad” renders reihei (or ryōbyō) 踰跼, a term occurring elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō in allusion to the wanderings of the rich man’s son in Chapter 4 of the Lotus Sūtra; likely a variant for the compound term lingping 伶俚 appearing at Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:17b11.

100 The types who get a little and consider it enough (toku shō i soku no rui 得小爲足の類): Doubtless an allusion to the parable in Chapter 8 of the Lotus Sūtra, in which a man, not realizing that he has a precious jewel sewn in his robe, wanders in poverty satisfied with whatever he can get; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Jewel in the robe.” So too those on the śrāvaka path, not realizing that they could attain the complete knowledge of a tathāgata, “take little knowledge as enough” (i shōchi i soku 以小智爲足). (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:29a5.)

101 the ordinary mind (byōjō shin 平常心): A popular Zen expression, seen especially in the common phrase, “The ordinary mind is the way” (byōjō shin ze dō 平常心是道); see Supplementary Notes.

“I’m always close to this” (go jō o shi setsu 吾常於此切): A phrase also cited in the “Henzan” 遍參 and (in the variant go jō o ze setsu 吾常於是切) the “Gabyō” 画餅 chapters of the Shōbōgenzō. The sense of the glyph setsu 切 here is subject to interpretation: the translation takes it as sekkin 切近 (“to be familiar with,” “to be intimate with”), but it could also be, and has been, understood as shinsetsu 深切 (“to be ardent,” “to care deeply,” etc.). From a remark attributed to Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价, in answer to a question about the three bodies of a buddha. The Dongshan yulu 洞山語錄 (T.1986A.47:510b24-25) gives the question as:

問、三身之中、阿那身不墮衆數。

[A monk] asked, “Among the three bodies [of the buddha], which body doesn’t fall among the numbered?”

Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:152, case 55) has a variant version:

洞山因僧問、三身中那身說法。師曰、吾常於此切。僧後問曹山、洞山道吾常於此切、意旨云何。山云、要頭斫將去。僧又問雪峰。峯以拄杖劈口打曰、我也曾到洞山來。

Dongshan was asked by a monk, “Among the three bodies, which preaches the dharma?”

The Master said, “I’m always close to this.”

The monk later asked Caoshan [i.e., Caoshan Benzhi 曹山本寂, 840-901], “Dongshan said, ‘I’m always close to this.’ What does that mean?”

Shan said, “If you want my head, cut it off and take it.”

The monk again asked Xuefeng [i.e., Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908)]. Feng struck him in the mouth with his staff and said, “I’ve been to Dongshan.”

六通・四果を佛道に正傳せる、かくのごとし。相違あらんは、佛法にあらざらんとしるべきなり。しかあれば、佛道はかならず神通より達するなり。その達する、涓滴の、巨海を吞吐する、微塵の、高嶽を拈放する、たれか疑著することをえん。これすなはち神通なるのみなり。

The correct transmission of the six powers and four fruits in the way of the buddhas is like this. We should realize that what differs from this is not the buddha dharma. This being the case, the way of the buddhas is always mastered from the spiritual powers. Who could doubt that, in this mastery, the smallest drop of water swallows and vomits the vast ocean, an infinitesimal dust mote takes up and lets go of a tall peak? This is just the spiritual powers.

INTRODUCTION

This work was composed in the summer of 1242, at Kōshōji. According to the colophon, it was copied out over thirty years later by Dōgen's disciple Ejō. The work, one of the shorter pieces in the Shōbōgenzō, appears as number 36 in both the seventy-five and sixty-chapter versions of the collection and as number 34 in the Honzan edition.

As its title indicates, the text is a discussion of the arhat, or “worthy” one, who has eliminated all his or her spiritual defilements (kleśa) and achieved nirvāṇa. In much Buddhist literature, the term “arhat” was used to refer to any fully realized Buddhist (and, indeed, was applied to Buddha Śākyamuni himself); but, with the rise of the bodhisattva ideal, the word came to refer specifically to the goal of the śrāvaka-yāna, or “vehicle of the hearers,” those held to aspire only to nirvāṇa and not to the anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi (“unsurpassed, perfect awakening”) of a buddha.

Dogen's discussion of the term dismisses the distinction between the arhat and the buddha. As in most of the chapters of the Shōbōgenzō, the discussion proceeds by way of comments on passages drawn from earlier literature — in this case, from the Lotus Sūtra and the sayings of several Chinese Chan masters. Expanding on the famous Lotus Sūtra doctrine that all Buddhism is ultimately intended to guide beings to buddhahood, Dōgen argues that the true arhat is a fully awakened buddha. Reiterating a theme found in much of his writing, he argues that true awakening is to be found in the spiritual practice of the Zen masters.

The Arhat

諸漏已盡、無復煩惱、逮得己利、盡諸有結、心得自在。

Their contaminants having been exhausted, without further afflictions, having attained their own benefits, having eliminated the bonds of existence, their minds set free.<sup>1</sup>

[36:2]

This is the great arhat; it is the ultimate fruit for students of Buddhism. It is called the “fourth fruit.”<sup>2</sup> There is a buddha arhat.<sup>3</sup>

1 Their contaminants having been exhausted (shorō [or shoro] i jin 諸漏已盡): Quoting the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:1c17-19). A description of the twelve thousand monks, all of whom were arhats, present at the preaching of the sūtra.

2 “fourth fruit” (daishi ka 第四果): I.e., last of the “four fruits” (shi ka 四果), or stages on the śrāvaka path to nirvāṇa: (1) “stream-enterer” (yoru 預流; S. śrotāpanna); (2) “once-returner” (ichirai 一來; S. sakṛdāgāmin); (3) “nonreturner” (fugen 不還; S. anāgāmin); and (4) “worthy” (arakan 阿羅漢; S. arhat).

3 There is a buddha arhat (butsu arakan ari 佛阿羅漢あり): Some versions give nari なり here for ari あり, which could be read either “it [i.e., the fourth fruit?] is a buddha arhat,” or “a buddha is an arhat.” While the term “arhat” is a common epithet for buddhas, the unusual expression “buddha arhat” (butsu arakan 佛阿羅漢) is not used in reference to arhats in general but only in the sense, “an arhat who is a buddha.” So, e.g., the Guoqu xianzai yinguo jing 過去現在因果經 (T.189.3:645a11-13), describing the conversion of Buddha Śākyamuni’s first five disciples:

There were for the first time in the world six arhats. The buddha arhat represented the buddha treasure; the four truths represented the dharma treasure; the five arhats represented the saṃgha treasure. Thus, the world was provided with the three treasures.

“The contaminants” are broken wooden dippers missing their handles.<sup>4</sup> Though they may have been used for a long time, their “having been exhausted” is the whole body of the wooden dipper springing forth.<sup>5</sup> “Having attained their own benefits” is going in and out of the crown of the head. “Having eliminated the bonds of existence” is in the realms everywhere in the ten directions, it has never been hidden.<sup>6</sup> The shape of “their minds set free,” we should investigate as the high places are naturally high and level; the low places are naturally low and level.<sup>7</sup> Therefore, there are “fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles.”<sup>8</sup> “Free”

4 “The contaminants” are broken wooden dippers missing their handles (shorō wa, motsu bei ha mokushaku 諸漏は、没柄破木杓): “Contaminant” (rō [or ro] 漏) translates the Buddhist technical term āsrava, used in reference to the impurity that characterizes the “contaminated” (uro 有漏; S. sāsrava) states of mind of the spiritual “commoner” (bonbu 凡夫; S. prthagjana), as opposed to the “uncontaminated” (muro 無漏; S. anāsrava) states of the spiritual “noble” (shō 聖; S. ārya). “Broken wooden dipper” (ha mokushaku 破木杓) is a common expression in Zen texts for something worthless, sometimes used in an ironic positive sense; the “missing handles” here seems a novel addition.

5 their “having been exhausted” is the whole body of the wooden dipper springing forth (i jin wa mokushaku no konjin chōshutsu nari 已盡は木杓の渾身跳出なり): Perhaps meaning that the exhaustion of the contaminants is their complete liberation. While both “whole body” (konjin 渾身) and “springing forth” (chōshutsu 跳出) occur regularly, this combination is unusual, being found only here and in the “Henzan” 遍參 chapter.

6 in the realms everywhere in the ten directions, it has never been hidden (jin jippō kai fuzōzō 盡十方界不曾藏): I.e., everywhere obvious; variation on the popular saying, “in the realms everywhere, it has never been hidden” (henkai fuzōzō 徧界不曾藏), attributed to Chan Master Shishuang Qingzhu 石霜慶諸 (807-888). Recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:157-158, case 58); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “In the realms everywhere, it has never been hidden.”

7 the high places are naturally high and level; the low places are naturally low and level (kōsho ji kōhei, teisho ji teihei 高處自高平、低處自低平): Variation on a well-known saying by Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂 (803-887), recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:138, case 23); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “High places are high and level, low places are low and level.”

8 “fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles” (shō heki ga ryaku 牆壁瓦礫): A well-known definition of the buddha mind, first attributed to Nanyang Huizhong 南陽慧忠 (d. 775). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles.”

means, mind, “the manifestation of the full function.”<sup>9</sup> “Without further afflictions” is the afflictions not yet arisen; it means the afflictions are obstructed by the afflictions.

阿羅漢の神通・智慧・禪定・說法・化導・放光等、さらに外道・天魔等にひとしかるべからず。見百佛世界等の論、かならず凡夫の見解に準ずべからず。將謂胡鬚赤、更有赤鬚胡の道理なり。入涅槃は、阿羅漢の入拳頭裏の行業なり。このゆえに、涅槃妙心なり、無廻避處なり。入鼻孔の阿羅漢を、眞阿羅漢とす、いまだ鼻孔に出入せざるは、阿羅漢にあらず。

The spiritual powers, wisdom, meditation, preaching, guidance, and radiance of the arhat cannot be compared with those of the other paths or the Deva Māra.<sup>10</sup> Discussions of seeing a hundred buddha worlds, and the like, we should never judge on the basis of the views of common people.<sup>11</sup> It is the principle of “I always thought the foreigner’s beard is red, but now here’s a red-bearded foreigner.”<sup>12</sup> Their entering nirvāṇa is the action of the arhat’s entering the fist; therefore, it is the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa, the place of no escape. The arhat who enters the nostrils is considered the true arhat; those who do not yet go in and out of the nostrils are not arhats.

9 mind, “the manifestation of the full function” (shin ya zenki gen 心也全機現): Variation on the words of a verse, quoted elsewhere by Dōgen, by Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤 (1063–1135) (Yuanwu Foguo chanshi yulu 圓悟佛果禪師語錄, T.1997.47:793c6). When Daowu Yuanzhi 道吾圓智 was asked at a funeral whether what was in the coffin was alive or dead, he said, “Alive, I don’t say; dead, I don’t say.” On this, Yuanwu commented,

Alive, the manifestation of the full function;

Dead, the manifestation of the full function.

For the conversation and Yuanwu’s entire verse, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Manifestation of the full function.”

10 other paths or the Deva Māra (gedō tenma 外道・天魔): I.e., followers of non-Buddhist religions and the deity Māra, who seeks to obstruct Buddhism.

11 Discussions of seeing a hundred buddha worlds (ken hyaku butsu sekai tō no ron 見百佛世界等の論): I.e., discussions of the strength of the “deva eye” (tengen 天眼) of the arhat relative to that of the common person, the pratyeka-buddha, and the bodhisatta or buddha. It is sometimes said that the arhat’s eye can see one lesser chiliocosm (shōsen sekai 小千世界) — i.e., one thousand world systems. The source of Dōgen’s “hundred buddha worlds” is unclear.

12 “I always thought the foreigner’s beard is red, but now here’s a red-bearded foreigner” (shō i koshu shaku, kō u shakushu ko 將爲胡鬚赤、更有赤鬚胡): “The red-bearded foreigner” and “the foreigner’s beard is red” are used as we might say “six of one, a half-dozen of the other” — i.e., a distinction without a difference. From the saying of Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 (749–814) to his disciple Huangbo Xiyun 黃檗希運 (dates unknown) (see, e.g., Zongmen tongyao ji 宗門統要集, ZTS.1:58c4-5; shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:178, case 102).

古云、我等今日、眞阿羅漢、以佛道聲、令一切聞。

*Of old, it was said,
Today, we are Truly arhats,
Who cause all to hear
The voice of the way of the buddhas.*<sup>13</sup>

[36:6]

いま令一切聞といふ宗旨は、令一切諸法佛聲なり。あにただ諸佛及弟子の
みを舉拈せんや。有識有知、有皮有肉、有骨有髓のやから、みなきかしむ
るを、令一切といふ。有識有知といふは、國土草木・牆壁瓦礫なり。揺落
盛衰、生死去來、みな聞著なり。以佛道聲、令一切聞の由來は、渾界を耳
根と參學するのみにあらず。

The essential point here of “cause all to hear” is to cause all dharmas [to be] the voice of the buddha.<sup>14</sup> How could it be taking up only the buddhas and their disciples? Beings with consciousness and with knowing, with skin and with flesh, with bones and with marrow — letting all of them hear is called “cause all.” “With consciousness and with knowing” means the land and the plants, “fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles.” Shaking and falling, flourishing and declining, being born and dying, coming and going — all are “hearing.” The origin of “causing all to hear the voice of the way of the buddha” is not only studying that the entire world is the ear faculty.<sup>15</sup>

13 Of old, it was said (ko un 古云): Variation on a verse in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:18c20-21), which in the original is punning on the word śrāvaka (“hearer”) as one who causes others to hear the dharma:

我等今者、眞是聲聞、以佛道聲、令一切聞。

Now, we are truly śrāvakas,
Who cause all to hear the voice of the way of the buddhas.

14 cause all dharmas [to be] the voice of the buddha (ryō issai shohō busshō 令一切諸法佛聲): Both the grammar and the context would lead one to expect here the predicate “cause to hear” (mon 聞), but apparently this reading is not attested.

15 not only studying that the entire world is the ear faculty (konkai o nikon to sangaku suru nomi ni arazu 渾界を耳根と參學するのみにあらず): Probably meaning that “causing all to hear” is not limited to the ordinary sense of hearing with the ear.

釋迦牟尼佛言、若我弟子、自謂阿羅漢・辟支佛者、不聞不知諸佛如來但教化菩薩事、此非佛弟子、非阿羅漢、非辟支佛。

Buddha Śākyamuni said,<sup>16</sup>

If my disciples themselves say that they are arhats or pratyeka-buddhas and have not heard and do not know the fact that the buddhas, the tathāgatas, only teach bodhisattvas, these are not disciples of the buddha, are not arhats, are not pratyeka-buddhas.

佛言の但教化菩薩事は、我及十方佛、乃能知是事なり、唯佛與佛、乃能究盡、諸法實相なり、阿耨多羅三藐三菩提なり。しかあれば、菩薩・諸佛の自謂も、自謂阿羅漢・辟支佛者に一齊なるべし。そのゆえはいかん。自謂、すなはち聞知諸佛如來、但教化菩薩事なり。

The Buddha's words, "only teaching bodhisattvas," is "I and the buddhas of the ten directions can know these matters," is "only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dhar-mas," is anuttara-samyak-sambodhi.<sup>17</sup> Therefore, the bodhisattvas and buddhas "themselves saying" must be equivalent to "themselves saying that they are arhats or pratyeka-buddhas." Why? "Themselves saying" is precisely hearing and knowing "the fact that the buddhas, the tathāgatas, only teach bodhisattvas."

16 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:7b27-29).

17 "I and the buddhas of the ten directions can know these matters" (ga gyū jippō butsu, nai nō chi ze ji 我及十方佛、乃能知是事); "only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas" (yui butsu yo butsu, nai nō gūjin, shohō jissō 唯佛與佛、乃能究盡、諸法實相): Two quotations from the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:5c24 and 5c11-13, respectively); for the latter, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas."

18 Of old (ko un 古云): Quoting the Mohe zhiguan 摩訶止觀 (T.1911.46:33c24-6):

阿羅漢辟支佛佛如醍醐。大論云、聲聞經中稱阿羅漢名爲佛地。故三人同是醍醐。

The arhat, pratyeka-buddha, and buddha are like ghee [the best of the five forms of milk]. The Dazhidu lun says that, in the śrāvaka scriptures, what is called the arhat is termed "the buddha stage." Therefore, all three are equally ghee.

いまの道著、これ佛道の證明なり。論師、胸臆の説のみにあらず、佛道の通軌あり。阿羅漢を稱して佛地とする道理をも參學すべし、佛地を稱して阿羅漢とする道理をも參學すべきなり。阿羅漢果のほかに、一塵・一法の剩法あらず、いはんや三藐三菩提あらんや。阿耨多羅三藐三菩提のほかに、さらに一塵・一法の剩法あらず、いはんや四向四果あらんや。阿羅漢擔來諸法の正當恁麼時、この諸法、まことに八兩にあらず、半斤にあらず。不是心、不是佛、不是物なり、佛眼也覩不見なり。八萬劫の前後を論ずべからず、抉出眼睛の力量を參學すべし。剩法は渾法剩なり。

The saying here is attested on the way of the buddhas; it is not merely an explanation from the bosom of a treatise master; it has the universal standard of the way of the buddhas.<sup>19</sup> We should study the principle that the arhat is called “the buddha stage”; we should study the principle that the buddha stage is called “the arhat.” Apart from the fruit of the arhat, there is not a single dust mote or a single dharma of remaining dharmas, much less samyak-sambodhi; apart from anuttara-samyak-sambodhi, there is not a single dust mote or a single dharma of remaining dharmas, much less the four approaches and four fruits.<sup>20</sup> At the very moment that the arhat comes bearing the dharmas, truly these dharmas are not eight tael, are not half a catty.<sup>21</sup> “They are not the mind, not the buddha, not a thing”; even the buddha eye cannot see them.<sup>22</sup> Without discussing whether it is before or after eighty thousand kalpas, we should study the 19 attested on the way of the buddhas (butsudō no shōmyō 佛道の證明): Or “attested in the word of the Buddha.” The “treatise master” (ronshi 論師) in the next clause may be a reference to Tiantai Zhiyi 天台智顗 (538-597), author of the Mohe zhiguan 摩訶止觀, from which Dōgen has just quoted.

20 the four approaches and four fruits (shikō shika 四向四果): I.e., the four stages of the śrāvaka path to nirvāṇa, divided into the “access” (kō 向; S. pratipanna) and “fruit” (ka 果; S. phala).

21 the arhat comes bearing the dharmas (arakan tanrai shohō 阿羅漢擔來諸法): Probably a reference to the Buddhist spiritual life undertaken by the arhat, perhaps reflecting a saying of Dōgen’s teacher Rujing 如淨 (1162-1227); see Supplementary Notes s.v. “Bearing the load coming, bearing the load going, bearing the load coming again.”

eight tael (hachi ryō 八兩); half a catty (han kin 半斤): A tael (ryō 兩) is a Chinese unit of weight, varying throughout history, equal to 1/16th catty (kin 斤); hence the expression “eight tael, half a catty” (hachi ryō han kin 八兩半斤) is akin to English “six of one, half dozen of the other.” Here, perhaps, meaning that the weight of the dharmas borne by the arhat is beyond measure.

22 “They are not the mind, not the buddha, not a thing” (fu ze shin, fu ze butsu, fu ze motsu 不是心、不是佛、不是物): Words attributed to Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-835) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:257c14).

even the buddha eye cannot see them (butsugen ya chōfiken 佛眼也覩不見): A fixed expression found in Zen literature, referring to the all-seeing eye of a buddha (butsugen 佛眼; S. buddha-cakṣus), or a buddha’s omniscience.

power that gouges out the eye.<sup>23</sup> Remaining dharmas are the whole of the dharma remaining.<sup>24</sup>

Buddha Śākyamuni said,<sup>25</sup>

Bhikṣus and bhikṣunīs who say they have already attained arhatship, that this is their last body, that they are in final nirvāṇa, and do not aspire further to seek anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi — this bunch, you should realize, are all arrogant people. Why is this? Because it is never the case that a bhikṣu who has really attained arhatship does not believe in this dharma.

いはゆる阿耨多羅三藐三菩提を能信するを、阿羅漢と證す。必信此法は、附屬此法なり、單傳此法なり、修證此法なり。實得阿羅漢は、是最後身、究竟涅槃にあらず、阿耨多羅三藐三菩提を志求するがゆえに。志求阿耨多羅三藐三菩提は、弄眼睛なり、壁面打坐なり、面壁開眼なり。徧界なりといへども、神出鬼没なり。互時なりといへども、互換投機なり。かくのごとくなるを、志求阿耨多羅三藐三菩提といふ。このゆえに、志求阿羅漢なり、志求阿羅漢は、粥足飯足なり。

This verifies that one who believes in “anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi” is an arhat. To believe fully in “this dharma” is to bequeath “this dharma,” is uniquely to transmit “this dharma,” is to practice and verify “this dharma.” Those who “have really attained arhatship” are not “in their last body,” in “final nirvāṇa”; for they “aspire to seek anuttara-samyak-

23 before or after eighty thousand kalpas (hachiman kō no zengo 八萬劫の前後): From the tradition that one who has attained the first fruit (yoru ka 預流果; S. śrotāpanna) of the śrāvaka path can attain buddhahood (or produce the aspiration to attain buddhahood) only after 84,000 kalpas.

the power that gouges out the eye (kesshutsu ganzei no rikiryō 抉出眼睛の力量): The expression “gouge out the eye” (kesshutsu ganzei 抉出眼睛, or ganzei kesshutsu 眼睛抉出), is used, like the more common “poke out the eye” (tosshutsu ganzei 突出眼睛), for getting the point of Zen. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye” and “Gouge out Bodhidharma’s eye.”

24 Remaining dharmas are the whole of the dharma remaining (jōhō wa konpō jō nari 剩法は渾法剩なり): I.e., to suggest that there are dharmas beyond what the arhat practices is to say the entire dharma is beyond.

25 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): A continuation of the Lotus Sūtra passage quoted in section 7 (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:7b29-c5).

sambodhi.” “Aspiring to seek anuttara-samyak-sambodhi” is playing with the eye, is sitting facing the wall, is facing the wall and opening the eye.<sup>26</sup> Though it may be in the realms everywhere, “the spirit appears, and the demon vanishes”; though it may span time, “they have an exchange and a meeting of minds.”<sup>27</sup> To be like this is called “aspiring to seek anuttara-samyak-sambodhi.” Therefore, it is aspiring to seek arhatship; aspiring to seek arhatship is the gruel is enough, the rice is enough.<sup>28</sup>

Chan Master Yuanwu of Jiashan said,<sup>29</sup>

The ancients, after getting the point, headed to the deep mountains, to a thatched hut or a cave; for ten or twenty years, they ate rice boiled in 26 sitting facing the wall (hekimen taza 壁面打坐): Presumably, “sitting in meditation facing a wall,” on the model of Bodhidharma’s nine years “facing a wall” (menpeki 面壁) at the Shaolin Monastery.

27 “the spirit appears, and the demon vanishes” (shin shutsu ki botsu 神出鬼沒); “they have an exchange and a meeting of minds” (gokan tōki 互換投機): The former phrase is an idiomatic expression for “one thing after another,” but here the two phrases allude to a verse by Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤 commenting on the words of two Chan masters (Yuanwu Foguo chanshi yulu 圓悟佛果禪師語錄, T.1997.47:802b29):

將謂猴白、更有猴黑。互換投機、神出鬼沒。

Here we thought it was the Marquise White,

But then there’s also the Marquis Black.

They have an exchange and a meeting of minds;

The spirit appears, and the demon vanishes.

Dōgen discusses the verse in “Shōbōgenzō gyōbutsu iigi” 正法眼藏行佛威儀). The use of Yuanwu’s phrases here seems to suggest that, while the aspiration to attain buddhahood may reach “throughout the world” and “across time,” it is expressed in the actual interactions of Zen practitioners.

28 the gruel is enough, the rice is enough (shuku soku han soku 粥足飯足): A common Zen expression meaning that the monk’s meals are sufficient and suggesting, by metaphorical extension, that the monk is spiritually replete.

a pot with a broken leg, totally forgetting the human world and forever abandoning the dusty realm. Nowadays, we dare not hope for such a thing. Just concealing our name, covering our tracks, and guarding our original lot, we make ourselves into this old patch-robe with bones like awls, conforming ourselves to what we have realized, and using it according to our capacities. We erase our old karma and melt away past practices; and, if we have any remaining energy, we reach out to others and establish a bond of prajñā, polishing our own heels and becoming proficient.<sup>30</sup> This is just like digging up one or a half in the wilds.<sup>31</sup> Together, we know existence; together, we shed birth and death; turning the benefits over to the future, we repay the deep kindness of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>32</sup> And, inevitably, as the fruit ripens under frost and dew, we exert ourselves and appear in the world; accommodating ourselves to circumstances, we present [the teachings] to humans and devas, without ever harboring thoughts of seeking anything. Still less do we generate the karma of avīci hell by relying on the aristocratic powers, becoming worldly teachers, cheating the common folk and deceiving the sages, coveting profit and scheming for fame. Even if we lack disciples, if we just pass our lives like this and avoid karmic consequences, we are a true arhat beyond the dust.

しかあればすなはち、而今の本色の衲僧、これ眞出塵阿羅漢なり。阿羅漢をしらんことは、かくのごとくしるべし。西天の論師等のことばを、妄計することなかれ。東地の圓悟禪師は、正傳の嫡嗣ある佛祖なり。

Thus, the present patch-robed monk of true colors is “a true arhat beyond the dust.” If we wish to know about arhats, we should know they are like this. Do not misjudge them from the words of the treatise masters of Sindh in the West; Chan Master Yuanwu of the Land of the East is a buddha and ancestor with legitimate inheritance of the correct transmission.<sup>33</sup>

* * * * *

30 We erase our old karma and melt away past practices (shōken kugō, yūzū shukujū 消遣舊業、融通宿習): In the context, taking yūzū 融通 here as something like “cause to flow” (rather than the more common “run together” or “integrate”).

polishing our own heels and becoming proficient (renma jiko kyakkon junjūku 練磨自己脚跟純熟): The reference is to spiritual training together with others.

31 This is just like digging up one or a half in the wilds (shō nyo kōsōri hatteki ikko hanko 正如荒草裏撥剔一箇半箇): I.e., finding a few authentic fellow practitioners.

32 turning the benefits over to the future (ten'eki mirai 轉益未來): I.e., to people in the future.

33 the words of the treatise masters of Sindh in the West (Saiten no ronji tō no kotoba 西天の論師等のことば): I.e., the technical definitions of the arhat in the treatises of Indian authors.

Chan Master Dazhi of Mount Baizhang in Hongzhou said,<sup>34</sup>

The eyes, ears, nose, and tongue are each without the stain of craving for any of the dharmas, whether being or non-being — this is called “receiving and keeping the four-line gāthā”; it is also called “the fourth fruit.”<sup>35</sup>

而今の自他にかかはれざる眼耳鼻舌身意、その頭正尾正、はかりきはむべからず。このゆえに、渾身おのづから不貪染なり、渾一切有無諸法に不貪染なり。受持四句偈おのづからの渾渾を、不貪染といふ、これをまた四果となづく。四果は阿羅漢なり。

The eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind of the present, regardless of self or other — their rightness from head to tail is beyond measure. Therefore, the whole body, of itself, is “without the stain of craving,” is “without the stain of craving for the whole of “any of the dharmas, whether being or non-being.” The natural wholeness of “receiving and keeping the four-line gāthā” is called “without the stain of craving”; it is also called the “the fourth fruit.” “The fourth fruit” is the arhat.

[36:17] {1:408}

しかあれば、而今現成の眼・耳・鼻・舌・身・意、すなはち阿羅漢なり。構本宗末、おのづから透脱なるべし。始到牢關なるは、受持四句偈なり、すなはち四果なり。透頂透底全體現成、さらに糸毫の遺漏あらざるなり。畢竟して道取せん、作麼生道。いはゆる、

Thus, the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind appearing in the present are the arhat. From beginning to end, they are naturally liberated.<sup>36</sup>

34 Chan Master Dazhi of Mount Baizhang in Hongzhou (Kōshū Hyakujōzan Daichi zenji 洪州百丈山大智禪師): i.e., Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海; from a passage appearing in the Tiansheng guangdong lu 天聖廣燈錄, ZZ.135:681a17, also quoted in “Shōbōgenzō jinzū” 正法眼藏神通.

35 “four-line gāthā” (shiku ge 四句偈): Here, probably referring to the verse on impermanence found throughout the Buddhist canon:

諸行無常、是生滅法、生滅滅已、寂滅爲樂。

Compounded things are impermanent:

This is the dharma of arising and ceasing.

When arising and ceasing have ceased,

Their calm cessation is bliss.

36 From beginning to end (kōhon shūmatsu 構本宗末): A loose, tentative translation of an obscure phrase, not occurring elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, perhaps meaning something like, “arrange the roots and assemble the branches”; taken here as referring to the list of the six sense organs.

羅漢在凡、諸法教他罣礙。羅漢在聖、諸法教他解脫。須知、羅漢與諸法同參也。既證阿羅漢、被阿羅漢碍也。所以空王已前老拳頭也。

When the arhat is a commoner, the dharmas obstruct him; when the arhat is a sage, the dharmas liberate him. We should realize that the arhat and the dharmas study together. Since they have verified arhatship, they are obstructed by arhatship. Therefore, they are an old fist from before King of Emptiness.<sup>39</sup>

37 “First reaching the solid barrier” (shi tō rōkan 始到牢關): From the saying, “once the final line is said, you first reach the solid barrier” (matsugo ikku shitō rōkan 末後一句始到牢關); here, perhaps, playing on the first clause, “once the final line is said.”

38 Let us say (iwayuru いわゆる): What follows in the next section is Dōgen’s conclusion, composed in Chinese.

39 an old fist from before King of Emptiness (Kūō izen rō kentō 空王已前老拳頭): Perhaps meaning something like, “a master before all differentiation.” “Old fist” (rō kentō 老拳頭) is regularly used in Zen texts, and in Dōgen’s writings, as a synecdoche for the Zen master. The expression “before King of Emptiness” (Kūō izen 空王已前) seems to be Dōgen’s own creation; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before King of Emptiness,” “Fist.”

INTRODUCTION

According to its colophon, this chapter dates from 1244, at a time when its author was staying at Kippōji, in Echizen (modern Fukui prefecture); it is said to have been “re-presented to the assembly” at that time, indicating that there must have been an earlier version that has not survived. The text occurs as number 37 in the seventy-five-chapter compilation of the Shōbōgenzō and number 66 in the Honzan edition; it is not included in the sixty-chapter compilation.

A note in the colophon associates the essay with the Chinese classic Spring and Autumn Annals (Chunqiu 春秋) that is evoked by its title. Despite this evocation, Dōgen’s text is not about ancient Chinese history and only indirectly about the seasons. Rather, it focuses on a single saying by the Tang-dynasty master Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869), founder of the Caodong tradition of Chan that Dōgen introduced to Japan. When a monk asked Dongshan how one might avoid cold and heat, the Master replied, “Why not go where there is no cold and heat?” When asked where such a place might be, Dongshan said, “When it’s cold, the cold kills you; when it’s hot, the heat kills you.”

Dōgen holds up this conversation as a case necessarily studied by the buddhas and ancestors; and, indeed, Dongshan’s words were well known in Chan circles and attracted many comments — including those in the famous Blue Cliff Records (Biyan lu 碧巖錄). In our text, Dōgen collects eight of these comments, to which he offers his own reactions, sometimes fairly extended, sometimes no more than a single line.

Most noteworthy in these reactions are Dōgen’s dismissals of those comments that interpret the conversation through the rubric of the “five ranks (wu wei 五位) of Dongshan” — an heuristic device employing the terms “upright” (zheng 正) and “inclined” (pian 偏) to discuss the relationships between the absolute and relative truths. Such passages in our text are often held up by later readers as evidence that Dōgen’s own version of Sōtō Zen had no use for this venerable schema widely associated with Dongshan and his lineage in both China and medieval Japan. While several of Dōgen's reactions seem at least grudgingly appreciative of previous comments, in his conclusion, he appears to reject them all, calling them "pitiful," ignorant of the cold and heat of the buddhas and ancestors, and evidence of the decline of the way of the ancestral masters.

Spring and Autumn

洞山悟本大師、因僧問、寒暑到來、如何迴避。師云、何不向無寒暑處去。僧云、如何是無寒暑處。師云、寒時寒殺闍梨、熱時熱殺闍梨。

Great Master Wuben of Dongshan was once asked by a monk, “When cold and heat come, how can we escape them?”<sup>1</sup>

The Master said, “Why not go where there is no cold and heat?”

The monk said, “Where is there no cold and heat?”

The Master said, “When it’s cold, the cold kills the Ācārya; when it’s hot, the heat kills the Ācārya.”<sup>2</sup>

This episode has been discussed by many in the past and should be worked on by many in the present. The buddhas and ancestors have invariably studied it, and those who have studied it are buddhas and ancestors. Many of the buddhas and ancestors of past and present, in Sindh in the West and the Land of the East, have taken this episode as the face of their realization.<sup>3</sup> The realization of the face of this episode is the kōan of the buddhas and ancestors.

1 Great Master Wuben of Dongshan (Tōzan Gohon daishi 洞山悟本大師): I.e., Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869), founder of the Caodong 曹洞 tradition of Chan. The conversation here appears in the Dongshan yulu 洞山語錄 (T.1986A.47:509c8-10, and 1986B.47:523c8-10), as well as several other Chan collections; it is treated as case 43 in the Biyan lu 碧巖錄 (T.2003.48:180a16ff). Dōgen cites a slightly variant version in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:244, case 225).

2 “the cold kills the Ācārya” (kan satsu jari 寒殺闍梨): The phrase could be taken to mean, “when it’s cold, you freeze to death.” Dongshan uses ācārya (“teacher,” “preceptor”) in reference to his interlocutor.

3 buddhas and ancestors of past and present, in Sindh in the West and the Land of the East (Saiten Tōchi kokon no busso 西天東地古今の佛祖): It is not clear in what

Given this, we should become familiar with the monk's question, "When cold and heat come, how can we escape them?" This is to say that we should try considering in detail the very time when cold comes, the very time when heat comes. In this cold and heat, the entire cold and the entire heat are both cold and heat itself. Because they are cold and heat itself, when they come, they come from the head of cold and heat itself, they appear from the eye of cold and heat itself. On this head is where there is no cold and heat; in this eye is where there is no cold and heat. The Eminent Ancestor's saying, "When it's cold, the cold kills the Ācārya; when it's hot, the heat kills the Ācārya," is the circumstances at the very time they come. Though "when it's cold" may say that "the cold kills," "when it's hot" is not necessarily a saying that "the heat kills." "Cold" is cold through and through; "heat" is heat through and through. Though we had learned myriad koṭis of means of "escape," this would still be exchanging head for tail.<sup>4</sup> "Cold" is the living eye of the ancestors; "heat" is the warm skin and flesh of the former masters.<sup>5</sup> sense we are to take the curious claim here that Dongshan's dialogue was studied in India.

the face of their realization (genjō no menmoku 現成の面目): Or "their realized face." Here, and in the following sentence, Dōgen plays with the expression "realized kōan" (genjō kōan 現成公案); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Realized kōan."

4 exchanging head for tail (i tō kan bi 以頭換尾): A Chinese colloquialism meaning "to get something backwards."

5 the warm skin and flesh of the former masters (senshi no dan piniku 先師の煖皮肉): The translation takes senshi 先師 ("former master"), like the parallel soshū 祖宗 ("ancestors"), as a general reference to earlier Chan masters; it could also refer specifically here to Dongshan or (though less likely) to Dōgen's own former master, Rujing.

Chan Master Jingyin Kumu succeeded Reverend Furong; he is known as Reverend Facheng.<sup>6</sup> He said,

Some among the assembly who discuss this say, “The question of this monk has fallen into the inclined; Dongshan’s answer returns to the rank of the upright.”<sup>7</sup> The monk, knowing the music in his words, enters the upright; Dongshan then goes off from the inclined.”<sup>8</sup> [Those who] discuss it like this not only blaspheme the prior sages, they humiliate themselves. Have they not seen the saying?<sup>9</sup>

*Producing opinions from what we hear,
The mind turns scarlet and blue.
While beautiful to behold,

Generally speaking, eminent gentlemen who tread [the way], if you wish to exhaust this matter, you should first recognize the treasury of the true dharma eye of the Ancient Ancestor.<sup>10</sup> The other teachings of the buddhas and ancestors are but the sounds of a heated bowl.<sup>11</sup>

6 Chan Master Jingyin Kumu (Jōin Koboku zenji 淨因枯木禪師): I.e., Kumu Facheng 枯木法成 (1071-1128), disciple of the important Caotong master Furong Daokai 芙蓉道楷 (1043-1118). The name Jingyin derives from the Jingyin Chan Cloister 淨因禪院, in Dongjing 東京 (in modern Henan), where Daokai was abbot. The quotation is from a passage appearing in the Jitai pudeng lu 嘉泰普燈錄, ZZ.137:186-187.

7 the inclined (hen 偏); the upright (shō 正): Terms of art in Zen associated especially with the schema of the “five ranks” (go i 五位) attributed to Dongshan; “the inclined” (or “the partial”) is used in reference to the relative truth, or the phenomenal world; “the upright,” to the absolute truth. The two glyphs connote respectively both (a) “slanted” and “vertical,” and (b) “side” and “center” (or “main”). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Upright or inclined.”

8 knowing the music (chi in 知音): A Chinese idiom indicating “to know a person’s mind” (from hearing him or her playing music); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Know the music.”

9 Have they not seen the saying? (fu ken dō 不見道): The following saying is attributed to Jiashan Shanhui 夾山善會 (805-881); see, e.g., the (slightly variant) version at Congrong lu 從容錄, T.2004.48:260b10-11.

10 Ancient Ancestor (jōso 上祖): I.e., Dongshan.

11 The other teachings of the buddhas and ancestors (ki yo busso gongyō 其餘佛祖言教): The phrase could also be read, “the teachings of other buddhas and ancestors.”

Nevertheless, I dare to ask you people, after all, where is there no cold or heat? Do you understand?

The jeweled tower is nest to the kingfisher;
The golden pavilion locks in the duck.

師は、これ洞山の遠孫なり、祖席の英豪なり。しかあるに、箇箇おほくあやまりて、偏正の窟宅にして高祖洞山大師を禮拜せんとするを烟誠するなり。佛法もし偏正の局量より相傳せば、いかでか今日にいたらん。あるひは野猫兒、あるひは田庫奴、いまだ洞山の堂奥を參究せず。かつて佛法の道閫を行李せざるともがら、あやまりて洞山に偏正等の五位ありて人を接す、といふ。これは胡説亂説なり、見聞すべからず。ただまさに上祖の正法眼藏あることを參究すべし。

The Master is a distant descendant of Dongshan, a hero of the ancestral seat. As such, he clearly admonishes the many mistaken ones who would pay obeisance to the Eminent Ancestor, Great Master Dongshan, within the cave of the inclined and upright. If the buddha dharma were transmitted based on the confines of the inclined and upright, how could it have reached the present? Wild kittens, field hands, those who have not yet investigated the interior of the hall of Dongshan, who have never practiced at the threshold of the way of the buddha dharma, mistakenly say that Dongshan had the five ranks of the inclined and upright with which he dealt with people. This is barbaric talk, wild talk; we should not see or hear it. We should just investigate the fact that the Ancient Ancestor did indeed have the treasury of the true dharma eye.

the sounds of a heated bowl (netsu wan myōshō 熱碗鳴聲): An idiomatic expression for talk meaningless as the sounds of a bowl expanding.

12 Chan Master Hongzhi of Mount Tiantong (Tendōzan Wanshi zenji 天童山宏智禪師): I.e., Hongzhi Zhengjue 宏智正覺 (1091-1157).

Reverend Danxia (Tanka oshō 丹霞和尚): I.e., Danxia Zixia 丹霞子淳 (1064-1117). The saying occurs in a lecture (shangtang 上堂) on Dongshan's case, above, in the Hongzhi chanshi yulu 宏智禪師語錄, T.2001.48:46c25-29.

If we discuss this matter, it is like two people playing chess: if you don't respond to my move, I will trick you. Only when we experience it like this, do we understand Dongshan's intention. Tiantong cannot resist giving a comment:

Seen from inside, it's neither hot nor cold.

In my way, you could stoop down and pick up a giant tortoise.

It is not that there is no chess game, but for the moment, how about the two people? If we say that two people are playing chess, we should be eight moves ahead; if we are eight moves ahead, it is not a chess game.<sup>13</sup> How about it? If we are to say something, we should say this: a chess game is one person encountering an opponent. Though we say this, we should fix in our minds and concentrate on, we should circulate in our bodies and investigate, these words of Hongzhi: “if you don't respond to my move.” “If you don't respond to my move” means “you cannot be I.” Do not pass over “I will trick you.” There is mud within mud, and those who step in it wash their feet or wash their chin strap; there is a pearl within a pearl, and when it shines, it illumines the other and illumines the self.<sup>14</sup>

13 eight moves ahead (hachi moku 八目): From the saying, “the onlooker [in a chess game] is eight moves ahead” (okame hachimoku 傍目八目).

14 wash their feet or wash their chin strap (ashi o arai, mata ei o arau あしをあらひ、また纓をあらふ): I.e., take it as dirty or take it as clean. From the song of the “Fisherman” (Yufu 漁父) in the Chinese classic Chuci 楚辞 (KR.4a0001.007-2a):

滄浪之水清兮、可以濯吾纓。滄浪之水濁兮、可以濯吾足。

When the waters of the Canglang are clear,

I'll wash my chin strap in them;

When the waters of the Canglang are dirty,

I'll wash my feet in them.

This saying, “the bowl rolls in the pearl,” is bright before and extinct after, is hardly heard in past or present.<sup>19</sup> Up till now, it seems it was said simply that the pearl rolling in the bowl is without rest.<sup>20</sup> Here, the antelope has hung up its horns in the sky; here, the wood circles the hunting dogs.<sup>21</sup>

16 The bowl rolls in the pearl; the pearl rolls in the bowl (ban sō shu, shu sō ban 盤走珠、珠走盤): The pearl rolling in a bowl is a fairly common image in Zen for the freedom of the spiritual life.

17 The upright within the inclined; the inclined within the upright (hen chū shō, shō chū hen 偏中正、正中偏): The first two of the “five ranks” (see above, Note 7).

18 The antelope hangs up its horns (reiyō kai kaku 羚羊掛角): Said to derive from the habit of the antelope to sleep with its horns hanging from branches.

19 bright before and extinct after, is hardly heard in past or present (kō zen zetsu go, kokon kan mon 光前絶後、古今罕聞): I.e., is virtually unique; an expression occurring in several Chan texts (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:275b14).

20 it seems it was said simply that the pearl rolling in the bowl is without rest (tada iwaku, ban ni hashiru tama no, jūjaku naki ga gotoshi ただいはく、盤にはしる珠の、住著なきがごとし): Or “it was said simply that it seems the pearl rolling in the bowl is without rest.”

21 the antelope has hung up its horns in the sky (reiyō, ima wa kū ni kakaku seri 羚羊、いまは空に掛角せり): The graph for “sky” (sora, kū 空), being that used for the term “emptiness” (S. śūnyatā), the passage could be read, “the antelope has hung up its horns in emptiness.”

Xuedou was a dharma descendant in the third generation after Yunmen. He can be called a skin bag who has studied his fill. In his saying, “extending a hand is the same as a cliff of a myriad fathoms,” though we may say he is displaying a rare standard, this is not necessarily the case. This episode of the monk asking and Shan showing is not necessarily “extending a hand or not extending a hand,” is not “appearing in the 22 Chan Master Mingjue, of Zisheng Monastery at Mount Xuedou in the Prefecture of Qingyuan (Keigen fu Setchōzan Shishō ji Myōkaku zenji 慶元府雪竇山資聖寺明覺禪師): i.e., Xuedou Zhongxian 雪竇重顯 (980-1052), disciple of Zhimen Guangzuo 智門光祚 (dates unknown), in the lineage of Yunmen 雲門; served as abbot of the Zishengsi 資聖寺 (in modern Zhejiang province). Xuedou's poem occurs as his comment on Dongshan's dialogue in the Biyan lu 碧巖錄 (T.2003.48:180b26-29).

23 a cliff of a myriad fathoms (banjin gai 萬仞崖): “Fathom” translates ren 仞, an ancient measure said to equal the arm span of an adult male.

24 vaidūrya (ruri 瑠璃): Also written ruri 琉璃; a Sanskrit term used for beryl, crystal, and other minerals; one of the seven precious substances.

The resolute hound of Han (ninshun Kan ro 忍俊韓獹): “Resolute” is a tentative translation. The colloquial Chinese sense of the term renjun 忍俊 as “smiling” seems unlikely here, but opinion is divided on the alternatives: some would take it as two adjectives meaning “cruel and great”; others (following the Shōbōgenzō monge 正法眼藏聞解, SCZ.7:604) read it as a verb-object compound, “to hide one's excellence.” The “hound of Han” refers to the black hunting dogs raised in the ancient state of Han 韓 during the Warring States period. Since the beast was famous for catching rabbits, it may be that here it stupidly seeks the rabbit in the moon reflected on the jewelled palace.

world or not appearing in the world.”<sup>25</sup> How much less does it employ talk of the inclined and the upright. Without using the eye of the inclined and the upright, it seems that he has no place to lay his hand on this episode; that he seems to have no nose grip with which to inquire about it is because he has not gone to the borderlands of the Eminent Ancestor, he has not seen the great house of the buddha dharma.<sup>26</sup> He should take up his sandals again and inquire about it.<sup>27</sup> Stop saying that the buddha dharma of the Eminent Ancestor is the five ranks of the upright and the inclined.

Reverend Shouzhou, Chan Master Changling of Tianning in Dongjing, said,<sup>28</sup>

*In the inclined there is the upright; in the upright, the inclined.
Drifting along among humans for a thousand centuries;
How often have I longed to return yet could never return.
Before the gate, as of old, the weeds are thick.*

25 “extending a hand or not extending a hand” (suishu fu suishu 垂手・不垂手); “appearing in the world or not appearing in the world” (shusse fu shusse 出世・不出世): To “extend (literally, ‘let down’) a hand” is to offer a teaching; to “appear in the world” is to undertake a career as a teacher. Dōgen is doubtless alluding here to the comment immediately following Xuedou’s poem in the Biyan lu 碧巖錄 (T.2003.48:180c1):

曹洞下有出世不出世、有垂手不垂手。

In Caodong, there is appearing in the world and not appearing in the world; there is extending a hand and not extending a hand.

26 the great house of the buddha dharma (buppō no taikē 佛法の大家): The term taikē, translated here as “great house,” can also refer to a “great one” (i.e., an accomplished person, or master). This passage could also be parsed somewhat differently:

The fact that, without using the eye of “the inclined and the upright,” he seems to have no place to lay his hand on this incident, seems to have no nose grip with which to inquire about it, is because he has not reached the borderlands of the Eminent Ancestor and has not seen the great house of the buddha dharma.

27 take up his sandals again (sara ni sōai o nenrai shite さらに草鞋を拈來して): I.e., should continue his pilgrimage.

28 Reverend Shouzhou, Chan Master Changling of Tianning in Dongjing (Tonkin Tennei Chōrei zenji Shutaku oshō 東京天寧長靈禪師守卓和尚): I.e., Changling Shouzhou 長靈守卓 (1065-1123), abbot of Tianning Monastery 天寧寺 in Dongjing 東京 (in modern Henan). Shouzhou’s poem occurs in the Zhangling Shouzhou chanshi yulu 長靈守卓禪師語錄, ZZ.120:325b17-18.

29 what is “being in the inclined” (ikanaran ka kore hen chū u いかならんかこれ偏中有): The translation obscures Dōgen's play with the first phrase of Shouzhou's poem, “in the inclined there is the upright” (hen chū u shō 偏中有正), in which he here takes the predicate “there is” as if it were the nominal “being.”

notch the boat to find the sword (kokushū kyūken 刻舟求劍): From the story, found in the Lüshi Chunqiu 呂氏春秋 (“Master Lü's Spring and Autumn Annals”; KR.3j0009.015-22a-b), of the stupid man of Chu 楚 who dropped his sword from a boat and marked the spot by notching the side of the boat.

Tangled Vines

Kattō

INTRODUCTION

According to its colophon, this work was composed at Kōshōji in the seventh month of 1243. Since during this month Dōgen is thought to have left Kōshōji for his new residence in Echizen, “Kattō” may be the last chapter of the Shōbōgenzō he composed in the capital area. Number 38 in both the seventy-five and sixty-chapter compilations, the work occurs as number 46 in the Honzan edition.

The term kattō 葛藤 (“arrowroot and wisteria”) has the colloquial sense, often encountered in Zen texts, of an “entanglement,” a “complexity,” “complication,” or “difficulty.” Zen texts typically treat the term as referring to (especially intellectual and linguistic) obstacles to be cut through, but Dōgen prefers to see it here as the “entanglement,” or “intertwining,” of master and disciple.

Thus, while seemingly inspired by a saying about vines by the author’s master, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, the bulk of this short text is taken up with the question of transmission of the dharma from master to disciple — especially the famous account of the dharma transmission by the first Chinese ancestor, Bodhidharma, to his disciple Huike 慧可. Here, Dōgen cites the famous story of Bodhidharma’s four disciples, from which derives the Zen expression “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow” (hi niku kotsu zui 皮肉骨髓), and argues against the common notion that these four terms signify a hierarchy of understanding. Finally, the essay closes with a note dismissing the legend that Bodhidharma rose from his grave and returned to India.

釋迦牟尼佛の正法眼藏無上菩提を證傳せること、靈山會には迦葉大士のみなり。嫡嫡正證二十八世、菩提達磨尊者にいたる。尊者みづから震旦國に祖儀して、正法眼藏無上菩提を大祖正宗普覺大師に附屬し、二祖とせり。

In the community on Vulture Peak, only Kāśyapa the Great One verified and transmitted the unsurpassed bodhi of the treasury of the true dharma eye of Buddha Śākyamuni.<sup>1</sup> In successor after successor through twenty-eight generations of correct verification, it reached Venerable Bodhidharma. The Venerable, conducting the ancestral rites in Cīnasthāna, bequeathed the unsurpassed bodhi of the treasury of the true dharma eye to the Great Ancestor, Great Master Zhengzong Pujue, and made him the Second Ancestor.<sup>2</sup>

---

1 Kāśyapa the Great One (Kashō daishi 迦葉大士): i.e., Mahākāśyapa, to whom the Buddha is said to have transmitted the shōbōgenzō 正法眼藏 on Vulture Peak. The name “Mahākāśyapa” means “Great Kāśyapa”; the title daishi 大士 used here often translates Sanskrit mahāsattva (“great being”).

verified and transmitted (shōden 證傳): i.e., personally experienced and passed down; a compound predicate appearing in the Shōbōgenzō only here and in section 2, immediately below.

2 conducting the ancestral rites (sogi shite 祖儀して): Sogi is usually interpreted as the deportment, or conduct, of the [buddhas and] ancestors.

Cīnasthāna (Shintan 震旦): Dōgen here and below uses the transliteration of a Sanskrit term for China, “Land of the Qin.”

Great Ancestor, Great Master Zhengzong Pujue (Taiso Shōshū Fukaku daishi 大祖正宗普覺大師): i.e., the Second Ancestor, Huīkē 慧可 (487–593).

The Twenty-eighth Ancestor, being the first to conduct the ancestral rites in the Land of Cīnasthāna, is called the First Ancestor; the Twenty-ninth Ancestor is called the Second Ancestor. This is the custom in the Land of the East.<sup>3</sup> The First Ancestor, under Venerable Prajñātāra, directly verified and transmitted the instructions of the buddha and the bones of the way; he verified the root source with the root source; he made it the root of the branches and leaves.<sup>4</sup>

おほよそ諸聖ともに、葛藤の根源を截斷する參學に趣向すといへども、葛藤をもて葛藤をきるを截斷といふ、と參學せず、葛藤をもて葛藤をまつふ、としらず、いかにいはんや葛藤をもて葛藤に嗣續することをしらんや。嗣法これ葛藤としれるまれなり、きけるものなし。道著せる、いまだあらず。證著せる、おほからんや。

Although the sages all devise study that severs the root source of tangled vines, they do not study that “severing” means to cut tangled vines with tangled vines; they do not know that tangled vines are entwined by tangled vines.<sup>5</sup> How much less, then, could they know that tangled vines are succeeded by tangled vines. Few understand that inheritance of the dharma is tangled vines. No one has heard this. No one has ever uttered it. How could there be many who have verified it?

3 Land of the East (Tōdo 東土): I.e., China.

4 Venerable Prajñātāra (Hannyatara sonja 般若多羅尊者): I.e., Bodhidharma's master, the Twenty-seventh Ancestor according to the traditional legend of the Zen ancestors in India.

instructions of the buddha and the bones of the way (bukkun dōkotsu 佛訓道骨): “Bones of the way” (dōkotsu 道骨) is typically interpreted as the “bones and marrow” (i.e., essential message) of the buddhas and ancestors; hence, the fundamental truth of Zen.

root source (kongen 根源); root of the branches and leaves (shiyō no moto 枝葉の本): Dōgen is here playing with the vegetative imagery suggested by his title theme. The “branches and leaves” could be taken either metaphysically, as the multiplicity appearing in the world from the hidden root, or historically, as the proliferation of Chan lineages after Bodhidharma.

5 sages (shoshō 諸聖): The term can refer to holy men in general, to the sages of Chinese religions, or to advanced Buddhist adepts (S. ārya); here, probably a (somewhat ironic?) reference to the Chinese Chan monks.

tangled vines (kattō 葛藤): Our title theme, a loose translation of two terms denoting climbing plants — the former, sometimes translated “arrowroot,” is regularly used for the kudzu vine; the latter is most often taken as “wisteria.” As a compound term, kattō has the common colloquial sense, often encountered in Zen texts, of an “entanglement,” a “complexity,” “complication,” or “difficulty”; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Tangled vines.”

My former master, the Old Buddha, said, “The bottle gourd vine entwines the bottle gourd.”<sup>6</sup>

This presentation to the assembly is something never seen or heard in any other quarter past or present.<sup>7</sup> My former master alone first expressed it. The bottle gourd vine entwining the bottle gourd vine is the buddhas and ancestors investigating the buddhas and ancestors, the buddhas and ancestors verifying and according with the buddhas and ancestors. It is, for example, to transmit the mind by the mind.<sup>8</sup>

The Twenty-eighth Ancestor addressed his followers, saying, “The time is coming. Why don’t you say what you’ve attained?”<sup>9</sup>

6 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): Honorific reference to Dōgen’s Chinese teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227).

7 presentation to the assembly (jishu 示衆): A standard expression for a Zen master’s lecture to his followers.

8 transmit the mind by the mind (i shin den shin 以心傳心): A famous Zen expression for the transmission of awakening from master to disciple.

9 Twenty-eighth Ancestor (dainijūhachi so 第二十八祖): Opening the famous account of the occasion on which Bodhidharma is supposed to have designated the monk Huike 慧可 as his successor. (See shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:230, case 201.) It is from this story that Dōgen gets the expression “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow” (hi niku kotsu zui 皮肉骨髓) occurring frequently throughout his writings to indicate the essential understanding of Buddhism handed down in the ancestral tradition. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

At that time, the follower Daofu said, “My present view is, without being attached to words and letters or being detached from words and letters, one still engages in the function of the way.”<sup>10</sup>

The Ancestor said, “You’ve gotten my skin.”

The Nun Zongchi said, “My present understanding is, it’s like Ānanda’s seeing the land of Buddha Akṣobhya: seen once, it isn’t seen again.”<sup>11</sup>

The Ancestor said, “You’ve gotten my flesh.”

Daoyu said, “The four elements are originally empty; the five aggregates are nonexistent. My view is that there’s not a single dharma to attain.”<sup>12</sup>

The Ancestor said, “You’ve gotten my bones.”

Finally, Huike, after making three bows, stood in his place.

The Ancestor said, “You’ve gotten my marrow.”

Consequently, [Bodhidharma] made him the Second Ancestor, transmitting the dharma and transmitting the robe.

10 Daofu (Dōfuku 道副): Sometimes identified with Sengfu 僧副 (464-524), said to have been a disciple of Bodhidharma.

11 Nun Zongchi (Ni Sōji 尼総持): Otherwise unknown.

Ānanda (Keiki 慶喜): Said to have been a relative of Gautama, he became a follower of the Buddha and, following the latter’s nirvāṇa, a disciple of Mahākāśyapa.

land of Buddha Akṣobhya (Ashuku butsu koku 阿閼佛國): A realm usually located in the eastern direction from Śākyamuni’s Sahā world. The reference to Ānanda’s seeing this land only once likely derives from the story that Buddha Śākyamuni, before Ānanda and a multitude of followers, used his paranormal powers briefly to reveal Akṣobhya and his retinue and then, withdrawing his powers, caused the vision to vanish. (See the Mahā-prajñā-pāramitā-sūtra (Mohe bore boluomi jing 摩訶般若波羅蜜經, T.223.8:363b29-c9).)

12 Daoyu (Dōiku 道育): Otherwise unknown.

We should study this. The saying of the First Ancestor, “You’ve gotten my skin, flesh, bones, and marrow,” is the saying of an ancestor.<sup>13</sup> His four followers have all gotten it, have all heard it. Both what they have heard and what they have gotten is the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow that springs forth from body and mind, the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow that sloughs off body and mind.<sup>14</sup>

The Ancestral Master is not to be perceived by one move of our knowledge and understanding; he is not ten realizations of subject and object or this and that.<sup>15</sup> Still, those without the correct transmission think that, since the understandings of the four disciples are familiar and remote, so the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow spoken of by the Ancestor differ from shallow to deep.<sup>16</sup> They think skin and flesh are more remote than bones and marrow and say that the Second Ancestor received the seal, “you’ve gotten my marrow,” because his understanding was superior.<sup>17</sup> Those who talk like this have never studied the buddhas and ancestors, and lack the correct transmission of the words of the Ancestor.<sup>18</sup>

13 saying of an ancestor (sodō 祖道): Perhaps intended in the sense, “saying worthy of an ancestor.”

14 springs forth from body and mind (chōshutsu shinjin 跳出身心); sloughs off body and mind (datsuraku shinjin 脱落身心): The two expressions are virtually synonymous. The verb in the former phrase, which might also be rendered, “jumps out of body and mind,” is often found in Zen texts in the sense, “to escape,” as a fish escapes a net. The latter phrase, while not found in the Chinese literature, is quite common in Dōgen’s writing, often attributed to his teacher, Rujing 如淨; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Body and mind sloughed off.”

15 one move (ichi jakusu 一著子); ten realizations (jū genjō 十現成): “One move” is used in reference to moving a piece in a board game; in Zen texts, often a rhetorical “move” in a dialogue. The phrase “he is not ten appearances of” might be rendered “he is not fully manifest in”; the translation here seeks to preserve the parallel construction and play with numbers in the original.

16 familiar and remote (shinso 親疏): A term often used in reference to familial lines; here, probably meaning “closer to and farther from” Bodhidharma’s understanding.

17 seal (in 印): I.e., the “seal of approval” from Bodhidharma. The term is regularly used to indicate the bestowing of transmission on a disciple.

18 words of the Ancestor (sodō 祖道): A term one might well be tempted to read “the way of the ancestors,” but its sense here seems clear from its use in the following section.

We should understand that, in the words of the Ancestor, “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow,” there is no shallow or deep. Even if there are superior and inferior in the understandings, the words of the Ancestor are just “gotten my.”<sup>19</sup> The essential point is that both the instruction “gotten my marrow” and the instruction “gotten my bones” are neither adequate nor inadequate in engaging the person for the sake of the person, in taking up the grass and falling into the grass.<sup>20</sup> They are, for example, like holding up a flower; they are like transmitting the robe.<sup>21</sup> What is said to the four is equal from the beginning. While the words of the Ancestor are equal, the four understandings are not necessarily equal. While the four understandings may be in pieces, the words of the Ancestor are just the words of the Ancestor.<sup>22</sup>

Generally speaking, sayings and understandings do not necessarily mandate each other.<sup>23</sup> For example, in the Ancestral Master's instruction

19 “gotten my” (toku go 得吾): Or “got me.” I.e., Bodhidharma says in each case, “you’ve gotten my . . .” Here, as he will do below, Dōgen is playing with the terms in Bodhidharma’s responses. The Chinese makes no distinction among the nominative (“I”), possessive (“my”), and accusative (“me”) cases, and the translation struggles to interpret Dōgen’s play with the pronouns here and below.

20 engaging the person for the sake of the person (i nin setsu nin 爲人接人); taking up the grass and falling into the grass (nen sō raku sō 拈草落草): Two phrases likely referring to the teaching activities of the masters — in this case, of Bodhidharma. The latter phrase seems unusual and may well represent Dōgen’s play with Chan stories that “take up grass” as a topic and the Chan expression “to fall into the grass” (rakusō 落草) used in reference to discourse that descends to the level of the student’s understanding.

21 holding up a flower (nenge 拈華); transmitting the robe (denne 傳衣): References to accounts of the transmission of the dharma; the former, to the famous story of the founding of the ancestral line on Vulture Peak, when Śākyamuni held up a flower, and Mahākāśyapa smiled (see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Hold up a flower”); the latter, likely to accounts of the handing down of the robe of Bodhidharma through the generations to the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能 (though Dōgen may also have had in mind here Śākyamuni’s bestowal of his robe to the next buddha, Maitreya).

22 in pieces (henpen 片片): I.e., are separate; the expression could also be interpreted as “are partial.” Compare Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bare mind in pieces.”

23 mandate each other (sōi 相委): An unusual expression, not occurring elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; likely meaning here, “be in accord with each other.”

to his four followers, he says, “you’ve gotten my ‘skin me.’”<sup>24</sup> If there were a hundred thousand followers after the Second Ancestor, there would be a hundred thousand explanations; they would be inexhaustible. Since there are only four followers, we have just the four sayings, “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow”; but many sayings remain that were not said and could be said.

しるべし、たとひ二祖に爲道せんにも、汝得吾皮、と道取すべきなり。たとひ汝得吾皮なりとも、二祖として正法眼藏を傳付すべきなり。得皮・得髓の殊劣によれるにあらず。

We should realize that, even in speaking to the Second Ancestor, he could say, “You’ve gotten my skin.” Even though [he were to say], “You’ve gotten my skin,” he would have transmitted the treasury of the true dharma eye [to Huike] as the Second Ancestor. “Gotten my skin” and “gotten my marrow” do not depend on superiority or inferiority.

また、道副・道育・総持等に爲道せんにも、汝得吾髓と道取すべきなり。吾皮なりとも、傳法すべきなり。祖師の身心、皮・肉・骨・髓ともに祖師なり。髓はしたしく、皮はうときにあらず。

Again, in speaking to Daofu, Daoyu, and Zongchi, he could have said, “You’ve gotten my marrow.” Although [he said,] “my skin,” he could transmit the dharma [to them]. For the body and mind of the Ancestral Master, “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow” are all the Ancestral Master. It is not that “marrow” is intimate and “skin” is remote.

Now, for one who would be equipped with the eye of study, getting the seal, “You’ve gotten my skin,” is the investigation of getting the Ancestral Master. There is an Ancestral Master whose body throughout is skin; there is an Ancestral Master whose body throughout is flesh; there is an Ancestral Master whose body throughout is bones; there is an Ancestral Master whose body throughout is marrow.<sup>25</sup> There is an Ancestral Master whose body throughout is mind; there is an Ancestral Master whose body throughout is body; there is an Ancestral Master whose mind throughout is mind. There is an Ancestral Master who is the Ancestral Master throughout; there is an Ancestral Master whose body throughout is “gotten my” and “you,” and so forth.<sup>26</sup>

When these Ancestral Masters appear together and speak to their hundred thousand followers, they explain, as here, “You’ve gotten my skin.”<sup>27</sup> While their explanations are of “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow,” onlookers will vainly make their living on explanations of “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”<sup>28</sup> If there had been six or seven followers in the Ancestral Master’s community, he could have said, “You’ve gotten my mind”; he could have said, “You’ve gotten my body.” He could have said, “You’ve gotten my buddha”; he could have said, “You’ve gotten my eyes”; he could have said, “You’ve gotten my verification.” There are occasions when the “you” here is the Ancestor and occasions when it is Huike. We should investigate in detail the principle of “gotten.”

25 body throughout is skin (tsūshin hi 通身皮): Here and in the following parallel sentences, Dōgen is likely inspired by the saying of Daowu Yuanzhi 道吾圓智 (769-835), discussed in the “Shōbōgenzō Kannon” 正法眼藏觀音, that Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara’s “body throughout is hands and eyes” (tsūshin ze shugen 通身是手眼). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “His body throughout is hands and eyes.”

26 Ancestral Master throughout (tsū soshi 通祖師): The English here loses the syntactical parallel with the preceding expressions (which, if it were maintained, could only produce the unlikely “Ancestor throughout is Master”).

“gotten my” and “you” (toku go nyo 得吾汝): A tentative translation, assuming that Dōgen is again here playing with the words of Bodhidharma’s saying (see Note 19, above). For other possible interpretations of this phrase, see Note 30, below.

27 these Ancestral Masters (korera no soshi これらの祖師): Dōgen here treats the various ways of thinking about Bodhidharma as a plurality of Bodhidharmas.

hundred thousand followers (hyakusen no monjin 百千の門人): I.e., the hundred thousand disciples of Bodhidharma that Dōgen imagines in section 9, above.

28 make their living (kakkei su 活計す): A common expression referring to one’s “livelihood”; used in Zen texts more broadly for one’s “way of life,” “pursuits,” etc. The point of this rather odd sentence would seem to be that, while Bodhidharma uses the terms “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow,” those who do not understand his use occupy themselves with taking the terms as references simply to “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

We should realize that there should be, “you’ve gotten me”; there should be, “I’ve gotten you”; there should be, “gotten me and you”; there should be, “gotten you and me.”<sup>29</sup> In our examination of the body and mind of the Ancestral Master, if we say that inner and outer are not one, or that the whole body cannot be his body throughout, then we are not in the land where the buddhas and ancestors appear.<sup>30</sup> To have got the “skin” is to have got the bones, flesh, and marrow; to have got the “bones, flesh, and marrow” is to have got the skin, flesh, and face. How could this be clearly comprehended only as the true body of all the worlds in the ten directions?<sup>31</sup> It is in addition the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.

Therefore, it is “gotten my robe”; it is “you’ve gotten the dharma.”<sup>32</sup> Hence, the sayings are instances of springing forth; master and disciple study together.<sup>33</sup> The hearings are instances of springing forth; master and disciple study together. Master and disciple studying together is the 29 “gotten me and you” (toku go nyo 得吾汝); “gotten you and me” (toku nyo go 得汝吾): Tentative translations. In these and the two preceding phrases, Dōgen is playing with the syntax of the same three terms. It is not clear how he wants us to parse these phrases; they could well be read, “the you that got me,” “the I that got you”; it is also at least possible to read them as “got my you,” “got your me” (or “got you as me,” “got me as you”).

30 the whole body cannot be his body throughout (konjin [or konshin] wa tsūshin naru bekarazu 渾身は通身なるべからず): The “whole body” is often used, as probably here, in a metaphysical sense, to refer to the dharma body of a buddha; see following note.

31 true body of all the worlds in the ten directions (jīn jippō kai no shinjitsu tai 盡十方界の眞實體): Presumably a reference to the dharma body of the buddha that pervades the universe. The rhetorical question here and the surprising sentence that follows it seem to suggest a common theme in Dōgen’s writing — that we should not understand the true nature of the awakened master simply in abstract metaphysical terms but must see it in his concrete features, words, and deeds.

32 “gotten my robe” (toku go e 得吾衣); “you’ve gotten the dharma” (nyo toku hō 汝得法): From the tradition that Bodhidharma’s robe was handed down to the early Chinese ancestors as a token of the fact that they had inherited his dharma.

33 master and disciple study together (shishi dōsan su 師資同參す): It is not clear exactly how this clause, here and in the succeeding sentence, is related to the clause that precedes it. Most likely, they are in apposition: i.e., “master and disciple studying together” are “instances of springing forth”; or, to put it more prosaically, in the interchange between teacher and student, we transcend ourselves.

tangled vines of the buddhas and ancestors. The tangled vines of the buddhas and ancestors are the vital artery of the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow. Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes is tangled vines; breaking into a smile is the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.<sup>34</sup>

さらに参究すべし、葛藤種子すなはち脱體の力量あるによりて、葛藤を纏繞する枝・葉・華・果ありて、回互・不回互なるがゆえに、佛祖現成し、公案現成するなり。

We should investigate further. Since the seeds of tangled vines have the power of the body stripped, there are branches, leaves, flowers, and fruit that entwine tangled vines; and, because they are “interacting and not interacting,” the buddhas and ancestors are realized, the kōan is realized.<sup>35</sup>

34 Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes (nenge shunmoku 拈華瞬目); breaking into a smile (hagan mishō 破顔微笑): References to the story of Śākyamuni’s transmission to Mahākāśyapa on Vulture Peak. See Note 21, above and Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes” and “Break into a smile.”

35 the body stripped (dattai 脱體): A term that can also mean “to escape the body,” in Chan texts, it often carries the sense, “to reveal all”; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Body stripped.”

buddhas and ancestors are realized, the kōan is realized (busso genjō shi, kōan genjō suru 佛祖現成し、公案現成する): “The kōan is realized” here translates one of Dōgen’s favorite expressions, kōan genjō 公案現成 (also genjō kōan 現成公案), a phrase that, in ordinary Chinese, might simply be rendered, “the case is settled” (i.e., a legal judgment has been rendered), but in the Shōbōgenzō and subsequent Sōtō usage, takes on more metaphysical tones as something like “reality manifest.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Realized kōan.”

36 Great Master Zhenji of Zhaozhou (Jōshū Shinsai daishi 趙州眞際大師). The posthumous title of Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 (778-897), famed disciple of Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願. His saying here appears in the Zhaozhou lu 趙州錄, Guzunxiu yulu 古尊宿語錄 (ZZ.118:311a14-18).

Thereupon, a monk asked, “Well, what about the Second Ancestor’s getting the marrow?”

The Master said, “Don’t slander the Second Ancestor.”

The Master again said, “Dharma had a saying that those on the outside get his skin, those on the inside get his bones. So, tell me, what do those still further inside get?”

A monk asked, “What’s the principle of getting the marrow?”

The Master said, “Just recognize the skin. Where this old monk is, he doesn’t set up even the marrow.”<sup>37</sup>

The monk asked, “What is the marrow?”

The Master said, “If you’re like this, you don’t touch even the skin.”<sup>38</sup>

しかあればしるべし、皮也摸未著のときは、髓也摸未著なり。皮を摸得するは、髓もうるなり。與麼即皮也摸未著の道理を功夫すべし。如何是得髓底道理と問取するに、但識取皮、老僧這裏、髓也不立、と道取現成せり。識取皮のところ、髓也不立なるを、眞箇の得髓底の道理とせり。かるがゆえに、二祖得髓、又作麼生の問取現成せり。迦葉傳與阿難の時節を當觀するに、阿難藏身於迦葉なり、迦葉藏身於阿難なり。しかあれども、傳與裏の相見時節には、換面目皮肉骨髓の行李をまぬかれざるなり。これによりて、且道、達磨傳與什麼人、としめすなり。達磨すでに傳與するときは達磨なり、二祖すでに得髓するには達磨なり。この道理の參究によりて、佛法なほ今日にいたるまで佛法なり。もしかのごとくならざらんは、佛法の今日にいたるにあらず。この道理、しづかに功夫參究して、自道取すべし、教他道取すべし。在外者得皮、在裏者得骨、且道、更在裏者得什麼。いまいふ外、いまいふ裏、その宗趣、もとも端的なるべし。外を論ずるとき、皮・肉・骨・髓ともに外あり、裏を論ずるとき、皮・肉・骨・髓ともに裏あり。

Given this, we should realize that, when we “don’t touch even the skin,” we don’t touch even the marrow. To be able to touch the skin is to get the marrow. We should work away at the meaning of “if you’re “Kāśyapa transmitted to Ānanda” (Kashō den yo Anan 迦葉傳與阿難): A reference to the tradition that Mahākāśyapa transmitted the dharma he had received from the Buddha to his disciple Ānanda.

37 “Where this old monk is” (rōsō shari 老僧者裏): Zhaozhou uses a Chinese idiom for “here” (zheli 者裏) that contains the same term (li 裏) he has used for “inside”; hence, there may be the suggestion that, by being “here,” he is, as it were, all the way “inside.”

“doesn’t set up even the marrow” (zui ya furyū 髓也不立): I.e., “doesn’t set up” as a topic, “doesn’t discuss.”

38 “you don’t touch even the skin” (hi ya mo mijaku 皮也摸未著): Literally, “you grope for but don’t touch even the skin” (a sense Dōgen will play on below). The Chinese expression mo michao 摸未著 (or mo buchao 摸不著) has the idiomatic sense “can’t understand,” or, as we might say, “don’t get it.”

like this, you don't touch even the skin." When asked, "What's the principle of getting the marrow?" he expressed the words, "Just recognize the skin. Where this old monk is, he doesn't set up even the marrow." With "recognize the skin," he made "doesn't set up even the marrow" the true "principle of getting the marrow." For this reason, the question appeared, "What about the Second Ancestor getting the marrow?"

When we should observe the time when "Kāśyapa transmitted to Ānanda," Ānanda hides his body in Kāśyapa, Kāśyapa hides his body in Ānanda.<sup>39</sup> Nevertheless, on the occasion when they encounter each other within the transmission, they do not escape the observances of skin, flesh, bones, and marrow that change the face.<sup>40</sup> Hence, [Zhaozhou] indicates, "So tell me, to whom did Dharma transmit?" Dharma was already Dharma when he "transmitted to"; the Second Ancestor was already Dharma when he "got the marrow."<sup>41</sup> Because of the investigation of this principle, the buddha dharma remains the buddha dharma down to today. If it were not like this, the buddha dharma would not have reached us today. Quietly working on and investigating the meaning of this, we should express it ourselves; we should have others express it. "Those on 39 When we should observe the time (jisetsu o tōkan suru ni 時節を當觀するに: The surprising deontic predicate tōkan suru 當觀す ("should observe") can probably be taken here simply as "observe" (or, perhaps, "observe now"); but the phrase "should observe the time" is likely intended to invoke a saying, based on the Nirvāṇa Sūtra (Da banniepan jing 大般涅槃經, T.374.12:532a18-19), that Dōgen discusses at length in his "Shōbōgenzō busshō" 正法眼藏佛性 (DZZ.1:17):

The Buddha said, "If you wish to know the meaning of 'buddha nature,' you should observe the conditions of the time."

For details of the widespread use of this saying in Zen texts and its possible origins in the Nirvāṇa Sūtra (Da banniepan jing 大般涅槃經), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "If you wish to know the meaning of 'buddha nature,' you should observe the conditions of the time."

40 they do not escape the observances of skin, flesh, bones, and marrow that change the face (kan menmoku hi niku kotsu zui no anri o manukarezaru nari 換面目皮肉骨髓の行李をまぬかれざるなり): "Observances" (anri 行李) typically refers to the religious practices of the monastic. "To change (or exchange) one's face" (kan menmoku 換面目) is a multivalent idiom; here, perhaps, referring to awakening; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Turning the head and changing the face." This rather obscure passage might be paraphrased as follows:

Although in one sense, at the moment of dharma transmission, Kāśyapa and Ānanda are identified ("hide their bodies" in each other), their individual awakening must still be expressed in the actual give and take of the transmission (exemplified by the "skin, flesh, bones, and marrow" of the Bodhidharma story).

41 "transmitted to" (den yo 傳與): An odd locution; Dōgen here retains the preposition of Zhaozhou's question, "to whom did Dharma transmit?"

the outside get his skin, those on the inside get his bones. So, tell me, what do those still further inside get?" The implication of this "outside" and "inside" should be quite obvious. When we discuss "outside," skin, flesh, bones, and marrow are all "outside"; when we discuss "inside," skin, flesh, bones, and marrow are all "inside."

しかあればすなはち、いま四員の達磨、ともに百千萬の皮・肉・骨・髓の向上を、條條に參究せり。髓よりも向上あるべからず、とおもふことなかれ、さらに三・五枚の向上あるなり。

This being the case, the four Dharmas here have all investigated what is beyond skin, flesh, bones, and marrow, in each of a hundred, thousand, myriad instances.<sup>42</sup> Do not think that there must be nothing beyond the "marrow"; there are still three or five beyond it.<sup>43</sup>

趙州古佛のいまの示衆、これ佛道なり。自餘の臨濟・徳山・大滙・雲門等のおよぶべからざるところ、いまだ夢見せざるところなり、いはんや道取あらんや。近來の杜撰の長老等、ありとだにもしらざるところなり。かれらに爲説せば、驚怖すべし。

This address to the assembly by the Old Buddha Zhaozhou is the saying of a buddha. It is something not reached by others like Linji, Deshan, Dawei, or Yunmen, something they have never dreamt of, much less spoken about.<sup>44</sup> It is something the recent illiterate elders do not even know exists, and they would be startled if we told them.<sup>45</sup>

42 four Dharmas here (ima shiin no Daruma いま四員の達磨): Dōgen seems here to be treating Bodhidharma's four followers as four versions of Bodhidharma.

43 there are still three or five beyond it (sara ni san go mai no kōjō aru nari さらに三・五枚の向上あるなり): Or, perhaps, "there are still three or five sheets of beyond." Here as elsewhere, Dōgen treats the adjective kōjō ("above," "beyond") as a noun, which he counts here with the classifier for thin, flat objects.

44 Linji, Deshan, Dawei, or Yunmen (Rinzai Tokusan Daii Unmon 臨濟・徳山・大滙・雲門): I.e., the famous Tang-period Chan monks Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866), Deshan Xuanjian 徳山宣鑑 (780-865), Weishan Lingyou 滙山靈祐 (771-853), and Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃 (864-949).

something they have never dreamt of (imada muken sezaruru tokoro いまだ夢見せざるところ): Japanese version of the Chinese insult wei meng xian zai 未夢見在 ("never seen even in one's dreams"); common in Dōgen's writing.

45 illiterate (zusan [or zuzan] 杜撰): Free translation of what is, more literally, "Du composition," used in pejorative reference to a literary work that, like those of Du, is ignorant of classical precedents. (Du is most often identified as the Song-dynasty poet Du Mo 杜默; for alternative theories, see M.14477.122.) Dōgen regularly uses the term to refer to those in the Chan tradition who are ignorant of the tradition.

The prior buddha and ancestor praises him with the praise, "old buddha"; the latter buddha and ancestor praises him with the praise, "old buddha."<sup>49</sup> We know that he is an old buddha beyond past or present.

46 Chan Master Xuedou Mingjue (Setchō Myōkaku zenji 雪竇明覺禪師): I.e., Xuedou Zhongtōu 雪竇重頭 (980-1052). His words here are probably not in fact a quotation; Dōgen's source is likely a comment on a story about Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 and Muzhou Daozong 睦州道蹤 (Venerable Chen 陳尊宿, dates unknown), in which Xuedou makes passing reference to them as "two old buddhas" (niyuan gufo 二員古佛). (Mingjue chanshi yulu 明覺禪師語錄, T.1996.47:672a5-6.). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Old buddha."

47 the word of an old buddha is proof of the buddha dharma (kobutsu no dō wa buppō no shōken nari 古佛の道は佛法の證驗なり): I.e., Zhaozhou's words reliably express the Buddhist teachings. The sentence could also be interpreted to mean, "the word, 'old buddha,' is evidence that [what Zhaozhou says] is the buddha dharma."

it is something once said by the self (jiko no sō dōshu nari 自己の曾道取なり): A tentative translation of a sentence the exact sense of which is uncertain. It could be interpreted to mean, "the self has said," or "Zhaozhou himself has said," or perhaps "the buddha dharma itself has said."

48 Great Master Zhenjue of Xuefeng (Seppō Shinkaku daishi 雪峰眞覺大師): I.e., Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908). His saying is found in several sources; see, e.g., Yuanwu Foguo chanshi yulu 圓悟佛果禪師語錄, T.1997.47:799a19; shinji Shōbōgenzo 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:268, case 283.

49 The prior buddha and ancestor (saki no busso さきの佛祖); the latter buddha and ancestor (nochi no busso のちの佛祖): I.e., both Xuedou 雪竇 and Xuefeng 雪峰 praise Zhaozhou.

しかあれば、皮・肉・骨・髓の葛藤する道理は、古佛の示衆する汝得吾の標準なり。この標格を功夫參究すべきなり。

Thus, the principle that skin, flesh, bones, and marrow are entangling is the standard of “you’ve gotten my,” presented to the assembly by the old buddha.<sup>50</sup> We should work at and investigate this norm.

Also, we study that saying the First Ancestor returned to the west is wrong.<sup>51</sup> What Song Yun saw is not necessarily the case. How could Song Yun see the conduct of the Ancestral Master? To know that, after the Ancestral Master returned to tranquility, he was interred at Mount Xiong’er is correct study.<sup>52</sup>

50 Thus (shika areba しかあれば): The first sentence here might be somewhat more simply put, “Thus, the teaching of the old buddha [Zhaozhou] about “you’ve gotten my” gives us a standard for understanding what is meant by [Dōgen’s saying that] “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow” are entangling.

51 the First Ancestor returned to the west (Shoso wa saiki su 初祖は西歸す): At issue here is the famous legend that, after Bodhidharma’s death (sometimes said to be from poisoning by the monk Bodhiruci), the Chinese emissary Song Yun 宋雲 encountered an Indian monk in the Pamirs with one sandal. A subsequent investigation of Bodhidharma’s grave revealed an empty tomb and one sandal. Recorded, e.g., at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:220b5-10.

52 Mount Xiong’er (Yūjisan 熊耳山): A mountain in Shanzhou 陝州 (present-day Henan). For this version of Bodhidharma’s final resting place, see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:220b4.

INTRODUCTION

This chapter is dated in late spring of 1241 at Kōshōji. It occurs as number 39 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō, as number 16 in the ninety-five-chapter Honzan edition, and as number 8 in fascicle 2 of the twenty-eight-text collection; it is not found in the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō. The chapter is also extant in a 1243 holograph, typically referred to as the Satomi 里見 manuscript (after the family that once owned it), now in possession of Komazawa University. In addition, what is likely an earlier draft is preserved in a manuscript belonging to the Kōjakuji 香積寺, in Hiroshima Prefecture; this version is translated here below as Variant Text 2.

The title theme of the essay is the practice, common in the Zen tradition, of certifying a disciple's inheritance of the dharma from his master with a document of succession. In the first part of his essay, Dōgen is concerned with the issue of inheritance itself, especially with the Zen claim that its lineage of ancestors is directly descended from the seven buddhas of the past. He then turns to the subject of the documents of succession, including accounts of his own encounter with them in China and criticisms of those in China who covet and collect such documents. In addition to giving us information on Dōgen's experiences in China, these accounts provide rare detail on the nature and use of inheritance certificates in the Southern Song.

The essay concludes with the striking and controversial claim that, of the disciples of the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能, only Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思, from whom Dōgen's own Sōtō lineage descends, received the direct transmission of the buddha dharma — a transmission witnessed in an inheritance certificate written in the mingled blood of Huineng and Qingyuan.

The Inheritance Certificate

夫、佛佛必ず佛佛に嗣法し、祖祖かならず祖祖に嗣法する、これ證契なり、これ單傳なり。このゆえに、無上菩提なり。佛にあらざれば、佛を印證するにあたはず、佛の印證をえざれば、佛となることなし。佛にあらざるよりは、たれかこれを最尊なりとし、無上なりと印することあらん。

Buddha after buddha invariably inherits the dharma from buddha after buddha; ancestor after ancestor invariably inherits the dharma from ancestor after ancestor. This is the verification and accord; this is the unique transmission. Therefore, it is unsurpassed bodhi. If one is not a buddha, one cannot certify a buddha; if one does not receive the certification of a buddha, there is no becoming a buddha. Insofar as one is not a buddha, who would deem this as most honored or certify it as unsurpassed?<sup>1</sup>

佛の印證をうるとき、無師獨悟するなり、無自獨悟するなり。このゆえに、佛佛證嗣し、祖祖證契すといふなり。この道理の宗旨は、佛佛にあらざれば、あきらむべきにあらず、いはんや十地・等覺の所量ならんや、いかにいはんや經師・論師等の測度するところならんや。たとひ爲説すとも、かれらきくべからず。

When one receives the certification of a buddha, one awakens alone without a teacher, one awakens alone without a self.<sup>2</sup> Therefore, it is said that buddha after buddha verifies and inherits, ancestor after ances-

1 who would deem this as most honored or certify it as unsurpassed (tare ka kore o saison nari to shi, mujō nari to in suru koto aran たれかこれを最尊なりとし、無上なりと印することあらん): “Most honored” (saison 最尊) is an epithet of a buddha; “unsurpassed” (mujō 無上) here is likely a reference to the “unsurpassed bodhi” (mujō bodai 無上菩提) of a buddha.

2 one awakens alone without a teacher (mushi dokugo 無師獨悟); one awakens alone without a self (muji dokugo 無自獨悟): The former phrase occurs fairly often in Buddhist texts, especially in reference to the pratyeka-buddha; the latter phrase represents Dōgen’s play on the equally common phrase “awakens by oneself without a teacher” (mushi jigo 無師自悟). Since of course Dōgen emphasizes the importance of the teacher, both expressions are typically understood here as suggesting that, in the experience of tor verifies and accords. The essential point of this principle cannot be clarified if one is not [one among] buddha after buddha; how could it be something measured by those on the ten stages or virtual awakening, not to mention something calculated by the sūtra masters or treatise masters, and the like.<sup>3</sup> Even if we were to explain it to them, they could not hear it.

佛佛相嗣するがゆえに、佛道はただ佛佛の究盡にして、佛佛にあらざる時節あらず。たとへば、石は石に相嗣し、玉は玉に相嗣することあり、菊も相嗣し、松も印證するに、みな前菊後菊如如なり、前松後松如如なるがごとし。かくのごとくなるを明らめざるともがらは、佛佛正傳の道にあふといへども、いかにある道得ならん、とあやしむにもおよばず、佛佛相嗣の祖祖證契す、といふ領覽あることなし。あはれむべし、佛種族に相似なりといへども、佛子にあらざることを、子佛にあらざることを。

Because buddha after buddha inherits it, the way of the buddhas is just the exhaustive investigation of buddha after buddha, with no time that is not buddha after buddha. It is like, for example, stones inheriting from stones, and jewels inheriting from jewels; like, when chrysanthemums inherit from each other, and pines certify each other, the prior chrysanthemums and later chrysanthemums are all such, and the prior pines and later pines are all such.<sup>4</sup> Those who have not clarified that it is like this, though they may encounter the words “direct transmission of buddha after buddha,” do not even wonder what this is saying and have no comprehension that the inheritance of buddha after buddha verifies and accords with ancestor after ancestor.<sup>5</sup> How pitiful that, though they may resemble the family of the buddha, they are not the children of the buddha, are not child buddhas.<sup>6</sup> awakening, there is neither self nor other. A similar use occurs in the opening sentence of “Shōbōgenzō hosshō” 正法眼藏法性.

3 the ten stages or virtual awakening (jitchi tōgaku 十地・等覺): The final phases of the bodhisattva path according to the fifty-two stage system, the latter being the penultimate state, just preceding, but virtually equivalent to, buddhahood.

4 the prior chrysanthemums and later chrysanthemums are all such, and the prior pines and later pines are all such (mina zen kiku go kiku nyonyo nari, zen shō go shō nyonyo naru みな前菊後菊如如なり、前松後松如如なる): Dōgen here plays with the expression nyonyo 如如, a term used for the metaphysical notion of “suchness,” or “thusness” (S. tathatā), used here in the sense that each is “like” the other.

6 children of the buddha (busshi 佛子); child buddhas (shibutsu 子佛): The former expression is a common reference to followers or descendants of the buddhas; the latter is Dōgen’s novel reversal of the compound term.

六祖、曹溪に、あるとき衆にしめしていはく、七佛より慧能にいたるまで四十佛あり、慧能より七佛にいたるに四十祖あり。

The Sixth Ancestor, at Caixi, once addressed the assembly saying, “From the seven buddhas through Huineng, there are forty buddhas; from Huineng through the seven buddhas, there are forty ancestors.”<sup>7</sup>

この道理、あきらかに佛祖正嗣の宗旨なり。いはゆる七佛は、過去莊嚴劫に出現せるもあり、現在賢劫に出現せるもあり。しかあるに、四十祖の面授をつらぬるは、佛道なり、佛嗣なり。

This principle is clearly the essential point of the direct line of inheritance of the buddhas and ancestors. Of the seven buddhas, some appeared in the past, Adornment Kalpa, some appeared in the present, Worthy Kalpa.<sup>8</sup> Nevertheless, what links the face-to-face conferral of the forty ancestors is the way of the buddhas, is the inheritance of the buddhas.<sup>9</sup>

7 The Sixth Ancestor (rokuso 六祖): I.e., Caixi Huineng 曹溪慧能. This saying, variations of which are also given in “Shōbōgenzō butsudō” 正法眼藏佛道 and “Kobutsu-shin” 古佛心, does not seem to occur in any other extant record of Huineng’s teachings. It may possibly reflect some tradition recorded in the Dunhuang manuscript of the Liuzu tan jing 六祖壇經 (see T.2007.48:344c11), where Huineng identifies himself as the fortieth in a lineage beginning with the seven buddhas.

8 the past, Adornment Kalpa (kako shōgon gō 過去莊嚴劫); the present, Worthy Kalpa (genzai ken gō 現在賢劫): It is commonly held that the first three of the seven buddhas of the past belong to the previous æon, called “adornment” (shōgon 莊嚴; or “array”; S. vyūha); while the last four are of our current æon, “worthy” (ken 賢; or “auspicious”; S. bhadra). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas.” In section 41, below, Dōgen will raise the issue of dharma transmission between buddhas of different kalpas.

9 what links the face-to-face conferral of the forty ancestors (shijisso no menju o tsuranuru 四十祖の面授をつらぬる): The claim would seem to be that there is something called “the way of the buddhas” or “the inheritance of the buddhas” that brings the ancestors into “face-to-face” relationships even when they belong to different kalpas.

inheritance of the buddhas (busshi 佛嗣): Or “buddha inheritance”; an unusual term appearing only in this chapter of the Shōbōgenzō, where it occurs often, in both nominal and verbal senses (“to buddha inherit”). In section 8, below, it is used in the sense “buddha inheritor” (or “buddha heir”) and is identified with the homophonous “buddha child”

しかあればすなはち、六祖より向上して七佛にいたれば、四十祖の佛嗣あり。七佛より向上して六祖にいたるに、四十佛の佛嗣なるべし。佛道祖道、かくのごとし。證契にあらず、佛祖にあざれば、佛智慧にあらず、祖究盡にあらず。佛智慧にあざれば、佛信受なし、祖究盡にあざれば、祖證契せず。しばらく四十祖といふは、近をかつがつ擧するなり。

Thus, when we go beyond the Sixth Ancestor through the seven buddhas, there is the inheritance of the buddhas of forty ancestors; and when we go beyond the seven buddhas through the Sixth Ancestor, it should be the inheritance of the buddhas of forty buddhas.<sup>10</sup> The way of the buddhas, the way of the ancestors, is like this. If it is not verification and accord, not buddhas and ancestors, it is not the wisdom of the buddhas, not the exhaustive investigation of the ancestors. If it is not the wisdom of the buddhas, there is no trust in the buddhas; if it is not the exhaustive investigation of the ancestors, the ancestors do not verify and accord. That we talk for the moment of “forty ancestors” is just to bring up the ones that are close to us.<sup>11</sup>

According to this, the inheriting of buddha after buddha is profound and far-reaching; it does not regress, does not turn back; it is uninterrupted and unceasing. The essential point of this is that, although Buddha Śākyamuni may have attained the way before the seven buddhas, long after, he inherited the dharma of Buddha Kāśyapa; although he may have attained the way on the eighth day of the twelfth month, thirty years from his descent to birth, it was an attainment of the way preceding that of the seven buddhas, an attainment of the way equal to and simultaneous with (or “follower of the Buddha”; bussshi 佛子). In a note appended to the end of the chapter (section 43, below), Dōgen uses it in quoting his teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227); but the passage, in Japanese, does not seem to have a source in Rujing’s extant recorded sayings, nor does the term appear in those sayings.

10 when we go beyond the Sixth Ancestor through the seven buddhas (rokuso yori kōjō shite shichi butsu ni itareba 六祖より向上して七佛にいたれば): A similar passage, with the same notion of a transmission “back” from Huineng to the seven buddhas, occurs in “Shōbōgenzō kobutsushin” 正法眼藏古佛心.

11 That we talk for the moment of “forty ancestors” is just to bring up the ones that are close (shibaraku shijisso to iu wa, chikaki o katsugatsu ko suru nari しばらく四十祖といふは、近をかつがつ擧するなり): Presumably, meaning that we speak here of forty “ancestors,” rather than forty “buddhas,” simply because the ancestors are closer to us.

that of the other buddhas, an attainment of the way preceding that of the other buddhas, an attainment of the way first before all the buddhas.<sup>12</sup>

さらに、迦葉佛は釋迦牟尼佛に嗣法する、と參究する道理あり。この道理をしらざるには、佛道をあきらめず、佛道をあきらめざれば、佛嗣にあらず。佛嗣といふことは、佛子といふことなり。

Futher, there is the principle to be investigated that Buddha Kāśyapa inherited the dharma from Buddha Śākyamuni. One who does not know this principle has not clarified the way of the buddhas; and, if one has not clarified the way of the buddhas, one is not an heir of the buddhas. To be an heir of the buddhas means to be a child of the buddhas.

釋迦牟尼佛、あるとき阿難にとはしむ、過去の諸佛は、これたれが弟子なるぞ。釋迦牟尼佛はいく、過去諸佛は、これ我釋迦牟尼佛の弟子なり。

Buddha Śākyamuni was once asked by Ānanda, “Whose disciples were the buddhas of the past?”<sup>13</sup>

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “The buddhas of the past were my, Buddha Śākyamuni’s, disciples.”

12 long after, he inherited the dharma of Buddha Kāśyapa (hisashiku Kashō butsu ni shihō seru ひさしく迦葉佛に嗣法せる): i.e., long after becoming a buddha, Śākyamuni succeeded the sixth buddha, Kāśyapa.

an attainment of the way first before all the buddhas (issai no shobutsu yori matsujō no jōdō 一切の諸佛より末上の成道): Taking matsujō 末上 in its normal meaning of “first of all”; many readers take it to mean “the last.”

世尊嘗與阿難行次、見一古佛塔。世尊便作禮。阿難云、此是什麼人塔。世尊云、此是過去諸佛塔。阿難云、過去諸佛是什麼人弟子。佛云、是吾弟子。阿難云、應當如是。

Once, when the World-Honored One was traveling with Ānanda, they saw an old Buddhist stūpa. The World-Honored One bowed to it. Ānanda said, “Whose stūpa is this?”

The World-Honored One said, “This is a stūpa of the buddhas of the past.”

Ānanda said, “Whose disciples were the buddhas of the past?”

The Buddha said, “They were my disciples.”

Ānanda said, “So it must be.”

Dōgen refers to this tradition in his “Shōbōgenzō jinzū” 正法眼藏神通, and the story occurs as case number 245 in the Eishōin 永晶院 text of Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (see DZZ.5:254, case 245n).

was once asked by Ānanda (Anan ni towashimu 阿難にとはしむ): The unexpected causative form of the verb here is thought to express an honorific.

[39:10]

諸佛の佛儀、かくのごとし。この諸佛に奉観して、佛嗣し、成就せん、すなはち佛佛の佛道にてあるべし。

The buddha deportment of the buddhas is like this. Attending these buddhas, receiving the inheritance of the buddhas, and achieving [buddhahood] — precisely this should be the way of the buddhas of buddha after buddha.

[39:11]

この佛道、かならず嗣法するとき、さだめて嗣書あり。もし嗣法なきは、天然外道なり。佛道もし嗣法を決定するにあらずば、いかでか今日にいたらん。これによりて、佛佛なるには、さだめて佛嗣佛の嗣書あるなり、佛嗣佛の嗣書をうるなり。その嗣書の爲體は、日月星辰をあきらめて嗣法す、あるひは皮・肉・骨・髓を得せしめて嗣法す。あるひは袈裟を相嗣し、あるひは拄杖を相嗣し、あるひは松枝を相嗣し、あるひは拂子を相嗣し、あるひは優曇華を相嗣し、あるひは金襴衣を相嗣す。鞞鞋の相嗣あり、竹篋の相嗣あり。

In this way of the buddhas, whenever someone inherits the dharma there is definitely an inheritance certificate. Those who lack dharma inheritance belong to an other path of natural occurrence.<sup>14</sup> If there were no determining dharma inheritance in the way of the buddhas, how could it have reached us today? Accordingly, those who are [in the lineage of] buddha after buddha, definitely have inheritance certificates of a buddha inheriting from a buddha, definitely receive inheritance certificates of a buddha inheriting from a buddha. As for the nature of those inheritance certificates, some inherit the dharma by clarifying the sun, moon, and stars; some inherit the dharma by getting the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.<sup>15</sup> Some inherit a kāṣāya; some inherit a staff; some inherit a pine 14 other path of natural occurrence (tennen gedō 天然外道): I.e., non-Buddhist religion holding the view that things arise, not from causes and conditions, but from themselves of their own accord; synonymous with jinen gedō 自然外道. A criticism that will be attributed below, section 42, to Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨.

15 As for the nature of those inheritance certificates (sono shisho no teitaraku wa その嗣書の爲體は): The passage that follows here, listing examples of dharma inheritance in the Chan tradition, has some similarities to examples of the prediction of buddhahood given in “Shōbōgenzō juki” 正法眼藏授記.

clarifying the sun, moon, and stars (nichigetsu seishin o akiramete 日月星辰をあきらめて); getting the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow (hi niku kotsu zui o toku seshimete 皮・肉・骨・髓を得せしめて): The former example may allude to the awakening of Buddha Śākyamuni upon seeing the dawn star; the latter recalls Bodhidharma's test of his four students, of whom he said in turn that they had gotten his skin, flesh, bones, and marrow. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

branch; some inherit a whisk; some inherit an udumbara flower; some inherit a gold brocade robe.<sup>16</sup> There is an inheritance of shoes; there is an inheritance of bamboo sticks.<sup>17</sup>

これらの嗣法を相嗣するとき、あるひは指血をして書嗣し、あるひは舌血をして書嗣す。あるひは油乳をもてかき、嗣法する、ともにこれ嗣書なり。嗣せるもの、得せるもの、ともにこれ佛嗣なり。まことにそれ佛祖として現成するとき、嗣法かならず現成す。現成するとき、期せざれどもきたり、もとめざれども嗣法せる佛祖おほし。嗣法あるは、かならず佛佛祖祖なり。

When these dharma inheritances are inherited, blood from a finger may be used to document the inheritance, or blood from the tongue may be used to document the inheritance; or the dharma inheritance may be written with oil or milk: all of these are inheritance certificates.<sup>18</sup> Both the one who has made the inheritance and the one who has received it are 16 kāśāya (kesa 袈裟); staff (shujō 拄杖); pine branch (shōshi 松枝); whisk (hossu 拂子): Objects that regularly appear in the stories of interactions between Zen masters and their disciples. The pine branch figured in dharma succession ceremonies, while the staff and fly whisk were insignia of the Zen master's office often invoked in the master's teachings (see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Staff," "Whisk."); the kāśāya, or outer robe, was sometimes bestowed on the disciple as an emblem of succession, as most famously in the case of the robe of Bodhidharma handed down to the Sixth Ancestor. Apart, perhaps, from this last case, there is probably no need to imagine that Dōgen had specific historical cases in mind here.

udumbara* flower (udonge 優曇華): Reference to the rare flower regularly appearing in Buddhist texts as an auspicious sign. Its mention here is likely an allusion to the famous legend of the founding of the Zen lineage, in which Buddha Śākyamuni held up a flower, the disciple Mahākāśyapa smiled, and the Buddha announced that he had transmitted "the treasury of the true dharma eye" to Mahākāśyapa; although the tradition does not typically identify the flower as the udumbara, Dōgen seems to have made this association (see, e.g., Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄, DZZ.4:12, no. 428). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Hold up a flower."

gold brocade robe (kinran e 金襴衣): Likely, reference to the legend that Buddha Śākyamuni bestowed a gold brocade robe on Mahākāśyapa, to be handed on to the next buddha, Maitreya (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:205c3-5).

17 shoes (sōai 鞞鞋); bamboo sticks (shippei 竹篴): The "bamboo stick" refers to the short staff used as a symbol of authority (and teaching tool) by abbots. The inheritance of shoes may allude to the well-known tradition that, when Touzi Yiqing 投子義青 (1032–1083) was asked by Fushan Fayuan 浮山法遠 (991–1067) to inherit the dharma of the deceased Zen Master Ming'an 明安禪師 (942–1027), he was given Ming'an's portrait, robe, and shoes. (See, e.g., Jianzhong Jingguo xudeng lu 建中靖國續燈錄, ZZ.136:351b1-6.)

18 the dharma inheritance may be written with oil or milk (arui wa yu'nyū o mote kaki, shihō suru あるひは油乳をもてかき、嗣法する): A tentative translation; the sense of the term yu'nyū 油乳 ("oil milk") here is uncertain; possibly a reference to ghee (soyu 酥油; S. ghṛta) or ghee and curd (nyūroku 乳酪; S. dadhi).

heirs of the buddha. Truly, whenever they appear as buddhas and ancestors, dharma inheritance always occurs. When it occurs, it comes unanticipated, and there are many buddhas and ancestors who have inherited the dharma although they did not seek it. Those who have dharma inheritance are invariably buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor.

Ever since the Twenty-eighth Ancestor came from the west, the essential point that there is dharma inheritance in the way of the buddhas has been heard correctly in the Land of the East. Prior to that, it had never been heard. It is something unreached by, unknown to, the likes of the treatise masters and dharma masters of Sindh in the West; it is something unreached in the realm of the ten sages and three worthies, while the masters of spells among the doctrinal scholars of the tripitaka, and the like, do not even wonder whether it exists.<sup>19</sup> How sad that, while receiving the human body that is a vessel of the way, being futilely entangled in a web of doctrine, they do not know how to transcend it and have no expectation of a chance to spring forth from it. Therefore, we should study the way with the utmost care and should be single-minded in our resolve to investigate it.

19 Sindh in the West (Saiten 西天): A term denoting the Indian subcontinent, from the transliteration of sindhu as tianzhu 天竺; Dōgen sometimes, as in section 18, below, treats it as the “Western Heavens,” in contrast to the “Eastern Earth” (Tōchi 東地; i.e., China).

ten sages and three worthies (jishhō sanken 十聖三賢): I.e., those on the ten “noble” (S. ārya) stages of the bodhisattva path and the three “worthy” (S. bhadra) stages just preceding them.

masters of spells among the doctrinal scholars of the tripitaka (sanzō gigaku no jujusshi 三藏義學の呪術師): The referent is unclear, the combination of “doctrinal scholar” (gigaku 義學) and “spell master” (jujusshi 呪術師) being unusual; perhaps learned masters of mantra, perhaps reciters of the canon.

When Dōgen was in the Song and was able to pay obeisance to inheritance certificates, [I found that] there were many types of inheritance certificates.<sup>20</sup> Among them was [one shown to me by] the West Hall Wei-yi, a person of Yue enrolled at Tiantong, who had formerly served as head of hall at Guangfu Monastery.<sup>21</sup> He was from the same birthplace as my former master. My former master always said, “You should ask West Hall Yi about the customs of the region.”<sup>22</sup>

Whereupon, the West Hall said, “In my place, I have a scroll of old calligraphy, somewhat questionable.<sup>24</sup> Let me show it to my elder brother.”

20 When Dōgen was in the Song (Dōgen zaisō no toki 道元在宋のとき): Here and below, Dōgen refers to himself by name, which we treat here as a first person pronoun. Dōgen was in Song-dynasty China 1223-1227.

21 West Hall Wei-yi (itsu seidō 惟一西堂): Otherwise unknown. “West Hall” (seidō 西堂) is a title for the former abbot of another monastery. “Yue” 越 refers to a region in present-day Zhejiang province; “Tiantong” 天童 is the mountain name of the Jingde Monastery 景德寺, in the same region, of which Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 was abbot during Dōgen’s residence there; “head of hall” (dōchō 堂頭) refers to the abbot of a monastery; there are several monasteries named “Guangfusi” 廣福寺, and the one in question here is uncertain.

22 “the customs of the region” (kyōfū 境風): Probably, a reference to the ways of the Yue region from which both Wei-yi and Rujing hailed.

23 “I’ve only seen a few” (kenrai sukunashi 見來すくなし): The Kōjakuji 香積寺 manuscript reads here “I’ve never seen one” (kenrai seru koto nashi 見來せることなし).

24 “somewhat questionable” (jinmo shidai nari 甚麼次第なり): A tentative translation, perhaps meaning “of uncertain provenance” or “questionable authenticity.”

been in the lineage of Fayan and had been obtained from among the robe and bowl of an elder.<sup>25</sup> It was not Elder Weiyi's own. On it was written the following:

かくのごとくかきたり。

“The First Ancestor Mahākāśyapa was awakened under Buddha Śākyamuni; Buddha Śākyamuni was awakened under Buddha Kāśyapa.”

It was inscribed like this.

予道元、これらを見しに、正嫡の、正嫡に嗣法あることを決定信受す。未曾見の法なり。佛祖の、冥感して兒孫を護持する時節なり、感激不勝なり。

Upon seeing this, I, Dōgen, became firmly convinced that there is dharma inheritance by a direct descendant from a direct descendant. It was something I had never seen. This was an instance of the buddhas and ancestors using their hidden influence to protect one of their descendants. I was unbearably moved.

雲門下の嗣書とて、宗月長老の、天童の首座職に充せしとき、道元にみせしは、いま嗣書をうる人のつぎかみの師、および西天東地の佛祖をならべつらねて、その下頭に、嗣書をうる人の名字あり。諸佛諸祖より、直にいまの新祖師の名字につらぬるなり。しかあれば、如來より四十餘代、ともに新嗣の名字へきたれり。たとへば、おのおの新祖にさづけたるがごとし。摩訶迦葉・阿難陀等は、餘門のごとくにつらなれり。

When Elder Zongyue held the position of head seat at Tiantong, he showed Dōgen an inheritance certificate from the Yunmen lineage.<sup>26</sup> The [name of the] master just preceding the recipient of the inheritance certificate was lined up in a row with the buddhas and ancestors of Sindh in the West and the Land of the East, and below those was the name of the recipient of the inheritance certificate.<sup>27</sup> There was a direct connection from the buddhas and ancestors to the name of the new ancestral 25 robe and bowl (ehatsu 衣鉢): A term indicating the personal possessions of a monk, auctioned off to other monks of his community following the owner's death.

26 Elder Zongyue (Shūgetsu chōrō 宗月長老): Otherwise unknown. The “head seat” (shuso 首座) is the leader of the monks in the saṃgha hall.

27 the buddhas and ancestors of Sindh in the West and the Land of the East (Saiten Tōchi no busso 西天東地の佛祖): I.e., the names of the representatives of the Zen lineage in Indian and China.

master.<sup>28</sup> Thus, it extended from the Tathāgata, through more than forty generations, down to and including the name of the new heir. It was as if each had bestowed [the transmission] on the new ancestor. Mahākāśyapa, Ānanda, and the rest, were lined up as in other traditions.<sup>29</sup>

ときに道元、宗月首座に問ふ、和尚、いま五家宗派をつらぬるに、いささか同異あり、そのころいかん。西天より嫡嫡相嗣せられば、なんぞ同異あらんや。宗月いはく、たとひ同異はるかなりといへども、ただまさに雲門山の佛はかくのごとくなる、と學すべし。釋迦老子、なにによりてか尊重他なる、悟道によりて尊重なり。雲門大師、なにによりてか尊重他なる、悟道によりて尊重なり。道元、この語をきくに、いささか領覽あり。

At the time, Dōgen asked Head Seat Zongyue, “Reverend, what is the meaning of the fact that there are slight discrepancies in the delineation of the lineages of the present five houses?<sup>30</sup> If they have been inherited from successor to successor from Sindh in the West, how could there be any discrepancies?”

Zongyue said, “Even were the discrepancies vast, you should just think that the buddhas of Mount Yunmen are like this. For what was old man Śākya honored? He was honored for his awakening to the way.<sup>31</sup> For what was Great Master Yunmen honored? He was honored for his awakening to the way.”

Upon hearing these words, Dōgen had a slight understanding.

28 the new ancestral master (shin soshi 新祖師): As was the custom in Song China, the recipient of the certificate is treated here and below as having already become an ancestor of the fictive Zen family.

29 Mahākāśyapa, Ānanda, and the rest (Makakashō Ananda tō 摩訶迦葉・阿難陀等): I.e., the members of the lineage beginning with the first and second Indian ancestors — for Dōgen’s list of which, see “Shōbōgenzō busso” 正法眼藏佛祖.

30 “lineages of the present five houses” (ima goke shūha いま五家宗派): I.e., the five lineages (Linji 臨濟, Weiyang 滄仰, Caodong 曹洞, Yunmen 雲門, and Fayan 法眼) recognized in the Chan literature of the Song, all of which originate after the Sixth Ancestor. Given the following sentence, Dōgen’s question seems to concern differences in the names of the Indian ancestors supposed to be shared by all Chan factions.

31 “For what was old man Śākya honored?” (Shaka rōshi, nani ni yorite ka sonjūta naru 釋迦老子、なにによりてか尊重他なる): “Old man Śākya” (Shaka rōshi 釋迦老子) is a common Zen term of endearment for Buddha Śākyamuni. The glyph ta 他 in sonjūta 尊重他 may be read as a colloquial Chinese auxiliary attached to the verb.

[39:20] {1:428}

いま江浙に大利の主とあるは、おほく臨濟・雲門・洞山等の嗣法なり。しかあるに、臨濟の遠孫と自稱するやから、ままにくはだつる不是あり。いはく、善知識の會下に參じて、頂相一幅、法語一軸を懇請して、嗣法の標準にそなふ。しかあるに、一類の狗子あり、尊宿のほとりに法語・頂相等を懇請して、かくし、たくはふることあまたあるに、晩年におよむで、官家に陪錢し、一院を討得して、住持職に補するときは、法語・頂相の師に嗣法せず、當代の名譽のともがら、あるひは王臣に親附なる長老等に嗣法するときは、得法をとはず、名譽をむさぼるのみなり。かなしむべし、末法惡時、かくのごとくの邪風あることを。かくのごとくのやからのなかに、いまだかつて一人として、佛祖の道を夢にも見聞するあらず。

At present, in Jiangzhe, leaders of the great monasteries mostly have dharma inheritance from Linji, Yunmen, or Dongshan.<sup>32</sup> But a bunch calling themselves distant descendants of Linji occasionally engage in scheming improprieties: joining the community of a wise friend and beseeching him for a scroll with his portrait or a scroll with his dharma words, they provide themselves with a sign of their dharma inheritance.<sup>33</sup> And then there is one kind of dog that, begging in the vicinity of venerables for dharma words, a portrait, or the like, hides them away and builds up a large store of them. Then, in his later years, he bribes government officials and is granted a cloister; and, when the position of abbot is conferred on him, instead of inheriting the dharma from a master whose dharma words or portrait he has, he inherits the dharma from among the bunch that is currently famous or some elder intimately connected with the imperial court. At that time, there is no question of his having attained the dharma; it is just desire for fame. How lamentable that there are such corrupt customs in this evil age at the end of the dharma. Among this type, there has never been one who saw or heard the way of the buddhas and ancestors even in his dreams.

おほよそ法語・頂相等をゆるすことは、教家の講師、および在家の男女等にも授く、行者・商客等にもゆるすなり。その旨、諸家の録にあきらかなり。あるひはその人にあらざるが、みだりに嗣法の證據を望むによりて、一軸の書をもとむこと、有道のいたむところなりといへども、なまじいに援筆するなり。しかるときは、古來の書式によらず、いささか師吾のよしをかく。近來の法は、ただその師の會にて得力すれば、すなはちかの師を師と嗣法するなり。かつてその師の印を得ざれども、ただ入室・上堂に咨參して、長連牀にあるともがら、住院のときは、その師承を擧するにいとまあらざれども、大事打開するとき、その師を師とせるのみおほし。

32 Jiangzhe (Kôsetsu 江浙): i.e., the provinces of Jiangsu and Zhejiang, the heartland of the Southern Song dynasty.

33 the community of a wise friend (zen chishiki no eka 善知識の會下): i.e., the congregation of a Zen teacher.

In general, in the granting of dharma words, portraits, and such, they are given even to lecturers in the teaching houses, as well as to male and female householders.<sup>34</sup> They are also granted to postulants, merchants, and the like.<sup>35</sup> This point is clear in the records of the various houses. Or, again, an unqualified person, shamelessly desiring proof of dharma inheritance, may seek a scroll of writing; though this may be painful for those who possess the way, they reluctantly take up the brush. In such cases, they do not follow the traditional form of composition, but just write a little something to the effect, “the teacher, I . . . .”<sup>36</sup> The practice in recent times is that, when one gains authority in the community of some master, one immediately inherits the dharma with that master as one’s master. This bunch has never received the teacher’s certification, but has merely sought instruction in his room-entering and convocations, while spending time on the long platforms; though, once they become abbots of cloisters, they have no time to bring up their inheritance from their master, there are many of them who simply regard as their master the master at the time that the great matter was opened.<sup>37</sup>

34 lecturers in the teaching houses (kyōke no kōshi 教家の講師): I.e., teachers in the Buddhist traditions that emphasize scriptural study. In Song-dynasty China, some Buddhist monasteries were categorized as “Teachings” (jiao 教), “Chan” (chan 禪), and “Vinaya” (lü 律) facilities; in this classification, the abbots of the Teachings monasteries typically belonged to the Tiantai 天台 lineage.

35 merchants (shōkaku 商客): Although in ordinary parlance, this term typically refers to a traveling merchant, here it may indicate a merchant visitor to the monastery.

36 write a little something to the effect, “the teacher, I . . . .” (isasaka shi go no yoshi o kaku いささか師吾のよしをかく): A tentative translation; the unusual expression shigo 師吾 (“teacher I”) may be shorthand for something like “being the teacher,” or perhaps simply “teacher so-and-so.”

37 room-entering and convocations (nisshitsu jōdō 入室・上堂): I.e., teaching sessions in the master’s quarters and formal addresses in the dharma hall, respectively.

long platforms (chōrenjō 長連牀): The extended daises in the saṃgha hall (sōdō 僧堂) on which monks of the great assembly (daishu 大衆) sat in meditation, chanted sūtras in prayer services, took their meals, and slept at night.

they have no time to bring up their inheritance from their master (sono shijō o ko suru ni itoma arazaredomo その師承を擧するにいとまあらざれども): I.e., are too busy to raise the matter of their spiritual patrimony.

the great matter was opened (daiji dakai 大事打開): I.e., the meaning of the Buddha’s teaching (or of life and death) was understood.

Again, there was a person named Canon Prefect Chuan, a distant descendant of Reverend Qingyuan, Chan Master Foyan of Longmen.<sup>38</sup> That Canon Prefect Chuan also had an inheritance certificate. At the beginning of Jiading, Senior Seat Ryūzen, though a person from the Land of Japan, carefully nursed Canon Prefect Chuan when the latter fell ill.<sup>39</sup> Because Ryūzen had been so diligent, in order to thank him for his help in nursing, Canon Prefect Chuan took out his inheritance certificate and allowed him to pay obeisance to it. “It’s something one rarely gets to see,” he had said, “but I’ll let you pay obeisance to it.”

After that, eight years later, in the autumn of the junior water year of the sheep, the sixteenth year of Jiading, when Dōgen first lodged at Mount Tiantong, Senior Seat Ryūzen kindly made a request of Canon Prefect Chuan, who permitted Dōgen to see the inheritance certificate.<sup>40</sup> In the format of the inheritance certificate, it listed in a row the forty-five ancestors from the seven buddhas through Linji; for the masters after Linji, there was a circle with the dharma names and signatures copied around the interior. The new heir was last, written beneath the year and month. We should realize that there are such differences among [the inheritance certificates of] the venerables of Linji.

38 Canon Prefect Chuan (Den zōsu 傳藏主): Otherwise unknown. “Canon Prefect” (zōsu 藏主) is the title of the monk in charge of the monastic library.

Reverend Qingyuan, Chan Master Foyan of Longmen (Ryūmon no Butsugen zenji 佛眼隆禪 of the Kongō Zanmai Cloister 金剛三昧院 on Mount Kōya 高野山. “Senior Seat” (jōza 上座) is an honorific for a senior monk, used variously for an abbot, a head monk, an elder, a monk of over twenty years standing, etc.

39 Jiading (Katei 嘉定): The Jiading era of the Song Emperor Ningzong 寧宗, 1194–1225.

Senior Seat Ryūzen (Ryūzen jōza 隆禪上座): Presumably, the monk Butsugen Ryūzen 佛眼隆禪 of the Kongō Zanmai Cloister 金剛三昧院 on Mount Kōya 高野山. “Senior Seat” (jōza 上座) is an honorific for a senior monk, used variously for an abbot, a head monk, an elder, a monk of over twenty years standing, etc.

40 the junior water year of the sheep, the sixteenth year of Jiading (Katei jūroku nen kimi 嘉定十六年癸未): I.e., 1223, the tenth stem, eighth branch of the sexagenary calendar.

My former master, Head of Hall of Tiantong, warned against people's improperly claiming dharma inheritance. My former master's community was truly the assembly of an old buddha, the revival of the monastery. He himself did not wear a patterned kāṣāya. Although the patchwork dharma robe of Chan Master Daokai of Mount Furong had come down to him, he did not use it even when ascending to the hall or mounting the seat.<sup>41</sup> In general, while serving as an abbot, he never once donned a patterned dharma robe throughout his entire life.<sup>42</sup> Both the thoughtful and the ignorant alike praised and respected him as a true wise friend.

In his convocations, my former master, the Old Buddha, regularly admonished those of all quarters, saying,<sup>43</sup>

In recent times, many of those who borrow the name of the way of the ancestors improperly don dharma robes, like to grow out their hair, and regard signing with the title of master as a vessel for appearance in the world.<sup>44</sup> How pitiful. Who can save them? It is regrettable that the el-ascending to the hall or mounting the seat (jōdō shinzo 上堂・陞座): I.e., during the formal occasions of the dharma hall convocation or sermon from the altar.

41 the patchwork dharma robe of Chan Master Daokai of Mount Furong (Fuyōzan no Dōkai zenji no nōhōe 芙蓉山の道楷禪師の衲法衣): The kāṣāya of Furong Daokai 芙蓉道楷 (1043-1118), a leading figure in the Southern Song revival of the Caodong tradition. This robe was supposed to have been passed on to Dōgen by Rujing.

42 In general, while serving as an abbot (ōyoso jūjishoku toshite おほよそ住持職として): Rujing served as abbot of several monasteries before assuming the position at Tiantong.

43 those of all quarters (shohō 諸方): I.e., assembled monks (or here, likely abbots) of various monasteries. Rujing's words here, given in Japanese, have no known source; perhaps, Dōgen's own recollection.

44 vessel for appearance in the world (shusse no shūkō 出世の舟航): I.e., a means to gaining promotion to a major abbacy.

ders of all quarters lack the mind of the way and do not study the way. Those who have seen or heard the circumstances of dharma certificates and dharma inheritance are even more rare, not one in a hundred thousand. This is the erosion of the way of the ancestors.

When he repeatedly remonstrated in this way, the elders from everywhere did not resent it.<sup>45</sup>

In Linji inheritance certificates, [the master] first writes his name, then writes, “disciple so-and-so inquired of me,” or writes, “joined my community,” or writes, “entered the interior of my hall,” or writes, “inherited from me,” and then lines up the previous generations in order.<sup>46</sup> Those, too, have a few dharma instructions handed down by word of mouth. The import of what they say is the clear point that inheritance, whether in the end or the beginning, is only of meeting a true wise friend.<sup>47</sup> In 45 the elders from everywhere did not resent it (tenka no chōrō uramizu 天下の長老うらみず): Presumably, meaning that the abbots who heard these remarks recognized their truth, though it might also mean that they felt no remorse.

46 “disciple so-and-so inquired of me” (bōkōshi ware ni sanzu 某甲子われに參ず): The four alternative inscriptions given here represent four degrees of intimacy, in ascending order, that a student may have with the master. To “inquire of” (sanzu 參ず) a teacher means to visit them and ask about Buddhist teachings or practice. To “join the community” (e ni kitaru 會にきたる) means to train under the master as a monk in residence at a monastery where they are abbot. To “enter the interior of the hall” (nyū dōō 入堂奥) means to be accepted as a “room-entering disciple” (nisshitsu deshi 入室弟子) — i.e., a disciple who has individual access to the teacher in their private rooms in the abbot’s quarters. Finally, to “inherit from” (shi 嗣) a master is to be recognized as a dharma heir.

47 inheritance, whether in the end or the beginning (shi wa owari hajime ni kakawarezu 嗣はおはり・はじめにかかはれず): The exact sense of “beginning” and “end” here is subject to interpretation. Perhaps the most plausible is that they refer to the beginning and end of the relationship between master and disciple; but they have also been taken as the disciple’s first and last master, or as first and last in the order of disciples receiving inheritance from a given master.

48 Since I have seen one with my own eyes, I present it here (mano atari mishi ni yorite, shirusu まのあたりみしによりて、しるす): What follows (in section 28) is entirely in Chinese, presumably copied down by Dōgen from the inheritance certificate he saw.

49 Canon Prefect Liaopai is a person of Weiwu (Ryōha zōsu Ibu nin ya 了派藏主威武人也): i.e., Wuji Liaopai 無際了派 (1149-1224), abbot of Tiantong 天童 when Dōgen first arrived there. His title here of “Canon Prefect” (zōsu 藏主) presumably reflects his previous office at Mount Ayuwang 阿育山, when his master, Deguang 德光, was abbot there. Weiwu 威武 was in Jian’an (present Fujian).

50 Deguang (Tokkō 德光): i.e., Zhuoan Deguang 拙菴德光 (1121-1203), the author of the certificate, referring to himself in the third person.

Reverend Gao of Mount Jing (Kinzan Kō oshō 徑山杲和尚): i.e., Dahui Zonggao 大慧宗杲 (1089-1163), who twice served as abbot of the Xingsheng Wanshou Chansi on Mount Jing (Jingshan xingsheng wanshou chansi 徑山興聖萬壽禪寺) in Hangzhou 杭州, Lin’an Prefecture 臨安府. Perhaps the most famous Linji master of the Southern Song, sharply criticized by Dōgen.

This was written by Deguang, Chan Master Fozhao, of Mount Ayuwang, who gave it to Pai Wuji.<sup>62</sup> When the latter was abbot of Tiantong, the young monk Zhigeng confidentially brought it and showed it to Dōgen in the Liaoran quarters.<sup>63</sup> I first saw this on the twenty-first day of the first month of the senior wood year of the monkey, the seventeenth year of Jiading in the Great Song.<sup>64</sup> How great was my joy! It was surely due to the hidden influence of the buddhas and ancestors. Burning incense and making bows, I unrolled and examined it.

60 Jiang of Xinghua (Kōke Shō 興化獎): i.e., Xinghua Cunjiang 興化存獎 (830-888).

61 the Eminent Ancestor Linji (Rinzai kōso 臨濟高祖): i.e., Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866), founder of the Linji 臨濟 lineage.

62 Deguang, Chan Master Fozhao, of Mount Ayuwang (Aikuōzan Busshō zenji Tokkō 阿育王山佛照禪師德光): i.e., Zhuoan Deguang 拙菴德光, who had also served as abbot at Ayuwang 阿育王, an important monastery near Tiantong 天童, famous for its relic of the Buddha.

Pai Wuji (Ha Musai 派無際): i.e., Wuji Liaopai 無際了派.

63 the young monk Zhigeng (shōshi sō Chikō 小師僧智庚): Otherwise unknown. "Young monk" translates shōshi sō 小師僧, a term sometimes said to refer to monks with less than ten years since their bhikṣu ordination; in modern usage, a "disciple monk"; here, more likely simply a reference to a young monk in training.

the Liaoran quarters (Ryōnen ryō 了然寮): The residence at Tiantong 天童 of Dōgen's Japanese master, Myōzen 明全 (1184-1225), with whom the former traveled to China. Dōgen may have been serving as Myōzen's attendant at the residence.

64 the twenty-first day of the first month of the senior wood year of the monkey, the seventeenth year of Jiading in the Great Song (Daisō Katei jūshichi nen kōshin shōgatsu nijūichi nichi 大宋嘉定十七年甲申正月二十一日): i.e., 11 February 1224, the first stem, ninth branch of the sexagenary calendar.

I had asked that this inheritance certificate be taken out because, in the seventh month of the previous year, the Prior Shiguang had told Dōgen about it in private in the Jiguang Hall.<sup>65</sup> At the time, Dōgen asked the Prior, “Who has it now?”

The Prior said, “It seems to be in the old man head of hall’s place.”<sup>66</sup> Later, if you ask him politely to take it out, I’m sure you can see it.”

After Dōgen heard these words, my desire to see it did not let up day or night. Therefore, in the following year, I politely begged the young monk Zhigeng and, with my single-mindedness, I got my request.

そのかける地は、白絹の表背せるにかく。表紙はあかき錦なり、軸は玉なり、長九寸ばかり、濶七尺餘なり。閑人にはみせず。道元すなはち智庚を謝す、さらに即時に堂頭に参じて焼香禮拜して無際和尚に謝す。ときに無際いわく、遮一段事、少得見知、如今老兄知得、便是學道之實歸也。ときに道元、喜感無勝。

The material on which it was written was mounted on white silk. The backing was red brocade; the spindle was jade.<sup>67</sup> The height was just nine inches; the length, more than seven feet.<sup>68</sup> It was not shown to outsiders.

Dōgen thanked Zhigeng; further, I immediately called upon the head of hall, burned incense, made bows, and thanked Reverend Wuji. Whereupon, Wuji said, “This is something that few are able to see for themselves. Now, elder brother, you know of it, and it will be a true refuge in your study of the way.”

At the time, Dōgen’s joy was unbearable.

65 Prior Shiguang (Shikō tsūsu 師廣都寺): Otherwise unknown. The prior (tsūsu 都寺) was the monastic officer in charge of overall administration.

Jiguang Hall (Jakkō dō 寂光堂): “Tranquil Light Hall,” name of the outer abbot’s quarters at Tiantong 天童.

66 “in the old man head of hall’s place” (dōchō rōkan nari 堂頭老漢那裏): I.e., in the abbot’s quarters.

67 The backing was red brocade (hyōshi wa akaki nishiki nari 表紙はあかき錦なり): The “backing” (hyōshi 表紙; literally, “cover paper”) refers to the sturdier material to which the silk is attached that serves as its cover when the scroll is rolled up.

68 The height was just nine inches; the length, more than seven feet (take kyū sun bakari, hiroso shichi shaku amari nari 長九寸ばかり、濶七尺餘なり): The certificate was a long, narrow scroll unrolled horizontally for reading. The length of the Chinese “foot” (chi 尺) varied somewhat over time but was roughly equal to the English foot; the “inch” (cun 寸) was one tenth of a chi.

wandering to Mount Tai, Mount Yan, and so on (Daisan Ganzan tō ni unyū suru 台山・雁山等に雲遊する): "Mount Tai" (Daisan 台山) here refers to Mount Tiantai 天台山, home of several monasteries, including the Guoqing Monastery 國清寺, headquarters of the Tiantai school, and the Wannian Monastery 萬年寺, referred to here; "Mount Yan" (Ganzan 雁山) is the mountain name of the Neng'ren Monastery 能仁寺 in Wenzhou 温州. During his stay in China, Dōgen never left the areas known at the time as the Liangzhe West Circuit (Liangzhe xilu 兩浙西路) and the Liangzhe East Circuit (Liangzhe tonglu 兩浙東路), which together have been called Zhejiang Province 浙江省 from the Ming dynasty down to the present.

70 Reverend Yuanzi of Fuzhou (Fukushū no Genshi oshō 福州の元肅和尚): Also read Gensu. Otherwise unknown.

71 Elder Zongjian (Sōkan chōrō 宗鑑長老): Identity uncertain.

72 Dawei and Yangshan's talk on designating an heir (Daii Kyōzan no ryōshi wa 大爲・仰山の令嗣話): This conversation, between Weishan Lingyou 爲山靈祐 (771-853) and his future dharma heir Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂 (803-887), is recorded in Dōgen's shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:180, case 103):

大爲山大圓禪師坐次、仰山侍立。師云、寂子、近日宗門中令嗣作麼生。仰曰、大

Dōgen said, “How could I have seen it?”

The Elder immediately stood up himself, presented it to me, and said:

I would not show this even to people close to me, even to an acolyte monk after years of service. This is the rule of the buddhas and ancestors. However, recently, when Yuanzi went out to the city and stayed there to see the prefectural governor, I had a dream, in which an eminent monk I thought was Chan Master Fachang of Mount Damei held out a sprig of plum blossoms and said, “If there is a real person who has crossed the gunwales, do not begrudge him the flowers.”<sup>73</sup>

So saying, he gave me the plum blossoms. Without thinking, in the dream, Yuanzi recited the lines, “Even before you crossed the gunwales, I should have given you thirty blows.”<sup>74</sup>

有人疑著此事。師云、寂子又作麼生。仰云、某甲祇管困來合眼、健即坐禪。所以未曾說著。師云、到這田地也難得。仰曰、據某甲見處、著一句語亦不得。師云、子爲一人也不得。仰云、自古聖人盡皆如是。師云、大有人笑汝與麼祇對。仰云、解笑某甲是某甲同參。師云、出頭作麼生。仰遶禪牀一匝。師云、裂破古今。

When Chan Master Dayuan of Mount Dawei was sitting, Yangshan stood by him in attendance. The Master asked, “Jizi, what do you make of the present-day issue of designating an heir in our lineage?”

Yang replied, “There are many people with doubts about this matter.”

The Master said, “Jizi, again, what do you make of it?”

Yang said, “When I get tired, I just close my eyes; when I’m healthy, I sit in meditation. So, I’ve never said anything.”

The Master said, “It’s hard to reach such a field.”

Yang said, “As far as I can see, I can’t say even a word.”

The Master said, “You can’t do it even for someone.”

Yang said, “From ancient times all the sages have been like this.”

The Master said, “Many are the people who would laugh at you for such a reply.”

Yang said, “To laugh at me is to practice with me.”

The Master said, “What about putting yourself forward?”

Yang circumambulated the [master’s] meditation seat, once around.

The Master said, “Ripping apart past and present.”

73 Chan Master Fachang of Mount Damei (Daibaizan Hōjō zenji 大梅山法常禪師): i.e., Damei Fachang 大梅法常 (752-839), a follower of Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一. He is said to have spent some forty years in isolation on Mount Damei 大梅山 (in modern Zhejiang). His biography can be found at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:254c2ff. His appearance in Yuanzi’s dream of the plum branch likely represents an association with his sobriquet Damei 大梅 (“Great Plum”).

74 “Even before you crossed the gunwales, I should have given you thirty blows” (mika sengen, kō yo sanjū bō 未跨船舷、好與三十棒): From a famous exchange between Chan Master Deshan Xuanjian 德山宣鑑 (780-865) and a monk from the Korean kingdom of Silla. The anecdote is recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:144, case 31):

And now, not five days have passed, and I meet my elder brother.<sup>75</sup> What's more, the elder brother has crossed the gunwales, and this inheritance certificate is written on plum blossom figured damask. It must be what Damei was teaching me. It is because it matches my dream vision, that I've brought this out. Do you seek to inherit the dharma from me? Should you seek it, I could not refuse.

道元、信感さしおくところなし。嗣書を請すべしといへども、ただ焼香禮拜して、恭敬供養するのみなり。ときに焼香侍者法寧といふ人あり、はじめて嗣書を見る、といひき。

Dōgen could not help but believe him. Although I was supposed to request an inheritance certificate, I only offered my respects, merely burning incense and bowing. At the time, there was an incense acolyte named Faning there, who said that it was the first time he had seen the inheritance certificate.<sup>76</sup>

道元ひそかに思惟しき、この一段の事、まことに佛祖の冥資にあらざれば、見聞なほかたし。邊地の愚人として、なんのさいはひありてか數番、これを見る。感涙霑袖。

Dōgen thought to himself, truly without the unseen help of the buddhas and ancestors, it would be hard to experience this event. By what good fortune could an ignorant person from a peripheral land see these several times? Tears of joy wet my sleeves.

鼎州徳山見性大師〈嗣龍潭、諱宣鑑〉小參示衆云、老僧今夜不答話、問話者三十棒。時有僧出禮拜。師便打。僧曰、某甲話也未問、因甚打某甲。師云、爾甚處人。僧曰、新羅人。師曰、未跨船舷、好與三十拄杖。

Great Master Jianxing of Deshan in Zhenzhou (succeeded Longtan, named Xuanjian) addressed the assembly at a small convocation saying, "This evening, I won't say any answers, and anyone who says a question will get thirty blows."

At that time, there was a monk who came forward and bowed. The Master hit him. The monk said, "I haven't said a question yet. Why did you hit me?"

The Master said, "Where are you from?"

The monk said, "I'm from Silla."

The Master said, "Even before you crossed the gunwales, I should have given you thirty blows of my staff."

75 my elder brother (rōhin 老兄): I.e., "you (Dōgen)."

76 incense acolyte named Faning (shōkō jisha Hōnei to iu hito 焼香侍者法寧といふ人): Otherwise unknown. The "incense acolyte" (shōkō jisha 焼香侍者) is the attendant tasked with assisting the abbot in offering incense; one of the "five acolytes" (go jisha 五侍者) in a Zen monastery.

On my way back to Tiantong from Mount Tai, Dōgen stayed at the overnight quarters at Husheng Monastery on Mount Damei.<sup>80</sup> There, I experienced a numinous dream, in which the Ancestral Master Damei came and presented me with a sprig of plum blossoms in full bloom. The mirror of the ancestors is a most reliable thing. The diameter of the blossoms on the sprig was more than one foot. How could the plum blossoms be anything but udumbara blossoms? What happens in dreams and 77 Weimo room, Dasheng hall, and the rest (Yuima shitsu Taisha dō tō 維摩室・大舍堂等): i.e., rooms associated with the abbot's quarters at Wannian Monastery 萬年寺; the Dasheng hall 大舍堂 was the front abbot's quarters (qian fangzhang 前方丈), immediately behind the dharma hall. (See "Gozan jissatsu zu" 五山十刹圖, Zengaku daijiten 禅学大辞典, Bekkan 別卷, p. 13.) This arresting recollection and that of the preceding section do not occur in the Kōjakuji 香積寺 text.

79 the length was over eight feet (hirosa hito hiro yo 濶一尋餘): The term hito hiro is the Japanese rendering of the Chinese yi xun 一尋, a measure, like the English "fathom," based on the armspan; standardized as eight Chinese feet (chi 尺).

80 overnight quarters at Husheng Monastery on Mount Damei (Daibaizan Goshōji no tanga 大梅山護聖寺の旦過): The guest quarters of the monastery founded by Damei Fachang 大梅法常. The term tanga 旦過 refers to a monk's one-night stay at a monastery; here, short for tangaryō 旦過寮, the accommodations for such monks.

The writing of inheritance certificates in our present Dongshan lineage differs from their writing in Linji and the rest.<sup>81</sup> What was affixed within the robes of the buddhas and ancestors, the Eminent Ancestor Qingyuan received in direct transmission, personally drawing pure blood from his finger and writing at the desk of Caoxi.<sup>82</sup> Tradition has it that it was written and transmitted by mingling the blood from his finger with the blood from Caoxi's finger. Tradition has it that the rite of mingling blood was carried out in the case of the First Ancestor and Second Ancestor as well. Without writing such things as “my offspring” or “made inquiries of me,” this is the procedure for the inheritance certificate written and handed down among the buddhas as well as the seven buddhas.<sup>83</sup>

81 our present Dongshan lineage (ima waga Tōzan monka いまわが洞山門下): I.e., Dōgen's Caotong (Sōtō 曹洞) lineage, descended from Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869).

82 What was affixed within the robes of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no eri ni kakarekeru 佛祖の衣裏にかかれける): Likely an allusion to the famous parable in the Lotus Sūtra, in which a priceless gem (representing the spiritual wealth of the buddha nature) is sewn into the lining of a garment (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:29a6-16).

Eminent Ancestor Qingyuan received in direct transmission, personally drawing pure blood from his finger and writing at the desk of Caoxi (Seigen kōso shitashiku Sōkei no kizen ni shite, te no yubi yori jōketsu o idashite kaki, shōden serarekeru nari 青原高祖したしく曹溪の几前にして、手の指より浄血をいだしてかき、正傳せられけるなり): “Eminent Ancestor Qingyuan” (Seigen kōso 青原高祖) refers to Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思 (d. 740), founder of the lineage leading to Dongshan 洞山; “Caoxi” (Sōkei 曹溪) refers to Qingyuan's master, the Sixth Ancestor, Caoxi Huineng 曹溪慧能. The translation here follows the most likely reading of the Japanese grammar in making “Qingyuan” the subject of “writing,” but it is highly unlikely that Dōgen wants us to think Qingyuan wrote out his own inheritance certificate. Dōgen's source for the tradition he describes here, as well as that, mentioned just below, of an inheritance certificate written in the mingled blood of Bodhidharma and Huike 慧可, is unknown.

83 the buddhas as well as the seven buddhas (shobutsu oyobi shichi butsu 諸佛および七佛): I.e., all the buddhas, including the seven buddhas of the past of which Śākya-muni is the last; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas.”

[39:39] {1:434}

しかあればしるべし、曹溪の血氣は、かたじけなく青原の淨血に和合し、青原の淨血、したしく曹溪の親血に和合して、まのあたり印證をうることは、ひとり高祖青原和尚のみなり、餘祖のおよぶところにあらず。この事子をしれるともがらは、佛法はただ青原のみに正傳せる、と道取するなり。

Thus, we should realize that, the lifeblood of Caoxi being graciously mingled with the pure blood of Qingyuan, and the pure blood of Qingyuan intimately mingled with the parental blood of Caoxi, the personal reception of the seal of verification was only by the Eminent Ancestor Reverend Qingyan alone and was not something attained by any other ancestor. Those who know the facts of this matter say that the buddha dharma was directly transmitted only to Qingyuan.<sup>84</sup>

[39:40]

先師古佛天童堂上大和尚、しめしていはく、諸佛かならず嗣法あり、いはゆる、釋迦牟尼佛者、迦葉佛に嗣法す、迦葉佛者、拘那含牟尼佛に嗣法す、拘那含牟尼佛者、拘留孫佛に嗣法するなり。かくのごとく佛佛相嗣して、いまにいたると信受すべし。これ學佛道なり。

My former master, the Old Buddha, Most Reverend Chief of Hall of Tiantong, taught:<sup>86</sup>

The buddhas always have dharma inheritance. That is, Buddha Śākyamuni inherited the dharma from Buddha Kāśyapa; Buddha Kāśyapa inherited the dharma from Buddha Kanakamuni; Buddha Kanakamuni inherited the dharma from Buddha Krakucchanda.<sup>87</sup> We should have 84 the buddha dharma was directly transmitted only to Qingyuan (buppō wa tada Seigen nomi ni shōden seru 佛法はただ青原のみに正傳せる): i.e., Qingyuan 青原 represents the principal heir to the Sixth Ancestor. Dongshan 洞山, the founder of Dōgen's lineage, was, of course, descended from Qingyuan.

85 The Inheritance Certificate (shisho 嗣書): This title apparently represents the beginning of the original colophon, marking the end of the document as it was first composed. The remainder of the colophon, with time and place of composition, appears at this point in the Kōjakuji MS but in our text here is found below the following appended material. The Satomi 里見 MS holograph seems to treat these words as the title of what follows here.

86 My former master, the Old Buddha, Most Reverend Chief of Hall of Tiantong (senshi kobutsu Tendō dōjō daishō 先師古佛天童堂上大和尚): i.e., Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨. Rujing's words, given here in Japanese, are not recorded elsewhere and apparently represent Dōgen's own report.

At the time, Dōgen said,

Buddha Śākyamuni appeared in the world and attained the way only after Buddha Kāśyapa had entered nirvāṇa. Not to mention, moreover, [the problem of] how the buddhas of the Worthy Kalpa could inherit the dharma from the buddhas of the Adornment Kalpa.<sup>89</sup> What is the reasoning here?

[39:42]

My former master said,

However, the variant text of this chapter, as well as some versions of our text, read here gakubutsu no dō 學佛の道 (“the way of studying the buddhas”).

the ten sages and three worthies (jisshō sanken 十聖三賢): See above, Note 19.

buddha after buddha is not like this. We study that Buddha Śākyamuni did indeed inherit the dharma from Buddha Kāśyapa. We study that Buddha Kāśyapa entered nirvāṇa only after Buddha Śākya inherited the dharma. If Buddha Śākyamuni had not inherited the dharma from Buddha Kāśyapa, it would be the same as an other path of natural occurrence; who would have faith in Buddha Śākya?<sup>91</sup> Because buddha after buddha has inherited in this way reaching down to the present, each and every buddha is a direct heir. They are not lined up; they are not bunched together.<sup>92</sup> We study that truly buddha after buddha inherits in this way. It has nothing to do with the numbers of kalpas or numbers of lifespans discussed in the teachings of the āgamas.<sup>93</sup> If we say it occurred only from Buddha Śākya, it is merely two thousand and some years, not very old. The inheritance, too, is a mere forty-some generations and would have to be called something new. This inheritance of the buddhas is not studied in this way. We study that Buddha Śākya inherited the dharma from Buddha Kāśyapa; we study that Buddha Kāśyapa inherited the dharma from Buddha Śākya.<sup>94</sup> When we study in this way, this is truly the dharma inheritance of the buddhas and the ancestors.

It was then that Dōgen not only first accepted that there was a dharma inheritance of the buddhas and ancestors but also sloughed off his past old nest.<sup>95</sup>

95 sloughed off his past old nest (jūrai no kyūka o mo datsuraku suru 從來の舊窠をも脱落する): A mixed metaphor for getting free from fixed ways of thinking. For the use of “slough off” (datsuraku 脱落), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Slough off.”

INTRODUCTION

This text was composed at Kōshōji in 1242. It occurs as number 40 in both the seventy-five-chapter and sixty-chapter compilations of the Shōbōgenzō and as number 35 in the Honzan edition.

The text takes its title from a saying by the famous Tang-dynasty Chan master Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗. Rather than launching directly into his comments on this saying, Dōgen devotes the first half of his essay to a treatment of the figure of Zhaozhou himself, as revealed in his biography and poetry. He tells here the story of Zhaozhou's encounter with his master, Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願, and goes on to praise the strict austerity of his later life as abbot of the Guanyin Cloister 觀音院, where he served till his death at the remarkable age, it is said, of 120.

Dōgen then turns to the title theme of the essay, the meaning of Zhaozhou's mysterious remark, "the cypress tree at the front of the garden," in response to the question of why Bodhidharma came to China. He goes on to discuss a second saying of Zhaozhou, that the cypress tree has the buddha nature and will become a buddha "once space falls to the ground." Dōgen's comments in this section are sometimes quite difficult to interpret and may well leave some readers asking the question with which the essay closes: "what is it?"

Zhaozhou, Great Master Zhenji, was the thirty-seventh generation from Tathāgata Śākya.<sup>1</sup> At the age of sixty-one, he first brought forth the mind [of bodhi] and, leaving home, studied the way.<sup>2</sup> At this time, he

1 Cypress Tree (hakujushi 柏樹子): Also written 栢樹子. An evergreen, native to China, used in decorative planting; traditionally thought of as a symbol of constancy and long life.

Zhaozhou, Great Master Zhenji (Jōshū Shinsai daishi 趙州眞際大師): I.e., Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 (778-897). Zhenji dashi 眞際大師 is a posthumous title. His biography appears at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:276c-278b; Song Gaoseng zhuan 宋高僧傳, T.2061.50:775c6ff; Zhaozhou Zhenji chanshi yulu bing xingzhuang 趙州眞際禪師語錄并行狀, Guzunsu yulu 古尊宿語錄, ZZ.118:304a13ff, etc.

thirty-seventh generation (dai sanjūshichi sei 第三十七世): Zhaozhou represents the fourth generation after the Sixth Ancestor of the Chinese Chan tradition, Huineng 慧能, in the lineage of Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744), Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709-788), and Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-835).

2 At the age of sixty-one, he first brought forth the mind [of bodhi] and, leaving home, studied the way (rokujiūssai ni shite hajimete hosshin shi, ie o idete gakudō su 六十一歳にしてはじめて發心し、いへをいでて學道す): The source for Dōgen's claim that Zhaozhou "left home" at the advanced age of sixty-one is unclear. The latter's biography in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:276c7-8) states that, as a youth he donned the robe and shaved his head (piti 披剃) at Hutong Cloister 扈通院, in present-day Shandong, but did not yet receive the precepts (wei nai jie 未納戒) — this would explain Nanquan's reference to him in our text as a śrāmaṇera, or "novice." His biography in the Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄 (Guzunsu yulu 古尊宿語錄, made a vow, saying, “Even if they are one hundred years old, if they are inferior to me, I will teach them; even if they are seven years old, if they are superior to me, I will inquire of them.” Vowing thus, he wandered south. As he went inquiring of the way, he reached Nanquan and paid obeisance to Reverend Yuan.<sup>3</sup>

At the time, Nanquan was in the abbot's quarters, where he had been lying down. When the Master approached, he [i.e., Nanquan] asked, “Where are you coming from?”

The Master said, “Ruixiang Cloister [‘Cloister of the Auspicious Image’].”<sup>4</sup>

Nanquan said, “And have you seen the auspicious image?”

The Master said, “I haven't seen the auspicious image, but I have seen a recumbent tathāgata.”<sup>5</sup>

Thereupon Naquan promptly arose and said, “Are you a śrāmaṇera with a master, or a śrāmaṇera without a master?”<sup>6</sup>

The Master replied, saying, “A śrāmaṇera with a master.”

ZZ.118:304a16-b10) says that he accompanied his “original master” (benshi 本師) — presumably the (unidentified) monk under whom he became a novice — to visit Nanquan (who died in 834, when Zhaozhou was 56); then, after he received the precepts (shou jie 受戒) — presumably from Nanquan — he returned to his home district in Caozhou 曹州 to visit “the master from whom he received the work” (shou ye shi 受業師) — again, no doubt, his “original master.” When his family heard that he had returned and sought to visit him, he escaped in the night and set off on his travels (bianli zhufang 遍歷諸方), always saying to himself,

七歲童兒勝我者、我即問伊。百歲老翁不及我者、我即教他。

A seven-year-old child who surpasses me, I'll inquire of him; a hundred-year-old elder who doesn't reach me, I'll teach him.

3 Nanquan (Nansen 南泉): I.e., the mountain range in present-day Anhui Prefecture.

Reverend Yuan (Gan oshō 願和尚): I.e., the Chan master Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願. The following dialogue occurs in several Chan sources; see, e.g., Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄, ZZ.118:304a17-b4; Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:276c9-13. Dōgen tells the story here in a mixture of Japanese and Chinese.

4 “Ruixiang Cloister” (Zuizō in 瑞像院): The temple on Mount Nanquan 南泉山 founded by Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願. Since the conversation would seem to be taking place in the abbot's quarters of this temple, Zhaozhou's answer might be understood as an assertion that he has been “right here.” (Such is the interpretation, e.g., at Shōbōgenzō monge 正法眼藏聞解, SCZ.5:218.)

5 “a recumbent tathāgata” (ga nyorai 臥如來): A reference, of course, to the reclining abbot.

6 “śrāmaṇera with a master” (ushu shami 有主沙彌): A śrāmaṇera is a novice, who has not taken the full precepts of the monk. The term “master” here translates the Chinese zhu 主, a term meaning “chief” or “head,” also “host” (as opposed to “guest”), “subject,” etc.; as such, the question here may imply an issue of self-understanding.

Nanquan said, “Who is your master?”

The Master said, “It is the first of spring and still cold. I trust the Reverend’s health is blessed.”<sup>7</sup>

Nanquan called the rector and said, “Assign this śrāmaṇera somewhere.”<sup>8</sup>

Thus he lodged at Nanquan and, without traveling anywhere else, pursued the way with concentrated effort for thirty years.<sup>9</sup> Without wasting an inch of shadow, he had no extraneous activities.<sup>10</sup> Eventually, after transmission of the way and reception of the work, he resided at Guanyin Cloister in Zhaozhou for another thirty years.<sup>11</sup> The circumstances of his abbacy were not like those of the usual quarters.

7 “It is the first of spring and still cold” (mō shun yū kan 孟春猶寒): Zhaozhou’s answer here is a formulaic polite salutation, of the sort that might be written by a monk to his senior; by implication, he assumes the posture of Nanquan’s student.

8 “Assign . . . somewhere” (bessho anbai 別處安排): The Chinese expression biechu 別處 (“elsewhere”), tentatively translated here simply as “somewhere,” may connote a “special place”; hence, the possible sense here “give . . . special treatment to” (as interpreted at Shōbōgenzō monge 正法眼藏聞解, SCZ.5:218). The version in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51: 276c14) has at this point simply, Nanquan respected him and permitted him to “enter the room” [i.e., become a disciple].

9 lodged (gūchoku shi 寓直し): Probably a variant of the more common gūshi 寓止; the glyph choku 直 here may be a locative marker, cognate with choku 值.

for thirty years (sanjū nen 三十年): The source of Dōgen’s claim here that Zhaozhou spent thirty years on Mount Nanquan 南泉山 before moving to Guanyin Cloister is not clear; it is usually said that he traveled widely, visiting other teachers. Dōgen’s version may be a conflation with the biography of Zhaozhou’s teacher, Nanquan 南泉, in which it is said that “he did not descend Nanquan for over thirty years” (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:257b26).

10 an inch of shadow (sun’in 寸陰): A literary expression for “a minute of time,” occurring often in Dōgen’s writings.

11 transmission of the way and reception of the work (dendō jugō 傳道受業): “Transmission of the way” typically refers to the recognition of a student’s spiritual qualifications by a teacher. The less common “reception of the work” often means “to accept the precepts,” but it may also refer to receiving instruction or transmission from a teacher.

Guanyin Cloister in Zhaozhou (Jōshū no Kannon in 趙州の觀音院): In present-day Hebei. The temple was known as Yong’an Cloister 永安院 from the Southern Song; the current name, Bailin Monastery 柏林寺, dates from the Qing dynasty.

[40:3]

嗟歎頻、一百家中無善人、來者祇道覓茶喫、不得茶嚙去又嗔。

On one occasion, he said,<sup>12</sup>

*Smoking fires: I futilely gaze on the neighborhood.
Parted from buns and dumplings last year.
Thinking of them today, I swallow my spittle in vain;
Rarely maintaining my thoughts; repeatedly sighing.
There's no good person in a hundred households.<sup>13</sup>
The ones that come say they're just looking for tea;
If they don't get their tea, they go away angry.*

[40:4]

あはれむべし、煙火まれなり、一味すくなし。雑味は前年よりあはず。一
百家人きたれば茶をもとむ、茶をもとめざるはきたらず。將來茶人は、一
百家人にあらざらん。これ見賢の雲水ありとも、思齊の龍象なからん。

What a pity. His smoking fires are few; he rarely has a single taste; he has not met a varied taste since last year.<sup>14</sup> When the people of the hundred households come, they are seeking tea; those not seeking tea do not come.<sup>15</sup> There is likely no one in the hundred households who brings him tea. There may be clouds and water that “meet someone good,” but there are likely no dragons or elephants that “think to equal him.”<sup>16</sup>

12 On one occasion, he said (aru toki iwaku 或時いはく): From the Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄, ZZ.118:333a11-13. The verse comes from Zhaozhou's Shier shi ge 十二時歌, a set of poems dedicated to the twelve times, or two-hour periods into which the day was traditionally divided. As its theme suggests, this poem is dedicated to the “meal time” (shi shi 食時), in the fifth, or “dragon,” hour (chen 辰) — i.e., 7:00-9:00 a.m.

13 Smoking fires (enka 煙火): I.e., the smoke from the neighbors' cooking fires.

good person (zennin 善人): Usually refers to a morally good person; it may also carry the connotation of a “person of good family” — i.e., a worthy lay follower (or donor).

14 single taste (ichimi 一味); varied taste (zōmi 雜味): Perhaps something like “a simple meal” and “a full-course meal” respectively.

15 people of the hundred households (ippyaku kajin 一百家人): Presumably, the villagers in the neighborhood of Zhaozhou's temple, but it is possible to read this as a metaphor for the “monks” (unsui 雲水) in the following sentence — in which case, one might also want to give a metaphorical reading to the “tea” here.

16 clouds and water (unsui 雲水): A common term for Buddhist monks, conveying the sense that they drift through the world like clouds and water.

“meet someone good” (kenken 見賢); “think to equal him” (shisai 思齊): After the common saying, quoted elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, from the Lunyu 論語 4 (KR.1h0005.002.14b):

[40:5]

あるときまたいはく、思量天下出家人、似我住持能有幾、土榻牀破蘆簾、老榆木枕全無被、尊像不燒安息香、灰裏唯聞牛糞氣。

On another occasion, he said,<sup>17</sup>

*Thinking of those who've left home in this realm,
How many could there be with an abbacy like mine?
An earthen bed with a tattered reed mat,
An old elmwood headrest with no cover at all.
At the icon, I don't burn the incense of Arsaces,
In the ashes, I just smell the odor of cow dung.*<sup>18</sup>

これらの道得をもて、院門の潔白しりぬべし、いまこの蹤跡を學習すべし。僧衆おほからず、不滿二十衆といふは、よくすることのかたきによりてなり。僧堂おほきならず、前架・後架なし。夜間は燈光あらず、冬天には炭火なし。あはれむべき老後の生涯といひぬべし。古佛の操行、それかくのごとし。

From these sayings, we can understand the purity of his cloister. We should study these traces. That his monastic assembly was not many, said to have been less than twenty, is because being able to do it is hard.<sup>19</sup>

---

When you meet someone good, think to equal him; when you meet someone not good, then look within yourself.

dragons or elephants (ryūzō 龍象): A term for superior religious practitioners found throughout Zen texts and often in Dōgen's writings. Although originally used in reference to great elephants (S. hasti-nāga), it is often interpreted as "dragons and elephants" — as suggested here in its parallel with "clouds and water."

17 On another occasion, he said (aru toki mata iwaku あるときまたいはく): From Zhaozhou yulu 趙州錄, ZZ.118:333b17-334a1. Another of the verses from Zhaozhou's Shier shi ge 十二時歌, this one dedicated to "midnight" (banye 半夜), the first hour (zi 子), 11:00 p.m.-1:00 a.m. Dōgen has omitted the opening line of the poem:

The mind and its objects, how can they ever be stopped?

18 At the icon (sonzō 尊像): I.e., the "venerated image" of a sacred Buddhist figure.

incense of Arsaces (Ansoku kō 安息香): Incense made from gum benzoin, the resin of a tree (styrax benzoin) of Southeast Asia; identified with the Indian incense guggulu. The Chinese Anxi 安息 transliterates "Arsaces," the name taken by the kings of the Arsacid empire of Parthia.

odor of cow dung (gofun ki 牛糞氣): I.e., dried dung used for fuel.

19 less than twenty (fuman nijū shu 不滿二十衆): Dōgen here slips into Chinese syntax, as if quoting a text; no source has been identified.

being able to do it is hard (yoku suru koto no kataki よくすることのかたき): A Japanese idiom likely reflecting the Chinese saying, "Knowing it is not hard; it is being able to do it that is hard" (fei zhi zhi nan, neng zhi nan ye 非知之難、能之難也).

The saṃgha hall was not large and lacked both front shelving and back shelving.<sup>20</sup> There was no lamplight at night and no charcoal fire in winter weather.<sup>21</sup> One could say it was a pitiful life for an aged one.<sup>22</sup> Such was the conduct of the Old Buddha.<sup>23</sup>

あるとき連牀のあしのおれたりけるに、燼木をなはにてゆひつけて、年月をふる。知事、つくりかへんと報ずるに、師、ゆるさざりけり。希代の勝躑なり。

Once, when the leg of the joined platform was broken, he spliced it by binding twine to a piece of burned wood [and continued to use it] for months and years.<sup>24</sup> When the stewards reported it to be replaced, the Master would not permit it.<sup>25</sup> [This incident] is an excellent vestige, rare throughout the generations.<sup>26</sup>

---

20 front shelving and back shelving (zenka goka 前架・後架): The former term refers to shelves located in the outer section of the saṃgha hall (sōdō 僧堂), used for food service; the latter refers to shelves in the lavatory behind the saṃgha hall, or by extension, to the lavatory itself. Dōgen is here drawing on the Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄, at ZZ.118:304b12:

The saṃgha hall lacked front and back shelving.

21 no lamplight at night (yakan wa tōkō arazu 夜間は燈光あらず): Dōgen is here perhaps drawing again on Zhaozhou's Shier shi ge 十二時歌 (ZZ.118:333b11-12): the verse for eventide (huang hun 黃昏), the hour of xu 戌 (7:00-9:00 p.m.), begins:

獨坐一間空暗室。陽焰燈光永不逢、眼前純是金州漆。

Sitting alone in a dark, empty room.

Long without greeting sunshine or lamplight;

Before me, it's all just the [black] lacquer of Jin.

22 a pitiful life for an aged one (awaremu beki rōgo no shōgai あはれむべき老後の生涯): Or, "the life of a pitiful aged one."

23 conduct of the Old Buddha (kobutsu no sōgyō 古佛の操行): "Conduct" here in the sense of proper behavior. The term kobutsu ("old buddha") could be plural; but, as Dōgen will point out below, Zhaozhou was known as "the old buddha." See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Old buddha."

24 joined platform (renjō 連牀): Or "continuous bench"; the structure used communally by the monks in the saṃgha hall for sitting, eating, and sleeping. Dōgen is here recounting an incident recorded in the Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄 (ZZ.118:304b12-13), where the furniture in question is called a "cord bench" (jōshō 繩床), a standard term for an individual monk's meditation platform.

25 stewards (chiji 知事): The six major officers of a Zen monastery. The story in the Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄 makes no mention of them.

26 an excellent vestige, rare throughout the generations (kidai no shōchoku 希代の勝躑): A somewhat unusual expression also appearing in the Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.3:72, no. 128). The glyph choku 躑 here is used in the sense "trace" (seki 跡).

よのつねには、解齋粥米全無粒、空對閑窓與隙塵なり。あるひは、このみ、をひろひて、僧衆もわが身も、茶飯の日用に活計す。いまの晩進、この操行を讃頌する、師の操行におよばざれども、慕古を心術とするなり。

Ordinarily,

In the breakfast gruel, there isn't any grain of rice;

I vacantly face the quiet window and the dust in the cracks.<sup>27</sup>

Or he would pick up nuts, and both he and the monks would live on them as their daily fare.<sup>28</sup> Latecomers now eulogize this conduct, and, though they do not reach the Master's conduct, they assume the attitude of admiring the ancients.

On one occasion, he addressed the assembly, saying,<sup>29</sup>

27 In the breakfast gruel, there isn't any grain of rice (gesai shuku bei zen mu ryū 解齋粥米全無粒): A quotation again from the Shier shi ge 十二時歌, the verse for dawn (pingdan 平旦), in the third period (yin 寅), 3:00 a.m.-5:00 a.m. (Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄, ZZ.118:333a5-6). Interpreters disagree on how to parse the Chinese of the first sentence here, some taking zhaizhou 齋粥 as the common compound for a monastic meal and the object of the initial jie 解 — a reading that might yield something like “dissecting the gruel” (or possibly “in the dissolved gruel.”) The translation here takes jiezhai 解齋 as a compound meaning “break the fast” (i.e., the monks' morning meal).

28 pick up nuts (konomi o hiroite このみをひろひて): The source for this information is not clear. It is possible that Dōgen is asking us to take literally the notice on a stele, recorded in the Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄 (ZZ.118:304a17), which says that, at the time of the persecution of Buddhism in the Huichang era 會昌 (841-846), Zhaozhou withdrew to Mount Julai 岨嶠山 in Shandong and continued his practice as a monk, living with “tree food and grass robes” (mokujiki sōe 木食草衣). Eating only gathered fruits and nuts is one of the standard Buddhist ascetic practices (S. dhūtāṅga).

29 On one occasion (aru toki あるとき): Although presented here as a Japanese rendering of a Chinese text, there seems to be no closely equivalent extant source for this passage. In his Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.3:26, no. 33), Dōgen cites a somewhat abbreviated version of Zhaozhou's remarks.

Zhaozhou said, “Brothers, just try investigating the principle and sitting. If, in twenty or thirty years, you haven't understood the way, take off this old monk's head and make a ladle to scoop shit and piss.”

Similar sayings (without the scatological flourish) appear in Zhaozhou's recorded sayings (Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄, ZZ.118:319a7-8) and in his notice in the Jingde chuanglu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:446b21-23), which has:

一心不生、萬法無咎。汝但究理坐看、三二十年。若不會道、截取老僧頭去。

In the thirty years I was in the south, I exclusively practiced seated meditation. If you all think to get this “prime great matter,” you should try investigating the principle and practicing seated meditation.<sup>30</sup> If, in three years, or five years, or twenty years, or thirty years, you haven’t attained the way, you can take off this old monk’s head, make it into a ladle, and scoop piss with it.

He made such a vow. Truly, pursuing the way in seated meditation is the direct path of the way of the buddhas. We should “try investigating the principle and sitting.”<sup>31</sup> Later, people said, “Zhaozhou is an old buddha.”<sup>32</sup>

[As is said in the Xin xin ming 信心銘,] “When a single thought does not arise, there’s nothing wrong with the myriad dharmas.” Just try investigating the principle and sitting. If, in twenty or thirty years, you haven’t understood the way, cut off this old monk’s head.

30 “prime great matter” (ichidan no daiji 一段の大事): From the common Zen expression ichidan daiji 一段大事 or simply ichidan ji 一段事 (“prime matter”); i.e., the most important point. The translation “prime” takes the Chinese duan 段 here as “rank”; taken simply as a counter, the expression could be read “one great matter.”

He walks and arrives where the waters end;

He sits and watches when the clouds arise.

32 “Zhaozhou is an old buddha” (Jōshū kobutsu 趙州古佛): The practice of calling Zhaozhou “an old buddha” is common in Zen texts. It is said to originate in a saying of Zhaozhou’s younger contemporary Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908) recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:268, case 283); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Old buddha.”

The Great Master was once asked by a monk, “What is the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west?”<sup>33</sup>

The Master said, “The cypress tree at the front of the garden.”

The monk said, “Reverend, don’t show a person with an object.”<sup>34</sup>

この一則公案は、趙州より起首せりといへども、必竟じて諸佛の渾身に作家しきたれるところなり、たれかこれ主人公なり。いましるべき道理は、庭前柏樹子、これ境にあらざる宗旨なり、祖師西來意、これ境にあらざる宗旨なり、柏樹子、これ自己にあらざる宗旨なり、和尚莫以境示人なるがゆえに、吾不以境示人なるがゆえに。いづれの和尚か和尚にさへられん、さへられずば、吾なるべし。いづれの吾か吾にさへられん、たとひさへらるとも、人なるべし。いづれの境か西來意に罣礙せられざらん、境はかならず西來意なるべきがゆえに。しかあれども、西來意の、境をもちて相待せるにあらず、祖師西來意、かならずしも正法眼藏涅槃妙心にあらざるなり。不是心なり、不是佛なり、不是物なり。

This one kōan, though it is said to have originated from Zhaozhou, is in the end something authored by the whole body of the buddhas.<sup>35</sup>

33 The Great Master (daishi 大師): i.e., Zhaozhou 趙州. Versions of this famous dialogue can be found in a number of sources; see, e.g., Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄 (ZZ.118:307a15-b2); Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要 (ZZ.136:666b12-14); shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:190, case 119). The question of Bodhidharma’s intention in coming to China seems to have preoccupied the monks in Zhaozhou’s community; it occurs with great frequency throughout his recorded sayings. For Zhaozhou’s answer here, See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Cypress tree at the front of the garden.”

34 “show a person with an object” (i kyō shi nin 以境示人): Or, more colloquially, “don’t use things to teach people”; the somewhat awkward translation here tries to highlight the contrast between “person” and “object” with which Dōgen seems to be playing in his comments below. “Object” here translates the Chinese jing 境, used for the objects of the senses (S. viśaya, ālambana). The English “show” here renders the Chinese si 示, which means both “to indicate” and “to instruct.” The question of what a master uses “to teach people” (shi ren 示人) is a common topic of conversation in Zen texts and occurs several times in Zhaozhou’s recorded sayings. One instance is particularly close to ours here and may have influenced Dōgen’s commentary; see below, Note 47.

35 originated (kishu seri 起首せり): Literally, “raised its head”; the corporeal image is likely meant to work with the subsequent “whole body.”

authored by the whole body of the buddhas (shobutsu no konjin ni sakke shikitareru 諸佛の渾身に作家しきたれる): The term konjin (or konshin) 渾身 (“whole body”) appears very often in the Shōbōgenzō in the sense of the entirety of something; here, it can probably be understood either as the buddhas taken as a “body” or as the “body” that all buddhas share. The phrase sakke shikitareru 作家しきたれる, translated here as

Who is the one in charge?<sup>36</sup> The principle we should understand here is the essential point that “the cypress at the front of the garden” is not an “object,” the essential point that “the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west” is not an “object,” the essential point that “the cypress tree” is not the self; for [it is said], “Reverend, don’t show a person with an object”; for [it is said,] “I don’t show a person with an object.” Which “Reverend” is impeded by “Reverend”? If he is not impeded, he must be “I.” Which “I” is impeded by “I”? Even if it is impeded, it must be “a person.” Which “object” is not obstructed by the “intention in coming from the west”?<sup>37</sup> For the “object” must inevitably be the “intention in coming from the west.” Nevertheless, the “intention in coming from the west” is not dependent on the “object.” “The intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west” is not necessarily “the treasury of the true dharma eye, the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa.”<sup>38</sup> It is “not the mind”; it is “not the buddha”; it is “not a thing.”<sup>39</sup>

“authored,” represents an unusual verbal form derived from the Chinese zuojia 作家, indicating an author or poet and, in Zen usage, an accomplished master.

36 Who is the one in charge? (tare ka kore shujinkō nari たれかこれ主人公なり): Taking nari なり as naran ならん. The Chinese term zhurengong 主人公, translated rather casually here as “the one in charge,” is a colloquial expression for the “proprietor,” the “head,” the “host,” the “subject,” etc.; commonly used in Zen texts for the true self. Here, the question would seem to be asking about the true creator of “this one kōan,” or, more broadly, the true nature of Zhaozhou. This is the only occurrence of the term in the Shōbōgenzō; its use here may reflect Nanquan’s question, above, “Are you a śrāmaṇera with a master” (shu 主), as well as, more importantly, dialogues found in Zhaozhou’s recorded sayings, in which he is himself asked about “who is in charge” of him. See, e.g., Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄 (ZZ.118:308b5):

問、如何是趙州主人公。師云、田庫奴。

Someone asked, “Who’s in charge of Zhaozhou?”

The Master answered, “A field hand.”

37 impeded (saeraren さへられん); obstructed (keige sera[rū] 罣礙せら[る]): Probably to be taken in the sense, “identified,” “defined”; a common usage in Dōgen’s writings.

38 “the treasury of the true dharma eye, the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa” (shōbōgenzō nehan myōshin 正法眼藏涅槃妙心): The essence of the Buddha’s awakening, traditionally said to have first been transmitted from Śākyamuni to Mahākāśyapa on Vulture Peak; what Bodhidharma is said to have brought to China. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Treasury of the true dharma eye.”

39 “not the mind” (fu ze shin 不是心); “not the buddha” (fu ze butsu 不是佛); “not a thing” (fu ze motsu 不是物): Words attributed both to Mazu Daoyi (e.g. at Jingde chuangdeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:445ba7) and to Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願. The latter attribution, since the context involves Zhaozhou, may be the more relevant here: it occurs in the following passage in Nanquan’s notice in the Jingde chuangdeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2067:51.257c13-15; quoted by Dōgen in the Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄, DZZ.4:192):

いま如何是祖師西來意と道取せるは、問取のみにあらず、兩人同得見のみにあざるなり。正當恁麼問時は、一人也未可相見なり、自己也能得幾なり。さらに道取するに、渠無不是なり。このゆえに錯錯なり、錯錯なるがゆえに將錯就錯なり。承虛接響にあらざらんや。

[The monk's] saying here, “What is the intention of the Ancestral Master's coming from the west?” is not merely a question; it is not merely that “both people can see the same.”<sup>40</sup> At the very time he asks, it is, he cannot see anyone; it is, how much of himself can he get?<sup>41</sup> Going further, [we can say,] he is without fault. Therefore, it is “mistake, mistake.”<sup>42</sup> Because it is mistake, mistake, it is making a mistake of a mistake.<sup>43</sup> Is this not to accept the hollow and entertain the echo?<sup>44</sup>

師有時云、江西馬祖説即心即佛。王老師不恁麼道。不是心、不是佛、不是物。恁麼道、還有過麼。趙州禮拜而出。

The Master on one occasion said, “Mazu of Jiangxi teaches, ‘This mind itself is the buddha.’ This old master Wang [i.e., Nanquan] doesn’t talk like this. It isn’t mind; it isn’t buddha; it isn’t a thing. Is there any mistake in talking like this?”

Zhaozhou bowed and left.

40 “both people can see the same” (ryōnin dō tokuken 兩人同得見): Likely meaning that the monk and Zhaozhou share the same view. The Chinese phrase comes from a verse attributed to the eighteenth Zen ancestor, Gayaśata 伽耶舍多, on which Dōgen comments in his “Shōbōgenzō kokyō” 正法眼藏古鏡 (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:212b18-19):

諸佛大圓鑑、内外無瑕翳、兩人同得見、心眼皆相似。

The great round mirror of the buddhas,

Without flaw or blur inside or out.

Both people can see the same.

Mind and eye, all alike.

41 he cannot see anyone (ichinin ya mi ka shōken 一人也未可相見); how much of himself can he get? (jiko ya nō toku ki 自己也能得幾): Dōgen slips again into Chinese syntax for these somewhat mysterious remarks, which are generally interpreted to mean that, when the monk asks the question, there is no one to whom it is addressed and no one who is asking it. Though it is possible to read this passage as a criticism of the monk, most interpreters take it as an affirmation of his understanding.

42 “mistake, mistake” (shaku shaku 錯錯): A common retort of Zen masters, sometimes used in ironic praise—which, given the context, seems the most likely interpretation here. Some readers take the expression to mean that the monk makes one “mistake” after another; others suggest that both the monk and Zhaozhou make the “mistakes.”

44 to accept the hollow and entertain the echo (shōkyō [or shōko] sekkyō 承虛接響): A Chinese idiomatic expression meaning something like “to take seriously what is vacuous.” Though the connotation is negative, most interpreters take it in a positive sense here.

[40:14] {1:440}

Because “the all-pervading spiritual root turns neither toward nor away,” it is “the cypress tree at the front of the garden”: if it is not an “object,” it cannot be a cypress tree; even if it is an object, it is [said,] “I don’t show a person with an object,” and “Reverend Preceptor, don’t show a person with an object.”<sup>45</sup> It is not an old ancestral shrine.<sup>46</sup> Since it is not an old ancestral shrine, he goes on burying.<sup>47</sup> Since he goes on

45 “the all-pervading spiritual root turns neither toward nor away” (kattatsu reikon mu kōhai 豁達靈根無向背): Or “the all-pervading spiritual root has neither front nor back.” After a line from the Caoan ge 草庵歌, by the Tang-dynasty master Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (700-790); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Reverend Shitou’s Song of the Thatched Hut.” The point here would seem to be that Zhaozhou’s “cypress tree,” like Shitou’s “root,” is neither affirmed nor denied in its identity as an “object.”

46 It is not an old ancestral shrine (koshi ni arazu 古祠にあらず): The rationale for this seeming non sequitur is not clear. Some interpreters have speculated that it is an allusion to the cypress trees traditionally planted at ancestral shrines in symbolic expression of eternal life; hence, the point is presumably that Zhaozhou’s cypress is not eternal.

47 he goes on burying (maimotsu [or maibotsu] shimoteyuku 埋没しもてゆく): Or perhaps “it goes on burying (or being buried)”; the grammatical subject is unexpressed. Some interpreters take this to mean that Zhaozhou’s cypress tree is continually “dying” (and “being reborn”) in each moment. More likely, the reference is to Zhaozhou’s teaching. Chan masters sometimes use the Chinese compound maimei 埋没 as a transitive verb to deny or dismiss someone. The translation here is based on such use, as seen in Zhaozhou’s recorded sayings: e.g., Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄, ZZ.118:315B12-15:

[A monk] asked, “When the buddhas and ancestors were alive, the buddhas and ancestors transmitted [the dharma]. After the extinction of the buddhas and ancestors, who transmits it?”

The Master said, “All of past and present is this old monk’s lot.”

The student said, “So what do you transmit?”

The Master said, “Everyone is included in birth and death.”

[The student] said, “You shouldn’t bury the ancestral masters.”

The Master said, “So what do they transmit?”

Or, again, at ZZ.118:323a2-5:

師有時屈指云、老僧喚作拳、爾諸人喚作什麼。僧云、和尚何得將境示人。師云、我不將境示人。若將境示闍黎、即埋沒闍黎去也。云、爭奈者箇何。師便珍重。

The Master once clenched his fingers and said, “This old monk calls it a fist. What do you all call it?”

burying, it is return my concentrated effort.<sup>48</sup> Since it is return my concentrated effort, it is “I don’t show a person with an object.” Then what else does he use to “show a person”? It must be “I’m also like this.”<sup>49</sup>

A monk said, “Reverend, how can you use an object to teach people?”

The Master said, “I don’t use an object to teach people. If I used an object to teach you, Acārya, it would bury the Acārya.”

[The monk] said, “Then what about that?”

The Master bid them farewell [and left].

If these passages are influencing Dōgen’s remarks here, his point might be, at least in part, that Zhaozhou’s cypress tree is not a memorial to Chan ancestor Bodhidharma but what he is using to “bury” (i.e., teach) people.

48 return my concentrated effort (gen go kufū rai 還吾功夫來): Or “give me back my concentrated effort.” The Chinese imperative construction here, huan wu . . . lai 還吾 . . . 來 (“give me back . . .”), is a fairly common challenge in Chan texts; Dōgen uses it (or the closely similar gen ga . . . rai 還我 . . . 來) several times in the Shōbōgenzō.

50 The Great Master (daishi 大師): I.e., Zhaozhou 趙州. A dialogue found in the Zhaozhou yulu 趙州語錄 (ZZ.118:321b14-16) and elsewhere.

51 “Wait till empty space falls on the ground” (tai kokū rakuchi 待虚空落地): Or “once empty space falls to earth.” Dōgen will play below on the predicate tai 待 (“to wait for,” “to depend on”).

We should not listen to the saying of the Great Master here and discard the question of this monk. The Great Master's words, "Wait till empty space falls on the ground," or "Wait till the cypress attains buddhahood," are not mutually dependent sayings.<sup>52</sup> They are questioning "the cypress," questioning "the buddha nature"; they are questioning "attaining buddhahood," questioning the time ["when"]; they are questioning "empty space," questioning "falling on the ground."

In the great master's speaking to the monk here, when he says, "It does," he means the "existence of the buddha nature of the cypress."<sup>53</sup> Penetrating these words, we should penetrate the vital artery of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>54</sup> That the cypress tree has the buddha nature usually cannot be said, has never been said. It has the buddha nature; so we should clarify its state. It has the buddha nature; how about the level of its ground and stage?<sup>55</sup> We should inquire into its lifespan and physical dimensions; we should ask about its family and clan.<sup>56</sup> Further, in a hun-

52 mutually dependent sayings (gosō no sōtai naru dōtoku 互相の相待なる道得): The translation masks Dōgen's play with the term tai 待 ("to wait for") in sōtai 相待 ("dependent").

53 "existence of the buddha nature of the cypress" (hakuju busshō u 柏樹佛性有): A tentative translation of an ambiguous phrase. The English loses Dōgen's play here with the graph u 有 ("to have," "to be"), translated as "it does" in Zhaozhou's answer. Readers differ on how to parse this phrase; some would read it, "the buddha nature of the cypress is existence"; others suggest, "the cypress is the buddha nature, is existence."

54 the vital artery of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no meimyaku 佛祖の命脈): The term meimyaku 命脈 ("vital artery") occurs often in the Shōbōgenzō, in the senses both of the "lifeblood" and the "bloodline" (especially of the lineage of the buddhas and ancestors).

55 ground and stage (chii 地位): Also read jii. Or simply "position." The clumsy translation here seeks to preserve Dōgen's pun, to which he will return below, on the "grounds" (ji 地; S. bhūmi) and "stages" (i 位; S. avasthā, etc.) of the bodhisattva path leading to buddhahood.

56 family and clan (shushō ruizoku 種姓・類族): The compound ruizoku, translated here as "clan," may refer to a range of groupings, from familial "relatives" or larger sodred thousand cypress trees, are they all of the same family, or are they of distinct familial lines? Should there be cypress trees that attain buddhahood? Cypress trees that practice? Cypress trees that bring forth the mind [of bodhi]? Does the cypress tree, although it attains buddhahood, not fulfill practice and bringing forth the mind? What are the causes and conditions between the cypress tree and empty space? Does the fact that the cypress tree's attaining buddhahood is definitely wait till you fall on the ground mean that the cypress tree's virtue as a tree is necessarily space?<sup>57</sup> Regarding the ground and stage of the cypress tree: is empty space the first ground? Is it the fruit stage?<sup>58</sup> We should make concentrated effort to study this in detail. I ask you, old man Zhaozhou, "Did you convey such business because you are yourself one dead cypress tree?"<sup>59</sup>

In sum, that the cypress tree has the buddha nature is not in the realm of the other paths or the two vehicles, is not seen or heard by the sūtra masters or treatise masters.<sup>60</sup> How much less is it proclaimed in the word cial units (such as a "people") to more abstract "types." "Family" (shushō 種姓) may be intended to evoke the common notion that the bodhisattva aiming to become a buddha belongs to the "family" (shō 姓; S. gotra) of the buddha. Here and in the following sentences, Dōgen is raising the common Buddhist question of what it means to claim that insentient beings can become buddhas.

57 wait till you fall on the ground (tai ni raku chi ji 待爾落地時): Dōgen has here playfully substituted the pronoun "you" (ni 爾) for "space" in Zhaozhou's words.

58 the first ground (shoji 初地); the fruit stage (kai 果位): I.e., the first of the ten "grounds" (S. bhūmi) of the bodhisattva's practice, and the final effect of that practice, buddhahood, known as the "fruit" (S. phala) stage. Dōgen is playing here with the terms "space" and "ground," "tree" and "fruit."

59 "convey such business" (inmo no kakkei o shōsoku seru 恁麼の活計を消息せる): A loose translation. Kakkei 活計 typically refers to one's "livelihood," "way of life," etc.; often applied to the Zen master's activities. Shōsoku 消息 is a noun meaning "news," "circumstances," etc.; here put in a verbal form.

60 other paths or the two vehicles (gedō nijō 外道二乘): I.e., those of non-Buddhist religions (S. tīrthika) and those of non-Mahāyāna traditions of Buddhism; a common pejorative in Dōgen's writing.

sūtra masters or treatise masters (kyōshi ronshi 經師・論師): I.e., specialists in the interpretation of the sūtras and treatises; scholastics. Another pejorative term commonly found in Dōgen's works.

flowers of dried-up trees and dead ashes.<sup>61</sup> Only a type like Zhaozhou studies and investigates it. Zhaozhou's saying here that the cypress has the buddha nature is [asking], "Is the cypress obstructed by the cypress or not?"<sup>62</sup> "Is the buddha nature obstructed by the buddha nature or not?" This saying is something not yet exhaustively investigated by one buddha or two buddhas. Even those with the face of a buddha are not necessarily able exhaustively to investigate this saying. Even among the buddhas, there will be buddhas who can say it and buddhas who cannot say it.

いはゆる待虚空落地は、あるべからざることをいふにあらず、柏樹子の成佛する毎度に、虚空落地するなり。その落地響かくれざるごと、百千の雷よりもすぎたり。柏樹成佛の時は、しばらく十二時中なれども、さらに十三時中なり。その落地の虚空は、凡聖所見の虚空のみにあらず、このほかに一片の虚空あり、餘人所不見なり、趙州一箇見なり。虚空のおつところの地、また凡聖所領の地にあらず、さらに一片の地あり、陰陽所不到なり、趙州一箇到なり。虚空落地の時節、たとひ日月山河なりとも、待なるべし。たれか道取する、佛性かならず成佛すべし、と。佛性は成佛以後の莊嚴なり、さらに成佛と同生同參する佛性もあるべし。

[The phrase] "Wait till empty space falls on the ground" is not saying something that could not be the case: every time the cypress tree attains buddhahood, empty space falls on the ground. The sound of its falling on the ground is not hidden: it exceeds a hundred thousand claps of thunder. The time when "the cypress attains buddhahood," while for the time being is within the twelve times, is further within thirteen times.<sup>63</sup> The empty space that falls on the ground is not just the empty space seen by

61 word flowers of dried-up trees and dead ashes (koboku shikai no gonka 枯木死灰の言華): "Dried-up trees and dead ashes" is a common Zen expression, used most often in a pejorative sense, for the mind in trance; here, no doubt, practitioners or advocates of contemplative trance. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Dried-up tree." "Word flowers" (gonka 言華) is an unusual term, perhaps coined after the common Buddhist expression "sky flowers" (kūge 空華), the illusory "spots" or "stars," as we might say, seen by defective eyes; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Clouded eyes and sky flowers." Dōgen is here no doubt playing with the wood and flowers of Zhaozhou's tree (ignoring the fact that the cypress does not flower).

62 "Is the cypress obstructed by the cypress or not" (hakuju hi hakuju ge ya mu 柏樹被柏樹礙也無): This and the following clause are rendered in Chinese syntax. The idiosyncratic usage of "obstructed" here follows that seen above, Note 37.

63 while for the time being is within the twelve times, is further within thirteen times (shibaraku jūni ji chū naredomo, sara ni jūsan ji chū nari しばらく十二時中なれども、さらに十三時中なり): Generally taken to mean that the buddhahood of the cypress occurs both within and beyond time. For the twelve times, see above, Note 12. Some versions of the text give the second clause here as the puzzling sara ni jūni ji chū nari さらに十二時中なり: "is further within the twelve times."

common people and sages: there is an additional piece of empty space; it is “something not seen by others”; it is, Zhaozhou alone sees it.<sup>64</sup> The ground where empty space falls is also not the ground occupied by commoners and sages: there is a further piece of ground; it is something not reached by shade or sunlight; it is, Zhaozhou alone reaches it.<sup>65</sup> At the time empty space falls on the ground, even the sun and moon, mountains and rivers, must be “waiting.”<sup>66</sup> Who says that the buddha nature necessarily attains buddhahood? The buddha nature is an adornment after one attains buddhahood; further, there must be a buddha nature that is born together and studies together with attaining buddhahood.

Therefore, the cypress and the buddha nature are not different notes with the same tune.<sup>67</sup> What we say is, since it is why necessarily so? we should investigate it [by asking,] “what about it?”<sup>68</sup>

64 common people and sages (bonshō 凡聖): A standard Buddhist expression for ordinary humans (S. prthagjana, “born apart”) and advanced Buddhist adepts (S. ārya, “nobles”), respectively.

菩薩於淨身、皆見世所有。唯獨自明了、餘人所不見。

The bodhisattva, in his pure body,

Sees all things in the world.

Only he alone comprehends this;

It is something not seen by others.

65 a further piece of ground; it is something not reached by shade or sunlight (sara ni ippen no chi ari, onyō [or inyō] sho futō nari さらに一片の地あり、陰陽所不到なり): Allusion to the well-known tale of the seven wise maidens (see, e.g., Zongmen liandeng huiyao 宗門聯燈會要, ZZ.136:444a8-16), who ask the god Śakra for “a piece of ground without shade or sunlight.” Dōgen invokes this tale elsewhere: e.g., in his “Shōbōgenzō muchū setsu mu” 正法眼藏夢中説夢 (DZZ.1:297) and Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.3:42-44, no. 64).

66 even the sun and moon, mountains and rivers, must be “waiting” (tatōi jitsugetsu [or nichigatsu] senga nari tomo, tai naru beshi たとひ日月山河なりとも、待なるべし): Generally taken to mean that everything in the world occurs at the time that space falls on the ground. Dōgen is here playing with the predicate tai 待 (“to wait”) from Zhaozhou’s statement, “wait till space falls on the ground.”

67 not different notes with the same tune (ion dōchō ni arazu 異音同調にあらず): Usually interpreted to mean that the cypress and the buddha nature are neither different nor the same.

68 since it is why necessarily so? we should investigate it [by asking,] “what about it?” (kahitsu naru ni, somosan to sankyū su beshi 何必なるに、作麼生と參究すべし): A tentative translation of a rather odd sentence. The antecedent of “it” here is not clear;

presumably the buddha nature of the cypress or the relationship between the two terms. ### INTRODUCTION

This text was composed on 17 August 1243, soon after Dōgen's move from Kōshōji, his monastery near the capital, to the domain of his samurai patron Hatano Yoshishige 波多野義重 in Echizen (modern Fukui). The work occurs as number 41 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō, number 32 in the sixty-chapter compilation, and number 47 in the Honzan edition.

The “three realms” of the title is standard Buddhist nomenclature for the threefold world system of saṃsāra: the realm of desire (S. kāma-dhātu), the realm of form (S. rūpa-dhātu), and the realm of formlessness (S. ārūpya-dhātu). The identification of these realms with the mind is often associated especially with the Yogācāra and Chinese Huayan schools of Buddhist thought, but versions of the expression, “the three realms are only mind,” are found throughout Buddhist literature, including the sayings of the Zen masters.

In his essay, Dōgen comments on three passages on the “three realms” attributed to Buddha Śākyamuni. The first identifies mind, buddha and living beings; the second claims the three realms as the property of the Buddha and living beings as his children; the third warns against the non-Buddhist view that there is a realm of living beings outside the three realms. The essay closes with comments on a conversation on the three realms between the ninth-century Chan master Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 and his disciple Lohan Guichen 羅漢桂琛.

The Three Realms Are Only Mind

釋迦大師道、三界唯一心、心外無別法。心・佛及衆生、是三無差別。

Great Master Śākya said,<sup>1</sup>The three realms are only one mind;Outside the mind, there's no other dharma.The mind, the buddha, and living beings —These three are without distinction.

[41:2]

一句の道著は、一代の擧力なり、一代の擧力は盡力の全擧なり。たとひ強爲の爲なりとも、云爲の爲なるべし。このゆえに、いま如來道の三界唯心は、全如來の全現成なり。全一代は全一句なり。三界は全界なり、三界はすなはち心といふにあらず。そのゆえは、三界はいく玲瓏八面も、なほ三界なり。三界にあらざらんと誤錯すといふとも、総不著なり。内外中間、初中後際、みな三界なり。三界は、三界の所見のごとし。界にあらざるものの所見は、三界を見不正なり。三界には三界の所見を舊窠とし、三界の所見を新條とす。舊窠也三界見、新條也三界見なり。このゆえに、

His single saying is all the efforts of a single lifetime; all the efforts of a single lifetime are the whole of his exhaustive efforts. While it may 1 Great Master Śākya (Shaka daishi 釋迦大師): i.e., Buddha Śākyamuni, here given the honorific title of a Zen master. The four-line saying attributed to him here, while quoted elsewhere in Chinese and Japanese texts, is not so common in the Chinese Buddhist literature. Though traditionally held to be a passage from the Avatamsaka-sūtra (Huayan jing 華嚴經), it is in fact assembled from disparate sources. The first line reflects the language of the Śikṣānanda translation of the Huayan jing 華嚴經 (T.279.10:194a14):

What exists in the three realms is only the one mind.

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “The three realms are only mind.” The second line is not in a sūtra but occurs frequently in Chinese treatises and commentaries. The third and fourth lines are taken verbatim from the Buddhahadra translation of the Huayan jing 華嚴經 (T.278.9:465c29). For “the three realms” (sangai 三界), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Three realms.”

be an act of deliberate action, it must be an act of speaking and acting.<sup>2</sup> Therefore, the “three realms are only mind” spoken of by the Tathāgata is the whole manifestation of the whole Tathāgata; the whole of his single lifetime is the whole of his single line.<sup>3</sup> “The three realms” are the whole realm; he is not saying “the three realms” are [merely] the mind. The reason is that, on any of their eight sides, crystal clear, “the three realms” are still the three realms.<sup>4</sup> While one might mistakenly hold that they are not the three realms, that is completely untenable. The inside, outside, and in between, the beginning, middle, and end — all are “the three realms.” “The three realms” are as the three realms are seen.<sup>5</sup> Seen as not being the three realms is the three realms seen incorrectly. In the three realms, the three realms seen are taken as an old den, or the three realms seen are taken as a new item.<sup>6</sup> “Old den” is a seeing of the three realms; “new item” is a seeing of the three realms. Therefore,

Great Master Śākya said, “Not as the three realms do I see the three realms.”<sup>7</sup>

2 it must be an act of speaking and acting (un'i no i naru beshi 云爲の爲なるべし): A usage, seen elsewhere in Dōgen's writing, that contrasts gōi 強爲 (translated here “deliberate action”) and un'i 云爲 (“words and acts”); the former suggests intentional, premeditated action, while the latter seems to be used for behavior that comes naturally.

3 the whole manifestation of the whole Tathāgata (zen nyorai no zengenjō 全如來の全現成): Or “the whole manifestation of all tathāgatas.” Similarly, the following “the three realms are the whole realm” could be read “the three realms are all the worlds.” The translations here aim to preserve Dōgen's repeated use of the word zen 全 (“whole”) throughout this passage.

4 any of their eight sides, crystal clear (iku reirō hachimen mo いく玲瓏八面も): From the saying, “all eight sides are crystal clear” (hachimen reirō 八面玲瓏); i.e., perfectly clear in all the eight cardinal and ordinal directions. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Crystal clear on all eight sides.”

5 “The three realms” are as the three realms are seen (sangai wa, sangai no shoken no gotoshi 三界は、三界の所見のごとし): Likely an allusion to the sentence from the Lotus Sūtra that Dōgen quotes in the next section: “Not as the three realms do I see the three realms.”

6 old den (kyūka 舊窠): A standard metaphor for old, habitual ways of thinking, “tired” concepts or clichés.

7 Great Master Śākya (Shaka daishi 釋迦大師): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:42c13-15):

如來如實知見三界之相。無有生死若退若出。亦無在世及滅度者。非實非虛非如非異。不如三界見於三界。

The Tathāgata views the marks of the three realms as they really are. There is no birth or death, no withdrawal or emergence; again, there is no remaining in the world nor passing to extinction. It is neither real nor vacuous, neither similar nor different. Not as the three realms do I see the three realms.

What is seen here is precisely the three realms; these three realms are as they are seen. The three realms are not original being; the three realms are not present being; the three realms are not a new item; the three realms are not arisen from causes and conditions; the three realms are not in the beginning, middle, or end.<sup>8</sup> There is “departing the three realms”; there is “now, these three realms.”<sup>9</sup> This is workings meeting workings; it is entanglements growing entanglements.<sup>10</sup> “Now, these three realms” are what is seen by the three realms. “What is seen” is “Not as the three realms do I see the three realms” (fu nyo sangai, ken o sangai 不如三界、見於三界): i.e., I do not view the three realms in the way that [the foolish commoners (S. bāla-prthagjana)] in the three realms view them. Some have wanted to read this line “there is nothing like [i.e., so good as] the three realms seeing the three realms.”

8 original being (hon'u 本有); present being (kon'u 今有): A common set, as in the verse of the Nirvāṇa Sūtra (Da banniepan jing 大般涅槃經, T.374.12:422c15-16):

本有今無、本無今有、三世有法、無有是處。

Originally existent, now nonexistent,

Originally nonexistent, now existent:

For the dharmas of the three times,

There is no such thing.

9 “departing the three realms” (shutsuri sangai 出離三界); “now, these three realms” (kon shi sangai 今此三界): The latter phrase is the first line of the verse from the Lotus Sūtra that Dōgen will quote in the next section; the former phrase (which might also be read “the three realms departed”) is a common expression throughout Buddhist literature, no doubt inspired here by the lines of the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:14c24-25) just preceding that first line of verse:

如來已離、三界火宅、寂然閑居、安處林野。

The Tathāgata has already departed

The burning house of the three realms

And dwells quietly at leisure,

Safely residing in forest and field.

For the parable that informs these lines, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Burning house.”

10 workings meeting workings (kikan no, kikan to shōken suru 機關の、機關と相見する); entanglements growing entanglements (kattō no, kattō o shōchō suru 葛藤の、葛藤を生長する): The antecedent of the grammatical subject, “this” (kore これ) is perhaps best taken as the two phrases of the preceding sentence: “departing the three realms” and “now these three realms” — i.e., the two aspects or views (transcendent and immanent, respectively) of the three realms. For the term “entanglements” (kattō 葛藤), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Tangled vines.”

“seeing the three realms”; “seeing the three realms” is realizing the three realms, is the realization of the three realms, is the realized kōan.<sup>11</sup> To turn the three realms into bringing forth the mind [of bodhi], practice, bodhi, and nirvāṇa — this is “all my property.”<sup>12</sup> Therefore,

釋迦大師道、今此三界、皆是我有、其中衆生、悉是吾子。

Great Master Śākya said,<sup>13</sup>

Now, these three realms
Are all my property,
And the living beings within them
Are all my children.

いまこの三界は、如來の我有なるがゆえに、盡界みな三界なり、三界は盡界なるがゆえに。今此は、過・現・當來なり、過・現・當來の現成は、今此を罣礙せざるなり、今此の現成は、過・現・當來を罣礙するなり。

Since “now these three realms” are “my property” of the Tathāgata, all the worlds are “the three realms”; for “the three realms” are all the worlds.<sup>14</sup> “Now these” is past, present, and future. The realization of 11 “What is seen” is “seeing the three realms” (iwayuru shoken wa, ken o sangai nari いはゆる所見は、見於三界なり): I.e., what is seen as the three realms is what the Buddha refers to in the line, “Not as the three realms do I see the three realms” (ken o sangai 見於三界).

“seeing the three realms” is realizing the three realms (ken o sangai wa, genjō sangai nari 見於三界は、見成三界なり): The translation loses the play on the glyph ken 見 (“to see”) in genjō 見成 (“to realize, or manifest,” otherwise written genjō 現成).

realized kōan (genjō kōan 見成公案): Or “settled case.” A Dōgen favorite, the title theme of one of the most celebrated chapters of his Shōbōgenzō; see Supplementary Notes.

12 this is “all my property” (kai ze ga u 皆是我有): Anticipating the words of the Buddha quoted in the immediately following section.

13 Great Master Śākya (Shaku daishi 釋迦大師): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:14c26), in a passage in which the Buddha likens himself to a father who saves his children from their burning house. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Burning house.”

14 “now these three realms” are “my property” of the Tathāgata (ima kono sangai wa, nyorai no ga u naru いまこの三界は、如來の我有なる): Dōgen here translates the first line of the Buddha’s verse into Japanese. The awkward “‘my property’ of the Tathāgata” seeks to preserve something of Dōgen’s use of the expression ga u 我有 (“belongs to me,” “mine”), but the English loses the important additional meaning, “my being,” “my existence,” with which Dōgen is playing here.

for “the three realms” are all the worlds (sangai wa jinkai naru ga yue ni 三界は盡界なるがゆえに): The translation of this non sequitur follows Kawamura’s punctuation. The clause could also be read with the following sentence, yielding, “Since ‘now these past, present, and future does not obstruct “now these”; the realization of “now these” obstructs past, present, and future.<sup>15</sup>

我有は、盡十方界眞實人體なり、盡十方界沙門一隻眼なり。衆生は、盡十方界眞實體なり、一一衆生の生衆なるゆえに衆生なり。

“My property” is “all the worlds in the ten directions are the true human body”; it is “all the worlds in the ten directions are the single eye of the śramaṇa.”<sup>16</sup> “The living beings” are the true body of all the worlds in the ten directions. Because each of the living beings is multiple lives, they are “living beings.”<sup>17</sup>

three realms’ are ‘my property’ of the Tathāgata, all the worlds are ‘the three realms.’ Since ‘the three realms’ are all the worlds, ‘now these’ is past, present, and future.”

15 the realization of “now these” obstructs past, present, and future (kon shi no genjō wa, ka gen tōrai o keige suru nari 今此の現成は、過・現・當來を罣礙するなり): Probably meaning that past, present, and future are defined by, or delimited by, “now these” (rather than vice versa).

16 “My property” is “all the worlds in the ten directions are the true human body” (ga u wa, jin jippō kai shinjitsu nintai nari 我有は、盡十方界眞實人體なり): I.e., the term “my property” (or “my being”) here is equivalent to “the true human body” in the saying, quoted several times by Dōgen, attributed to Xuansha Shibeī 玄沙師備 (835-908). Found at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:196, case 131; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “True human body.”

17 Because each of the living beings is multiple lives, they are “living beings” (ichiichi shujō no shōshu naru yue ni shujō nari 一一衆生の生衆なるゆえに衆生なり): A play with the term shujō 衆生 that is lost in translation. The term, usually translated “living beings” or “sentient beings,” is composed of the plural marker shu 衆 plus shō 生, “living being,” “life,” “birth,” etc. Dōgen reverses the two elements to create the neologism shōshu 生衆, suggesting “a group of lives,” “a multitude of living beings,” etc.

“Are all my children” is the principle, children, “the manifestation of the full function.”<sup>18</sup> Nevertheless, that “my children” do not damage or diminish “the bodies, hair, and skin” always received from their compassionate father is taken as the realization of “children.”<sup>19</sup> In the present case, it is not that the father is before and the child after, nor that the child is before and the father after; it is not that father and child are lined up side by side — this is called the principle of “my children.” It is not that they are given to them, but they “receive” them; it is not that they are snatched away from them, but they have “received” them.<sup>20</sup>

They have no mark of coming or going; they are not measured by large or small; they are not an issue of old or young; we should maintain old and young as the old and young of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>21</sup> There

18 children, “the manifestation of the full function” (shi ya zenki gen 子也全機現): Variation on a verse comment by Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤 (1063–1135) on a saying of Daowu Yuanzhi 道吾圓智 (769–835). When Daowu was asked at a funeral whether what was in the coffin was alive or dead, he said, “Alive, I don’t say; dead, I don’t say.” On this Yuanwu commented,

生也全機現、死也全機現。

Alive, the manifestation of the full function;

Dead, the manifestation of the full function.

For the funeral story and Yuanwu’s verse comment, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Manifestation of the full function.”

身體髮膚，受之父母，不敢毀傷，孝之始也。

Our bodies, hair, and skin are received from our parents; we dare not damage or wound them. This is the beginning of filial piety.

20 It is not that they are given to them, but they “receive” them (yoju ni arazare-domo, kore o uku 與授にあらざれども、これをうく): I.e., “it is not that the ‘bodies, hair, and skin’ are given to ‘my children,’ but ‘my children’ do ‘receive’ them from their compassionate father.”

21 They have no mark of coming or going (korai no sō arazu 去來の相あらず): The unexpressed grammatical subject throughout this sentence is taken as “the father and his children.”

There are fathers and children in which father and child are born and appear at the same time; there are fathers and children in which father and child manifest extinction at the same time; there are fathers and children in which father and child do not appear at the same time; there are fathers and children in which father and child do not manifest extinction at the same time.<sup>24</sup> Although they do not obstruct the compassionate father, they have manifest "my children"; without obstructing "my children," the compassionate father manifests.<sup>25</sup> There are "living beings" with minds; there are "living beings" with no minds; there are "my children" with minds; there are "my children" with no minds. In this way, whether "my children" or "we children" — all are worthy successors of the compassionate father Śākya.<sup>26</sup> All beings of past, present, and future throughout all the worlds in the ten directions are the buddhas of past, べし); This could be understood either as "we should take 'old and young' here as similar to their use in reference to the buddhas and ancestors," or as "we should treat 'old and young' as they are understood by the buddhas and ancestors."

22 There are cases where the father is young and the child old (fu shō shi rō ari 父子老あり); Dōgen may have in mind here the passage in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:42a11-14) in which Śākyamuni's claim to have trained myriad bodhisattvas is likened to a young man claiming to have fathered a child of one hundred.

24 father and child manifest extinction at the same time (fushi dōji ni genmetsu suru 父子同時に現滅する); I.e., the two enter nirvāṇa simultaneously.

25 Although they do not obstruct the compassionate father, they have manifest "my children" (jifu o keige sezaedomo, goshi o genjō seri 慈父を罣礙せざれども、吾子を現成せり); Perhaps meaning that being the child of the buddha does not interfere with being the parent buddha. Some texts read here goshi to genjō seri 吾子と現成せり ("they have manifest as my children").

26 whether "my children" or "we children" (goshi shigo 吾子・子吾): "We children" is an attempt to capture Dōgen's playful reversal of the syntax of the expression "my children" (goshi 吾子); perhaps meaning, whether from the perspective of the father or of the child.

present, and future throughout all the worlds in the ten directions. “My children” of the buddhas are the living beings; the compassionate fathers of the living beings are the buddhas.

しかあればすなはち、百草の華果は、諸佛の我有なり、巖石の大小は、諸佛の我有なり。安處は林野なり、林野は已離なり。

Such being the case, the flowers and fruits of the hundred grasses are “my property” of the buddhas; the large and small rocks and stones are “my property” of the buddhas. Their “safely residing” is “forest and field”; “forest and field” is their having “already departed.”<sup>27</sup>

しかもかくのごとくなりといふとも、如來道の宗旨は、吾子の道のみなり、其父の道、いまだあらざるなり、參究すべし。

Although this may be so, the essential point of the Tathāgata’s words are only the words, “my children”; we should investigate the fact that he never uses the words, “their father.”

[41:11]

釋迦牟尼佛道、諸佛應化法身、亦不出三界。三界外無衆生、佛何所化。是故我言、三界外別有一衆生界藏者、外道大有經中說、非七佛之所說。

Buddha Śākyamuni said,<sup>28</sup>

The response, transformation, and dharma bodies of the buddhas do not go beyond the three realms.<sup>29</sup> Outside the three realms, there are no living beings; so, what would be converted by the buddha? Therefore, I say, [the claim] that there is a store of a realm of living beings outside the three realms is a theory in the Scripture of Great Being of an other path, not something taught by the seven buddhas.<sup>30</sup>

27 Their “safely residing” is “forest and field”; “forest and field” is their having “already departed” (ansho wa rinya nari, rinya wa iri nari 安處は林野なり、林野は已離なり): From the Lotus Sūtra verse noted above; see Note 9.

28 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): From the Renwang jing 仁王經, T.245.8:827a1-4.

29 response, transformation, and dharma bodies of the buddhas (shobutsu ôke hosshin 諸佛應化法身): The exact sense of this expression is unclear, depending on whether the “response” body (ôjin 應身) is taken as (a) a more exalted form of the “transformation” body (keshin 化身; S. nirmāṇa-kāya), the body that appears as a human, or (b) another term for the reward body (hōshin 報身; S. saṃbhoga-kāya), the perfected body developed through practice on the bodhisattva path.

30 Scripture of Great Being of an other path (gedō Daiu kyō 外道大有經): Unidentified; often attributed to the Vaiśeṣika school of Hinduism but may be a generic term for scriptures asserting the concept of brahman.

あきらかに参究すべし、諸佛應化法身は、みなこれ三界なり、無外なり。たとへば、如來の無外なるがごとし、牆壁無外なるがごとし、三界の無外なるがごとく、衆生無外なり。無衆生のところ、佛何所化なり、佛所化は、かならず衆生なり。

We should clearly investigate that the response, transformation, and dharma bodies of the buddhas are all “the three realms,” are without outside.<sup>31</sup> This is like the tathāgatas being without outside, like fences and walls being without outside; just as the three realms are without outside, living beings are without outside. Where it is without living beings, “what would be converted by the buddha?” “What is converted by the buddha” is always living beings.

We should realize that the granting of being to “a store of a realm of living beings outside the three realms” is from “the Scripture of Great Being of an other path,” not a sūtra of the seven buddhas. “Only mind” is not one or two, is not “the three realms,” is not “beyond the three realms,” is “without error.”<sup>32</sup> It is having thinking and perceiving; it is lacking thinking and perceiving.<sup>33</sup> It is “fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles”;

31 are without outside (muge nari 無外なり): Dōgen reverses the syntax of the predicate ge mu 外無 (“outside there are no”) in the quotation.

32 “without error” (mu u shakumyō 無有錯謬): Reflecting the line in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:42c16) just following the quotation in section 3, above:

Not as the three realms do I see the three realms. Such things, the Tathāgata sees clearly, without error.

33 thinking and perceiving (ryo chi nen kaku 慮知念覺): A loose translation of terms for cognitive functions not commonly found as a set in Buddhist literature but appearing several times in the Shōbōgenzō, where they seem to stand collectively for the ordinary operations of consciousness. The translation takes them as two compound expressions (the first of which does occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō in reference to the thinking mind); as individual terms, they might be rendered “considering, knowing, thinking, and perceiving.” See Supplementary Notes.

it is mountains, rivers, and the whole earth.<sup>34</sup> Mind is skin, flesh, bones, and marrow; mind is holding up a flower and breaking into a smile.<sup>35</sup>

There is having mind; there is lacking mind. There is mind with a body; there is mind without a body. There is mind before the body; there is mind after the body.<sup>36</sup> When the body is born, there are the types: from womb, egg, moisture, and transformation; when the mind is born, there are the types: from womb, egg, moisture, and transformation.<sup>37</sup> Blue, yellow, red, and white — these are mind; long, short, square, and round — these are mind; birth and death, coming and going — these are mind; years, months, days, and hours — these are mind; dreams, phantasms, sky flowers — these are mind; water spray, foam, and flames — these are mind; the spring flowers and the autumn moon — these are mind; “in haste and at risk” — these are mind.<sup>38</sup> Nevertheless, we should not mountains, rivers, and the whole earth (senga daichi 山河大地): A common expression for “the physical world,” occurring very frequently throughout Dōgen’s writings.

35 skin, flesh, bones, and marrow (hi niku kotsu zui 皮肉骨髓); holding up a flower and breaking into a smile (nenge hagan 拈華破顏): Two stock expressions for the transmission of Zen: the first is from the story of Bodhidharma’s transmission to the second Chinese ancestor, Huike 慧可; the second is from the story of the first transmission, on Vulture Peak, from Buddha Śākyamuni to Mahākāśyapa. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow,” “Hold up a flower,” and “Break into a smile.”

36 mind before the body (shinsen no shin 身先の心): “Before the body and after the body” (shinsen shingo 身先身後) are most often used in reference to lifetimes before and after this lifetime; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Body and mind.”

37 womb, egg, moisture, and transformation (tairanshikke 胎・卵・湿・化): The four ways in which living beings are born in saṃsāra: “womb born” (S. jarāyujā) refers to mammals; “egg born” (S. aṇḍaja) refers to birds and reptiles; “moisture born” (S. saṃsvedajā) refers to lower forms of animal life, such as insects; “transformation born” (S. upapādukā) refers to those in the heavens and hells, as well as the incarnations of buddhas and advanced bodhisattvas.

38 sky flowers (kūge 空華): S. khapuspa; spots appearing to the diseased eye; a standard metaphor in Buddhist texts for what is mere appearance without objective reality; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Clouded eyes and sky flowers.”

“in haste and at risk” (zōji tenpai 造次顛沛): A fixed idiom for fleeting experience, from a saying in the Lunyu 論語 4 (KR.1h0005.002.11b):

君子無終食之間違仁，造次必於是，顛沛必於是。

The gentleman does not violate humaneness even for the space of a meal: even when in haste, he keeps to it; even when at risk, he keeps to it.

39 we should not damage them (kiha su bekarazu 毀破すべからず): Recalling the Confucian maxim noted above, Note 19.

40 “the real marks of the dharmas” are mind; “only buddhas with buddhas” are mind (shohō jissō shin nari, yuibutsu yo butsu shin nari 諸法實相心なり、唯佛與佛心なり): Or “it [i.e., mind] is the mind of ‘the real marks of the dharmas’; it is the mind of ‘only buddhas with buddhas.’” From a passage in the Lotus Sūtra often cited by Dōgen; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas.”

いま大師の問取する三界唯心汝作麼生會は、作麼生會・未作麼生會、おなじく三界唯心なり。このゆえに、未三界唯心なるべし。眞應、このゆえに椅子をさしていはく、和尚喚遮箇作什麼。しるべし、汝作麼生會は、喚遮箇作什麼なり。

In the Great Master's question — “The three realms are only mind.” How do you understand it?” — “How do you understand it?” and “How do you not understand it?” are equally “the three realms are only mind.” Therefore, it must be “not the three realms are only mind.”<sup>42</sup> Zhenying, therefore, points at the chair and says, “What does the Reverend call this?” We should recognize that “How do you understand it?” is “What do you call this?”

大師道の椅子は、且道すべし、これ會三界語なりや、不會三界語なりや、三界語なりや、非三界語なりや、椅子道なりや、大師道なりや。かくのごとく試道看の道究すべし。試會看の會取あり、試參看の究參あるべし。

The Great Master's saying “chair” — tell me, is this a word of understanding the three realms, or is it a word of not understanding the three realms? Is it a word of the three realms, or is it a word not of the three realms? Is it the saying of the chair, or is it the saying of the Great Master? In this way, we should investigate the saying by trying to say it. There should be an understanding that tries to understand it, a thorough study that tries to study it.

Zhenying said, “The Reverend doesn't understand 'the three realms are only mind.'” This saying may be, for example, the “East Gate” and “South Gate” in speaking of Zhaozhou, but it is in addition the “West Gate” and “North Gate.”<sup>43</sup> There is in addition an East Zhaozhou and

42 “How do you understand it?” and “How do you not understand it?” (somosan e mi somosan e 作麼生會・未作麼生會); it must be “not the three realms are only mind” (mi sangai yui shin naru beshi 未三界唯心なるべし): Dōgen plays here with Zhenying's, “The Reverend doesn't understand ‘the three realms are only mind,’” creating two improbable negative versions of the original question. Presumably, “how do you understand it?” is to “the three realms are only mind” as “how do you not understand it?” is to “not the three realms are only mind.”

43 This saying may be, for example, the “East Gate” and “South Gate” in speaking of Zhaozhou, but it is in addition the “West Gate” and “North Gate” (kono dō, tatoeba dō Jōshū suru naka no tōmon nanmon nari to iedomo sara ni seimon hokumon nari a South Zhaozhou. We should investigate the fact that, even if there is understanding “the three realms are only mind,” there is in addition “not understanding the three realms are only mind.” In addition, there is also “the three realms are only mind” that is neither understood nor not understood.

The Great Master said, “I call it bamboo and wood.” In this saying, before the speech and after the words, we should investigate and penetrate the item that is bright before and extinct after.<sup>44</sup> “I call it bamboo and wood” — before he called it that here, what was it called? When up till now the eight sides were crystal clear, were beginning, middle, and end all “bamboo and wood”?<sup>45</sup> Is “calling it bamboo and wood” here saying

趙州因僧問、如何是趙州。師曰、東門南門西門北門。僧曰、不問這箇。師曰、爾問趙州。𡵿。

Zhaozhou was once asked by a monk, “What is Zhaozhou.”

The Master said, “East Gate, South Gate, West Gate, North Gate.”

The monk said, “I didn’t ask about that.”

The Master said, “You asked about Zhaozhou.”

Zhaozhou’s answer plays on the fact that his sobriquet is that of the city of Zhaozhou 趙州 — hence, the four city gates. Dōgen’s sentence seems to suggest that the Reverend’s “not understanding the three realms are only mind” is not only two of the gates (half the story?) but all four; however, some texts give here “but there should be in addition the West Gate and North Gate” (sara ni seimon hokumon aru beshi さらに西門北門あるべし), which suggests, there may be more to Xuansha than “not understanding.”

44 before the speech and after the words (shōzen kugo 聲前句後): A fairly common phrase in Zen literature, seemingly a development from the expression “words before speech” (shōzen ku 聲前句, or shōzen ikku 聲前一句): i.e., expressing what precedes language, or cannot be said.

bright before and extinct after (kōzen zetsugo 光前絶後): An idiom for something unique — better than anything preceding it and not to be replicated in the future; variant of “empty before and extinct after” (kūzen zetsugo 空前絶後).

45 When up till now the eight sides were crystal clear, were beginning, middle, and end all “bamboo and wood”? (jūrai no hachimen reirō ni sho chū go tomo ni chikuboku nari to ya sen 從來の八面玲瓏に、初・中・後ともに竹木なりとやせん):

it is “the three realms are only mind”? Or is it not saying it is “the three realms are only mind”? We should realize that, when we speak of “the three realms are only mind” in the morning, we may speak of a “chair,” or of “only mind,” or of “the three realms”; but when we speak of “the three realms are only mind” in the evening, it is spoken of as “I call it bamboo and wood.”

眞應道の桂琛亦喚作竹木、しるべし、師資の對面道なりといふとも、同參の頭正尾正なるべし。しかありといへども、大師道の喚遮箇作竹木と、眞應道の亦喚作竹木と、同なりや、不同なりや、是なりや、不是なりや、と參究すべきなり。

Zhenying says, “Guichen also calls it bamboo and wood.” We should recognize that, while this may be words exchanged face-to-face between master and disciple, they must be [the words] correct from head to tail of a fellow student.<sup>46</sup> Although this may be so, we should thoroughly investigate whether the “I call it bamboo and wood” said by the Great Master and the “I also call it bamboo and wood” said by Zhengyin are the same, are not the same, are right, or are not right.

大師云盡大地覓一箇會佛法人不可得。この道取をも、審細に辨肯すべし。

The Great Master said, “I can’t find a single person anywhere on all the whole earth who understands the buddha dharma.” This saying, we should confirm in detail.

We should realize that the Great Master is only, “I call it bamboo and wood,” and Zhenying is also only, “I call it bamboo and wood.” Beyond that, they have not understood “the three realms are only mind”; they have not failed to understand “the three realms are only mind”; they have said that “the three realms are only mind”; they have not failed to say that “the three realms are only mind.” Nevertheless, while this may

Talking of the Mind, Talking of the Nature

Sesshin Sesshō

INTRODUCTION

According to its colophon, this work was composed in 1243, at Kippō-ji, the monastery in Echizen (present-day Fukui) where Dōgen resided following his departure from the capital area in the summer of the same year. It occurs as number 42 in the seventy-five-chapter compilation of the Shōbōgenzō and as number 48 in the Honzan edition. It is also found as number 6 in fascicle 3 of the twenty-eight-text Himitsu collection; as is typical of texts in this collection, it does not occur in the sixty-chapter compilation.

The text represents a commentary on a conversation between the Tang-dynasty monks Shenshan Sengmi 神山僧密 and his dharma brother Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价, famed founder of Dōgen's Caodong (Sōtō) lineage. The title derives from Dongshan's remark in the conversation that "there's someone inside who's talking of the mind and talking of the nature."

In the Chinese Chan literature (and perhaps even in Dongshan's use), to talk of the mind and the nature was sometimes seen as a waste of time. In a passing remark in the "Shōbōgenzō sansui kyō" 正法眼藏山水經, Dōgen seems to agree with this view; but here he takes the opposite position, arguing forcefully that talking of the mind and the nature is the very essence of the Zen tradition, what he calls in his final sentence "the essential functions of the seven buddhas and the ancestral masters." Talking of the nature, he says, is the nature "talking," the buddha nature expressing itself in the world; and it is participation in this activity that constitutes the teaching, practice, and awakening of the way of the buddhas.

From this position, Dōgen criticizes those who think that one must give up talking of the mind and the nature in order to attain the way. In particular, he singles out the Song-dynasty master Dahui Zonggao 大慧宗杲 as someone who does not understand the mind and the nature, someone who has not "tasted the tea and rice of the buddhas and ancestors.” This attack on a leading figure of the Linji house of Chan, as well as a passing jibe at the founder of the house, Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄, himself, together with the praise of the Caodong founder, Dongshan, as “the most honored among the ancestors,” has led some readers to see the present work as in part an argument for the superiority of Dōgen’s Sōtō tradition.

cloister beside |the road| (bō in 傍院): Supplying ro 路 from the Chinese versions of the story, which give lu bang yuan 路傍院.

“Inside” (rimen 裏面): The element men 面, while here having little semantic function in the Chinese, has the etymological sense, “face” or “surface” — a sense Dōgen will take advantage of in his commentary below, section 18.

“there’s someone” (unin 有人): Or simply “someone”; Dōgen will play with the predicate-nominative syntax of the Chinese idiom in his commentary, section 18.

“talking of the mind and talking of the nature” (sesshin sesshō 説心説性): A famous phrase that gets picked up in other Zen texts. “Mind” and “nature” can be understood either as two topics (the mind and its true nature) or as two elements of a single compound expression, shinshō 心性, “the nature of the mind.” The predicate, setsu 説, taken here simply as “to talk about,” also has the meanings, “to explain,” “to expound,” “to teach,” “to preach.” Hence, especially in the setting of the cloister here, Dongshan’s remark could be read, “There’s someone preaching the mind and preaching the nature.”

2 Elder brother Sengmi (Sōmitsu shihaku 僧密師伯): The term shihaku 師伯, translated here as “elder brother,” reflects the fact that Shenshan 神山 and Dongshan 洞山 were fellow disciples of Yunyan 雲巖 and, hence, are “dharma brothers.” While the Chinese

Great Master Wuben said, “Once he’s questioned by my elder brother, he’s definitely completely dead.”<sup>3</sup>

Elder brother Sengmi said, “Who is it that’s talking of the mind and talking of the nature?”

Great Master Wuben said, “In death, he lives.”<sup>4</sup>

“Talking of the mind and talking of the nature” is the great origin of the way of the buddhas; from it are caused to appear buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor. Without “talking of the mind and talking of the nature,” there would be no turning the wheel of the wondrous dharma; there would be no bringing forth the mind [of bodhi] or practicing; there would be no “whole earth and sentient beings simultaneously attaining the way”; there would be no “all living beings have no buddha nature.”<sup>5</sup> Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes is “talking of the sources (and the shinji Shōbōgenzō) identify Shenshan simply as “the Master” (shih 師), Dōgen introduces here the honorific term that Dongshan will use in reference to Shenshan. Commentators often parse this term as “the Master’s (i.e., Dongshan’s) elder brother” and treat it as an honorific among Dongshan’s followers; this interpretation may work for Dōgen’s use in this line, but it hardly fits with Dongshan’s own use in the next line.

3 “he’s definitely completely dead” (jiki toku kyoshi jūbun 直得去死十分): The expression kyoshi jūbun 去死十分 (“totally dead”) is an idiom occurring in Zen texts with a sense something like “is as good as dead”; in his commentary below, Dōgen will play with the element jūbun 十分 (“completely,” “totally”), which has a literal sense, “ten parts” (or “a hundred percent”). The grammatical subject is unexpressed here; it is usually taken as the “someone” (unin 有人) who is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature,” but it could be Dongshan himself.

4 “In death, he lives” (shi chū toku katsu 死中得活): Or “he revives,” “he survives.” Perhaps derived from the Chinese idiom, “to seek life in death” (si chung qiu huo 死中求活) — i.e., to hope to survive a desperate situation.

5 Without “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” (sesshin sesshō ni arazareba 説心説性にあらざれば): The hyperbolic praise of the expression, “talking of the mind and talking of the nature,” here and throughout this chapter is in stark contrast to Dōgen’s opinion in his “Shōbōgenzō sansui kyō” 正法眼藏山水經 (from 1240) (DZZ.1:318):

“Talking of the mind and talking of the nature” is something not condoned by the buddhas and ancestors.

“whole earth and sentient beings simultaneously attaining the way” (daichi ujō dōji mind and talking of the nature”; breaking into a smile is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature”; “making a bow and standing in place” is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature”; “the Ancestral Master entering the Liang” is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature”; “transmitting the robe in the middle of the night” is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature.”<sup>6</sup> Raising the staff is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature”; lowering the whisk is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature.”<sup>7</sup> jōdō 大地有情同時成道): A reference to the Buddha’s awakening under the bodhi tree. The expression, which appears in several of Dōgen’s texts, is from a line that he will quote in his “Shōbōgenzō hotsu bodai shin” 正法眼藏發菩提心 chapter (DZZ.2:164; also quoted at Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄, DZZ.3:28, no. 37):

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “When the dawn star appeared, I, together with the whole earth and sentient beings, simultaneously attained the way.”

Although the passage appears in Chan texts from this period (see, e.g., Jianzhong Jingguo xudeng lu 建中靖國續燈錄, ZZ.136:36b17-18), it has not been located in any extant sūtra. The translation here follows the usual reading of daichi ujō 大地有情 as a compound subject; the phrase could also be read, “sentient beings of the whole earth.”

“all living beings have no buddha nature” (issai shujō mu busshō 一切衆生無佛性): A saying attributed to Weishan Lingyu 潯山靈祐 (771-853); see, e.g., shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:188, case 115). Often interpreted to mean that the buddha nature is “empty” — i.e., not some thing that sentient beings have. Perhaps intended here as what we might call the reverse of the relationship between buddha and sentient beings given in the preceding clause.

6 Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes (nenge shunmoku 拈華瞬目): breaking into a smile (hagan mishō 破顏微笑): References to the famous founding story of Zen (found, e.g., at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:258, case 253), in which the Buddha held up a flower on Vulture Peak, his disciple Mahākāśyapa smiled, and the Buddha recognized him as the heir to his “treasury of the true dharma eye.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Break into a smile” and “Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes.”

“making a bow and standing in place” (raihai ei ni ryū 禮拜依位而立): Reference to the account of Huike’s 慧可 recognition as the Second Ancestor of Chinese Chan. Bodhidharma asked four of his disciples for expressions of their understanding of his teaching. Huike’s response was simply to bow and stand in place, whereupon Bodhidharma declared, “You’ve gotten my marrow.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

“the Ancestral Master entering the Liang” (soshi nyūryō 祖師入梁): Reference to Bodhidharma’s bringing the Zen tradition to China from India. The Liang dynasty ruled southern China during the period 502-557; Bodhidharma is said to have had an interview with the founder of the dynasty, Wudi 武帝 (r. 502-550).

“transmitting the robe in the middle of the night” (yahan den’e 夜半傳衣): Reference to the ascension of the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能, who is said to have received the robe of Bodhidharma from the Fifth Ancestor, Hungren 弘忍, in secret during the night.

おほよそ佛佛祖祖のあらゆる功德は、ことごとくこれ説心説性なり。平常の説心説性あり、牆壁瓦礫の説心説性あり。いはゆる、心生種種法生の道理現成し、心滅種種法滅の道理現成する、しかしながら心の説なる時節なり、性の説なる時節なり。

In sum, every virtue of buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature.” There is the “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” of “the ordinary”; there is the “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” of “fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles.”<sup>8</sup> The realization of the principle, “when the mind arises, the various dharmas arise,” and the realization of the principle, “when the mind ceases, the various dharmas cease,” are in either case occasions of “talking of the mind,” occasions of “talking of the nature.”<sup>9</sup>

しかあるに、心を通ぜず、性に達せざる庸流、くらくして説心説性をしらず、談玄談妙をしらず、佛祖の道にあるべからざるといふ、あるべからざるとをしふ。説心説性を説心説性としらざるによりて、説心説性を説心説性とおもふなり。これ、ことに大道の通塞を批判せざるによりてなり。

Yet, mediocre types, who have not penetrated the mind, who have not reached the nature, without knowing “talking of the mind and talking of the nature,” without knowing “discussing the dark, discussing the subtle,” say that and teach that, these must not be the words of the buddhas of Zen masters associated with their teaching. The staff (shujō 拄杖) is a walking stick, often carried by the master when he “ascends to the hall” (jōdō 上堂; i.e., holds a formal convocation); the whisk (hossu 拂子) is a ceremonial fly-whisk, often held by the master during convocations and other rituals. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Staff,” “Whisk.”

8 “the ordinary” (byōjō 平常): Likely an allusion to the famous saying of Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-835) (found, e.g., at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:134, case 19); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Ordinary mind is the way.”

9 The realization of the principle (dōri genjō 道理現成): An unusual locution, found occasionally in Dōgen’s writings, probably meaning something like, “the expression (or appearance) of the truth that . . .”

“when the mind arises, the various dharmas arise” (shin shō shuju hō shō 心生種種法生); “when the mind ceases, the various dharmas cease” (shin metsu shuju hō metsu 心滅種種法滅): A fixed combination, commonly found together in Zen texts; usually said to derive from the Dasheng qishin lun 大乘起信論 (T.1666.32:577b22), though a similar set can be found in the Lankāvatāra-sūtra (Ru lengqie jing 入楞伽經, T.671.16:568c12).

Of late, there was a certain Zonggao, Chan Master Dahui of Jingshan, who said,

People today, because they like talking of the mind and talking of the nature or discussing the dark and discussing the subtle, are slow to gain the way.<sup>13</sup> When, you have thrown away both “mind” and have not penetrated the mind (shin o tsū zezu 心を通ぜず); have not reached the nature (shō ni tatsu sezaruru 性に達せざる): A play with the compound term tsūdatsu 通達 (“to penetrate,” “to master”).

“discussing the dark, discussing the subtle” (dan gen dan myō 談玄談妙): The compound expression genmyō (“dark and subtle” or “deep and marvelous”) is a common one in Buddhist texts, and in Chinese writing more generally, for what is profound and mysterious. Here, a reference to the words of Dahui Zonggao 大慧宗杲 that Dōgen will quote in the next section.

11 they think of “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” as “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” (sesshin sesshō o sesshin sesshō to omou 説心説性を説心説性とおもふ): Usually interpreted to mean that they take “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” in some literal sense of “talking.”

12 they have not judged the passage and blockage of the great way (daidō no tsūsoku o hihan sezaruru 大道の通塞を批判せざる): Usually interpreted to mean that they have not thought critically about what is and is not integral to the great way. “Passage and blockage” here translates tsūsoku 通塞, meaning that a road or way is “open or blocked”; often carrying the idiomatic sense of “affairs going smoothly or not.”

13 Of late (kōrai 後來): Ordinarily an adverb meaning “subsequently,” “thereafter,” etc., this term seems to appear in Dōgen’s writings exclusively in dismissive reference to what is merely recent (cf. the more “classic” korai 古來).

Zonggao, Zen Master Dahui of Jingshan (Kinzan Daie zenji Sōkō 徑山大慧禪師宗杲): Dahui Zonggao 大慧宗杲 (1089-1163), a leading figure in the Linji 臨濟 lineage during the Southern Song. The Shōbōgenzō contains several criticisms of him (see especially “Shōbōgenzō jishō zanmai” 正法眼藏自證三昧). Mount Jing (Kinzan 徑山) was a major Chan monastery located in Hangzhou 杭州, Lin’an Prefecture 臨安府.

This saying does not know the pale yellow silk of the buddhas and ancestors, has not heard of the monarchical line of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>15</sup> Consequently, he says this because he knows only that the mind is solely thinking and perceiving, and does not learn that thinking and perceiving are also the mind.<sup>16</sup> Mistakenly figuring only that the nature

Dahui's words here are given in Japanese and in fact do not seem to be a direct quotation from any extant text. The records of Dahui's teachings do contain several passages in which he is critical of the practices of “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” (shuo xin shuo xing 説心説性) and “talking of the dark and talking of the subtle” (shuo xuan shuo miao 説玄説妙). (See, e.g., Dahui yulu 大慧語錄, T.1998A.47:830c4-5; 47:927b26-7.)

14 the two do not arise (nisō fushō 二相不生): Literally, “the two characteristics do not arise.” Could be understood as a reference either to the two pairs, “mind and nature” and “dark and subtle,” or to the two members of each pair.

verify and accord (shōkai 證契): A tentative translation of a term occurring a number of times in Dōgen's writings but more rarely in the Chinese Chan texts. Both elements of the compound are common Zen terms, with legal connotations, for spiritual understanding: shō 證 (“verify”) has the sense of “bearing witness” to something; kai 契 (“accord”) has the sense of “agreeing” with someone or something (from the nominal usage as “tally,” “contract,” or “agreement”). The translation here treats both elements as verbs, but interpretations of Dōgen's use of shōkai regularly treat it as a subject-predicate compound, meaning one's “verification accords” (often, with that of one's master); the relationship could also be understood as a predicate-object, meaning that one “verifies the accord” (with the teachings or one's master). This term does not seem to occur in Dahui's writings, though he does use the two elements in reverse: qisheng 契證, perhaps to be understood, “to accord with the verification.”

15 the pale yellow silk of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no kenshō 佛祖の縑緗); the monarchical line of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no reppeki 佛祖の列辟): “Pale yellow silk” (kenshō 縑緗) refers to the silk threads used to decorate books; hence, as a synecdoche, “texts.” “Monarchical line” (reppeki 列辟, or retsukeki), not occurring elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, is usually taken as a reference to the Zen lineage; some interpret heki 辟 here as “law”; others take it as a substitute for the homonymous graph heki 璧 (“jade”).

16 the mind is solely thinking and perceiving (shin wa hitoe ni ryo chi nen kaku nari 心はひとへに慮知念覺なり); thinking and perceiving are also the mind (ryo chi nen kaku mo shin naru 慮知念覺も心なる): “Thinking and perceiving” represents a loose is pure, deep, quiescent, and still, he does not know about the existence or non-existence of the buddha nature or dharma nature. Because he has never seen “such a nature” even in his dreams, he has this biased view of the buddha dharma.<sup>17</sup>

The “mind” spoken of by the buddhas and ancestors is the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow; the “nature” maintained by the buddhas and ancestors is the bamboo stick and staff.<sup>18</sup> The “dark” that the buddhas and ancestors verify and accord with is pillars and lanterns; the “subtle” that the buddhas and ancestors take up is knowledge and understanding.<sup>19</sup> translation of ryo chi nen kaku 慮知念覺, terms for cognitive functions not commonly found as a set in Buddhist literature but appearing several times in the Shōbōgenzō, where they seem to stand collectively for the ordinary operations of consciousness. The translation takes them as two compound expressions (the first of which does occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō in reference to the thinking mind); as individual terms, they might be rendered “considering, knowing, thinking, and perceiving.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Thinking and perceiving.” The point here appears to be that Dahui thinks that the mind has mental activities but does not understand that these activities are themselves the mind.

17 “such a nature” (nyoze shō 如是性): The adjective “such” (nyoze 如是) here could refer simply to the preceding “buddha nature” and “dharma nature,” but it also suggests the famous list, often evoked in the Shōbōgenzō, of ten “suchnesses” (jū nyoze 十如是), appearing in Kumārajīva’s translation of the Lotus Sūtra, one of which is “such a nature.” (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:5c12.)

biased view (hekiken 辟見): Reading heki 辟 here as heki 僻.

18 skin, flesh, bones, and marrow (hi niku kotsu zui 皮肉骨髓): An expression used throughout Dōgen’s writings for the essence or entirety of what is transmitted in the Zen tradition; from the account, mentioned above, of Bodhidharma’s interview with his four disciples (see Note 6). Here, Dōgen is no doubt playing with the contrast between these body parts and the mind.

the bamboo stick and staff (shippei shujō 竹篋・拄杖): Two insignia of the Zen master. The master’s bamboo stick (shippei 竹篋) is a short rod often held during lectures; for his staff, see above, Note 7.

19 pillars and lanterns (rochū tōrō 露柱・燈籠): The free-standing pillars and the lanterns of monastic buildings; an expression, fairly common in Zen texts, for the ordinary, insentient things of the world around the monk; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Pillars and lanterns.”

knowledge and understanding (chiken ge’e 知見・解會): I.e., our ordinary experience of the world; the subjective correlate, we might say, to “pillars and lanterns.”

The buddhas and ancestors who are truly buddhas and ancestors, from the beginning, hear this “mind and nature,” teach it, practice it, and verify it. They maintain this “dark and subtle,” and they study it. Those who are like this are called the children and grandchildren studying the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>20</sup> Those who are not like this are not students of the way.<sup>21</sup>

Therefore, [Dahui’s] “gaining the way” does not gain the way; when it does not gain the way, it is not that it does not gain the way.<sup>22</sup> It misses the occasions of both gaining and not [gaining]. While, to say, as you say, “forget both mind and nature,” is a part expressing the talk of the mind; it is a small part, a hundredth, thousandth, ten thousandth, a hundred thousandth part.<sup>23</sup> To say, “discard both dark and subtle,” is a part forming the discussion of discussing the dark.<sup>24</sup>

20 children and grandchildren (jison 兒孫): Or simply “descendants.” The expression “descendants of the buddhas and ancestors” is used repeatedly throughout the Shōbōgenzō for (authentic) members of the Zen tradition.

21 Those who are not like this are not students of the way (shika no gotoku ni arazareba, gakudō ni arazu しかのごとくにあらざれば、學道にあらず): Or “If it is not like this, it is not the study of the way.”

22 Therefore, [Dahui’s] “gaining the way” does not gain the way; when it does not gain the way, it is not that it does not gain the way (tokudō no tokudō sezu, futokudō no toki futokudō narazaru 得道の得道せず、不得道のとき不得道ならざる): The subject of the second clause is unexpressed here. The translation treats it as Dahui’s words, “gain the way,” but it may also be understood as Dahui himself or perhaps as “those who are not like this” from the preceding sentence. In any case, the passage is generally interpreted to mean that Dahui’s sense of “attaining the way” is not really attaining the way; similarly, what he thinks of as not attaining the way is not in fact not attaining the way.

23 as you say (nanji ga iu ga gotoku なんぢがいふがごとく): I.e., as Dahui has said above. As is not uncommon in Zen comments, Dōgen is here directly addressing the person he is quoting. The translation continues the use of the second person throughout the passage, though the grammatical subject is unexpressed and could as well be read as “he” (i.e., Dahui).

24 a part expressing the talking of the mind (shin no setsu arashimuru bun 心の説あらしむる分); a part forming the discussion of discussing the dark (dan gen no dan narashimuru bun 談玄の談ならしむる分): The particle no in both these phrases is

Not having studied this pivot, if you stupidly say, “forgetting,” you think [it is] leaving the hand, you know it as escaping the body.<sup>25</sup> You are not yet liberated from the confines of the Small Vehicle; how could you reach the innermost darkness of the Great Vehicle, let alone know the higher pivot?<sup>26</sup> It is difficult to say that you have tasted the tea and rice of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>27</sup> ambiguous. It is possible to interpret shin no setsu 心の説 either as “talking about the mind” or as “the mind’s talking”; similarly, it is possible to interpret dan gen no dan 談玄の談 either as “the discussion that is discussing the dark” or as “discussing the dark’s discussion.”

leaving the hand (te o hanarenzuru 手をはなれんずる); escaping the body (mi ni no-garenuru 身にのがれぬる): Both phrases express the abandonment of something.

26 confines of the Small Vehicle (shōjō no kyokuryō 小乗の局量): Like many Mahāyāna authors, Dōgen often associates the Hīnayāna with the negation of, or urge to escape from, the phenomenal world. Note the three-tiered hierarchy here, common in his writings, of Small Vehicle, Great Vehicle, and the tradition of the buddhas and ancestors; the progression seems to be expressed here through a metaphoric journey into the “household” of the buddhas and ancestors. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Three vehicles.”

innermost darkness (ōgen 奥玄): A somewhat unusual term, no doubt introduced here to pick up the “darkness” (gen 玄) of the “dark and subtle” (genmyō 玄妙) above. Ō 奥 connotes the “interior” of a structure; hence, what is “hidden” from public view, what is “private” and “remote.”

27 tea and rice of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no sahan 佛祖の茶飯): I.e., the spiritual “fare” provided by the tradition. The expression “everyday tea and rice” (kajō sahan 家常茶飯) is a fairly common one in Dōgen’s writings and in Chinese Chan texts; see Supplementary Notes.

28 personally to investigate (taikyū su 體究す): The translation of taikyū 體究 as “personally investigate” masks the corporeal connotation of the glyph tai 體 (“body”) with which Dōgen may be playing here in his subsequent “before the body and after the body” (shinsen shingo 身先身後) — an expression typically indicating “past lives and future lives.”

At that time, the First Ancestor said to the Second Ancestor, “Externally, put a stop to conditions; internally, the mind will be without panting.<sup>29</sup> With the mind like fences and walls, you will enter the way.”

The Second Ancestor talked of the mind and talked of the nature but did not verify and accord [with them].<sup>30</sup> One day, he suddenly understood. Subsequently, he addressed the First Ancestor, saying, “Your disciple has this time finally put a stop to conditions.”

The First Ancestor recognized that he had awakened and did not further press him, saying only, “Haven’t you achieved severance and extinction?”<sup>31</sup>

The Second Ancestor said, “No.”

The First Ancestor said, “How is the Master?”<sup>32</sup>

The Second Ancestor said, “Clear, clear, ever knowing; therefore, words cannot reach it.”

The First Ancestor said, “This is the substance of the mind transmitted down from the buddhas and ancestors. Now you’ve gotten it; protect it well.”

29 the First Ancestor said to the Second Ancestor (Shoso, i Niso 初祖、謂二祖): A story found in several texts; see, e.g., Zongmen tongyao ji 宗門統要集 (ZTS.1:21a). Also quoted by Dahui, which may explain its presence here; see Dahui yulu 大慧語錄 (T.1998A.47:925b17-24). The protagonists are, of course, Bodhidharma (“the First Ancestor”) and his disciple Huike 慧可 (“the Second Ancestor”).

“conditions” (shoen 諸緣): I.e., involvements in worldly affairs.

“without panting” (mutan 無喘): Or “without busyness.” The English loses what may be a play in the Chinese with the graph xi 息, translated here as “put a stop to” but also meaning “breath.”

30 verify and accord (shōkai 證契): See above, Note 14. The Chinese versions of the story use only the verb qi 契 (“accord”).

31 “severance and extinction” (danmetsu 斷滅): A term typically understood as indicating a spiritually undesirable state; sometimes associated with the “annihilationist” position (danken 斷見; S. uccheda-vāda) that denies karma and rebirth.

32 “How is the Master?” (shi somosan 子作麼生): “Master” here renders the diminutive shi 子, used here in direct address.

この因縁、疑著するものあり、擧拈するあり。二祖の、初祖に參侍せし因縁のなかの一因縁、かくのごとし。二祖、しきりに説心説性するに、はじめは相契せず。やうやく積功累徳して、つひに初祖の道を得道しき。庸愚おもふらくは、二祖、はじめに説心説性せしときは證契せず、そのとが、説心説性するにあり、のちには説心説性をすてて證契せり、とおもへり。心如牆壁可以入道の道を參徹せざるによりて、かくのごとくいふなり。これ、ことに學道の區別にくらし。

There are those who have doubts about this episode, those who take it up.<sup>33</sup> One episode among the episodes of the Second Ancestor's service under the First Ancestor is like this. When the Second Ancestor was persistently talking of the mind and talking of the nature, at first, he did not accord with it. Finally, "accumulating merit and amassing virtue," he gained the way of the words of the First Ancestor. The mediocre fools think that, [if] the Second Ancestor failed to verify and accord when he was first talking of the mind and talking of the nature, the fault lay in his talking of the mind and talking of the nature; subsequently, having discarded talking of the mind and talking of the nature, he verified and accorded. They say this because they have not penetrated the words, "with the mind like fences and walls, you will enter the way." This is particularly ignorant of distinctions in studying the way.

Why is this? After we have brought forth the mind of bodhi and turned to the practice of the way of the buddhas, when we are wholeheartedly performing the difficult practices, though we may be performing them, we do not have one hit in a hundred practices.<sup>34</sup> Still, whether from a wise friend, whether from a sūtra scroll, eventually we hit it.<sup>35</sup> This one

33 those who have doubts (gijaku suru mono 疑著するもの); those who take it up (konen suru 擧拈する): To "doubt" may refer either to "being suspicious of" or to "wondering about." To "take up" refers to "taking as a topic for study or comment."

34 mind of bodhi (bodai shin 菩提心): I.e., the bodhisattva's aspiration for unsurpassed, perfect awakening; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Bring forth the mind."

35 whether from a wise friend, whether from a sūtra scroll (waku jū chishiki waku jū kyōkan 或從知識・或從經卷): Dōgen here shifts to Chinese for this formulaic expres-hit in the present is [due to] the power of a hundred misses in the past, is the “one maturation” of a hundred misses.<sup>36</sup> Hearing the teachings, cultivating the way, attaining the verification are all like this. Yesterday’s “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” may be a hundred misses, but yesterday’s hundred misses of “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” are suddenly today’s one hit.

When we have the beginner’s mind in the practice of the way of the buddhas, if [we think that], since we are untrained and have not penetrated it, we might discard the way of the buddhas and take an other path, then we cannot attain the way of the buddhas. Those types who have not mastered the beginning and end of the practice of the way of the buddhas have difficulty clarifying the fact that this passage and blockage is reasonable.<sup>37</sup>

佛道は、初發心のときも佛道なり、成正覺のときも佛道なり、初・中・後ともに佛道なり。たとへば、萬里をゆくものの、一步も千里のうちなり、千歩も千里のうちなり。初一步と千歩とことなれども、千里のおなじきがごとし。しかあるを、至愚のともがらはおもふらく、學佛道の時は佛道にいたらず、果上のときのみ佛道なり、と。擧道説道をしらず、擧道行道をしらず、擧道證道をしらざるによりて、かくのごとし。迷人のみ佛道修行して大悟すと學して、不迷の人も佛道修行して大悟すとしらず、きかざるともがら、かくのごとくいふなり。

The way of the buddhas is the way of the buddhas at the time of the initial bringing forth of the mind [of bodhi]; it is the way of the buddhas at the time of attaining right awakening.<sup>38</sup> It is the way of the buddhas throughout beginning, middle, and end. For example, for one walking ten thousand miles, one step is within a thousand miles; the thousandth step is within a thousand miles.<sup>39</sup> The first one step and the thousandth step may be different, but the thousand miles are the same.

36 “one maturation” (ichirō 一老): Rō 老 is usually taken here as rōren 老練 (“mature,” “veteran”).

37 that this passage and blockage is reasonable (kono tsūsoku no dōri naru koto この通塞の道理なること): “Reasonable” here translates dōri 道理, elsewhere rendered as “principle,” “truth.” For the idiom, “passage and blockage” (tsūsoku 通塞), see above, Note 12.

38 initial bringing forth of the mind (sho hosshin 初發心); right awakening (shōga-ku 正覺): i.e., the outset and the culmination of the bodhisattva path. At issue here is the interpretation of the term butsudō 佛道 (“way of the buddhas”), which, depending on context, can mean (a) buddhahood, (b) the path to buddhahood, or (c) the expression of buddhahood.

39 a thousand miles (sen ri 千里): The value of the Chinese “mile” (li 里) varies throughout history, generally around one-third of the English mile.

Yet, an extremely stupid bunch thinks that, when we are studying the way of the buddhas, we have not reached the way of the buddhas; only when we attain the fruit is it the way of the buddhas. They are like this because they do not know about taking up the way and talking of the way, they do not know about taking up the way and practicing the way, they do not know about taking up the way and verifying the way. Those who talk like this are the bunch who learn that only the deluded practice the way of the buddhas and have the great awakening; they do not know, and have not heard, that the non-deluded also practice the way of the buddhas and have the great awakening.

Though we say that “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” before verification and accord is the way of the buddhas, we verify and accord through “talking of the mind and talking of the nature.” We should not learn that “verification and accord” refers only to the deluded initially having the great awakening: the deluded have the great awakening; the awakened have the great awakening; the unawakened have the great awakening; the undeluded have the great awakening; those who have verified and accorded verify and accord.

しかあれば、説心説性は、佛道の正直なり。杲公、この道理に達せず、説心説性すべからず、といふ、佛法の道理にあらず。いまの大宋國には、杲公におよべるもなし。

Thus, “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” is the direct [approach] of the way of the buddhas.<sup>40</sup> Mister Gao’s saying, without his having mastered this principle, that we should not engage in “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” is not a principle of the buddha dharma.<sup>41</sup> In the present Land of the great Song, there is no one who even reaches Mister Gao.

* * * * *

40 direct [approach] of the way of the buddhas (butsudō no shōjiki 佛道の正直): A loose translation of a somewhat odd locution; the term shōjiki 正直 would normally function as a modifier (“direct,” “directly,” “straightforward,” etc.).

41 Mister Gao (Kōkō 杲公): “Mister” renders kō 公, a title not normally applied to a Zen master; here probably carries a certain ironic tone.

高祖悟本大師、ひとり諸祖のなかの尊として、説心説性の、説心説性なる道理に通達せり。いまだ通達せざる諸方の祖師、いまの因縁のごとくなる道取なし。

The Eminent Ancestor, Great Master Wuben, the single most honored among the ancestors, penetrated the principle that “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature.”<sup>42</sup> The ancestral masters of all quarters who have not penetrated it have no sayings like this present episode.<sup>43</sup>

When elder brother Sengmi and the Great Master were traveling, [Dongshan] pointed out a cloister beside [the road] and said, “Inside, there’s someone talking of the mind and talking of the nature.”

この道取は、高祖出世よりこのかた、法孫かならず祖風を正傳せり、餘門の、夢にも見聞せるところにあらず、いはんや夢にも領覽の方をしらんや。ただ嫡嗣たるもの、正傳せり。この道理、もし正傳せざらんは、いかでか佛道に達本ならん。いはゆるいまの道理は、或裏・或面、有人・人有、説心説性なり。面裏心説、面裏性説なり。これを參究功夫すべし。性にあらざる説、いまになし、説にあらざる心、いまだあらず。

Ever since the Eminent Ancestor appeared in the world, his dharma descendants have always correctly transmitted this saying [as] the ancestral style. It is not something other traditions have seen even in their dreams; still less have they known, even in their dreams, how to understand it.<sup>44</sup> Only those who are legitimate heirs have correctly transmitted it. How can one who does not correctly transmit this truth reach the origin on the way of the buddhas? The truth in question here is: whether “inside” or “surface,” “there’s someone” and “someone’s there” “talking 42 The Eminent Ancestor, Great Master Wuben (Kōso Gohon Daishi 高祖悟本大師): I.e., Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价.

43 this present episode (ima no innen いまの因縁): Literally, “causes and conditions,” the term innen is regularly used in Zen texts to indicate a story, or “old case” (kosoku 古則), or kōan. The reference is to the Dongshan story with which this piece began; Dōgen now proceeds to a line-by-line Japanese translation and commentary on the story.

44 not something other traditions have seen even in their dreams (yomon no, yume ni mo kenmon seru tokoro ni arazu 餘門の、夢にも見聞せるところにあらず): I.e., something others have never dreamt of; a Japanese rendering of a standard Zen insult often used by Dōgen in its Chinese form, mu ya miken zai 夢也未見在. “Other traditions” (yomon) presumably refers to those outside the Caodong (Sōtō) lineage of Dongshan.

of the mind and talking of the nature.”<sup>45</sup> It is within the surface, the mind is talking; within the surface, the nature is talking.<sup>46</sup> We should investigate and work at this. There has not yet been “talking” that is not “nature”; there is no “mind” that is not “talking.”

“Buddha nature” means all “talking.” “No buddha nature” means all “talking.” Though one studies the nature of the buddha nature, those who do not study “having buddha nature” are not studying the way; those who do not study “no buddha nature” are not studying the way. Those who study that “talking” is “the nature” are the legitimate descendants of the buddhas and ancestors; those who believe and accept that “the nature” is “talking” are the buddhas and ancestors of the legitimate descendants.

心は疏動し、性は恬靜なり、と道取するは外道の見なり。性は澄湛にして、相は遷移する、と道取するは、外道の見なり。佛道の學心・學性、しかあらず、佛道の行心・行性は、外道にひとしからず、佛道の明心・明性は、外道その分あるべからず。

To say that the mind is disturbed and the nature is composed is the view of other paths; to say that the nature is clear and deep and the characteristics shift and move is the view of other paths.<sup>47</sup> The study of 45 “inside” or “surface” (waku ri waku men 或裏或面): Dōgen is here playing with the two elements of the binome rimen 裏面; see above, Note I. Presumably, he is thereby calling into question any assumption that the “someone” is only “inside.”

“there’s someone” and “someone’s there” (unin nin’u 有人人有): Dōgen is simply reversing the order of subject and predicate in Dongshan’s phrase, “there’s someone.”

46 within the surface, the mind is talking; within the surface, the nature is talking (menri shin setsu, menri shō setsu 面裏心説、面裏性説): Here, Dōgen reverses the syntax of all three expressions: rimen 裏面 (“inside”), sesshin 説心 (“talking of the mind”), and sesshō 説性 (“talking of the nature”).

47 the mind is disturbed and the nature is composed (shin wa sodō shi, shō wa tenjō nari 心は疏動し、性は恬靜なり): I.e., the common notion that, although our minds are active, the true nature of our minds is calm.

the nature is clear and deep and the characteristics shift and move (shō wa chōtan ni shite, sō wa sen’i suru 性は澄湛にして、相は遷移する): I.e., the standard distinction between the unchanging nature and the changing features of things.

other paths (gedō 外道): I.e., non-Buddhist, or heterodox, religious traditions; S. tīrthika.

the mind and study of the nature on the way of the buddhas are not like this. The practice of the mind and practice of the nature on the way of the buddhas are not equivalent to the other paths. The clarification of the mind and the clarification of the nature on the way of the buddhas, the other paths have no share in.

On the way of the buddhas, there is the “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” of “someone”; there is the “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” of no one. There is the not talking of the mind and not talking of the nature of “someone”; there is the not talking of the mind and not talking of the nature of no one. There is talking of the mind and not talking of the mind; talking of the nature and not talking of the nature. When one has not studied “talking of the mind” at the time when there is no one, then “talking of the mind” has not reached the field.<sup>48</sup> When one has not studied “talking of the mind” at the time when there is “someone,” then “talking of the mind” has not reached the field. We study no one who “talks of the mind”; we study no one “talking of the mind”; we study this one who “talks of the mind”; we study this one “talking of the mind.””<sup>49</sup>

Linji’s total power to say something is just “the true person of no rank,” but he still has not said, “the true person of rank.”<sup>50</sup> He has not

48 “talking of the mind” has not reached the field (sesshin mitō denchi 説心未到田地): Usually interpreted to mean that [unless one understands “no one” “talking of the mind,”] one has not yet understood “talking of the mind.” The agricultural term denchi 田地 (“paddy field”) is often used in Zen texts for a realm of discourse or state of mind.

49 no one who “talks of the mind” (sesshin munin 説心無人); no one “talking of the mind” (munin sesshin 無人説心): Tentative translations of phrases that could be parsed in several other ways: e.g., “talking of the mind is without anyone,” “there is no one who talks of the mind,” etc.

50 “true person of no rank” (mui shinnin 無位真人): A famous saying by Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866), founder of the Linji 臨濟 house of Chan (of which Dahui was a member). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “True person of no rank.”

realized what remains to be studied, what remains to be said; we can say he has not reached the ground of penetration.<sup>51</sup> Because “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” are talking of the buddhas and talking of the ancestors, we meet them in the ear, we meet them in the eye.<sup>52</sup>

ちなみに僧密師伯いはく、是誰。

The elder brother Sengmi said, “Who is it?”

[42:24]

When he expresses this saying, elder brother Sengmi should previously avail himself of this saying and should subsequently avail himself of this saying.<sup>53</sup> “Who is it?” is the “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” over there.<sup>54</sup> Therefore, when “who is it?” is said, when “who is it?” is thought, this is itself “talking of the mind and talking of the nature.” This “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” is something 51 he has not reached the ground of penetration (mitō santetsu chi 未到參徹地): A phrase that picks up the expression “has not reached the field” in the preceding paragraph. The English “ground” here tries to capture something of the semantic functions of the term chi 地, which reminds the reader both of the earlier “field” (denchi 田地) and of the “grounds,” or “ranks” (chi 地; S. bhūmi), of the Buddhist path that Linji’s saying is dismissing.

52 we meet them in the ear, we meet them in the eye (nisho ni shōken shi, gensho ni shōken su 耳處に相見し、眼處に相見す): Or “we see them in the visual sphere, we see them in the auditory sphere.” The terms nisho 耳處 (S. śrotāyatana) and gensho 眼處 (S. cakṣurāyatana) are used in technical Buddhist vocabulary respectively for the sense fields of vision and hearing.

53 When he expresses this saying (kono dōshu o genjō seshimuru ni この道取を現成せしむるに): Or “when this saying is brought to realization.” The verb in the original is a causative, the agent of which is unexpressed; it could be understood either as “we” or as “he.”

previously avail himself (saki ni mo . . . jōzu さきにも . . . 乗ず); subsequently avail himself (nochi ni mo . . . jōzu のちにも . . . 乗ず): This could be interpreted to mean simply that, in the story, Sengmi asks the question twice; but commentators regularly take it to suggest that the question is a timeless one.

54 over there (nari 那裏): The translation masks what may be a play with this term, which includes the element ri 裏 of Dongshan’s “inside” (menri 面裏); hence, the suggestion that Sengmi’s question is itself what is being talked about there in the cloister. Some would interpret nari here to be an oblique reference to the “teaching of the mind and teaching of the nature” that is “over there,” beyond a conventional meaning.

that those of other quarters have never known.<sup>55</sup> They have forgotten their child and taken it for a thief; so “they see the thief as their child.”<sup>56</sup>

大師いはく、被師伯一問、直得去死十分。

The Great Master said, “Once he’s questioned by my elder brother, he’s definitely completely dead.”

When mediocre types of students hear these words, they think that the “someone” who is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature,” upon being asked, “who is it?” is “definitely completely dead.” The reason is that they are facing the words, “who is it?” without recognizing them, without any view of them at all; hence, [the words] are “dead words.”<sup>57</sup> This is not necessarily the case. Those who have penetrated this “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” are rare. To be “dead” a hundred percent is not to be “dead” ten or twenty percent; hence “dead” is a hundred percent.<sup>58</sup> At the very moment of being “questioned,” who would hold that this is not shielding the heavens and covering the earth?<sup>59</sup> Illumining the past is cut off; illumining the present is cut off, illumining the future is cut off. Illumining this very moment is cut off.

55 those of other quarters (yohō no tomogara 餘方のともがら): A term of ambiguous reference; presumably, those (like Dahui and Linji) in other Chan traditions.

56 “see the thief as their child” (zoku o ninjite ko to su 賊を認じて子とす): Dōgen’s vernacular rendering of a common Zen saying (nin zoku i shi 認賊爲子), used to describe an egregious error; usually traced to the Śūraṅgama-sūtra (Shulengyan jing 首楞嚴經, T.945.19:108c21).

57 “dead words” (shiku 死句): A standard expression for empty, ineffective language. Dōgen is, of course, playing with the term shi 死 (“dead”) in Dongshan’s remark. To retain something of this play, one might treat shiku 死句 here not only as “dead words” but as “deadly words.”

58 “dead” a hundred percent (jūbun no kyoshi 十分の去死); “dead” is a hundred percent (kyoshi no jūbun 去死の十分): Dōgen is here playing with Dongshan’s expression, kyoshi jūbun 去死十分 (“completely dead”).

59 shielding the heavens and covering the earth (shaten gaichi 遮天蓋地): Generally interpreted to mean “all inclusive.”

僧密師伯いはく、説心説性底誰。

The elder brother Sengmi said, “Then who is it that’s talking of the mind and talking of the nature?”

[42:28]

さきの是誰といまの是誰と、その名は張三なりとも、その人は李四なり。

The previous “who is it?” and this “who is it?” though the name is Zhang’s third, the person is Li’s fourth.<sup>60</sup>

[42:29]

大師いはく、死中得活。

The Great Master said, “In death, he lives.”

In regard to this “in death,” [we should not] think that it is directly pointing to the “definitely dead”; it is not directly pointing to [the one who is] “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” and arbitrarily saying, “who is it?”<sup>61</sup> “Who is it?” arranges the “someone” who is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature.”<sup>62</sup> There should be a study holding that he does not wait ten thousand times to be a hundred percent “dead.”<sup>63</sup> The Great Master’s words, “In death, he lives,” are the voices and forms of “someone talking of the mind and talking of the nature” right before us. Again, they are also one or two parts of a hundred 60 Zhang’s third (Chō san 張三); Li’s fourth (Li shi 李四): From the Chinese idiom Zhang san Li si 張三李四 (“Zhang’s third son, Li’s fourth son”), used (as we might use “Tom, Dick, and Harry”) to indicate anyone at all. The sentence is usually interpreted to mean simply that Sengmi is asking twice about the same person.

61 In regard to this “in death” (kono shichū wa この死中は): A sentence difficult to parse, for which there are varied readings. The translation takes the final negative to govern both clauses. However the sentence is read, the point seems to be that we should not think that “in death” refers to the same state as “dead,” or that “who is it?” refers to the one who is “talking of the mind and talking of the nature.”

62 arranges the “someone” (unin o sahai su 有人を差排す): Taken to mean that the question “who is it?” refers to an array of “someones.”

63 he does not wait ten thousand times (banki sezu 萬期せず): Or “does not have ten thousand expectations.” Usually understood to mean, “is already always [a hundred percent dead].”

percent “dead.” Life may be fully alive, but it is not death changing to appear as life: it is just the sloughing off of “he lives” that is true from head to tail.<sup>64</sup>

おほよそ佛道・祖道には、かくのごとくの説心説性ありて、參究せらるるなり。又且のときは十分の死を死して、得活の活計を現成するなり。

In general, there is this kind of “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” that is investigated on the way of the buddhas and the way of the ancestors. When we go further, by dying a complete death, we realize the way of life of “he lives.”

We should realize that, from the Tang period till today, there have been many pitiable types who have not clarified the fact that “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” are the way of the buddhas, who are in the dark about the “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” in teaching, practice, and verification, and who talk rashly and speak wildly. We should save them before the body and after the body.<sup>65</sup> What I say to them is this: “talking of the mind and talking of the nature” are the essential functions of the seven buddhas and the ancestral masters.

Talking of the Mind, Talking of the Nature

64 true from head to tail (zushin bishin 頭正尾正): A fairly common expression meaning “correct throughout,” “entirely right.”

This is perhaps the most difficult passage of the text. One possible paraphrase of its “argument” might look like this.

The “death” in Dongshan’s statement, “in death,” does not refer simply to the state he calls “dead,” just as Sengmi’s “who is it” does not refer simply to a person “talking of the mind and talking of the nature.” Rather, the question “who is it?” refers to the array of phenomena that are all “talking of the mind and talking of the nature”; and these phenomena are always “dead,” always alive in death. They are what is occurring right before us. They are all both “dead” and “alive”; they are all completely liberated even as they live and die.

65 before the body and after the body (shinsen shingo 身先身後): See above, Note 28.

INTRODUCTION

This essay was composed at Kippōji (also known as Yoshiminedera) in the autumn of 1243, some two months after its author had ended his mission in the capital and withdrawn to the rural province of Echizen. The text represents number 43 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō and number 50 in the Honzan edition; it does not appear in the sixty-chapter compilation but is listed as number 6 of fascicle 1 in the twenty-eight-text Himitsu Shōbōgenzō.

Like some other chapters from this period, “Shohō jissō” includes some sharp criticism of recent Chan masters in Song Chin, whom he takes to task for their association of Buddhism with Daoism and Confucianism, their ignorance of the wisdom of the Zen ancestors, and their failure to appreciate the significance of the title phrase of this essay, “the real marks (or mark) of the dharmas.” The phrase occurs in a famous passage in Kumārajīva’s translation of the Lotus Sūtra as the object of knowledge available only to the buddhas. While the translation here follows one likely reading of the phrase, taking it to mean something like “the true features of phenomena,” the Japanese Tendai tradition in which Dōgen was trained tended to interpret the phrase as the metaphysical claim that “the dharmas are the real mark” — i.e., that “all phenomena are marked by reality (or are ultimately real).” While the Lotus Sūtra plays a central role in Dōgen’s Buddhism, it is much less conspicuous in the sayings of the Song-dynasty Chan masters — hence, Dōgen’s disappointment that they seemed largely to ignore this phrase.

Dōgen often quotes or alludes to the Lotus Sūtra throughout the Shōbōgenzō; here, however, he is not merely using the sūtra as a proof text in support of his comments on Zen but is commenting on passages of the sūtra itself, much as he comments on the sayings of the Zen masters. This practice of treating the sūtra as the recorded sayings of Śākyamuni has no real precedent in the Chinese Chan literature and makes the “Shohō jissō” chapter an interesting expression of the Buddhism of a Japanese Tendai convert to Zen. Equally interesting as the expression of a young Japanese pilgrim in China is a passage near the end of the chapter, in which Dōgen relates his personal experience of a late-night talk by his teacher, Rujing.

The Real Marks of the Dharmas

佛祖の現成は、究盡の實相なり、實相は諸法なり、諸法は如是相なり、如是性なり、如是身なり、如是心なり、如是世界なり、如是雲雨なり、如是行住坐臥なり、如是憂喜動靜なり、如是拄杖拂子なり、如是拈華破顔なり、如是嗣法授記なり、如是參學辦道なり、如是松操竹節なり。

The realization of the buddhas and ancestors is the real marks exhaustively investigated.<sup>1</sup> The real marks are the dharmas; the dharmas are “such marks,” are “such natures,” are such bodies, are such minds, are such worlds, are such clouds and rain, are such walking, standing, sitting, and reclining, are such anger and joy, motion and rest; they are such staffs and whisks, are such holding up a flower and breaking into a smile; they are such inheriting the dharma and conferring a prediction, are such investigating and pursuing the way, are such constancy of pine and restraint of bamboo.<sup>2</sup>

1 the real marks exhaustively investigated (gūjin no jissō 究盡の實相): Or “the real marks of exhaustive investigation.” From the line in the Lotus Sūtra quoted in the next section: “Only buddhas and buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas.”

2 “such marks” (nyoze sō 如是相); “such natures” (nyoze shō 如是性): Dōgen begins here a list, initially derived from the Lotus Sūtra passage he will quote in the next section, but continuing on to members of his own invention. “Marks” (sō 相; S. lakṣaṇa) refers to the attributes, or distinctive features, by which a thing is recognized; “natures” (shō 性; S. svabhāva) refers to the essence of a thing.

holding up a flower and breaking into a smile (nenge hagan 拈華破顔): From the famous founding legend of Zen, in which Buddha Śākyamuni holds up a flower and his disciple Mahākāśyapa smiles. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Holding up a flower and breaking into a smile.”

constancy of pine and restraint of bamboo (shōsō chikusetsu 松操竹節): A play with the term sōsetsu 操節, meaning to be well-disciplined and steadfast, combined with the image of the pine as evergreen and, thus, constant, and the bamboo, the nodes of which are designated by the term (setsu 節) used for “limit,” or “restraint.” An unusual expression, not occurring elsewhere in Dōgen’s writing.

釋迦牟尼佛言、唯佛與佛、乃能究盡諸法實相。所謂諸法、如是相・如是性・如是體・如是力・如是作・如是因・如是緣・如是果・如是報・如是本末究竟等。

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas — i.e., that the dharmas are of such marks, such natures, such substance, such power, such actions, such causes, such conditions, such effects, such recompense, such ultimate equivalence from beginning to end.”<sup>3</sup>

The “ultimate equivalence from beginning to end” said by the Tathāgata is what “the real marks of the dharmas” themselves say, is “The Ācārya said it himself”; it is the study of equivalence; for their study is equivalent.<sup>4</sup>

3 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:5c10-13); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas.” One of the most famous passages in the sūtra, the source of the so-called “ten suchnesses” (jū nyoze 十如是) of Tiantai exegesis (see, e.g., Fahua xuanyi 法華玄義, T.1716.33:693b9ff). The extant Sanskrit for this passage is somewhat different from Kumārajīva’s version and lists only five aspects of the dharmas known by the tathāgata: which (ya) the dharmas are, how (yathā) they are, what they are like (yādrś), what their marks (lakṣaṇa) are, what their natures (svabhāva) are.

Only buddhas with buddhas (yui butsu yo butsu 唯佛與佛): I.e., “only the buddhas” (no doubt rendering the Sanskrit tathāgata eva). The awkward English here tries to retain Kumārajīva’s four-word expression with which Dōgen will play below.

4 “The Ācārya said it himself” (jari ji dōshu 闍梨自道取): I.e., “you said it yourself.” The term ācārya, originally meaning a Buddhist instructor, is regularly used by Zen teachers in direct address to their students. Perhaps reflecting the words of Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:323a26-27):

僧便問、如何是主中主。師曰、闍梨自道取。

The monk asked further, “What is the master within the master?”

The Master [Dongshan] said, “The Ācārya said it himself.”

it is the study of equivalence; for their study is equivalent (ittō no sangaku nari, sangaku wa ittō naru ga yue ni 一等の參學なり、參學は一等なるがゆえに): The punctuation here follows Kawamura’s edition; the last phrase could also be read with the sentence following: “Because their study is equivalent, ‘only buddhas with buddhas’ are ‘the real marks of the dharmas’; ‘the real marks of the dharmas’ are ‘only buddhas with buddhas.’” The translation assumes that the term ittō 一等 refers to the “equivalent” study by the three speakers: “the Tathāgata,” “the real marks of the dharmas,” and “the Ācārya”; and it can also of course refer to their study of the “equivalence” (iō 等) in the phrase “ultimate equivalence from beginning to end.”

[43:4] {1:458}

唯佛與佛は、諸法實相なり、諸法實相は、唯佛與佛なり。唯佛は、實相なり、與佛は、諸法なり。諸法の道を聞取して、一と參じ、多と參ずべからず。實相の道を聞取して、虚にあらざと學し、性にあらざと學すべからず。實は、唯佛なり、相は、與佛なり、乃能は、唯佛なり、究盡は、與佛なり、諸法は、唯佛なり、實相は、與佛なり。諸法のまさに諸法なるを、唯佛と稱す、諸法のいまし實相なるを、與佛と稱す。

“Only buddhas with buddhas” are “the real marks of the dharmas”; “the real marks of the dharmas” are “only buddhas with buddhas.” “Only buddhas” are “the real marks”; “with buddhas” are “the dharmas.” Hearing the words “the dharmas,” we should not study them as one, nor study them as many; hearing the words “the real marks,” we should not study that they are not vacuous, nor study that they are not the nature.<sup>5</sup> “Real” is “only buddhas”; “marks” are “with buddhas”; “can” is “only buddhas”; “exhaustively investigate” is “with buddhas”; “the dharmas” are “only buddhas”; “the real marks” are “with buddhas.” That “the dharmas” are truly “the dharmas” is called “only buddhas”; that “the dharmas” at this moment are “the real marks” is called “with buddhas.”

[43:5]

しかあれば、諸法のみづから諸法なる、如是相あり、如是性あり。實相のまさしく實相なる、如是相あり、如是性あり。唯佛與佛と出現於世するは、諸法實相の説取なり、行取なり、證取なり。その説取は、乃能究盡なり。究盡なりといへども、乃能なるべし。初・中・後にあらざるゆえに、如是相なり、如是性なり。このゆえに初・中・後善といふ。

Thus, there are “such marks,” there are “such natures,” in which “the dharmas” are themselves “the dharmas”; there are “such marks,” there are “such natures,” in which “the real marks” are truly “the real marks.” “To appear in the world” as “only buddhas with buddhas” is the preaching, is the practice, is the verification, of “the real marks of the dharmas.”<sup>6</sup> The preaching is “can exhaustively investigate.” While it may be “exhaustively investigate,” it should be “can.”<sup>7</sup> Because it is not begin-

5 we should not study them as one, nor study them as many (ichi to sanji, ta to sanzu bekarazu 一と參じ、多と參ずべからず): I.e., though the term shohō 諸法 (“dharmas”) is a plural form, we should not treat it as either singular or plural.

not vacuous (ko ni arazu 虚にあらざ); not the nature (shō ni arazu 性にあらざ): I.e., we should not think that “real” implies the opposite of empty of reality; we should not think that “marks” implies phenomenal characteristics as opposed to essential nature.

6 “To appear in the world” (shutsugen o se 出現於世): Allusion to the famous lines of the Lotus Sūtra, in which Śākyamuni announces that the purpose of Buddhism is to lead beings to buddhahood. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas, the world-honored ones, appear in the world for the reason of one great matter alone.”

7 While it may be “exhaustively investigate,” it should be “can” (gūjin nari to iedomo, nai nō naru beshi 究盡なりといへども、乃能なるべし): Perhaps meaning ning, middle, and end, it is “such marks,” it is “such natures”; therefore, it is said, “good in the beginning, middle, and end.”<sup>8</sup>

乃能究盡といふは、諸法實相なり、諸法實相は、如是相なり、如是相は、乃能究盡如是性なり、如是性は、乃能究盡如是體なり、如是體は、乃能究盡如是力なり、如是力は、乃能究盡如是作なり、如是作は、乃能究盡如是因なり、如是因は、乃能究盡如是縁なり、如是縁は、乃能究盡如是果なり、如是果は、乃能究盡如是報なり、如是報は、乃能究盡本末究竟等なり。

“Can exhaustively investigate” means “the true marks of the dhar-mas.” “The true marks of the dharmas” are “such marks”; “such marks” are “such natures” that “can exhaustively investigate”; “such natures” are “such substance” that “can exhaustively investigate”; “such substance” is “such power” that “can exhaustively investigate”; “such power” is “such actions” that “can exhaustively investigate”; “such actions” are “such causes” that “can exhaustively investigate”; “such causes” are “such conditions” that “can exhaustively investigate”; “such conditions” are “such effects” that “can exhaustively investigate”; “such effects” are “such recompense” that “can exhaustively investigate”; “such recompense” is “such ultimate equivalence from beginning to end” that “can exhaustively investigate.”<sup>9</sup>

The saying “ultimate equivalence from beginning to end” is truly “suchness” realized.<sup>10</sup> Hence, the “effects” of the effects of effects are something like, “while the buddha’s preaching expresses the ultimate meaning (‘exhaustively investigate’), it must also include practical instruction (‘can’).”

8 “good in the beginning, middle, and end” (sho chū go zen 初・中・後善): Variation on a common description of the buddha dharma, as seen in the Lotus Sūtra and many other Buddhist texts; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Good in the beginning, middle, and end.”

9 “such natures” that “can exhaustively investigate” (nai nō gūjin nyoze shō 乃能究盡如是性): Presumably, to be understood, “such natures that [only buddhas with buddhas] can exhaustively investigate”; and similarly, mutatis mutandis, throughout this sentence.

10 “suchness” realized (genjō no nyoze 現成の如是): Or “the suchness of realization.” I.e., the ultimate truth manifest in the world.

not the “effects” of causes and effects; therefore, the “effects” of causes and effects must be the “effects” of the effects of effects.<sup>11</sup> Because these “effects” obstruct the “marks,” “natures,” “substance,” and “power,” the “marks,” “natures,” “substance,” “power,” and the rest, of “the dharmas,” however incalculable and limitless, are “the real marks.”<sup>12</sup> Because these “effects” do not obstruct the “marks,” “natures,” “substance,” and “power,” the “marks,” “natures,” “substance,” “power,” and the rest, of “the dharmas,” are together “the real marks.” When the “effects,” “recompense,” “causes,” “conditions,” and the rest, are left entirely to obstruct the “marks,” “natures,” “substance,” “power,” and the rest, we have a saying of eighty or ninety percent; when the “effects,” “recompense,” “causes,” “conditions,” and the rest, are left entirely not to obstruct the “marks,” “natures,” “substance,” “power,” and the rest, we have a saying of a hundred percent.

いはゆるの如是相は、一相にあらず、如是相は、一如是にあらず、無量無邊、不可道、不可測の如是なり。百千の量を量とすべからず、諸法の量を量とすべし、實相の量を量とすべし。そのゆえは、唯佛與佛乃能究盡諸法實相なり、唯佛與佛乃能究盡諸法實性なり、唯佛與佛乃能究盡諸法實體なり、唯佛與佛乃能究盡諸法實力なり、唯佛與佛乃能究盡諸法實作なり、唯佛與佛乃能究盡諸法實因なり、唯佛與佛乃能究盡諸法實緣なり、唯佛與佛乃能究盡諸法實果なり、唯佛與佛乃能究盡諸法實報なり、唯佛與佛乃能究盡諸法實本末究竟等なり。

11 the “effects” of the effects of effects (ka ka no ka 果果の果): i.e., the effect that is the ultimate spiritual result. Reflecting a passage in the Nirvāṇa Sūtra (Da banniepan jing 大般涅槃經, T.374:12.524a5-8):

善男子、佛性者有因有因因、有果有果果。有因者即十二因緣。因因者即是智慧。有果者即是阿耨多羅三藐三菩提。果果者即是無上大般涅槃。

Good man, in the buddha nature there are causes and there are causes of causes; there are effects and there are effects of effects. That there are “causes” refers to the twelvefold causes and conditions; “causes of causes” refers to wisdom. That there are “effects” refers to anuttara-samyak-sambodhi; “effects of effects” refers to unsurpassed great parinirvāṇa.

therefore, the “effects” of causes and effects must be the “effects” of the effects of effects (kono yue ni, inga no ka wa, sunawachi ka ka no ka naru beshi このゆえに、因果の果は、すなはち果果の果なるべし): The logic of this apparently contradictory conclusion may be something like this: since the ultimate effect, unlike ordinary effects, is universal, it must subsume ordinary effects.

12 Because these “effects” obstruct the “marks,” “natures,” “substance,” and “power” (kono ka, sunawachi sō shō tai riki o ai keige suru ga yue ni この果、すなはち相・性・體・力をあひ罣礙するがゆえに): Here and below, the verb keige 罣礙 (“to obstruct”) likely has the sense “to define,” “to distinguish as” — a usage common in the Shōbōgenzō. Hence, the ten “suchnesses” may be “obstructed” (distinguished one from the other) or may be “unobstructed” (taken as a single “suchness”).

“Such marks” are not a single mark; “such marks” are not a single suchness: they are incalculable, limitless, inexpressible, unfathomable suchness.<sup>13</sup> We should not take the measure of hundreds of thousands as their measure; we should take the measure of “the dharmas” as their measure; we should take the measure of “the real marks” as their measure. The reason is “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas”; it is “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate” the real natures of the dharmas; it is “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate” the real substance of the dharmas; it is “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate” the real power of the dharmas; it is “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate” the real action of the dharmas; it is “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate” the real causes of the dharmas; it is “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate” the real conditions of the dharmas; it is “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate” the real effects of the dharmas; it is “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate” the real recompense of the dharmas; it is “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate” the real ultimate unity from beginning to end of the dharmas.<sup>14</sup>

かくのごとくの道理あるがゆえに、十方佛土は唯佛與佛のみなり、さらに一箇半箇の唯佛與佛にあらざるなし。唯と與とは、たとへば、體に體を具し、相の相を證せるなり。また、性を體として、性を存せるがごとし。このゆえにいはく、

Because there is a principle like this, the buddha lands of the ten directions are nothing but “only buddhas with buddhas”; there is not in addition one or a half that is not “only buddhas with buddhas.” “Only” and “with” are like providing “substance” with “substance,” like “marks”

13 a single mark (issō 一相): Or “the one mark,” a term often used to express the ultimate sameness of all phenomena; the mark of suchness.

14 The reason is “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas” (sono yue wa, yui butsu yo butsu nai nō gūjin shohō jissō nari そのゆえは、唯佛與佛乃能究盡諸法實相なり): Dōgen simply repeats here the line from the Lotus Sūtra quoted above, and then proceeds to use the same pattern with the other members of the list of ten “suchnesses.” It may be, however, that here he would like us to take the pattern as modifying these members, a reading that would yield something like this:

The reason is that they are “the real marks of the dharmas” that “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate”; they are the real natures of the dharmas that “only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate”; and so on, mutatis mutandis.

verifying “marks.”<sup>15</sup> Or, again, it is like maintaining “natures” by taking “natures” as “substance.”<sup>16</sup> Therefore, it is said,

Thus, the very time of “can exhaustively investigate” and the very time of “can know these” are both equally instances of “sometimes.”<sup>18</sup> If “I” were the same as or different from “the buddhas of the ten directions,” why would he express the words “and the buddhas of the ten directions”?<sup>19</sup> Because right here there are no “ten directions,” the “ten

15 “Only” and “with” are like providing “substance” with “substance,” like “marks” verifying “marks” (yui to yo to wa, tatoeba, tai ni tai o gu shi, sō no sō o shō seru nari 唯と與とは、たとへば、體に體を具し、相の相を證せるなり): Probably meaning that “only” and “with,” in the phrase “only buddhas with buddhas,” are redundant — like substance added to substance or marks realizing themselves as marks.

16 like maintaining “natures” by taking “natures” as “substance” (shō o tai tosh-ite, shō o zon seru ga gotoshi 性を體として、性を存せるがごとし): Though the exact sense is obscure, again, apparently indicating something superfluous, or unnecessary: among the ten “suchnesses,” preserving the item “natures” by treating it as the following item, “substance.”

17 “I and the buddhas of the ten directions can know these matters” (ga gyū jippō butsu, nai nō chi ze ji 我及十方佛、乃能知是事): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:5c23-24):

如是大果報、種種性相義、我及十方佛、乃能知是事。

Such great effects and recompense,

The manifold meanings of natures and marks —

I and the buddhas of the ten directions

Can know these matters.

18 are both equally instances of “sometimes” (onajiku kore menmen no uji nari おなじくこれ面面の有時なり): “Sometimes” here translates uji 有時, a term that receives extended treatment in the famous Shōbōgenzō chapter of the same name; often translated “being-time.”

19 If “I” were the same as or different from “buddhas of the ten directions” (ga moshi jippō butsu ni dōi seba 我もし十方佛に同異せば): Or simply, “if ‘I’ were different from ‘buddhas of the ten directions.’” Generally understood to mean, “if Buddha Śākyamuni and the other buddhas were separate beings subject to comparisons.” The oddity of the argument here suggests that, in the sūtra phrase ga gyū jippō butsu 我及十

このゆえに、實相の、實相に參學するを、佛祖の、佛祖に嗣法する、とす。これ、諸法の、諸法に授記するなり。唯佛の、唯佛のために傳法し、與佛の、與佛のために嗣法するなり。

Therefore, “the real marks” studying with “the real marks” represents the buddhas and ancestors inheriting the dharma of the buddhas and ancestors. This is “the dharmas” bestowing predictions on “the dharmas”; it is “only buddhas” transmitting the dharma for the sake of “only buddhas,” “with buddhas” inheriting the dharma for the sake of “with buddhas.”

方佛 (“I and the buddhas of the ten directions”), Dōgen may want us to read the word gyū 及, not as the conjunction “and,” but as the verb “to reach” — hence, “I extend to the buddhas of the ten directions.”

21 spring starting with the flowers, and people meeting the spring (haru wa hana ni iri, hito wa haru ni au 春は華にいり、人は春にあふ): I.e., spring is experienced as flowers blooming. “The real marks” is to “the dharmas” as “spring” is to “flowers.”

22 a person looking at water (hito no mizu o miru 人の水をみる): Some MS witnesses have “looking at fire” (hi 火) here, but clearly the metaphor is seeing one’s reflection on the surface of water.

23 bringing forth the mind [of bodhi], practice, bodhi, and nirvāṇa (hosshin shugyō bodai nehan 發心・修行・菩提・涅槃): I.e., the bodhisattva path, beginning with the aspiration for bodhi and ending with buddhahood and final nirvāṇa. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bring forth the mind.”

“Such marks” of wind, rain, water, and fire, are “exhaustively investigate”; “such natures” of blue, yellow, red, and white, are “exhaustively investigate.” By this “substance” and “power,” we “turn the commoner into a sage”; by this “effects” and “recompense,” we “transcend the buddhas and surpass the ancestors.”<sup>26</sup> By this “causes” and “conditions,”

24 “birth and death, coming and going, as the true human body” (shōji korai shinjitsu nintai 生死去來眞實人體): After the words of Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤 (1063-1135); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “True human body.”

we hold fast, and we let go (hajō shi hōgyō su 把定し放行す): An expression, often used by Dōgen, likely reflecting a line in a verse by Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227) (Rujing chanshi yulu 如淨禪師語錄, T.2002A.48:122c18):

放行把住逞風流。

Letting go and holding on, full of style.

25 with this as their vital artery, the flower opens and the fruit forms (kore o meimyaku toshite, kekai kekka su これを命脈として、華開・結果す): The term meimyaku 命脈 (“vital artery”) occurs often in the Shōbōgenzō, in the senses both of the “lifeblood” and the “bloodline” (especially of the lineage of the buddhas and ancestors). The vegetative image here no doubt recalls the transmission verse attributed to Bodhidharma (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:589b27-28):

吾本來茲土、傳法救迷情。一華開五葉、結果自然成。

I originally came to this land

To transmit the dharma and save deluded beings.

A single flower opens five petals;

The fruit forms, ripening naturally of itself.

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “A single flower opens five petals.”

with this as their bones and marrow, there are Kāśyapa and Ānanda (kore o kotsuzui toshite, Kashō Anan ari これを骨髓として、迦葉・阿難あり): Another allusion to the Zen lineage. “Bones and marrow” (kotsuzui 骨髓) recalls Bodhidharma’s testing of four disciples, to whom he said of each in turn that he (or, in one case, she) had got his skin, flesh, bones, and marrow; the story is recorded at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:230, case 201; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.” “Kāśyapa” (Kashō 迦葉) is Mahākāśyapa, the disciple of Śākyamuni recognized as the first ancestor of Zen; “Ānanda” (Anan 阿難) is Śākyamuni’s cousin and attendant, who became Mahākāśyapa’s disciple and is reckoned as the second ancestor.

26 “turn the commoner into a sage” (tenbon nisshō 轉凡入聖): I.e., advance on the Buddhist path from the status of a “common person” (bonbu 凡夫; S. prthagjana) to the “noble” (shō 聖; S. ārya). An expression apparently first appearing in the Si nianchu 四

“transcend the buddhas and surpass the ancestors” (chōbutsu osso 超佛越祖): A popular expression for the ultimate spiritual state, best known from a dialogue involving Yunmen Wenyan 雲門分偈 (864–949) found in several sources; see, e.g., Yunmen Kuangzhen chanshi guanglu 雲門匡眞禪師廣錄, T.1988.47:548b5-6:

時有僧問、如何是超佛越祖之談。師云、餬餅。

At the time, a monk asked, “What is the talk that transcends the buddhas and surpasses the ancestors?”

The Master [Yunmen] said, “Rice cakes.”

27 “grasping earth and making gold” (aku do jō gon 握土成金): Or “the earth in one’s hand turns to gold”; a metaphor for abrupt spiritual transformation, from the legend concerning Śākyamuni’s follower Śākya Mahānāma (Shaku Makanan 釋摩訶男) that whatever he held turned into a treasure. The phrase here is found in a criticism of asceticism without understanding by the seventh-century monk Huiman 慧滿 (dates unknown) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:221a28-29):

慧滿曰、祖師心印非專苦行。但助道耳。若契本心、發隨意眞光之用、則苦行如握土成金。

Huiman said,

The mind seal of the ancestral masters is not focused on the austere practices; they are only a subsidiary way. If you accord with your original mind, and produce the spontaneous functioning of the true radiance, then the austere practices will be like “grasping earth and making gold.”

transmitting the dharma and bequeathing the robe (denbō fue 傳法附衣): I.e., the Zen lineage; from the tradition that the first ancestors of the lineage in China passed down the robe of Bodhidharma to their successors.

“All bodhisattvas” means “all buddhas.” Buddhas and bodhisattvas are not different types, not senior and junior, not superior and inferior. This bodhisattva and that bodhisattva are not two people, not self and other; although not past, present, or future, becoming a buddha is their procedure for practicing on the bodhisattva path. They attain buddhahood at the initial bringing forth of the mind [of bodhi]; they attain buddhahood at the stage of marvelous awakening.<sup>36</sup> There are bodhisattvas who have

“All bodhisattvas” are the original ancestors of all buddhas; all buddhas are the original teachers of all bodhisattvas. The unsurpassed bodhi of these buddhas — whether practiced and verified in the past, whether practiced and verified in the present, whether practiced and verified in the future, whether practiced and verified before this body, whether practiced and verified after this mind — is all, in beginning, middle, and end, “this sūtra.” Both that which “belongs” and that to which it “belongs” are equally “this sūtra.”<sup>37</sup> This very time is “this sūtra” verifying “all bodhisattvas.”<sup>38</sup>

The “sūtra” is not sentient; the “sūtra” is not insentient. The “sūtra” is not conditioned; the “sūtra” is not unconditioned.<sup>39</sup> Nevertheless, when it verifies the bodhisattva, verifies the person, verifies the “real marks,” 37 Both that which “belongs” and that to which it “belongs” are equally “this sūtra” (nōzoku shozoku, onajiku kono kyō nari 能屬・所屬、おなじくこの經なり): i.e. both the “sūtra” and the “unsurpassed bodhi” are “this sūtra.”

39 not conditioned (ui ni arazu 有爲にあらず); not unconditioned (mui ni arazu 無爲にあらず): Following the standard interpretation of these terms as translations of Sanskrit saṃskṛta and asaṃskṛta respectively; but in this context, the sense may be that the sūtra neither has nor lacks intentional action.

verifies “this sūtra,” it “opens the gate of expedient means.”<sup>40</sup> “The gate of expedient means” is the unsurpassed virtue of the fruit of buddhahood; it is “the dharmas abide in their dharma positions”; it is “the marks of the world constantly abide.”<sup>41</sup> “The gate of expedient means” is not a temporary device; it is the study of the entire world in the ten directions; it is taking up “the real marks of the dharmas” and studying them. Although this “gate of expedient means” is appearing and, in the entire world in the ten directions, is covering the world in the ten directions, those who are not “all bodhisattvas” are not in its realm.

Xuefeng said, “All the whole earth is the gate of liberation, but even if you drag them, people don’t consent to go in.”<sup>42</sup>

Therefore, we should realize that, while all the earth, all the worlds, may be a “gate,” it is not easy to go in and out of it, and those who go in and out are few. Even if you “drag them,” they do not go in or out; even if you do not “drag them,” they do not go in or out. Those that step forward will make a mistake; those that step back will get stuck.<sup>43</sup> Now what? If we take up the people and try to get them in and out of the gate, they get further from the gate; when we take up the gate and put it in the people, there will be some who go in and out.

40 it verifies the bodhisattva (bosatsu o shō shi 菩薩を證し): The grammatical subject is unstated; presumably the “sūtra.”

42 Xuefeng (Seppō 雪峰): I.e., Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822–908). The quotation is a variant of a saying found in several sources; see, e.g., Zongmen tongyao ji 宗門統要集, ZTS.1:183c10; Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要, ZZ.136:784a12.

43 Those that step forward (shinpo no mono 進歩のもの); those that step back (taiho no mono 退歩のもの): The expression “stepping forward and stepping back” (shinpo taiho 進歩退歩) occurs regularly in Dōgen’s writings; it can refer simply to all the ordinary movements of the agent, or more specifically, to motion forward and back. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Stepping forward and stepping back.” Here, no doubt, those who try to enter the “gate of liberation” and those who do not.

[43:25] {1:463}

“Opening the gate of expedient means” is “revealing the true real marks.” “Revealing the true real marks” covers all time, with beginning, middle, and end cut off.<sup>44</sup> The principle of that very opening of the “opening of the gate of expedient means” is the “opening of the gate of expedient means” throughout all the worlds in the ten directions.<sup>45</sup> At this very moment, if we truly look at all the worlds in the ten directions, they have a form never before seen: one or two sheets and three or four pieces of all the worlds in the ten directions have been taken up and made the “opening of the gate of expedient means.” According to this, while it may appear that they are equally “opening the gate of expedient means,” it appears rather that so many of all the worlds in the ten directions have taken their share of a small portion of “opening the gate of expedient means” and made it their realized face.<sup>46</sup> A style like this is entirely the power of “belonging to the sūtra.”

44 covers all time, with beginning, middle, and end cut off (gaiji ni shite, sho chū go saidan nari 蓋時にして、初・中・後際斷なり): Probably meaning that the activity of “revealing the true real mark” is going on all the time, in each individual moment. For the expression “before and after cut off” (zengo saidan 前後際斷), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before and after cut off.”

45 the “opening of the gate of expedient means” throughout all the worlds in the ten directions (jin jippō kai ni kai hōben mon suru 盡十方界に開方便門する): Probably meaning that the “opening” is occurring everywhere around us. This entire section is quite difficult; one possible paraphrase of the argument might look something like this:

The revelation of the ultimate truth is going on everywhere at all times. When we see the world in this light, we see the revelation in each experience of the world. This does not mean that all these experiences can be reduced to a single revelation of the ultimate truth; rather, each of our countless experiences of the world is a unique revelation. Such a way of seeing is the unsurpassed perfect bodhi that the sūtra offers the bodhisattvas.

46 made it their realized face (genjō no menmoku to seri 現成の面目とせり): Or “made it the face of their realization”; presumably, meaning that countless worlds are manifest when the gate of expedient means is opened.

[43:26]

示眞實相といふは、諸法實相の言句を、盡界に風聞するなり、盡界に成道するなり。實相諸法の道理を、盡人に領覽せしむるなり、盡法に現出せしむるなり。

“Revealing the true real marks” means to spread talk of the words, “the real marks of the dharmas,” throughout all the worlds, to attain the way throughout all the worlds. It is to make the truth, “the dharmas of the real marks,” discernable among all humans, to make it appear among all dharmas.<sup>47</sup>

[43:27]

Therefore, the unsurpassed bodhi of the forty buddhas and forty ancestors “belongs wholly to this sūtra.”<sup>48</sup> It “belongs to this sūtra,” and “this sūtra belongs” to it. That the rush cushion and meditation board are anuttara-bodhi “belongs wholly to this sūtra.”<sup>49</sup> Holding up a flower and breaking into a smile, making a bow and getting the marrow, both “belong wholly to this sūtra,” are “the belongings of this sūtra.”<sup>50</sup> They are “opening the gate of expedient means, revealing the true real marks.”

48 forty buddhas and forty ancestors (shijū butsu shijisso 四十佛・四十祖): I.e., the seven buddhas, twenty-seven Indian ancestors of Zen from Mahākāśyapa through Prajñātāra, and six ancestors in China from Bodhidharma through Huineng. Calculation of the numbers in the lineage are complicated by the fact that traditional listings of the members typically count Bodhidharma twice, as both the twenty-eighth Indian and first Chinese ancestor. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas,” and “Buddhas and ancestors.”

49 rush cushion and meditation board (futon zenpan 蒲團・禪版): I.e., the meditation cushion and the stick used to support the chin during meditation.

making a bow and getting the marrow (raihai tokuzui 禮拜得髓): Reference to Bodhidharma’s testing of his disciples (see above, Note 25), in which Huike 慧可 is recognized as having gotten his master’s marrow when he simply bowed without speaking.

Nevertheless, recently a type of illiterate in the Land of the Great Song, not knowing the destination, not seeing the treasure trove, treats the words “real marks” as empty talk and goes on to study the words of Laozi and Zhuangzi.<sup>51</sup> These, they say, are the equal of the great way of the buddhas and ancestors. Or they say the three teachings are one. Or they say the three teachings are like the three legs of a tripodal pot, which will fall over if it lacks one of them.<sup>52</sup> Idiocy to this extreme is beyond compare.

We should not acknowledge that the type that has words like this has heard the buddha dharma. Why is this? The buddha dharma had its origin in Sindh in the West. For the eighty years [the Buddha] was in the world, for the fifty years he preached the dharma, he actively converted humans and devas.<sup>53</sup> He “converted all living beings, causing them all 51 not knowing the destination, not seeing the treasure trove (rakusho o shirazu, hōsho o mizu 落處をしらず、寶所をみず): I.e., not recognizing the ultimate significance of the words “real marks.” The metaphor of the “treasure trove” (hōsho 寶所) as the true goal of Buddhism comes from a famous parable in the Lotus Sūtra, in which the buddha is depicted as a caravan leader taking people to a treasure (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:25c26ff).

52 the three teachings are like the three legs of a tripodal pot (sankyō wa kanae no sankyaku no gotoshi 三教は鼎の三脚のごとし): A standard simile often associated especially with the Song-dynasty monk Gushan Zhiyuan 孤山智圓 (976-1022).

53 For the eighty years [the Buddha] was in the world, for the fifty years he preached the dharma (zaise hachijū nen, seppō gojū nen 在世八十年、說法五十年):

to enter the way of the buddhas.”<sup>54</sup> Thereafter, twenty-eight ancestors transmitted it directly.<sup>55</sup> This was considered the height, considered the most subtle and exalted: followers of other paths and the Deva Māra were all continually defeated; and countless humans and devas attained buddhahood and became ancestors.<sup>56</sup>

Yet no one said the way of the buddhas was insufficient because they had not inquired into Confucianism and Daoism in the Land of Cīnasthāna.<sup>57</sup> If it were definitely the case that the three teachings are one, then when the buddha dharma emerged, Confucianism and Daoism should also have emerged at the same time in Sindh in the West. Instead, the buddha dharma was “I alone am honored in heaven and beneath heaven.”<sup>58</sup> We should recall the events of this time; we should not forget it or be mistaken about it. The words, “the three teachings are one,” do not amount to the sounds of little children; they are [the words of] a type that would destroy the buddha dharma. Types like this are very common. Some adopt the manner of guides of humans and devas; some have become the teachers of kings and emperors. It is a time of decline of the buddha dharma in the Great Song. My former master, the Old Buddha, warned strongly about this.<sup>59</sup>

I.e., the lifespan and teaching career of Buddha Śākyamuni. The latter figure is common despite the tradition that Siddhārtha achieved buddhahood at the age of 35.

54 “converted all living beings, causing them all to enter the way of the buddhas” (ke issai shujō, kai ryō nyū butsudō 化一切衆生、皆令入佛道): The words of Buddha Śākyamuni in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:8b7).

55 twenty-eight ancestors (nijūhasso 二十八祖): I.e., the lineage of Indian ancestral masters from Mahākāśyapa through Bodhidharma.

56 followers of other paths and the Deva Māra (gedō tenma 外道・天魔): I.e., followers of non-Buddhist religions and the god Māra, who seeks to obstruct Buddhism.

57 Land of Cīnasthāna (Shintan koku 震旦國): Dōgen uses here the transliteration of a Sanskrit name for China.

58 “I alone am honored in heaven and beneath heaven” (tenjō tenge yui ga doku son 天上天下唯我獨尊): Words attributed to Buddha Śākyamuni as a newborn baby; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “I alone am honored.”

59 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): A reference to Dōgen’s Chinese teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨.

Types like this are seeds of the two vehicles and the other paths.<sup>60</sup> Such types have already spent two or three hundred years without even knowing of the existence of the “real marks.”<sup>61</sup> They say only that, by studying the true dharma of the buddhas and ancestors, we will escape from transmigration through birth and death. Or there are many who do not even know what it would mean to study the true dharma of the buddhas and ancestors, and who think it is only imitating the ancients as abbot of a cloister. How sad that they have abandoned the way of the ancestral masters — something much lamented by venerables possessed of the way. Such types should be pitied, without listening to the words they produce.

Chan Master Yuanwu said, “Birth and death, coming and going, are the true human body.”<sup>62</sup>

[43:32] {1:465}

この道取を拈擧して、みづからをしり、佛法を商量すべし。

Taking up this saying, we should know ourselves and should consider the buddha dharma.

Changsha said, “All the worlds in the ten directions are the true human body; all the worlds in the ten directions are within the radiance of the self.”<sup>63</sup>

60 seeds of the two vehicles and the other paths (nijō gedō no shūji 二乗・外道の種子): I.e., have the karma of the śrāvaka (shōmon 聲聞) and pratyeka-buddha (engaku 緣覺) vehicles and of non-Buddhist religions.

61 have already spent two or three hundred years (sude ni nisanbyaku nen o hetari すでに二三百をへたり): This could refer to the lifetimes of the individuals of this type, but it is more likely a reference to the recent history of the type in Song China.

62 Chan Master Yuanwu (Engo zenji 圓悟禪師): I.e., Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤. For his saying, see above, Note 24.

63 Changsha (Chōsa 長沙): I.e., Changsha Jingcen 長沙景岑 (dates unknown), a disciple of Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-835). The quotation here has no known extant source and appears to be a conflation of two different sayings. The second clause does indeed represent the words of Changsha, quoted elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “All the worlds in the ten directions are the single eye of the śramaṇa.” The first clause, however, also appearing elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, is a saying, not of Changsha, but of Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 (835-908), recorded, e.g., in shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:196, case 131); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “True human body.”

かくのごとくの道取、いまの大宋國の諸方長老等、おほよそ參學すべき道理と、なほしらず、いはんや參學せんや。もし擧しきたりしかば、ただ赤面、無言するのみなり。

A saying like this, the elders of all quarters in the Land of the Great Song do not even recognize as a truth to be studied, let alone would they study it. If someone were to bring it up to them, they would merely be red-faced and speechless.

My former master, the Old Buddha, said,<sup>64</sup>

The elders of all quarters nowadays lack illumination of the past, lack illumination of the present.<sup>65</sup> They have never had the truth of the buddha dharma. How could they know to bring up “all the worlds in the ten directions” like this? It seems they have never even heard of it over there.<sup>66</sup>

これをききてのち、諸方長老に問著するに、眞箇聽來せるすくなし。あはれむべし、虚説にして職をけがせることを。

After hearing this, when I questioned the elders in all quarters, in fact few had heard [such sayings]. How sad that they sully their office with empty talk.

應庵曇華禪師、ちなみに德徽大德にしめしていはく、若要易會、祇向十二時中起心動念處、但即此動念、直下頓豁了不可得、如大虚空、亦無虚空形段、表裏一如、智境雙泯、玄解俱亡、三際平等、到此田地、謂之絕學無爲閑道人也。

64 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): The source for these words of Dōgen's Chinese teacher, Rujing 如淨, is unknown. Judging from Dōgen's comment in the following section, perhaps a report of words he himself heard from Ru-jing. The passage is in a mix of Chinese and Japanese.

65 elders of all quarters (shohō chōrō 諸方長老): i.e., abbots of monasteries throughout the land.

illumination of the past (shōko 照古); illumination of the present (shōkon 照今): Fixed expressions often as a four-glyph phrase, or as shōkokon 照古今; knowledge of history, or of “past and present” (kokon 古今); when used in reference to a mirror of history, perhaps better rendered “reflection of past and present.”

66 over there (ta nari 他那裏): i.e., in the elders' communities.

Chan Master Tanhua of Ying'an once addressed the Most Virtuous Dehui, saying,<sup>67</sup>

If you want to understand easily, then in the twelve times, just face the mind that arises and the thoughts that move, and immediately clarify on the spot that they are ungraspable, like vast empty space, and without empty space or shape.<sup>68</sup> Exterior and interior are one; knowledge and objects are both obliterated; the dark mystery and its understanding are both annihilated; and the three junctures are equivalent.<sup>69</sup> One who reaches this field is known as “a person at ease in the way, finished learning, with nothing to do.”<sup>70</sup>

これは、應庵老人盡力道得底句なり。これただ影をおふて、休歇をしらざるがごとし。表裏一如ならんときは、佛法あるべからざるか、なにかこれ表裏。また虚空有形段を、佛祖の道取とす。なにをか虚空とする。おもひやるに、應庵いまだ虚空をしらざるなり、虚空をみざるなり、虚空をとらざるなり、虚空をうたざるなり。

This is a saying old Ying'an gave all his strength to make. It is as if he's just chasing shadows and knows no rest.<sup>71</sup> When exterior and interior are not one, will the buddha dharma no longer exist?<sup>72</sup> What are “exterior and interior”? Moreover, that “empty space” has “shape” is something the buddhas and ancestors say. What does he take as “empty space?” When we think about it, Ying'an does not yet know “empty 67 Chan Master Tanhua of Ying'an (Ōan Donge zenji 應庵曇華禪師): 1103-1163, disciple of Huqiu Shaolong 虎丘紹隆. His saying occurs in the Ying'an heshang yulu 應庵和尚語錄, ZZ.120:858a17-b2, as a teaching presented to Chan Person Hui 徽禪人.

68 in the twelve times (jūni ji chū 十二時中): I.e., throughout the twenty-four hours of the day, traditionally divided into twelve two-hour periods.

69 the three junctures are equivalent (sansai byōdō 三際平等): I.e., past, present, and future are equal.

70 “a person at ease in the way, finished learning, with nothing to do” (zetsugaku mui kandōnin 絕學無爲閑道人): A fixed expression for one who has completed the Buddhist path, from the opening line of the Zhengdao ge 證道歌, attributed to Yongjia Xuanjue 永嘉玄覺 (or Zenjue 真覺, d. 713) (T.2014.48:395c9).

71 It is as if he's just chasing shadows and knows no rest (kore tada kage o oute, kyūkatsu o shirazaru ga gotoshi これただ影をおふて、休歇をしらざるがごとし): Though the image is slightly different, somewhat reminiscent of the man in the Zhuangzi 莊子 (Yufu 漁父, KR.5c0126.031.5a) who died by running from his shadow without ever stopping.

72 When exterior and interior are not one (hyōri ichinyo narazaran toki 表裏一如ならんとき): Some MSS read here hyōri ichinyo naran toki 表裏一如ならんとき (“when exterior and interior are one”).

space,” has not yet seen “empty space,” has not caught hold of “empty space,” has not hit “empty space.”<sup>73</sup>

He says, “the mind that arises and the thoughts that move.” There is a principle that the mind has never moved. How could there be a “mind that arises” “in the twelve times”? The “mind” ought not come up and get inside “in the twelve times,” and “the twelve times” have not come into “in the twelve minds”; so how could there be a “mind that arises”? What are “the thoughts that move”? Do “thoughts” “move” or not move? Do they neither move nor not move? What is “moving”? What is not “moving”? What does he mean by “thoughts”? Are “thoughts” “in the twelve times”? Are “the twelve times” inside “thoughts”? Are there times it is neither one?

He says that, if we “just face” “in the twelve times,” it will be “easy to understand.” What exactly will be “easy to understand”? Does “easy to understand” mean the way of the buddhas and ancestors?<sup>74</sup> If so, the way of the buddhas is neither easy to understand nor difficult to understand. Therefore, Nanyue and Jiangxi long pursued the way under their masters.<sup>75</sup>

73 has not caught hold of “empty space” (kokū o torazaru nari 虚空をとらざるなり): Possibly reflecting a story recorded at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:256, case 248, and discussed in the “Shōbōgenzō kokū” 正法眼藏虚空; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose.”

74 the way of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no dō 佛祖の道): Or “the words of the buddhas and ancestors.”

75 Nanyue and Jiangxi (Nangaku Kōzei 南嶽・江西): i.e., Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677–744), who studied with the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能, and Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709–788), who studied with Nanyue.

頓豁了不可得といふ、佛祖道未夢見なり。恁麼の力量、いかでか要易會の所堪ならん。はかりしりぬ、佛祖の大道をいまだ參究しきたらずといふことを。佛法もしかのごとくならば、いかでか今日にいたらん。

He says, “immediately clarify the ungraspable.” He has never seen the way of the buddhas and ancestors even in his dreams. How could one with this kind of ability be worthy of “wanting to understand easily”? It is obvious that he has never investigated the great way of the buddhas and ancestors. If the buddha dharma were like this, how could it have reached us today?

Even Ying'an was like this. When we look for someone like Ying'an among the elders of the various mountains today, we would not encounter one for kalpas.<sup>76</sup> We could not find an elder equal to Ying'an if we looked till our eyeballs collapsed. Recent people mostly accept Ying'an. Nevertheless, it is difficult to accept that the buddha dharma reached Ying'an. He was just a latecomer to his monastic seat; we can say he was ordinary. Why? Because Ying'an did have the mettle to know people. Those today do not know people, because they do not know themselves. Ying'an may not have arrived, but he did have some study of the way; the elders today lack any study of the way. Ying'an may have heard good words, but they did not enter his ears, he did not see them with his ears; they did not enter his eyes, he did not hear them with his eyes. Ying'an was like this at the time; now, he may himself be awakened. The elders of the various mountains of the Great Song today do not deduce the inside and outside of Ying'an; his voice and form are not of their realm.

Types like this do not even know whether the “real marks” spoken of by the buddhas and ancestors are the words of the buddhas and ancestors or not the words of the buddhas and ancestors. Therefore, for the past two or three hundred years, we do not see any of the elder illiterate types speaking of the “real marks.”

先師天童古佛、ある夜間に方丈にして普説するにいはく、天童今夜有牛兒、黃面瞿曇拈實相、要買那堪無定價、一聲杜宇孤雲上。

My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong, while giving a public sermon in the abbot's quarters one evening, said,<sup>77</sup>

*Tiantong this evening has a calf;
The golden-faced Gautama takes up the real marks.<sup>78</sup>
If you want to buy it, how could it have no price?
The cry of a cuckoo above a single cloud.*

かくのごとくあれば、尊宿の、佛道に長ぜるは、實相をいふ。佛法をしらず、佛道の參學なきは、實相をいはざるなり。

In this way, venerables accomplished in the way of the buddhas speak of the “real marks”; those who do not know the buddha dharma, who lack study of the way of the buddhas, do not speak of the “real marks.”

77 My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong (senshi Tendō kobutsu 先師天童古佛): This anecdote has no known written source and seems to represent Dōgen's personal experience at Tiantong.

public sermon (fusetsu 普説): I.e., a talk to the monastic community, as opposed to private consultations.

78 a calf (gyūji 牛兒): Likely a reference to Rujing himself, as offspring of the Buddha; perhaps reflecting a traditional derivation of Buddha Śākyamuni's surname, Gautama, from “most excellent of cattle.”

These words [are from] the third month, in the spring of the senior fire year of the dog, second year of Baoqing, of the Great Song.<sup>79</sup> At almost the fourth watch of the night, I heard three beats of the drum from above.<sup>80</sup> Taking my sitting cloth and donning my kāṣāya, I went out the front door of the cloud hall, where the room-entering placard had been hung up.<sup>81</sup> First, I followed the assembly above the dharma hall. Passing the west wall of the dharma hall, I climbed the western stairs of the Jiguang Hall.<sup>82</sup> Passing in front of the west wall of the Jiguan Hall, I climbed the western stairs of the Daguangming Treasury.<sup>83</sup> The Daguangming Treasury is the abbot's quarters. From south of the western screens, I went to the incense stand, offered incense, and bowed. At the room entrance, I expected a queue, but I did not see a single monk. The blinds were lowered at the Miaogao Terrace.<sup>84</sup> The voice of the dharma of the Most Reverend Head of Hall could be faintly heard.<sup>85</sup> Then, the rector, Zukun of Xichuan, came up and similarly offered incense and bowed; when he finished, we stealthily peeked into the Miaogao Terrace and found it was packed full both east and west.<sup>86</sup> At the time, there was a public sermon; I slipped stealthily into the back, stood and listened.

79 the third month, in the spring of the senior fire year of the dog, second year of Baoqing, of the Great Song (Daisō Hōkyō ninen heijutsu haru sangatsu no koro 大宋寶慶二年丙戌春三月のころ): I.e., March-April, 1226, the third stem, eleventh branch of the cyclical calendar, in the Song dynasty's Baoqing era (1225-1227). The location is the monastery on Mount Tiantong 天童山, of which Rujing was abbot at this time.

80 fourth watch (shikō 四更): I.e., 2:00-4:00 a.m.

81 cloud hall (undō 雲堂): I.e., the saṃgha hall, in which the monks of the "great assembly" (daishu 大衆) reside.

room-entering placard (nishitsu hai 入室牌): I.e., the signboard announcing an audience in the abbot's quarters.

82 Jiguang Hall (jakkōdō 寂光堂): "Hall of Tranquil Light"; the abbot's outer quarters at Tiantong, a building located just north of the dharma hall.

83 Daguangming Treasury (dai kōmyō zō 大光明藏): "Treasury of great radiance"; the abbot's middle quarters at Tiantong, just north of the Jiguang Hall.

84 Miaogao Terrace (myōkōdai 妙高臺): "Terrace of Sumeru"; the inner chamber of the abbot's quarters at Tiantong.

85 The voice of the dharma of the Most Reverend Head of Hall (dōchō daioshō no hōon 堂頭大和尚の法音): I.e., the voice of the abbot, Rujing, teaching the dharma.

86 the rector, Zukun of Xichuan (Seisen no Sokon ino 西川の祖坤維那): Not otherwise known. The rector (ino 維那) is the monastic administrator in charge of maintaining discipline in the "great assembly" (daishu 大衆) of monks.

大梅の法常禪師住山の因縁、舉せらる。衣荷食松のところに、衆家おほくなみだをながす。靈山釋迦牟尼佛の安居の因縁、くはしく舉せらる。きくもの、なみだをながすおほし。

After giving such a public sermon, he had the present verse. Upon finishing the verse, he hit the right side of his meditation chair once with his right hand and said, “Enter!” In his room-entering talk, he said, “The cuckoo cries, and the mountain bamboo splits.” Such were his room-entering words; he had no other talk. Though the audience was large, they made no comment. They were just intimidated.

88 Buddha Śākyamuni's retreat on Vulture Peak (Ryōzen Shakamuni butsu no angō 靈山釋迦牟尼佛の安居): A topic no doubt occasioned by the date of Rujing's talk, just preceding the monastic summer retreat.

89 “The retreat at Mount Tiantong is about to begin” (Tendōzan angō chikaki ni ari 天童山安居ちかきにあり): Though the first sentence is put in Japanese, presumably, the words of Rujing on the occasion being described. Dates of the summer retreat vary; a common practice was to start on the fifteenth or sixteenth of the fourth month.

This ritual of room-entering does not exist in other quarters; only my former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong, practiced it. During the public sermon, the assembly surrounded his chair and screens like clouds. Then, as they continued to stand like clouds, just as they were, from among the monks, one would enter the room at his convenience, while the person who had finished the room-entering left in the usual way from the door of the abbot's quarters. Those remaining, since they just remained standing as they were, could all observe the deportment and movements of the person entering the room, as well as the manner of the Reverend Head of Hall and his room-entering talk. This ritual is not that of other quarters; other elders must not be able to perform it. In room-entering on other occasions, [the monks] wanted to enter the room before other people; in this room-entering, they wanted to enter the room after others. We should not forget this distinction in people's thoughts and words.

We might well hear Xuansha’s words, “deeply discussing the real marks,” as saying that the swallow alone was “deeply discussing” “the real marks.” Nevertheless, this is not the case. “During a convocation,” there is “hearing the singing of a swallow.” It is not that the “swallow” is “deeply discussing” the “real marks”; it is not that “Xuansha” is “deeply discussing” the “real marks.” It does not extend to both of them; however, just as it is it is “deeply discussing the real marks.”

during a convocation (sanji 參次): Probably an informal talk (shōsan 小參), often held in the abbot’s quarters.

“Deeply discussing the real marks, skillfully talking on the essentials of the dharma” (shindan jissō, zensetsu hōyō 深談實相、善說法要): Variant of the words of Bodhisattva Mañjuśrī describing Vimalakīrti (Weimojie shoshuo jing 維摩詰所說經, T.475.14:544a28):

He has deeply mastered the real marks and is good at talking on the essentials of the dharma.

We should investigate this episode for a bit. There is “during a convocation”; there is “hearing the singing of a swallow”; there are the words, “deeply discussing the real marks, skillfully talking on the essentials of the dharma”; there is “coming down from his seat”; there is “afterwards, a monk begged instruction, saying, ‘I don’t understand’”; there is “the Master said, ‘Go away! No one believes you.’” “I don’t understand” is not necessarily “begging instruction” on “the real marks,” but it is the vital artery of the buddhas and ancestors, the bones and marrow of the treasury of the true dharma eye.

We should realize that, even had this monk begged instruction by saying, “I understand it,” or “I can explain it,” Xuansha should still say to him, “Go away! No one believes you.” It is not that he says, “Go away! No one believes you,” because he begs instruction by saying he doesn’t understand what he has understood. Indeed, whether it is not this monk but Zhang’s third or Li’s fourth, whether it is “the real marks of the dharmas,” at the time and place where we directly pass through the vital artery of the buddhas and ancestors, the study of “the real marks” appears like this.<sup>92</sup> It appeared among the followers of Qingyuan.<sup>93</sup>

INTRODUCTION

This chapter was composed in 1243, soon after Dōgen moved from the capital to Echizen (modern Fukui). It represents number 44 in the seventy-five-chapter compilation of the Shōbōgenzō and number 49 in the Honzan edition but does not appear in the sixty-chapter compilation. The twenty-eight text Himitsu collection of Shōbōgenzō texts contains two works entitled “Butsudō,” listed in fascicle 1 as numbers 7 and 9. The latter of these is rather similar to our text here; but the former is sufficiently different that it was included separately in the Honzan edition as number 93, under the new title “Dōshin” 道心 (“Mind of the Way”; translated here below in Volume 7 as Supplementary Text 9).

The central theme of “Butsudō” concerns what we might call the institutional character or identity of Dōgen’s tradition. The title reflects the claim, made at the very outset of the text, that the lineage of the ancestral masters of the tradition is continuous with the ancient line of the seven buddhas, of which Śākyamuni was the last; it is thus a lineage of buddhas, not merely a Buddhist school. From this, Dōgen goes on to criticize sharply the common practice of referring to this lineage as the “Zen” (Sanskrit dhyāna, or “meditation”) school.

The text then moves to the question of the five houses (goke 五家) into which the Chan historians in the Song dynasty often divided the tradition. Quoting the dismissal of distinctions among the houses by his teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, Dōgen attributes the notion of distinct houses to the decline of the tradition in China. He then takes up each of the five houses in turn, arguing that none of the ostensible founders of these houses ever spoke of them as distinct schools. Near the end of this section, he singles out for criticism the twelfth-century work, Rentian yanmu 人天眼目 (“The Eye of Humans and Devas”), by Huiyan Zhizhao 晦巖智昭, which provides a summary account of Chan based on the history and teachings of the five schools.

Finally, the text returns to the broader issue of school identity, pointing out that the true transmission of the Buddha’s wisdom is not a school, and that the establishment of a Buddhist school is a violation of the Buddha’s own practice.

The Way of the Buddhas

曹溪古佛、あるとき衆にしめしていはく、慧能より七佛にいたるまで四十祖あり。

The Old Buddha of Caoxi once addressed the assembly saying, “There are forty ancestors from Huineng through the seven buddhas.”<sup>1</sup>

1 The Way of the Buddhas (butsudō 佛道): Or “way of the Buddha.” An extremely common expression in East Asian Buddhism, often meaning simply what we would call “Buddhism”; also used in reference variously to the “teachings” of a buddha (roughly equivalent to buppō 佛法; S. buddha-dharma); the “wisdom” attained by a buddha (bodai 菩提; S. bodhi); the state of “buddhahood” (busshō 佛性; S. buddhatva); the “vehicle” (jō 乘; S. yāna) or “path” (dō 道; S. mārga) leading to buddhahood; the practice that expresses buddhahood; etc. While these various connotations may sometimes be at play here, the predominant sense of butsudō in our text seems to be something like “the tradition” of the buddha(s) — i.e., the authentic teachings, practices, people, and institutions descended from the buddhas.

The Old Buddha of Caoxi (Sōkei kobutsu 曹溪古佛; also written 曹谿): An epithet, appearing often in Dōgen’s writing, for the famous Sixth Ancestor, Huineng of Caoxi 曹溪慧能. Mount Caoxi (Sōkeizan 曹溪山), in present-day Guangdong, is the site of his temple, the Baolinsi 寶林寺. The expression kobutsu 古佛, literally “old (or ‘ancient’ or ‘past’) buddha,” is regularly used in reference to “the buddhas of the past,” especially the seven buddhas mentioned here; Zen texts also employ it as an honorific for past masters of the tradition — a use Dōgen will take quite literally below; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Old buddha.”

Dōgen’s Japanese rendering of Huineng’s words here closely resembles a passage in the “Shōbōgenzō shisho” 正法眼藏嗣書, originally composed in 1241 and edited in 1243 (the date of our text). There is no known source for these words. The Dunhuang version of the Liuzu tan jing 六祖壇經 (T.2007.48:344c11) does contain a statement by Huineng that he represents the fortieth generation in a line beginning with the seven buddhas; but this manuscript was of course not known to Dōgen, and other extant versions of the work that he might have seen do not seem to contain this passage.

“forty ancestors” (shijisso 四十祖): The seven buddhas, twenty-seven Indian ancestors of Zen from Mahākāśyapa through Prajñātāra, and six ancestors in China from Bodhidharma to Huineng 慧能. Calculation of the numbers in the lineage are complicated by the fact that traditional listings of the members typically count Bodhidharma twice, as both the twenty-eighth Indian and first Chinese ancestor; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas and ancestors.”

[44:2]

When we investigate these words, it is forty buddhas from the seven buddhas to Huineng.<sup>2</sup> When we count buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor, this is the way to count. Counting in this way, the seven buddhas are seven ancestors, and the thirty-three ancestors are thirty-three buddhas. Such is Caoxi's essential point. This is the instruction of a buddha of direct descent: only a legitimate heir to the direct transmission directly transmits this way of counting.

[44:3]

釋迦牟尼佛より曹溪にいたるまで、三十四祖あり。この佛祖相承、ともに迦葉の、如來にあひたてまつれりしがごとく、如來の、迦葉をえましますがごとし。

From Buddha Śākyamuni to Caoxi, there are thirty-four ancestors.<sup>3</sup> This inheritance of buddhas and ancestors is in each case like Kāśyapa having encountered the Tathāgata, like the Tathāgata gaining Kāśyapa.<sup>4</sup>

[44:4]

釋迦牟尼佛の、迦葉佛に參學しますがごとく、師資ともに于今有在なり。このゆえに、正法眼藏まのあたり嫡嫡相承しきたれり。佛法の正命、ただこの正傳のみなり。佛法は、かくのごとく正傳するがゆえに、附囑の嫡嫡なり。

Just as Buddha Śākyamuni studied under Buddha Kāśyapa, so do all

“seven buddhas” (shichi butsu 七佛): i.e., Śākyamuni and six buddhas said to have preceded him; commonly referred to as “the seven buddhas of the past” (kako shichi butsu 過去七佛); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas.”

2 When we investigate these words (kono dō o sankyū suru ni この道を参究するに): Dōgen's comment on Huineng's saying here echoes passages elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō — e.g., in “Shōbōgenzō shisho” 正法眼藏嗣書 and “Shōbōgenzō kobutsushin” 正法眼藏古佛心.

3 thirty-four ancestors (sanjūshi so 三十四祖): Presumably, Dōgen here adds Śākyamuni to the traditional list of thirty-three Zen ancestors from Mahākāśyapa to Huineng.

4 like Kāśyapa having encountered the Tathāgata, like the Tathāgata gaining Kāśyapa (Kashō no, nyorai ni aitamatsurerishi ga gotoku, nyorai no, Kashō o emashimasu ga gotoshi 迦葉の、如來にあひたてまつれりしがごとく、如來の、迦葉をえましますがごとし): Though somewhat ambiguous, given the predicates used here, the reference is likely to the relationship between Buddha Śākyamuni (“the Tathāgata”) and his disciple, the First Ancestor, Mahākāśyapa (“Kāśyapa”; not to be confused with Buddha Kāśyapa, mentioned just below).

the masters and disciples even today.<sup>5</sup> Therefore, the treasury of the true dharma eye has actually been inherited by successor after successor. The correct life of the buddha dharma is nothing but this correct transmission. Because the buddha dharma is thus correctly transmitted, it is successor after successor to the bequest.

しかあれば、佛道の功德・要機、もらさずそなはれり。西天より東地につたはれて十萬八千里なり、在世より今日につたはれて二千餘載。この道理を參學せざるともがら、みだりにあやまりていはく、佛祖正傳の正法眼藏涅槃妙心、みだりにこれを禪宗と稱す、祖師を禪祖と稱す、學者を禪子と號す、あるひは禪和子と稱し、あるひは禪家流の自稱あり。これみな僻見を根本とせる枝葉なり。西天東地、從古至今、いまだ禪宗の稱あらざるを、みだりに自稱するは、佛道をやぶる魔なり、佛祖のまねかざる怨家なり。

Thus, it has been wholly endowed with the virtues and the essential functions of the way of the buddhas. Transmitted from Sindh in the West to the Land of the East, it is one hundred eight thousand miles; transmitted from his lifetime to the present, more than two thousand years.<sup>6</sup> The type that has not studied this truth talks rashly and mistakenly. “The treasury of the true dharma eye, the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa,” directly transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors, they rashly call the “Zen school.” The ancestral masters, they call “Zen ancestors”; the students, they designate “Zen master” or call “Zen reverend”; or there are those

5 Buddha Kāśyapa (Kashō butsu 迦葉佛): i.e., the sixth of the seven buddhas of the past. Śākyamuni is traditionally held to have studied under countless buddhas in the past, including Kāśyapa. While Dōgen here treats Kāśyapa and Śākyamuni as master and disciple, the traditional understanding of the historical relationships among members of the list of seven buddhas is of course rather different from those in the Zen lineage. The lives of these buddhas do not overlap; rather, Kāśyapa’s career as a buddha (said to have lasted twenty-thousand years) ended long before the advent of Buddha Śākyamuni, and legends that place the latter among Kāśyapa’s followers refer to events in Śākyamuni’s former lives as a bodhisattva, long before he was born as Siddhārtha and went on to attain awakening. In an addendum to the “Shōbōgenzō shisho” 正法眼藏嗣書, Dōgen recalls a conversation about this issue with his teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227).

6 one hundred eight thousand miles (jūman hassen ri 十萬八千里): A fixed expression indicating a great distance. The Chinese unit li 里 varies throughout history but was generally around one-third mile. (At that length, the distance between Varanasi and Kyoto would be roughly 10,000 li.)

more than two thousand years (nisen yo sai 二千餘載): The number here reflects the traditional East Asian Buddhist reckoning of the date of Śākyamuni’s parinirvāṇa as 949 BCE (the 52nd year of the reign of the Chou Emperor Mu Wang 穆王; see e.g., Jingde chuangdeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:305c18-19).

that call themselves “followers of the Zen house.”<sup>7</sup> These are all but branches and leaves that have taken a biased view as the root. When the name “Zen school” has not existed throughout Sindh in the West and the Land of the East, from ancient times till the present, rashly to call oneself this is to be a demon who would destroy the way of the buddhas, an unbidden enemy of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>8</sup>

In Shimen's Grove Record, it is said,<sup>9</sup>

When Bodhidharma first went from Liang to Wei, he proceeded to the foot of Mount Song, where he rested his staff at Shaolin.<sup>10</sup> There he just sat facing a wall. It was not the practice of dhyāna, but after a while, others, unable to fathom what he was doing, made Dharma a practitioner of dhyāna. Now, dhyāna is but one among various practices; how could it suffice to exhaust [the practice of] the sage?

7 “Zen master” (zenji 禪師); “Zen reverend” (zennasu 禪和子): The former term doubtless reflects its broad use for a practitioner of meditation; some MS witnesses give here zensu 禪子 (“Zennist”); others, zensō 禪僧 (“Zen monk”). The translation of zennasu 禪和子 reflects the fact that it is thought to incorporate the term oshō 和尚 (or wajō, “preceptor”), used in polite reference to a monk (hence, “reverend”).

8 the name “Zen school” (zenshū no shō 禪宗の稱): The use of the term Chanzong 禪宗 (“Zen school” or “Zen lineage”) in reference to the lineage of Bodhidharma seems to have begun in China during the ninth century. It is unclear what Dōgen might mean by his claim that the name did not exist in the “Land of the East” (Tōchi 東地), a term normally indicating China.

9 Shimen's Grove Record (Sekimon Rinkan roku 石門林間錄): “Shimen” 石門 is a sobriquet for the author Juefan Huihong 覺範慧洪 (1071-1128); this passage from his Linjian lu 林間錄 can be found at ZZ.148:590b7-12. Dōgen also cites the passage in his “Shōbōgenzō gyōji” 正法眼藏行持 and Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄.

10 Liang (ryō 梁); Wei (gi 魏): From the legend that, upon his arrival in China, Bodhidharma first visited the territory of the Liang dynasty (502-557) in the south and then went to the land of the Northern Wei dynasty (386-534).

Mount Song (Sūzan 嵩山): The mountain in the Dengfeng 登封 district of modern Henan Province.

rested his staff at Shaolin (ijō o shōrin 倚杖於少林): I.e., stopped at the Shaolinsi 少林寺 on Mount Song, traditionally identified as Bodhidharma's residence; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Staff.”

Nevertheless, people of the time took it in this way; and those who wrote histories followed this and recorded him among practitioners of dhyāna, thus making him a confederate of the partisans of “dried-up trees and dead ashes.”<sup>11</sup> Although the sage does not stop at dhyāna, he does not oppose dhyāna. It is like “change,” which is beyond yin and yang and yet does not oppose yin and yang.

第二十八祖と稱するは、迦葉大士を初祖として稱するなり。毗婆尸佛よりは第三十五祖なり。七佛および二十八代、かならずしも禪那をもて證道をつくすべからず。このゆえに、古先いはく、禪那は諸行のひとつならくの、なんぞもて聖人をつくすにたらん。

To call him the “twenty-eighth ancestor” is to speak of Kāśyapa, the Great One, as the “first ancestor”; from Buddha Vipasyin, he is the thirty-fifth ancestor.<sup>12</sup> The seven buddhas and twenty-eight generations have never taken dhyāna to exhaust the verification of the way. Therefore, our old forebear says here, “Dhyāna is but one among various practices; how could it suffice to exhaust [the practice of] the sage?”

この古先、いささか人をみきたれり、祖宗の堂奥にいれり、このゆえにこの道あり。近日は大宋國の天下に、難得なるべし、ありがたかるべし。たとひ禪那なりとも、禪宗と稱すべからず、いはんや禪那いまだ佛法の総要にあらず。

This old forebear has seen something of the person, has entered the interior of the hall of the ancestors; therefore, he has these words. Nowadays, throughout the entire Land of the Great Song, [his type] would be difficult to meet, would be welcome indeed. Even if it were dhyāna, we

11 those who wrote histories (i shi sha 爲史者): Likely a reference to Daoxuan 道宣 (596-667), whose Xu gaoseng zhuan 續高僧傳 includes Bodhidharma’s biographical notice in the section of the work devoted to eminent monks who were “practitioners of dhyāna” (shūzen 習禪). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Practitioner of dhyāna.”

“dried-up trees and dead ashes” (koboku shikai 枯木死灰): Or, as we might say, “dead wood and cold ashes”; a common expression in Zen texts, used in reference, often pejorative, to a state of mind free from thoughts. Occurs several times in this sense in Dōgen’s corpus. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dried-up tree.”

12 To call him the “twenty-eighth ancestor” (dainijūhachi so to shō suru wa 第二十八祖と稱するは): The antecedent of “him” here is Bodhidharma.

Kāśyapa, the Great One (Kashō daishi 迦葉大士): I.e., Mahākāśyapa; Dōgen here provides a Chinese translation of mahāsattva (“great being”) or mahāpuruṣa (“great person”) for the element mahā in the First Ancestor’s name, a convention reflecting the passage from the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 he will quote below.

Buddha Vipasyin (Bibashi butsu 毘婆尸佛): I.e., the first of the seven buddhas, said to have lived in the Adornment Kalpa (shōgon kō 莊嚴劫; S. vyūha-kalpa), preceding ours.

should not call it the “Dhyāna [i.e., Zen] school.” Much less is dhyāna the essence of the entire buddha dharma.

Those who nevertheless intentionally speak of the great way directly transmitted by buddha after buddha as the “Zen school” have never seen even in their dreams the way of the buddhas, have never heard of it in their dreams. Do not acknowledge that those who designate themselves the “Zen school” have the buddha dharma. Who has called themselves the “Zen school”? There have never been buddhas or ancestral masters who called themselves the “Zen school.” We should realize that the name “Zen school” is used by Māra-pāpīyān; and those who would call themselves by Māra-pāpīyān’s name must be the minions of Māra, not the descendants of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>13</sup>

13 Māra-pāpīyān (Mahajun 魔波旬): Dōgen uses here the Sanskrit term for the demonic figure, Māra, the Evil One, lord of the sixth heaven of the realm of desire (yokkai 欲界; S. kāma-loka), who seeks to obstruct Buddhist awakening. Māra famously brought his legions (matō 魔黨; also written 魔黨) to prevent Siddhārtha from attaining buddhahood under the bodhi tree.

14 The World-Honored One (seson 世尊): A telling of the famous story of the transmission of Zen from Śākyamuni to the First Ancestor, of which there are several variants. Dōgen recorded the story in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5: 258, case 253) and retells it in his Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.4:182, no. 1).

held up an udumbara flower and blinked his eyes (nen udon ge shunmoku 拈優曇華瞬目): This expression, though repeated elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, does not seem to occur in any extant Chinese source. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes.” The udumbara flower (udon ge 優曇華), often identified with the blossom of the tree figus glomerata, is said to bloom only once every three thousand years; the raining down of this blossom appears regularly in Buddhist literature as a sign of an auspicious event or person.

World-Honored One said, “I have a treasury of the true dharma eye, the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa; together with my saṃghāṭī robe, I bequeath it to Mahākāśyapa.”<sup>15</sup>

The World-Honored One’s bequest to Kāśyapa, the Great One, was, “I have a treasury of the true dharma eye, the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa.” He did not go on to add, “I have a ‘Zen school,’ which I bequeath to Mahākāśyapa.” He said, “Together with my saṃghāṭī robe,” not “together with my ‘Zen school.’” Thus, we simply do not hear of the name “Zen school” during the lifetime of the World-Honored One.

初祖、そのとき、二祖にしめしていはく、諸佛無上妙道、曠劫精勤、難行苦行、難忍能忍。豈以小徳小智輕心慢心、欲冀眞乗。またいはく、諸佛法印、匪從人得。またいはく、如來以正法眼藏、附囑迦葉大士。

At that time, the First Ancestor addressed the Second Ancestor saying, “The unsurpassed wondrous way of the buddhas takes vast kalpas of spiritual fortitude, painfully practicing what is difficult to practice, enduring what is difficult to endure.<sup>16</sup> How could one of little virtue and little wisdom, of frivolous mind and vain mind, aspire to the true vehicle?”

He also said, “The dharma seal of the buddhas is not obtained from another.”

And he said, “The Tathāgata bequeathed the treasury of the true dharma eye to Kāśyapa, the Great One.”

15 “saṃghāṭī robe” (sōgyari e 僧伽梨衣): The “assembly robe,” most formal of the traditional three robes (kesa 袈裟; S. kāśāya or kaśāya) of the monk, sewn in nine to twenty-five sections. A famous legend has it that Mahākāśyapa retired to Mount Kukkuṭapāda (Keisokusen 鷄足山), where he awaits the advent of the future Buddha Maitya, to whom he will transmit this robe. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Robe of the Tathāgata.”

16 At that time, the First Ancestor addressed the Second Ancestor (shoso, sono toki, niso ni shimeshite 初祖、そのとき、二祖にしめして): I.e., Bodhidharma addressed the second Chinese ancestor of Chan, Huike 慧可. The phrase “at that time” (sono toki) has no intelligible antecedent here. The three quotations are slight variants on passages in the notice on Bodhidharma in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:219b14-16; 219b20-21; 219c6 (the first quotation cuts off the text in mid-sentence).

いましめすところ、諸佛無上妙道、および正法眼藏、ならびに諸佛法印なり。當時すべて禪宗と稱することなし、禪宗と稱すべき因縁きこえず。いまこの正法眼藏は、揚眉瞬目して面授しきたる、身心骨髓をもてさづけきたる、身心骨髓に稟授しきたるなり。身先身後に傳授し稟受しきたり、心上心外に傳授し稟受するなり。

What is presented here is “the unsurpassed wondrous way of the buddhas,” and the “treasury of the true dharma eye,” together with the “dharma seal of the buddhas.” At that time, they were never called the “Zen school,” nor does one hear of any occasion to call them a “Zen school.”<sup>17</sup> This “treasury of the true dharma eye” here has been personally bestowed by raising the eyebrows and blinking the eyes, has been handed down by the “bones and marrow of body and mind,” has been conferred to the “bones and marrow of body and mind.”<sup>18</sup> It has been transmitted and received “before the body and after the body,” transmitted and received “upon the mind and beyond the mind.”<sup>19</sup>

17 occasion to call them a “Zen school” (zenshū to shō su beki innen 禪宗と稱すべき因縁): Or “reason to call them the ‘Zen school.’” The term innen 因縁 here may be taken in the sense either of “cause and condition” or of historical “instance” or “case.”

18 raising the eyebrows and blinking the eyes (yōbi shunmoku 揚眉瞬目): Here, perhaps suggesting the Buddha’s blink in Dōgen’s version of the transmission to Mahākāśyapa. “Raising the eyebrows and blinking the eyes” is a set phrase used in Zen texts to represent the ordinary actions through which Buddhism is expressed; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Raise the eyebrows and blink the eyes.”

“bones and marrow of body and mind” (shinjin kotsuzui 身心骨髓): Or “body and mind, bones and marrow”; a fairly common combination in Dōgen’s writings. The term “bones and marrow” (kotsuzui 骨髓) evokes the set expression “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow” (hi niku kotsu zui 皮肉骨髓) derived from the story of the transmission from Bodhidharma to Huìkǎi 慧可. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow,” and “Body and mind.”

conferred (bonju 稟授): As in “impart a commission”; some texts give bonju 稟受 (“receive a commission”).

19 “before the body and after the body” (shin sen shin go 身先身後): An expression suggesting either (a) what exists before and after one has a body, or (b) what precedes and follows a given lifetime. Occurs also in the “Shōbōgenzō sesshin sesshō” 正法眼藏説心説性, in the lines “investigate before the body and after the body” (shinsen shingo ni sankyū su 身先身後に参究す) (DZZ.1:451), and “save them before the body and after the body” (shinsen shingo ni sukuu 身先身後にすくふ) (DZZ.1:456); here, likely akin to the following “upon the mind and beyond the mind” to indicate transcendence of the individual participants in the transmission.

“upon the mind and beyond the mind” (shinjō shinge 心上心外): Or “above the mind and outside the mind.” An unusual expression not occurring elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings; could be taken to refer to either (a) what is in the mind and what is beyond it, or (b) what is above and beyond the mind.

One does not hear the name “Zen school” in the communities of the World-Honored One and Kāśyapa; one does not hear the name “Zen school” in the communities of the First and Second Ancestors; one does not hear the name “Zen school” in the communities of the Fifth and Sixth Ancestors; one does not hear the name “Zen school” in the communities of Qingyuan and Nanyue.<sup>20</sup> One cannot tell when or by whom it was so named. Probably it was named among students unworthy of reckoning as students, a group who secretly sought to destroy the dharma or steal the dharma. For later students rashly to use a name never acknowledged by the buddhas and ancestors would be the ruin of the house of the buddhas and ancestors.

Moreover, [such use] suggests that there is some dharma called the “Zen school” other than the dharma of buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor. If there were [a dharma] other than the way of the buddhas and ancestors, it would be a dharma of an other path.<sup>21</sup> As descendants of the buddhas and ancestors, we should study the bones and marrow, face and eyes of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>22</sup> We have cast ourselves on the way of the buddhas and ancestors and should not skulk off from here to study an other path. We are entrusted with the rare body and mind of 20 Fifth and Sixth Ancestors (goso rokuso 五祖・六祖): I.e., Huineng 慧能 and his teacher, the Fifth Ancestor of Chan in China, Daman Hongren 大滿弘忍 (602-675).

Qingyuan and Nanyue (Seigan Nangaku 青原・南嶽): I.e., the two most prominent disciples of Huineng: Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思 (d. 740) and Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744).

21 dharma of an other path (gedō no hō 外道の法): I.e., the teaching of a non-Buddhist religion.

22 bones and marrow, face and eyes (kotsuzui menmoku 骨髓面目): Or “bones, marrow, and countenance.” The term menmoku 面目 is a standard expression for the “face,” often used in Zen texts as a synecdoche for the (real) person (as in the famous “original face” [honrai menmoku 本來面目]); the translation seeks to retain the parallel with “bones and marrow.” The only instance of this combination in the Shōbōgenzō.

a human, [through] the power of our past pursuit of the way.<sup>23</sup> Having received this beneficent power, mistakenly to serve an other path is no way to repay the beneficence of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>24</sup>

大宋の近代、天下の庸流、この妄稱禪宗の名をききて、俗徒おほく禪宗と稱し、達磨宗と稱し、佛心宗と稱する、妄稱きほひ風聞して、佛道をみだらんとす。これは、佛祖の大道、かつていまだしらず、正法眼藏、ありとだにも見聞せず、信受せざるともがらの亂道なり。正法眼藏をしらん、たれか佛道をあやまり稱することあらん。

Recently in the Great Song, mediocre types throughout the land hear the appellation of this falsely named “Zen school,” and the lay followers compete to spread talk of such false names as the “Zen school,” or the “Dharma school,” or the “Buddha Mind school,” till they would disrupt the way of the buddhas.<sup>25</sup> This is the disruptive talk of those who have never known the great way of the buddhas and ancestors, who have not seen or heard, believed or accepted even that there is a treasury of the true dharma eye.<sup>26</sup> Who that would know the treasury of the true dharma eye would use a false name for the way of the buddhas?

23 [through] the power of our past pursuit of the way (korai no bendō riki 古來の辨道力): A tentative translation, understanding the point to be that our present body and mind are the results of our past practice of Buddhism. The clause might also be read, “they [i.e., our body and mind] are the power to pursue the way [coming down to us] from the past.”

24 beneficent power (onriki 恩力): Or “benevolent power”; a term usually indicating another’s power, here (if the interpretation of the preceding sentence is correct), applied to the influence of karma. Does not occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

25 “Dharma school” (Daruma shū 達磨宗); “Buddha Mind school” (Busshin shū 佛心宗): The term Daruma shū 達磨宗 (i.e., “Bodhidharma school”; also written 達摩宗), though seemingly not in fact particularly common in the Chinese Chan literature, was sometimes used in Japan during Dōgen’s time to refer to the nascent Japanese Zen movement. The term busshin shū 佛心宗 had wider usage, both in China and Japan, and was a common designation for Zen in the Tendai 天台 school in which Dōgen was originally trained.

26 disruptive talk (randō 亂道): The translation loses what may be a play in the original on daidō 大道 (“great way”) and randō 亂道 (suggestive of a “reckless or corrupt way”).

Therefore,

Great Master Wuji of the Shitou Hermitage on Mount Nanyue, in a convocation, addressed the great assembly, saying, “My dharma gate has been transmitted from prior buddhas.<sup>27</sup> It isn’t concerned with meditation or vigor; it solely masters the knowledge and insight of a buddha.”<sup>28</sup>

[44:17]

We should know that the buddhas and ancestors who have direct transmission from the seven buddhas, from all the buddhas, speak like this. He states only, “My dharma gate has been transmitted from prior buddhas”; he has no statement, “My Zen school has been transmitted from prior buddhas.” Without distinguishing the individual items “meditation or vigor,” he makes [them] “solely master” “the knowledge and insight of a buddha.”<sup>29</sup> He does not disdain vigor and meditation; [they are] “the knowledge and insight of a buddha” “solely mastered.” This was treated as the bequest, “I have a treasury of the true dharma eye”: “my” is “I

27 Great Master Wuji of the Shitou Hermitage on Mount Nanyue (Nangakusan Sekitō an Musai daishi 南嶽山石頭菴無際大師): i.e., the famous Tang-dynasty Chan figure Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (700-790), disciple of Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思. The words quoted here occur at several places in Zen literature; see, e.g., the Jingde chuan-deng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:309b12-14).

28 “meditation or vigor” (zenjō shōjin 禪定・精進): Likely reference to the members of the list of the six perfections (rokudo 六度) practiced by the bodhisattva, of which vigor (S. vīrya-pāramitā) is the fourth, and meditation (S. dhyāna-pāramitā) is the fifth (the sixth being wisdom [S. prajñā-pāramitā]).

29 he makes [them] “solely master” “the knowledge and insight of a buddha” (butsu shi chicken o yui tatsu seshimu 佛之知見を唯達せしむ): A tentative translation, taking the clause to mean that vigor and meditation are included in the mastery of the buddhas’ knowledge and insight, as suggested in the following sentence. One might also take the accusative particle o を here as governing the causative verb: “he makes the knowledge and insight of a buddha solely master.” An odd locution that begins a series of plays with Shitou’s saying.

have”; “dharma gate” is the “true dharma.”<sup>30</sup> “My,” “I have,” and “my marrow” are the bequest “you’ve gotten.”<sup>31</sup>

無際大師は、青原高祖の一子なり、ひとり堂奥にいれり。曹溪古佛の剃髪の法子なり。しかあれば、曹溪古佛は祖なり、父なり。青原高祖は兄なり、師なり。佛道祖席の英雄は、ひとり石頭菴無際大師のみなり。佛道の正傳、ただ無際のみ唯達なり。道現成の果果條條、みな古佛の不古なり、古佛の長今なり。これを正法眼藏の眼睛とすべし。自餘に比準すべからず、しらざるもの、江西大寂に比するは非なり。

Great Master Wuji was the only child of the Eminent Ancestor Qingyuan; he alone entered the interior of the hall. He was the dharma child through tonsure of the Old Buddha of Caoxi.<sup>32</sup> Thus, the Old Buddha of Caoxi was both his grandfather and his father; and the Eminent Ancestor Qingyuan was both his elder brother and his teacher. The only hero of the ancestral seat on the way of the buddhas was Great Master Wuji of the Shitou Hermitage; only Wuji “solely mastered” the direct transmission of the way of the buddhas.<sup>33</sup> Each point and each item in his statements is the agelessness of an old buddha, the everlasting presence of an old buddha; we should take them as the eye of the treasury of the true dharma eye.<sup>34</sup> 30 treated as the bequest (fuzoku to seri 附嘱とせり): I.e., Shitou’s remark here is equivalent to what was expressed above, in the bequest to Mahākāśyapa, as “I have a treasury of the true dharma eye.” The following clause explains the equivalence.

“my” is “I have”; “dharma gate” is the “true dharma” (go shi wa go u nari, hōmon wa shōbō nari 吾之は吾有なり、法門は正法なり): I.e., the word “my” in Shitou’s saying, “my teaching,” is equivalent to the words “I have” in the saying of Śākyamuni, “I have the treasury of the true dharma eye”; similarly, the words “dharma gate” in Shitou’s saying is equivalent to the words “true dharma” in Śākyamuni’s saying.

31 “my marrow” (go zui 吾髓); “you’ve gotten” (nyo toku 汝得): Dōgen is here playing with well-known language appearing in the bequest from Bodhidharma to Huike, “You’ve gotten my marrow” (nyo toku go zui 汝得吾髓); see above, Note 18.

32 dharma child through tonsure of the Old Buddha of Caoxi (Sōkei kobutsu no teihatsu no hossu 曹溪古佛の剃髪の法子): I.e., received the tonsure from the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能. Though he would have been only thirteen at the time of the Sixth Ancestor’s death in 713, Shitou is said to have entered the order under Huineng before becoming a follower of Huineng’s disciple Qingyuan 青原.

33 hero of the ancestral seat on the way of the buddhas (butsudō soseki no ei'yū 佛道祖席の英雄): An expression of high praise for a past master, appearing several times in Dōgen’s writings. The “ancestral seat” (soseki 祖席) is a common term for the Zen lineage.

34 Each point and each item in his statements (dō genjō no kaka jōjō 道現成の果果條條): A loose translation of the unusual expression kaka jōjō 果果條條 (“fruits and branches”), not occurring elsewhere in Dōgen’s writing. It is unclear whether “his statements” (dō genjō 道現成) here refers only to the quoted saying or to everything that Shitou had to say.

Thus, we should know that the way of the buddhas transmitted and received by prior buddhas is not even called Zen meditation, much less described as the “Zen school.” We should clearly understand that calling it the “Zen school” is an error in the extreme. Crude types, thinking that it must be like the school of being or school of emptiness, lament that, without a school name, there would seem to be nothing to study.<sup>36</sup> The way of the buddhas cannot be like this. We should be firmly convinced that it was never called the “Zen school.”

no fuko nari, kobutsu no chōkon nari 古佛の不古なり、古佛の長今なり): The translation struggles to capture Dōgen’s play with “old” here. “Agelessness” renders fuko 不古 (“not old,” “not past”); “everlasting” translates chōkon 長今 (“long, or extended, present”); both expressions are generally taken to mean “timelessness.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Old buddha.”

eye of the treasury of the true dharma eye (shōbōgenzō no ganzei 正法眼藏の眼睛): I.e., the eye that sees, or sees by means of, the shōbōgenzō 正法眼藏. The translation reads this as referring to Shitou’s words, but it might also refer to Shitou himself. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye” and “Treasury of the true dharma eye.”

35 Jiangxi Daji (Kōzei Daijaku 江西大寂): I.e., Shitou’s famous contemporary Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709-788), disciple of Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓; Shitou and Mazu are often considered together as the leading Chan figures of their generation and are said to have been personally close.

36 school of being or school of emptiness (ushū kūshū 有宗・空宗): Buddhist traditions emphasizing respectively the phenomenal world or the ultimate emptiness of the phenomenal world. Sometimes identified with the Sarvāstivāda (Setsu issai u bu 説一切有部) and Madhyamaka (Sanron shū 三論宗) traditions respectively; more likely reflecting the broader Tendai 天台 usage of umon 有門 (“gate [or ‘teaching’] of being”) and kūmon 空門 (“gate of emptiness”), in reference to a school’s preference for assertion or denial of the reality of phenomena (dharmas). In the Japanese Tendai tradition of Dōgen’s day, the Zen teaching was identified with the gate of emptiness in Tendai’s perfect teaching (engyō 圓教) — in contrast to the Mantrayāna (shingon 眞言), which represented the gate of being.

Nevertheless, the mediocre types of recent generations are stupid and do not know the style of the ancients. Fellows without transmission from the prior buddhas erroneously say that within the buddha dharma there are the teaching styles of the five schools.<sup>37</sup> This is a natural decline and diminution. There has not been one or a half to rescue them. My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong, was the first to take pity on them.<sup>38</sup> It was the people's fortune and the dharma's fulfillment.<sup>39</sup>

37 teaching styles of the five schools (goshū no monpū 五宗の門風): I.e., the five lineages into which Song-dynasty authors often divided the Chan tradition, to which Rujing will refer below: Yunmen 雲門, Fayen 法眼, Weiyang 潯仰, Linji 臨濟, and Caodong 曹洞.

38 My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong (senshi Tendō kobutsu 先師天童古佛): I.e., Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, abbot of the Jingde Monastery 景德寺 on Mount Tiantong 天童山, in present-day Zhejiang province. Dōgen received transmission from Rujing in 1225.

39 It was the people's fortune and the dharma's fulfillment (hito no un nari, hō no tatsu nari 人の運なり、法の達なり): A tentative translation of an obscure remark, taking "people" here to refer to those on whom Rujing took pity. The juxtaposition of the "humans" by whom or to whom Buddhism is taught and the "dharma" that is taught is a common pattern.

Yunmen, Fayen, Weiyang, Linji, and Caodong (unmon hōgen igyō rinzai sōtō 雲門・法眼・潯仰・臨濟・曹洞): I.e., the five houses (goke 五家), or schools, referred to in the preceding paragraph. They are said to have developed among the descendants of the two most prominent disciples of the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能: Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思 and Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓. In the lineage of the former, the Yunmen 雲門 house is named after Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃 (864-949); the Fayen 法眼 house, after Fayen Wenyi 法眼文益 (885-958); the Caodong house 曹洞, after Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869) and his disciple Caoshan Benji 曹山本寂 (840-901) (or, by other accounts, Dongshan and the Sixth Ancestor, Caoxi Huineng 曹溪慧能). In the lineage of Nanyue 南嶽, the Weiyang 潯仰 house is named after Weishan Lingyu 潯山靈裕 (771-853) and his disciple Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂 (807-883); the Linji 臨濟 house, after Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866).

This statement is hard to encounter in a thousand years; my former master alone said it. It is hard to hear throughout the ten directions; the perfect seat alone hears it.<sup>41</sup> This being the case, among one thousand monks, there is none with ears to hear it, none with eyes to see it. How much less are there those who take up the mind and hear it, those who hear it with the body?<sup>42</sup> Even though they heard it with their own whole body and mind for one hundred million ten thousand kalpas, there have not been those who, taking up my former master's body and mind throughout, hear it, verify it, believe it, and slough it off.<sup>43</sup>

It is pitiful that, throughout the ten directions of the one Land of the Great Song, all have thought that the elders of all quarters are of equal stature to my former master.<sup>44</sup> Shall we take the group that thinks like this as endowed with the eye, or as unendowed with the eye? Again, some have thought that Linji and Deshan were of equal stature to my former master.<sup>45</sup> We have to say that this group also has never seen my former master, has never met Linji. Before I had paid obeisance to the Old 41 the perfect seat (enseki 圓席): I.e., the ideal Buddhist assembly.

42 take up the mind and hear it (shin o koshite kiku 心を擧してきく): I.e., hear it with their minds.

43 whole body and mind (kon shinjin 渾身心): body and mind throughout (tsū shinjin 通身心): Dōgen is here elaborating on two fairly common expressions for the entire body: “whole body” (konjin 渾身) and “body throughout” (tsūshin 通身). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Body and mind” and “His body throughout is hands and eyes.”

44 elders of all quarters (shohō no chōrō tō 諸方の長老等): I.e., the senior Chan teachers or abbots throughout the land.

45 Linji and Deshan (Rinzai Tokusan 臨濟・徳山): I.e., Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 and Deshan Xuanjian 徳山宣鑑 (780-865). These two prominent Tang-dynasty monks are also dismissed elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō: see “Shōbōgenzō kattō” 正法眼藏葛藤, written two months before our text, and “Shōbōgenzō mitsugo” 正法眼藏密語, written just four days after the “Butsudō” chapter.

Buddha, my former master, I thought to investigate the dark import of the five schools. After paying obeisance to the Old Buddha, my former master, I clearly knew the point that “five schools” is a corrupt name.

Thus, when the buddha dharma flourished in the Land of the Great Song, there was no term “five schools,” and there were no ancients who, taking up the term “five schools,” tell us of “house styles.” Ever since the buddha dharma became weak, we have this arbitrary term “five schools.” It is like this because people are stupid in their study and are not keen about pursuing the way.

To each and every monk seeking authentic investigation, I offer this strict prohibition: do not note or retain the arbitrary term “five houses”; do not note or designate the “teaching styles” of the five houses.<sup>46</sup> Not to mention “the three mysteries and three essentials,”<sup>47</sup> “the four consider-

46 each and every monk (unko suiko 雲箇水箇): The loose translation loses the unusual play with the common term for monk, unsui 雲水 (“clouds and water”), used in the preceding section, here split into two terms by the classifier ko 箇 (repeated in the following “authentic” [shinko no 眞箇の]); more literally, suggesting something like “each cloud and each water.” The only occurrence in the Shōbōgenzō.

47 “the three mysteries and three essentials” (sangen sanyō 三玄・三要): Dōgen begins here a list of catch phrases identified with various Chan teaching styles or techniques, especially as given in the Rentian yanmu 人天眼目, by Huiyan Zhizhao 晦巖智昭 (dates unknown), a twelfth-century work he will explicitly dismiss toward the end of our text. “The three mysteries and three essentials” is a teaching associated with Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄, founder of the Linji school. See, e.g., Linji lu 臨濟錄 (T.1985.47:497a19-21):

The Master also said, “One line should contain the gates of the three mysteries. The gate of one mystery should contain the three essentials. There is the provisional; there is the functional. All of you, how do you understand it?”

The Rentian yanmu 人天眼目 (T.2006.48:301c24ff) quotes a variant of this saying and goes on to discuss various treatments of the topic. At a later point (T.2006.48:311b19-20), it summarizes the three by saying:

三玄者、玄中玄、體中玄、玄。三要者、一玄中具三要。

The three mysteries are the mystery within the mystery; the mystery within the body, the mystery within the phrase. The three essentials are the three essentials within one mystery.

ations,”<sup>48</sup> “the four illuminations and applications,”<sup>49</sup> “the nine spheres,” and the like.<sup>50</sup> Not to mention “the three phrases” or “the five ranks” or 48 “the four considerations” (shi ryōken 四料簡): Also written 四料揀. A teaching method also associated with Linji 臨濟, based on a passage in the Linji lu 臨濟錄 (T.1985.47:497a22-23):

師晚參示衆云、有時奪人不奪境。有時奪境不奪人。有時人境俱奪。有時人境俱不奪。

At the evening convocation, the Master addressed the assembly saying, “Sometimes, I snatch away the person but don’t snatch away the object; sometimes, I snatch away the object but don’t snatch away the person; sometimes, I snatch away both person and object; sometimes, I don’t snatch away either person or object.”

The saying is quoted and its interpretation by various masters recorded in the Rentian yanmu 人天眼目 (T.2006.48:300b6ff).

49 “the four illuminations and applications” (shi shōyū 四照用): Or “four understandings and applications.” Again, attributed to Linji 臨濟, though apparently not occurring in early versions of the Linji lu 臨濟錄. The Rentian yanmu 人天眼目 discussion (T.2006.48:304a10ff) begins with a quotation of Linji 臨濟:

師一日示衆云、我有時先照後用。有時先用後照。有時照用同時。有時照用不同時。先照後用有人在。先用後照有法在。照用同時。驅耕夫之牛。奪饑人之食。敲骨取髓。痛下針錐。照用不同時。有問有答。立主立賓。合水和泥應機接物。

One day, the Master addressed the assembly saying,

Sometimes I illumine it first and apply it later; sometimes I apply it first and illumine it later; sometimes I illumine and apply it at the same time; sometimes I illumine and apply it not at the same time. When I illumine it first and apply it later, the person is there; when I apply it first and illumine it later, the dharma is there. When I illumine and apply it at the same time, I drive off the farmer’s ox; I steal the food of the starving man; I pound the bones and get the marrow; I needle the pain. When I illumine and apply it not at the same time, I have questions, I have answers; I set up the host and set up the guest; I accord with the water and harmonize with the mud, dealing with things in response to the opportunity.

50 “the nine spheres” (kutai 九帶): An organization of Buddhist teachings attributed to Fushan Fayuan 浮山法遠 (991-1067), in the Linji 臨濟 lineage. The Rentian yanmu 人天眼目 discusses them at T.2006.48:308a26-310b8, opening with this explanation:

Whenever Fushan addressed his followers, he widely cited the words of the school. Then his students collected them and begged the Master to name them. The Master categorized them according to type and called them the Fo chan zong jiaoyi jiudai ji (“Collection of the Nine Spheres of the Teachings of the Buddhist Zen School”), perhaps in imitation of Bangu’s Jiuliu (“Nine Currents”) [of early Chinese philosophy].

Sources give somewhat variant versions of the nine; the Rentian yanmu 人天眼目 (T.2006.48:308b1ff passim) has: (1) fo zhengfa yan zang dai 佛正法眼藏帶 (“the sphere of the treasury of the true dharma eye of the buddha”), (2) fofa zang dai 佛法藏帶 (“the sphere of the treasury of the dharma of the buddha”), (3) ri guan dai 理貫帶 (“the sphere of principle throughout”), (4) shi guan dai 事貫帶 (“the sphere of phenomena throughout”), (5) li shi zonghong dai 理事縱橫帶 (“the sphere of principle and phenomena vertical and horizontal”), (6) ququ chui dai 屈曲垂帶 (“the sphere of letting down the

The words of Old Master Śākya are not of such small measure as this and do not take something like this as of great measure; he does not state them, nor do we hear them at Shaolin or Caoxi.<sup>52</sup> It is pitiful, something said now by shavelings of the last age who have not heard the dharma

51 “three phrases” (sanku 三句): The expression “three phrases” (or “three statements”) is applied to the teachings of various Chan masters, and it is impossible to say just which of these Dōgen may have had in mind here. The best-known case is that of the “three phrases” of Yunmen 雲門, cited elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Yunmen’s three phrases.”

“five ranks” (goi 五位): There are several versions of the “five ranks” formula, associated especially with the Caodong 曹洞 school and attributed originally to the school’s founder, Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Five ranks.”

“ten wisdoms of the truth of sameness” (jū dōshin chi 十同眞智): More commonly known as jūchi dōshin 十智同眞. A set of desiderata for teaching developed by Fenyang Shanzhao 汾陽善昭 (947-1024). They are given in the Fenyang yulu 汾陽語錄 (T.1992.47:596b22-25) as: (1) “sameness in quality” (tong yi zhi 同一質), (2) “sameness in the great matter” (tong da shih 同大事), (3) “sameness in all practicing” (zong tong can 總同參), (4) “sameness in true aspiration” (tong zhen zhi 同眞志), (5) “sameness in universality” (tong pian pu 同遍普), (6) “sameness in endowment” (tong ju zu 同具足), (7) “sameness in gain and loss” (tong de shi 同得失), (8) “sameness in birth and death” (tong sheng sha 同生殺), (9) “sameness in giving voice” (tong yin hou 同音吼), (10) “sameness in gaining entry” (tong de ru 同得入).

The Rentian yanmu 人天眼目 discusses the formula at T.2006.48:304c22ff. Its list (at T.2006.48:305a7-9) differs from the Fenyang yulu 汾陽語錄 version only in number 4, which it gives as “sameness in true wisdom” (tong zhen zhi 同眞智).

52 The words of Old Master Śākya (Shaka rōshi no dō 釋迦老子の道): Or “the way of Old Master Śākya.”

Shaolin or Caoxi (Shōrin Sōkei 少林・曹溪): i.e., the residences of the First and Sixth Ancestors.

and whose bodies and minds and eyes are dark.<sup>53</sup> Descendants and seeds of the buddhas and ancestors, do not utter such words!<sup>54</sup>

In what the buddhas and ancestors maintain, one never hears these mad words. Recent little teachers, types who have never heard the complete way of the buddha dharma, who lack complete reliance on the way of the ancestors, who are ignorant of their original lot, boasting of one or two little parts, set up such names of schools. Ever since they set up the names of schools, the little children, because they do not study the way that should seek out the root, vainly follow the branches. Lacking the aspiration that admires the ancients, they have the conduct that mixes with the secular. Even the secular warn that following along with the secular world is base.

文王問太公曰、君務舉賢、而不獲其功、世亂愈甚、以致危亡者何也。太公曰、舉賢而不用、是以有舉賢之名也、無得賢之實也。文王曰、其失安在。太公曰、其失在好用世俗之所譽、不得其真賢。文王曰、好用世俗之所譽者何也。太公曰、好聽世俗之所譽者、或以非賢爲賢、或以非智爲智、或以非忠爲忠、或以非信爲信。君以世俗所譽者爲賢智、以世俗之所毀者爲不肖、則多黨者進、少黨者退。是以群邪比周而蔽賢、忠臣死於無罪、邪臣虛譽以求爵位。是以世亂愈甚、故其國不免於危亡。

King Wen asked the Grand Duke, “Why is it that the lord employs and promotes the worthy but does not garner the benefit, so that the disorder of the world increases to an extreme that becomes dangerous?”<sup>55</sup>

The Grand Duke said, “He elevates the worthy but does not use them. This is because he elevates the names of the worthy and does not get the reality of the worthy.”

King Wen said, “Where is the fault?”

53 the last age (matsudai 末代): I.e., the final period in the historical decline of Buddha Śākyamuni’s teachings, often thought in Dōgen’s day to have begun in 1052 and to last for ten thousand years. A term occurring only infrequently in Dōgen’s writing.

54 Descendants and seeds of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no jison shūji 佛祖の兒孫種子): An unusual expression, presumably meaning “those descended from the buddhas and ancestors and those with the karmic potential (‘seeds’) to become buddhas and ancestors.”

The Grand Duke said, "The fault is in using what the worldly praise and not getting the truly worthy."

King Wen said, "What is using what the worldly praise?"

The Grand Duke said, "To listen to the praise of the worldly is to take the unworthy as the worthy, to take the unintelligent as the intelligent, to take the disloyal as the loyal, to take the unfaithful as the faithful. If the lord takes as worthy and intelligent those praised by the worldly and takes as unworthy those reviled by the worldly, then the majority party will advance and the minority party will retreat. Thus, when the wicked band together, they obscure the worthy; the loyal ministers die without crime, and the wicked ministers seek court ranks with flattery. Thus, the disorder of the world increases to an extreme, and as a result, the country cannot avoid peril."

俗なほ、その國、その道の危亡することをなげく、佛法・佛道の危亡せん、佛子、かならずなげくべし。危亡のもとみは、みだりに世俗にしたがふなり。世俗にほむるところをきく時は、眞賢をうることなし。眞賢をえんとおもはば、照後觀前の智略あるべし。世俗のほむるところ、いまだかならずしも賢にあらず、聖にあらず。世俗のそしるところ、いまだかならずしも賢にあらず、聖にあらず。しかありといへども、賢にしてそしりをまねくと、偽にしてほまれあると、三察するところ、混ずべからず。賢をもちいざらんは、國の損なり、不肖をもちいん、國のうらみなり。

Even the secular lament when their country and its way are imperiled; when the dharma of the buddha and the way of the buddhas are imperiled, the children of the buddha should naturally lament. The basis of the peril is the indiscriminate accord with the secular world. When one listens to what the worldly praise, one fails to get the "truly worthy." If one would get the truly worthy, one should have the wisdom to illumine behind and see ahead. Those the worldly praise are not always worthies, are not always sages; those the worldly disparage are not always worthies, are not always sages. While this is the case, where we thrice examine the worthy's inviting disparagement and the fraud's being praised, we should not confuse them. Not to use the worthy is a loss to the country; to use the unworthy is a regret for the country.

To set up the name “five schools” is a confusion with the secular world. Though there are many who follow the secular world, there are few people who understand the secular as secular. The sage should convert the secular; to follow the secular is extremely stupid. Those that would follow the secular — how could they know the correct dharma of the buddha? How could they become buddhas or become ancestors? It has been inherited by successor after successor from the seven buddhas; how could it be like setting up the five denominations of the rules by the bunch in Sindh in the West who rely on the text to understand the meaning?<sup>56</sup>

しかあればしるべし、佛法の正命を正命とせる祖師は、五宗の家門ある、とかつていはざるなり。佛道に五宗あり、と學するは、七佛の正嗣にあらず。

Thus, we should realize that the ancestral masters who have taken the correct life of the buddha dharma as the correct life have never said that there are houses of the five schools. Those who learn that there are five houses in the way of the buddhas are not legitimate heirs of the seven buddhas.

しかあれば、はかりしりぬ、西天二十八代、東地二十二祖、いまだ五宗の家門を開演せざるなり。祖師とある祖師は、みなかくのごとし。五宗を立て各各の宗旨ありと稱するは、誑惑世間人のともがら、少聞薄解のたぐひなり。佛道におきて、各各の道を自立せば、佛道いかでか今日にいたらん。迦葉も自立すべし、阿難も自立すべし。もし自立する道理を正道とせば、佛法はやく西天に滅しなまし。各各自立せん宗旨、たれかこれ慕古せん。各各に自立せん宗旨、たれか正邪を決擇せん。正邪いまだ決擇せずば、たれかこれを佛法なりとし、佛法にあらずとせん。この道理あきら

56 the five denominations of the rules (ritsu no gobu 律の五部): Reference to the tradition that, some one hundred years after the time of Buddha Śākyamuni, there arose among the followers of Upagupta, separate vinaya collections in the five schools of Dharmaguptaka, Sarvāstivāda, Mahīśāsaka, Kāśyapīya, and Vātsīputrīya (sometimes replaced by Mahāsāṃghika).

57 My former master (senshi 先師): I.e., Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨. The source is unknown.

Thus, we know clearly that the twenty-eight generations of Sindh in the West and the twenty-two ancestors of the Land of the East never proclaimed the houses of the five schools.<sup>58</sup> The ancestral masters that are ancestral masters are all like this. Those who set up the “five schools” and claim that each has its own tenets are types who would deceive the people of the world, the sort with little learning and slight understanding. If, within the way the buddha, each sets up their own way, how could the way of the buddhas have reached us today? Kāśyapa would have set up his own; Ānanda would have set up his own.<sup>59</sup> If the principle of setting up one's own [way] were the correct way, the buddha dharma would have quickly disappeared in Sindh in the West. Who would “admire the ancients” for the tenets set up by each [faction]? Who could judge the truth or falsity of tenets set up by each? If we cannot judge its truth or falsity, who could say this is the buddha dharma or this is not the buddha dharma? If this principle is not clear, it is difficult to call it the buddha dharma. The name “five schools” was not set up during the time of any of the ancestral masters. After the perfect quiescence of the ancestral masters who are called the ancestral masters of the five schools, perhaps branches of their followers, those whose eyes were not yet clear, whose feet had not yet walked, without asking their fathers, opposing their ancestors, set up this name. The point is clear. Anyone should recognize it.

Great Master Huizhao, abandoning a house that explicates scripture, became a follower of Huangbo.<sup>65</sup> Three times he tasted Huangbo's stick, altogether sixty staffs. Visiting Dayu, he had an awakening.<sup>66</sup> He subsequently resided at Linji Cloister in Zhenzhou.<sup>67</sup> While he may not have exhaustively investigated Huangbo's mind, he has no saying of one line, no saying of a half line, that the buddha dharma he inherited should be called the Linji school; he does not raise his fist; he does not take up his whisk.<sup>68</sup> Nevertheless, immediately, mediocre factions among his followers, without protecting the work of the father, without protecting the buddha dharma, mistakenly set up the name “Linji school.” Were it constructed during the life of Great Master Huizhao, since it goes against the words of the Ancient Ancestor, there should have been prior discussion about setting up that name.

66 Visiting Dayu, he had an awakening (Daigu no tokoro ni sanjite seigo seri 大愚のところに参じて省悟せり): Recounting the famous story that, after being beaten three times by Huangbo 黄檗, Linji consulted with Gaoan Dayu 高安大愚 (dates unknown) and understood Huangbo's actions.

Linji said, “If someone suddenly asks you, what will you answer?”

豎舉せず、拈拂せず): “Raising the fist” and “taking up the whisk” are two common actions used in a Chan master’s teachings; here, presumably, meaning that Linji did not use reference to a Linji school in his teaching.

69 When Linji was about to pass away (Rinzai shō shimetsu 臨濟將示滅): A famous passage supposed to record Linji’s final words; it is found in many Zen sources and recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:210, case 167; probably taken from the Hongzhi lu 宏智錄, T.2001.48:19c8-12). Linji’s disciple Sansheng Huiran 三聖慧然 (dates unknown) is traditionally credited with the compilation of his master’s recorded sayings. A version of his exchange with Linji appears at the end of the text (Linji lu 臨濟錄, T.1985.47:506c3-7).

70 “this blind donkey” (sha katsuro 遮瞎驢): Scholarly opinion is divided on whether the glyph katsu 瞎 should be taken here as “blind” or “one-eyed” (i.e., “blind in one eye”).

Linji does not say, “Do not let my Zen school be extinguished.” He does not say, “Do not let my Linji school be extinguished.” He does not say, “Do not let my school be extinguished.” He just says, “Do not let my treasury of the true dharma eye be extinguished.” Clearly, we should realize that the great way correctly transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors should not be called “the Zen school,” should not be called “the Linji school.” We should have no dreams of calling it “the Zen school.” Even though “extinguished” is the principle and form of the treasury of the true dharma eye, this is how it is bequeathed.<sup>71</sup> The “extinguished” “with this blind donkey” is truly the “who would have known” of the bequeathal.<sup>72</sup> Among the followers of Linji, Sansheng is the only one; he should not be compared with, or ranked with, his elder and younger dharma brothers.<sup>73</sup> Truly, he is placed under the bright window.<sup>74</sup> The episode of Linji and Sansheng is the buddhas and ancestors. The bequeathal of Linji today is the bequeathal of Vulture Peak yesterday.<sup>75</sup> Therefore, the reason we should not call it the Linji school is obvious.

71 “extinguished” is the principle and form of the treasury of the true dharma eye (mekkyaku wa shōbōgenzō no rishō nari 滅却は正法眼藏の理象なり): I.e., the treasury of the true dharma eye is by its nature and characteristics “extinguished.” The term rishō 理象 (“principle and form”) does not occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; it is generally understood as equivalent to the common riji 理事 (“principle and phenomena”).

72 The “extinguished” “with this blind donkey” is truly the “who would have known” of the bequeathal (kō sha katsuro hen no mekkyaku, makoto ni fuzoku no sui chi nari 向遮睹驢邊の滅却、まことに附嘱の誰知なり): I.e., the extinction of Linji’s teaching that takes place with Sansheng is precisely the “who would have known” that Linji transmits to Sansheng. The translation labors to preserve something of Dōgen’s play with the terms of Linji’s statement.

73 Among the followers of Linji, Sansheng is the only one (Rinzai monka ni wa, tada Sanshō nomi nari 臨濟門下には、ただ三聖のみなり): It is unclear why and in what sense Dōgen singles out Sanshō among Linji’s followers. Perhaps because his version of the exchange (unlike most other versions) has Linji “entrusting” (shoku 嘱) Sansheng, Dōgen takes Sansheng as the chief inheritor of Linji’s teachings; the Linji lineage, however, is traditionally held to descend, not from Sansheng, but from Linji’s disciple Xinghua 興化存獎 (830-888).

74 placed under the bright window (meisō ka anbai 明窓下安排): A fixed idiom for one at home in the study of sūtras and Chan discourse records (goroku 語録); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bright windows.”

75 The bequeathal of Linji today is the bequeathal of Vulture Peak yesterday (kon-nichi Rinzai no fuzoku wa, sekijitsu Ryōzen no fuzoku nari 今日臨濟の附屬は、昔日靈山の附屬なり): I.e., Linji’s bequest to Sansheng is the same as Buddha Śākyamuni’s bequest to Mahākāśyapa on Gr̥dhra-kūṭa.

Great Master Kuangzhen of Mount Yunmen in the past studied with Venerable Chen; he would have been the grandson of Huangbo.<sup>76</sup> Later, he succeeded Xuefeng.<sup>77</sup> This master did not say that the treasury of the true dharma eye should be called the Yunmen school. His followers, not realizing that the false names Weiyang and Linji were false names, newly established the name Yunmen school. If the tenets of Great Master Kuangzhen had aspired to a name that established a school, it would be difficult to acknowledge him as the body and mind of the buddha dharma. When it is now called by the name of a school, it is like calling the emperor a commoner.

cially recorded teacher's title. In his thousand words he had not a single word, in his ten thousand lines he had not a single line, in which he said that the name "Fayan school" should be established as the name of the treasury of the true dharma eye. Nevertheless, his followers established the name "Fayan school." If Fayan were converting people today, he would erase the term for the current falsely named Fayan school. With Chan Master Fayan already departed, there is no one to save us from this calamity. Even a thousand or ten thousand years later, people who would be filial to Chan Master Fayan must not take the name "Fayan school" as a name. This is basic filiality toward Chan Master Great Fayan. In sum, Yunmen and Fayan are the distant descendants of the Eminent Ancestor Qingyuan.<sup>79</sup> They transmitted the bones of the way; they transmitted the marrow of the dharma.

青原高祖は、曹溪古佛の同時に、曹溪の化儀を青原に化儀せり。在世に出世せしめて、出世を一世に見聞するは、正嫡のうへの正嫡なるべし、高祖のなかの高祖なるべし。雄參學、雌出世にあらず。そのときの齊肩、いま拔群なり。學者、ことにしるべきところなり。

At the same time as the Old Buddha of Caoxi, Eminent Ancestor Qingyuan practiced Caoxi's teaching methods at Qingyuan. That he was made to appear in the world during his lifetime and he saw his appearance in the world in the same generation means he must have been the legitimate heir among legitimate heirs, must have been the eminent ancestor among eminent ancestors.<sup>82</sup> It is not a case of strong study and weak appearance in the world.<sup>83</sup> Those of his stature at his time would be outstanding today. This is something students should realize.

曹溪古佛、ちなみに現般涅槃をもて人天を化せし席末に、石頭すすみて所依の師を請す。古佛ちなみに尋思去としめて、尋讓去といはず。しかあればすなはち、古佛の正法眼藏、ひとり青原高祖の正傳なり。たとひ同得道の神足をゆるすとも、高祖はなほ正神足の獨歩なり。曹溪古佛、すでに青原を、わが子の子ならしむ。子の父の、父の父とある、得髓あきらかなり、祖宗の正嗣なることあきらかなり。

On the occasion when the Old Buddha of Caoxi was converting humans and devas by manifesting his complete nirvāṇa, from the last seats Shitou came forward and requested a master on whom to rely. On that occasion, the Old Buddha indicated that he “go inquire of Si”; he did not say that he “go inquire of Rang.”<sup>84</sup> Therefore, the treasury of the true dharma of the Old Buddha was correctly transmitted to the Eminent Ancestor Qingyuan alone. Though we may grant that they were spir-

82 That he was made to appear in the world during his lifetime (zaise ni shusse seshimete 在世に出世せしめて): i.e., was put forward as a teacher while his master, Huineng 慧能, was still active. The following “same generation” (isse 一世) similarly refers to the same generation as his teacher.

83 It is not a case of strong study and weak appearance in the world (yū sangaku, shi shusse ni arazu 雄參學、雌出世にあらず): An unusual expression, the exact meaning of which is subject to interpretation. It is often taken to mean that Qingyuan was the equal of Caoxi, but it could also be understood to mean that Qingyuan was as strong a teacher as he was a student.

84 “go inquire of Si” (jin Shi ko 尋思去): i.e., go visit Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思. This advice is recorded in an amusing story in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:240a27-b5), in which Shitou initially takes Huineng's words, xunsi qu 尋思去, to mean “go ponder it” and goes off to meditate.

“go inquire of Rang” (jin Jō ko 尋讓去): Reference to Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓, the disciple of Huineng from whom the lineages of the Weiyang 潯仰 and Linji 臨濟 schools descend.

itual feet who gained the way together, the Eminent Ancestor was the sole pace of the real spiritual foot.<sup>85</sup> Since the Old Buddha of Caoxi had Qingyuan make a child of his child, the father of the child would be the father of the father; that he attained the marrow is obvious; that he was the legitimate heir of the ancestors is obvious.<sup>86</sup>

洞山大師、まさに青原四世の嫡嗣として、正法眼藏を正傳し、涅槃妙心開眼す。このほか、さらに別傳なし、別宗なし。大師かつて、曹洞宗と稱すべし、と示衆する拳頭なし、瞬目なし。また門人のなかに、庸流まじはらざれば、洞山宗と稱する門人なし、いはんや曹洞宗といはんや。

Great Master Dongshan, as the legitimate heir in the fourth generation of Qingyuan, correctly transmitted the treasury of the true dharma eye and opened the eye of the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa. Beside this, there is no separate transmission, there is no separate school. The Great Master never had a fist or a blink of the eye in which he instructs the assembly that they should be called the Caodong school. Among his followers as well, because they were not corrupted by mediocre types, there was no follower who called them the Dongshan school, much less said they were the Caodong school.

The name “Caodong school” may include the name “Caoshan.”<sup>87</sup> If

85 Though we may grant that they were spiritual feet who gained the way together, the Eminent Ancestor was the sole pace of the real spiritual foot (tatoi dō tokudō no jinsoku o yurusutomo, kōso wa nao shō jinsoku no doppo nari たとひ同得道の神足をゆるすとも、高祖はなほ正神足の獨歩なり): I.e., although both Qingyuan 青原 and Nanyue 南嶽 may have been top disciples of Huineng, it was the former alone who was the authentic inheritor of the Sixth Ancestor's teachings. Dōgen puns here on the term jinsoku 神足 (“spiritual foot”), which is used both for paranormal physical powers (from the Sanskrit rddhi-pāda) and for a superior disciple

86 Since the Old Buddha of Caoxi had Qingyuan make a child of his child, the father of the child would be the father of the father (Sōkei kobutsu, sude ni Seigen o, waga shi o shi narashimu. shi no fu no, fu no fu to aru 曹溪古佛、すでに青原を、わが子の子ならしむ。子の父の、父の父とある): I.e., Huineng 慧能 had his disciple Qingyuan 青原 take his disciple Shitou 石頭 as a disciple; Huineng was thus both the master of Shitou and the master of Shitou's master, Qingyuan.

87 “Caoshan” (Sōzan 曹山): I.e., Dongshan's disciple Caoshan Benji 曹山本寂. An alternative etymology of the name “Caodong” 曹洞 derives the element cao 曹 from the Sixth Ancestor's mountain name Caoxi 曹溪.

this is the case, Yunju and Tong'an ought also to be included.<sup>88</sup> Yunju was a guide among humans and the heavens above, more revered than Caoshan. So it is obvious regarding this name “Caodong” that the stinking skin bags of a marginal faction, seeking to be of equal stature, called themselves by this name “Caodong.” Truly this is a case where, “though the noon sun is bright, the floating clouds cover it below.”<sup>89</sup>

In sum, when the Buddha was present, he never called [his teachings] “the Buddha school,” or called them “the Vulture Peak school,” or spoke of “the Jetavana school,” or spoke of the “My Mind school,” or spoke of the “Buddha Mind school.”<sup>93</sup> Where in the words of the Buddha does he use the name “Buddha Mind school”? Why do people today use the name “Buddha Mind school”? Why would the World-Honored One necessarily call the mind a school? Why would a school necessarily be the mind? If there is a Buddha Mind school, there should be a Buddha Body school, should be a Buddha Eye school, should be a Buddha Ear school, should be a Buddha Nose or Tongue school, should be a Buddha Marrow school, Buddha Bones school, Buddha Feet school, Buddha Land school, and so on. Now, there are none of these. We should realize the fact that the name “Buddha Mind school” is a false name.

Lately, there was a little child named Zhicong, who collected one word or two words of the ancestral masters, said they were the denominations of the five houses, and called it The Eye of Humans and Devas.<sup>94</sup> People not knowing how to assess it, beginners and latecomers think it true, and some even keep it hidden in their robes. It is not “the eye of humans and devas”; it blinds the eye of human and devas. How could it have the virtue of blinding the treasury of the true dharma eye?

This Eye of Humans and Devas was collected by Senior Seat Zhicong, in the twelfth month of the senior earth year of the monkey, in Chunxi, at the Wannian Monastery on Mount Tiantai.<sup>95</sup> Though it is a late production, if its words were right, we should attend to it. It is craziness; it is foolishness. It lacks the eye of study; it lacks the eye of pilgrimage. How much less could it have the eye that sees the buddhas and ancestors? We should not use it. He should not be called “Zhicong” {“wise and bright”}; he should be called “Yumeng” {“stupid and dull”}. He who does not know that person, who does not encounter the person, in collecting words and lines, does not pick words and lines of the person who would be that person.<sup>96</sup> We know that he does not know the person.

95 the twelfth month of the senior earth year of the monkey, in Chunxi (Junki boshin jūni gatsu 淳熙戊申十二月): I.e., the twelfth lunar month of the fifth stem ninth branch of the cyclical year of the Chunxi 淳熙 era [December 1188-January 1189]. This information occurs in the preface to the work, at T.2006.48:300a12, a19.

96 that person (sono hito その人): An expression occurring several times in the Shōbō-genzō in the sense “a real person,” “a person with real understanding.”

震旦國の教學のともがら宗稱するは、齊肩の彼彼あるによりてなり。いま佛祖正法眼藏の附屬嫡嫡せり。齊肩あるべからず、混ずべき彼彼なし。

That those who study the teachings in the Land of Cīnasthāna called themselves schools was because there were others of equal stature.<sup>97</sup> Now, the treasury of the true dharma eye of the buddhas and ancestors has been bequeathed from heir to heir; there are none of equal stature, there are no others that could be confused with it.

かくのごとくなるに、いまの杜撰長老等、みだりに宗の稱をもはらす、自專のくはだて、佛道をおそれず。佛道は、なんちが佛道にあらず、諸佛祖の佛道なり、佛道の佛道なり。

Despite this, the illiterate elders nowadays always rashly call themselves a school; scheming on their own, they are not in awe of the way of the buddhas. The way of the buddhas is not your way of the buddhas: it is the buddhas' and ancestors' way of the buddhas; it is the way of the buddhas's way of the buddhas.

太公謂文王曰、天下者、非一人之天下、天下之天下也。

The Grand Duke said to King Wen, "The realm is not one person's realm: it is the realm's realm."<sup>98</sup>

97 That those who study the teachings in the Land of Cīnasthāna called themselves schools was because there were others of equal stature (Shintan koku no kyōgaku no tomogara shūshō suru wa, seiken no hihi aru ni yorite nari 震旦國の教學のともがら宗稱するは、齊肩の彼彼あるによりてなり); i.e., the custom of designating schools in Chinese Buddhism reflects the fact that there were various factions with more or less equal claim to represent the religion.

の化儀にそむきて、宗の稱を立せん、如來の弟子にあらず、祖師の兒孫にあらず、重逆よりもおもし。たちまちに如來の無上菩提をおもくせず、自宗を自専する、前來を輕忽し、前來をそむくなり。前來もしらずといふべし、世尊在日の功德を信ぜざるなり、かれらが屋裏に佛法あるべからず。

Thus, even the secular gentleman has this wisdom, has these words. Children within the house of the buddhas and ancestors must not arbitrarily follow “Stupid and Dull” in calling the great way of the buddhas and ancestors by the names of schools they establish. This is a major violation; not [worthy of] people of the way of the buddhas. If we should use the term “school,” the World-Honored One would himself have used it. When the World-Honored One did not himself use it, how as his descendants can we use it after his extinction? Who is more skilled than the World-Honored One? Were he not skilled, we would not benefit. Again, when you turn against the traditional way of the buddhas and ancestors and independently establish your own school, which of the descendants of the buddha would take your school as a school? We should study by illuminating the past and observing the present. Do not be reckless. Trying not to differ one hair from the time when the World-Honored One was in the world, to lament our failure to reach even one part in a billion, to rejoice in reaching it, to aspire not to differ from it — only this is what the disciples left behind make their repeated thought. So we should vow to meet and serve him for many lives; so we should aspire to see the Buddha and hear the dharma for many lives. Those who, violating the teaching method when the World-Honored One was in the world, would intentionally set up the name of a school are not the disciples of the Tathāgata, are not the descendants of the ancestral masters; it is heavier than the grave offenses.<sup>99</sup> Taking lightly the unsurpassed bodhi of the Tathāgata, impulsively to devote oneself exclusively to one’s own school is to neglect antecedents, to depart from antecedents. We must say they do not know the antecedents. They do not believe in the virtues of the days of the World-Honored One. Within their house, there can be no buddha dharma.

しかあればすなはち、學佛の道業を正傳せんには、宗の稱を見聞すべからず。佛佛祖祖、附屬し正傳するは、正法眼藏無上菩提なり。佛祖所有の法は、みな佛附屬しきたれり、さらに剰法のあらたなるあらず。この道理、すなはち法骨道髓なり。

Thus, in correctly transmitting the work of the way of studying Buddhism, we should not see or hear the term “school.” What buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor bequeath and correctly transmit is the unsurpassed bodhi of the treasury of the true dharma eye. The dharma possessed by the buddhas and ancestors has all been bequeathed by the Buddha; there is no further additional dharma. This principle is the bones of the dharma, the marrow of the way.

99 grave offenses (jūgyaku 重逆): The serious violations of the monastic code: e.g., the ten grave violations (jū jūzai 十重罪) and the five heinous offenses (gogyaku 五逆).

INTRODUCTION

This essay was composed at Kippōji in the autumn of 1243. It represents number 45 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō and number 51 in the Honzan version; it is not found in the sixty-chapter compilation but is preserved in the twenty-eight-text Himitsu Shōbōgenzō, where it is listed as number 4 of fascicle 2.

The essay focuses on a single kōan, featuring the ninth-century monk Yunju Daoying 雲居道膺, a disciple of Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价, on the claim that Buddha Śākyamuni had “secret words” (mitsugo 密語; also sometimes written as 蜜語) understood only by his disciple Mahākāśyapa. The claim reflects the tradition that Zen was first transmitted on Vulture Peak, when the Buddha held up a flower, and Mahākāśyapa smiled. Dōgen strongly rejects the notion that the Buddha’s “secret words” refers to a truth beyond language conveyed through his act of holding up the flower. Rather, he says, “secret words” refers to what is most intimately true — a secret possessed by everyone and expressed wherever authentic Buddhism is taught and practiced.

The relatively short essay ends with an elegant verse by the twelfth-century figure Xuedou Zhijian 雪竇智鑑, which likens “secret words” to blossoms falling in the night, their fragrance perfuming the streams of the city.

Secret Words

諸佛之所護念の大道を見成公案するに、汝亦如是、吾亦如是、善自護持、いまに證契せり。

When they express the great way that “the buddhas bear in mind” as “the realized kōan,” [the words] “you’re also like this, I’m also like this,” “protect it well” have verified the accord in the present.<sup>1</sup>

雲居山弘覺大師、因官人送供問曰、世尊有密語、迦葉不覆藏。如何是世尊密語。大師召曰、尚書。其人應諾。大師云、會麼。尚書曰、不會。大師云、汝若不會、世尊密語、汝若會、迦葉不覆藏。

1 When they express the great way that “the buddhas bear in mind” as “the realized kōan” (shobutsu shi shogonen no daidō o genjō kōan suru ni 諸佛之所護念の大道を見成公案するに): “What the buddhas bear in mind” (shobutsu shi shogonen 諸佛之所護念) is a fixed phrase found widely in the canon; here, it alludes to the saying of the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能, in the famous exchange with his student Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744) (e.g., at shinji Shōbōgenzō 真字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:178, case 101; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “What thing is it that comes like this?”), which Dōgen goes on to quote in this sentence. When Nanyue says he is not defiled by practice and verification, Huineng says:

祇此不染汚、是諸佛之所護念。汝亦如是、吾亦如是、乃至西天諸祖亦如是。

“Just this ‘not defiled’ is what the buddhas bear in mind. You’re also like this, I’m also like this, and all the ancestors of Sindh in the West [i. e., India] are also like this.”

The English “express . . . as the realized kōan” strives to render Dōgen’s use here of the expression genjō kōan 見成公案 (“realized case”) as a transitive verb, the agent of which is unexpressed; the translation takes it as Huineng’s words, but one might also assume an unstated “one” or “we.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Realized kōan.”

“protect it well” (zen ji go ji 善自護持): A common admonition to the student; while not in most versions of the Sixth Ancestor’s saying, its presence here may reflect its occurrence in the version recorded in the Rentian yanmu 人天眼目 (T.2006.48:322b3-4).

have verified the accord in the present (ima ni shōkai seri いまに證契せり): Probably meaning that the truth of Huineng’s words are verified here and now.

Great Master Hongjue of Mount Yunju, was once asked by an official presenting offerings, “The World-Honored One has secret words; for Kāśyapa, they are not concealed.<sup>2</sup> What are the secret words of the World-Honored One?”

The Great Master called him, saying, “Minister.”

The man responded. The Great Master said, “Do you understand?”

The minister said, “I don’t understand.”

The Great Master said, “If you don’t understand, it’s the secret words of the World-Honored One; if you do understand, it’s not concealed for Kāśyapa.”

大師者、青原五世の嫡孫と現成して、天人師なり、盡十方界の大善知識なり。有情を化し、無情を化す。四十六佛の佛嫡として、佛祖のために説法す。三峰庵主の住裏には、天厨送供す。傳法得道のときより、送供の境界を超越せり。

The Great Master appeared as the legitimate successor in the fifth generation from Qingyuan; he was the teacher to devas and men, a great wise friend to all throughout the ten directions.<sup>3</sup> He converted the sentient; he converted the insentient. As the buddha successor of forty-six buddhas, he preached the dharma for the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>4</sup> Where he was residing as master of the Sanfeng Hermitage, he was presented with offerings from the kitchens of the devas; after he received transmission of the dharma and gained the way, he transcended the realm of the offerings.<sup>5</sup>

3 the fifth generation from Qingyuan (Seigen gose 青原五世): I.e., fifth in the line of masters descended from Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思 (d. 740), one of the two leading disciples of the Sixth Ancestor.

4 the buddha successor of forty-six buddhas (shijūroku butsu no butteki 四十六佛の佛嫡): I.e., forty-sixth in the lineage of the seven buddhas, the thirty-four ancestors in India and China to Qingyuan, and the five generations from Qingyuan to Yunju; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas and ancestors” and “Seven buddhas.”

5 the Sanfeng Hermitage (Sanpōan 三峰庵): The exact location is uncertain; perhaps near Dongshan 洞山, in present-day Jiangxi province. Yunju is said to have stayed here before studying with Dongshan.

he was presented with offerings from the kitchens of the devas (tenchū sōku su 天厨送供す): Dōgen’s source for this legend that Yunju was fed by the gods is unknown;

[45:4] {1:490}

いまの道取する世尊有密語、迦葉不覆藏は、四十六佛の相承といへども、四十六代の本来面目として、 匪従人得なり、不従外來なり、不是本得なり、未嘗新條なり。この一段事の密語の現成なる、ただ釋迦牟尼世尊のみ密語あるにあらず、諸佛祖みな密語あり。すでに世尊なるは、かならず密語あり、密語あれば、さだめて迦葉不覆藏あり。百千の世尊あれば、百千の迦葉ある道理を、わすれず參學すべきなり。參學すといふは、一時に會取せんとおもはず、百廻・千廻も審細功夫して、かたきものをきらんと經營するがごとくすべし。かたる人あらば、たちどころに會取すべし、とおもふべからず。

The words said here, “The World-Honored One has secret words; for Kāśyapa, they are not concealed,” while they may be the inheritance of forty-six buddhas, as the original face of forty-six generations, they are not got from another, do not come from outside, were not originally possessed, have never been a new item.<sup>6</sup> That this incident is the expression of “secret words” does not mean that only the World-Honored One Śākyamuni has “secret words”: the buddhas and ancestors all have “secret words.” Since they are “World-Honored Ones,” invariably they have “secret words”; when they have “secret words,” definitely there is “for Kāśyapa, they are not concealed.” We should study this without forgetting the principle that, when there are a hundred thousand World-Honored Ones, there are a hundred thousand Kāśyapas. To study this means, without thinking to understand it all at once, we should work on it carefully, as if planning to cut through a hard object. If there is someone telling us something, we should not think we can understand it on the spot.

いま雲居山すでに世尊ならんに、密語そなはり、不覆藏の迦葉あり。喚尚書、書應諾は、すなはち密語なりと參學することなかれ。

Since Yunjushan here is a “World-Honored One,” he possesses “secret words,” he has “Kāśyapa,” for whom “they are not concealed.” Do not study that his calling the minister and the minister responding are themselves “secret words.”

---

the account also occurs in “Shōbōgenzō gyōji” 正法眼藏行持 (DZZ.1:152), where it is said that, following his study with Dongshan, the gods were no longer able to see him — something of a familiar trope in Zen hagiography.

6 they are not got from another (hi jū nin toku 匪従人得): Perhaps reflecting the common expression, “the dharma seal of the buddhas is not got from another” (shobutsu hōin hi jū nin toku 諸佛法印匪従人得). The other three members of this list have no obvious sources.

[45:6]

大師ちなみに尚書にしめすにいはく、汝若不會世尊密語、汝若會迦葉不覆藏。いまの道取、かならず多劫の辨道功夫を立志すべし。なんちもし不會なるは世尊の密語なり、といふ、いまの茫然とあるを不會といふにあらず、不知を不會といふにあらず。なんちもし不會、といふ道理、しづかに參學すべき處分を聽許するなり。功夫辨道すべし。さらにまた、なんちもし會ならんは、と道取する、いますでに會なるとにはあらず。

At that time, the Great Master instructed the minister, saying, “If you don’t understand, it’s the secret words of the World-Honored One; if you do understand, it’s not concealed for Kāśyapa.” We should definitely resolve to pursue the way and work for many kalpas on this saying. In his saying, “If you don’t understand, it’s the secret words of the World-Honored One,” it is not that he is calling [the minister’s] present bewilderment “not understanding”; it is not that he is calling ignorance “not understanding.” The principle of “if you don’t understand” allows for a way of dealing with it that should be quietly studied; we should work on it and pursue the way. Furthermore, his saying, “if you understand,” does not mean, “now you’ve already understood.”

[45:7] {1:491}

There are many paths for studying the buddha dharma. Within them, there is a pivot of understanding the buddha dharma and not understanding the buddha dharma.<sup>7</sup> When we have not seen a true master, we do not know even that it exists; we mistakenly understand that there are secret words we meaninglessly associate with a visual sphere or an auditory sphere beyond seeing or hearing.<sup>8</sup> He is not saying that it is because of “if you understand” that “it’s not concealed for Kāśyapa”: there is also “not concealed” with not understanding. We should not study that what

7 Within them, there is a pivot of understanding the buddha dharma and not understanding the buddha dharma (sono naka ni, buppō o e shi, buppō o fue suru kanreisu ari そのなかに、佛法を會し、佛法を不會する關梔子あり): Probably meaning that the issue of understanding and not understanding is a pivotal point in any study of the buddha dharma. See Supplementary Notes, s.v., “Pivot.”

8 we mistakenly understand that there are secret words we meaninglessly associate with a visual sphere or an auditory sphere beyond seeing or hearing (itazura ni zetsu kenmon no gensho nisho ni ôsete, mitsugo ari, to ran’e seri いたづらに絶見聞の眼處・耳處におほせて、密語あり、と亂會せり): I.e., we wrongly think that there are secret words beyond what can be seen or heard by our eyes and ears.

is “not concealed” anyone should be able to see and hear. We should try to investigate precisely the time when this is already “not concealed,” when there is already nowhere in which it is “not concealed.”

しかあれば、みづからしらざらん境界を、密語と參學しきたるにあらず、佛法を不會する正當恁麼時、これ、一分の密語なり。これ、かならず世尊有なり、有世尊なり。

Therefore, it is not that we have been studying as “secret words” some realm that we ourselves do not know: the very moment when we do not understand the buddha dharma — this is “secret words” in one part.<sup>9</sup> This is certainly what “the World-Honored One has,” what has the World-Honored One.<sup>10</sup>

Nevertheless, those who have never heard the instructions of a true master, though they may be in the lion seat, have never seen this truth even in their dreams. They irrationally say,

“The World-Honored One has secret words” refers to his having held up a flower and blinked his eyes before the assembly of a million on Vulture Peak.<sup>11</sup> The reason is that the Buddha’s preaching with words is shallow and seems concerned with names and forms. Holding up

9 “secret words” in one part (ichibun no mitsu go 一分の密語): The exact sense is uncertain: often taken here to mean that the moment of not understanding is “wholly secret words;” could be read as “one part of secret words.”

10 This is certainly what “the World-Honored One has,” what has the World-Honored One (kore, kanarazu seson u nari, u seson nari これ、かならず世尊有なり、有世尊なり): Dōgen plays here with the phrase in the minister’s question to Yunju, “The World-Honored One has secret words.”

11 held up a flower and blinked his eyes before the assembly of a million on Vulture Peak (Ryōzen hyakuman shu zen ni nenge shunmoku seshi 靈山百萬衆前に拈華瞬目せし): Reference to (one version of) the famous story of the first transmission of Zen from Buddha Śākyamuni to Mahākāśyapa, recorded at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:258, case 253); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes.”

the flower and blinking the eyes, being preaching without words, is an occasion of propounding with secret words. The assembly of a million was unable to comprehend it; hence, for the assembly of a million, it was secret words. “For Kāśyapa, they are not concealed” refers to Kāśyapa’s breaking into a smile, as if he already knew that the World-Honored One would hold up a flower and blink the eyes; therefore, applied to Kāśyapa, it was not concealed. This is the true arcanum, handed down one to one.

Those that hear this and believe it to be true are like “rice, hemp, bamboo, and reeds” and form the monasteries throughout the Nine Provinces.<sup>12</sup> Pitiful. The abandoning of the way of the buddhas and ancestors arises from this source. A clear-eyed person should see through them one by one.

If we take the World-Honored One’s having words as shallow, his holding up a flower and blinking his eyes must also be shallow. If we take the World-Honored One’s having words as names and forms, we are not a person who studies the buddha dharma. Although we may know that having words is names and forms, we do not yet know that the World-Honored One has no names and forms; we have yet to slough off common sentiment. The buddhas and ancestors slough off all throughout body and mind; they preach the dharma; they preach with words; they turn the wheel of dharma. Many are those who have benefited from seeing and hearing this. Those who practice by faith and those who practice 12 are like “rice, hemp, bamboo, and reeds” and form the monasteries throughout the Nine Provinces (tō ma chiku i no gotoku, Kushū ni sōrin o naseri 稻麻竹葦のごとく、九州に叢林をなせり): “Rice, hemp, bamboo, and reeds” (tō ma chiku i 稻麻竹葦), occurring several times in the Shōbōgenzō, is a fixed expression for “profuse,” taken from the Lotus Sūtra; see Supplementary Notes. The “Nine Provinces” (Kushū 九州) is a term for China.

by dharma receive the teaching where there are buddhas and ancestors and share in the teaching where there are no buddhas and ancestors.<sup>13</sup>

How could the assembly of a million not have perceived his holding up the flower and blinking his eyes as holding up a flower and blinking his eyes? They should be of equal stature to Kāśyapa; they should be born together with the World-Honored One. The assembly of a million and the assembly of a million should study together, should bring forth the mind [of bodhi] at the same time; they are on the same way; they are of the same land. They see the Buddha and hear the dharma by the wisdom with knowledge; they see the Buddha and hear the dharma by the wisdom without knowledge. After first seeing one buddha, they proceed to see buddhas numerous as the sands of the Ganges. Each of the buddha convocations is an assembly of hundreds of myriads of koṭis. They must perceive that the exposition of holding up a flower and blinking the eyes of each of the buddhas is at the same time. Their eyes are not dark; their ears are sharp. They have eyes of the mind; they have eyes of the body. They have ears of the mind; they have ears of the body.

迦葉の破顔微笑、憍作麼生會、試道看。なんだちがいふがごとくなれば、これも密語といひぬべし。しかあれども、これを不覆藏といふ、至愚のかさなれるなり。

Kāśyapa's breaking into a smile, how do you understand it? Say something! If it were as you people say, this too should be called "secret words." But you call it "not concealed," which is extreme stupidity compounded.

Subsequently, the World-Honored One said, "I have a treasury of the true dharma eye, the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa; I bequeath it to Mahākāśyapa."

13 Those who practice by faith and those who practice by dharma (shingyō hōgyō no tomogara 信行・法行のともがら): A traditional distinction between two types of Buddhists: "those who advance by faith" (zuishingyō 隨信行; S. śraddhānusārin) and "those who advance by [study of] dharma" (zuihōgyō 隨法行; S. dharmānusārin).

[45:13] {1:493}

かくのごとくの道取、これ有言なりや、無言なりや。世尊もし有言をきらひ、拈華を愛せば、のちにも拈華すべし。迦葉、なんぞ會取せざらん、衆會、なんぞ聽取せざらん。かくのごとくともがらの説話、もちいるべからず。

A statement like this — is it with words or is it without words? If the World-Honored One disliked having words and loved holding up the flower, he should have held up the flower afterwards as well. How could Kāśyapa have failed to understand it? How could the assembly have failed to hear it? We should not use the talk of people like this.

[45:14]

おほよそ世尊に密語あり、密行あり、密證あり。しかあるを、愚人おもはく、密は他人のしらず、みづからはしり、しれる人あり、しらざる人ありと、西天東地、古往今來、おもひいふは、いまだ佛道の參學あらざるなり。もしかくのごとくいば、世間・出世間の學業なきもののうへには密はおほく、遍學のものは密はすくなかりぬべし。廣聞のともがらは密あるべからざるか。いはんや天眼・天耳、法眼・法耳、佛眼・佛耳等を具せんときは、すべて密語・密意あるべからず、といふべし。佛法の密語・密意・密行等は、この道理にあらず。人にあふ時節、まさに密語をきき、密語をとく。おのれをしるとき、密行をしるなり。いはんや佛祖よく上來の密意・密語を究辦す。しるべし、佛祖なる時節、まさに密語・密行、きほひ現成するなり。

In sum, the World-Honored One has secret words, has secret practice, has secret verification.<sup>14</sup> However, ignoramuses think the “secret” means others do not know but we ourselves know, that there are people who know and people who do not know; from Sindh in the West to the Land of the East, from ancient time to the present, those who think and say this have not studied the way of the buddhas. If they say this, for the ones without mundane or transmundane learning there would be many secrets, while those with extensive learning would have few secrets. Are those of wide experience supposed to be without secrets? Not to mention when one possesses the deva eye, the deva ear, the dharma eye, the dharma ear, the buddha eye, the buddha ear, and the like, they should say that one would have no secret words or secret intentions at all.<sup>15</sup> The secret

14 has secret words, has secret practice, has secret verification (mitsugo ari, mitsugyō ari, misshō ari 密語あり、密行あり、密證あり): The consistent rendering of mitsu 密 as “secret” misrepresents the semantic range of the term here; a more natural version might read “has secret words, has strict practice, has intimate verification”; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Practice and verification.”

15 the deva eye, the deva ear (tengen tenni 天眼・天耳): I.e., paranormal seeing and hearing, two of the five (or six) spiritual powers (jinzū 神通; S. abhijñā) of the advanced adept; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Spiritual powers.” The deva eye is the second of the “five eyes” (gogen 五眼) partially listed here: the physical eye (nikugen 肉眼), deva words, secret intentions, secret practice, and such, in the buddha dharma do not follow this logic. It is precisely when we meet a person that we hear secret words and speak secret words. When we know ourselves, we know secret practice. How much more do the buddhas and ancestors thoroughly examine the above “secret intentions” and “secret words.” We should realize that, precisely when one is a buddha and ancestor, secret words and secret practice vie to appear.

いはゆる密は、親密の道理なり。無間斷なり、蓋佛祖なり、蓋汝なり、蓋自なり、蓋行なり、蓋代なり、蓋功なり、蓋密なり。密語の、密人に相逢する、佛眼也觀不見なり。密行は自他の所知にあらず、密我ひとり能知す、密他おのおの不會す、密却在汝邊のゆえに、全靠密なり、一半靠密なり。

“Secret” means the principle of intimacy. It is without interruption. It covers the buddhas and ancestors; it covers you; it covers me; it covers practice; it covers the generations; it covers our effort; it covers the secret.<sup>16</sup> The meeting of the secret words with the secret person, even the buddha eye cannot see. Secret practice is not something known by self or other: the secret self alone knows it; the secret others are each “I don’t understand.” Because “the secret is rather with you,” it wholly relies on the secret, it half relies on the secret.<sup>17</sup> eye (tengen 天眼), wisdom eye (egen 慧眼) (that sees emptiness), dharma eye (hōgen 法眼) (of the advanced bodhisattva that clearly distinguishes all phenomena), and buddha eye (butsugen 佛眼) (of omniscience). Dōgen plays with the list here by adding “dharma ear” and “buddha ear.”

16 it covers the generations; it covers our effort (gai dai nari, gai kū nari 蓋代なり、蓋功なり): “Generations” (dai 代) may refer to the generations of buddhas and ancestors. The translation takes kū 功 here as kufū 功夫 (“concentrated effort”); it could also be understood as kudoku 功德 (“virtue”; “merit”).

17 Because “the secret is rather with you,” it wholly relies on the secret, it half relies on the secret (mitsu kyaku zai nyo hen no yue ni, zen kō mitsu nari, ippan kō mitsu nari 密却在汝邊のゆえに、全靠密なり、一半靠密なり): “The secret is rather with you” comes from the words of the Fifth Ancestor, when asked about “secret words and secret intentions” (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:232a12-14):

祖曰、我今與汝說者、即非密也。汝若返照自己面目、密却在汝邊。

The Ancestor said, “What I’m telling you here is not the secret. If you reflect on your own face, the secret is rather with you.”

The implied grammatical subject of the predicates “wholly relies” (zen kō 全靠) and “half relies” (ippan kō 一半靠) is unclear, and some read zen 全 and ippan 一半 as themselves the subjects — i.e., “the whole relies,” “one half relies.” The use here may reflect the words of Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (700-791) when asked by his teacher to explain himself (e.g., at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:240b17-18):

曰、和尚也須道取一半。莫全靠學人。

[Shitou] said, “The Reverend should say half; don’t rely wholly on your student.”

[45:16] {1:494}

かくのごとくの道理、あきらかに功夫參學すべし。おほよそ爲人の處所、辦肯の時節、かならず舉似密なる、それ佛佛祖祖の正嫡なり。而今是甚麼時節のゆえに、自己にも密なり、他己にも密なり、佛祖にも密なり、異類にも密なり。このゆえに、密頭上あらたに密なり。かくのごとくの教・行・證、すなはち佛祖なるがゆえに、透過佛祖密なり。しかあれば、透過密なり。

We should clearly make concentrated effort and study such truth. In general, that the places where people are taught and the times when the teaching is confirmed are invariably the secret presented — this is the correct succession of buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor.<sup>18</sup> Because it is “what time is this?” it is secret to self, it is secret to others, it is secret to the buddhas and ancestors, it is secret to other beings.<sup>19</sup> Therefore, there are further secrets on top of secrets. Because such teaching, practice, and verification are precisely the buddhas and ancestors, they are secrets that pass beyond the buddhas and ancestors. Hence, they pass beyond secrets.

The World-Honored One has secret words;

For Kāśyapa, they are not concealed.

Throughout the night, a rain of falling blossoms;

In the whole city, the streams are fragrant.

18 that the places where people are taught and the times when the teaching is confirmed are invariably the secret presented (inin no shosho, benkō no jisetsu, kanarazu kōji mitsu naru 爲人の處所、辦肯の時節、かならず舉似密なる): A phrase that could also be parsed, “in the places where people are taught and the times when the teaching is affirmed, that the presentation is secret.”

19 “what time is this?” (nikon ze jinmo jisetsu 而今是甚麼時節): Variation on the common Zen rhetorical question, “what place is this?” (shari ze jinmo sho zai 這裏是甚麼處在; i.e., “where are we here?”).

而今雪竇道の一夜落華雨、満城流水香、それ親密なり。これを舉似して、佛祖の眼睛・鼻孔を檢點すべし。臨濟・徳山のおよぶべきところにあらず。眼睛裏の鼻孔を參開すべし、耳處の鼻頭を尖聡ならしむるなり。いはんや耳鼻眼睛裏ふるきにあらず、あらたなるにあらざる渾身心ならしむ。これを華雨世界起の道理とす。

Xuedou's words here, "Throughout the night, a rain of falling blossoms; in the whole city, the streams are fragrant" — these are intimate.<sup>21</sup> Taking them up, we should examine the eye and the nose of the buddhas and ancestors. They are not a place Linji or Deshan could reach.<sup>22</sup> We should study and open the nose within our eye; we should sharpen the nose of the ear. Not to mention make our ear, nose, and eye our whole body, neither old nor new. This we take as the truth of "a flower rains, and the world arises."<sup>23</sup>

師翁道の満城流水香、それ藏身影彌露なり。かくのごとくあるがゆえに、佛祖家裏の家常には、世尊有密語、迦葉不覆藏を參究透過するなり。七佛・世尊、ほとけごとに、而今のごとく參學す。迦葉・釋迦、おなじく而今のごとく究辦しきたれり。

The words of my master's father, "In the whole city, the streams are fragrant" — this is the body concealed, its shadow more exposed.<sup>24</sup> Thus, in the daily fare within the house of the buddhas and ancestors, we investigate and pass beyond "the World-Honored One has secret words; for Kāśyapa, they are not concealed." The seven buddhas, the World-Honored ones, each of the buddhas, studies like this; Kāśyapa and Śākya, similarly have been thoroughly investigating like this.<sup>25</sup>

21 these are intimate (sore shinmitsu nari それ親密なり): The English "intimate" masks the play on the glyph mitsu 密 ("secret").

22 They are not a place Linji or Deshan could reach (Rinzai Tokusan no oyobu beki tokoro ni arazu 臨濟・徳山のおよぶべきところにあらず): i.e., Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866) and his contemporary Deshan Xuanjian 徳山宣鑑 (780-865); one of several dismissive remarks in the Shōbōgenzō on these two famous Chan masters.

23 "a flower rains and the world arises" (ke u sekai ki 華雨世界起): Playing on the final line of a dharma transmission verse attributed to Bodhidharma's master, Prajñātāra. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "A flower opens, and the world arises."

24 the body concealed, its shadow more exposed (zō shin yo mi ro 藏身影彌露): Variation on the idiom, "to conceal the body and expose the shadow" (zō shin ro yo 藏身露影): to speak with hidden meaning, to hint at something.

25 Kāśyapa and Śākya (Kashō Shaka 迦葉・釋迦): In the context here, perhaps better taken as Buddha Śākyamuni and the First Ancestor, Mahākāśyapa, rather than the more usual Śākyamuni and his predecessor, Buddha Kāśyapa.

The Insentient Preach the Dharma

無情說法

The Insentient Preach the Dharma

Mujō seppō

INTRODUCTION

This chapter was composed in the autumn of 1243, at Kippōji, the monastery in Echizen Province where Dōgen taught following his move from the capital in the summer of that year. It occurs as number 46 in both the seventy-five and sixty-chapter compilations of the Shōbōgenzō and as number 53 in the Honzan edition.

The title theme of the essay is best known in Zen literature from the teachings of the eighth-century figure Nanyang Huizhong 南陽慧忠, a disciple of the Sixth Ancestor and the subject of a number of famous koans. Dōgen offers here commentary on a conversation on the theme between Huizhong and an unidentified monk, as well as on a very similar conversation between the ninth-century master Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 and his teacher Yunyan Tansheng 雲巖曇晟.

It was not uncommon in Dōgen's day for Japanese Buddhists to imagine that the natural world, including inanimate objects, was somehow expressing Buddhist truths. Indeed, in his celebrated "Mountains and Waters Sūtra" ("Sansui kyō" 山水經) and other chapters of the Shōbōgenzō, Dōgen himself often seems to affirm such a view. Yet, in this essay, he warns us not to confuse the preaching of the dharma with "the rustling branches of the forests," and not to think that the insentient are simply the "grasses and trees, tiles and pebbles" of our natural world. Rather, as he emphasizes in his opening remarks, we should understand the insentient preaching the dharma as the fundamental activity of the buddhas and ancestors, the "realized kōan" (genjō kōan 見成公案) handed down in the lineage of Zen.

Preaching the dharma in preaching the dharma is the realized kōan that the buddhas and ancestors bequeath to the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>1</sup> This “preaching the dharma” is the dharma preaching. It is not sentient, not insentient; it is not constructed, not unconstructed; it is not the causes and conditions of the constructed or the unconstructed; it is not a dharma

1 Preaching the dharma in preaching the dharma (seppō o seppō suru 説法於説法する): A tentative translation of an odd locution, in mixed Chinese and Japanese syntax, that can be variously interpreted. This rendering treats the particle o 於 (Chinese yu) as a locative marker (Japanese ni okite), suggesting a sense “to preach the dharma where (or while) the dharma is being preached”; it could also be read as an accusative (Japanese o), which would yield “preaching the dharma of [i.e., regarding] the preaching of dharma.” Though probably less likely here, the particle could also be taken as a dative marker — paralleling its use in the immediately following clause — and the phrase parsed “preaching the dharma to preachers of the dharma.”

the realized kōan that the buddhas and ancestors bequeath to the buddhas and ancestors (busso fuzoku o busso no genjō kōan 佛祖附嘱於佛祖の見成公案): Or “the realized kōan of the buddhas and ancestors bequeathing to the buddhas and ancestors.” The expression “realized kōan” here translates genjō kōan 見成公案 (more often written 現成公案), one of Dōgen’s favorite expressions and the title of one of the most celebrated chapters of the Shōbōgenzō. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Realized kōan.”

arising from conditions.<sup>2</sup> Nevertheless, it is not following the path of the bird: it is for the buddha assembly.<sup>3</sup>

When the great way is complete, preaching the dharma is complete; when the treasury of the dharma is bequeathed, preaching the dharma is bequeathed.<sup>4</sup> When the flower is taken up, preaching the dharma is taken up; when the robe is transmitted, preaching the dharma is transmitted.<sup>5</sup>

2 It is not sentient, not insentient (ujō ni arazu, mujō ni arazu 有情にあらず、無情にあらず): The term “sentient,” or “sentient being,” typically refers to the “living,” or “animate,” beings (shujō 衆生; S. sattva) subject to rebirth in the five (or six) states of samsāra; in contrast to (a) inanimate objects, both vegetable and mineral (mujō 無情; “the insentient”), and (b) the “sages” (shō 聖), or transcendent buddhas and advanced bodhisattvas.

constructed (ui 有爲); unconstructed (mui 無爲): Taking these terms in the common Buddhist sense of samskṛta (“compounded,” “produced [by causes and conditions]” and asamskṛta (“uncompounded,” “unproduced”) respectively. They can also be (and often are here) taken in the sense, regularly found in Zen literature, of “intentional” and “unintentional” respectively.

the causes and conditions of the constructed or the unconstructed (ui mui no in-nen 有爲・無爲の因縁): A somewhat obscure phrase, probably meaning something like “subject to, or causally connected with, either the constructed or unconstructed.”

a dharma arising from conditions (jū engi no hō 從緣起の法): I.e., a teaching reflecting dependent origination; possibly alluding to a line in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:9b8-9):

諸佛兩足尊、知法常無性、佛種從緣起、是故說一乘。

The buddhas, most honored among the two-legged,

Knowing that the dharmas are always without nature,

And that the seeds of buddhahood sprout from conditions,

Therefore teach the one vehicle.

3 not following the path of the bird (chōdō ni fugyō 鳥道に不行): Likely meaning that preaching the dharma is not merely the free expression of liberation that leaves no traces. (See, e.g., Shōbōgenzō keiteki 正法眼藏啓迪 3:510.) “The path of the bird” (chōdō 鳥道) is a well-known expression of the Tang-dynasty master Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869), often invoked by Dōgen; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dongshan’s three roads.”

for the buddha assembly (busshu ni iyo su 佛衆に爲與す): The predicate iyo su 爲與す does not occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; it is taken here as “to provide for the sake of.” The term busshu 佛衆, while regularly used in reference to an assembly of buddhas, here more likely indicates the followers of the buddhas.

4 treasury of the dharma (hōzō 法藏): Typically, denoting the Buddhist scriptures, especially the sūtras; here, perhaps, more broadly, the Buddhist teachings.

5 When the flower is taken up (nenge no toki 拈華のとき); when the robe is transmitted (den’e no toki 傳衣のとき): Allusion to the transmission of Zen. The former phrase recalls the famous legend of Buddha Śākyamuni’s holding up a flower to transmit “the treasury of the true dharma eye” to the First Ancestor, Mahākāśyapa; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Hold up a flower.” The latter phrase may invoke the tradition that Śākyamuni also gave his robe to Mahākāśyapa; but it is more often treated as an allusion

Therefore, the buddhas and ancestors, from before King Majestic Voice, have all been paying their respects to preaching the dharma; from before the buddhas, they have all been originally practicing preaching the dharma.<sup>6</sup>

Do not study this only as meaning that preaching the dharma has been governed by the buddhas and ancestors: the buddhas and ancestors have been governed by preaching the dharma. This preaching the dharma does not only expound merely the aggregate of eighty-four thousand dharmas; there is a preaching of the aggregate of incalculable, limitless dharmas.<sup>7</sup> Do not study this to mean that later buddhas preach the dharma of the dharma preaching of prior buddhas: just as prior buddhas have not come to be later buddhas, so with preaching the dharma, the prior dharma preaching is not made the later dharma preaching.

Therefore, to the legend that the Fifth Ancestor in China, Hongren 弘忍, bequeathed the robe of Bodhidharma to Huineng 慧能 as a symbol of the latter's status as Sixth Ancestor.

6 before King Majestic Voice (Ion'ō izen 威音王以前): A common expression, occurring often in Dōgen's writing and other Zen texts, used to suggest the primordial past or a state prior to any differentiation; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Before King Majestic Voice."

originally practicing (hongyō 本行): Likely reflecting a passage in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:42c22-23) cited in several places in the Shōbōgenzō:

諸善男子、我本行菩薩道所成壽命、今猶未盡、復倍上數。

Good sons, the lifespan attained by my original practice of the bodhisattva path is even now still not exhausted; it is twice the above number.

7 aggregate of eighty-four thousand dharmas (hachiman shisen mon no hōun 八萬四千門の法蘊): A standard expression for the enormous number of teachings by the Buddha; the "aggregate of dharmas" (S. dharma-skandha) is virtually synonymous with the "treasury of the dharma" (hōzō 法藏) mentioned above.

8 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): Quoting a passage from the "Upāya-kausālya" chapter of the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:10a22-23).

[46:3]

しかあればすなはち、諸佛の、説法を使用するがごとく、諸佛は、説法を使用するなり。諸佛の、説法を正傳するがごとく、諸佛は、説法を正傳するによりて、古佛より七佛に正傳し、七佛よりいまに正傳して、無情説法あり。この無情説法に、諸佛あり、諸祖あるなり。我今説法は、正傳にあらざる新條、と學することなかれ。古來、正傳は舊窠の鬼窟、と證することなかれ。

Thus, just as the buddhas employ preaching the dharma, so the buddhas employ preaching the dharma. Just as the buddhas directly transmit preaching the dharma, so the buddhas directly transmit preaching the dharma; and thus there is the insentient preaching the dharma, directly transmitted from the old buddhas to the seven buddhas, directly transmitted from the seven buddhas to the present.<sup>9</sup> In this “insentient preaching the dharma,” there are the buddhas, there are the ancestors. Do not study that “I now preach the dharma” means new items not directly transmitted; do not attest that what is directly transmitted from ancient times is a ghost cave of old dens.<sup>10</sup>

大唐國西京光宅寺大證國師、因僧問、無情還解說法否。國師云、常說熾然、說無間歇。僧曰、某甲爲甚麼不聞。國師曰、汝自不聞、不可妨他聞者也。僧曰、未審、什麼人得聞。國師曰、諸聖得聞。僧曰、和尚還聞否。國師曰、我不聞。僧曰、和尚既不聞、爭知無情解說法。國師曰、賴我不聞、我若聞則齊於諸聖、汝即不聞我說法。僧曰、恁麼則衆生無分也。國師曰、我爲衆生說、不爲諸聖說。僧曰、衆生聞後如何。國師曰、即非衆生。

9 from the old buddhas to the seven buddhas (kobutsu yori shichi butsu ni 古佛より七佛に): Or “from the old buddha to the seven buddhas.” “The seven buddhas” refers to what are often called “the seven buddhas of the past” (kako shichi butsu 過去七佛): i.e., Śākyamuni and the six buddhas (the names of which vary according to the source) said to have preceded him; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas.” The term “old buddha” (kobutsu 古佛) is used in Zen texts to refer both to these seven buddhas and as an honorific for certain esteemed Zen masters; here, it no doubt indicates the buddhas of prior kalpas, such as Buddha Bhīṣmagarjitasvararāja mentioned above. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Old buddha.”

10 “I now preach the dharma” (ga kon seppō 我今説法): Dōgen is here borrowing the words of Śākyamuni quoted just above.

ghost cave of old dens (kyūka no kikutsu 舊窠の鬼窟): A mixing of two common metaphors. “Old den” (or “nest,” or “burrow”; kyūka 舊窠) is regularly used in Zen literature for old or habitual ways of thinking, “tired” concepts or clichés. “Ghost (or ‘phantom’) cave” (kikutsu 鬼窟) is used in reference to the dark confines of intellectual nihilism or contemplative oblivion; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Ghost cave.” Here, presumably, mere dogma.

National Teacher Dazheng of the Guangzhai Monastery in the Western Capital of the Land of the Great Tang was once asked by a monk, “Can the insentient preach the dharma?”<sup>11</sup>

The National Teacher said, “They’re constantly preaching with ardor; they preach without pause.”

The monk said, “Why can’t I hear it?”

The National Teacher said, “That you can’t hear it doesn’t prevent others from hearing it.”

The monk said, “I don’t understand. Who can hear it?”

The National Teacher said, “The sages can hear it.”<sup>12</sup>

The monk said, “Can the Reverend hear it?”

The National Teacher said, “I can’t hear it.”

The monk said, “If the Reverend can’t hear it, how does he know that the insentient preach the dharma?”

The National Teacher said, “Fortunately, I don’t hear it. If I heard it, I would equal the sages, and you wouldn’t hear me preaching the dharma.”

The monk said, “In this case, living beings have no part in this.”<sup>13</sup>

The National Teacher said, “I preach for living beings; I don’t preach for sages.”

The monk said, “After the living beings hear it, how are they?”

The National Teacher said, “They’re not living beings.”

11 National Teacher Dazheng of the Guangzhai Monastery in the Western Capital of the Land of the Great Tang (Daitō koku Saikyō Kōtakuji Daishō kokushi 大唐國西京光宅寺大證國師): I.e., Nanyang Huizhong 南陽慧忠 (d. 775), disciple of the Sixth Ancestor and the subject of a number of famous kōans. “The Western Capital” (Saikyō 西京) refers to Chang’an, site of the Guangzhaisi 光宅寺 where Huizhong resided. The exact source of Dōgen’s version of Huizhong’s conversation on the insentient preaching the dharma has not been identified; a similar passage occurs in a longer discussion on the topic at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:438a9-25).

12 “sages” (shoshō 諸聖): I.e., advanced spiritual adepts. In technical Buddhist usage, the “nobles” (S. ārya), or those well established on the “noble path” (shōdō 聖道; S. ārya-mārga), as opposed to the “commoners” (bonbu 凡夫; S. prthagjana), or ordinary folk.

13 “living beings have no part in this” (shujō mubun 衆生無分): I.e., living beings are not in a position to hear the preaching. The term “living beings” (shujō 衆生; S. sattva) is synonymous with “the sentient” (ujō 有情); here, used in contrast to “the sages.”

[46:5] {2:4}

無情説法を參學せん初心・晩學、この國師の因縁を直須勤學すべし。

Beginners and latecomers who would study “the insentient preach the dharma” should study with diligence this episode of the National Teacher.

[46:6]

常説熾然、説無間歇とあり。常は、諸時の一分時なり。説無間歇は、説すでに現出するがごときは、さだめて無間歇なり。無情説法の儀、かならずしも有情のごとくにあらんずる、と參學すべからず、有情の音聲、および有情説法の儀のごとくなるべきがゆえに。

“They’re constantly preaching with ardor; they preach without pause.” “Constantly” is one time among all times.<sup>14</sup> “They preach without pause”: preaching that is certainly appearing is definitely “without pause.” We should not study that the manner in which the insentient preach the dharma must necessarily be like that of the sentient because it ought to be like the voices of the sentient and the manner in which the sentient preach the dharma.<sup>15</sup>

[46:7]

有情界の音聲をうばふて、無情界の音聲に擬するは、佛道にあらず。無情説法、かならずしも聲塵なるべからず、たとへば、有情の説法、それ聲塵にあらざるがごとくなり。しばらく、いかなるか有情、いかなるか無情、と問自問他、功夫參學すべし。

To snatch away the voices of the sentient realm and liken them to the voices of the insentient realm is not the way of the buddhas. The insentient preaching the dharma is not necessarily sound, just as preaching the dharma by the sentient is not sound. We should make concentrated effort and study this a while, asking ourselves, asking others, what is “the sentient,” “what is the insentient”?

14 one time among all times (shoji no ichibunji 諸時の一分時): A tentative translation of an ambiguous phrase, which might be understood “each moment of all times,” suggesting perhaps that each time somehow incorporates or expresses all times.

15 because it ought to be like the voices of the sentient and the manner in which the sentient preach the dharma (ujō no onjō, oyobi ujō seppō no gi no gotoku naru beki ga yue ni 有情の音聲、および有情説法の儀のごとくなるべきがゆえに): The translation here follows Kawamura’s punctuation of this phrase, which takes it as modifying the preceding clause. The passage could be, and in some other editions is, parsed such that the phrase modifies the following sentence (in the section below) — a reading that would yield, “[Thinking that] because it ought to be like the voices of the sentient and the manner in which the sentient preach the dharma, to snatch away the voices of the sentient realm and liken them to the voices of the insentient realm is not the way of the buddhas.”

[46:8]

Thus, we should carefully take heed and study in what manner it is that the insentient preach the dharma. One who considers, as the foolish think, that the rustling branches of the forests, the opening and falling of leaves and flowers, are the insentient preaching the dharma — this is not a person who studies the buddha dharma. If this were the case, who could not know the preaching of the insentient, who could not hear the preaching of the insentient? We should reflect a while.<sup>16</sup> In the realm of the insentient, are there grasses, trees, and forests? Is the realm of the insentient mixed into the realm of the sentient? Still, those who consider grasses and trees, tiles and pebbles as the insentient have not studied extensively; those who consider the insentient as grasses and trees, tiles and pebbles have not studied their fill.

Even if, for now, we were to accept the plants seen by humans and treat them as the insentient, grasses and trees are also not what is fathomed by common thinking. Why? There is a vast difference between the forests of the heavens and those among humans; what grows in central countries and marginal lands is not the same; the grasses and trees in the ocean and in the mountains are all dissimilar.<sup>17</sup> Not to mention that there are forests growing in the sky, forests growing in the clouds. Of the hundred grasses and myriad trees that grow in wind, fire, and the rest, there are in general

16 We should reflect (ekō su beshi 廻光すべし): An unusual usage not appearing elsewhere in Dōgen's writing. The term ekō typically occurs in the fixed phrase ekō henshō 回光返照, "turn the light around and shine it back [on oneself]"; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Turn the light around and shine it back."

17 central countries and marginal lands (chūgoku henchi 中國・邊地): Likely referring to places at the center and borders respectively of our continent of Jambudvīpa. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Four Continents."

those that should be studied as sentient, those that are not recognized as insentient.<sup>18</sup> There are grasses and trees that are like humans and beasts; whether they are sentient or insentient is not clear.<sup>19</sup> Not to mention the trees and rocks, flowers and fruits, hot and cold waters of the transcendents — though when we see them we have no doubts, when we would explain them, is it not difficult?<sup>20</sup> Seeing merely the grasses and trees of the one Land of Shenzhou, being familiar with the grasses and trees of the one region of Nihon, do not consider or deliberate that the myriad quarters and all the worlds must be like them.<sup>21</sup>

國師道、諸聖得聞。いはく、無情説法の會下には、諸聖立地聽するなり。諸聖と無情と、聞を現成し、説を現成せしむ。無情、すでに諸聖のために説法す、聖なりや、凡なりや。あるひは、無情説法の儀をあきらめをはりなば、諸聖の所聞かくのごとくあり、と體達すべし。すでに體達することをえては、聖者の境界をはかりしるべし。さらに、超凡越聖の通霄路の行履を參學すべし。

“The National Teacher said, ‘The sages can hear it.’” This says that, in the community where the insentient preach the dharma, the sages stand and listen.<sup>22</sup> The sages and the insentient manifest hearing, manifest

18 wind, fire, and the rest (fû ka tō 風火等): Likely here an abbreviation for the four elements of Buddhist cosmology: earth, water, fire, and wind; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four elements and five aggregates.”

19 whether they are sentient or insentient is not clear (ujō mujō imada akiramezaru nari 有情・無情いまだあきらめざるなり): The translation follows Kawamura’s punctuation here, treating this as a dependent clause modifying the preceding “plants”; it could also be read as a separate sentence: “The [categories of] sentient and insentient are not clear.”

20 the transcendents (senke 仙家): Likely a reference to the hermit sages (sennin 仙人) of Daoist lore, known for their thaumaturgic powers, in whose mountain haunts one can expect uncanny occurrences.

when we would explain them, is it not difficult? (setchaku sen ni, katakaran ya 説著せんに、かたからんや): The translation here follows those editions that read katakazaran ya かたからざらんや.

21 the one Land of Shenzhou (Shinshū ikkoku 神州一國): I.e., the country of China. The term shinshū 神州 (literally “divine region”) is sometimes thought to reflect shendan 神丹, a transliteration of Cīnasthāna, a Sanskrit name for China. The term is also used in Japanese in reference to Japan, where it is understood as “the region of the kami.”

the myriad quarters and all the worlds (manpō jinkai 萬方・盡界): The translation follows Kawamura’s punctuation; the phrase might also be read, “all the worlds in the myriad quarters.”

22 the sages stand and listen (shoshō ritchi chō 諸聖立地聽): I.e., attend respectfully to the preaching, as at the formal dharma talk of a Zen master. This expression seems to be a variant of the more common “the buddhas of the three times stand and listen” (sanze shobutsu ritchi chō 三世諸佛立地聽), best known from the words of Xuansha preaching. Since the insentient preach the dharma for the sages, are they sages or are they commoners? Again, if we have finished clarifying the manner in which the insentient preach the dharma, we should personally realize that what the sages hear exists like this.<sup>23</sup> Having gained personal realization, we should gauge the realm of the sages.<sup>24</sup> Further, we should study the conduct on the road through the clouds that transcends the commoner and surpasses the sage.<sup>25</sup>

國師いはく、我不聞。この道も、容易會なり、と擬することなかれ。超凡越聖にして不聞なりや、擘破凡聖窠窟のゆえに不聞なりや。恁麼功夫して、道取を現成せしむべし。

“The National Teacher said, ‘I don’t hear it.’” Do not consider that these words are easy to understand. Does he “not hear it” having transcended the commoner and surpassed the sage? Or does he not hear it because he breaks down the dens and caves of “commoner and sage”? Working at it in this way, we should actualize his words.

---

Shibei 玄沙師備 (835-908) that Dōgen discusses in his “Shōbōgenzō gyōbutsu iigi” 正法眼藏行佛威儀。

23 personally realize (taitatsu 體達): There are two lines of interpretation of the term tai 體 in this compound expression found throughout Buddhist literature and Dōgen’s writings: (a) “bodily,” “physically”; “personally” (as taken here); or (b) “substance,” or “essence” (which would yield here something like “realize, or penetrate, to the essence”).

what the sages hear exists like this (shoshō no shomon kakunogotoku ari 諸聖の所聞かくのごとくあり): The pronoun “this” here lacks any obvious antecedent. Could be taken to mean “what the hearing of the sages is like,” but the sense may be simply that the sages do in fact hear the preaching of the insentient.

24 should gauge the realm of the sages (shōja no kyōkai o hakarishiru beshi 聖者の境界をはかりしるべし): I.e., “should (or will) determine the experience of the sage.” While the term kyōkai 境界 is often used in a general sense for “realm,” or “sphere,” given our context, it may carry here its more technical Buddhist usage as “sensory field” or “object of cognition.” The suffix beshi here may be taken either as conjecture (“will likely,” “may be expected to”) or as imperative (“ought to”).

25 road through the clouds (tsūshōro 通霄路): A tentative translation for a fixed expression, found in Song-dynasty Chan texts, indicating a “higher” way, beyond the standard understandings of Buddhist practice. The term shō 霄, translated here as “clouds,” can also refer to, and is probably most often interpreted here as, the “heavens,” or “firmament,” as well as the “night.” The term occurs elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō only in “Dōtoku” 道得 (DZZ.1:376), probably in the sense “celestial passage.”

transcends the commoner and surpasses the sage (chōbon osshō 超凡越聖): I.e., to go beyond the stages of the Buddhist spiritual path; a common expression in Zen literature.

“The National Teacher said, ‘Fortunately, I don’t hear it. If I heard it, I would equal the sages.’” This presentation is not one word or two words.<sup>26</sup> “Fortunately I” is not commoner or sage; should “fortunately I” be a buddha and ancestor?<sup>27</sup> Because the buddhas and ancestors transcend the commoner and surpass the sage, [what they hear] should not be equal to what the sages hear.

Dealing with the reasoning of the National Teacher’s words, “you wouldn’t hear me preaching the dharma,” we should manage the bodhi of the buddhas and the sages.<sup>28</sup> Its essential point is that, when the insentient preach the dharma, the sages can hear it; when the National Teacher preaches the dharma, this monk can hear it. On this reasoning, we should take long days and months of study and concentrated effort.<sup>29</sup> For now, we should question the National Teacher: “I’m not asking about ‘after 26 This presentation (kono koji この擧示): The term koji (also written 擧似), “to take up and present [a topic],” is used in reference especially to a comment on a Zen case. Though here likely a reference to the National Teacher’s words, it could also be read in reference to Dōgen’s comment: i.e., “the comment on this [saying].”

not one word or two words (ichidō ryōdō ni arazu 一道兩道にあらず): Perhaps meaning “not simply a few [ordinary] words.”

27 “Fortunately I” (raiga 頼我): Dōgen has here created a neologism from the first two words of the National Teacher’s remark; presumably to be understood as “the fortunate person [who does not hear].”

28 Dealing with the reasoning . . . we should manage (ridō o shuri shite 理道を修理して. . . ryōri su beki nari 料理すべきなり): A tentative translation of a passage likely meaning something like, “We should master the meaning [of the National Teacher’s words] and handle [the bodhi of the buddhas and sages].” The translation fails to capture the play with the graph ri 理 (“reason”) in this sentence. The terms ridō 理道 and shuri 修理 are not common in Dōgen’s writing: the former might be parsed here as “reasoned words”; the latter, normally “to repair,” “to put in order,” may have the sense here of “to train,” “to practice.” The term ryōri 料理 appears elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō (“Jippō” 十方, DZZ.2:97) in the sense “to have control over, or mastery of [a topic]”; it could also be rendered “to reckon,” “to estimate,” or “to consider.”

29 long days and months (nisshin gekkyū 日深月久): Literally, “a depth of days and length of months,” a fixed expression for the extended passage of time; not common in Buddhist texts nor occurring elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings.

高祖洞山悟本大師、參曩祖雲巖大和尚、問云、無情說法什麼人得聞。雲巖曩祖曰、無情說法、無情得聞。高祖曰、和尚聞否。曩祖曰、我若聞、汝即不得聞吾說法也。高祖曰、若恁麼即某甲不聞和尚說法也。曩祖曰、我說汝尚不聞、何況無情說法也。高祖乃述偈呈曩祖。曰、也太奇、也太奇、無情說法不思議、若將耳聽終難會、眼處聞聲方得知。

The Eminent Ancestor, Great Master Wuben of Dongshan, when studying with the Ancient Ancestor, Most Reverend Yunyan, asked him, “When the insentient preach the dharma, who can hear it?”<sup>30</sup>

Yunyen, the Ancient Ancestor, said, “When the insentient preach the dharma, the insentient can hear it.”

The Eminent Ancestor said, “Does the Reverend hear it?”

The Ancient Ancestor said, “If I heard it, you couldn’t hear my preaching the dharma.”

The Eminent Ancestor said, “In that case, I don’t hear the Reverend preaching the dharma.”

The Ancient Ancestor said, “Even when I preach, you still don’t hear. How much less when the insentient preach the dharma.”

The Eminent Ancestor then expressed a gāthā presented to the Ancient Ancestor:

How strange! How strange!

The insentient preaching the dharma is inconceivable.

If we use the ear to hear it, it’s hard in the end to understand;

Only when the eye hears the voices do we know it.<sup>31</sup>

30 The Eminent Ancestor, Great Master Wuben of Dongshan (kōso Tōzan Gohon daishi 高祖洞山悟本大師): “Great Master Wuben” (Gohon daishi 悟本大師) is the posthumous title conferred on Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价; “Eminent Ancestor” (kōso 高祖) is an honorific recognizing Dongshan as founder of the Caodong (Sōtō) lineage. “Ancient Ancestor, Most Reverend Yunyan” (nōso Ungan daioshō 曩祖雲巖大和尚) refers to Dongshan’s master, Yunyan Tansheng 雲巖曇晟 (782-841), disciple of Yaoshan Weiyan 藥山惟儼 (751-834). Their conversation also appears in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:204, case 148), as well as in his Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.4:40, 4:316). While generally following the version of this episode found in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:321b27-c11), Dōgen’s rendition of Dongshan’s verse diverges in favor of a slightly expanded treatment of the story seen in Dahui’s 大慧 Zhengfayanzang 正法眼藏 (ZZ.118:76b17-a6).

31 the eye (gensho 眼處): The “eye,” of course, can serve as a metaphor for wisdom; but, here, no doubt, for the sake of the seven-glyph line, Dongshan uses the Buddhist

The meaning of these words of the Eminent Master, “When the insentient preach the dharma, who can hear it?” we should examine in detail through an entire life and many lives of concentrated effort. This question he asks should additionally be endowed with the virtue of a statement.<sup>32</sup> This statement has the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow; it is not only transmitting the mind by the mind. “Transmitting the mind by the mind” is something confirmed by the beginner and latecomer.<sup>33</sup> There is a pivotal point directly transmitted by taking up the robe, directly transmitted by holding up the dharma.<sup>34</sup> How could people today fulfill it in three or four autumns of work.<sup>35</sup> The Eminent Ancestor, though he had previously heard the essential point of Dazheng’s words, “when the insentient preach the dharma, the sages can hear it,” goes on here to have the question, “when the insentient preach the dharma, who can hear it?” Do we take this as affirming Dazheng’s words, or take it as not affirming Dazheng’s words? Do we take it as a question, or take it as a statement?

technical term for the visual sense sphere (S. caḥṣurāyatana), defined as the eye organ and its object. Dōgen will play with the element sho 處 (“place”; i.e., “sense sphere”) in his comments below. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye.”

32 should additionally be endowed with the virtue of a statement (sara ni dōchaku no kudoku o gu su beshi さらに道著の功德を具すべし): I.e., the interrogative, “who can hear it?” (jūmo nin toku mon 什麼人得聞) could be taken in a declarative sense: “‘Who’ can hear it”; a play on the interrogative not uncommon in Dōgen’s writings.

33 something confirmed by the beginner and latecomer (shoshin bangaku no ben-kō 初心晩學の辦肯): I.e., the lesser understanding of those not yet mature in Buddhist training; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Beginner’s mind.”

34 taking up the robe (e o koshite 衣を擧して); holding up the dharma (hō o nenjite 法を拈じて): Here likely reflecting Bodhidharma’s “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow” mentioned just above and alluding to Bodhidharma’s saying to his successor, Huike, that he was bestowing on him the true dharma and his kāṣāya.

35 three or four autumns (sanshū shigetsu 三秋四月): Literally, “three autumns, four moons”; likely a variation on sanshi shūgetsu 三四秋月 (“three or four autumn moons”). Some would take shū 秋 here as “month” and read this as “three or four months.” The expression seems not to be a common one and does not occur elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings.

If he is not affirming Dazheng at all, how could he talk this way? If he is completely affirming Dazheng, how could he talk this way?

曩祖雲巖曰、無情説法、無情得聞。この血脈を正傳して、身心脱落の參學あるべし。いはゆる無情説法、無情得聞は、諸佛説法、諸佛得聞の性相なるべし。無情説法を聴取せん衆會、たとひ有情・無情なりとも、たとひ凡夫・賢聖なりとも、これ無情なるべし。この性相によりて、古今の眞偽を批判すべきなり。たとひ西天より將來すとも、正傳まことの祖師にあらざらんは、もちいるべからず。たとひ千萬年より習學すること聯綿なりとも、嫡嫡相承にあらずば、嗣續しがたし。いま、正傳すでに東土に通達せり、眞偽の通塞、わきまへやすからん。たとひ衆生説法、衆生得聞の道取を聴取しても、諸佛諸祖の骨髓を稟受しつべし。雲巖曩祖の道を聞取し、大證國師の道を聴取して、まさに與奪せば、諸聖得聞の道取する諸聖は、無情なるべし、無情得聞と道取する無情は、諸聖なるべし。無情所説無情なり、無情説法即無情なるがゆえに。しかあればすなはち、無情説法なり、説法無情なり。

The Ancient Ancestor Yunyan said, “When the insentient preach the dharma, the insentient can hear it.” There should be a study of body and mind sloughed off that directly transmits this vital artery.<sup>36</sup> This “when the insentient preach the dharma, the insentient can hear it” must be the nature and marks of “when the buddhas preach the dharma, the buddhas can hear it.”<sup>37</sup> The community that would listen to the insentient preaching the dharma — whether they be sentient or insentient, whether they be common people or worthies and sages — must be insentient. On the basis of this nature and marks, we should judge the genuine and spurious in past and present.

Even if brought from Sindh in the West, if it is not by a true ancestral master of authentic transmission, it is of no use. Even for one whose training has been continuous for a thousand myriad years, if it is not what is inherited by successor after successor, it is difficult to succeed to it. Now, the authentic transmission has penetrated to the Land of the East, and it ought to be easy to distinguish the passage and blockage 36 a study of body and mind sloughed off that directly transmits this vital artery (kono kechimiyaku o shōden shite, shinjin datsuraku no sangaku この血脈を正傳して、身心脱落の參學): Probably meaning something like, “a study that is liberated (or liberates us) through inheritance of this teaching.” The term meimiyaku 命脈 (“vital artery”) occurs often in the Shōbōgenzō, in the senses both of the “lifeblood” and the “bloodline” (especially of the lineage of the buddhas and ancestors). “Body and mind sloughed off” (shinjin datsuraku 身心脱落) is one of Dōgen’s favorite expressions for spiritual liberation; see Supplementary Notes.

37 must be the nature and marks of (no shōsō naru beshi の性相なるべし): I.e., “must be the same as”; “nature and marks” (shōsō 性相) is a standard expression in Buddhist writing for the essence (S. svabhāva) of a thing, and its defining characteristics, or attributes (S. lakṣaṇa).

of the genuine and spurious. Even listening to the words, “when living beings preach the dharma, living beings can hear it,” we should surely accept them as the bones and marrow of the buddhas and the ancestors. In hearing the words of the Ancient Ancestor Yunyan, in listening to the words of the National Teacher Dazheng, when we truly appraise them, the sages referred to in “the sages can hear it” must be insentient; and the insentient referred to in “the insentient can hear it” must be sages. What is preached by the insentient is insentient; for the insentient preaching the dharma is itself insentient. Therefore, it is the insentient preach the dharma, and preaching the dharma is the insentient.

The Eminent Ancestor said, “In that case, I don’t hear the Reverend preaching the dharma.” The “in that case” we hear here is taking up the essential point of “when the insentient preach the dharma, the insentient can hear it”: based on the principle that, “when the insentient preach the dharma, the insentient can hear it,” it is, “I don’t hear the Reverend preaching the dharma.”<sup>38</sup> At this point, the Eminent Ancestor is not merely taking a rear seat for the insentient preaching the dharma; his aspiration to preach the dharma for the insentient manifests itself and assaults the heavens.<sup>39</sup> He does not simply personally realize “the insentient preach the dharma”; he has personally investigated the hearing and the not hearing of the insentient preaching the dharma. He has gone on personally to realize the preaching and not preaching, the past preaching, present preaching, and future preaching of the sentient preaching the dharma. And he has further completed clarification of the principle that the heard and unheard preaching of the dharma is sentient and is insentient.

38 The “in that case” we hear here (ima kiku tokoro no nyaku inmo いまきくところの若恁麼): Note that Dōgen’s interpretation of Dongshan’s “in that case” ignores the more obvious antecedent of Yunyan’s immediately preceding statement, “If I heard it, you could not hear my preaching the dharma.”

39 rear seat (sekimatsu 席末): I.e., a back seat in the assembly [listening to the insentient preach].

assaults the heavens (shōten 衝天): A fixed phrase for vaulting ambition or high aspiration; occurs several times in Dōgen’s writings.

In general, hearing the dharma is not merely the object of the ear organ and ear consciousness: from before your father and mother were born, from before Majestic Voice, to the limit of the future, to a limitless future, we hear the dharma with our entire strength, entire mind, entire body, entire way; there is hearing the dharma before the body and after the mind.<sup>40</sup> All of these ways of hearing the dharma have their benefits. Do not say that there is no benefit in hearing the dharma when it does not register in consciousness.<sup>41</sup> Those with mind extinguished and body extinct should benefit from hearing the dharma; those with no mind and no body should benefit from hearing the dharma.<sup>42</sup> The buddhas and 40 before your father and mother were born (bumo mishō izen 父母未生已前): Also read fubo mishō izen. Also sometimes interpreted “before your father and mother gave birth.” A famous expression in Zen literature suggesting what one is before one’s identity as a person, what one really is before one can be identified; often associated with “one’s original face” (honrai menmoku 本來面目). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before your father and mother were born.”

to the limit of the future, to a limitless future (naishi jin miraisai, mujin miraisai 乃至盡未來際、無盡未來際): “Limit of the future” is a common Buddhist term for the extreme limit of time, to which Dōgen here adds his own variant.

entire strength, entire mind, entire body, entire way (koriki koshin kotai kodō 舉力・舉心・舉體・舉道): Following the usual reading of ko 舉 (“to raise”) here as “all,” “whole,” etc.; but the passage could be read, “taking up our strength, taking up our minds, taking up our bodies, taking up the way (or the words).”

before the body and after the mind (shin sen shin go 身先心後): An unusual expression, not occurring elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, suggesting “beyond body and mind” (or “before and after this body and mind”); variation on “before the body, after the body” (shin sen shin go 身先身後) — i.e., what precedes and follows a given lifetime.

41 when it does not register in consciousness (shinshiki ni en zezareba 心識に縁ぜざれば): Literally, “when it does not serve as the object of a mental consciousness.”

42 mind extinguished and body extinct (shin metsu shin motsu 心滅身没); no mind and no body (mushin mushin 無心無身): Two unusual expressions, not occurring elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō. While they may of course be read simply as states of unconsciousness, they may also suggest advanced spiritual states in which body and mind ancestors always become buddhas and become ancestors by passing through such times.<sup>43</sup> The power of the dharma to touch the body and mind — how could common thinking fully perceive it? The limits of the body and mind cannot be fully clarified. The merit of hearing the dharma plants a seed in the field of body and mind that will never decay; eventually it will sprout and grow, and with time, will inevitably bear fruit.

The foolish think that, even if we do not neglect to hear the dharma, without advancement on the road of understanding and no claim to a good memory, there will be no benefit in it.<sup>44</sup> Taking up the body and mind of humans and devas, to be one of extensive memory and much learning — this is the most essential. To forget on the spot and be at a loss once we depart — what benefit, they think, is there in that? What merit of learning, they say, is there in that? This is because they have not met a true master, because they have not seen that person.<sup>45</sup> One who lacks face-to-face conferral of the direct transmission is said not to be a true master. One who has received the direct transmission of buddha after buddha is a true master. When, as the foolish say, it is remembered in consciousness and not forgotten for a while, this is the time when the merit of hearing the dharma slightly covers the mind and covers the consciousness. At this very time, there is the merit that covers the body, covers before the body, covers the mind, covers before the mind, covers after the mind; covers cause, conditions, recompense, deed, attribute, nature, substance, and power; covers the buddhas, and covers the ancestors, covers the self and the other, covers the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.<sup>46</sup> A virtue appears that covers words and speech, covers sitting and reclining, everywhere throughout the heavens.<sup>47</sup>

Although truly merit such as this in hearing the dharma is not easily known, when we join the great assembly of the buddhas and ancestors and investigate the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow, there is no time when the efficacy of preaching of the dharma does not lead us; there is no place in which we are not blessed by the dharma power of hearing the dharma. In this way, making the times and kalpas sudden or gradual, we see the realization of the results.<sup>48</sup> It is not that we should necessarily cast aside much learning and extensive memory; but we are not to take that one corner alone as the essential function. Students should know this. The Eminent Ancestor has personally realized this.

The Eminent Ancestor then expressed a gāthā and presented it to the Ancient Ancestor Yunyan, saying that “the inconceivability of the insentient preaching the dharma” is “How strange! How strange!” Therefore, both the insentient and the insentient preaching the dharma are difficult to conceive. How are we to take this “insentient”? We should study that it is neither commoner nor sage, is neither sentient nor insentient. Whether commoner or sage, sentient or insentient, both their preaching and not preaching must belong to the realm of the conceivable. Here, it is “incon-

“If we use the ear to hear it, it’s hard in the end to understand” means that, whether it be the deva ear or the dharma ear that fills the world and fills time, if we think to “use the ear to hear it,” “it’s hard in the end to understand.”<sup>53</sup> Even if there are ears on walls or ears on staffs, they will not understand the insentient preaching the dharma; for it is not sound.<sup>54</sup> It is not that there is no “if we use the ear to hear it,” but even though we spend the concentrated efforts of a hundred thousand kalpas, “it’s hard in the end to understand.”<sup>55</sup> Since it is the deportment of the one way beyond sound and form, it is not the dens and caves in the vicinity of the common person or sage.<sup>56</sup>

dharma ear (hōni 法耳): An unusual expression, no doubt intended to parallel the common “dharma eye” (hōgen 法眼) possessed by the advanced bodhisattva, as seen in “Shōbōgenzō mitsugo” 正法眼藏密語.

54 ears on walls (hekijō ni 壁上耳): Perhaps a play on the expression “the mouth hung on the wall” (kō ka heki jō 口挂壁上) — i.e., putting away the mouth and no longer using it to speak.

ears on staffs (bōtō ni 棒頭耳): Perhaps a play on the common expression “the staff has eyes” (bōtō u gen 棒頭有眼), meaning the master’s staff knows when and where to strike. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Staff.”

55 It is not that there is no “if we use our ears to hear it” (nyaku shō ni chō wa naki ni arazu 若將耳聽はなきにあらず): Probably meaning, “While we may use the ears to hear it.” The odd English reflects Dōgen’s retention of the conditional conjunction “if” (nyaku 若) from the verse.

56 deportment of the one way beyond sound and form (shōshiki no hoka no ichidō no iigi 聲色のほかの一道の威儀): No doubt reflecting a line in a verse by Xiangyan Zhixian 香嚴智閑 (d. 898) recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:134, case 17) and invoked elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings:

眼處聞聲方得知。この道取を、箇箇おもはくは、いま人眼の所見する草木華鳥の往來を、眼處の聞聲といふならん、とおもふ。この見處は、さらにあやまりぬ、またく佛法にあらず、佛法は、かくのごとくいふ道理なし。

“Only when the eye hears the voices do we know it.” This saying, people think must mean that the comings and goings of grass, trees, flowers, and birds seen by the human eye are “the eye hearing the voices.” This viewpoint is completely mistaken, not the buddha dharma at all. The buddha dharma has no reasoning like this.

高祖道の眼處聞聲の參學するには、聞無情說法聲のところ、これ眼處なり、現無情說法聲のところ、これ眼處なり。眼處、さらにひろく參究すべし。眼處の聞聲は、耳處の聞聲にひとしかるべきがゆえに、眼處の聞聲は、耳處の聞聲にひとしからざるなり。眼處に耳根あり、と參學すべからず、眼即耳、と參學すべからず、眼裏聲現、と參學すべからず。

In studying “the eye hears the voices” said by the Eminent Ancestor, where we hear the voices of the insentient preaching the dharma, this is “the eye”; where we manifest the voices of the insentient preaching the dharma, this is “the eye.”<sup>57</sup> We should investigate “the eye” still more broadly. Since the eye hearing the voices should be the same as the ear hearing the voices, the eye hearing the voices is not the same as the ear hearing the voices.<sup>58</sup> We should not study it to mean there is an ear organ in the eye; we should not study it to mean that the eye is the ear; we should not study it to mean that the voices occur within the eyes.

Of old it was said, “All the worlds in the ten directions are the single eye of the śramaṇa.”<sup>59</sup>

57 where we hear the voices of the insentient preaching the dharma, this is “the eye” (mon mujō seppō shō no tokoro, kore genshō nari 聞無情說法聲のところ、これ眼處なり): In his use here of tokoro ところ (“the place where”), Dōgen seems to be playing with the element shō 處 (“place”; S. āyatana) in Dongshan’s “eye” (genshō 眼處); similarly, mutatis mutandis, in the next clause. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye.”

58 Since the eye hearing the voices should be the same as the ear hearing the voices, the eye hearing the voices is not the same as the ear hearing the voices (genshō no monshō wa, nishō no monshō ni hitoshikaru beki ga yue ni, genshō no monshō wa, nishō no monshō ni hitoshikarazaru nari 眼處の聞聲は、耳處の聞聲にひとしかるべきがゆえに、眼處の聞聲は、耳處の聞聲にひとしからざるなり): The odd logic of this sentence seems to be explained by Dōgen’s remarks following it: i.e., the eye and ear are the same in that they have their distinct functions and, therefore, are not the same.

59 “All the worlds in the ten directions are the single eye of the śramaṇa” (jin jippō kai ze shamon isseki gen 盡十方界是沙門一隻眼): Also read isseki gan. Words, attribut-

[46:27]

この眼處に聞聲せば、高祖道の眼處聞聲ならん、と擬議商量すべからず。たとひ古人道の盡十方界一隻眼の道を學すとも、盡十方はこれ一隻眼なり。さらに千手頭眼あり、千正法眼あり、千耳眼あり、千舌頭眼あり、千心頭眼あり、千通心眼あり、千通身眼あり、千棒頭眼あり、千身先眼あり、千心先眼あり、千死中死眼あり、千活中活眼あり、千自眼あり、千他眼あり、千眼頭眼あり、千參學眼あり、千豎眼あり、千横眼あり。

We should not consider and deliberate that, if our eye hears the voices, it is the “eye hears the voices” said by the Eminent Ancestor. Although we study the words said by the ancient, that “all the worlds in the ten directions are the single eye,” all the ten directions are themselves “the single eye.” Moreover, there are a thousand hand eyes, a thousand true dharma eyes, a thousand ear eyes, a thousand tongue eyes, a thousand mind eyes, a thousand eyes throughout the mind, a thousand eyes throughout the body, a thousand staff eyes, a thousand eyes before the body, a thousand eyes before the mind, a thousand eyes of death within death, a thousand eyes of life within life, a thousand eyes of self, a thousand eyes of other, a thousand eyes of eyes, a thousand eyes of study, a thousand vertical eyes, a thousand horizontal eyes.<sup>60</sup>

[46:28] {2:12}

しかあれば、盡眼を盡界と學すとも、なほ眼處に體究あらず、ただ、聞無情説法を眼處に參究せんことを急務すべし。いま高祖道の宗旨は、耳處は無情説法に難會なり、眼處は聞聲す。さらに通身處の聞聲あり、遍身處の聞聲あり。たとひ眼處聞聲を體究せずとも、無情説法、無情得聞を體達すべし、脱落すべし。この道理つたはれるゆえに、

Thus, though we study all eyes as “all the worlds,” we still lack personal investigation of “the eye.” We should make it our urgent business to investigate hearing the insentient preach the dharma with “the eye.”<sup>61</sup> The Eminent Ancestor’s essential point here is that for the ear it is “hard to understand” the insentient preaching the dharma; the eye hears the voices. Going further, there is “the body throughout” hearing the voices; there is “the body everywhere” hearing the voices.<sup>62</sup> Though we have not personally investigated “the eye hears the voices,” we should personally realize, and should cast off, “when the insentient preach the dharma, the insentient can hear it.” Because this principle has been transmitted,

60 a thousand hand eyes (senjutō gen 千手頭眼): No doubt an allusion to Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara of a thousand arms and a thousand eyes (senju sengen Kannon 千手千眼觀音), who is depicted with an eye in the palm of each hand. The topic is the subject of a conversation between Yunyan Tansheng 雲巖曇晟 and fellow disciple Daowu Yuanzhi 道吾圓智 (769-835) that is recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:182, case 105) and discussed in the “Shōbōgenzō Kannon” 正法眼藏觀音; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “His body throughout is hands and eyes.”

a thousand staff eyes (sen bōtō gen 千棒頭眼): See above, Note 54.

61 investigate hearing the insentient preach the dharma with “the eye” (mon mujō seppō o gensho ni sankyū sen 聞無情説法を眼處に參究せん): The adverbial phrase “with the eye” (gensho ni 眼處に) here could modify either “investigate” or “hearing.”

This is the insentient that preach the dharma transmitting the true eye, transmitting the bones and marrow, of the Ancient Ancestor.<sup>64</sup> On the principle that all preaching the dharma is insentient, it is “the insentient preach the dharma”; this represents the standard case.<sup>65</sup> The insentient preach the dharma for the sake of the insentient. What should we call the insentient?<sup>66</sup> We should know: it is the one who hears the insentient preaching the dharma. What should we call preaching the dharma? We should know: it is the one who does not know it is insentient.

62 “the body throughout” (tsūshin sho 通身處); “the body everywhere” (henshin sho 遍身處): Terms reflecting the dialogue on the thousand eyes and arms of Avalokiteśvara alluded to in the preceding section; see above, Note 60. The English “body” here loses Dōgen’s playful replacement of shin 身 in the original dialogue with shinsho 身處 (“tactile sense field”; S. kāyātana), in keeping with Dongshan’s gensho 眼處 (“sense of vision”); see above, Note 31.

63 Old Buddha of Tiantong (Tendō kobutsu 天童古佛): I.e., Dōgen’s teacher Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “The bottle gourd vine entwines the bottle gourd.” Dōgen often cites or alludes to this saying in the Shōbōgenzō.

64 This is the insentient that preach the dharma transmitting the true eye, transmitting the bones and marrow, of the Ancient Ancestor (kore Nōso shōgen no tsutaware, kotsuzui no tsutawareru seppō mujō nari これ曩祖正眼のつたはれ、骨髓のつたはれる説法無情なり): I.e., Rujing’s intertwining vines are the essence of the insentient preaching Yunyan’s Buddhism.

65 this represents the standard case (iwayuru tenko nari いはゆる典故なり): Likely meaning that the Ancient Ancestor’s words, “the insentient preach the dharma,” represent “the locus classicus” or “the governing precedent” of this teaching.

INTRODUCTION

This essay was composed at Kippōji in the ninth lunar month of 1243. It represents number 47 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō and number 52 in the Honzan edition; it is not included in the sixty-chapter compilation but is found as number 4 of fascicle 3 in the twenty-eight-text collection.

The essay concerns the centrality of the sūtras in the Zen tradition. In this, it is directed against those that would see the tradition as “a separate transmission outside the teachings” (kyōge betsuden 教外別傳), “not dependent on words and letters” (furyū monji 不立文字). In the first part of his essay, Dōgen argues that the sūtras and Zen masters convey the same teachings, that the activities of the Zen master are the enactment of the sūtras, that indeed, when properly understood, the sūtras are “all the worlds in the ten directions.”

The remainder of the essay is devoted to a sharp criticism of recent developments in Chan in the Song dynasty: for example, the view that we should abandon study and simply empty our minds; the practice of using stock lines of the Chan masters as the standards for training; or the view that the three traditions of Confucianism, Daoism, and Buddhism are ultimately one. In the course of this criticism, Dōgen dismisses the famous Tang-dynasty figure Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 while praising his own teacher, Tiantong Ruji 天童如淨; he ends with a warning against the assumption that foreign monks and imperial teachers are necessarily accomplished in Buddhism.

In its themes and its strongly polemical tone, this essay has similarities with three other Shōbōgenzō chapters — “Butsudō” 佛道, “Shohō jissō” 諸法實相, and “Mitsugo” 密語 — that date from the ninth month of 1243 and represent Dōgen’s first thoughts after abandoning his mission in the imperial capital and moving his community to the isolated region of Echizen.

Sūtras of the Buddhas

このなかに、教菩薩法あり、教諸佛法あり。おなじくこれ大道の調度なり。調度、ぬしにしたがふ、ぬし、調度をつかふ。これによりて、西天東地の佛祖、かならず或從知識、或從經卷の正當恁麼時、おのおの發意・修行・證果、かつて間隙あらざるものなり。發意も經卷・知識により、修行も經卷・知識による、證果も經卷・知識に一親なり。機先句後、おなじく經卷・知識に同參なり。機中句裏、おなじく經卷・知識に同參なり。

Among these, there is the “dharma taught to the bodhisattvas”; there is the dharma taught to the buddhas.<sup>1</sup> They are both implements of the great way. The implements fit their owners; the owners use the implements. Due to this, at the very time that each of the buddhas and ancestors of Sindh in the West and the Land of the East, whether from a wise friend, whether from a sūtra scroll, brings forth the thought [of bodhi], practices, and verifies the fruit, there has never been any gap.<sup>2</sup> Bringing forth

1 Among these (kono naka ni このなかに): In the absence of any antecedent, the surprising pronoun at the head of the essay must refer to the “sūtras” of the title (though some would read this expression in the sense “here”).

“dharma taught to the bodhisattvas” (kyō bosatsu hō 教菩薩法): Recalling the introduction to the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:2b7-9):

爾時世尊、四衆圍遶、供養恭敬尊重讚歎、爲諸菩薩說大乘經、名無量義、教菩薩法、佛所護念。

At that time, the World-Honored One, surrounded by the fourfold congregation, favored with offerings, honored and revered, preached a sūtra of the great vehicle for the bodhisattvas entitled Immeasurable Meaning, a dharma taught to the bodhisattvas, that the buddhas bear in mind.

The following “dharma taught to the buddhas” (kyō shobutsu hō 教諸佛法) is Dōgen’s variation on the sūtra phrase.

2 whether from a wise friend, whether from a sūtra scroll (waku jū chishiki, waku jū kyōkan 或從知識、或從經卷): A fixed phrase, in Chinese syntax, that occurs often in Dōgen’s writings; see Supplementary Notes.

there has never been any gap (katsute kangeki arazaru mono nari かつて間隙あらざるものなり): Exactly what “gap” is being denied here is not entirely obvious; perhaps, the gaps in the sequence of the bodhisattva’s initial aspiration for bodhi, practice on the the thought depends on sūtra scrolls and wise friends; practice depends on sūtra scrolls and wise friends; verifying the fruit is wholly intimate with sūtra scrolls and wise friends. Before the function and after the words are both studying together with sūtra scrolls and wise friends; in the function and within the words are both studying together with sūtra scrolls and wise friends.<sup>3</sup>

知識は、かならず經卷を通利す。通利す、といふは、經卷を國土とし、經卷を身心とす、經卷を爲他の施設とせり、經卷を坐臥・經行とせり、經卷を父母とし、經卷を兒孫とせり、經卷を行解とせるがゆえに、これ知識の、經卷を參究せるなり。知識の洗面・喫茶、これ古經なり。經卷の、知識を出生するといふは、黃檗の六十拄杖、よく兒孫を生長せしめ、黃梅の打三杖、よく傳衣・付法せしむるのみにあらず、桃華をみて悟道し、竹響をききて悟道する、および見明星悟道、みなこれ經卷の、知識を生長せしむるなり。あるいは、まなこをえて經卷をうる皮袋・拳頭あり、あるいは、經卷をえてまなこをうる木杓・漆桶あり。

Wise friends are always well versed in the sūtra scrolls. “Well versed” means they take the sūtra scrolls as the land; they take the sūtra scrolls as their bodies and minds; they take the sūtra scrolls as provisionally established for the sake of others; they take the sūtra scrolls as sitting, reclining, and walking; they take the sūtra scrolls as their father and mother; they take the sūtra scrolls as their descendants; they take the sūtra scrolls as practice and understanding. It is for this reason that wise friends investigate the sūtra scrolls. Wise friends’ washing their faces and taking tea — these are the old sūtras.<sup>4</sup> That the sūtra scrolls give birth to wise friends means not only Huangbo’s sixty blows nurturing his descendants, and Huangmei’s three strikes transmitting the robe and bequeathing the dharma, but also seeing the peach blossoms and awakening to the way, hearing the sound of the bamboo and awakening to the way, seeing the dawn star and awakening to the way: these are all the path, and final awakening, though, given what follows in this section, one might also imagine the gap between the “wise friend” and the “sūtra scroll” as spiritual resources throughout this sequence.

3 Before the function and after the words (kisen kugo 機先句後): Variation on the more common shōzen kugo 聲前句後 (“before the voice and after the words”), suggesting what is before and after anything exists or happens; in the context here, it may be that the unusual phrase is meant to invoke the “function” of the wise friends and the “words” of the sūtras.

4 Wise friends’ washing their faces and taking tea (chishiki no senmen kissa 知識の洗面・喫茶): Possibly an allusion to the story of Weishan Lingyu 潯山靈祐 (771-853) washing his face and taking tea with Xiangyan Zhixian 香嚴智閑 (d. 898) and Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂 (803-887) (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:265c16-21; shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:158, case 61). Dōgen discusses the story in his “Shōbōgenzō jinzū” 正法眼藏神通.

sūtra scrolls growing wise friends.<sup>5</sup> There are skin bags and fists who get sūtra scrolls by getting eyes; there are wooden ladles and lacquer buckets that get eyes by getting sūtra scrolls.<sup>6</sup>

いはゆる經卷は、盡十方界これなり。經卷にあらざる時處なし。勝義諦の文字をもちい、世俗諦の文字をもちい、あるいは天上の文字をもちい、あるいは人間の文字をもちい、あるいは畜生道の文字をもちい、あるいは修羅道の文字をもちい、あるいは百草の文字をもちい、あるいは萬木の文字をもちいる。このゆえに、盡十方界に森森として羅列せる長・短・方・圓・青・黄・赤・白、しかしながら經卷の文字なり、經卷の表面なり。これを大道の調度とし、佛家の經卷とせり。

“Sūtra scrolls” are all the worlds in the ten directions. There is no time or place that is not a sūtra scroll. They use the script of ultimate truth; they use the script of conventional truth. Or they use the script of the heavens above, or they use the script of humans, or they use the script of the path of the beasts, or they use the script of the path of the asuras, or they use the script of the hundred grasses, or they use the

5 Huangbo’s sixty blows (Ōbaku no rokujū shujō 黄檗の六十拄杖): Allusion to the tradition that Huangbo Xiyun 黄檗希運 beat his student Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866) sixty times (see, e.g., Biyan lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:222b19-21); re-introduced below, section 18.

Huangmei’s three strikes (Ōbai no da sanjō 黄梅の打三杖): Allusion to the story that, when the future Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能, was husking rice at the Fifth Ancestor’s monastery at Huangmei 黄梅, the latter signaled his acknowledgment of the former by striking the mortar three times, after which he transmitted the dharma and gave him the ancestral robe of Bodhidharma; see, e.g., Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄, ZZ.135:645a9-11. Dōgen tells a version of the story in his “Shōbōgenzō inmo” 正法眼藏怎麼.

seeing the peach blossoms (tōke o mite 桃華をみて): Allusion to the story that Lingyun Zhiqin 靈雲志勤 awakened to the way upon viewing peach trees in bloom; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Peach blossoms.” Dōgen includes the story in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:206, case 155) and recounts the episode in his “Shōbōgenzō keisei sanshoku” 正法眼藏溪聲山色.

hearing the sound of the bamboo (chikukyō o kikite 竹響をききて): Allusion to the story that Xiangyan Zhixian 香嚴智閑 gained an understanding upon hearing a bit of debris strike a bamboo stalk; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “A painted cake can’t satisfy hunger.” Dōgen includes the story in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:206, case 155) and recounts the episode in his “Shōbōgenzō keisei sanshoku” 正法眼藏溪聲山色.

seeing the dawn star and awakening to the way (ken myōjō godō 見明星悟道): Allusion to the tradition that Buddha Śākyamuni was awakened upon seeing the planet Venus. See, e.g., Xiuxing benji jing 修行本記經, T.184.3:471c29.

6 skin bags and fists (hitai kentō 皮袋・拳頭); wooden ladles and lacquer buckets (mokushaku shittsū 木杓・漆桶): Common ironic references to Zen masters; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bag of skin,” “Fist,” and “Lacquer bucket.”

script of the myriad trees. For this reason, the long and short, the square and round, the blue, yellow, red, and white, densely arrayed throughout all the worlds in the ten directions, are all the script of the sūtra scrolls, the surfaces of the sūtra scrolls. These, we take as the implements of the great way, we take as the sūtra scrolls of the house of the buddhas.

These sūtra scrolls spread through all times and circulate through all lands. Opening the gate that teaches humans, they do not forsake any human of all the earth; opening the gate that teaches things, they save the beings of all the earth. When they teach the buddhas and teach the bodhisattvas, it is all the earth and all the realms. “Opening the gate of expedient means,” opening the gate of abiding in position, without forsaking one or a half, they “reveal the true real mark.”<sup>7</sup> At this very moment, whether the buddhas or the bodhisattvas, in their thinking and perceiving, and in their not thinking and perceiving, though not their own deliberate demand, have, each of them, made getting this sūtra scroll their great aspiration.<sup>8</sup>

必得是經のときは、古今にあらず、古今は得經の時節なるがゆえに。盡十方界の、目前に現前せるは、これ得是經なり。この經を讀誦通利するに、佛智・自然智・無師智、こころよりさきに現成し、身よりさきに現成す。このとき、新條の特地、とあやしむことなし。この經の、われらに受持讀誦せらるるは、經の、われらを攝取するなり。文先句外、向下節上の消息、すみやかに散華貫華なり。

7 “Opening the gate of expedient means” (kai hōben mon 開方便門); “opening the gate of abiding in position” (kai jūi mon 開住位門); they “reveal the true real mark” (ji shin jissō 示眞實相): Allusions to lines in the Lotus Sūtra. The first and third phrases occur in a sentence at Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:31c16-17:

此經開方便門、示眞實相。

This sūtra opens the gate of expedient means and reveals the true real mark.

The second phrase is Dōgen’s play on the first, alluding to a line he often cites. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dharmas abide in their dharma positions.”

8 At this very moment (kono shō inmo ji この正恁麼時): This convoluted sentence might be paraphrased, “When the sūtras reveal the real mark, the buddhas and bodhisattvas all greatly anticipate obtaining the sūtras, whether or not they are consciously aware of and intentionally trying for this.”

The time in which they “surely get this sūtra” is not past or present; for past and present are the time they get the sūtra.<sup>9</sup> The manifesting before their eyes of all the worlds in the ten directions — this is “getting this sūtra.” When they “read, recite, and are well versed in” this sūtra, “buddha wisdom, natural wisdom, untaught wisdom” are realized before the mind, are realized before the body.<sup>10</sup> At that time they do not doubt it as a new, special state. When these sūtras are received and kept, read and recited by us, the sūtras gather us in. The circumstances before the writing and beyond the words, going beneath and above the sections, are immediately scattered flowers and strung flowers.<sup>11</sup>

9 The time in which they “surely get this sūtra” (hitsu toku ze kyō no toki 必得是經のとき): Again, an allusion to the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:61a21-22):

If good sons and good daughters achieve four dharmas in this way, after the extinction of the Tathāgata, they will surely get this sūtra.

for past and present are the time they get the sūtra (kokon wa toku kyō no jisetsu naru ga yue ni 古今は得經の時節なるがゆえに): Perhaps, the seemingly nonsensical logic here can be understood as something like, “Getting the sūtra is not something that happens at a time in history; for all of history is the time of getting the sūtra.” The translation follows Kawamura’s punctuation, but it is also possible to read this phrase with the following sentence, thus yielding something like, “Because all of history is the time of getting the sūtra, everything that appears in the present is getting the sūtra.”

10 When they “read, recite, and are well versed in” this sūtra (kono kyō o dokujū tsūri suru ni この經を讀誦通利するに): Perhaps another allusion to the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:58b10-12):

世尊、若善男子善女人、有能受持法華經者、若讀誦通利、若書寫經卷、得幾所福。

[Bodhisattva Medicine King asked.] “World-Honored One, if there are good sons and good daughters who receive and keep the Lotus Sūtra, who read, recite, and are well versed in it, who copy the sūtra scrolls, how much merit will they get?”

“buddha wisdom, natural wisdom, untaught wisdom” (butchi jinenchi mushichi 佛智・自然智・無師智): Again, reflecting the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:13b24-28):

若有衆生。從佛世尊聞法信受。勤修精進。求一切智佛智自然智無師智如來知見力無所畏。愍念安樂無量衆生。利益天人度脫一切。是名大乘。

If there are beings who, hearing the dharma from a buddha, a World-Honored One, believe it, diligently practice it, and make efforts, seeking universal wisdom, natural wisdom, untaught wisdom, the knowledge, powers, and fearlessness of the tathāgata, mercifully thinking on and providing joy to incalculable beings, benefiting devas and humans and delivering them all, these are called the Great Vehicle.

11 going beneath and above the sections (kōge setsujō 向下節上): A tentative translation of an obscure phrase not encountered elsewhere in Dōgen’s writing; perhaps meaning both implicit (“beneath” the text) and explicit (“above” the sections of text).

scattered flowers and strung flowers (sange kange 散華貫華): Perhaps meaning that the various teachings all come together. Likely reflecting the simile of a sūtra as a thread

この經を、すなはち法となづく。これに八萬四千の說法蘊あり、この經のなかに、成等正覺の諸佛なる文字あり、現住世間の諸佛なる文字あり、入般涅槃の諸佛なる文字あり。如來・如去、ともに經中の文字なり、法上の法文なり。拈華瞬目、微笑破顔、すなはち七佛正傳の古經なり。腰雪斷臂、禮拜得髓、まさしく師資相承の古經なり。つひにすなはち傳法・附衣する、これすなはち廣文全巻を附属せしむる時節至なり。みたび臼をうち、みたび箕の米をひる、經の經を出手せしめ、經の經に正嗣するなり。

These sūtras are called the dharma. In them, there is the preaching of the eighty-four-thousandfold aggregate of dharmas; within these sūtras, there is script that is the buddhas who have attained perfect awakening; there is script that is buddhas presently abiding in the world; there is script that is buddhas passed into parinirvāṇa.<sup>12</sup> The thus-come ones and the thus-gone ones are both the script in these sūtras, the script of the dharma on the dharma.<sup>13</sup> Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes, breaking into a smile, are an old sūtra directly transmitted by the seven buddhas.<sup>14</sup> Hip-deep in snow and cutting off an arm, making a bow and getting the marrow, are an old sūtra inherited from master to disciple.<sup>15</sup> Eventually, the transmission of the dharma and the bestowal of the robe that prevents the teachings from scattering, as a garland keeps flowers from scattering in the wind. See, e.g., Shanjianlü piposha 善見律毘婆沙, T.1462.24:676a29-b3.

12 script that is the buddhas who have attained perfect awakening (jō tōshōgaku no shobutsu naru monji 成等正覺の諸佛なる文字): I.e., the sūtra texts are the dharma body of the buddhas. The term monji 文字 (“script”; also read moji) can refer either to the content of the texts or to the glyphs with which they are written.

13 The thus-come ones and the thus-gone ones (nyorai nyoko 如來・如去): Two interpretations of the Sanskrit epithet for buddhas, tathāgata, read either as tathā-āgata (“come thus”) or tathā-gata (“gone thus”).

the script of the dharma on the dharma (hōjō no hōmon 法上の法文): The exact sense is uncertain; perhaps meaning that the text of the dharma inscribes the dharma in the sūtras.

14 Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes, breaking into a smile (nenge shunmoku, mishō hagan 拈華瞬目、微笑破顔): Allusion to the famous first transmission of Zen, on Vulture Peak, when Buddha Śākyamuni held up a flower, and Mahākāśyapa smiled. The expression mishō hagan 微笑破顔 (“breaking into a smile”) is normally written in reverse order: hagan mishō 破顔微笑. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes.”

15 Hip-deep in snow and cutting off an arm, making a bow and getting the marrow (yōsetsu danpi, raihai tokuzui 腰雪斷臂、禮拜得髓): Allusion to two incidents in the transmission from Bodhidharma to the second Chinese ancestor, Huike 慧可: the former phrase refers to the legend that Huike stood through a snowy night, waiting for Bodhidharma to acknowledge him, and then finally cut off his own arm as an offering (see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Cut off an arm”); the latter phrase recalls the scene in which Huike expressed his understanding of Bodhidharma’s teaching by bowing silently, and Bodhidharma said, “You’ve gotten my marrow” (see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow”).

— this was the arrival of the time when all the scrolls of the vast writings are entrusted; striking the mortar three times, sifting the rice three times, are a sūtra holding out a sūtra, a sūtra directly succeeding a sūtra.<sup>16</sup>

しかのみにあらず、是什麼物恁麼來、これ教諸佛の千經なり、教菩薩の萬經なり。説似一物即不中、よく八萬蘊をとく、十二部をとく。いはんや拳頭・脚跟、拄杖・拂子、すなはち古經・新經なり、有經・空經なり。在衆辦道、功夫坐禪、もとより頭正也佛經なり、尾正也佛經なり。菩提葉に經し、虛空面に經す。

Not only this, but “what thing is it that comes like this?” — this is the thousand sūtras taught to the buddhas, the myriad sūtras taught to the bodhisattvas; “to say it’s like any thing wouldn’t hit it” preaches the eighty-thousandfold aggregate, preaches the twelvefold division.<sup>17</sup> Not to mention that the fist and heel, the staff and whisk, are old sūtras and new sūtras, sūtras of being and sūtras of emptiness.<sup>18</sup> Pursuing the way in the assembly and making concentrated effort in seated meditation are fundamentally a sūtra of the buddhas true from the head, are a sūtra of 16 the transmission of the dharma and the bestowal of the robe (denbō fue 傳法・付衣); striking the mortar three times, sifting the rice three times (mitabi usu o uchi, mitabi mi no kome o hiru みたたび臼をうち、みたたび箕の米をひる): References to the transmission from the Fifth Ancestor to Huineng; see above, Note 5. Dōgen’s version of the story (see, e.g., “Shōbōgenzō inmo” 正法眼藏恁麼) is unusual in having Huineng respond to the Ancestor’s three strikes by sifting the rice in his winnow three times.

17 “what thing is it that comes like this?” (ze jūmo butsu inmo rai 是什麼物恁麼來); “to say it’s like any thing wouldn’t hit it” (setsu ji ichimotsu soku fuchū 説似一物即不中): Reference to a conversation, much quoted by Dōgen, between the Sixth Ancestor and Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓. The first sentence is the Ancestor’s question; the second, is Huairang’s response. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “What thing is it that comes like this?”

eighty-thousandfold aggregate (hachiman un 八萬蘊); the twelvefold division (jūni bu 十二部): I.e., the entire body of sūtras. The former phrase rounds off the standard “eighty-four-thousandfold” collection of teachings; the latter phrase refers to a common organization of the sūtras by type, discussed in the “Shōbōgenzō bukkyō” 正法眼藏佛教. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Three vehicles and twelvefold teachings.”

18 fist and heel, the staff and whisk (kentō kyakukon, shujō hossu 拳頭・脚跟、拄杖・拂子): Common terms of synecdoche (“fist” and “heel”) and metonymy (“staff” and “whisk”) for the Zen master; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Fist,” “Staff,” and “Whisk.”

sūtras of being and sūtras of emptiness (u kyō kū kyō 有經・空經): A tentative translation; presumably, “sūtras that teach the existence of dharmas” and “sūtras that teach the emptiness of dharmas.”

the buddhas true to the tail.<sup>19</sup> They compose a sūtra on a bodhi leaf; they compose a sūtra on the face of empty space.<sup>20</sup>

おほよそ佛祖の一動兩靜、あはせて把定・放行、おのれづから佛經の卷舒なり。窮極あらざるを、窮極の標準と參學するゆえに、鼻孔より受經・出經す、脚尖よりも受經・出經す。父母未生前にも受經・出經あり、威音王以前にも受經・出經あり。山河大地をもて、經をうけ、經をとく、日月星辰をもて、經をうけ、經をとく。あるいは空劫以前の自己をして、經を持し、經をさづく、あるいは面目已前の身心をもて、經を持し、經をさづく。かくのごとくの經は、微塵を破して出現せしむ、法界を破していださしむるなり。

In sum, the buddhas and ancestors' one movement and two stillnesses, as well as their holding fast and letting go, are themselves the rolling up and unrolling of the sūtras of the buddhas.<sup>21</sup> Because they study the lack of any limit as the marker of the limit, they receive the sūtras and bring forth the sūtras through their nostrils; they receive the sūtras and bring forth the sūtras through the tips of their toes. There is receiving the sūtras and bringing forth the sūtras before their father and mother were born; there is receiving the sūtras and bringing forth the sūtras before King Majestic Voice.<sup>22</sup> They receive the sūtras and preach the sūtras by means of the mountains, rivers, and the whole earth; they receive the sūtras and preach the sūtras by means of the sun, moon, and constellations. Or they keep the sūtras and bestow the sūtras by the self before the kalpa of emptiness; or they keep the sūtras and bestow the sūtras by the body and 19 sūtra of the buddhas true from the head (zushin ya bukkyō 頭正也佛經); sūtra of the buddhas true to the tail (bishin ya bukkyō nari 尾正也佛經なり): From the expression, common in Dōgen's writing, "true from head to tail" (zushin bishin 頭正尾正).

20 They compose a sūtra on a bodhi leaf (bodai yō ni kyō shi 菩提葉に經し): Presumably playing on the palm leaf, on which the sūtras were written in India. "Compose a sūtra" renders Dōgen's use here of "sūtra" as a verb (kyō shi 經し), perhaps suggesting the act of composing the "warp" (tate 經) on a loom.

21 one movement and two stillnesses (ichidō ryōjō 一動兩靜): Presumably, meaning "any movement and rest"; an unusual expression, not occurring elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

holding fast and letting go (hajō hōgyō 把定・放行): An expression, often used by Dōgen, sometimes in reverse order, alluding to the teaching methods of the Zen master; perhaps reflecting a verse by Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227) (Rujing chanshi yulu 如淨禪師語錄, T.2002A.48:122c18):

放行把住遑風流。

Letting go and holding on, full of style.

22 before their father and mother were born (bumo mishō zen 父母未生前); before King Majestic Voice (Ion'ō izen 威音王以前): Two common fixed expressions, appearing often in the Shōbōgenzō, for that which precedes phenomenal existence. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Before your father and mother were born" and "Before King Majestic Voice."

第二十七祖般若多羅尊者道、貧道出息不隨衆緣、入息不居蘊界、常轉如是經、百千萬億卷、非但一卷兩卷。

The Twenty-seventh Ancestor, Venerable Prajñātāra, said,<sup>25</sup>

When this humble wayfarer breathes out, he does not follow along with conditions; when he breathes in, he does not settle down in the aggregates and constituents.<sup>26</sup> He is perpetually turning such a sūtra, hundreds of thousands of myriads of millions of scrolls, not merely one scroll or two scrolls.<sup>27</sup>

before the face (menmoku izen 面目已前): Likely an abbreviated form of honrai menmoku izen 本來面目已前 (“preceding the original face [before one’s father and mother were born]”).

24 Such sūtras, they reveal by smashing dust motes (kaku no gotoku no kyō wa, mijin o hashite shutsugen seshimu かくのごとくの經は、微塵を破して出現せしむ): Likely an allusion to a passage in the Avatamsaka-sūtra (Huayan jing 華嚴經, T.279.10:273b15-22), in which the buddha wisdom within the minds of living beings is likened to a great sūtra scroll within motes of dust.

有一聰慧人、淨眼悉明見。破塵出經卷、普饒益衆生。

A sagacious person,

With pure eyes, clearly sees them all;

Smashing the dust motes, he exposes the sūtra scrolls,

And widely and abundantly benefits living beings.

25 The Twenty-seventh Ancestor, Venerable Prajñātāra (dai nijūshichi so Han-nyatara sonja 第二十七祖般若多羅尊者): A saying found in several sources (see, e.g., Hongzhi chanshi guanglu 宏智禪師廣錄, T.2001.48:18c12-15) and cited by Dōgen in his “Shōbōgenzō kankin” 正法眼藏看經 and Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.3:16, no. 20).

26 aggregates and constituents (ungai 蘊界): I.e., the five “heaps” (un 蘊; S. skandha) that make up the psychophysical organism, and the eighteen “elements” (kai 界; S. dhātu) of the six sense organs, their objects, and their attendant consciousnesses. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four elements and five aggregates.”

27 such a sūtra (nyoze kyō 如是經): The expression may be taken either as “the sūtra of breathing in and breathing out” or as “the sūtra of suchness” (or both).

Hearing such words of the Ancestral Master, we should study that the sūtras are being turned where one breathes out and breathes in.<sup>28</sup> Those who know the turning of the sūtras must know where the sūtras are. Because it is the turner and the turned, turning the sūtras and the sūtras turning, it must be knowing them all and seeing them all.<sup>29</sup>

先師尋常道、我箇裏、不用焼香・禮拜・念佛・修懺・看經、祇管打坐、辦道功夫、身心脱落。

My former master always said, “Here, there is no need to burn incense, make bows, recollect the buddha, practice repentance, or read the sūtras; just sitting, making concentrated effort to pursue the way, body and mind are sloughed off.”<sup>30</sup>

28 where one breathes out and breathes in (shussoku nissoku no tokoro 出息・入息のところ): Or “where he [i.e., the Ancestral Master] breathes out and breathes in.”

29 turning the sūtras and the sūtras turning (tenkyō kyōten 轉經・經轉): Perhaps reflecting a line from a verse, quoted in “Shōbōgenzō kankin” 正法眼藏看經, attributed to the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能 (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:238a24):

心迷法華轉、心悟轉法華。

When the mind is deluded, the Lotus turns it;

When the mind is awakened, it turns the Lotus.

knowing them all and seeing them all (shicchi shikken 悉知悉見): The objects of the verbs here are uncertain: in the context, they would seem to be “the sūtras”; but the expression may reflect a passage in the Diamond Sūtra (Jingang jing 金剛經, T.235.8:750c3-6) that would make the object the person “turning” and “being turned by” the sūtras:

須菩提、當來之世若有善男子善女人、能於此經受持讀誦、則爲如來以佛智慧悉知是人、悉見是人。皆得成就無量無邊功德。

Subhūti, if in ages to come there are good men and good women who receive and keep, read and recite this sūtra, the Tathāgata, with his buddha wisdom, will know all these people, will see all these people; and they will all achieve measureless, limitless merit.

30 My former master (senshi 先師): I.e., Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨. This saying of Rujing has no known source in extant Chinese texts and is generally assumed to be the private recollection of Dōgen. A similar passage, unattributed to Rujing, appears in Dōgen’s early work, the “Bendōwa” 辨道話; slightly variant versions are attributed to Rujing in “Shōbōgenzō gyōji” 正法眼藏行持 and “Shōbōgenzō zanmai ō zanmai” 正法眼藏三昧王三昧, as well as at Hōkyō ki 寶慶記, DZZ.7:18-20.

かくのごとくの道取、あきらむるともがら、まれなり。ゆえはいかん。看經をよんで看經とすれば、觸す、よんで看經とせざれば、そむく。不得有語、不得無語、速道速道。この道理、參學すべし。この宗旨あるゆえに、古人云、看經須具看經眼。

Those who clarify such words are rare. Why? If we take “read the sūtras” as “read the sūtras,” we violate them; if we take them not as “read the sūtras,” we oppose them.<sup>31</sup> “You can’t say anything; you can’t say nothing. Speak! Speak!”<sup>32</sup> We should study this principle. Because of this essential point, a person of old said, “To read the sūtras, you must possess the eye for reading the sūtras.”<sup>33</sup>

まさにしるべし、古今にもし經なくば、かくのごとくの道取あるべからず。脱落の看經あり。不用の看經あること、參學すべきなり。

We should realize that, if there were no sūtras in past and present, there would be no such words. We should study that there is a reading of the sūtras that is “sloughed off”; there is a reading of the sūtras that is “no need.”

[47:14]

Thus, one or a half who studies this, surely having received transmission and kept the sūtras of the buddhas, must be a child of the Buddha. Do not learn in vain the false views of other paths. Because the treasury of the true dharma eye manifest now is the sūtras of the buddhas, all the sūtras of the buddhas are the treasury of the true dharma eye. They are neither identical nor different; they are not self or other. You should 31 we violate them (soku su 觸す): Taking soku 觸 in the sense sokuhan 觸犯 (“to offend”); perhaps meaning that, if we take the words at face value, we do not do them justice.

32 “You can’t say anything; you can’t say nothing. Speak! Speak!” (futoku ugo, futoku mugo, sokudō sokudō 不得有語、不得無語、速道速道): A passage in Chinese, perhaps reflecting the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:129a17). Though Dōgen would not have used this text, his full expression here occurs at Wumen guan 無門關 (T.2005.48:298b19).

The sūtras of the buddhas must be the same. They may be many, but we are to accept in faith and reverently practice a single gāthā, a single line.<sup>35</sup> We cannot understand the eighty thousand [teachings]; but not being a master of the sūtras of the buddhas, do not rashly say that the sūtras of the buddhas are not the buddha dharma. Though you claim the bones and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors, when viewed with the true eye, you are latecomers relying on texts.<sup>36</sup> You must be the same as those who receive and keep a single line, a single gāthā; you may not even amount to those who receive and keep a single line, a single gāthā. Do not slander the true dharma of the buddha based on this shallow understanding. It cannot be the case that sounds and forms have more merit than the sūtras of the buddhas.<sup>37</sup> Sounds and forms delude and confuse

34 you do not clarify them all (nandachi kotogotoku kaimei sezu なんだちことごとく開明せず): The second person plural pronoun nandachi なんだち here has no obvious antecedent. Dōgen seems to be addressing directly those he will go on to criticize in the following sections who think that the Zen treasury of the true dharma eye obviates the need for the sūtras. The treatment of “the treasury of the true dharma eye” as plural here is unusual; presumably to be taken as “the teachings transmitted in the treasury of the true dharma eye.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Treasury of the true dharma eye.”

35 we are to accept in faith and reverently practice a single gāthā, a single line (shinju bugyō sen koto, ichige ikku naru beshi 信受奉行せんこと、一偈一句なるべし): More literally, “our acceptance in faith and reverent practice should be one verse and one line.” Both the virtue of “accepting in faith and reverently practicing” a sūtra, and of taking to heart even “a single verse, a single line” of a sūtra, are commonly encountered tropes in the Buddhist literature.

36 bones and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no kotsuzui 佛祖の骨髓): I.e., the essential teaching passed down in the Zen tradition. Dōgen’s point here is that those who claim that this teaching is passed down outside of books do so on the basis of their reading of Zen books.

37 sounds and forms (shōshiki 聲色): I.e., sense objects; here, presumably the immediate sensory experience favored by Dōgen’s opponents over the words of the Buddha

Nevertheless, in the Land of the Great Song, since about one or two hundred years ago, every illiterate stinking skin bag has been saying, “We should not take to heart even the words of the ancestral masters, let alone be forever looking at and using the sūtra teachings; we should just make our bodies and minds like dried-up trees and dead ashes, like a broken wooden ladle, or a bucket missing its bottom.”<sup>38</sup> Such types have foolishly become followers of other paths and the Deva Māra. They seek in the sūtras.

38 illiterate stinking skin bag (zusan no shū hitai 杜撰の臭皮袋): I.e., Zen monks ignorant of the tradition. “Stinking skin bag” (shū hitai 臭皮袋) is a common term for the body, especially of humans; often used by Dōgen in reference especially to Zen monks; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bag of skin.” “Illiterate” is a loose translation for zusan 杜撰, more literally, “Du composition,” used in pejorative reference to a literary work that, like those of Du, is ignorant of classical precedents. (Du is most often identified as the Song-dynasty poet Du Mo 杜默; for alternative theories, see M.14477.122.) Dōgen regularly uses the term to refer to those in the Zen tradition who are ignorant of the tradition.

dried-up trees and dead ashes (koboku shikai 枯木死灰): Or, as we might say, “dead wood and cold ashes”; a common expression in Zen texts, used in reference to a state of mind without thoughts. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dried-up tree.”

broken wooden ladle (ha mokushaku 破木杓); bucket missing its bottom (datteitsū 脱底桶): Two common expressions for something “useless,” often used in Zen texts in an ironic positive sense.

and use what they should not use; and, as a result, the dharma of the buddhas and ancestors has become the worthless dharma of madmen. How pitiful. How sad. Even the “broken ladle” and the “bottomless bucket” are the old sūtras of the buddhas and ancestors. Rare are the buddhas and ancestors who have mastered the scrolls and books of these sūtras.

Those who say that the sūtras of the buddhas are not the buddha dharma are unacquainted with the occasions when the buddhas and ancestors used the sūtras, have not studied the occasions when the buddhas and ancestors emerged from the sūtras, do not know the degree to which the buddhas and ancestors are close to or distant from the sūtras of the buddhas.<sup>39</sup> Such illiterate types are like “rice, hemp, bamboo, and reeds.”<sup>40</sup> They have ascended the lion seat and, as the teachers of humans and devas, have established monasteries throughout the world.<sup>41</sup> Because the illiterates study with illiterates, they do not know the truth that is not illiterate and, not knowing it, “they go from darkness into darkness.”<sup>42</sup> How pitiful.

Never having had the body and mind of the buddha dharma, they do not know how to have physical deportment and mental constraint. Since they have not clarified the import of being and emptiness, when someone puts a question to them, they arbitrarily raise their fist, even though they are in the dark about what it means to raise it. Since they have not clarified the ways of the true and the false, when someone puts a question to them, they raise their whisk, even though they are not clear what it means to raise it. Or, in offering a hand to others, they take up as the standard for studying the way Linji’s “four considerations” or “four

Subhūti, all the buddhas, as well as the anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi of the buddhas, have emerged from this sūtra.

My former master, Reverend Tiantong, used to laugh at them and say,<sup>44</sup> How could the study of Buddhism be like this? The great way directly transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors, we have been permitted to receive in abundance in our minds and in our bodies. In studying it, there is not enough time to try to investigate it thoroughly; what leisure 43 Linji’s “four considerations” (Rinzai no shi ryōken 臨濟の四料簡): Also written 四料揀. A teaching method associated with Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄, based on a passage in the Linji lu 臨濟錄 (T.1985.47:497a22-23):

師晚參示衆云、有時奪人不奪境。有時奪境不奪人。有時人境俱奪。有時人境俱不奪。

At the evening convocation, the Master addressed the assembly saying, “Sometimes, I snatch away the person but don’t snatch away the object; sometimes, I snatch away the object but don’t snatch away the person; sometimes, I snatch away both person and object; sometimes, I don’t snatch away either person or object.”

The saying is quoted and its interpretation by various masters recorded in the Rentian yanmu 人天眼目 (T.2006.48:300b6ff).

“four illuminations and applications” (shi shōyō 四照用): Four methods of teaching varying the relationship between wisdom and its expression: the former precedes the latter, the latter precedes the former, the two are simultaneous, the two are not simultaneous. (See Rentian yanmu 人天眼目, T.2006.48:304a10ff.)

Yunmen’s “three phrases” (Unmon no sanku 雲門の三句): A set of sayings attributed to Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃, of which there are two versions; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Yunmen’s three phrases.”

Dongshan’s “three roads” (Tōzan no sanro 洞山の三路): Three phrases attributed to Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dongshan’s three roads.”

44 My former master, Reverend Tiantong (senshi Tendō oshō 先師天童和尚): The source of these remarks attributed to Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 is not known; perhaps Dōgen’s personal recollection. The remarks are put in Japanese, and it is possible that only the first sentence represents Rujing’s words. The first sentence of the following section, however, suggests that we should read the entire passage as a quotation (or paraphrase) of Rujing.

time is there to include the words of latecomers? We should realize that it is obvious the elders in all quarters lack the mind of the way and do not study the body and mind of the buddha dharma.<sup>45</sup>

Such was my former master's address to the assembly. In truth, Linji was a junior member of the congregation of Huangbo.<sup>46</sup> Receiving sixty blows of the staff, eventually he visited Dayu.<sup>47</sup> Upon hearing him speak of the "grandmother's mind," he reflected on his previous behavior and returned to Huangbo.<sup>48</sup> Because this matter resounded like thunder, it was thought that Huangbo's buddha dharma was transmitted only to Linji; it was even thought that he surpassed Huangbo.<sup>49</sup> This is absolute-45 elders in all quarters (shohō chōrō 諸方長老): i.e., abbots of monasteries throughout the land.

46 Linji was a junior member of the congregation of Huangbo (Rinzai wa, Ōba-ku no eka ni goshō nari 臨濟は、黄檗の會下に後生なり): Dōgen here recounts an abbreviated version of the famous story of Linji's study under Huangbo Xiyun 黄檗希運 (dates unknown), which appears in several sources (see, e.g., Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄, ZZ.135:683b3-684a18; shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:138-142, case 27) and is repeated in "Shōbōgenzō gyōji" 正法眼藏行持, where Dōgen's treatment of Linji is much less harsh.

47 Receiving sixty blows of the staff (rokuju shujō 六十拄杖): The story has it that three times Linji sought to ask Huangbo a question, and three times he was beaten. In "Shōbōgenzō gyōji" 正法眼藏行持, Dōgen explains that each time he received twenty blows.

Dayu (Daigu 大愚): i.e., Gaoan Dayu 高安大愚 (dates unknown), the master to whom Linji was directed when he abandoned his practice under Huangbo.

48 "grandmother's mind" (rōba shin 老婆心): Dayu's judgment that, in beating Linji, Huangbo was behaving like a kindly grandmother.

49 resounded like thunder (raimon seru 雷聞せる): i.e., was heard everywhere.

ly not the case. Linji was simply in Huangbo's congregation following the assembly; yet, when Venerable Chen urged him, he said that he did not know what to ask.<sup>50</sup> When he had yet to clarify the great matter, when, as a comrade of the dark studying the way, he stood and listened to the dharma, how could he be so at a loss?<sup>51</sup> We should recognize that he was not of the highest aptitude.

Furthermore, Linji lacked the determination to surpass his master, and we do not hear from him any words that go beyond his master. Huangbo had sayings that surpassed his master; he had great wisdom that went beyond this master; he left sayings that said things the Buddha did not yet say; he understood dharmas the ancestors did not yet understand. Huangbo was an old buddha transcending past and present; he was more venerated even than Baizhang; he was more sagacious even than Mazu.<sup>52</sup> Linji had no such brilliance. Why? He never said even in his dreams any line not already said long ago; he seems only to have understood the many and forgotten the one or mastered the one and been troubled by the many. How could his “four considerations” and the like be taken as having the flavor of the way and used as a guide to studying the dharma?

50 when Venerable Chen urged him (Chin sonshuku susumuru toki 陳尊宿すすむるとき): In some versions of the story, the head monk (shuso 首座) who prompted Linji to pose a question to Huangbo is identified as Muzhou Daozong 睦州道蹤 (or Daoming 道明, whose family name was Chen 陳; dates unknown).

51 comrade of the dark studying the way (sangaku no genryo 參學の玄侶): I.e., a Zen monk in training. The term genryo 玄侶 is interpreted as “a comrade who studies the mysteries of Zen.” The only occurrence of this term in the Shōbōgenzō.

52 Baizhang (Hyakujō 百丈); Mazu (Baso 馬祖): I.e., Huangbo's master, Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 (749-814), and Baizhang's master, Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709-788).

53 Xuefeng (Seppō 雪峰): I.e., Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908). Dōgen here turns to Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃, the second of the masters he mentions at the end of section 16.

stage of a student.<sup>54</sup> To take these as having got the root is just to worry about the branches.<sup>55</sup> When Linji had not yet arrived, when Yunmen had not yet appeared, what did the buddhas and ancestors take as their standard for studying the way? For this reason, we should recognize that the work of the way of the house of the buddhas is not transmitted in their quarters.<sup>56</sup> It is because they lack any reliable basis that they recklessly speak such nonsense. These fellows recklessly slight the sūtras of the buddhas; let no one follow them. If we should discard the sūtras of the buddhas, we should discard Linji and Yunmen; if we should not use the sūtras of the buddhas, we will have no water to drink and no ladle with which to scoop it.

また、高祖の三路・五位は節目にて、杜撰のしるべき境界にあらず。宗旨正傳し、佛業直指せり、あへて餘門にひとしからざるなり。

Furthermore, the “three paths” and “five ranks” of the Eminent Ancestor are the crux, not in the realm known to illiterates.<sup>57</sup> Their essential point has been correctly transmitted, and the work of the buddha directly indicated; they are by no means equivalent to the other traditions.<sup>58</sup>

54 stage of a student (gakuchi 學地): I.e., the stage of the student (S. śaikṣa) on the path prior to final awakening, the stage of the non-student (mugaku 無學; S. aśaikṣa).

55 To take these as having got the root is just to worry about the branches (korera o mote tokuhon to sen, tada kore shūmatsu naru beshi これらをもて得本とせん、ただこれ愁末なるべし): From the common Zen expression, “Just get the root and don’t worry about the branches” (tan toku hon maku shū matsu 但得本莫愁末). The antecedents of the plural pronoun here must be Linji and Yunmen.

56 in their quarters (karera ga okuri ni かれらが屋裏に): This would appear to be a reference to the “houses” of Linji and Yunmen; yet the implied subject of the predicate “speak such nonsense” in the following sentence would seem to be those who hold up the sayings of Linji and Yunmen as “standards for studying the way.”

57 Eminent Ancestor (kōso 高祖): I.e., Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价, the third master mentioned in section 16, above.

58 they are by no means equivalent to the other traditions (aete yomon ni hito-shikarazaru nari あへて餘門にひとしからざるなり): The translation takes the implied subject to be “the three paths and five ranks”; it might also be taken as Dongshan’s Caodong tradition.

ずといはば、祖經あらんとき、もちいるや、もちいるべからずや。祖道に佛經のごとくなる法おほし、用・捨いかん。もし佛道のほかに祖道ありといはば、たれか祖道を信ぜん。祖師の、祖師とあることは、佛道を正傳するによりてなり、佛道を正傳せざらん祖師、たれか祖師といはん。初祖を崇敬することは、第二十八祖なるゆえなり。佛道のほかに祖道をいはば、十祖・二十祖たてがたからん。嫡嫡相承するによりて、祖師を恭敬するゆえは、佛道のおもきによりてなり。佛道を正傳せざらん祖師は、なんの面目ありてか人天と相見せん。いはんや、ほとけをしたいしふかきこころざしをひるがへして、あらたに佛道にあらざらん祖師にしたがひがたきなり。

Again, illiterate types say that the teachings of the Daoists, the teachings of the Confucians, and the teachings of Śākya must ultimately be of one end; it is just that they have differences in their starting points.<sup>59</sup> Sometimes they liken them to the three legs of a tripodal pot.<sup>60</sup> This is a point much discussed by the monks in the Land of the Great Song nowadays. If they talk like this, we must say that, for these fellows, Buddhism has already vanished from the earth; and, what is more, not so much as a speck of the buddha dharma ever came down to them.

When such fellows recklessly try to speak of the passage and blockage of the buddha dharma, they erroneously say that the sūtras of the buddhas are useless, that there is an essential point separately transmitted among the followers of the ancestral masters. They are of small capabilities, for they have not learned of the borders of the way of the buddhas. If they say the sūtras of the buddhas ought not be used, if there were sūtras of the ancestors, should they be used or not? In the way of the ancestors, there are many teachings like those of the sūtras of the buddhas; should they be used or discarded?<sup>61</sup>

If we say there is a way of the ancestors apart from the way of the buddhas, who would believe in the way of the ancestors? That the ancestral masters are regarded as ancestral masters is due to their directly transmitting the way of the buddhas; who would regard as an ancestral master an ancestral master who did not directly transmit the way of the buddhas?

59 the teachings of the Daoists, the teachings of the Confucians, and the teachings of Śākya must ultimately be of one end (Dōkyō Jukyō Shakkyō, tomo ni sono gokuchi wa ikki naru beshi 道教・儒教・釋教、ともにその極致は一揆なるべし): The claim, popular among some Confucian and Buddhist authors in the Song period, that “the three teachings are one” (sanjiao yizhi 三教一致).

60 Sometimes they liken them to the three legs of a tripodal pot (arui wa, kore o kanae no sankyaku ni tatou あるいは、これを鼎の三脚にたとふ): A standard simile often associated especially with the Song monk Gushan Zhiyuan 孤山智圓 (976-1022).

61 In the way of the ancestors (sodō ni 祖道に): One is tempted to take this as “in the words of ancestors,” but the subsequent discussion suggests that dō 道 is being used here in the broad sense of “tradition” or even “religion.”

That we venerate the First Ancestor is because he is the Twenty-eighth Ancestor.<sup>62</sup> If we say there is a way of the ancestors apart from the way of the buddhas, it would be hard to establish ten ancestors or twenty ancestors. The reason we revere the ancestral masters for inheriting it by successor after successor is that we value the way of the buddhas. With what face would an ancestral master who did not directly transmit the way of the buddhas encounter humans and devas? Not to mention how hard it would be to abandon our deep resolve to admire the buddha and start following an ancestral master who was not on the way of the buddhas.

That illiterate madmen now foolishly dismiss the way of the buddhas is because they are unable to choose the dharma belonging to the way of the buddhas. First of all, to compare the teachings of the Daoists and the teachings of the Confucians to the teachings of the buddhas is not only pitifully stupid: it is also the cause of evil karma and the weakening of the country; for it represents the decline of the three treasures.<sup>63</sup> The ways of Confucius and Laozi are not to be equated even with the arhat; how could they approach virtual awakening or wondrous awakening?<sup>64</sup> The teachings of Confucius and Laozi may barely discern, in the astronomical phenomena of heaven and earth, ken and kon, what was seen 62 First Ancestor (shoso 初祖): I.e., Bodhidharma, the first Chinese ancestor and twenty-eighth Indian ancestor.

63 three treasures (sanbō 三寶): I.e., Buddhism, as represented by the “three treasures” (or “three jewels”; S. tri-ratna) of buddha, dharma, and saṃgha.

64 virtual awakening or wondrous awakening (tōgaku myōgaku 等覺・妙覺; also read myōkaku): I.e., the penultimate stage of the bodhisattva path, virtually equivalent to complete awakening, or the ultimate stage of buddhahood.

and heard by the sages; but they cannot clarify, in a lifetime or multiple lifetimes, the causes and effects of the Great Sage.<sup>65</sup> They may barely discern, in the action of non-action, the motion and rest of body and mind; but they cannot clarify, in its boundlessness cut off, the reality of all the worlds in the ten directions.<sup>66</sup>

In sum, the inferiority of the teachings of Confucius and Laozi to the teachings of the buddhas cannot be discussed even as the gap between heaven and earth; arbitrarily to discuss them as “the same principle” is to denigrate the buddha dharma, to slander Confucius and Laozi. The teachings of Confucius and Laozi may have their subtleties, but how could the elders of recent times clarify even a small fraction of them, let alone grasp the great handle for myriad ages?<sup>67</sup> They have lessons and training, but the mediocrities of today could hardly undertake them. There is simply no one who tries to practice them. Even a single speck of dust cannot be identified with another speck; how much less can the latecomers of today confirm that the sūtras of the buddhas hold inner mysteries?<sup>68</sup> Since they are not clear about either one, they simply talk this nonsense about “oneness.”<sup>69</sup>

causes and effects of the Great Sage (daishō no inga 大聖の因果): I.e., the teachings on cause and effect given by Buddha Śākyamuni.

66 action of non-action (mui no i 無爲の爲): A reference to the famous Daoist teaching of “non-action” (wuwei 無爲), in which the sage acts without intentionally doing anything.

boundlessness cut off (mujin saidan 無盡際斷): A futile attempt to capture the sense of an unusual phrase, not encountered elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings; perhaps expressing the ultimate emptiness of the worlds. The English loses what is presumably a play on the glyph (jin 盡, “exhaustive”), translated as “all” in the phrase “all the worlds in the ten directions” (jin jippō kai 盡十方界) and understood as “limit” in the expression “boundlessness” (mujin 無盡). The term saidan 際斷 likely reflects the fixed Buddhist expression zengo saidan 前後際斷 (“before and after cut off”); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before and after cut off.”

67 grasp the great handle for myriad ages (mango ni daihei o toran 萬期に大柄をとらん): I.e., be able to rule for ten thousand years (by following the principles of Confucianism). The “great handle” (daihei 大柄) is a metaphor for political rule (somewhat like English “reins of state”).

68 Even a single speck of dust cannot be identified with another speck (ichi mijin, nao tain ni dōzu bekarazu 一微塵、なほ他塵に同ずべからず): The logical relationship of this sentence to the one following would seem to be something like: “it is impossible to say even that two atoms are exactly alike; how much more difficult to identify Confucianism and Daoism with Buddhism, when the scriptures of the latter have mysteries the latecomers cannot recognize.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dust.”

69 either one (ryōtō 兩頭): I.e., either Confucianism and Daoism on the one hand or Buddhism on the other.

[47:23] {2:23}

大宋、いまかくのごとくのともし、師號に署し、師職にをり、古今に無慚なるをもて、おろかに佛道を亂辦す。佛法ありと聴許しがたし。かくのごとくのともしの長老等、かれこれともしにいはく、佛經は、佛道の本意にあらず、祖傳、これ本意なり、祖傳に奇特玄妙つたはれり。

In the Great Song nowadays, such fellows are assigned the title “master” and occupy the position of teacher; unashamed before those of past or present, they stupidly distort the way of the buddhas. It is difficult to acknowledge that they have the buddha dharma. Such elders, to a man, say that the sūtras of the buddhas are not the original intention of the way of the buddhas, that the ancestral transmission is the original intention, that the rare and profound has been passed down in the ancestral transmission.

[47:24]

かくのごとくの言句は、至愚のはなはだしきなり、狂顛のいふところなり。祖師の正傳に、まったく一言半句としても、佛經に違せる奇特あらざるなり。佛經と祖道と、おなじくこれ釋迦牟尼佛より正傳流布しきたれるのみなり。ただし祖傳は、嫡嫡相承せるのみなり。しかあれども、佛經をいかでかしらざらん、いかでかあきらめざらん、いかでか讀誦せざらん。古徳いはく、なんぢ、經にまどふ、經、なんぢをまよはさず。古徳、看經の因縁おほし。

Such words are the ultimate of stupidity, said by the mad. In the correct transmission of the ancestral masters, there is not a single word or half a line so rare that it contradicts the sūtras of the buddhas. The sūtras of the buddhas and the way of the ancestors have both simply been directly transmitted and disseminated from Buddha Śākyamuni. It is just that the ancestral transmission has been inherited by successor after successor. Yet how could they not know the sūtras of the buddhas? How could they not be clear about them? How could they not read and recite them? An old worthy has said, “You are deluded by the sūtras; the sūtras do not delude you.”<sup>70</sup> There are many cases of the old worthies reading the sūtras.

[47:25] {2:24}

杜撰にむかふていふべし、なんぢがいふのごとく、佛經もしなげすつべくは、佛心もしなげすつべし、佛身もしなげすつべし、佛身心しなげすつべくは、

70 An old worthy has said (kotoku iwaku 古徳いはく): The source of the saying, given here in Japanese, is not known. Commentators have suggested that the words may reflect a remark, which Dōgen quotes in his “Shōbōgenzō Hokke ten Hokke” 正法眼藏法華轉法華, by the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能, to the monk Fada 法達, a devotee of the Lotus Sūtra (e.g., at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:237a24):

祖曰、經意分明、汝自迷背。

The Ancestor said, “The meaning of the sūtra is clear; you yourself have deludedly gone against it.”

佛子なげすつべし、佛子なげすつべくは、佛道なげすつべし、佛道なげすつべくは、祖道なげすてざらんや、佛道・祖道ともになげすてば、一枚の禿子の百姓ならん、たれかなんちを喫棒の分なしといはん、ただ王臣の驅使のみにあらず、閻老のせめあるべし。

We should say the following to the illiterates. To discard the sūtras of the buddhas as you say means we should also discard the mind of the buddhas, we should discard the body of the buddhas. To discard the body and mind of the buddhas means we should discard the children of the buddhas. To discard the children of the buddhas means we should discard the way of the buddhas.<sup>71</sup> To discard the way of the buddhas means we should discard the way of the ancestors. If we discard both the way of the buddhas and the way of the ancestors, you will be a bald commoner. Who would say you don't deserve to taste the rod? Not only will you be used at will by kings and ministers, but you will be answerable to Old Yama.<sup>72</sup>

近來の長老等、わづかに王臣の帖をたづさへて、梵刹の主人といふをもて、かくのごとくの狂言あり。是・非を辨ずるに人なし。ひとり先師のみ、このともがらをわらふ。餘山の長老等、すべてしらざるところなり。

The elders of recent times have such crazy words based simply on the fact that they carry papers from the king or a minister and declare themselves masters of brahma-kṣetras.<sup>73</sup> And there is no one to distinguish right from wrong. Only my former master laughed at these fellows; [their errors] are completely unrecognized by the elders of the other mountains.<sup>74</sup>

おほよそ異域の僧侶なれば、あきらむる道かならずあるらんとおもひ、大國の帝師なれば、達せるところさだめてあるらんとおもふべからず。異域の衆生、かならずしも僧種にたへず、善衆生は善なり、惡衆生は惡あり。法界のいく三界も、衆生の種品おなじかるべきなり。

As a general rule, we should not think that, because someone is a monk from a foreign region, he will surely possess the way of understanding; or think that, because someone is a teacher to the emperor of a great country, he will certainly be accomplished. The living beings of foreign 71 To discard the children of the buddhas (busshi nagesutsubeku 佛子なげすつべく): Correcting Kawamura's nazusutsubeku なずすつべく).

72 Old Yama (En Rō 閻老): A playful epithet for King Yama, popularly seen as a judge of the dead in the court of the underworld.

73 brahma-kṣetras (bonsetsu 梵刹): I.e., monastic establishments; the transliteration of a Sanskrit term for "pure field," or sacred space.

74 other mountains (yozan 餘山): I.e., other monasteries.

regions do not necessarily have what it takes to be a monk: the good living beings are good; the evil living beings have evil. The types of living beings should be the same in all the three realms of the dharma realm.<sup>75</sup>

Again, in becoming a teacher to the emperor of a great country, it is not necessarily one who possesses the way that is chosen. It is hard for the emperor to know who has the way; he simply hears the recommendation of his ministers and makes the appointment. In past and present, there have been teachers to the emperor who had the way and many teachers to the emperor who did not have the way. During corrupt reigns, those who get appointed are people without the way; during corrupt reigns, those who do not get appointed are people with the way. Why is this? Because there are times when people are recognized and times when people are not recognized.

We should not forget that long ago, at the time of Huangmei, there was Shenxiu.<sup>76</sup> Shenxiu was the teacher to the emperor, who lectured on the dharma before the bamboo blind, who preached the dharma before the reed screen.<sup>77</sup> And, in addition, he was the senior seat among seven 75 all the three realms of the dharma realm (hokkai no iku sangai 法界のいく三界): I.e., in any of the threefold world systems (of desire, form, and formlessness) anywhere throughout existence. Presumably, the diverse beings in these realms are “the same” in the sense that the good ones are good and the bad ones, bad.

76 long ago, at the time of Huangmei, there was Shenxiu (Ōbai no mukashi, Jinshū aru 黄梅のむかし、神秀ある): Reference to the Fifth Ancestor, Hongren of Huangmei 黄梅弘忍 (601-674), and his follower Shenxiu 神秀 (d. 706), a prominent monk who in the last years of his life served at the court of Empress Wu. In traditional Zen histories, Shenxiu is regarded as the founder of the so-called “Northern school,” in contrast to the “Southern school” of the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能. The story of his defeat by Huineng in a poetry contest to determine the successor to Hongren was made famous by the Platform Sūtra of the Sixth Ancestor (Liuzu tan jing 六祖壇經, T.2007).

77 who lectured on the dharma before the bamboo blind, who preached the dharma before the reed screen (renzen ni kōhō su, hakuzen ni seppō su 簾前に講法す、箔 hundred eminent monks.<sup>78</sup> We should trust that long ago, at the time of Huangmei, there was the postulant Lu.<sup>79</sup> Having gone from woodcutter to postulant, he had escaped carrying firewood only to work pounding rice. His lowly status might be lamentable, but his leaving the laity, surpassing the monks, gaining the dharma, and receiving transmission of the robe is something previously unheard of even in antiquity; it is an outstanding trace, rare through the ages, that remains only in the Land of the East and not in Sindh in the West. It seems that even the seven hundred eminent monks were no match for him, and that even the dragon elephants of the land lacked the status to follow in his footsteps.<sup>80</sup> Truly, he was an heir to the Buddha, who succeeded to the position of ancestor in the thirty-third generation. How could there have been such a thing had the Fifth Ancestor not been a wise friend who could recognize the person.

We should quietly reflect on such a truth; do not be in haste about it. We should desire to get the ability to recognize the person. Failure to recognize the person is a major calamity for self and other, a major calamity for the world. Learning and skill are not essential; we should quickly seek the eye that can recognize the person, the ability to recognize the person.<sup>81</sup> Without the ability to recognize the person, we will remain submerged for vast kalpas.

---

前に説法す): I.e., taught in the presence of the emperor (who was traditionally shielded from view by blinds and screens).

78 senior seat among seven hundred eminent monks (shichihyaku kōsō no jōza 七百高僧の上座): Reference to the tradition that Shenxiu was the head monk of Hongren's community at Huangmei.

79 postulant Lu (Ro anja 盧行者): I.e., Huineng 慧能, at the time still a lay practitioner surnamed Lu 盧. Dōgen goes on here to recall the tradition that Huineng had been an illiterate woodcutter before joining Hongren's community; that, as a laymen, he had been assigned to work pounding rice for the monastery; and that he subsequently succeeded Hongren, from whom he received the robe of Bodhidharma.

80 dragon elephants (ryūzō 龍象): A term for superior religious practitioners. Although originally used in reference to great elephants (S. mahānāga or hastināga), it is often interpreted as “dragons and elephants.”

81 Learning and skill (kōgaku sodai 廣學措大): A loose translation of an expression more literally rendered something like “broadly learned and in control of important matters”; akin to hōgaku sodai 飽學措大.

しかあればすなはち、佛道にさだめて佛經あることをしり、廣文深義を山海に參學して、辦道の標準とすべきなり。

Thus, realizing that the way of the buddhas definitely has the sūtras of the buddhas, we should study their extensive texts and profound meanings in the mountains and on the seas, and take them as the standard for pursuing the way.

INTRODUCTION

This short essay was composed at Kippōji, at the beginning of the first winter its author would spend in the snow country of Echizen. It represents number 48 in both the sixty- and seventy-five-chapter compilations of the Shōbōgenzō and number 54 in the Honzan edition.

The title theme concerns a common Buddhist term for ultimate reality, or what phenomena (*dharma*s) really are. Dōgen begins his essay with a warning that the dharma nature is not merely the object of Buddhist study: the study of Buddhism is itself the dharma nature; the dharma nature is itself studying Buddhism. Hence, he goes on to criticize the common view that “dharma nature” refers to a reality beyond phenomena themselves and quotes a saying of the famous Tang-dynasty Chan master Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 to the effect that everything we do always takes place within “the dharma nature samādhi.” In his comments on the saying, Dōgen expands on this claim: the opening of blossoms in spring and the falling of leaves in autumn are the dharma nature; our mistaken belief that the opening of blossoms and falling of leaves are not the dharma nature is the dharma nature.

When we study, whether following a sūtra scroll or following a wise friend, we awaken alone without a teacher.<sup>1</sup> “Awakening alone without a teacher” is the working of the dharma nature.<sup>2</sup> Even one who knows at birth must invariably seek a teacher and inquire about the way; even one who knows at non-birth must invariably make concentrated effort and pursue the way.<sup>3</sup> Which of us is not one who knows at birth? Yet until we

1 whether following a sūtra scroll or following a wise friend (arui wa kyōkan ni shitagai, arui wa chishiki ni shitagaite あるひは經卷にしたがひ、あるひは知識にしたがひて): A Japanese rendering (and reversal) of a fixed expression appearing several times in the Shōbōgenzō, “whether from a wise friend, whether from a sūtra scroll” (waku jū chishiki waku jū kyōkan 或從知識或從經卷); see Supplementary Notes.

2 awaken alone without a teacher (mushi dokugo 無師獨悟): An expression occurring often in Buddhist literature, especially in reference to the pratyeka-buddha. Synonymous with the equally common phrase “awaken by oneself without a teacher” (mushi jigo 無師自悟), as in the Zen expression “before [the primeval Buddha] King Majestic Voice, awaken by oneself without a teacher” (Ion’ō izen mushi jigo 威音王已前無師自悟); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before King Majestic Voice.” While of course Dōgen (like the Zen tradition more generally) emphasizes the need for a teacher, here (and in “Shōbōgenzō shisho” 正法眼藏嗣書), he uses the expression in a positive sense.

dharma nature (hosshō 法性): The fact or state of being dharma (S. dharmatā); the true nature of dharma(s) (S. dharmasvabhāva); etc. A standard Buddhist technical term for ultimate reality.

3 knows at birth (shōchi 生知); knows at non-birth (mushō chi 無生知): The translation of the second expression tries to retain something of Dōgen’s parallel play here with two quite different terms. The expression “knowledge at birth,” or “innate knowledge” (shōchi 生知), derives from a saying of Confucius at Lunyu 論語 16; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Knowledge at birth.” The Buddhist expression mushō chi 無生知 is typically understood here as “knowledge of non-arising” (i.e., recognition that dharmas reach the bodhi that is the fruit of buddhahood, we follow a sūtra scroll or a wise friend.

しるべし、經卷・知識にあふて法性三昧をうるを、法性三昧にあふて法性三昧をうる生知といふ。これ宿住智をうるなり、三明をうるなり、阿耨菩提を證するなり。生知にあふて、生知を習學するなり、無師智・自然智にあふて、無師智・自然智を正傳するなり。もし生知にあらざれば、經卷・知識にあふといへども、法性をきくことえず、法性を證することえざるなり。大道は、如人飲水冷暖自知の道理にはあらざるなり。一切諸佛および一切菩薩・一切衆生は、みな生知のちからにて、一切法性の大道、あきらむるなり。經卷・知識にしたがひて法性の大道をあきらむるを、みづから法性をあきらむるとす。經卷、これ法性なり、自己なり。知識、これ法性なり、自己なり。法性、これ知識なり、法性、これ自己なり。法性自己なるがゆえに、外道・魔儻の邪計せる自己にはあらざるなり。法性には外道魔儻なし、ただ喫粥來、喫飯來、點茶來のみなり。

We should realize that attaining the samādhi of dharma nature through encountering a sūtra scroll or a wise friend is called the knowledge at birth that attains the samādhi of dharma nature through encountering the samādhi of dharma nature.<sup>4</sup> It is attaining the knowledge of former lives; it is attaining the three knowledges; it is verifying anuttara-bodhi.<sup>5</sup> Encountering knowledge at birth, we study knowledge at birth; encountering masterless wisdom and spontaneous wisdom, we directly transmit are empty and do not arise (mushō hō nin 無生法忍; S. anutpattika-dharma-kṣānti); alternatively, it could be taken as equivalent to the common mushō chi 無生智 (S. anutpāda-jñāna), knowledge that one has achieved nirvāṇa and will not experience future rebirths. Dōgen repeats this combination in his “Shōbōgenzō shizen biku 四禪比丘.”

4 samādhi of dharma nature (hosshō zanmai 法性三昧): A concentration in which one knows the nature of all dharmas. Though the name of this meditation (or the similar “samādhi of the determination of dharma nature” [hitsu hosshō zanmai 畢法性三昧; S. dharma-dhātu-niyata]) appears in lists of samādhis, it does not seem to have been a particularly popular topic in Buddhist literature and, apart from Mazu’s 馬祖 reference to it quoted below, section 4, does not figure much in Chan discourse; it is not mentioned elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

5 knowledge of former lives (shukujū chi 宿住智): Recollection of past lives (S. pūrve-nivāsanānasmṛti-jñāna); one of the three knowledges (sanmyō 三明; S. tri-vidya) and six spiritual powers (rokutsū 六通; S. ṣaḍ-abhijñā); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Spiritual powers.”

three knowledges (sanmyō 三明): Three spiritual knowledges (S. tri-vidya) said to have been acquired by Buddha Śākyamuni during the night of his awakening, also occurring in the standard list of the six spiritual powers (rokutsū 六通; S. ṣaḍ-abhijñā) acquired by Buddhist adepts: the deva eye (tengen 天眼; S. divya-cakṣus), recollection of former lives (shukujū 宿住 or shukumyō 宿命; S. pūrva-nivāsanānasmṛti), and knowledge of the exhaustion of the contaminants (rojin 漏盡; S. āsrava-kṣaya).

anuttara-bodhi (anoku bodai 阿耨菩提): The unsurpassed awakening of a buddha.

masterless wisdom and spontaneous wisdom.<sup>6</sup> If we are not one with knowledge at birth, although we may encounter a sūtra scroll or a wise friend, we will not be able to hear of the dharma nature, will not be able to verify the dharma nature.

The great way is not the principle that the person who drinks the water knows whether it is cold or hot.<sup>7</sup> All the buddhas, as well as all the bodhisattvas and all living beings, clarify the great way of the nature of all dharmas through the power of knowledge at birth. To clarify the great way of the dharma nature through following a sūtra scroll or following a wise friend is to clarify the dharma nature oneself. The sūtra scroll is the dharma nature, is the self; the wise friend is the dharma nature, is the self. The dharma nature is the wise friend; the dharma nature is the self. Because it is the self of the dharma nature, it is not the self falsely reckoned by the other paths and the minions of Māra.<sup>8</sup> In the dharma nature, there are no other paths or minions of Māra; there is only having some gruel, having some rice, making some tea.<sup>9</sup>

しかあるに、三二十年の久學と自稱するもの、法性の談を見聞するとき、茫然のなかに一生を蹉過す。飽叢林と自稱して、曲木の床にのぼるもの、法性の聲をきき、法性の色をみるに、身心依正、よのつねに紛然の窟坑に昇降するのみなり。そのていたらくは、いま見聞する三界十方撲落してのち、さらに法性あらはるべし、かの法性は、いまの萬象森羅にあらずと邪計するなり。法性の道理、それかくのごとくなるべからず。この森羅萬象

6 masterless wisdom and spontaneous wisdom (mushi chi jinen chi 無師智・自然智): Wisdom acquired without a teacher and wisdom that arises of its own accord. The juxtaposition of these two here probably reflects a fourfold list of wisdoms found in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:13b25-26): “knowledge of everything, buddha knowledge, spontaneous knowledge, and knowledge without a teacher” (issai chi butchi jinen chi mushi chi 一切智佛智自然智無師智).

7 the person who drinks the water knows whether it is cold or hot (nyo nin on sui reidan ji chi 如人飲水冷暖自知): A proverb used to express the subjective character of awakening by oneself. Interestingly, in his “Bendōwa” 辨道話, Dōgen uses this proverb to make what seems the opposite point of this sentence:

證の得否は、修せむもののおのづからしらむこと、用水の人の、冷暖をみづからわきまふるがごとし。

Whether or not one has attained verification, those who practice know for themselves, just as people who use water can tell for themselves whether it is cold or hot.

8 the self falsely reckoned by the other paths and the minions of Māra (gedō matō no jake seru jiko 外道・魔黨の邪計せる自己): I.e., false views of the self held by members of other religions and followers of the Deva Māra, the Evil One.

9 having some gruel, having some rice, making some tea (kiSSHuku rai, kippan rai, tencha rai 喫粥來、喫飯來、點茶來): Breakfast, lunch, and tea; i.e., the daily routine of the monastery. Commentators have suggested various sources for these three phrases, given in Chinese, but they do not seem to quote or allude to any particular text.

と法性と、はるかに同・異の論を超越せり、離・即の談を超越せり。過・現・當來にあらず、斷・常にあらず、色・受・想・行・識にあらざるゆえに法性なり。

However, those who claim long study of twenty or thirty years waste their entire lives in bewilderment when they hear talk of the dharma nature. Those who, claiming to be surfeited with monastic life, climb into the bentwood chair — when they hear the sound of the dharma nature or see the form of the dharma nature, the secondary and primary recompense of their bodies and minds typically just go up and down in a pit of rank confusion.<sup>10</sup> In their condition, they falsely reckon that the dharma nature will be manifest after the three realms and ten directions we presently experience are smashed and scattered, and that that dharma nature is not the thicket of myriad forms.<sup>11</sup> The truth of the dharma nature is not like this. The myriad forms of the thicket and the dharma nature far transcend discussions of sameness or difference, far transcend talk of separate or identical. They are not past, present or future; they are not annihilated or permanent; they are not form, sensation, perception, formations, or consciousness.<sup>12</sup> Therefore, they are the dharma nature.

* * * * *

10 Those who, claiming to be surfeited with monastic life, climb into the bentwood chair (hō sōrin to jishō shite, kyokumoku no shō ni noboru mono 飽叢林と自稱して、曲木の床にのぼるもの): I.e., those claiming to be fully trained in the monastery, who ascend to the ceremonial chair of the abbot.

secondary and primary recompense (eshō 依正): A standard Buddhist term for the results of past karma, reflected respectively in the circumstances into which one is born and the mental and physical makeup of the person; see Supplementary Notes. Here, perhaps, simply the person, composed of body and mind.

11 thicket of myriad forms (manzō shinra 萬象森羅): Also read banzō shinra 萬象森羅; a common expression for all things in the universe, based on the image of a dense stand of trees. The following “myriad forms of the thicket” (shinra manzō 森羅萬象) is a common variant with the same sense. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Myriad forms.”

12 annihilated or permanent (danjō 斷常): Two extreme views often criticized in Buddhist literature, with exact meanings varying according to context; often taken as “nihilism or eternalism.” Here, perhaps, an opposition between momentary dharmas and permanent dharma nature.

form, sensation, perception, formations, or consciousness (shiki ju sō gyō shiki 色・受・想・行・識): I.e., the five aggregates (goun 五蘊; S. pañca-skandha) into which the person can be analyzed; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four elements and five aggregates.”

[48:4]

洪州江西馬祖大寂禪師曰、一切衆生、從無量劫來、不出法性三昧、長在法性三昧中、著衣喫飯、言談祇對、六根運用、一切施爲、盡是法性。

Chan Master Daji, Mazu of Jiangsi in Hongzhou said,<sup>13</sup>

All living beings, for innumerable kalpas, have not emerged from the dharma nature samādhi. Long absorbed in the dharma nature samādhi, wearing clothes and having meals, exchanging words, using the six senses, all activities — they are entirely the dharma nature.

[48:5] {2:28}

馬祖道の法性は、法性道法性なり、馬祖と同參す、法性と同參なり。すでに聞著あり、なんぞ道著なからん。法性騎馬祖なり。人喫飯、飯喫人なり。法性よりこのかた、法性三昧をいはず。法性よりのち、法性をいはず、法性よりさき、法性をいはず。法性とならび無量劫は、これ法性三昧なり。法性を無量劫といふ。

The dharma nature spoken of by Mazu is the dharma nature spoken of by the dharma nature. It studies together with Mazu; it studies together with the dharma nature. Since it hears, how could it not but speak?<sup>14</sup> It is the dharma nature riding Mazu.<sup>15</sup> It is the person “having meals”; the meals having the person. Ever since the dharma nature, it “has not emerged from the dharma nature samādhi”; after the dharma nature, it “has not emerged from the dharma nature”; before the dharma nature, it “has not emerged from the dharma nature.”<sup>16</sup> “The dharma nature” together with “innumerable kalpas” — this is “the dharma nature samādhi.” “Dharma nature” is called “innumerable kalpas.”

13 Chan Master Daji, Mazu of Jiangsi in Hongzhou (Kōshū Kōzei Baso Daijaku Zenji 洪州江西馬祖大寂禪師): Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一(709-788). His saying can be found, e.g., at Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄, ZZ.135:652b10-12.

14 Since it hears, how could it not but speak? (sude ni monjaku ari, nanzo dōjaku nakaran すでに聞著あり、なんぞ道著なからん): Taking “the dharma nature” as the grammatical subject. Perhaps alluding to Mazu’s expression “exchanging words” (gon-dan shitai 言談祇對; literally, “talking and answering”) — i.e., having heard Mazu speak of it, the dharma nature naturally responds.

15 It is the dharma nature riding Mazu (hosshō ki Baso nari 法性騎馬祖なり): A pun on Mazu’s sobriquet, “Ancestor Ma” (from his lay surname, Ma 馬, meaning “horse”).

16 Ever since the dharma nature, it “has not emerged from the dharma nature samādhi” (hosshō yori kono kata, hosshō zanmai o idezu 法性よりこのかた、法性三昧をいはず): i.e., as long as there has been a dharma nature, it has been within the dharma nature samādhi. Here and throughout this sentence, again taking “the dharma nature” as the implied grammatical subject.

[48:6]

Thus, where we are just now is the dharma nature; the dharma nature is where we are just now. When we wear clothes and have meals, this is the dharma nature samādhi “wearing clothes and having meals.” It is the realization of the dharma nature of “clothes”; it is the realization of the dharma nature of “meals”; it is the realization of the dharma nature of “having”; it is the realization of the dharma nature of “wearing.” Not “wearing clothes and having meals,” not “exchanging words,” not “using the six senses,” not engaging in “all activities,” is not “the dharma nature samādhi,” it is the dharma nature of not entering.<sup>17</sup>

[48:7]

The present statement was handed down by the buddhas to Buddha Śākyamuni, was directly transmitted by the ancestors down to Mazu. Buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor, offering their hands to transmit it directly, have directly transmitted it to the dharma nature samādhi; buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor, not entering it, make the dharma nature brisk and lively.<sup>18</sup> Although the dharma masters of letters may have the term “dharma nature,” it is not the dharma nature spoken of by Mazu. The strength of living beings who have “not emerged from the dharma nature” to attempt further not to be in the dharma nature, even were it to have some success, would be three or four more pieces of dharma nature.<sup>19</sup> The “exchange of words,” the “use” and

17 the dharma nature of not entering (funyū hosshō 不入法性): A phrase that could also be read “not entering the dharma nature”; a play on Mazu’s saying that living beings “have not emerged from the dharma nature samādhi.”

18 buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor, not entering it, make the dharma nature brisk and lively (butsu butsu soso, funyū ni shite hosshō o kappatsupatsu narashimu 佛佛祖祖、不入にして法性を活鱗鱗ならしむ): Again, playing on Mazu’s “not emerging.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas and ancestors” and “Brisk and lively.”

19 The strength of living beings who have “not emerged from the dharma nature” to attempt further not to be in the dharma nature (fushutsu hosshō no shujō, sara ni hosshō ni arazaran to gi suru chikara 不出法性の衆生、さらに法性にあらざらんと the “activities” that they take not to be the dharma nature — these must be the dharma nature.

The days and months of the “innumerable kalpas” are the passage of the dharma nature; they are the same in the present and future. This thinking that takes the measure of body and mind as the measure of body and mind and thinks that they are far from the dharma nature — this is the dharma nature.<sup>20</sup> This thinking that does not take the measure of body and mind as the measure of body and mind and thinks that it is not the dharma nature — this is the dharma nature. Thinking and not thinking are both the dharma nature. It is followers of the other paths who study that, when we have defined them as “the nature,” water ought not to flow and trees ought to have no thriving and withering.

[48:9] {2:29}

釋迦牟尼佛道、如是相、如是性。

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “Such marks, such natures.”<sup>21</sup>

[48:10]

しかあれば、開華葉落、これ如是性なり。しかあるに、愚人おもはくは、法性界には開華葉落あるべからず。しばらく他人に疑問すべからず、なんぢが疑著を道著に依模すべし。他人の説著のごとく舉して、三復參究すべし、さきより脱出あらん向來の思量、それ邪思量なるにあらず、ただあきらめざるときの思量なり。あきらめんとき、この思量をして失せしむるにあらず。開華葉落、おのれづから開華葉落なり。法性に開華葉落あるべからずと思量せらるる思量、これ法性なり。依模脱落しきたれる思量なり、

20 This thinking that takes the measure of body and mind as the measure of body and mind and thinks that they are far from the dharma nature (shinjin no ryō o shinjin no ryō toshite, hosshō ni tōshi to shiryō suru kono shiryō 身心の量を身心の量として、法性にとほしと思量するこの思量): I.e., the understanding that considers the body and mind as having a measurable extent, in contrast to the “immeasurable” dharma nature. The translation loses the play on “measure” (ryō 量) in “thinking” (shiryō 思量). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Body and mind.”

このゆえに如法性の思量なり。思量法性の渾思量、かくのごとくの面目なり。

Thus, the opening of flowers and falling of leaves — this is “such natures.” Still, fools think that, in the realm of the dharma nature, there should be no opening of flowers or falling of leaves. For a while, without questioning others, you should mold your doubt as a saying: you should take it up as you would the speech of another and investigate it thrice over.<sup>22</sup> Your previous thinking, from which you will already have escaped — that is not false thinking: it is just the thinking of a time before you have clarified [the dharma nature].<sup>23</sup> When you clarify it, it is not that this thinking is eliminated: the opening of flowers and falling of leaves are in themselves the opening of flowers and falling of leaves.<sup>24</sup> The thinking that thinks that there should be no opening of flowers and falling of leaves in the dharma nature — this is the dharma nature. It is thinking that has sloughed off the mold; for this reason, it is the thinking of such a dharma nature.<sup>25</sup> All thinking of the dharma nature of thinking is such a face.

22 For a while, without questioning others, you should mold your doubt as a saying (shibaraku tanin ni gimon su bekarazu, nanji ga gijaku o dōjaku ni emo su beshi しばらく他人に疑問すべからず、なんぢが疑著を道著に依模すべし): Directly admonishing the “fools” to question their own doubts. The verbal form emo su 依模す (“to model,” or “to mold”) is unusual and does not occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

23 Your previous thinking, from which you will already have escaped (saki yori dasshutsu aran kōrai no shiryō さきより脱出あらん向來の思量): Presumably, meaning that, by investigating your doubt thrice over, you will be rid of the thinking that gave rise to it. The term dasshutsu 脱出 (“escape”) is not found in the Shōbōgenzō outside its two occurrences in this chapter.

24 the opening of flowers and falling of leaves are in themselves the opening of flowers and falling of leaves (kaike yōraku, onorezukara kaike yōraku nari 開華葉落、おのれづから開華葉落なり): Presumably meaning that the opening of flowers and falling of leaves can be understood as phenomenal events in their own right, without reference to the dharma nature — hence, the fools’ way of thinking also remains valid alongside the clarified view.

25 thinking that has sloughed off the mold (emo datsuraku shikitareru shiryō 依模脱落しきたれる思量): Perhaps Dōgen’s variant on the expression “escape the mold” (emo dasshutsu 依模脱出) (see, e.g., Biyan lu 碧巖錄, T.2003:48:147a27). For the use of “slough off” (datsuraku 脱落), see Supplementary Notes.

thinking of such a dharma nature (nyo hosshō no shiryō 如法性の思量): Or, perhaps, “thinking of the dharma nature as such.” Dōgen seems to be suggesting a threefold movement here: from “the fool’s” thinking that the dharma nature is free from phenomenal change, to the higher thinking that phenomenal change is also the dharma nature, to “thinking of the dharma nature,” in which the two models (“molds”) have been “sloughed off.”

Mazu's words, "they are entirely the dharma nature," are truly words of eight or nine tenths, but there is much that Mazu has not yet said. For example, he does not say, "All dharma natures have not emerged from the dharma nature." He does not say, "All dharma natures are entirely the dharma nature." He does not say, "All living beings have not emerged from living beings." He does not say, "All living beings are a small part of the dharma nature." He does not say, "All living beings are a small part of all living beings." He does not say, "All dharma natures are half of living beings." He does not say, "Half a living being is half a dharma nature." He does not say, "No living beings are the dharma nature."<sup>26</sup> He does not say, "The dharma nature is not living beings." He does not say, "The dharma nature escapes from the dharma nature." He does not say, "Living beings slough off living beings." He just informs us that living beings have not emerged from the dharma nature samādhi. He does not say that the dharma nature cannot emerge from the living being samādhi; he has no saying that the dharma nature samādhi emerges from and enters into the living being samādhi. Much less do we hear of the dharma nature attaining buddhahood, or hear of living beings verifying the dharma nature, or hear of the dharma nature verifying the dharma nature. He has no saying that the insentient have not emerged from the dharma nature.

26 "No living beings are the dharma nature" (mushujō ze hosshō 無衆生是法性): Or, perhaps, "non-living beings are the dharma nature."

[48:12] {2:30}

しばらく馬祖にとふべし、なにをよんでか衆生とする。もし法性をよんで衆生とせば、是什麼物恁麼來なり、もし衆生をよんで衆生とせば、説似一物即不中なり。速道速道。

Now, we should ask Mazu,

What are you calling “sentient beings”? If you are calling the dharma nature “sentient beings,” it is, “what thing is it that comes like this?” If you are calling sentient beings “sentient beings,” it is, “to say it’s like any thing would miss the mark.”<sup>27</sup> Speak! Speak!

INTRODUCTION

According to its colophon, this work was produced at Kippōji, in Echizen, during the first year of the Kangen era. Since Dōgen was still living in Heiankyō until August 3 of that year, we can assume that the “Darani” essay was written sometime between August 1243 and 9 February 1244 (the last day of Kangen 1). The work represents number 49 in both the seventy-five and sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō compilations, and number 55 in the Honzan edition.

The title of the essay refers to the incantations, spells, magical formulae, and the like, common throughout the Buddhist world and especially in the esoteric Buddhism of Dōgen’s world. Surprisingly, however, for an author with such profound interest in language, Dōgen virtually ignores the obvious sense of dhāraṇī as sacred speech and instead interprets the term as religious action — especially the actions of attending, greeting, paying obeisance, and making offerings to one’s teacher. Indeed, the bulk of the essay is devoted to instruction in the proper procedure for exchanging greetings with the master. It is from the practice of this dhāraṇī, Dōgen concludes, that all the buddhas and ancestors have developed the aspiration for bodhi, trained themselves, attained awakening, and taught the dharma.

In those whose eye of study is clear, the true dharma eye is clear. Since the true dharma eye is clear, they are able to clarify the eye of study. The direct transmission of this pivot is the power that derives from attending great wise friends.<sup>1</sup> This is the great cause; this is the great dhāraṇī.<sup>2</sup> Great wise friends are buddhas and ancestors; we should always devotedly serve at their towel and flask.<sup>3</sup>

1 The direct transmission of this pivot is the power that derives from attending great wise friends (kono kanrei o shōden suru koto, hitsunen toshite dai zenchishiki ni bugon suru chikara nari この關楯を正傳すること、必然として大善知識に奉觀するちからなり): Probably meaning something like, “what enables this crucial clarification is one’s attendance on a teacher.” The term kanrei 關楯 (more often written kanreisu 關掇子) refers to the fittings at the top and bottom of a door on which it swivels; used, somewhat as English uses “hinge,” for a crucial point. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Pivot.” A “wise friend” (zenchishiki 善知識) is a spiritual mentor.

2 This is the great cause; this is the great *dhāraṇī (kore dai innen nari, kore dai darani nari これ大因縁なり、これ大陀羅尼なり): The antecedents of the two pronouns kore これ (“this”) here are uncertain: they may refer to the “great wise friend” or to “the power that derives from attending” the wise friend. It may also be that the two pronouns have different antecedents: the first referring to the “wise friend”; the second, to the “power.” The wise friend is sometimes called “the great cause” of spiritual development; see e.g., the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:60c9-10):

善知識者は大因縁。所謂化導令得見佛、發阿耨多羅三藐三菩提心。

The wise friend is the great cause; for they guide one and enable one to see the buddha and bring forth the thought of anuttara-samyak-sambodhi.

3 devotedly serve at their towel and flask (kinbyō ni gonkaku su 巾瓶に勤恪す): I.e., “closely attend upon”; “towel and flask” (kinbyō 巾瓶) is a reference to the cloth and water bottle of the monk; by extension, a monk’s personal attendants. Dōgen is here no doubt hinting at the stories he will allude to in the following section.

[49:2]

しかあればすなはち、擎茶來・點茶來、心要現成せり、神通現成せり。盥水來・瀉水來、不動著境なり、下面了知なり。佛祖の心要を參學するのみにあらず、心要裏の一兩位の佛祖に相逢するなり。佛祖の神通を受用するのみにあらず、神通裏の七八員の佛祖をえたるなり。これによりて、あらゆる佛祖の神通は、この一束に究盡せり、あらゆる佛祖の心要は、この一拈に究盡せり。このゆえに、佛祖を奉觀するに、天華天香をもてする、不是にあらざれども、三昧陀羅尼を拈じて奉觀供養する、これ佛祖の兒孫なり。

This being the case, bringing the tea, making the tea — the essence of mind appeared, the spiritual powers appeared; bringing the basin of water and pouring the water, he did not move the object, he knew about it from down there.<sup>4</sup> These are not just studying the essence of the mind

4 bringing the tea, making the tea (kei cha rai ten cha rai 擎茶來・點茶來): Allusion to two stories involving monks serving their masters. The first concerns the Tang-dynasty figure Longtan Chongxin 龍潭崇信 (dates unknown) and his master Tianhuang Daowu 天皇道悟 (748-807) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:313b19-22):

一日問曰、某自到來不蒙指示心要。悟曰、自汝到來吾未嘗不指汝心要。師曰、何處指示。悟曰、汝擎茶來吾爲汝接。汝行食來吾爲汝受。汝和南時吾便低首。何處不指示心要。

One day, [Chontan] asked, “Since I arrived, I haven’t been instructed on the essence of mind.”

Wu said, “Since you arrived, I’ve never failed to show you the essence of mind.”

The Master said, “Where did you instruct me?”

Wu said, “You brought me tea, and I drank it for you. You served me food, and I accepted it for you. When you paid your respects to me, I bowed my head. Where did I not instruct you on the essence of mind?”

The second story alluded to here involves Weishan Lingyu 潯山靈祐 (771-853) and his disciples Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂 (807-883) and Xiangyan Zhixian 香嚴智閑 (d. 898) (e.g., at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:265c16-21). Dōgen offers a Japanese translation of and commentary on the story in his “Shōbōgenzō jinzū” 正法眼藏神通; he records a Chinese version in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:158, case 61:

大潯一日臥次、仰山來。師乃轉面向壁臥。仰曰、某甲是和尚弟子、不用形迹。師作起勢。仰便出。師召曰、寂子。仰迴頭。師云、聽老僧說箇夢。仰低頭作聽勢。師曰、爲我原看。仰取一盆水、一條手巾來。師遂洗面了纔坐、香嚴入來。師云、我適來與寂子作一上神通。不同小小。嚴曰、某甲在下面了了得知。師曰、子試道看。香嚴乃點一椀茶來。師歎曰、二子神通智慧、過於驚子・目連。

One day, when Dawei [i.e., Weishan] was lying down, Yangshan came to him. The Master [Dawei] turned and lay facing the wall.

Yang said, “I’m the Reverend’s disciple; no need for appearances.”

The Master went to get up. As Yang was about to leave, the Master called to him, saying, “Huiji.”

Yang turned his head. The Master said, “Listen while this old monk tells you of his dream.”

Yang lowered his head as if to listen. The Master said, “Try interpreting it for me.”

Yang brought him a basin of water and a hand towel. Dawei washed his face. As the of the buddhas and ancestors; they are encountering one or two buddhas and ancestors within the essence of mind. They are not just enjoying the spiritual powers of the buddhas and ancestors; they are getting seven or eight buddhas and ancestors within the spiritual powers. As a result, all the spiritual powers of the buddhas and ancestors are exhaustively investigated in this one bundle; all the essence of mind of the buddhas and ancestors is exhaustively investigated in this one pinch. Therefore, when attending the buddhas and ancestors, while it is not wrong to do so with heavenly flowers and heavenly incense, those who attend and make offerings with samādhi dhāraṇī are the descendants of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>5</sup>

いはゆる大陀羅尼は、人事、これなり、人事は大陀羅尼なるがゆえに、人事の現成に相逢するなり。人事の言は、震旦の言音を依模して、世諦に流通せることひさしといふとも、梵天より相傳せず、西天より相傳せず、佛祖より正傳せり。これ聲色の境界にあらざるなり、威音王佛の前後を論ずることなかれ。

Master finished washing his face and sat down, Xiangyan came in.

The Master said, “Master Ji and I just did one surpassing spiritual power. It wasn’t like the little stuff.”

Yan said, “I was down there; I know all about it.”

The Master said, “Try saying something.”

Xiangyan went and made a bowl of tea.

The Master sighed, saying, “The spiritual power and wisdom of these two masters exceeds that of Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana.”

bringing the basin of water and pouring the water (kan sui rai, cha sui rai 盥水來、瀉水來): Allusion to Yangshan’s act of bringing the basin for Weishan in the story above, as well as, perhaps, to a third story, involving Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-835) and Deng Yinfeng 鄧隱峰 (dates unknown), that Dōgen quotes in the “Shōbōgenzō ō saku sendaba” 正法眼藏王索仙陀婆. Here is the version in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:160, case 64):

南泉一日見鄧隱峰來、遂指淨瓶曰、淨瓶是境、瓶中有水。不得動著境、與老僧將水來。峰遂將瓶向南泉面前瀉。南泉即休。

One day, when Nanquan saw Deng Yinfeng approaching, he pointed at a water flask and said, “The flask is an object; inside the flask, there is water. Without moving the object, bring this old monk the water.”

Feng brought the bottle in front of Nanquan and poured out the water. Nanquan desisted.

5 samādhi dhāraṇī (zanmai darani 三昧陀羅尼): It is unclear whether Dōgen wants us to read these two terms in conjunction, or as a tatpurusha, variously interpreted as “dhāraṇī that is a samādhi,” “dhāraṇī in a state of samādhi,” “dhāraṇī for entering (or maintaining) samādhi,” etc. The expression, fairly common in Buddhist literature, occurs elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō only in the “Den’e” 傳衣 chapter. The virtue of offering dhāraṇī to the buddhas and ancestors may reflect the “Dhāraṇī” chapter of the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:58b8ff), in which various beings offer dhāraṇī to teachers of the sūtra.

“The great dhāraṇī” is salutation.<sup>6</sup> Because salutations are the great dhāraṇī, one encounters it in the occurrence of salutations. Although the word ninji, modeled on the pronunciation of Cīnasthāna, has long been current in the secular world, it was not passed down from the heaven of Brahmā; it was not passed down from Sindh in the West: it was directly transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>7</sup> It is not in the realm of sight or sound; do not discuss it as before or after Buddha King Majestic Voice.<sup>8</sup>

その人事は、焼香禮拜なり。あるいは出家の本師、あるいは傳法の本師あり。傳法の本師すなはち出家の本師なるもあり。これらの本師にかならず依止奉観する、これ咨參の陀羅尼なり。いはゆる、時時をすごさず參侍すべし。

These salutations are burning incense and paying obeisance. There are the original masters with whom we leave home, or the original masters who transmit the dharma to us; there are also original masters who transmit the dharma to us that are themselves the original master with whom we leave home. Always to rely on and attend these original masters is the dhāraṇī of consulting them. In a word, we should train under them without letting a moment slip by.

6 salutation (ninji 人事): Here understood as the greetings exchanged between monks.

7 pronunciation of Cīnasthāna (Shintan no gon'on 震旦の言音): I.e., a Chinese word; Dōgen uses a transliteration of a Sanskrit name for China.

heaven of Brahmā (bonten 梵天); Sindh in the West (Saiten 西天): The former term refers to the heaven of the first dhyāna in the realm of form, ruled over by the god Brahmā; the translation of the latter term, used in reference to India, masks Dōgen's play here on the glyph ten 天 (“heaven”) used in the transliteration of the Sanskrit Sindhu (Tenjiku 天竺).

8 before or after Buddha King Majestic Voice (Jon'ō butsu no zengo 威音王佛の前後): From a passage in the Liuzu danjing 六祖壇經, in which the necessity of having one's awakening approved by a Zen master is said to be different “before King Majestic Voice” and “after King Majestic Voice”; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before King Majestic Voice.”

At the opening and close of the retreat, at winter solstice, and on the first of the month and mid-month, we invariably offer incense and pay obeisance.<sup>9</sup> In regard to the procedure, the time is set either before the gruel or following the gruel.<sup>10</sup> Properly attired, we call at the master's hall. "Properly attired" means that we call wearing the kāśāya, carrying the sitting cloth, properly wearing shoes and socks, and bringing a piece of aloes wood or jian incense or the like.<sup>11</sup> Upon arriving before the master, we bow in greeting.<sup>12</sup>

The attendant monk then prepares the censer and places a candle. If the master is already seated in his chair, we should light the incense straightaway. If the master is behind the curtain, we should light the incense straightaway; if the master is lying down or eating, at such times

9 opening and close of the retreat (ango no hajime owari 安居のはじめ・をはり): Dates of the summer retreat vary; a common practice put it from the fifteenth of the fourth month through the fifteenth of the seventh month.

10 either before the gruel or following the gruel (arui wa shuku zen, arui wa shuku ha あるいは粥前、あるいは粥罷): i.e., either before or after the monks' morning meal.

11 sitting cloth (zagu 坐具): The cloth on which the monk performs his prostrations. piece of aloes wood or jian incense or the like (ippen no jin senkō tō 一片の沈・箋香等): The exact referent of the term senkō 箋香 here is unclear. While in some contexts it may mean simply "stick incense," here the glyph jian 箋 more likely refers to a particular substance. It is identified in one Song-dynasty source (Fan Chengda's 范成大 Guihai yuheng zhi 桂海虞衡志, Zhi xiang 志香, KR.2k0115.001-10a) as the product of a fragrant tree of Hainan; it is often read as equivalent to zhan 棧 and taken as referring to a fragrant tree said in Chinese sources to grow in northern Vietnam. Dōgen uses these same terms for incense in his "Shōbōgenzō kankin" 正法眼藏看經.

12 bow in greeting (monjin 問訊): Literally, "to make inquiries"; to join the palms and lower the head in an act of greeting.

we should light the incense straightaway. If the master is standing, we should bow in greeting with the words, “Please, Your Reverence, be seated,” or request, “Please, Your Reverence, make yourself comfortable.” There are various phrases for requesting that he be seated. After having requested that the reverend take his seat, we bow in greeting, bending the body according to form.

After completing the bow in greeting, we walk up to the front of the incense stand and place in the censer the stick of incense we have brought. With regard to placing the incense, the incense is sometimes inserted under the lapel of the robe, sometimes carried in the breast of the robe, or sometimes kept inside the sleeves, according to the preference of the individual. After the bow of greeting, we take out the incense. If it is wrapped in paper, we turn our shoulders to the left and remove the paper in which it is wrapped. Holding up the incense with both hands, we place it in the censer. We should stand it up straight; do not let it lean to one side.

After placing the incense, we walk around to the right with hands folded [in front of the chest]; coming in front of him, we face the reverend and bow in greeting, bending the body according to form; after which, we spread the sitting cloth and make prostrations. The prostrations are nine prostrations or twelve prostrations. After we finish the prostrations, we gather up the sitting cloth and bow in greeting. Sometimes, we spread the sitting cloth once, do three prostrations, and offer a seasonal greeting. But for the nine prostrations here, without offering the seasonal greeting, we should just spread [the cloth] and do the three prostrations three times.<sup>13</sup>

These ritual procedures have been handed down from afar from the seven buddhas. Their essential point has been directly transmitted to us; for this reason, we follow these procedures. We never abandon such rituals of obeisance whenever the occasion arises. In addition, we pay obeisance whenever we receive the benefits of the dharma; and we pay obeisance when we request benefits on a case.<sup>14</sup> In the past, when the Second Ancestor expressed what he had seen to the First Ancestor, he 13 we should just spread [the cloth] and do the three prostrations three times (tada itten sanpai o sando aru beki nari ただ一展三拜を三度あるべきなり): It is not clear from this whether one is to repeat the spreading of the cloth for each of the three sets of three bows.

14 receive the benefits of the dharma (hōyaku o kōburu 法益をかうぶる); request benefits on a case (innen o shineki sen to suru 因縁を請益せんとする): I.e., when we receive a teaching and when we seek a teaching on some edifying example in the literature.

paid obeisance by three prostrations — such is [an example of] this.<sup>15</sup> We do three prostrations when the news of the treasury of the true dharma eye is proclaimed.<sup>16</sup>

しるべし、禮拜は正法眼藏なり。正法眼藏は大陀羅尼なり。請益のときの拜は、近來おほく頓一拜をもちいる、古儀は三拜なり。法益の謝拜、かならずしも九拜・十二拜にあらず、あるいは三拜、あるいは觸禮一拜なり、あるいは六拜あり。ともにこれ稽首拜なり。西天にはこれらを、最上禮拜となづく。あるいは六拜あり、頭をもて地をたたく。いはく、額をもて地にあててうつなり、血のいづるまでもす。これにも展坐具せるなり。一拜・三拜・六拜、ともに額をもて地をたたくなり。あるいはこれを頓首拜となづく。世俗にもこの拜あるなり、世俗には九品の拜あり。法益のとき、また不住拜あり。いはゆる、禮拜してやまざるなり、百千拜までもいたるべし。ともにこれら、佛祖の會にもちいきたれる拜なり。

We should recognize that paying obeisance is the treasury of the true dharma eye. The treasury of the true dharma eye is the great dhāraṇī. For the prostrations when requesting benefits, recently many have used a single prostration with head touching the ground; the old form is three prostrations. For prostration in gratitude for the benefits of the dharma, it is not necessarily nine prostrations or twelve prostrations; it is sometimes three prostrations or a single abbreviated prostration; or there are six prostrations.<sup>17</sup> All of these are prostrations with head to the ground. In Sindh in the West, these are called “the highest obeisance.”<sup>18</sup> In the six prostrations, we strike the head on the ground; that is, we hit the ground with the forehead, even drawing blood. In this case, too, we spread the 15 when the Second Ancestor expressed what he had seen to the First Ancestor (niso, sono kami kenjo o shoso ni tatematsurishi toki 二祖、そのかみ見處を初祖にたてまつりしとき): Reference to the famous story in which Huike 慧可 (who would become the Second Ancestor) expressed his understanding to Bodhidharma simply by bowing. Dōgen’s version of the story in the “Shōbōgenzō kattō” 正法眼藏葛藤 has Huike making three prostrations, but his version in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:230, case 201), like that in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:219b27-c5) on which it is based, says only that he “bowed” (raihai 禮拜).

16 when the news of the treasury of the true dharma eye is proclaimed (shōbōgenzō no shōsoku o kaen suru ni 正法眼藏の消息を開演するに): Presumably, on the occasion of dharma talks, though it is unclear here whether the bows are to be done by the speaker, the audience, or both. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Treasury of the true dharma eye.”

17 abbreviated prostration (sokurei 觸禮): A form of prostration in which the sitting cloth is not opened out.

18 In Sindh in the West, these are called “the highest obeisance” (Saiten ni wa korera o, saijō raihāi to nazuku 西天にはこれらを、最上禮拜となづく): The expression saijō raihāi 最上禮拜 is not attested in the Chinese canon, nor is it known what source Dōgen used for this claim.

sitting cloth. Whether in one, three, or six prostrations, we touch the ground with the forehead; this is sometimes called “prostration knocking the head.” This prostration is also found in the secular world; in the secular world, there are nine grades of prostration.<sup>19</sup> Again, there is the continuous prostration when we receive the benefits of the dharma: that is, we pay obeisance without stopping, even up to a hundred thousand prostrations. All of these are prostrations that have been performed in the assemblies of the buddhas and ancestors.

おほよそこれらの拜、ただ和尚の指揮をまぼりて、その拜を如法にすべし。おほよそ禮拜の住世せるとき、佛法住世す。禮拜、もしかくれぬれば、佛法、滅するなり。

In general, we should perform these prostrations according to form, following the guidance of the teacher. In sum, when obeisance is present in the world, the buddha dharma is present in the world; when obeisance disappears, the buddha dharma is extinguished.

In paying obeisance to the original masters who transmitted the dharma to us, we make prostrations without choosing the time or considering the place. We may prostrate ourselves even when they are lying down or eating; we may prostrate ourselves even when they are defecating or urinating. We may pay obeisance from a distance, separated by fences and walls, or separated by mountains and rivers. We may pay obeisance separated by kalpas; we may pay obeisance separated by birth and death, coming and going; we may pay obeisance separated by bodhi and nirvāṇa.

弟子小師、しかのごとく種種の拜をいたすといへども、本師和尚は答拜せず、ただ合掌するのみなり。おのづから奇拜をもちいることあれども、おぼろげの儀にはもちいず。かくのごとくの禮拜のとき、かならず北面禮拜するなり。本師和尚は、南面して端坐せり。弟子は本師和尚の面前に立地して、おもてを北にして、本師にむかひて本師を拜するなり、これ本儀な

19 in the secular world, there are nine grades of prostration (sezoku ni wa kuho no hai ari 世俗には九品の拜あり): A teaching of the Zhou li 周禮 (Chunguan zongling 春官宗令, KR.Id0002.006.33b).

り。みづから歸依の正信おこれば、かならず北面の禮拜、そのはじめにおこなはると正傳せり。

Although disciples perform various prostrations such as these, the reverend original masters do not return the prostration but simply joins their palms. While there may be times when they use the odd prostration, they do not use it in the normal forms.<sup>20</sup> When paying obeisance in this way, we always pay obeisance facing north; the reverend original masters are seated erect facing south. The disciple stands before the reverend original master and, facing north toward the original master, pays obeisance to the original master — this is the fundamental form. It has been directly transmitted that, when we develop the right faith to take refuge, obeisance facing north is invariably the first thing to do.

このゆえに、世尊の在日に、歸佛の人衆・天衆・龍衆、ともに北面にして世尊を恭敬禮拜したてまつる。最初に、阿若憍陳如<亦名拘隣>・阿濕卑<亦名阿陞>・摩訶摩南<亦名摩訶拘利>・波提<亦曰跋提>・婆敷<亦名十力迦葉>、この五人のともがら、如來成道ののち、おぼえずして起立し、如來にむかひたてまつりて、北面の禮拜を供養したてまつる。外道・魔儻、すでに邪をすてて歸佛するときは、必定して自構・他構せざれども、北面禮拜するなり。

For this reason, in the days of the World-Honored One, the humans, devas, and nāgas that took refuge in the Buddha all venerated and paid obeisance to the World-Honored One while facing north. In the beginning, Ājñāta-kaundīya (also called Kurin), Aśvajit (also called Ahei), Mahānāman (also called Makakuri), Bhadrīka (also called Badai), and Bāṣpa (also called Jūriki Kashō) — this group of five, following the Tathāgata's attainment of the way, spontaneously rose and, facing the Tathāgata, offered him obeisance while facing north.<sup>21</sup> When followers of the other paths and the minions of Māra cast aside their false views and took refuge in the Buddha, though induced to do so neither by themselves nor by others, they invariably paid obeisance facing north.

20 odd prostration (kihai 奇拜): A single prostration done by the teacher in response to the prostrations of the disciple. The term originally occurs in the list of nine prostrations in the Zhou li 周禮; the word “odd” (ki 奇) here is said to be used in the sense “extraordinary.”

21 Ājñāta-kaundīya (Anyakyōjinnyo 阿若憍陳如): First member of (a slightly odd version of) the traditional list of the Buddha's first five disciples (followed in each case by a variant version of the name). While it is commonly held that, upon encountering the Buddha after his awakening, they spontaneously paid him respects, the source for Dōgen's claim that they did so while facing north is unknown.

それよりこのかた、西天二十八代、東土の諸代の祖師の會にきたりて正法に歸する、みなおのづから北面の禮拜するなり。これ正法の肯然なり、師弟の構意にあらず。これすなはち大陀羅尼なり、有大陀羅尼、名爲圓覺、有大陀羅尼、名爲人事、有大陀羅尼、現成禮拜なり、有大陀羅尼、其名袈裟なり、有大陀羅尼、是名正法眼藏なり。これを誦呪して盡大地を鎮護したる、盡方界を鎮成したる、盡時界を鎮現したる、盡佛界を鎮作したる、庵中・庵外を鎮通したる。大陀羅尼、かくのごとくなると參學究辦すべきなり。一切の陀羅尼は、この陀羅尼を字母とせり。この陀羅尼の眷屬として、一切の陀羅尼は現成せり。一切の佛祖、かならずこの陀羅尼門より發心、辦道、成道、轉法輪あるなり。

Ever since then, all who have come and taken refuge in the true dharma in the communities of the ancestral masters of the twenty-eight generations in Sindh in the West and the generations in the Land of the East have naturally paid obeisance facing north. This is their accord with the true dharma, not the plan of master or disciple. This is precisely the great dhāraṇī. “There is a great dhāraṇī called ‘perfect awakening.’”<sup>22</sup> There is a great dhāraṇī called “salutations”; there is a great dhāraṇī that realizes obeisance. There is a great dhāraṇī whose name is the kāṣāya; there is a great dhāraṇī whose name is the “treasury of the true dharma eye.” By their reciting this spell, all the whole earth has been pacified and protected, the realms in all directions have been pacified and formed, the realms in all times have been pacified and manifested, all the buddha realms have been pacified and created, inside the hut and outside the hut have been pacified and penetrated.<sup>23</sup> We should study and thoroughly examine that the great dhāraṇī is like this. All the dhāraṇī take this dhāraṇī as their syllabary.<sup>24</sup> As the retinue of this dhāraṇī, all the dhāraṇī have appeared. It is from this dhāraṇī gate that all the buddhas and ancestors

しかあれば、すでに佛祖の兒孫なり、この陀羅尼を審細に參究すべきなり。おほよそ爲釋迦牟尼佛衣之所覆は、爲十方一切佛祖衣之所覆なり。爲釋迦牟尼佛衣之所覆は、爲袈裟之所覆なり。袈裟は標幟の佛衆なり。この辦肯、難値難遇なり。まれに邊地の人身をうけて、愚蒙なりといへども、宿殖陀羅尼の善根力現成して、釋迦牟尼佛の法にむまれあふ。たとひ百草のほとりに自成・他成の諸佛祖を禮拜すとも、これ釋迦牟尼佛の成道なり、釋迦牟尼佛の辦道功夫なり、陀羅尼神變なり。たとひ無量億千劫に古佛・今佛を禮拜する、これ釋迦牟尼佛之所時節なり。ひとたび袈裟を身體におほふは、すでにこれ得釋迦牟尼佛之身肉手足・頭目髓腦・光明轉法輪なり。かくのごとくして袈裟を著するなり。これは現成著袈裟功德なり。これを保任し、これを好樂して、ときとともに守護し搭著して、禮拜供養釋迦牟尼佛したてまつるなり。このなかに、いく三阿僧祇劫の修行をも辦肯究盡するなり。

This being the case, since we are the descendants of the buddhas and ancestors, we should investigate this dhāraṇī in detail. Generally put, to be “covered by the robe of Buddha Śākyamuni” is to be covered by the robe of all the buddhas and ancestors in the ten directions.<sup>25</sup> To be “covered by the robe of Buddha Śākyamuni” is to be covered by the kāṣāya. The kāṣāya is the buddha assembly epitomized. The confirmation of this is hard to encounter, hard to meet.<sup>26</sup> It is rare that, although we are stupid and have received a human body in a peripheral land, the power of the good roots of dhāraṇī planted in former lives has been realized, and we have been born at the time of the dharma of Buddha Śākyamuni. Though we pay obeisance to the self-attained or other-attained buddhas and ancestors wherever the hundred grasses grow, this is the attainment of the way by Buddha Śākyamuni; it is the concentrated effort in pursuit of the way by Buddha Śākyamuni; it is the spiritual transformations of 25 “covered by the robe of Buddha Śākyamuni” (i Shakamuni butsu e shi shofu 爲釋迦牟尼佛衣之所覆): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:62a2-3), in reference to one who keeps the Lotus Sūtra:

當知是人佛讚善哉。當知是人爲釋迦牟尼佛手摩其頭。當知是人爲釋迦牟尼佛衣之所覆。

Know that this person will be praised by the Buddha as excellent. Know that this person will be patted on the head by Buddha Śākyamuni. Know that this person will be covered by the robe of Buddha Śākyamuni.

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Robe of the Tathāgata.” This sentence is missing from the Ryūmonji 龍門寺 and some other early MSS.

the dhāraṇī.<sup>27</sup> Though we pay obeisance to past buddhas and present buddhas for incalculable millions of thousands of kalpas, this is the time of being “covered by the robe of Buddha Śākyamuni.”<sup>28</sup> To cover the body once with the kāśāya is surely to get Buddha Śākyamuni’s body and flesh, hands and feet, head and eyes, marrow and brain, radiance and turning of the wheel of the dharma. This is the way we wear the kāśāya. This is the merit of wearing the kāśāya made manifest. Maintaining it and cherishing it, protecting and wearing it over time, we pay obeisance and make offerings to Buddha Śākyamuni. Herein, we confirm and exhaustively investigate the practice of so many three innumerable kalpas.<sup>29</sup>

To pay obeisance and to make offerings to Buddha Śākyamuni means to pay obeisance and make offerings to the original masters who transmit the dharma to us, to pay obeisance and make offerings to the original masters who tonsured us. This itself is to see Buddha Śākyamuni, to make offerings of the dharma to Buddha Śākyamuni, to make offerings of dhāraṇī to Buddha Śākyamuni.

27 Though we pay obeisance to the self-attained or other-attained buddhas and ancestors wherever the hundred grasses grow (tatoi hyakusō no hotori ni jijō tajō no shobusso o raihai su tomo たとひ百草のほとりに自成・他成の諸佛祖を禮拜すとも): Probably meaning something like, “no matter where we pay obeisance to any of the buddhas and ancestors.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas and ancestors.” “The hundred grasses” (hyakusō 百草) is a standard metaphor for “all phenomena.” The sense of the unusual expression “self-attained or other-attained” (jijō tajō 自成他成) is uncertain; perhaps, “attained by oneself or with the aid of another.”

28 the time of being “covered by the robe of Buddha Śākyamuni” (Shakamuni butsu shi sho jisetsu 釋迦牟尼佛之所時節): Supplying the glyphs e 衣 and fu 覆 missing in the Ryūmonji 龍門寺 MS.

INTRODUCTION

This work represents number 50 in the seventy-five-chapter compilation of the Shōbōgenzō and number 56 in the Honzan edition. According to its colophon, it was presented three times at three different monasteries: first, in the tenth month of 1239, at Kōshōji, near the capital; then, in the tenth month of 1243, at Kippōji, in Echizen; and, finally, in the first month of 1250, at Eihei-ji. The work is also extant in a separate, rather different version, preserved as number 50 in the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō and translated here below as Variant Text 4.

The three dates span almost the entire history of the composition of the Shōbōgenzō. The first corresponds exactly to the date given for the “Senjō” 洗淨 chapter, another early work on monastic hygiene, while the third date comes at the conclusion of a series of works on monastic rules that occupied Dōgen toward the end of his life.

As its title indicates, this work concerns the procedures for face-washing in the monastery. Less obvious from the title is a lengthy section on brushing the teeth and scraping the tongue with the traditional willow twig tooth stick. Interestingly, for the historian of material culture, Dōgen reports that, while the monks of Song-dynasty China retained the ritual of face-washing, his Japanese compatriots had lost it; whereas, while the Japanese monks still used the tooth stick described in the Indian vinaya, the Chinese monks had abandoned it in favor of a horsehair tooth brush. Since he sees both face-washing and use of the willow twig as “the true dharma of the old buddhas,” Dōgen takes pride here in the fact that both will be practiced at his monastery.

Washing the Face

[50:1] {2:37}

法華經云、以油塗身、澡浴塵穢、著新淨衣、内外俱淨。

In the Lotus Sūtra, it is said,<sup>1</sup>

*Anointing the body with oil,
He bathes away the dirt;
Donning a new clean robe,
Both inside and out are pure.*

[50:2]

いはゆるこの法は、如來、まさに法華會上にして、四安樂行の行人のために、ときましますところなり。餘會の説にひとしからず、餘經におなじかるべからず。しかあるに、身心を澡浴して香油をぬり、塵穢をのぞくは、第一の佛法なり。新淨の衣を著する、ひとつの淨法なり。塵穢を澡浴し、香油を身に塗するに、内外俱淨なるべし。内外俱淨なるとき、依報・正報、清淨なり。

The procedure spoken of here is one that was preached by the Tathāgata on the occasion of the Lotus assembly, for the sake of practitioners of the four practices of ease and joy.<sup>2</sup> It is not equivalent to the preachings of other assemblies; it is surely not the same as other sūtras. Thus, bathing body and mind, applying scented oils, and removing the dirt are the primary buddha dharma.<sup>3</sup> To don a new clean robe is one procedure of four practices of ease and joy (shi anraku gyō 四安樂行): A standard list of four types of practice based on the “Sukhavihāra” chapter of the Lotus Sūtra: practices of body (shin 身), speech (ku 口), mind (i 意), and vow (seigan 誓願).

1 Lotus Sūtra (Hokke kyō 法華經): From the “Sukhavihāra” chapter (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:38a9-11); the grammatical subject in the sūtra passage is “the bodhisattva.”

2 Lotus assembly (hokke e 法華會): I.e., the assembly on Vulture Peak before which Buddha Śākyamuni is said to have taught the Lotus Sūtra.

3 bathing body and mind (shinjin o sōyoku shite 身心を澡浴して): Dōgen here shifts the object of the verb “to bathe” (sōyoku 澡浴) in the sūtra verse from the “dirt” (jin'e 塵穢) that is washed away; if we maintain the parallel with the sūtra, his phrase purification. In bathing away the dirt and smearing the body with scented oil, “both inside and out are pure.” When “both inside and out are pure,” secondary and primary recompense are pure.<sup>4</sup>

Nevertheless, stupid people who have not heard the buddha dharma and have not studied the way of the buddhas say that, while bathing may wash the skin of the body a bit, within the body are the five organs and six viscera, and, if we do not bathe each of these, we will not be pure; therefore, we need not necessarily bathe the surface of the body.<sup>5</sup> Those who talk like this do not know, have not heard the buddha dharma; they have not met a true master and are not the descendants of the buddhas and ancestors.

しばらくかくのごとくの邪見のともがらのことばをなげすてて、佛祖の正法を參學すべし。いはゆる諸法の邊際、いまだ決斷せず、諸大の内外、また不可得なり。かるがゆえに、身心の内外、また不可得なり。しかあれども、最後身の菩薩、すでにいまし道場に坐し、成道せんとするとき、まづ袈裟を洗浣し、つぎに身心を澡浴す。これ三世十方の諸佛の威儀なり。最後身の菩薩と餘類と、諸事みなおなじからず。その功德智慧、身心莊嚴、みな最尊最上なり。澡浴・洗浣の法も、またかくのごとくなるべし。いはんや諸人の身心、その邊際、ときにしたがふてことなることあり。いはゆる一坐のとき、三千界みな坐斷せらる。このとき、かくのごとくなりといへども、自・他の測量にあらず、佛法の功德なり。その身心量、また五尺・六尺にあらず、五尺・六尺、さだまれる五尺・六尺にあらざるゆえなり。處在も、此界・他界、盡界・無量盡界等の有邊・無邊にあらず、遮裏は什麼處在、説細説麤のゆえに。心量、また思量・分別のよくしるべきにあらず、不思議・不分別のよくきはむべきにあらず。身心量かくのごとくなるがゆえに、澡浴量もかくのごとし。この量を拈得して修證する、これ佛佛祖祖の護念するところなり。計我をさきとすべからず、計我を實

could be read as the more thought-provoking “bathing away body and mind.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Body and mind.”

4 secondary and primary recompense (ehō shōhō 依報・正報): Standard Buddhist terms for the two aspects of karmic consequences: respectively, the environment, or circumstances, into which one is born; and the psychophysical makeup of the person; see Supplementary Notes. Here, no doubt a gloss on the sūtra’s “inside and out.”

5 five organs and six viscera (gozō roppu 五臓六腑): Two categories of traditional Chinese anatomy. The former refers to the heart, lungs, liver, spleen, and kidneys; the latter, to the large and small intestines, gall bladder, bladder, stomach, and sanjiao 三焦 (the viscera responsible for breathing, digestion, and excretion).

Casting aside the words of those who hold such false views, we should study for a while the true dharma of the buddhas and ancestors. That is, the limit of the dharmas has yet to be determined; the “inside and out” of the elements is also ungraspable.<sup>6</sup> For that reason, the “inside and out” of body and mind is also ungraspable. Nevertheless, bodhisattvas in their last bodies, when they are just about to sit at the place of awakening and attain the way, first wash their kāṣāya and then bathe their bodies and minds.<sup>7</sup> This is the deportment of all buddhas of the three times and ten directions. In all matters, bodhisattvas in their last bodies are not the same as other types: their merit and wisdom, the adornments of their bodies and minds, are all the most honored, the supreme. Their procedures for bathing and washing must also be like this. Not to mention that the limits of people’s bodies and minds differ according to the time. That is, when we sit once, the three chiliocosms are all fully seated.<sup>8</sup> At this time, while this may be so, it is not the calculation of self or other: it is the virtue of the buddha dharma. The dimensions of that body and mind are also not five feet or six feet; for five feet or six feet is not a fixed five

---

6 the limit of the dharmas has yet to be determined (shohō no henzai, imada ketsudan sezu 諸法の邊際、いまだ決斷せず): Variation on a common claim in the Mahāyāna literature that the dharmas (taken either as phenomena or as the teachings) are inexhaustible and their limits ungraspable. The “elements” (shodai 諸大) refers to the four elements (earth, water, fire, and wind) from which the material world is composed; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four elements and five aggregates.”

7 bodhisattvas in their last bodies (saigo shin no bosatsu 最後身の菩薩): I.e., bodhisattvas at the end of their path, when they attain buddhahood. “The place of awakening” (dōjō 道場) refers to the bodhi-maṇḍa, the seat under the bodhi tree where a buddha attains supreme bodhi. The source of the claim that, before they are seated, they do their laundry and take a bath is unknown.

8 when we sit once, the three chiliocosms are all fully seated (ichiza no toki, sanzen kai mina zadan seraruru 一坐のとき、三千界みな坐斷せらるる): Likely meaning that, in seated meditation, the entire universe is sitting with the sitter; presumably given here as an example of the variation in “the limits of people’s bodies and minds.” “The three chiliocosms” (sanzen kai 三千界) is a standard expression for the world system of a buddha. “Firmly seated” is a tentative rendering of zadan 坐斷, a term commonly used in the sense “to hold down” or “to reject,” but regularly interpreted in Sōtō writings as “to sit completely,” “to sit and cut off.”

feet or six feet. Its location, too, is neither the limited nor limitless [places] of this world or other worlds, all the worlds or all the incalculable worlds; for “where are we here, that we’re talking of fine and talking of coarse?”<sup>9</sup> The dimensions of the mind, as well, are not something that can be known by thinking or discrimination, not something that can be investigated by not thinking or not discriminating.<sup>10</sup> Because the dimensions of body and mind are like this, the dimensions of bathing them are also like this. To take up these dimensions and practice and verify them — this is what buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor bear in mind.<sup>11</sup> We should not put the imputed self first; we should not take the imputed self as real.<sup>12</sup>

Thus, in bathing and washing in this way, we exhaustively investigate and purify the dimensions of the body and the dimensions of the mind. Whether they are the four elements, or they are the five aggregates, or they are the undestroyed, when we bathe them, any of them can achieve purity.<sup>13</sup> We should not think merely that this means that they are pure

9 “where are we here, that we’re talking of fine and talking of coarse?” (shari ze jinmo shozai, setsu sai setsu so 遮裏是什麼處在、說細說麤): A fixed expression, variants of which occur several times in the Shōbōgenzō. There are several precedents for the expression in the Chinese Chan literature, one of which, involving Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866) and Zhenzhou Puhua 鎮州普化 (dates unknown) is recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:164, case 96). The force of the question is usually something like, “Where do you think we are, that you can talk about such trivial matters?” But, here, Dōgen seems to be taking seriously the question, “where are we here?”

10 not something that can be known by thinking or discrimination (mata shiryō funbetsu no yoku shiru beki ni arazu また思量・分別のよくしるべきにあらず): A Japanese variation on a famous line from the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:7a18-20):

我以無數方便種種因緣譬喻言辭演說諸法。是法非思量分別之所能解。

I use innumerable techniques, and various stories, parables, and figures of speech to expound the dharmas. This dharma is not something that can be understood by thinking or discrimination.

11 what buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor bear in mind (butsubutsu soso no gonen suru tokoro 佛佛祖祖の護念するところ): A Japanese variation on the line, often quoted by Dōgen, from the conversation on practice and verification between the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能, and his follower Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “What thing is it that comes like this?”

12 put the imputed self first (kega o saki to su 計我をさきとす): “Imputed self” renders kega 計我, a technical term for the self we imagine ourselves to be; we might also read here “put caring for the self first.”

13 Whether they are the four elements, or they are the five aggregates, or they are the undestroyed (tatoi shidai nari tomo, tatoi goun nari tomo, tatoi fue nari tomo たとひ四大なりとも、たとひ五蘊なりとも、たとひ不壊なりとも): Allusion to a saying on the four elements and five aggregates by the famous Tang-dynasty Chan master Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 (778-897), which Dōgen quotes in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正 only after water has come and washed them. How could water be originally pure or originally impure? Whether it is originally pure or originally impure, we do not say that it makes the place to which it comes pure or impure. It is just that Buddhist procedures have been handed down on using water to wash, using water to bathe, and so on, when maintaining the practice and verification of the buddhas and ancestors. In practicing and verifying in accordance with these, we transcend purity, we pass beyond impurity, we slough off non-purity and non-impurity.

Thus, the dharma of bathing though not yet defiled and bathing when already completely pure has been maintained only in the way of the buddhas and ancestors; it is not something known by followers of other paths. If it were as the stupid people say, then even if we were to grind down the five organs and six viscera to a fine dust, rendering them empty in themselves, and exhausted the waters of the great oceans in washing them, if we did not wash inside the dust, how could they be pure?<sup>14</sup> If we did not wash inside the emptiness, how could we achieve the purification of “inside and out”? The foolish commoners also surely do not know the procedure for bathing emptiness. Taking up emptiness, we bathe emptiness; taking up emptiness, we bathe body and mind. Those who believe in bathing according to proper procedure surely maintain the practice and verification of the buddhas and ancestors.

法眼藏 (DZZ.5:270, case 88) and elsewhere. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four elements and five aggregates.”

14 rendering them empty in themselves (sokukū narashimete 即空ならしめて): Dōgen here plays with the metaphysics of the internal organs. Even if we analyze them into their constituent dharmas and see these dharmas as empty of independent existence, according to the fools’ argument, we would still need to wash inside the dharmas and inside emptiness. He then goes on to say that, in fact, we are bathing emptiness when we bathe the body.

[50:6]

いはゆる、佛佛祖祖、嫡嫡正傳する正法には、澡浴をもちいるに、身心内外、五臓六腑、依正二報、法界虚空の内外中間、たちまちに清淨なり。香華をもちいてきよむるとき、過去・現在・未來、因縁行業、たちまちに清淨なり。

That is, in the true dharma directly transmitted to successor after successor by buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor, when we use bathing, the inside and outside of body and mind, the five organs and six viscera, the twofold recompense of secondary and primary, and the inside, outside, and in-between of the dharma realm and empty space are instantly pure. When we purify using incense and flowers, the deeds that are causes and conditions in past, present, and future are instantly pure.<sup>15</sup>

[50:7] {2:40}

佛言、三沐三薫、身心清淨。

The Buddha said,<sup>16</sup>

Bathing three times, censing three times;

Body and mind are pure.

しかあれば、身をきよめ心をきよむる法は、かならず一沐しては一薫し、かくのごとくあひつらなれて、三沐三薫して、禮佛し轉經し、坐禪し經行するなり。經行、をはりて、さらに端坐坐禪せんとするには、かならず洗足するといふ。足、けがれ觸せるにあらざれども、佛祖の法、それかくのごとし。

Thus, the procedure for purifying the body and purifying the mind is always to bathe once and cense once, continuing this until, “bathing three times, censing three times,” we worship the buddha and turn the sūtras, practice seated meditation and circumambulation. When circumambulation is finished and we are to sit upright in seated meditation, it is said that we always wash our feet. Even if our feet have not touched anything polluted, such are the procedures of the buddhas and ancestors.

15 deeds that are causes and conditions in past, present, and future (kako genzai mirai, innen gyōgō 過去・現在・未來、因縁行業): Perhaps variation on a phrase in the Dazhidu lun 大智度論 (T.1509.25:71c16-17):

知過去因縁行業、是名明。

To know the deeds that are causes and conditions in the past is called “knowledge.”

16 The Buddha (butsu 佛): Source unknown. Although this phrase does occasionally occur in Zen texts, there is no evidence that the practice was ever part of the monk’s bathing ritual; given the occurrence of the phrase in sermons on bathing the Buddha, it may have been part of the ritual of bathing the statue of the baby Buddha on the Buddha’s birthday.

それ三沐三薫すといふは、一沐とは一沐浴なり、通身みな沐浴す。しかうしてのち、つねのごとくして衣裳を著してのち、小爐に名香をたきて、ふところのうち、および袈裟・坐處等に薫ずるなり。しかうしてのち、また沐浴してまた薫ず。かくのごとく三番するなり。これ如法の儀なり。このとき、六根六塵あらたにきたらざれども、清淨の功德ありて現前す、うたがふべきにあらず。三毒四倒いまだのぞこほらざれども、清淨の功德たちまちに現前するは佛法なり。たれか凡慮をもて測度せん、なにびとか凡眼をもて覷見せん。

Regarding “bathing three times and censuring three times,” “bathing once” means one bath, in which the body throughout is bathed. After that, and after putting on our clothes, we light fine incense in a small censer and cense inside our robe lapels, as well as our kāṣāya, sitting place, and so on. After that, we bathe again and cense again, in this way repeating it three times. This is the conduct according to proper procedure. At this time, although the six sense faculties and six sense objects are not renewed, we should not doubt that they have the virtue of purity, which will appear to us. The [teaching] that, even though the three poisons and four inversions are not yet removed, the virtue of purity immediately appears to us is the buddha dharma.<sup>17</sup> Who could fathom this with the thought of the commoner? What person could see it with the eye of the commoner?

For example, when we wash and purify aloes wood incense, we would not break it into pieces and wash it, nor would we grind it into powder and wash it; we purify it by just washing the whole thing. In the buddha dharma, the procedures for washing have, without exception, been established. We wash the body, wash the mind, wash the feet, wash the face, wash the eyes, wash the mouth, wash the places of defecation and urination, wash the hands, wash the bowls, wash the kāṣāya, wash the head. All of these are the true dharma of the buddhas and ancestors of the three times.

17 three poisons and four inversions (sandoku shitō 三毒四倒): The former refers to a standard list of the basic defilements: greed (ton 貪; S. rāga), anger (shin 瞋; S. dveṣa), and delusion (chi 癡; S. moha); the latter, known as the viparyāsa (tendō 顛倒), refers to a standard set of false views regarding permanence (jō 常; S. nitya), pleasure (raku 樂; S. sukha), self (ga 我; S. ātman), and purity (jō 淨; S. śubha).

[50:11] {2:41}

When we seek to make offerings to the buddha, dharma, and saṃgha, in bringing the various incense, we first wash our hands, rinse our mouth, wash our face, and don a clean robe; filling a clean bowl with pure water, we wash and purify the incense. After that, we respectfully offer it to the realm of the buddha, dharma, and saṃgha. We pray: “To the three treasures may we respectfully offer candana incense from the Malaya Mountains, washed in waters of the eight virtues from Lake Anavatapta.”<sup>18</sup>

[50:12]

洗面は、西天竺國よりつたはれて、東震旦國に流布せり。諸部の律にあきらかなりといふとも、なほ佛祖の傳持これ正嫡なるべし。數百歳の佛佛祖祖おこなひきたれるのみにあらず、億千萬劫の前後に流通せり。ただ垢膩をのぞくのみにあらず、佛祖の命脈なり。

Washing the face was handed down from the Land of Sindhu in the West and spread in the Land of Cīnasthāna in the East.<sup>19</sup> While it is clearly stated in the various recensions of the vinaya, what is transmitted and kept by the buddhas and ancestors is surely the correct succession. It has not only been performed for hundreds of years by buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor; it has circulated before and after koṭis of thousands of myriads of kalpas. It is not only to remove grime and grease; it is the vital artery of the buddhas and ancestors.

18 We pray (negawaku wa ねがはくは): The sentence takes the form of a ritual dedication of merit in Japanese.

“candana incense from the Malaya Mountains” (Marisen no sendan kō 摩黎山の梅檀香): Incense made from the famous sandalwood of the Western Ghats in the Malabar region of southwest India. The term mari 摩黎 (or 摩梨), is used for Maraya 摩羅耶, a transliteration of the Sanskrit Malaya (from which, “Malabar”).

19 Land of Sindhu in the West (sai Tenjiku koku 西天竺國); Land of Cīnasthāna in the East (tō Shintan koku 東震旦國): i.e., India and China, respectively.

いはく、もしおもてをあらはざれば、禮をうけ他を禮する、ともに罪あり。自禮禮他、能禮所禮、性空寂なり。性脱落なり。かるがゆえに、かならず洗面すべし。

It is said that, when one does not wash the face, there is an offense both in receiving obeisance and in offering obeisance to another.<sup>20</sup> One's own obeisance and the obeisance of the other — “the one who offers obeisance and the one to whom obeisance is offered — their natures are empty and quiescent”; their natures are sloughed off.<sup>21</sup> Therefore, we should always wash the face.

洗面の時節、あるひは五更、あるひは昧旦、その時節なり。先師の、天童に住せしときは、三更の三點をその時節とせり。裙・褌衫を著し、あるひは直褌を著して、手巾をたづさへて洗面架におもむく。

The time for washing the face may be either the fifth watch or at dawn.<sup>22</sup>

20 when one does not wash the face, there is an offense both in receiving obeisance and in offering obeisance to another (moshi omote o arawazareba, rai o uke ta o rai suru, tomo ni tsumi ari もしおもてをあらはざれば、禮をうけ他を禮する、ともに罪あり): Although given here as if a vinaya infraction, there is no known source for this rule. It may somehow reflect a rather different rule found the Shisong lü 十誦律 (T.1435.23:300a1-2):

自洗面不得作禮。亦不得向洗面者禮。

When washing one's face, do not make obeisance. Also, do not make obeisance to one who is washing his face.

21 One's own obeisance and the obeisance of the other (jirai raita 自禮禮他): The exact sense of this unusual phrase in Chinese is unclear. It might be understood as a restatement of the preceding sentence: “obeisance I receive and obeisance I do,” or of the following sentence: “the self that makes obeisance and the other to whom obeisance is offered.” The form of the phrase suggests a possible play on the ubiquitous expression “self-benefit and benefiting others” (jiri rita 自利利他).

22 fifth watch (gokō 五更): The last of the traditional five, two-hour watches (kō 更) of the night; roughly 4:00-6:00 a.m. (though the exact times, based as they were on the sunset, varied with the season). Here begins Dōgen's concrete instructions on washing the face and brushing the teeth.

When my former master was abbot of Tiantong, he set the time as the third strike of the third watch.<sup>23</sup> We don the skirt and partial robe, or don the long robe, take along a hand towel, and proceed to the face-washing stands.<sup>24</sup>

手巾は一幅の布、ながさ一丈二尺なり。そのいろ、しろかるべからず、しろきは制す。

The hand towel is a single piece of cloth, one jō two shaku in length.<sup>25</sup> Its color must not be white; white is forbidden.

{2:42}

[50:16]

三千威儀經云、當用手巾有五事。一者當拭上下頭。二者當用一頭拭手、以一頭拭面。三者不得持拭鼻。四者以用拭膩汚、當即浣之。五者不得拭身體、若澡浴、各當自有巾。

In the Sūtra of the Three Thousand Rules of Deportment, it is said,<sup>26</sup>

There are five points regarding use of the hand cloth. First, wipe using the top and bottom ends. Second, use one end to wipe the hands and the other end to wipe the face. Third, do not use to wipe the nose. Fourth, when soiled from wiping grease, wash immediately. Fifth, do not use to wipe the body; when bathing, each should have his own [bath] towel.

まさに手巾を持せんに、かくのごとく護持すべし。手巾をふたつにをりて、左のひぢにあたりて、そのうへにかく。手巾は、半分はおもてをのごひ、半分にては手をのごふ。はなをのごふべからず、とは、はなのうち、および鼻涕をのごはず。わき・せなか・はら・へそ・もも・はぎを、手巾してのごふべからず。垢膩にけがれたらんに、洗浣すべし。ぬれ、しめられんは、火に烘じ、日にほして、かわかすべし。手巾をもて、沐浴のとき、もちいるべからず。

23 third strike of the third watch (sankō no santen 三更の三點): Roughly 1:30 a.m. Each two-hour watch was divided into five “strikes” (ten 點).

24 skirt and partial robe (kun henzan 裙・褌衫; also read hensan); long robe (jiki-totsu 直綴): The former pair is the set of robes for the lower and upper body respectively; the latter (literally, “sewn directly”) is the full robe, in which lower and upper robes are sewn together to form a single garment.

25 one jō two shaku in length (nagasa ichijō nishaku ながさ一丈二尺): Roughly twelve feet.

26 Sūtra of the Three Thousand Rules of Deportment (Sanzen iigi kyō 三千威儀經): A text of regulations traditionally regarded as a translation by the second-century figure An Shigao 安世高; the passage quoted here occurs at Sanqian weiyi jing 三千威儀經, T.1470.24:921c19-22.

In carrying the hand cloth, we should take care of it in this way. Fold the cloth in two and hang it over the left arm by the elbow. We use half of the cloth to wipe the face and half to wipe the hands. “Do not wipe the nose” means do not wipe inside the nose or nasal mucus. Do not use the hand cloth to wipe the armpit, back, belly, navel, thighs, or calves. When soiled by grime or grease, it should be washed. When wet or damp, it should be dried out by setting near a fire or drying in the sun. We should not use the hand cloth when bathing.

雲堂の洗面處は後架なり。後架は照堂の西なり、その屋圖つたはれり。庵内および單寮は、便宜のところにかまふ。住持人は、方丈にて洗面す。耆年老宿居處に、便宜に洗面架をおけり。住持人、もし雲堂に宿するときは、後架にして洗面すべし。

The place for washing the face by the cloud hall is the rear washstands.<sup>27</sup> The rear washstands are to the west of the illuminated hall, the ground plans of which have been handed down to us.<sup>28</sup> In hermitages and individual quarters, it is provided wherever convenient.<sup>29</sup> The abbot washes his face in the abbot's quarters. Face-washing stands are provided where convenient in the residences of seniors and elders. When the abbot lodges in the cloud hall, he should wash his face at the rear washstands.

洗面架にいたりて、手巾の中分をうなじにかく。ふたつのはしを左右のかたよりまへにひきこして、左右の手にて、左右のわきより手巾の左右のはしをうしろへいだして、うしろにておのおのひきちがへて、左のはしは右へきたり、右のはしは左にきたして、むねのまへにあたりてむすぶなり。かくのごとくすれば、褌衫のくびは手巾におほはれ、兩袖は手巾にゆひあげられて、ひぢよりかみにあがりぬるなり。ひぢよりしも、うで・たなごころ、あらはなり。たとへば、たすきかけたらんがごとし。そののち、もし後架ならば、面桶をとりて、かまのほとりにいたりて、一桶の湯をとりて、かへりて洗面架のうへにおく。もし餘處にては、打湯桶の湯を面桶にいる。

27 cloud hall (undō 雲堂): A term for the saṃgha hall (sōdō 僧堂), where the monks of the great assembly sleep, take their meals, sit in meditation, etc.

28 illuminated hall (shōdō 照堂): A covered corridor between the saṃgha hall and the rear washstands, which was illumined by skylights, windows, or open sides.

29 hermitages and individual quarters (annai oyobi tanryō 庵内および單寮): Separate residences within the monastic compound. The former term refers to the residences of retired abbots or other eminent monks serving at subtemples; the latter term refers to the offices of the higher-ranking monastic officers, which could also serve as their private sleeping quarters.

Upon arriving at the face-washing stand, drape the middle of the hand cloth around the nape of the neck, with the two ends pulled forward over the left and right shoulders. With the left and right hands, bring the left and right ends of the cloth under the left and right armpits to the back; cross them in the back, so that the left end comes around to the right and the right end comes around to the left; tie them together in front of the chest. In this way, the collar of the partial robe is covered by the hand cloth, and the sleeves are tied up by the cloth, so as to be raised above the elbows, while below the elbows, the forearms and hands are exposed. It is similar, for example, to wearing a sleeve cord.<sup>30</sup>

After that, if it is at the rear washstands, take a face bucket, go to the area of the cauldrons, get a single bucket of hot water, come back, and place it on the face-washing stand. If it is at some other place, pour the hot water from the hot water bucket into the face bucket.

つぎに、楊枝をつかふべし。今大宋國諸山には、嚼楊枝の法、ひさしくすたれてつたはれざれば、嚼楊枝のところなしといへども、今吉祥山永平寺、嚼楊枝のところあり。すなはち今案なり。これによれば、まづ嚼楊枝すべし。楊枝を右手にとりて、咒願すべし。

Next, we should use the willow twig. At present at the various mountains of the Land of the Great Song, since the procedure of chewing the willow twig has long been abandoned and is not handed down, there are no places where the willow twig is chewed; but now, at Eihei Monastery on Mount Kichijō, there is a place where the willow twig is chewed.<sup>31</sup> This is our present plan.

According to this [procedure], we should first chew the willow twig. Taking the willow twig in the left hand, we should recite the prayer.

30 sleeve cord (tasuki たすき): A cord used to tie back the sleeves of a robe when working or washing.

31 various mountains (shozan 諸山): Also read shosan. A term for the major Buddhist monasteries.

willow twig (yōji 楊枝): The tooth stick (S. danta-kāṣṭha) prescribed for monks in the vinaya; despite its name in Chinese, the stick was not necessarily fashioned from the wood of the willow. Chewing one end of the stick shredded the fibers, creating an effective tool for cleaning the teeth.

華嚴經淨行品云、手執楊枝、當願衆生、心得正法、自然清淨。

*In the “Pure Practice” chapter of the Flower Garland Sūtra, it is said,<sup>32</sup> Grasping the willow twig,
Pray that living beings

And are naturally purified.*

[50:22]

この文を誦しをはりて、さらに揚枝をかまんとするに、すなはち誦すべし、

When finished chanting this text and about to chew the willow twig, we should chant:

[50:23] {2:44}

晨嚼楊枝、當願衆生、得調伏牙、噬諸煩惱。

*Chewing the willow twig at daybreak,
Pray that living beings
Attain the teeth of discipline
That bite off the afflictions.<sup>33</sup>*

[50:24]

この文を誦しをはりて、まさに嚼楊枝すべし。楊枝のながさ、あるひは四指、あるひは八指、あるひは十二指、あるひは十六指なり。

When finished chanting this text, we should chew the willow twig. The length of the willow twig may be four fingers, eight fingers, twelve fingers, or sixteen fingers.

[50:25]

摩訶僧祇律第三十四云、齒木應量用、極長十六指、極短四指。

In number 34 of the Mahāsāṃghika Vinaya, it is said, “For the tooth stick, use according to proper size: a maximum length of sixteen fingers; a minimum length of four fingers.”<sup>34</sup>

32 “Pure Practice” chapter of the Flower Garland Sūtra (Kegon kyō jōgyō bon 華嚴經淨行品): Da fangguangfo huayan jing 大方廣佛華嚴經, T.278.9:431a25-26. Here and in the subsequent quotations from this text, the sūtra passages are not actually in the form of a prayer but, rather, occur in a long list of prescriptions for how bodhisattvas should think as they go about their daily activities.

33 Chewing the willow twig at daybreak (shin shaku yōji 晨嚼楊枝): A continuation of the Flower Garland Sūtra passage (T.278.9:431a26-27).

34 number 34 of the Mahāsāṃghika Vinaya (Makasōgi ritsu dai sanjūshi 摩訶僧祇律第三十四): Dōgen combines here two sentences of the Mohesengqi lü 摩訶僧祇律, fascicle 34 (T.1425.22:505b1-2, b17-18).

[50:26]

しるべし、四指よりもみじかくすべからず、十六指よりもながきは、量に應せず。ふとさは手小指大なり。しかありといへども、それよりもほそき、さまたげなし。そのかたち、手小指形なり。一端はふとく、一端ほそし。そのふときはしを、微細にかむなり。

We know from this that it should not be shorter than four fingers, and longer than sixteen fingers does not accord with proper size. The thickness is the size of the little finger, though there is nothing to prevent something thinner. Its shape is that of the little finger: one end thicker, the other end thinner. We chew the thicker end into fine strands.

三千威儀經云、嚼頭不得過三分。

In the Sūtra of the Three Thousand Rules of Deportment, it is said, "The chewed tip should not exceed three tenths of an inch."<sup>35</sup>

[50:28]

よくかみて、はのうへ、はのうら、みがくがごとくとぎあらふべし。たびたびとぎみがき、あらひすすぐべし。はのものとしのうへ、よくみがきあらふべし。はのあひだ、よくかきそろえ、きよくあらふべし。漱口たびたびすれば、すすぎきよめらる。しかうしてのち、したをこそぐべし。

Having chewed it well, rub and clean the front and back of the teeth as if polishing them. Rub and polish, wash and rinse them repeatedly. Polish and clean the gums at the base of the teeth. Thoroughly scrape between the teeth and wash them clean. By frequently rinsing the mouth, it will be rinsed clean. After this, scrape the tongue.

三千威儀經云、刮舌有五事、一者不得過三返。二者舌上血出當止。三者不得大振手汚僧伽梨衣若足。四者棄楊枝莫當人道。五者常當屏處。

In the Sūtra of the Three Thousand Rules of Deportment, it is said,<sup>36</sup>

Regarding scraping the tongue, there are five points. First, do not exceed three times. Second, stop if the surface of the tongue bleeds. Third, do not move the hand so much that the saṃghāti robe or the feet are soiled. Fourth, do not dispose of the willow twig where people walk. Fifth, always do this in a screened-off place.

35 Sūtra of the Three Thousand Rules of Deportment (Sanzen iigi kyō 三千威儀經): Sanqian weiyi jing 三千威儀經, T.1470.24:915b5.

[50:30] {2:45}

いはゆる刮舌三返といふは、水を口にふくみて、舌をこそげこそげすること、三返するなり、三刮にはあらず。血いでばまさにやむべし、といふにこころうべし。よくよく刮舌すべしといふことは、三千威儀經云、淨口者、嚼楊枝・漱口・刮舌。しかあれば、楊枝は、佛祖ならびに佛祖兒孫の、護持しきたれたるところなり。

The “scraping the tongue three times” mentioned here means that filling the mouth with water and scraping away at the tongue is repeated three times; it does not mean to make only three scrapes. We should heed the admonition to stop if there is bleeding. On the fact that we should thoroughly scrape the tongue, it is said in the Sūtra of the Three Thousand Rules of Deportment, “Purifying the mouth means chewing the willow twig, rinsing the mouth, and scraping the tongue.”<sup>37</sup> Thus, the willow twig is something that has been upheld by the buddhas and ancestors, as well as by the descendants of the buddhas and ancestors.

The Buddha was residing in the Bamboo Grove at Rājagṛha, together with one thousand two hundred fifty bhikṣus.<sup>38</sup> On the first day of the twelfth month, King Prasenajit provided the meal of the day. Early that morning, he personally gave the Buddha a willow twig. After the Buddha had received and chewed it, he threw the remainder on the ground, whereupon it immediately started growing and developing luxuriant vegetation, sending out roots and stems, till it reached a height of five hundred yojana. Its branches and leaves spread out like clouds, and its circumference was comparably huge. Gradually, it also produced flowers the size of wagon wheels; and, eventually, it also produced fruit the size of a five-peck crock. Its roots, stems, branches, and leaves were entirely of the seven precious substances. Their numerous colors shone with exceptional beauty, the light from each color obscuring the sun and the moon. When the fruit was eaten, the flavor of the fruit was like ambrosia. Its fragrance perfumed the four quarters, and all who smelled it were pleased. When a fragrant breeze blew in and knocked them together, the branches and leaves all gave forth a harmonious and refined sound that elucidated the essentials of the dharma; and those who heard it never tired of it. The reverence and faith of all the people who observed the transformation of that tree grew increasingly pure and virtuous. When the Buddha then preached the dharma, their minds opened and understood in accord with his meaning. Those who set their minds on seeking buddhahood and attained the fruit of birth in a heaven were very great in number.

38 The Buddha was residing in the Bamboo Grove at Rājagṛha (butsu zai ōsha jō chikuon shi chū 佛在王舍城竹園之中): From the Damamūka-nidāna-sūtra (Xianyu jing 賢愚經, T.202.4:362b8-19). The miracle of the willow twig described here is also recorded in the vinaya (see Sifen lü 四分律, T.1428.22:949a5-7).

佛および衆僧を供養する法は、かならず晨旦に楊枝をたてまつるなり。そののち種種の供養をまうく。ほとけに楊枝をたてまつれることおほく、ほとけ楊枝をもちいさせたまふことおほけれども、しばらくこの波斯匿王みづからてづから供養します因縁、ならびにこの高樹の因縁、しるべきゆえに擧するなり。

The procedure of making offerings to the Buddha and the assembly of monks is always to offer a tooth stick early in the morning. After that, various other offerings are prepared. Although there are many cases of offering the willow twig to the Buddha, and many cases of the Buddha using the willow twig, for now, I hold up this episode of King Prasenajit himself offering one with his own hands, together with the episode of the tall tree, because we should know about them.

またこの日、すなはち外道六師、ともにほとけに降伏せられたてまつりて、おどろきおそりてにげはしる、つひに六師ともに投河而死。六師徒類九億人、皆來師佛求爲弟子。佛言善來比丘、鬚髮自落、法衣在身、皆成沙門。佛爲說法、示其法要、漏盡結解、悉得羅漢。

It was also on this day that the six teachers of other paths, having all been defeated by the Buddha, ran away in shock and terror, and all six teachers eventually threw themselves into the river and died.<sup>39</sup>

Nine hundred million followers of the six teachers came en masse to the Buddha and asked to be his disciples. When the Buddha said, “Welcome, bhikṣus,” their beards and hair fell away by themselves, dharma robes covered their bodies, and they all became śramaṇas. When the Buddha preached the dharma for them, showing them the essentials of the dharma, their contaminants were exhausted, their bonds released, and they all attained arhatship.

39 six teachers of other paths (gedō rokushi 外道六師): Continuing to quote from the Damamūka-nidāna-sūtra (Xianyu jing 賢愚經, T.202.4:363a7-11).

[50:34] {2:47}

しかあればすなはち、如來すでに楊枝をもちいしますゆえに、人天これ
を供養したてまつるなり。あきらかにしりぬ、嚼楊枝、これ諸佛菩薩なら
びに佛弟子の、かならず所持なりといふことを。もし、もちいざらんは、
その法、失墜せり、かなしまざらんや。

Thus, because the Tathāgata was already using the willow twig, humans and devas made offerings of them to him. Clearly, then, we know that chewing willow twigs is something the buddhas and bodhisattvas, as well as the disciples of the buddhas, have kept without fail. If we do not use them, the procedure will be lost. How could we not lament this?

[50:35]

In the Brahma's Net Bodhisattva Precepts Sūtra, it is said,<sup>40</sup>

*You children of the Buddha, during the dhūta of the two periods, the winter and summer seated meditation, and the binding of the summer retreat, you should always use willow twigs, soap, the three robes, a water flask, a bowl, a sitting cloth, a staff, an incense burner, a water filter, a hand cloth, a knife, a flintstone, tweezers, a rope chair, the sūtras, the vinaya, a buddha image, and a bodhisattva image.<sup>41</sup>
When bodhisattvas practice the dhūta and when they roam about, whether they travel a hundred miles or a thousand miles, they should always have these eighteen kinds of articles close to their persons.
The dhūta periods are from the fifteenth day of the first month until the fifteenth day of the third month, and from the fifteenth day of the eighth month until the fifteenth day of the tenth month. During these two periods, one should always keep these eighteen kinds of articles close to one's person, like the two wings of a bird.*

to the practice of austerities; the “two periods” (niji 二時) are those defined here below.

この十八種物、ひとつも虧闕すべからず。もし虧闕すれば、鳥の一翼おちたらんがごとし。一翼のこれりとも、飛行することあたはじ、鳥道の機縁にあらざらん。菩薩もまたかくのごとし、この十八種の羽翼そなはらざれば、行菩薩道あたはず。十八種のうち、楊枝すでに第一に居せり、最初に具足すべきなり。この楊枝の用・不をあきらめんともがら、すなはち佛法をあきらむる菩提薩埵なるべし。いまだかつてあきらめざらんは、佛法也未夢見在ならん。

Not a single one of these eighteen kinds of articles should be missing. If any is missing, it would be like a bird losing a wing: even if one wing remained, it could not fly and would not be an opportunity for the “path of the bird.”<sup>42</sup> Bodhisattvas are also like this: if not equipped with these eighteen kinds of articles, they cannot follow the bodhisattva path. Among the eighteen kinds, since the willow twig occupies the first position, one should equip oneself with that first. Those who clarify whether or not the willow twig is used are surely bodhisattvas who clarify the buddha dharma. Those who have not yet clarified it must never have seen the buddha dharma even in their dreams.

この梵網菩薩戒は、過去・現在・未來の諸佛菩薩、かならず過・現・當に受持しきたれり。しかあれば、楊枝、また過・現・當に受持しきたれり。

These Brahma’s Net bodhisattva precepts have always been received and kept in past, present, and future by the buddhas and bodhisattvas of past, present, and future. Thus, the willow twig has also been received and kept in past, present, and future.

42 “path of the bird” (chōdō 鳥道): A favorite expression of Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869) that occurs several times in Dōgen’s writings; generally taken to imply “a way that follows no route and leaves no traces.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dongshan’s three roads.”

43 If someone were to ask what this means (waku u nin mon ishi ikan 或有人問意旨如何): Dōgen shifts to Chinese for this statement and his answer. “Old man Eihei” (Eihei rōkan 永平老漢) is, of course, a self-reference.

まさにしるべし、佛佛祖祖正傳の宗旨、それかくのごとし。これに違せんは佛道にあらず、佛法にあらず、祖道にあらず。

Truly, we should recognize that the essential point directly transmitted by buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor is like this. Whatever goes against this is not the word of the buddhas, not the dharma of the buddhas, not the way of the ancestors.

しかあるに、大宋國いま楊枝たえてみえず。嘉定十六年癸未四月のなかに、はじめて大宋に諸山諸寺をみるに、僧侶の、楊枝をしれるなく、朝野の貴賤、おなじくしらず。僧家すべてしらざるゆえに、もし楊枝の法を問著すれば、失色して度を失す。あはれむべし、白法の失墜せることを。わづかにくちをすすぐともがらは、馬の尾を寸餘にきりたるを、牛の角の、おほきさ三分ばかりにて方につくりたるが、ながさ六七寸なる、そのはし二寸ばかりにむまのたちがみのごとくにうえて、これをもちて牙齒をあらふのみなり。僧家の器にもちいがたし。不淨の器ならん、佛法の器にあらず。俗人の祠天するにも、なほきらひぬべし。かの器、また俗人・僧家、ともにくつのちりをはらふ器にもちいる。また梳鬢のときもちいる。いささかの大小あれども、すなはちこれひとつなり。かの器をもちいるも、萬人が一人なり。

Nevertheless, in the Land of the Great Song at present, the willow twig is never seen. During the fourth month of the junior water year of the sheep, the sixteenth year of Jiading, when I first observed the various mountains and other monasteries of the Great Song, there was no cleric who knew of the willow twig, and the elites and commoners of court and countryside were likewise ignorant of it.<sup>46</sup> Because the monks knew nothing of it, when I inquired about the use of the willow twig, they would pale and lose their composure. What a pity, to lose the pure dharmas. Those who at least do rinse out their mouths just clean their teeth with a thing made from horse tail, cut to a little more than an inch, that is implanted in a piece of ox horn of some three tenths of an inch across and six or seven inches long, of which the last two inches are planted with the bristles, rather like a horse's mane. This is not an implement for use by a monk: it is likely an impure implement, not an implement of the buddha dharma. Even the laity in their sacrifices to the devas would have an aversion to it. This implement is used by the laity and clerics alike as implements for brushing dust off their shoes; they also use it when brushing their hair. The size may be slightly different, but it is the same thing. Even those who use this implement are but one in ten thousand.

しかあれば、天下の出家・在家、ともにその口氣、はなはだくさし。二三尺をへだててもものいふとき、口臭きたる、かぐものたへがたし。有道の尊宿と稱し、人天の導師と號するともがらも、漱口・刮舌・嚼楊枝の法、ありとだにもしらず。これをもて推するに、佛祖の大道、いま陵夷をみるらんこと、いくそばくといふことしらず。いまわれら、露命を萬里の蒼波にをしまず、異域の山川をわたりしのぎて、道をとぶらふとすれども、澆運かなしむべし、いくそばくの白法か、さきだちて滅没しぬらん。をしむべし、をしむべし。

Thus, the breath of renunciants and householders alike throughout the land is extremely malodorous. When they speak, even from two or three feet away, the stink coming from their mouths is difficult to bear. Even those known as venerables in possession of the way and called teachers of humans and devas do not know that the procedures for rinsing the mouth, scraping the tongue, and chewing the willow stick even exist. Judging from this, we cannot imagine to what degree we are now witnessing the deterioration of the great way of the buddhas and ancestors. Now, even as we risk our evanescent lives to the ten thousand miles of deep green waves and cross the mountains and rivers of foreign lands in search of the way, we cannot but lament our misfortune, that so many pure dharmas have already been lost. How regrettable. How regrettable.

しかあるに、日本一國朝野の道俗、ともに楊枝を見聞す、佛光明を見聞するならん。しかあれども、嚼楊枝、それ如法ならず、刮舌の法、つたはれず、倉卒なるべし。しかあれども、宋人の、楊枝をしらざるにたくらぶれば、楊枝をもちいるべしとしれるは、おのづから上人の法をしれり。仙人の法にも、楊枝をもちいる。しるべし、みな出塵の器なり、清淨の調度なりといふことを。

Throughout the Land of Japan, however, the religious and laity of court and countryside have all likely experienced the willow twig and experienced the radiance of the Buddha. Still, our chewing of the willow twig is not in accordance with proper procedure, and the procedure of scraping the tongue has not been handed down; so, we are surely lax. Even so, in contrast to people of the Song, who do not know of the willow twig, those who have understood the necessity of using the willow twig know for themselves a procedure of the holy ones. The procedures of the immortals also make use of the willow twig.<sup>47</sup> We should realize that these are all utensils beyond the dusty world, implements of purity.

三千威儀經云、用楊枝有五事。一者斷當如度。二者破當如法。三者嚼頭不得過三分。四者疏齒當中三齧。五者當汁澡目用。

In the Sūtra of the Three Thousand Rules of Deportment, it is said,<sup>48</sup>

There are five points that pertain to using the willow twig. First, it should be cut to the proper proportions. Second, it should be broken using the proper procedure. Third, in chewing the tip, do not exceed three tenths of an inch. Fourth, in [cleaning] the gaps between teeth, it should be inserted for three bites. Fifth, the sap should be used to rinse the eyes.

いま嚼楊枝・漱口の水を、右手にうけてもて目をあらふこと、みな、もと三千威儀經の説なり。いま日本國の往代の庭訓なり。刮舌の法は、僧正榮西つたふ。楊枝つかひてのち、すてんとするとき、兩手をもて楊枝のかみたるかたより二片に擘破す。その破口のときかほを、よこぎまに舌上にあててこそぐ。すなはち、右手に水をうけて、くちにいれて漱口し、刮舌す。漱口・刮舌たびたびし、擘楊枝の角にて、こそげこそげして、血出を度とせんとするがごとし。

Our present practice of spitting the water from chewing the willow twig and rinsing the mouth into one's right hand and using it to wash the eyes is originally entirely from the instructions of the Sūtra of the Three Thousand Rules of Deportment. In the Land of Japan today, it is a household rule from ages past. The procedure for scraping the tongue was transmitted by the Saṃgha Controller Eisai.<sup>49</sup>

48 Sūtra of the Three Thousand Rules of Deportment (Sanzen iigi kyō 三千威儀經): Sanqian weiyi jing 三千威儀經, T.1470.24:915b4-6. The fourth point here is a bit unclear; the procedure seems to be to insert the willow twig between the teeth and bite down on it three times. The fifth point recommends using the sap released into one's saliva from chewing the twig as an eye wash.

49 Saṃgha Controller Eisai (sōjō Eisai 僧正榮西): I.e., Myōan Eisai (or Yōsai) 明菴榮西 (1141-1215), founder of Kenninji 建仁寺, where Dōgen stayed for several years

After using the willow twig, when it is to be discarded, using both hands, we tear it apart into two pieces, starting at the chewed end. Take the sharp edge of the split twig, place it crosswise on the tongue and scrape. That is, putting water in the mouth with the right hand, rinse the mouth and scrape the tongue. Rinse the mouth and scrape the tongue over and over again, using the edge of the split willow twig to scrape and scrape, as if to draw blood.

soon as we are finished using the willow twig, we should discard it in an inconspicuous place. After discarding the willow twig, we should snap the fingers three times.<sup>53</sup> When at the rear washstand, there should be a container for receiving discarded willow twigs; when at other locations, we should discard it in an inconspicuous place. The water used to rinse the mouth should be spit out somewhere other than in the face bucket.

つぎに、まさしく洗面す。両手に面桶の湯を掬して、額より兩眉毛・兩目・鼻孔・人中・顙・頬、あまねくあらふ。まづよくよく湯をすくひかけて、しかうしてのち摩沐すべし。涕唾・鼻涕を面桶の湯におとしいるることなかれ。かくのごとくあらふとき、湯を無度につひやして、面桶のほかにもらし、おとし、ちらして、はやくうしなふことなかれ。あかおち、あぶらのぞこほりぬるまで、あらふなり。耳裏あらふべし、著水不得なるがゆえに。眼裏あらふべし、著沙不得なるがゆえに。あるいは頭髮・頂顙までもあらふ、すなはち威儀なり。洗面、をはりて、面桶の湯をすててのちも、三彈指べし。

Next, do the face-washing proper. Using both hands, scoop up hot water from the face bucket and wash all over, from the forehead to the eyebrows, eyes, nostrils, the human center, cranium, and cheeks.<sup>54</sup> We should first wet them thoroughly with the hot water and then scrub them clean. Do not allow tears, saliva, or nasal mucus to drip into the hot water in the face bucket. When washing like this, do not let the hot water run out too quickly by using an immoderate amount, dripping it outside the face bucket, spilling it, or splashing it about. Wash until the grime is off and the oil removed. We should wash “in the ears”; for “water can’t get in.”<sup>55</sup> We should wash “in the eyes”; for “sand can’t get in.” To wash to the hairline or to the crown of the head is proper deportment. Having finished washing the face, after emptying the hot water from the face bucket, we should also snap the fingers three times.

53 snap the fingers three times (santanji 三彈指): A common apotropaic gesture used to ward off impurities.

54 human center (ninchū 人中): I.e., the upper lip, considered as a central node in acupuncture. Some texts read nichū 耳中 (“within the ears”) here.

55 We should wash “in the ears”; for “water can’t get in” (niri arau beshi, jaku sui futoku naru ga yue ni 耳裏あらふべし、著水不得なるがゆえに): This and the following sentence are playing on a popular saying attributed to the ninth-century figure Bai-shui Benren 白水本仁 (dates unknown), disciple of Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (see, e.g., Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要, ZZ.136:805b18):

示衆云、眼裏著沙不得。耳裏著水不得。

Addressing the assembly, he said, “Sand can’t get in his eyes; water can’t get in his ears.”

[50:50] {2:52}

つぎに、手巾のおもてをのごふはしにて、のごひ、かわかすべし。しかうしてのち、手巾、もとのごとく脱しとりて、ふたへにして左臂にかく。雲堂の後架には、公界の拭面あり、いはゆる一疋布をまうけたり。烘櫃あり、衆家ともに拭面するに、たらざるわづらひなし。かれにも頭面のごふべし、また自己の手巾をもちいるも、ともにこれ法なり。

Next, with the end of the hand cloth used for wiping the face, we should wipe and dry. After that, we remove the hand cloth, fold it in half, and drape it over the crook of the left arm, as it was to begin with. At the rear washstands of the cloud hall, there are communal face towels — that is, cloths one bolt in length are provided.<sup>56</sup> There is a heating chest, so that there is no concern for a shortage [of dry towels] when members of the community all wipe their faces. We should wipe the head and face with these or use our own hand cloth; either way is proper procedure.

[50:51]

While washing the face, do not bang the bucket and ladle, and do not be noisy. Do not get the area wet by splashing the hot and cold water about. We should reflect to ourselves that, although born in the latter five hundred years and dwelling on remote islands of a peripheral land, we should rejoice in the fact that the good accumulated in past lives has not decayed, and that we directly transmit the deportment of the old buddhas, and practice and verify it without defilement.<sup>57</sup> In returning to the cloud hall, step lightly to keep the sound down.

[50:52]

耆年宿徳の草菴、かならず洗面架あるべし、洗面せざるは非法なり。洗面のとき、面藥をもちいる法あり。

In the thatched huts of seniors and elderly worthies, there should always be face-washing stands; to fail to wash the face is improper. When washing the face, there is a procedure using facial ointments.

56 cloths one bolt in length (ichihitsu bu 一疋布): “Bolt” translates hiki 疋, a length of cloth equal to two tan 反, or enough for a single adult robe.

57 the latter five hundred years (go gohyaku sai 後五百歳): i.e., the final, degenerate age of the dharma of Buddha Śākyamuni, as taught in the Lotus Sūtra.

おほよそ嚼楊枝・洗面、これ古佛の正法なり。道心辨道のともがら、修證すべきなり。あるいは湯をえざるには、水もちいる、舊例なり、古法なり。湯・水すべてえざらんときは、早晨よくよく拭面して、香草・末香等をぬりてのち、禮佛誦經、燒香坐禪すべし。いまだ洗面せずば、もろもろのつとめ、ともに無禮なり。

In sum, chewing the willow twig and washing the face — these are the true dharma of the old buddhas. Those who pursue the way with the mind of the way should practice and verify them. When hot water is not available, to use cold water is an ancient precedent, is an old procedure. When neither hot nor cold water is available, then in the morning, we should thoroughly rub the face, and then, after applying herbal incense, powdered incense, or the like, should pay obeisance to the buddha, recite the sūtras, burn incense, and sit in meditation. Whatever services are performed when one has not yet washed the face lack ritual propriety.

In the Land of Sindhu and the Land of Cīnasthāna, the kings and princes, great ministers and high officials, householders and renunciants, men and women of court and countryside, peasants and commoners, all practice face-washing. Among their household implements as well, there is a face bucket, whether of silver or of tin. In their temples to the devas and shrines to the gods, face-washing is offered every morning; in the stūpa sites of the buddhas and ancestors, as well, face-washing is offered.<sup>58</sup> Householders and renunciants, after washing their faces, don proper clothing and pay obeisance to the devas, pay obeisance to the gods, pay obeisance to the ancestors, and pay obeisance to the father and mother. We pay obeisance to our teachers, pay obeisance to the three treasures, pay obeisance to the myriad spirits of the three realms, and pay obeisance to the true lords of the ten directions.<sup>59</sup> Nowadays, even farmers and paddy workers, fishermen and woodsmen never neglect to wash their faces; yet they lack chewing the willow twig. In the Land of Japan, the kings and great ministers, old and young, in court and countryside, householders and renunciants of high and humble status do not neglect the practice of chewing the willow twig and rinsing the mouth; yet they do not wash the face. It is one gained, one lost. Now, our maintaining both face-washing and chewing the willow twig represents a florescence [of the dharma] that has repaired the deficiency; it is the illuminating presence of the buddhas and ancestors.

INTRODUCTION

According to its colophon, this work was presented in the winter of 1243, at Kippōji, the monastery where Dōgen resided following his move from the capital to the province of Echizen. It represents number 51 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō, number 57 in the Honzan edition, and number 5 of fascicle 3 in the twenty-eight-text Himitsu collection; it is not found in the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō.

Dōgen opens the work with an account of the founding of his lineage, the famous story of Buddha Śākyamuni's transmission of the treasury of the true dharma eye to his disciple Mahākāśyapa on Vulture Peak. He then rehearses the tradition of the buddhas and ancestors, from the seven buddhas of the past, through the twenty-eight Indian ancestors to Bodhidharma and the six Chinese ancestors to Huineng 慧能, continuing down to Dōgen's own teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨. On the first day of the fifth lunar month of the first year of the Baoqing era 寶慶 (8 June 1225), Dōgen reports, Rujing accepted the Japanese disciple into the lineage, in a face-to-face conferral in the abbot's quarters of Tiantong Monastery.

Dōgen then proceeds to discuss the history and meaning of his title theme, the "face-to-face conferral," or direct, personal instruction from master to disciple. In a play on the term "face," he argues that, since every generation of the lineage receives the dharma personally transmitted from Buddha Śākyamuni and the seven buddhas, the face-to-face conferral is the transmission of the face of the buddhas from the face of the master to the face of the disciple; hence, obeisance paid to a master in the lineage is obeisance to the buddhas.

In a lengthy postscript, Dōgen takes to task the eleventh-century Chan master Jianfu Chenggu 薦福承古 for claiming that he was a successor to the famous tenth-century master Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃 because he had experienced an insight while reading the latter's words. Chenggu, Dōgen says, has obviously never even heard of the face-to-face conferral. On his terms, everyone who had ever had an insight while reading a Buddhist sūtra could claim to be a direct successor to Buddha Śākyamu-ni himself. Instead, those who have had insight while reading a text have always sought out a teacher in the lineage to confirm their understanding face-to-face.

爾時、釋迦牟尼佛、西天竺國靈山會上、百萬衆中、拈優曇華瞬目。於時摩訶迦葉尊者、破顏微笑。釋迦牟尼佛言、吾有正法眼藏涅槃妙心、附囑摩訶迦葉。

At that time, Buddha Śākyamuni, in an assembly of one million at the assembly on Vulture Peak in the Land of Sindhu in the West, held up an udumbara flower and blinked his eyes.<sup>1</sup> Thereupon, Venerable Mahākāśyapa broke into a smile. Buddha Śākyamuni said, “I have a treasury of the true dharma eye, the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa; I bestow it on Mahākāśyapa.”

[51:2]

これすなはち、佛佛祖祖、面授正法眼藏の道理なり。七佛の正傳して迦葉尊者にいたる。迦葉尊者より二十八授して、菩提達磨尊者にいたる。菩提達磨尊者、みづから震旦國に降儀して、正宗太祖普覺大師慧可尊者に面授す。五傳して曹溪山大鑑慧能大師にいたる。一十七授して、先師大宋國慶元府太白名山天童古佛にいたる。

This is the principle of the treasury of the true dharma eye conferred face-to-face by buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor. Directly transmitted by the seven buddhas, it reached Venerable Kāśyapa.<sup>2</sup>

1 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): A telling of the famous story of the transmission of Zen from Śākyamuni to the First Ancestor, Mahākāśyapa, a story of which there are several variants. Dōgen recorded other versions in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5: 258, case 253), Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.4:182, no. 1), and several Shōbōgenzō chapters. The passage here is given in Chinese, as if Dōgen is quoting a text, but the source is unknown.

Vulture Peak (Ryōzen 靈山): “Sacred Peak,” denoting Gṛdhra-kūṭa, the mountain in Magadha where the Buddha is supposed to have taught the Lotus and other sūtras.

Land of Sindhu in the West (Sai Tenjiku koku 西天竺國): I.e., the Indian subcontinent, the Chinese tianzhu 天竺 representing a transliteration of the Sanskrit Sindhu.

2 seven buddhas (shichi butsu 七佛): I.e., the set of seven buddhas of the past, culminating in Buddha Śākyamuni, with which the traditional history of Zen often begins; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas.” Dōgen goes on here to invoke the lineage

Through twenty-eight conferrals from Venerable Kāśyapa, it reached Venerable Bodhidharma.<sup>3</sup> Venerable Bodhidharma, having personally descended to the Land of Cīnasthāna, conferred it face-to-face to Venerable Huike, Great Master Pujue, Grand Ancestor Zhengzong.<sup>4</sup> Through five transmissions, it reached Great Master Dajian Huineng of Mount Caoxi.<sup>5</sup> Through seventeen conferrals, it reached my former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong, on Renowned Mount Taibai, in the Qingyuan Prefecture in the Land of the Great Song.<sup>6</sup>

On the first day of the fifth month of the junior wood year of the rooster, the first year of Baoqing in the Great Song, I, Dōgen, first burned incense and paid obeisance at the Miaogaotai to my former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong.<sup>7</sup> My former master, the Old Buddha, first saw leading to his own master, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227), from the First Ancestor, Mahākāśyapa, through the Twenty-eighth Ancestor, Bodhidharma, his Chinese disciple Huike 慧可 (487–593), and the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能. Tiantong 天童 is the mountain name of Rujing’s monastery, the Jingdesi 景德寺.

3 Venerable Bodhidharma (Bodaidaruma sonja 菩提達磨尊者): The famous twenty-eighth Indian ancestor, said to have brought Zen to China in the early sixth century.

4 Land of Cīnasthāna (Shintan koku 震旦國): I.e., “China,” represented here by a Sanskrit name transliterated by the Chinese Zhendān 震旦.

Venerable Huike, Great Master Pujue, Grand Ancestor Zhengzong (Shōshū taiso Fukaku daishi Eka sonja 正宗太祖普覺大師慧可尊者): I.e., Bodhidharma’s disciple, Huike 慧可, reckoned as the second ancestor in China; his honorific titles are more often given as Great Master Zhengzong Pujue (Shōshū Fukaku daishi 正宗普覺大師) and Chan Master Dazu (Taiso zenji 太祖禪師).

5 Great Master Dajian Huineng of Mount Caoxi (Sōkeizan Daikan Enō daishi 曹溪山大鑑慧能大師): I.e., the famous Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能; Chan Master Dajian 大鑑禪師 is a posthumous title. Mount Caoxi 曹溪山, in present-day Guangdong, is the site of his temple, the Baolinsi 寶林寺.

6 my former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong, on Renowned Mount Taibai, in the Qingyuan Prefecture in the Land of the Great Song (senshi Daisō koku Keigen fu Taihaku Myōzan Tendō Kobutsu 先師大宋國慶元府太白名山天童古佛): I.e., Dōgen’s teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, abbot of the Jingde Monastery 景德寺 on Mount Tiantong 天童山, in present-day Zhejiang Province.

7 On the first day of the fifth month of the junior wood year of the rooster, the first year of Baoqing in the Great Song (Daisō Hōkyō gannen itsuyū gogatsu ichinichi 大宋寶慶元年乙酉五月一日): I.e., 8 June 1225.

Miaogaotai (Myōkōdai 妙高臺): “The Terrace of Sumeru,” one of the three buildings comprising the abbot’s quarters at Jingde Monastery 景德寺.

Dōgen. At that time, in giving Dōgen personal instruction and face-to-face conferral, he said,

[51:4]

佛佛祖祖面授の法門、現成せり。これすなはち靈山の拈華なり、嵩山の得髓なり、黃梅の傳衣なり、洞山の面授なり。これは佛祖の眼藏面授なり。吾屋裏のみあり、餘人は夢也未見聞在なり。

The dharma gate conferred face-to-face by buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor is fulfilled. This is precisely holding up the flower on Vulture Peak; it is getting the marrow on Mount Song; it is transmitting the robe at Huangmei; it is the face-to-face conferral of Dongshan.<sup>8</sup> This is the face-to-face conferral of the treasury of the eye of the buddhas and ancestors. It exists only within our house; others have never seen or heard of it even in their dreams.

この面授の道理は、釋迦牟尼佛、まのあたり迦葉佛の會下にして面授し護持しきたれるがゆえに、佛祖面なり。佛面より面授せざれば、諸佛にあらざるなり。釋迦牟尼佛まのあたり迦葉尊者をみることに親附なり。阿難・羅睺羅といへども、迦葉の親附におよばず。諸大菩薩といへども、迦葉の親附におよばず、迦葉尊者の座に坐することえず。世尊と迦葉と、同座し同衣しきたるを、一代の佛儀とせり。迦葉尊者、したしく世尊の面授を面授せり、心授せり、身授せり、眼授せり。釋迦牟尼佛を供養恭敬、禮拜奉觀したてまつれり。その粉骨碎身、いく千萬變といふことをしらず、自己の面目は面目にあらず、如來の面目を面授せり。

The principle of this face-to-face conferral is that, because Buddha Śākyamuni, in the community of Buddha Kāśyapa, personally received and maintained the face-to-face conferral, his is the face of a buddha and ancestor.<sup>9</sup> Had he not received the face-to-face conferral from the face of a buddha, he would not be [one of] the buddhas.<sup>10</sup> That Buddha Śākya-

8 holding up the flower on Vulture Peak (Ryōzen no nenge 靈山の拈華): Reference to the first transmission of Zen, as described in section I, above; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Hold up a flower.” “Getting the marrow on Mount Song” (Sūzan no tokuzui 嵩山の得髓) refers to Bodhidharma’s transmission to Huike 慧可, of whom Bodhidharma said he had “gotten his marrow”; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.” “Transmitting the robe at Huangmei” (Ōbai no den’e 黃梅の傳衣) refers to the bestowal of the robe of Bodhidharma by the Fifth Ancestor, Hongren 弘忍 (688-761), to the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能. “Face-to-face conferral of Dongshan” (Tōzan no menju 洞山の面授) refers to the transmission of the Caodong 曹洞 lineage from its founder, Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869). Somewhat surprisingly, Dōgen here quotes his Chinese master in Japanese translation.

9 Buddha Kāśyapa (Kashō butsu 迦葉佛): I.e., the sixth of the seven buddhas, just prior to Buddha Śākyamuni; not to be confused with the First Ancestor, Kāśyapa, mentioned just below. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas.”

10 Had he not received the face-to-face conferral from the face of a buddha, muni personally saw Venerable Kāśyapa is his intimate bequest to him. Even Ānanda and Rahula did not equal his intimate bequest to Kāśyapa.<sup>11</sup> Even the great bodhisattvas did not equal his intimate bequest to Kāśyapa, were unable to sit in the seat of Venerable Kāśyapa. It was the practice of the Buddha during his life that the World-Honored One and Kāśyapa would share the same seat and the same robe.<sup>12</sup> Venerable Kāśyapa intimately got the face conferral, the mind conferral, the body conferral, the eye conferral of the World-Honored One's face-to-face conferral. He made offerings, venerated, paid obeisance, and devotedly attended Buddha Śākyamuni. No one knows how many thousands of myriads of transformations he went through, in thus pulverizing his bones and shattering his body.<sup>13</sup> His own face was not his face; he received the face-to-face conferral of the face of the Tathāgata.

釋迦牟尼佛、まさしく迦葉尊者をみまします、迦葉尊者、まのあたり阿難尊者をみる、阿難尊者、まのあたり迦葉尊者の佛面を禮拜す、これ面授なり。阿難尊者、この面授を住持して、商那和修を接して面授す。商那和修尊者、まさしく阿難尊者を奉観するに、唯面與面、面授し面受す。かくのごとく、代代嫡嫡の祖師、ともに弟子は師にみえ、師は弟子をみるによりて、面授しきたれり。一祖・一師・一弟としても、あひ面授せざるは佛佛祖祖にあらず。たとへば、水を朝宗せしめて宗派を長ぜしめ、燈を續して光明つねならしむるに、億千萬法するにも本枝一如なるなり、また啐啄の迅機なるなり。

Buddha Śākyamuni truly saw Venerable Kāśyapa; Venerable Kāśyapa directly saw Venerable Ānanda; Venerable Ānanda directly paid obeisance to the buddha face of Venerable Kāśyapa: this is the face-to-face conferral.<sup>14</sup> Venerable Ānanda, maintaining this face-to-face conferral, he would not be [one of] the buddhas (butsumen yori menju sezareba, shobutsu ni arazaru nari 佛面より面授せざれば、諸佛にあらざるなり): The translation takes the unexpressed subject to be “Buddha Śākyamuni,” but the sentence might also be read as a more general claim: “those without the face-to-face conferral from the face of a buddha, are not buddhas.” The expression “face of a buddha” (butsumen 佛面) could be read simply as “a buddha,” but Dōgen is playing here and below with the “face” (men 面) of “face-to-face conferral” (menju 面授). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddha faces, ancestor faces.”

11 Ānanda and Rahula (Anan Ragora 阿難羅睺羅): i.e., Śākyamuni's cousin and son, respectively.

12 the World-Honored One and Kāśyapa would share the same seat and the same robe (Seson to Kashō to, dōza shi dōe shikitaru 世尊と迦葉と、同座し同衣しきたる): Reference to the legends that Śākyamuni invited Mahākāśyapa to share his seat and entrusted his robe to Mahākāśyapa.

13 pulverizing his bones and shattering his body (funkotsu saishin 粉骨碎身): A fixed idiom for extreme asceticism.

14 Ānanda (Anan 阿難): Mahākāśyapa's disciple, the Second Ancestor.

received Śaṇavāsa and conferred it to him face-to-face.<sup>15</sup> When Venerable Śaṇavāsa truly attended Venerable Ānanda, only a face with a face conferred face-to-face and received face-to-face.<sup>16</sup> In this way, the ancestral masters of successor after successor in generation after generation, through the disciple seeing the master and the master seeing the disciple, have been conferring face-to-face. Were even one ancestor, one master, or one disciple not to confer face-to-face, it would not be buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor. For example, when we extend channels for water to merge into the ocean, or make light constant by continuing to light lamps, even if this covers koṭis of thousands of myriads of dharmas, root and branch remain one. Again, it is the simultaneous action of tapping and pecking.<sup>17</sup>

しかあればすなはち、まのあたり釋迦牟尼佛をまぼりたてまつりて、一期の日夜をつめり、佛面に照臨せられたてまつりて、一代の日夜をつめり。これ、いく無量を往來せりとしらず、しづかにおもひやりて、隨喜すべきなり。

Therefore, they have filled their term of days and nights directly observing Buddha Śākyamuni; they have filled their lifetime of days and nights illumined by the presence of the face of the Buddha.<sup>18</sup> No one knows over how many incalculable [kalpas] they have come and gone like this; we should quietly reflect on it and rejoice.

釋迦牟尼佛の佛面を禮拜したてまつり、釋迦牟尼佛の佛眼をわがまなこにうつしたてまつり、わがまなこを佛眼にうつしたてまつりし、佛眼睛なり、佛面目なり。これをあひつたへて、いまにいたるまで一世も間斷せず面授しきたれるは、この面授なり。而今の數十代の嫡嫡は、面面なる佛面なり、本初の佛面に面受なり。この正傳面授を禮拜する、まさしく七佛釋迦牟尼佛を禮拜したてまつるなり、迦葉尊者等の二十八佛祖を禮拜供養したてまつるなり。佛祖の面目・眼睛、かくのごとし。

15 Śaṇavāsa (Shōnawashu 商那和修): Ānanda's disciple, the Third Ancestor.

16 only a face with a face (yui men yo men 唯面與面): A play on the expression "only a buddha with a buddha" (yui butsu yo butsu 唯佛與佛) in Kumārajīva's translation of the Lotus Sūtra; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas."

17 simultaneous action of tapping and pecking (sottaku no jinki 啐啄の迅機): I.e., the combined action of master and disciple; from the image of the birth of a chick, which taps the inside of the shell while the mother pecks the outside.

18 they have filled their term of days and nights (ichigo no nichiya o tsumeri 一期の日夜をつめり): I.e., "they have spent their lives"; the translation takes the unexpressed subject to be the masters and disciples in the lineage of the face-to-face conferral.

They are the eye of the buddha, the face of the buddha, who have paid obeisance to the buddha face of Buddha Śākyamuni, who have reflected the buddha eye of Buddha Śākyamuni in their own eye and reflected their own eye in the buddha eye.<sup>19</sup> The conferral face-to-face that has handed this down to the present without interruption for even a single generation is the face-to-face conferral. Successor after successor spanning the tens of generations down to the present are face after face of buddha faces, received face-to-face from the original face of the buddha. To pay obeisance to this directly transmitted face-to-face conferral is truly to pay obeisance to Buddha Śākyamuni and the seven buddhas, to pay obeisance and make offerings to Venerable Kāśyapa and the twenty-eight buddhas and ancestors. Such are the faces and the eyes of the buddhas and ancestors.

この佛祖にまみゆるは、釋迦牟尼佛等の七佛にみえたてまつるなり。佛祖したしく自己を面授する正當恁麼時なり、面授佛の面授佛に面授するなり。葛藤をもて葛藤に面授して、さらに斷絶せず。眼を開して眼に眼授し、眼受す、面をあらはして面に面授し、面受す。面授は面處の受授なり。心を拈じて心に心授し、心受す、身を現じて身を身授するなり。他方・他國も、これを本祖とせり。震旦國以東、ただこの佛正傳の屋裏のみ、面授面受あり、あらたに如來をみたてまつる正眼をあひつたへきたれり。

To meet these buddhas and ancestors is to be met by Buddha Śākyamuni and the rest of the seven buddhas. It is the very moment when the buddhas and ancestors personally confer themselves face-to-face; it is the conferral face-to-face by a buddha who confers face-to-face to a buddha who confers face-to-face. They confer entanglements face-to-face to entanglements, without any interruption.<sup>20</sup> Opening the eye, they confer eye-to-eye to the eye and receive eye-to-eye from the eye; showing the face, they confer face-to-face to the face and receive face-to-face from the face. The face-to-face conferral is the receiving and conferring of the 19 They are the eye of the buddha, the face of the buddha (butsu ganzei nari, butsu menmoku nari 佛眼睛なり、佛面目なり): Again, taking the unexpressed subject to be the “masters and disciples.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye.”

reflected the buddha eye of Buddha Śākyamuni in their own eye (Shakamuni butsu no butsugen o waga manako ni utsushitatematsuri 釋迦牟尼佛の佛眼をわがまなこにうつしたてまつり): Taking waga manako (“their own eye”) to refer to the eyes of the masters and disciples. The verb utsusu うつす here and in the following clause is read as 映す; it might also be taken as 移す, which would yield, “transferred the buddha eye of Buddha Śākyamuni to their own eye.”

20 entanglements (kattō 葛藤): A term usually meaning “difficulties,” “complexities,” etc., but regularly used by Dōgen in the sense of the “intertwining” (of master and disciple). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Tangled vines.”

face.<sup>21</sup> Taking up the mind, they confer mind-to-mind to the mind and receive mind-to-mind from the mind; revealing the body, they confer the body, body-to-body.<sup>22</sup> In other regions and other lands as well, these are regarded as the original ancestors. From the Land of Cīnasthāna eastwards, only this house directly transmitted from the Buddha has the face-to-face conferral and face-to-face reception, and has been handing down the true eye that beholds the Tathāgata anew.

釋迦牟尼佛面を禮拜するとき、五十一世ならびに七佛祖宗、ならべるにあらず、つらなるにあらざれども、俱時の面授あり。一世も師をみざれば、弟子にあらず、弟子をみざれば、師にあらず。さだまりてあひみ・あひみえて、面授しきたれり、嗣法しきたるは、祖宗の面授處道現成なり。このゆえに、如來の面光を直拈しきたるなり。

When we pay obeisance to the face of Buddha Śākyamuni, there is a simultaneous face-to-face conferral of the ancestors of the fifty-one generations and the seven buddhas, though they are neither ranged side by side nor lined up one after the other.<sup>23</sup> If we do not meet a master during our lifetime, we are not a disciple; if we do not meet a disciple, we are not a master. Definitely to see each other and be seen by each other, to have conferred face-to-face and to have inherited the dharma — this is the realization of the way on which the ancestors confer face-to-face.<sup>24</sup> Therefore, they have directly taken up the radiance of the face of the Tathāgata.

しかあればすなはち、千年萬年、百劫億劫といへども、この面授、これ釋迦牟尼佛の面現成授なり。この佛祖現成せるには、世尊・迦葉、五十一世、七代祖宗の影現なり、光現成なり、身現成なり、心現成なり、失脚

21 receiving and conferring of the face (mensho no juju 面處の受授): “The face” (mensho 面處) could be taken here either as the subject or the object of the verb; and the phrase might also be read, “received and conferred where there is a face.”

22 they confer the body, body-to-body (shin o shinju suru 身を身授する): Here, “the body” has become the direct object that is conferred, whereas, in the preceding cases, “eye,” “face,” and “mind” are in the dative, and what is conferred is left unexpressed.

23 the ancestors of the fifty-one generations and the seven buddhas (gojūisse nara-bi ni shichi butsu soshū 五十一世ならびに七佛祖宗): i.e., the lineage of ancestors from the seven buddhas of the past through Dōgen himself, in the fifty-first generation after Buddha Śākyamuni; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas and ancestors.”

24 realization of the way on which the ancestors confer face-to-face (soshū no menju sho dō genjō 祖宗の面授處道現成): The expression dō genjō 道現成 occurs elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō in the sense “realization of words” — i.e., “statement,” a reading that seems unlikely here (or below, section 14); the unusual use of sho 處 in menju sho 面授處 here (as in mensho 面處, above, section 9) may not indicate a locus but does seem to presage this sense in section 14, below.

來なり、尖鼻來なり。一言いまだ領覽せず、半句いまだ不會せずといふとも、師、すでに裏頭より弟子をみ、弟子、すでに頂顙より師を拜しきたれるは、正傳の面授なり。

Thus, even after a thousand years, ten thousand years, a hundred kalpas, or a hundred thousand kalpas, this face-to-face conferral is the conferral in which the face of Buddha Śākyamuni appears. When these buddhas and ancestors appear, it is the appearance of the form of the World-Honored One, of Kāśyapa, of the fifty-one generations and seven generations of ancestors; it is the appearance of their radiance, the appearance of their bodies, the appearance of their minds; it is their coming with feet lost, their coming with noses sharp.<sup>25</sup> Even though a single word may not yet have been comprehended, nor a half line not understood, the master having seen the disciple from within and the disciple having bowed to the master from the crown of his head constitute the face-to-face conferral of the direct transmission.<sup>26</sup>

We should respect such a face-to-face conferral. Those who merely display some trace of the mind in the field of the mind are not necessarily to be greatly honored.<sup>27</sup> Those who do a face-to-face conferral while changing the face, who have a face-to-face conferral while turning the head, the skin of their faces must be three inches thick, the skin of their faces must be ten feet thin.<sup>28</sup> The skin of the face at this point must be 25 coming with feet lost (shikkya rai 失脚來): The term shikkya 失脚 (more often read shikkyaku) normally means “to lose one’s footing,” “to stumble,” hence, “to lose status”; some readers take it here to mean “coming without any feet.” The sense of the parallel expression “sharp (or pointed) nose” (senbi 尖鼻) here is also uncertain; one MS witness reads “lost nose” (shitsubi 失鼻). These terms do not occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

26 nor a half line not understood (hanku imada fue sezu 半句いまだ不會せず): Some readers take the negative fue 不會 (“not understood”) as suggesting a higher state “beyond understanding”; hence, “has not yet gone beyond the understanding of a half line.” A slightly less convoluted reading would be simply, “has not yet even failed to understand a half line.”

27 Those who merely display some trace of the mind in the field of the mind (wazuka ni shinseki o shinden ni arawaseru ga gotoku naran わづかに心跡を心田にあらはせるがごとくならん): The exact sense is uncertain; perhaps “those merely aware of their mental state.”

28 changing the face (kanmen 換面); turning the head (kaitō 廻頭): From the multivalent idiom “to turn the head and change the face” (kaitō kanmen 廻頭換面); here, the “great round mirror of the buddhas”; because the great round mirror is taken as the skin of the face, it is “without flaw or blur inside or out.”<sup>29</sup> The great round mirror has transmitted the great round mirror face-to-face.

まのあたり釋迦牟尼佛をみたてまつる正眼を正傳しきたれるは、釋迦牟尼佛よりも親曾なり、眼尖より前後三三の釋迦牟尼佛を見出現せしむるなり。かるがゆえに、釋迦牟尼佛をおもくしたてまつり、釋迦牟尼佛を恋慕したてまつらんは、この面授正傳をおもくし尊宗し、難値難遇の敬重禮拜すべし。すなはち如來を禮拜したてまつるなり、如來に面授せられたてまつるなり。あらたに面授如來の正傳參學の宛然なるを拜見するは、自己なりとおもひきたりつる自己なりとも、他己なりとも、愛惜すべきなり、護持すべきなり。

The direct transmission of the true eye that sees right before it Buddha Śākyamuni is more intimate than Buddha Śākyamuni himself; from the corner of the eye, it reveals a Buddha Śākyamuni of “three three before and after.”<sup>30</sup> For this reason, those who value Buddha Śākyamuni, who love Buddha Śākyamuni, should value and revere this direct transmission of the face-to-face conferral, should venerate and pay obeisance to what is hard to encounter, hard to meet. This is itself to pay obeisance to the Tathāgata, to receive the face-to-face conferral from the Tathāgata. Those who behold anew that the study of the direct transmission of the perhaps, expressing the identity or interdependence of master and disciple). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Turning the head and changing the face.”

the skin of their faces must be three inches thick (menpi kō sanzun naru beshi 面皮厚三寸なるべし): From a fixed expression meaning to have a “thick skin,” normally used in the sense to be “shameless” or “impudent.” The following “ten feet thin” (haku ichijō 薄一丈) is Dōgen’s play on the expression.

29 “great round mirror of the buddhas” (shobutsu daienkyō 諸佛大圓鏡); “without flaw or blur inside or out” (naige mu kaei 内外無瑕翳): From the story (on which Dōgen comments in his “Shōbōgenzō kokyō” 正法眼藏古鏡) of the Eighteenth Ancestor, Gayaśata, who is said to have been born accompanied by a mirror. The expressions here are a slight variant of the first two lines of Gayaśata’s verse (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:212b18-19):

諸佛大圓鑑、内外無瑕翳、兩人同得見、心眼皆相似。

The great round mirror of the buddhas,

Without flaw or blur inside or out.

Both people can see the same.

Mind and eye, all alike.

30 a Buddha Śākyamuni of “three three before and after” (zengo sansan no Shakamuni butsu 前後三三の釋迦牟尼佛): Probably meaning “multiple (or infinite) Buddhas Śākyamuni”; from a well-known but obscure saying known as “Mañjuśrī’s three three before and after” (Monju zengo sansan 文殊前後三三), appearing several times in Dōgen’s writings and commonly interpreted as indicating an incalculable number. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Three three in front, three three in back.”

Tathāgata of face-to-face conferral is precisely this should cherish it, should preserve it, whether in the self they have thought was their self or in another.<sup>31</sup>

屋裏に正傳しいはく、八塔を禮拜するものは、罪障解脱し、道果感得す。これ釋迦牟尼佛の道現成處を、生處に建立し、轉法輪處に建立し、成道處に建立し、涅槃處に建立し、曲女城邊にのこり、菴羅衛林にのこれる、大地を成じ、大空を成ぜり。乃至、聲・香・味・觸・法・色處等に塔成せるを禮拜するによりて、道果現成す。この八塔を禮拜するを、西天竺國のあまねき勤修として、在家・出家、天衆・人衆、きほふて禮拜供養するなり。これすなはち一卷の經典なり。佛經はかくのごとし。いはんやまた、三十七品の法を修行して、道果を箇箇生生に成就するは、釋迦牟尼佛の亘古亘今の修行修治の蹤跡を、處處の古路に流布せしめて、古今に歴然せるがゆえに成道す。

In the direct transmission within our house, it is said that those who pay obeisance to the eight stūpas will be liberated from their offenses and attain the fruit of the way.<sup>32</sup> These are places manifesting the way of Buddha Śākyamuni — erected at the place of his birth, erected at the place where he turned the wheel of dharma, erected at the place where he attained the way, erected at the place where he entered nirvāṇa, preserved in the vicinity of Kanyākubja, preserved at the Amrapālī Grove — that manifest the whole earth and manifest the whole sky.<sup>33</sup> And so on, down to stūpas formed from sounds, smells, tastes, tactile objects, colors, and forms, by paying obeisance to which the fruit of the way is manifest.

31 the study of the direct transmission of the Tathāgata of face-to-face conferral is precisely this (menju nyorai no shōden sangaku no ennen naru 面授如來の正傳參學の宛然なる): A tentative reading of a phrase difficult to parse; the translation takes it to mean that the study directly transmitted in the lineage of masters and disciples is the study of the Tathāgata present in each generation of the face-to-face conferral. On this reading, the unexpressed object of the following “cherish” (aijaku 愛惜) and “preserve” (goji 護持) might be taken either as the “study” or as the “Tathāgata.”

32 eight stūpas (hattō 八塔): Reference to the tradition that stūpas were erected at eight sites associated with events in the life of Buddha Śākyamuni: typically given as Kapilavastu, where the Buddha was born; Magadha, where he achieved buddhahood; Vārāṇasī, where he first preached; Jetavana, where he revealed his spiritual powers; Kanyākubja, where he descended from Indra’s heaven; Rājagṛha, where his saṃgha was purified; Vaiśālī, where he determined his lifespan; and Kuśinagara, where he entered nirvāṇa. (See, e.g., Fo shuo ba da lingta minghao jing 佛說八大靈塔名號經, T.1685.32:773a7-15.)

manifest the whole earth and manifest the whole sky (daichi o jō ji, daikū o jō zeri 大地を成じ、大空を成ぜり): Or, perhaps, “form the whole earth and form the whole sky”; the sense seems to be that the stūpas represent not only the way of the buddhas but all of heaven and earth.

Paying obeisance to these eight stūpas is a wide-spread practice of the Land of Sindhu in the West, where householders and renunciants, devas and humans, vie with one another to pay obeisance and make offerings. This is none other than a role of scripture; such are the sūtras of the buddhas. Needless to say, then, those who achieve the fruit of the way in life after life by practicing the thirty-seven dharmas attain the way because the traces of Buddha Śākyamuni's practice and discipline spanning past and present have been disseminated on the old paths everywhere and are obvious in past and present.<sup>34</sup>

We should realize how many renewals of frost and flowers those eight multi-storied stūpas have witnessed.<sup>35</sup> Although often assailed by wind and rain, their merit has left its mark on emptiness, left its mark on form, and the generosity with which it is still shared with people today remains undiminished. And when we now try to practice those faculties, powers, awakening, and path, while there may be the afflictions and the impediment of delusions, when we practice them, their power is still fresh.<sup>36</sup>

34 thirty-seven dharmas (sanjūshichi hon no hō 三十七品の法): S. saptatrimśad-bodhi-pakṣikā-dharmāḥ; a venerable listing, found throughout the Buddhist canon, of seven (sometimes overlapping) sets of spiritual desiderata: (1) the four abodes of mindfulness (shinenjū 四念住; S. smṛty-upasthāna), (2) the four right abandonments (shishōdan 四正斷; S. samyak-prahāṇa), (3) the four bases of spiritual power (shijinsoku 四神足; S. ṛddhi-pāda), (4) the five faculties (gokon 五根; S. indriya), (5) the five powers (goriki 五力; S. bala), (6) the seven limbs of awakening (shichikakushi 七覺支; S. bodhyaṅga), and (7) the eightfold path (hasshōdō 八正道; S. mārga). Dōgen discusses the list in his “Shōbōgenzō sanjūshichi hon bodai bunpō” 正法眼藏三十七品菩提分法.

35 frost and flowers (sōka 霜華): i.e., “autumns and springs”; a literary expression for “years.”

36 faculties, powers, awakening, and path (kano kon riki kaku dō かの根・力・覺・道): Categories of the thirty-seven dharmas mentioned in the preceding section: the five spiritual faculties (gokon 五根), five spiritual powers (goriki 五力), seven limbs of awakening (shichi kakushi 七覺支), and eightfold path (hasshōdō 八聖道).

Such is the merit of Buddha Śākyamuni. It goes without saying that the present face-to-face conferral should not be compared to those.<sup>37</sup> Those thirty-seven factors of bodhi have as their basis this face of the Buddha, mind of the Buddha, body of the Buddha, way of the Buddha, tip of the Buddha, tongue of the Buddha, and so on.<sup>38</sup> That accumulation of merit of the eight stūpas likewise has as its foundation the face of the Buddha and the rest. Now, as those who study the buddha dharma, when we seek to tread the life-saving path to liberation, in the quiet moments of our days and nights, we should think well and work hard on this, we should rejoice and be glad.

いはゆるわがくには、他國よりもすぐれ、わが道は、ひとり無上なり。他方には、われらがごとくならざるともがらおほかり。わがくに、わが道の無上獨尊なるといふは、靈山の衆會、あまねく十方に化導すといへども、少林の正嫡、まさしく震旦の教主なり、曹溪の兒孫、いまに面授せり。このとき、これ佛法あらたに入泥入水の好時節なり。このとき證果せずば、いづれのときか證果せん、このとき斷惑せずば、いづれのときか斷惑せん、このとき作佛ならざらんは、いづれのときか作佛ならん、このとき坐佛ならざらんは、いづれのときか行佛ならん。審細の功夫なるべし。

That is, [we should think] our land is superior to other lands, our way alone is unsurpassed; in other regions, there are many who are not our equal. The reason our land, our way, is unsurpassed and uniquely honored is that, while the assembly on Vulture Peak may have guided beings widely in the ten directions, the direct successor of Shaolin was truly the master of the teaching in Cīnasthāna, and the descendants of Caoxi conferred it face-to-face to the present.<sup>39</sup> Now is a good time, when the

37 should not be compared to those (karera ni hijun su bekarazu かれらに比準すべからず): I.e., is beyond comparison with those — the antecedents of “those” (karera) being the merits (kudoku 功德) of the “eight stūpas” and “thirty-seven factors.”

tip of the Buddha (bussen 佛尖): An odd locution, perhaps recalling the “corner of the eye” (gansen 眼尖) in section 13, above. One manuscript witness has the less problematic “radiance of the buddha” (bukkō 佛光).

39 assembly on Vulture Peak (Ryōzen no shue 靈山の衆會): I.e., the teachings of Buddha Śākyamuni to his assembly on Vulture Peak.

direct successor of Shaolin (Shōrin no shōteki 少林の正嫡): I.e., Bodhidharma, at the Shaolinsi 少林寺.

master of the teaching in Cīnasthāna (Shintan no kyōshu 震旦の教主): I.e., founder of the teaching in China. The term “master of the teaching” (kyōshu 教主) is regularly used for a religious founder, including the Buddha.

descendants of Caoxi (Sōkei no jison 曹溪の兒孫): I.e., the descendants of the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng of Caoxi 曹溪慧能.

buddha dharma enters anew into the mud and into the water.<sup>40</sup> If we do not verify the fruit now, when will we verify the fruit? If we do not cut off the delusions now, when will we cut off the delusions? If now we are not “making a buddha,” when will we make a buddha? If now we are not “a seated buddha,” when will we be “a practicing buddha”?<sup>41</sup> We should work on this in detail.

釋迦牟尼佛、かたじけなく迦葉尊者に附嘱面授するにいはく、吾有正法眼藏、附嘱摩訶迦葉とあり。嵩山會上には、菩提達磨尊者まさしく二祖にしめしていはく、汝得吾髓。

Buddha Śākyamuni, in kindly making a face-to-face conferral of his bequest to Venerable Kāśyapa, said, “I have a treasury of the true dharma eye; I bestow it on Mahākāśyapa.” At the assembly on Mount Song, Venerable Bodhidharma truly addressed the Second Ancestor, saying, “You’ve gotten my marrow.”

[51:19] {2:60}

はかりしりぬ、正法眼藏を面授し、汝得吾髓の面授なるは、ただこの面授のみなり。この正當恁麼時、なんぢがひごろの骨髓を透脱するとき、佛祖面授あり。大悟を面授し、心印を面授するも、一隅の特地なり。傳盡にあらずといへども、いまだ欠悟の道理を參究せず。

It is obvious here that what makes the face-to-face conferral of the “treasury of the true dharma eye” and what constitutes the face-to-face conferral of “you’ve gotten my marrow” is just this face-to-face confer-

40 good time, when the buddha dharma enters anew into the mud and into the water (buppō aratani nyūdei nissui no kō jisetsu 佛法あらたに入泥入水の好時節): From the common image of teaching the dharma as “dragged through the mud and drenched with water” (dadei taisui 挖泥帶水); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dragged through the mud and drenched with water.” The verb tense is unmarked here; hence, it is unclear whether Dōgen is claiming that his age is a good time for Buddhism to spread or a good time in which Buddhism is spreading. In either case, the claim is in marked contrast to laments found elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō that Dōgen and his readers were living in a peripheral land in a benighted age.

41 “making a buddha” (sabutsu 作佛); “a seated buddha” (zabutsu 坐佛); “a practicing buddha” (gyōbutsu 行佛): The first two expressions reflect the famous conversation on meditation, often cited by Dōgen, between Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744) and Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709-788) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:240c18ff). When Mazu says he is practicing seated meditation (zazen 坐禪) in order to “make a buddha” (sabutsu 作佛), Nanyue asks him, “Are you studying seated meditation or are you studying seated buddha (zabutsu 坐佛)?” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nanyue polishes a tile.” Dōgen comments on this conversation at length in the “Shōbōgenzō zazen shin” 正法眼藏坐禪箴. The term gyōbutsu 行佛 here might well be read “walking buddha” (in contrast to the preceding “seated buddha”); the translation opts instead for the sense, often found in the Shōbōgenzō, that identifies buddhahood with Buddhist practice (as, e.g., in “Shōbōgenzō gyōbutsu iigi” 正法眼藏行佛威儀).

ral.<sup>42</sup> At this very moment, when you transcend your everyday bones and marrow, there is the face-to-face conferral of the buddhas and ancestors. To confer the great awakening face-to-face and to confer the mind seal face-to-face are also particular partial instances of this.<sup>43</sup> While they may not be exhaustive of transmission, they have not yet investigated the principle of lacking awakening.<sup>44</sup>

おほよそ佛祖大道は、唯面授面受、受面授面のみなり。さらに剰法あらず、虧闕あらず。この面授のあふにあへる自己の面目をも、隨喜歡喜、信受奉行すべきなり。

In sum, the great way of the buddhas and ancestors is just face-to-face conferral and face-to-face reception, receiving face-to-face and conferring face-to-face. There is nothing left over, nothing missing. And we should rejoice in, be glad about, faithfully accept, and reverently practice our own face encountered in the encounter with this face-to-face conferral.

佛道の面授かくのごとくなる道理を、かつて見聞せず、參學なきともがあるなかに、大宋國仁宗皇帝の御宇、景祐年中に、薦福寺の承古禪師といふものあり。

Among those who have never seen or heard of, who are without study of, the truth that the face-to-face conferral in the way of the buddhas is like this, there was, during the Jingyou years in the reign of the Emperor Renzong in the Land of the Great Song, a certain Chan Master Chenggu of the Jianfu Monastery.<sup>47</sup>

45 I was granted a certain access to the interior of the hall (yaya dōō o chōko seraru やや堂奥を聴許せらる): i.e., Dōgen was admitted to private interviews with Rujing, beginning (according to the Hōkyō ki 寶慶記) in the seventh month of 1225.

when I somewhat sloughed off body and mind, having been entrusted with a face-to-face conferral, I came back to the Land of Japan (wazuka ni shinjin o datsuraku suru ni, menju o hōnin suru koto arite, nihon koku ni honrai seri わづかに身心を脱落するに、面授を保任することありて、日本國に本來せり): The temporal sequence here is somewhat confusing, since Dōgen has earlier said (in section 3, above) and repeats here that his face-to-face conferral took place at his first meeting with Rujing, in June of 1225, not at his subsequent experience of “body and mind sloughed off” (shinjin datsuraku 身心脱落), thought to have occurred later that summer. (For this expression, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Body and mind sloughed off.”) Though the exact date is uncertain, Dōgen likely returned to Japan in the second half of 1227. The English “came back” here translates the odd predicate honrai 本來 (“originally came”), which some readers suggest is an allusion to the first line of the transmission verse of Bodhidharma (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:219c18):

吾本來此土、傳法救迷情。

I originally came to this land

To transmit the dharma and save the deluded.

いま、なんぢ、雲門大師をしり、雲門大師をみることをたとひゆるすとも、雲門大師、まのあたりなんぢをみるやいまだしや。雲門大師、なんぢをみずば、なんぢ、承嗣雲門大師不得ならん。雲門大師、いまだなんぢをゆるさざるがゆえに、なんぢもまた、雲門大師、われをみる、といはず。しりぬ、なんぢ、雲門大師といまだ相見せざりといふことを。

Now, even if we were to accept that you know Great Master Yunmen and that you see Great Master Yunmen, has Great Master Yunmen personally seen you or not? If Great Master Yunmen does not see you, you could not “succeed Great Master Yunmen.” Since Great Master Yunmen has not acknowledged you, even you do not say, “Great Master Yunmen saw me.” We know that you and Great Master Yunmen never met each other.

Of the seven buddhas and all the other buddhas of past, present, and future, which buddha or ancestor inherited the dharma without master and disciple meeting each other? Do not say that Huangbo's “vision wasn't perfect.” How can you gauge Huangbo's activities, or gauge Huangbo's words? Huangbo is an old buddha, with exhaustive examination of dharma inheritance. You have never seen, heard or studied even in your dreams the principle of dharma inheritance. Huangbo inherited the dharma from his master and maintained his ancestor.<sup>51</sup> Huangbo met with his master and saw his master. 52 You have seen no master whatsoever (nanji wa, subete shi o mizu なんぢは、すべて師をみず): Chenggu is said to have been studying under Fuyan Liangya 福嚴良雅 when he had his insight into Yunmen’s teachings; presumably, then, we are to understand here that he had no true encounter with this teacher (or that this teacher was not a true master, or both).

雲門大師入滅已得一百餘年なれども雲門に承嗣す、といふ。なんちにゆゆしきちからありて雲門に承嗣するか、三歳の孩兒よりはかなし。一千年のち雲門に嗣法せんものは、なんちに十倍せるちからあらん。

You say, although it is “already more than one hundred years since the extinction” of Great Master Yunmen, you have succeeded Yunmen. Did you succeed Yunmen because you had some awesome ability? That is less likely than a child of three. Someone inheriting the dharma of Yunmen after a thousand years would be ten times more able than you.

われいまなんちをすくふ、しばらく話頭を參學すべし。百丈の道取する子向後莫承嗣大師否の道取は、馬大師に嗣法せよ、といふにはあらぬなり。しばらくなんち獅子奮迅話を參學すべし、烏龜倒上樹話を參學して、進歩退歩の活路を參究すべし。嗣法に凭るの參學力あるなり。黄檗のいふ恐喪我兒孫のことば、すべてなんち、はかるべからず。我、の道取、および、兒孫、の人、これ、たれなりとかしれる、審細に參學すべし。かくれずあらはれて道現成せり。

Now, I shall come to your rescue. We should study the topic a bit. Baizhang's saying “Won't you hereafter be an heir of the Great Master?” was not saying, “inherit the dharma of Great Master Ma.” You should study a bit the talk of the lion aroused; studying the talk of the turtle climbing backward up the tree, you should investigate the life-saving path on which we step forward and step back.<sup>57</sup> In inheriting the dharma,

56 sun face and moon face of the way of the buddhas (butsudō no nichimen gachimēn 佛道の日面月面): I.e., the passage of time in Buddhism, playing on “sun” (day) and “moon” (month); likely an allusion to the words of Mazu himself, who, when he was unwell, described his condition as “sun-faced buddha (said to live 1800 years), moon-faced buddha (who lives for one day)”; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Sun face, moon face.”

57 talk of the lion aroused (shishi funjin wa 獅子奮迅話): What “talk” (wa 話) is referred to here is uncertain and has been the subject of various speculations. Though a source has not been identified, the “lion” may represent an oblique reference to the famous “roar” (katsu 喝), mentioned above by Chenggu, that Mazu is supposed to have given Baizhang. The expression “the lion aroused” (shishi funjin 獅子奮迅; also written 師子奮迅) is a common metaphor for awesome power, especially of the buddha — as in the buddha's “samādhi of the lion aroused” (shishi funjin zanmai 獅子奮迅三昧).

talk of the turtle climbing backward up the tree (uki tō jōju wa 烏龜倒上樹話): Reference to a comment, by Xiangshan Yunliang 香山蘊良 (dates unknown), on the story that there is such power of study.<sup>58</sup> You could not fathom anything of Huang-bo's words, "I fear I would lose my descendants." Do you know who "my" refers to, or who his "descendants" are? You should study this in detail. It has been stated clearly, with nothing hidden.<sup>59</sup>

しかあるを、佛國禪師惟白といふ、佛祖の嗣法にくらきによりて、承古を雲門の法嗣に排列せり、あやまりなるべし。晩進しらずして、承古も參學あらん、とおもふことなかれ。

However, a certain Weibo, Chan Master Foguo, in the dark as he was on the dharma inheritance of the buddhas and ancestors, listed Chenggu as a dharma heir of Yunmen — surely an error.<sup>60</sup> Latecomers, not knowing this, must not think that Chenggu had any study.<sup>61</sup>

なんちがごとく文字によりて嗣法すべくは、經書をみて發明するものは、みな釋迦牟尼佛に嗣法するか、さらにしかあらざるなり。經書によれる發明、かならず正師の印可をもとむるなり。

If you could inherit the dharma through words and letters, does everyone who gains an understanding by reading sūtra texts inherit the dharma from Buddha Śākyamuni? Surely not. Those who gain an understanding based on sūtra texts always seek the seal of approval of a true master.

---

Baizhang once rolled up the abbot, Mazu's 馬祖, prostration mat before the latter could make bows to the Buddha on it; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Iron bull."

58 In inheriting the dharma, there is such power of study (shihō ni inmo no sangakuriki aru nari 嗣法に凭麼の參學力あるなり): Or, perhaps, "in those who inherit the dharma . . ." The antecedent of "such" (inmo 凭麼) here is unclear; perhaps (as in section 26, above), the ability to investigate the meaning of Baizhang and Mazu's words.

59 It has been stated clearly, with nothing hidden (kakurezu arawarete dō genjō seri かくれずあらはれて道現成せり): Probably meaning that what Mazu says is obvious. Some readers take the expression dō genjō 道現成 as meaning "the way is realized."

60 Weibo, Chan Master Foguo (Bukkoku zenji Ihaku 佛國禪師惟白): Fayun Weibo 法雲惟白 (dates unknown), a disciple of Fayun Faxiu 法雲法秀 (1027-1090) in the Yunmen lineage, was the compiler of the Jianzhong Jingguo xudeng lu 建中靖國續燈錄, which includes Chenggu's biographical notice among the descendants of Yunmen (at ZZ.136:53b18).

61 Latecomers, not knowing this, must not think that Chenggu had any study (banshin shirazu shite, Jōko mo sangaku aran, to omou koto nakare 晩進しらずして、承古も參學あらん、とおもふことなかれ): The manuscript of the twenty-eight-text Himitsu Shōbōgenzō ends here, with the colophon given below.

Chenggu, from what you say, you have not even read the words of Yunmen. Only those who have seen the words of Yunmen have inherited the dharma of Yunmen. You have not seen Yunmen with your own eyes; you have not seen yourself with your own eyes; you have not seen Yunmen with Yunmen's eyes; you have not seen yourself with Yunmen's eyes. There are many things like this you have not yet investigated. You should keep on buying straw sandals, seek out a true master, and inherit the dharma.<sup>62</sup> Do not say that you inherited from Great Master Yunmen. If you say it, you must be the follower of an other path. Even if Baizhang were to say it, it would be a big mistake.

INTRODUCTION

This chapter was composed and presented to the assembly at Kōshōji, in the winter of 1241. It represents number 52 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō, number 15 in the Honzan edition, and number 1 of fascicle 3 in the twenty-eight-text collection; it is not found in the sixty-chapter compilation.

The “Busso” chapter is not an essay; it is merely a list of the fifty-seven names in the Buddhist lineage leading to the author. The list is divided into three sections: the seven buddhas of the past, ending with Buddha Śākyamuni; the twenty-eight Indian ancestors, ending with Bodhidharma; and the twenty-two generations of Chinese masters, ending with the author’s master, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨. The list is framed by an opening remark to the effect that these buddhas and ancestors are realized through the act of venerating them, and a closing report that, in the summer of 1225, Dōgen himself venerated the ancestor Rujing. It was, he says, two buddhas together.

The realization of the buddhas and ancestors is taking up the buddhas and ancestors and having an audience with them.<sup>1</sup> It is not only a matter of past, present, and future: it must be beyond even what is beyond the buddha.<sup>2</sup> Truly, taking up those who have maintained the faces of the buddhas and ancestors, we pay obeisance and encounter them. Putting the virtues of the buddhas and ancestors on display, we have been maintaining them, we have been personally verifying them.<sup>3</sup>

1 The realization of the buddhas and ancestors is taking up the buddhas and ancestors and having an audience with them (sore, busso no genjō wa, busso o konen shite bugon suru nari それ、佛祖の現成は、佛祖を擧拈して奉観するなり): The verb konen 擧拈 is regularly used in the sense “to take up [a topic] for consideration”; hence, one reading of this sentence might be that the buddhas and ancestors come alive, as it were, in our study of their records. The translation leaves untranslated the first word of the Japanese sentence, sore それ, reading it simply as the initial particle sore 夫 (C. fu) used at the head of a discussion; however, the early MSS write this word 宗禮, in which the Chinese glyphs could be read for their sound value (as man'yōgana 万葉仮名) for sore and/or for their meaning as something like “obeisance to the ancestors.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas and ancestors.”

2 It is not only a matter of past, present, and future (ka gen tōrai nomi ni arazu 過・現・當來のみにあらず): The grammatical subject is unexpressed; the sentence could also be read “they [i.e., the buddhas and ancestors] are not merely past, present, and future; they must be beyond even what is beyond the buddha (butsu kōjō 佛向上).” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Beyond the buddha.”

3 Putting the virtues of the buddhas and ancestors on display, we have been maintaining them, we have been personally verifying them (busso no kudoku o genko seshimete, jūji shikitarī, taishō shikitareri 佛祖の功德を現擧せしめて、住持しきたり、體證しきたれり): The grammatical subject is unstated and could also be taken as “they” (i.e., “the buddhas and ancestors”). The term genko 現擧, translated here “display” does not occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; it could be taken to mean either to take up the virtues for study or to manifest the virtues. The latter reading is suggested by the unusual term taishō 體證, “personally verify,” or “realize with the body.”

4 The Most Reverend Buddha Vipāśyin (meaning “extensive explication”) (Bibashi butsu dai oshō shi un kōsetsu 毘婆尸佛大和尚此云廣說): Here begins a list of the seven buddhas of the past with which accounts of the Zen lineage sometimes start; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas.” The parenthetical remarks on the Chinese meanings of the names are likely taken from the Lüzong xinxue mingju 律宗新學名句 (ZZ.105:648b1), a work compiled in 1094 by the monk Weixian 惟顯. His interpretation of vipāśyin here as “extensive explication” (kōsetsu 廣說) suggests that he associated the name with the Sanskrit vibhāṣa (bibasha 毘婆沙), rather than vipāśyin (“insightful”).

5 “all-merciful” (issai ji 一切慈): The source of this meaning is unclear; the name Viśvabhū is more commonly interpreted as “pervasive being” (issai u 一切有) or “pervasive arising” (issai shō 一切生).

6 “golden sage” (kon sennin 金仙人): Apparently, a confusion with the following, Kanakamuni.

7 “drinking light” (onkō 飲光): A common Chinese interpretation of kāśyapa, possibly from kas (“to shine”) and pa (“to drink”). The Sanskrit name is more often associated with the tortoise (kaśyapa).

8 (The seventh buddha) The Most Reverend Buddha Śākyamuni (meaning “forbearance and quiescence”) (shichi butsu Shakamuni butsu dai oshō shi un nōnin jakumoku 七佛釋迦牟尼佛大和尚此云能忍寂默): The initial parenthetical can be understood, “here ends the list of the seven buddhas.” The interpretation of the name Śākyamuni (normally, “sage of the Śākya”) as “forbearance and quiescence” is likely derived from saha (“enduring”) and muni (“silence,” “silent ascetic”).

While some of the names on the list are attested or even well-known in Indic sources, others are reconstructions, more or less tentative, from the Chinese; indeed, for a goodly number of the names, more than one such reconstruction has been proposed, but no attempt is made here to provide, or adjudicate among, the alternatives. Although the set of Indian ancestors varies in early Chan sources, by Dōgen's day the members had been largely fixed; with slight orthographic variants, Dōgen's list follows that found in the influential Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:204b28-c22, 210c27-211a9).

The Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:204c22) uses the more common Longshu 龍樹.

INTRODUCTION

This chapter represents number 53 of the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō and number 59 of the Honzan edition; it does not occur in the sixty-chapter compilation. The text bears a colophon stating that it was composed in December of 1243, some months after its author had moved from the capital to mountainous Echizen province. Outside his quarters, he notes in the colophon, the snow was already three feet deep.

In the dead of winter, Dōgen writes of the Chinese plum, one of the first trees to bloom in the early spring, often while snow is still on its branches. But the “Baika” chapter is not a celebration of spring flowers; it is a study, rather, of verses on the plum found in the recorded sayings of Dōgen’s Chinese master, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, a work he had received from China in the preceding year. Our text here comments on no less than eight such verses, emphasizing the image of the plum as the eye of the Buddha handed down in the lineage of the ancestors, and reading Rujing’s verses in conversation with the images of flowers used in the Chan literature on transmission.

My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong, was the most reverend chief of hall, in the thirtieth generation, of the Jingde Monastery at Tiantong, renowned Mount Taibai, in the Qingyuan Prefecture of the Great Song.<sup>1</sup>

1 My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong (senshi Tendō kobutsu 先師天童古佛): i.e., Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227). Tiantong is the mountain name of the Jingdesi 景德寺, located in the modern Yinzhou 鄞州 of Ningbo, Zhejiang Province. "Chief of hall" (dōjō 堂上) refers to the abbot.

2 In a convocation (jōdō 上堂): From the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:128a26-b1.

3 Tiantong's first words of mid-winter (Tendō chūtō dai ikku 天童仲冬第一句): Perhaps meaning something like, "my word for the month." "Mid-winter" (chūtō 仲冬) refers to the second month of winter, corresponding to the eleventh month of the lunar calendar.

*Till the whole earth is everywhere spread with snow.<sup>4</sup>
 The old plum, for no reason at all,

いま開演ある老梅樹、それ太無端なり、忽開華す、自結菓す。あるいは春をなし、あるいは冬をなす。あるいは狂風をなし、あるいは暴雨をなす。あるいは衲僧の頂門なり、あるいは古佛の眼睛なり。あるいは草木となれり、あるいは清香となれり。驀割なる神變神怪、きはむべからず。乃至大地・高天、明日・清月、これ老梅樹の樹功より樹功せり、葛藤の葛藤を結纏するなり。老梅樹の忽開華のとき、華開世界起なり。華開世界起の時節、すなはち春到なり。この時節に、開五葉の一華あり。この一華時、よく三華・四華・五華あり、百華・千華・萬華・億華あり、乃至無數華あり。これらの華開、みな老梅樹の一枝・兩枝・無數枝の不可誇なり。優曇華・優鉢羅華等、おなじく老梅樹華の一指・兩指なり。おほよそ一切の華開は、老梅樹の恩給なり。人中・天上の老梅樹あり、老梅樹中に人間・天堂を樹功せり。百千華を人天華と稱す、萬億華は佛祖華なり。恁麼の時節を、諸佛出現於世と喚作するなり、祖師本來茲土と喚作するなり。

The old plum tree expounded here is “for no reason at all”: it “suddenly blooms”; it spontaneously bears fruit. Or it “makes the spring”; or it makes the winter. Or it makes the “wild winds”; or it makes the “rough rain.” Or it is the “pate” of the “patch-robed monks”; or it is the eye of the Old Buddha.<sup>5</sup> Or it has become the “grass and trees”; or it has become the “purity” and “fragrance.” Its “swift” miraculous “strange transformations” cannot be comprehended. “Till the whole earth,” the high heavens, the bright sun, and clear moon — their “tree virtue” is established from the tree virtue of the old plum tree; it is tangled vines entwining tangled vines.<sup>6</sup> When the old plum “suddenly blooms,” it is “a

4 Till the whole earth is everywhere spread with snow (naishi kōkon daichi setsu manman 乃至交袞大地雪漫漫): Taking kōkon 交袞 as equivalent to konkon 袞袞, in the sense “continuous,” “uninterrupted.”

5 eye of the Old Buddha (kobutsu no ganzei 古佛の眼睛): The translation takes this as a reference to “the Old Buddha of Tiantong” (Tendō kobutsu 天童古佛), but it could well be read as “eye of the old buddhas.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye.”

6 their “tree virtue” is established from the tree virtue of the old plum tree (kore rō baiju no jukō yori jukō seri これ老梅樹の樹功より樹功せり): Probably meaning something like, “they are what they are by virtue of the properties of the old plum tree.” The awkward English struggles to preserve a pun on the term jukō 樹功 (“tree virtue”), which also has the sense “establish,” “accomplish,” etc. The pun is repeated later in this section in the phrase, “the human realm and heavenly mansions have been established” (ningen tendō o jukō seri 人間天堂を樹功せり).

tangled vines entwining tangled vines (kattō no kattō o ketten suru nari 葛藤の葛藤を結纏するなり): Or “entanglements entwining entanglements”; probably meaning that the old plum tree, on the one hand, and the earth, heaven, sun, and moon, on the other, are completely intertwined with each other. The phrasing recalls Rujing’s saying, quoted in “Shōbōgenzō kattō” 正法眼藏葛藤:

flower opens, and the world arises.”<sup>7</sup> The moment when “a flower opens, and the world arises” is precisely the arrival of spring. In this moment, there is the “one flower” that “opens five petals.”<sup>8</sup>

At the time of this “one blossom,” there are “three” blossoms, “four” blossoms, “five” blossoms; there are a hundred blossoms, a thousand blossoms, ten thousand blossoms, a hundred thousand blossoms; until there are “countless blossoms.” All their bloomings are “nothing to boast of” on one branch, two branches, or countless branches. The udumbara flower, the utpala flower, and the like, are all one finger or two fingers of the old plum blossoms.<sup>9</sup> In sum, all bloomings are gifts bestowed by the old plum tree. There is an old plum tree among humans and in the heavens above; and within the old plum tree, the human realm and heavenly mansions have been established. Hundreds of thousands of blossoms are called “human and deva blossoms”; myriads of koṭis of blossoms are “buddha and ancestor blossoms.” Such a moment is called “the buddhas appear in this world”; it is called the Ancestral Master “originally came to this land.”<sup>10</sup>

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “‘Tangled vines,” and “The bottle gourd vine entwines the bottle gourd.”

7 “a flower opens, and the world arises” (ke kai sekai ki 華開世界起): The final line of the dharma transmission verse attributed to Bodhidharma’s master, Prajñātāra. See Supplementary Notes.

8 “one flower” that “opens five petals” (kai goyō no ikke 開五葉の一華): Allusion to a line in the transmission verse attributed to Bodhidharma that Dōgen will quote below, section 12 (see Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:219c17-18):

吾本來茲土、傳法救迷情、一華開五葉、結果自然成。

To transmit the dharma and save deluded sentient beings.

A single flower opens five petals;

The fruit forms, ripening naturally of itself.

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “A single flower opens five petals.”

9 udumbara* flower (udonge 優曇華); utpala* flower (upparage 優鉢羅華; also read ubarage): The former is a plant said to blossom only once every three thousand years; hence, used in Buddhism as a symbol of what is rare and precious. The latter is a flower most often taken as a blue lotus.

one finger or two fingers of the old plum blossoms (rō baijuka no isshi ryōshi 老梅樹華の一指・兩指): The sense of “finger” here is uncertain; perhaps an allusion to Zhuangzi’s saying, “heaven and earth are one finger” (tiandi yizhi ye 天地一指也, KR5c0134.001.008b), typically used to suggest the equality of things. Some manuscript witnesses read the homophonous “branch” (shi 枝) here for “finger” (shi 指).

10 “the buddhas appear in this world” (shobutsu shutsugen o se 諸佛出現於世): A fixed phrase occurring often in the literature; here, perhaps, especially associated with

The turning here of this old buddha's dharma wheel at the extreme limits of all the worlds is the moment when all humans and devas gain the way. Even the clouds and rain, wind and water, as well as the grass, trees, and insects — there is nothing that does not receive the benefits of this dharma. Turned by this dharma wheel, even heaven and earth, countries and lands, are brisk and lively.<sup>12</sup> To hear words never heard before means to hear the present words; to get what has never been before is what getting the present dharma is called.<sup>13</sup> In short, it is a dharma wheel one could never experience without extraordinary good fortune.

[53:6] {2:71}

Throughout the one hundred eighty or so provinces of the Land of the Great Song today, there are mountain monasteries and village temples, their numbers beyond calculation. Within them live many monks. Yet those that have never seen my former master, the Old Buddha, are many, while those that have seen him are few. Not to mention how few there must be that have experienced his words. Not to ask whether there could be many that have met and greeted him. Not to mention that those admitted to the interior of the hall are less than a few.<sup>14</sup> Not to mention those permitted to pay obeisance to my former master's skin, flesh, bones, and marrow, eyes and face.

先師古佛、たやすく僧家の討掛搭をゆるさず。よのつねにいはく、無道心慣頭、我箇裏不可也、すなはちおいひだす。出たいはく、不一本分人、要作甚麼。かくのごときの狗子は騒人なり、掛搭不得といふ。まさしくこれをみ、まのあたりこれをきく。ひそかにおもふらくは、かれらいかなる罪根ありてか、このくにの人なりといへども、共住をゆるされざる。われなにのさいはひありてか、遠方外國の種子なりといへども、掛搭をゆるさるのみにあらず、ほしきままに堂奥に出入して、尊儀を禮拜し、法道をきく。愚暗なりといへども、むなしかるべからざる結良縁なり。先師の、宋朝を化せしとき、なほ參得人あり、參不得人ありき。先師古佛、すでに宋朝をさりぬ、暗夜よりもくらからん。ゆえはいかん。先師古佛より前後に、先師古佛のごとくなる古佛なきがゆえに、しかいふなり。

My former master, the Old Buddha, did not lightly permit monks to request registration. He would always say, “Those inveterately lacking the mind of the way aren't permitted at my place,” and immediately chase them out. After they were gone, he would say, “Not a person of the original lot — what could he do?”<sup>15</sup> He would say that dogs like that bother the others and cannot register.

Actually seeing this, personally hearing this, I thought to myself, “What evil roots do they have that, though natives of this land, they are not permitted to stay with us? What good fortune do I have that, though 14 those admitted to the interior of the hall (dōō o yurusaruru 堂奥をゆるさるる): i.e., those granted private interviews.

15 “Not a person of the original lot” (fu itsu honbun nin 不一本分人): i.e., an inauthentic type, not in accord with his true nature.

the seed of a distant foreign land, I am not only permitted to register but, going in and out of the interior of the hall at will, I pay obeisance to his revered figure and hear his words of dharma? Dimwitted though I am, I have formed a good karmic relation that is hardly in vain.”

Even when my former master was teaching in the Song, there were those able to practice and those unable to practice with him. Since my former master, the Old Buddha, has departed the Song, it is darker there than a dark night.<sup>16</sup> Why is this? I say this because, before and after my former master, the Old Buddha, there has not been an old buddha the likes of my former master, the Old Buddha.

しかあれば、いまこれを見聞せんときの晩學おもふべし、自餘の諸方の人天も、いまのごとくの法輪を見聞すらん、參學すらん、とおもふことなかれ。雪裏の梅華は一現の曇華なり。ひごろはいくめぐりか我佛如來の正法眼睛を拜見しながら、いたづらに瞬目を蹉過して、破顔せざる。而今すでに雪裏の梅華まさしく如來眼睛なりと正傳し、承當す。これを拈じて頂門眼とし、眼中睛とす。さらに梅華裏に參到して梅華を究盡するに、さらに疑著すべき因縁いまだきたらず。これすでに天上天下、唯我獨尊の眼睛なり、法界中尊なり。

Thus, when later students now see and hear this, they should reflect on it; do not think that humans and devas in other quarters also see and hear or study a dharma wheel like the present one. The “plum blossoms in the snow” are the udumbara flower that appears but once.<sup>17</sup> How many times, day after day, while looking upon the eye of true dharma of our Buddha, the Tathāgata, have we futilely missed his blink and failed to smile?<sup>18</sup> Now, we receive and accede to the direct transmission that the plum blossom in the snow is truly the “eye” of the Tathāgata. We take it up as the eye on the forehead, as the pupil of the eye.<sup>19</sup> Further, when 16 my former master, the Old Buddha, has departed the Song (senshi kobutsu, sude ni Sōchō o sarinu 先師古佛、すでに宋朝をさりぬ): Rujiing had died some 16 years before these words were being written.

17 udumbara flower that appears but once (ichigen no donge 一現の曇華): From the belief that the udumbara blooms only once every three thousand years. Here as elsewhere, Dōgen associates the udumbara with the flower that Buddha Śākyamuni held up on Vulture Peak when he transmitted the treasury of the true dharma eye to Mahākāśyapa. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Hold up a flower.”

18 we futilely missed his blink and failed to smile (itazura ni shunmoku o shaka shite, hagan sezarū いたづらに瞬目を蹉過して、破顔せざる): From the legend, in Dōgen’s telling, that, when Buddha Śākyamuni held up the flower on Vulture Peak, he blinked, and Mahākāśyapa broke into a smile. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Break into a smile.”

19 eye on the forehead (chōmon gen 頂門眼): Some readers take this as “the eye at the top of the head,” though it more likely refers to the “third eye” of wisdom, at the center of the forehead.

we study within the plum blossom and exhaustively investigate the plum blossom, no occasion for doubts emerges. This is surely the eye of “In heaven and on earth, I alone am honored”; it is honored throughout the dharma realm.<sup>20</sup>

しかあればすなはち、天上の天華・人間の天華・天雨曼陀羅華・摩訶曼陀羅華・曼殊沙華・摩訶曼殊沙華、および十方無盡國土の諸華は、みな雪裏梅華の眷屬なり。梅華の恩徳分をうけて華開せるがゆえに、百億華は梅華の眷屬なり、小梅華と稱すべし。乃至空華・地華・三昧華等、ともに梅華の多少の眷屬群華なり。華裏に百億國をなす、國土に開華せる、みなこの梅華の恩分なり。梅華の恩分のほかは、さらに一恩の雨露あらざるなり。命脈、みな梅華よりなれるなり。ひとへに嵩山少林の雪漫漫地と參學することなかれ、如來の眼睛なり。頭上をてらし、脚下をてらす。ただ雪山・雪宮のゆきと參學することなかれ、老瞿曇の正法眼睛なり。五眼の眼睛、このところに究盡せり。千眼の眼睛、この眼睛に圓成すべし。

Thus, the heavenly flowers of the heavens above and the heavenly flowers among humans, “the mādārava flowers, the mahāmādārava flowers, the mañjūśaka flowers, the mahāmañjūśaka flowers that rain from the heavens,” as well as the flowers of inexhaustible lands in the ten directions, are all the retinue of the “plum blossoms in the snow.”<sup>21</sup> Since they have bloomed by receiving the favor of the plum blossoms, ten million flowers are the retinue of the plum blossoms and could be called “little plum blossoms.” And so on, down to the sky flowers, earth flowers, samādhi flowers, and the like, are all larger or smaller clusters of flowers in the retinue of the plum blossoms.<sup>22</sup> They form ten million

20 “In heaven and on earth, I alone am honored” (tenjō tenge, yui ga doku son 天上天下、唯我獨尊): Words attributed to Buddha Śākyamuni as a newborn baby; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “I alone am honored.”

21 heavenly flowers (tenge 天華): The flowers said to fall from the heavens onto those skilled in preaching the dharma.

“the mādārava flowers, the mahāmādārava flowers, the mañjūśaka flowers, the mahāmañjūśaka flowers that rain from the heavens” (ten u mandara ge makaman-dara ge manjusha ge makamajusha ge 天雨曼陀羅華・摩訶曼陀羅華・曼殊沙華・摩訶曼殊沙華): From the scene in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:2b10-11), in which these four magical flowers rain down on the buddha and his audience.

22 sky flowers (kūge 空華): “Flowers in the sky” (S. khaṇḍapā), used for spots appearing to the diseased eye; a standard metaphor in Buddhist texts for what is mere appearance without objective reality (though Dōgen gives the term a quite different sense in his Shōbōgenzō kūge 正法眼藏空華). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Clouded eyes and sky flowers.” The exact sense of “earth flowers” (chige 地華) here is uncertain; perhaps, “physical flowers,” introduced simply in contrast to “sky flowers.”

samādhi flowers (zanmaige 三昧華): A somewhat unusual expression, not occurring elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, the exact sense of which is uncertain; perhaps, “flowers lands within the blossoms, and the blossoms blooming in these lands are all due to the favor of the plum blossoms. Apart from the favor of the plum blossoms, they have not the slightest benefit of rain or dew; their lifelines derive entirely from the plum blossoms.

Do not study only that Shaolin on Mount Song is the place “everywhere spread with snow”: it is the “eye” of the Tathāgata, illumining above the head, illumining beneath the feet.<sup>23</sup> Do not study it simply as the snow of the Snowy Mountains or the Snowy Palace: it is the true dharma eye of Old Gautama.<sup>24</sup> The eye of the five eyes is exhaustively investigated here; the eye of the thousand eyes is perfectly realized in this “eye.”<sup>25</sup> occurring to one in samādhi,” or “the flower that is samādhi.” The image is suggestive of a verse on the “markless samādhi” (musō zanmai 無相三昧; S. animitta-samādhi) attributed to Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744) (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:241a6-7):

心地含諸種、遇澤悉皆萌。三昧華無相、何壞復何成。

The mind ground contains the seeds;

When they meet the moisture, they all sprout.

The flowers of the samādhi are without signs;

What decomposes; what composes?

23 Shaolin on Mount Song is the place “everywhere spread with snow” (Sūzan Shōrin no setsu manman chi 嵩山少林の雪漫漫地): Allusion to the legend that the Second Ancestor, Huike 慧可, stood throughout a snowy night at Shaolin Monastery 少林寺 on Mount Song 嵩山 waiting for an interview with Bodhidharma; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Cut off an arm.” Mt. Song is in present-day Henan.

“eye” of the Tathāgata (nyorai no ganzei 如來の眼睛): Presumably, the eye lost by Gautama in Rujing’s verse. For the meanings of “eye” (ganzei 眼睛) in Zen texts, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye.”

24 the Snowy Mountains or the Snowy Palace (Sessen Setsugū 雪山・雪宮): If these are to be taken as proper nouns, the former is a reference to the Himalayas, while the latter may refer to the detached palace of the ancient state of Qi during the Warring States period.

25 five eyes (gogen 五眼): A standard set of five levels of vision, typically given as (1) the “physical eye” (nikugen 肉眼) of ordinary human sight, (2) the “deva eye” (tengen 天眼) of paranormal sight, (3) the “wisdom eye” (egen 慧眼) that sees emptiness, (4) the “dharma eye” (hōgen 法眼) of the advanced bodhisattva, and (5) the omniscient “buddha eye” (butsugen 佛眼).

thousand eyes (sengen 千眼): The eyes in the palms of each hand of the thousand-armed Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara.

of the dharmas that is not exhaustively investigated by the body and mind and the radiance of old Gautama. Though the perceptions of humans and devas differ, and the sentience of common people and sages are separated, “everywhere spread with snow” is “the whole earth”; “the whole earth” is “everywhere spread with snow.” Were it not “everywhere spread with snow,” there would be no “whole earth” anywhere in all the worlds. The roundness of the surface and interior of this “everywhere spread with snow” — this is the “eye” of old man Gautama.

しるべし、華地悉無生なり、華無生なり。華無生なるゆえに、地無生なり。華地悉無生のゆえに、眼睛無生なり。無生といふは、無上菩提をいふ。正當恁麼時の見取は、梅華只一枝なり。正當恁麼時の道取は、雪裏梅華只一枝なり。地華生生なり。

We should realize that blossoms and earth are both unarisen.<sup>26</sup> The blossoms are unarisen; because the blossoms are unarisen, the earth is unarisen. Because the blossoms and the earth are both unarisen, the eye is unarisen. “Unarisen” means unsurpassed bodhi. What is seen at this very moment is “just one branch of plum blossoms.” What is said at this very moment is “just one branch of plum blossoms in the snow.” It is “earth and flowers arising and arising.”<sup>27</sup>

Further to call this “everywhere spread with snow” means the entire surface and interior are everywhere spread with snow. All the worlds are 26 blossoms and earth are both unarisen (ke chi shitsu mushō nari 華地悉無生なり): Or “flowers and earth are both unborn.” The term mushō 無生 (“unborn,” “unarisen”) is regularly used to express the “emptiness” of phenomena — i.e., that they do not really occur.

27 “earth and flowers arising and arising” (chi ke shōshō nari 地華生生なり): The clumsy translation “arising and arising” strains to retain the play here with shōshō 生生 (“to sprout again and again,” “to increase,” etc.). Dōgen seems to be recalling in this section the transmission verse of the Fourth Ancestor, Daoxin 道信 (580-651) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:222b18-19):

華種有生性、因地華生生、大緣與信合、當生生不生。

Flowers and seeds have the nature to arise:

Dependent on the earth, flowers arise and arise.

When the great condition and faith accord,

Their very arising and arising does not arise.

the “mind ground”; all the worlds are the “sentience of flowers.”<sup>28</sup> Because all the worlds are “the sentience of flowers,” all the worlds are the “plum blossoms.” Because all the worlds are the “plum blossoms,” all the worlds are Gautama’s “eye.” The “wherever you go” of “now” is the mountains, rivers, and the whole earth.<sup>29</sup> Wherever the thing, wherever the time — they are all the expression of the “wherever you go” of:

I originally came to this land

To transmit the dharma and save deluded sentient beings.

A single flower opens five petals;

The fruit forms, ripening naturally of itself.<sup>30</sup>

While there may be coming from the west and spreading in the east, the plum blossoms are the “wherever you go” of “now.”<sup>31</sup>

Once you suddenly awaken to the sentience of flowers,

The fruit of bodhi forms of itself.

29 The “wherever you go” of “now” (nikon no tōsho 而今の到處): Or, more naturally, “the present ‘wherever you go,’” a phrase that could mean both “everywhere now” and “the term ‘everywhere’ used here.” Here and below, the infelicitous English struggles to preserve Dōgen’s play with Rujing’s phrase, “Now, it’s a thicket wherever you go” (nikon tōsho jō keikyoku 而今到處成荊棘).

mountains, rivers, and the whole earth (senga daichi 山河大地): A common expression for “the whole world”; equivalent to Rujing’s “the whole earth” (daichi 大地).

30 Wherever the thing, wherever the time (tōji tōji 到事到時): Presumably meaning “every thing and every time”; here, again, the translation tries to preserve Dōgen’s variations on Rujing’s “wherever you go” (tōsho 到處).

I originally came to this land (go hon rai shi do 吾本來茲土): Bodhidharma’s transmission verse; see above, Note 8.

31 coming from the west and spreading in the east (seirai tōzen 西來・東漸): Fixed expressions for Bodhidharma’s arrival from India and his teachings’ subsequent popularity in East Asia; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Coming from the west.”

That the manifestation of “now” is like this, he describes as “it’s a thicket.” On the big branches, there is the “now” of old branches and new branches; on the little twigs, there is the “wherever you go” of old twigs and new twigs. We should study “wherever” in “you go”; we should study “you go” in “now.”<sup>32</sup> The interior of “three, four, five” or six “blossoms” is the interior of “countless blossoms.” The blossoms are endowed with an interior virtue that is deep and broad; they reveal a surface virtue that is tall and great. This “interior” and “surface” are the blooming of “a single flower.” Because it is “just one branch,” there is no different branch, there is no different seed.<sup>33</sup> The one calling the “wherever you go” of the “one branch” “now” is old man Gautama.<sup>34</sup> Because it is “just one branch,” it is bequeathed to successor after successor.

このゆえに、吾有の正法眼藏附嘱摩訶迦葉なり、汝得は吾髓なり。かくのごとく、到處の現成、ところとしても太尊貴生にあらずといふことなきがゆえに、開五葉なり、五葉は梅華なり。このゆえに、七佛祖あり、西天二十八祖・東土六祖、および十九祖あり。みな只一枝の開五葉なり、五葉の只一枝なり。一枝を參究し、五葉を參究しきたれば、雪裏梅華、の正傳附嘱相見なり。只一枝、の語脈裏に轉身轉心しきたるに、雲月是同なり、溪山各別なり。

For this reason, it is “the treasury of the true dharma eye” that “I have,” “I bequeath to Mahākāśyapa”; it is what “you’ve gotten” is “my marrow.”<sup>35</sup> In this way, because the manifestation of “wherever you go” never fails to be greatly honored everywhere, it is “opening five petals.” The “five petals” are the “plum blossom.” For this reason, there are the seven 32 We should study “wherever” in “you go”; we should study “you go” in “now” (sho wa, tō ni sangaku su beshi, tō wa, kon ni sangaku su beshi 處は、到に參學すべし、到は、今に參學すべし): Presumably, meaning something like, “we should understand that the place [of the branches] is everywhere and everywhere is the present.” Again, the awkward translation tries to preserve the language of Rujing’s verse with which Dōgen is playing.

33 different seed (ishu 異種): Play with a term that normally means “different type.”

34 The one calling the “wherever you go” of the “one branch” “now” is old man Gautama (isshi no tōsho o nikon to shō suru, Kudon rōkan nari 一枝の到處を而今と稱する、瞿曇老漢なり): Presumably, meaning that Rujing and Gautama are the same “one branch.”

35 it is “the treasury of the true dharma eye” that “I have,” “I bequeath to Mahākāśyapa”; it is what “you’ve gotten” is “my marrow” (go u no Shōbōgenzō fuzoku Makakashō nari, nyo toku wa go zui nari 吾有の正法眼藏附嘱摩訶迦葉なり、汝得は吾髓なり): Play with the syntax of the two most famous statements of transmission from master to disciple: Buddha Śākyamuni’s statement, “I have a treasury of the true dharma eye; I bequeath it to Mahākāśyapa”; and Bodhidharma’s saying to Huīke 慧可, “You’ve gotten my marrow.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Treasury of the True Dharma Eye,” “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

buddhas and ancestors, there are the twenty-eight ancestors of Sindh in the West and the six ancestors, as well as the nineteen ancestors, of the Land of the East.<sup>36</sup> They are all the “opening five petals” of “just one branch,” the “just one branch” of the “five petals.” When we have investigated the “one branch,” have investigated the “five petals,” it is an encounter with the bequest of the direct transmission of the “plum blossoms in the snow.” When we have turned our bodies and turned our minds in the flow of the words “just one branch,” it is “clouds and moon are the same,” it is “valleys and mountains are different.”<sup>37</sup>

しかあるを、かつて參學眼なきともがらいはく、五葉といふは、東地五代と初祖とを一華として、五世をならべて、古今前後にあらざるがゆえに五葉といふ、と。この言は、擧して勘破するにたらざるなり。これらは參佛參祖の皮袋にあらず、あはれむべきなり。五葉一華の道、いかでか五代のみならん。六祖よりのちは道取せざるか。小兒子の説話におよばざるなり、ゆめゆめ見聞すべからず。

Nevertheless, those who have never had the eye of study say, “The ‘five petals’ means that the five generations of the Land of the East and the First Ancestor make ‘a single flower’; because the five generations are lined up side-by-side, not past or present, earlier or later, they are called ‘five petals.’”<sup>38</sup> These words are not worth taking up and seeing

36 there are the seven buddhas and ancestors, there are the twenty-eight ancestors of Sindh in the West and the six ancestors, as well as the nineteen ancestors, of the Land of the East (shichi busso ari, Saiten nijūhachi so Tōdo roku so, oyobi jūkyū so ari 七佛祖あり、西天二十八祖・東土六祖、および十九祖あり): The term busso 佛祖 (“buddhas and ancestors”) might better be rendered here “buddha ancestors.” Dōgen’s lineage, from the seven buddhas of the past ending with Śākyamuni, through the twenty-eight Indian ancestors ending with Bodhidharma, and the six generations in China from Bodhidharma through the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能, to the generations following Huineng. Since there are only seventeen generations separating Dōgen from the Sixth Ancestor, he must be reckoning Huineng and himself among the “nineteen ancestors” here. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas,” “Buddhas and ancestors.”

37 When we have turned our bodies and turned our minds in the flow of the words (gomyaku ri ni tenshin tenjin shikitaru ni 語脈裏に轉身轉心しきたるに): Variation on a common Zen idiom, meaning to be transformed by the words.

it is “clouds and moon are the same,” it is “valleys and mountains are different” (ungetsu ze dō nari, keizan kakubetsu nari 雲月は同なり、溪山各別なり): From a saying of Jiashan Shanhui 夾山善會 (805-881) (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:331a12). Perhaps meaning here, “branch” and “petals” are in one sense the same and yet remain distinct.

38 “The ‘five petals’ means that the five generations of the Land of the East and the First Ancestor make ‘a single flower’” (goyō to iu wa, Tōchi godai to shoso to o ikke toshite 五葉といふは、東地五代と初祖とを一華として): A common interpretation, though the “five petals” of Bodhidharma’s verse are also sometimes understood as through. These are not skin bags who have studied the buddhas or studied the ancestors; they are pitiful.<sup>39</sup> How could the words “one flower of five petals” refer only to the five generations? Do they say nothing of those after the Sixth Ancestor? This is worth less than the talk of little children; we should never listen to it.

は新を脱落せり。このゆえに、伏惟大衆なり、伏惟大衆は、慙慙なるがゆえに。

His point is that, borne by “the plum opening,” myriad springs are early.<sup>43</sup> The myriad springs are one or two virtues within the plum. Even a single spring causes “the myriad things” to be “new,” causes the myriad dharmas to be “New Year’s Day.” “Felicitations” means the eye is true. “The myriad things” means, not only past, present, and future, but “before King Majestic Voice” until the future.<sup>44</sup> Because he says that the incalculable, inexhaustible past, present, and future are all “new,” the newness has sloughed off newness. Therefore, it is “I submit to the great assembly”; for “submitting to the great assembly” is like this.

A single word accords,

Willow eyes sprout on new twigs;

Plum blossoms fill the old branches.<sup>46</sup>

43 His point is that, borne by “the plum opening,” myriad springs are early (sono shūshi wa, baikai ni tai serarete banshun hayashi その宗旨は、梅開に帶せられて萬春はやし): i.e., the plum’s opening causes the springs to be early.

44 “before King Majestic Voice” (Ion’ō izen 威音王以前): A common expression, occurring often in Dōgen’s writing and other Zen texts, used to suggest the primordial past or a state prior to any differentiation; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before King Majestic Voice.”

45 My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong (senshi Tendō kobutsu 先師天童古佛): Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:123c27-28); a verse celebrating the installment of a new steward of the monastery. The opening line recalls words attributed to Wuxie Lingmo 五洩靈默 (747-818) upon visiting Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (700-791) (There are several variants; see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:254b8-9):

若一言相契、我即住。不然便去。

If a single word accords, I stay; if not, I go away.

46 Willow eyes sprout on new twigs (ryūgen hotsu shinjō 柳眼發新條): “Willow eyes” (ryūgen 柳眼) are the buds of the willow tree. Dōgen will play on these “eyes” in his comment.

いはく、百大劫の辨道は、終始ともに一言相契なり。一念頃の功夫は、前後おなじく萬古不移なり。新條を繁茂ならしめて眼睛を發明する、新條なりといへども眼睛なり。眼睛の他にあらざる道理なりといへども、これを新條と參究す。新は、萬物咸新に參學すべし。梅華満舊枝といふは、梅華全舊枝なり、通舊枝なり、舊枝是梅華なり。たとへば、華枝同條參、華枝同條生、華枝同條満なり。華枝同條満のゆえに、吾有正法、附囑迦葉なり。面面満拈華、華華満破顔なり。

He says, pursuit of the way for a hundred great kalpas is, from start to finish, “a single word accords”; concentrated effort for a single moment is, before or after, “unmoved for myriad ages.” Causing the “new twigs” to grow in rank profusion, they open the eye; though they are “new twigs,” they are the eye.<sup>47</sup> Although it is true that they are not other than the eye, we investigate them as “new twigs.” “New,” we should study in “the myriad things are all new.” “Plum blossoms fill the old branches” means the plum blossoms are the entire old branches, means the old branches throughout, means the old branches are the plum blossoms. For instance, it is blossoms and branches study the same twig together; blossoms and branches grow the same twig together; blossoms and branches fill the same twig together.<sup>48</sup> Because blossoms and branches fill the same twig together, it is “I have the true dharma; I bequeath it to Kāśyapa”; it is face after face fills the flower held up; flower after flower fills the face that smiled.<sup>49</sup>

* * * * *

47 Causing the “new twigs” to grow in rank profusion, they open the eye (shinjō o hanmo narashimete ganzei o hatsumyō suru 新條を繁茂ならしめて眼睛を發明する): A tentative translation, assuming the unexpressed grammatical subject should be taken as “pursuit of the way” and “concentrated effort.” It is also possible to read this clause as itself the subject of the following clause: i.e., “What causes the new twigs to grow in rank profusion and opens the eye is the new twigs, is the eye.”

48 blossoms and branches study the same twig together (ke shi dō jō san 華枝同條參): Here and in the following two clauses, Dōgen plays with the common expressions “study together” (dōsan 同參) and “born together” (dōshō 同生); the predicates could be read, “have the same ‘twig study’; have the same ‘twig birth’; have the same ‘twig fill.’”

49 face after face fills the flower held up; flower after flower fills the face that smiled (menmen man nenge, keke man hagan 面面満拈華、華華満破顔): Perhaps, meaning that each person [in the lineage of the plum blossoms] fulfills the role of the flower held up by the Buddha on Vulture Peak; each blossom fulfills the role of Mahākāśyapa breaking into a smile upon seeing the flower.

My former master, the Old Buddha, said in a verse:

50 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): Lines from a verse found at Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:126c1. Dōgen quotes the same verse in his “Shōbōgenzō kenbutsu” 正法眼藏見佛。

51 brocade of Shu or the jade disk of He (shokukin kaheki 蜀錦・和璧): I.e., rare objects: the famous brocade of the ancient state of Shu (modern Sichuan); and the jade annulus, discovered by a certain Bian He 卞和, of the ancient kingdom of Chu 楚, and presented to King Wen of Zhou 周文王。

52 “marrow my gotten you’ve” (zui go toku nyo 髓吾得汝): A reversal of the glyphs in Bodhidharma’s saying, “You’ve gotten my marrow.” There have been various attempts to parse this as a sentence — e.g., “I as the marrow got you,” — as well as suggestions that it is meant simply to identify “the blooming of the plum” with each of the words in Bodhidharma’s saying. A similar play with the saying is found in “Shōbōgenzō kattō” 正法眼藏葛藤。

53 King Prasenajit (Hashinoku ō 波斯匿王): From the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:130c7-11. Prasenajit was king of Kośala and a devout patron of the Buddha. The same exchange is also told with King Aśoka as the interlocutor. Piṇḍola (Binzuru 賓頭盧) was a prominent arhat among the Buddha’s followers, often depicted as having long, drooping eyebrows. Dōgen cites the exchange and Rujing’s verse on it elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

*He brushed up his eyebrows and answered the matter;
He'd personally once seen the Buddha, and they did not deceive each other.
Worthy of offerings even now, throughout the four continents.
Spring is on the twigs of the plum, cold in their girdle of snow.*

この因縁は、波斯匿王、ちなみに尊者の見佛・未見佛を問取するなり。見佛、といふは作佛なり、作佛、といふは策起眉毛なり。尊者、もしただ阿羅漢果を證すとも、眞阿羅漢にあらずば、見佛すべからず。見佛にあらずば、作佛すべからず。作佛にあらずば、策起眉毛佛不得ならん。

This episode concerns King Prasenajit once asking the Venerable whether he had seen the Buddha or not seen the Buddha. To “see the Buddha” means to become a buddha; to “become a buddha” means to “brush up the eyebrows.” Even though the Venerable had realized only the fruit of the arhat, had he not been a true arhat, he could not have seen the Buddha. If he had not seen the Buddha, he could not have become a buddha. If he had not become a buddha, he could not have been a buddha who “brushed up his eyebrows.”

しかあればしるべし、釋迦牟尼佛の面授の弟子として、すでに四果を證して後佛の出世をまつ尊者、いかでか釋迦牟尼佛をみざらん。この見釋迦牟尼佛は、見佛にあらず、釋迦牟尼佛のごとく見釋迦牟尼佛なるを、見佛と參學しきたれり。波斯匿王、この參學眼を得開せるところに、策起眉毛の好手にあふなり。親曾見佛の道旨、しづかに參佛眼あるべし。この春は、人間にあらず、佛國にかぎらず、梅梢にあり。なにとしてかしがあるとしる、雪寒の眉毛策なり。

Thus, we should recognize that, as a disciple who had the face-to-face conferral from Buddha Śākyamuni, and who had already verified the fourth fruit and was awaiting the appearance in the world of the subsequent buddha, how could the Venerable have failed to see Buddha Śākyamuni?<sup>54</sup> This seeing Buddha Śākyamuni is not “seeing the Buddha”: seeing Buddha Śākyamuni as does Buddha Śākyamuni has been studied as “seeing the Buddha.”<sup>55</sup> King Prasenajit, having opened the 54 verified the fourth fruit (shika o shōshite 四果を證して): I.e., achieved the state of arhat, the culmination of the four stages on the path to nirvāṇa: stream entrant, once-returner, nonreturner, and arhat.

awaiting the appearance in the world of the subsequent buddha (gobutsu no shusse o matsu 後佛の出世をまつ): Reference to the tradition that Piṇḍola was asked by Buddha Śākyamuni not to enter nirvāṇa but to remain in saṃsāra until the coming of the future Buddha Maitreya.

55 seeing Buddha Śākyamuni as does Buddha Śākyamuni has been studied as “seeing the Buddha” (Shakamuni butsu no gotoku ken Shakamuni butsu naru o, ken-butsu to sangaku shikitareri 釋迦牟尼佛のごとく見釋迦牟尼佛なるを、見佛と參學し eye of this study, met a skilled hand who “brushed up his eyebrows.” For the meaning of the words, “he’d personally once seen the Buddha,” we should have the buddha eye that quietly studies it.<sup>56</sup> The “spring” here is not that of humans, is not limited to the buddha lands; it is “on the twigs of the plum.” How do we know this? The coldness of the snow is the eyebrows brushed up.

先師古佛云、本來面目無生死、春在梅華入畫圖。

My former master, the Old Buddha, said,

The original face has no birth or death;

春を畫圖するに、楊・梅・桃・李を畫すべからず、まさに春を畫すべし。楊・梅・桃・李を畫するは、楊・梅・桃・李を畫するなり、いまだ春を畫せるにあらず。春は畫せざるべきにあらず、しかあれども先師古佛のほかは、西天東地のあひだ、春を畫せる人いまだあらず。ひとり先師古佛のみ、春を畫する尖筆頭なり。いはゆるいまの春は、畫圖の春なり、入畫圖のゆえに。これ餘外の力量をとぶらず、ただ梅華をして春をつかはしむるゆえに、畫にいれ、木にいるなり、善巧方便なり。

When picturing spring, we should not depict willows, apricots, peaches, or plums; we should depict spring.<sup>58</sup> To depict willows, apricots, peaches, and plums is to depict willows, apricots, peaches, and plums; it is not yet to have depicted spring. It is not that spring cannot be depicted; yet apart from my former master, the Old Buddha, there has never きたれり): i.e., Piṇḍola’s seeing the Buddha has been understood here as seeing Śākya-muni as Śākyamuni sees himself.

56 we should have the buddha eye that quietly studies it (shizuka ni sanbutsugen aru beshi しづかに參佛眼あるべし): The expression sanbutsugen 參佛眼, here rendered “the buddha eye that studies,” could also be parsed “the eye that studies (or studies with) the buddha.” The translation takes the sense to be that we should calmly study [the meaning of Piṇḍola’s having seen the Buddha] with the omniscient eye of a buddha (butsugen 佛眼). A similar usage is found in the “Shōbōgenzō kenbutsu” 正法眼藏見佛:

この見佛眼、すでに參開なる現成を見佛とす。見佛眼の活路、これ參佛眼なり。

The realization in which this eye of seeing buddha has been opened is called “seeing buddha.” The life-saving path of the eye of seeing buddha — this is the buddha eye of study.

57 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:131c21-22, from a verse at a cremation.

58 willows, apricots, peaches, or plums (yō bai tō ri 楊・梅・桃・李): i.e., trees that represent springtime. Here, the translation uses “apricot” for bai 梅 (ume; Prunus mume, “Japanese apricot”) and “plum” for ri 李 (sumomo; Prunus salicina, “Japanese plum”).

been anyone throughout Sindh in the West and the Land of the East who has depicted it. My former master, the Old Buddha, alone is a sharp brush tip that depicts spring. What is called “spring” here is the spring of the picture; for it “enters the picture.”<sup>59</sup> Because, without seeking after any power beyond this, he just has the plum blossoms make use of the spring, it enters the picture and enters the trees. It is a skillful device.<sup>60</sup>

先師古佛、正法眼藏あきらかなるによりて、この正法眼藏を、過去・現在・未來の十方に聚會する佛祖に正傳す。このゆえに、眼睛を究徹し、梅華を開明せり。

Because he was clear about the treasury of the true dharma eye, my former master, the Old Buddha, correctly transmitted this treasury of the true dharma eye from the buddhas and ancestors assembled in the ten directions in past, present, and future. Therefore, he has completely mastered the eye and clarified the plum blossom.

If some personal demon happens to appear, and we think that the plum blossom is not the eye of Gautama, we should think: what could we take as the eye among the things that may have been proposed as more likely than the plum blossom to be the eye?<sup>63</sup> At this point, if we search for the eye elsewhere, we will always be “face-to-face without recognizing each other”; for we will be “meeting without bringing it out.”<sup>64</sup> Today is not our own today; it is everyone’s today.<sup>65</sup> The eye of the plum blossom should be immediately clear; do not go on searching for it.

Till the whole earth is everywhere spread with snow.

63 personal demon (jima 自魔): Or, perhaps, “demon of the self”; an unusual term, not appearing elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, it does occur in an eccentric list of four types of demon given in the Chinese Dafan tianwang wen fo jueyi jing 大梵天王問佛決疑經 (ZZ.87:663a15-17): heavenly demons (tenma 天魔), external demons (gema 外魔), other demons (tama 他魔), self demons (jima 自魔).

64 “face-to-face without recognizing each other” (taimen fusōshiki 對面不相識); “meeting without bringing it out” (sōhō mi nenshutsu 相逢未拈出): Two fixed expressions from Zen literature. The former is best known from a saying of the early figure Yang Dajian 楊大年 (dates unknown) (e.g., at Chanlin sengbao juan 禪林僧寶傳, ZZ.137:522b2-3):

對面不相識、千里却同風。

Face-to-face without recognizing each other.

For a thousand miles, the same wind.

The latter expression is a variant of a saying attributed to Danxia Tianran 丹霞天然 (739-824) (e.g., at Zongjing lu 宗鏡錄, T.2016.48:419b14-15):

相逢不拈出、舉意便知有。

In meeting, they don’t bring it out;

But, if one thinks about it, one knows it’s there.

65 it is everyone’s today (taike no konnichi nari 大家の今日なり): The term taike 大家 (also read daika) can mean (a) “great one,” “maestro,” etc.; (b) “great house” or “great family”; or (c) “everyone.” It is sometimes taken here, by extension from (c), to mean “everything.”

[53:30]

先師古佛云、明明歴歴、梅華影裏休相覓、爲雨爲雲自古今、古今寥寥有何極。

My former master, the Old Buddha, said,<sup>66</sup>

So clear, so obvious:

Stop searching in the shapes of the plum blossoms.

Raining down and forming clouds, themselves past and present;

Past and present, vast and vacant — where is there any limit?

[53:31]

しかあればすなはち、くもをなし、あめをなすは、梅華の云爲なり。行雲・行雨は、梅華の千曲萬重色なり、千功萬徳なり。自古今は梅華なり、梅華を古今と稱するなり。

Thus, forming clouds and making rain are the words and deeds of the plum blossom. The drifting clouds and falling rain are the shapes of the plum blossom's thousand folds and myriad layers, its thousand virtues and myriad merits. "Themselves past and present" is "the plum blossoms": the plum blossoms are called "past and present."

[53:32]

古來、法演禪師いはく、朔風和雪振溪林、萬物潛藏恨不深、唯有嶺梅多意氣、臘前吐出歲寒心。

Long ago, Chan Master Fayen said,<sup>67</sup>

A north wind mixed with snow shakes the valley groves;

The myriad things are buried, without deep regret.

But there's a plum tree on the ridge whose spirits are high;

Even before the year's end, it vomits up all wintry thoughts.

66 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): From the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:132b19-21. Dōgen's version breaks off Rujing's seven-glyph first line, which reads quxi quxi ming lili 去兮去兮明歴歴 ("Gone, gone, clear and obvious").

67 Chan Master Fayen (Hōen zenji 法演禪師): i.e., Wuzu Fayen 五祖法演 (d. 1104), at Jianzhong Jingguo xudeng lu 建中靖國續燈錄, ZZ.136:405a11-12.

[53:33] {2:79}

しかあれば、梅華の銷息を通せざるほかは、歳寒心をしりがたし。梅華小許の功德を、朔風に和合して雪となせり。はかりしりぬ、風をひき雪をなし、歳を序あらしめ、および溪林・萬物をあらしむる、みな梅華力なり。

Thus, without being familiar with the circumstances of the plum blossom, it is hard to understand its “wintry thoughts.” A few of the virtues of the plum blossom, mixed with the “north wind,” have become the “snow.” It is clear that what summons the wind and makes the snow, orders the year, and gives existence to the “valley groves” and the “myriad things,” is entirely the power of the plum blossom.

The sound of the painted horn was the sound of sorrow.<sup>68</sup>

[53:35]

孚上座は、もと講者なり、夾山の典座に開發せられて、大悟せり。これ、梅華の春風を大小吹せしむるなり。

The Senior Seat Fu was originally a lecturer; developed by the cook of Mount Jia, he had a great awakening.<sup>69</sup> It was the plum blossoms letting the spring winds blow as they will.

68 Senior Seat Fu of Taiyuan (Taigen Fu jōza 太原孚上座): Dates unknown; a disciple of Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908). Dōgen's source is unknown. A (slightly variant) version of this verse is attributed to Senior Seat Fu 孚上座 in the late fourteenth-century anthology Chanzong zaduhai 禪宗雜毒海 (ZZ.114:131a4-5).

painted horn (gakaku 畫角): An ancient sonorous decorated wind instrument, used in the military to rouse the troops and in imperial processions to warn of their passing; here, likely, reveille (kukaku 鼓角), upon hearing which, it is said, Fu had his awakening.

69 developed by the cook of Mount Jia (Kassan no tenzo ni kaihotsu serarete 夾山の典座に開發せられて): The name of the cook is unknown; the story of his guiding Fu is told in several sources (see, e.g., case 99 of the Biyān lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:222b26-c13). The cook laughed during Fu's lecture on the Nirvāṇa Sūtra's teaching on the dharma body and, when subsequently questioned about it, advised Fu to sit in meditation in order to understand the sūtra; Fu sat all night and, at the sound of the drum marking the fifth watch, suddenly had an understanding.

Senjō

INTRODUCTION

According to its colophon, this chapter is one of the earliest texts of the Shōbōgenzō, composed in the autumn of 1239 at Dōgen's newly established Kōshōji. It represents number 54 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō and number 7 in the Honzan edition; it is not found in the sixty-chapter compilation.

Like the “Senmen” 洗面 (“Washing the Face”) chapter, “Senjō” is a work on monastic hygiene. The title term, “washing and purifying,” was a euphemism in Song-dynasty Buddhist monasteries for the procedures to be followed when using the toilet. The procedures discussed here were not original to Dōgen: as his quotations suggest, they are drawn from the Chanyuan qinggui 禪苑清規 (Rules of Purity for the Chan Park, compiled in 1103), and other works on monastic rules and regulations. Unlike such works, however, Dōgen adds commentary on the spiritual significance of the procedures as the embodied practice of the buddhas and ancestors.

[54:1] {2:80}

佛祖の護持しきたれる修證あり、いはゆる不染汚なり。

There is a practice and verification upheld by the buddhas and ancestors:
it is “not defiling.”

[54:2]

南嶽山觀音院大慧禪師、因六祖問、還假修證不。大慧云、修證不無、染汚即不得。六祖云、只是不染汚、諸佛之所護念、汝亦如是、吾亦如是、乃至西天祖師亦如是、云云。

Chan Master Dahui of Guanyin Cloister on Mount Nanyue was asked by the Sixth Ancestor, “Does it nevertheless depend on practice and verification?”<sup>1</sup>

Dahui said, “It’s not that it lacks practice and verification, but it can’t be defiled by them.”

The Sixth Ancestor said, “Just this ‘not defiled’ is what the buddhas bear in mind. You’re also like this, I’m also like this, down to all the ancestral masters of Sindh in the West are also like this.”

1 Chan Master Dahui of Guanyin Cloister on Mount Nanyue (Nangakusan Kannonin Daie zenji 南嶽山觀音院大慧禪師): I.e., Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744). The passage quoted here is found in a well-known conversation between Nanyue and his master, the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能, versions of which are found in several Chinese sources, as well as Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ5:178, case 101), and introduced often in the Shōbōgenzō. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “What thing is it that comes like this?”

“Does it nevertheless depend on practice and verification?” (kan ka shushō fu 還假修證不): The question is preceded by the following exchange. When Nanyue went to visit Huineng, the Ancestor asked him where he was coming from. Nanyue said that he was coming from the National Teacher An on Mount Song. Huineng asked, “What thing is it that comes like this?” (ze jūmo butsu inmo rai 是什麼物恁麼來). Nanyue answered, “To say it’s like any thing wouldn’t hit it.” The thing that “comes like this” (inmo rai 恁麼來) is a play on nyorai 如來 (S. tathāgata; “thus-come one”), an epithet of the buddhas.

2 End quote (unnun 云云): Parenthetical indication in the original.

大比丘三千威儀經云、淨身者、洗大小便、剪十指爪。

In the Sūtra of the Three Thousand Rules of Deportment for Great Bhikṣus, it is said, “To ‘purify the body’ is to wash upon urinating and defecating, and to clip the nails of one’s ten fingers.”<sup>3</sup>

しかあれば、身心これ不染汚なれども、淨身の法あり、心法あり。ただ身心をきよむるのみにあらず、國土・樹下をもきよむるなり。國土いまだかつて塵穢あらざれども、きよむるは諸佛之所護念なり。佛果にいたりてなほ退せず、廢せざるなり。その宗旨、はかりつくすべきことかたし。作法、これ宗旨なり、得道、これ作法なり。

Thus, even though body and mind are “not defiled,” there is a procedure for purifying the body; there is a procedure for the mind.<sup>4</sup> It not only purifies body and mind; it purifies the land and the bases of trees as well.<sup>5</sup> Even though the land has never had any dust and pollution, to purify it is “what the buddhas bear in mind.” Having reached the fruit of buddhahood, they still do not regress, do not abandon it. The essential point of this is not something that can ever be fully calculated. Observance — this is the essential point; gaining the way — this is observance.<sup>6</sup>

3 Sūtra of the Three Thousand Rules of Deportment for Great Bhikṣus (Dai biku sanzen iigi kyō 大比丘三千威儀): Da biqiu sanqian weiyi 大比丘三千威儀, T.1470.24:914a16.

4 there is a procedure for purifying the body; there is a procedure for the mind (jōshin no hō ari, shinbō ari 淨身の法あり、心法あり): The term shinbō 心法 may evoke “the mind dharma” transmitted in the Zen lineage but should probably here be taken in parallel with the preceding clause.

5 the land and the bases of trees (kokudo juge 國土・樹下): An unusual combination. The term kokudo 國土 (“land”) is multivalent and can refer to the nation, the earth, or a world, such as the “pure land” (jōdo 淨土) of Buddha Śākyamuni. The term juge 樹下 (“beneath, or at the bases of, trees”) translates the Sankrit vrkṣa-mūla (“tree root”), used in reference to the location of spiritual practice at the foot of trees — as in Siddhārtha’s practice under the bodhi tree. Possibly, reflecting the vision of buddhas seated under jeweled trees in countless buddha lands described in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:33b15-17).

6 Observance — this is the essential point; gaining the way — this is observance (sahō, kore shūshi nari, tokudō, kore sahō nari 作法、これ宗旨なり、得道、これ作法なり): “Observance” (sahō 作法) refers to the rites and procedures of monastic practice; “gaining the way” (tokudō 得道) may refer either to the ritual entrance into the monastic order or, as more likely here, to the attainment of spiritual awakening. This line is likely the locus classicus for the phrase “observance is the essential point” in the later Sōtō dictum, “deportment is the buddha dharma; observance is the essential point” (iigi soku buppō, sahō kore shūshi 威儀即佛法、作法是宗旨).

Water is not necessarily intrinsically pure, nor is it intrinsically impure. The body is not necessarily intrinsically pure, nor is it intrinsically impure. All dharmas are also like this. Water is neither sentient nor insentient; the body is neither sentient nor insentient. All dharmas are also like this. The teachings of the Buddha, the World-Honored One, are also like this. However, it is not that we use water to purify the body; rather, in maintaining the buddha dharma by means of the buddha dharma, there is this rite, which is called “washing and purifying.” It is to be intimate with and directly transmit the one body and mind of the buddhas and ancestors; it is to see and hear firsthand the one line of the buddhas and ancestors; it is clearly to sustain the one radiance of the buddhas and ancestors. In sum, it is to make manifest their incalculable, limitless virtues. At the very moment that we make the practice our deportment in body and mind, we are fully endowed with and perfectly attain his original practice long ago.<sup>8</sup> Therefore, the body and mind of practice and verification appear in their original form.

十指の爪をきるべし。十指といふは、左右の両手の指のつめなり。足指の爪、おなじくきるべし。

One should cut the nails of one's ten fingers. "Ten fingers" means the nails on the fingers of both hands, left and right. Toenails should also be cut.

[54:8]

經にいはく、つめのながさ、もし一麥ばかりになれば、罪をうるなり。

In a sūtra, it is said, "If the length of the nails exceeds one grain of barley, that is an offense."<sup>9</sup>

[54:9]

しかあれば、爪をながくすべからず、爪のながきは、おのづから外道の先蹤なり、ことさらつめをきるべし。しかあるに、いま大宋國の僧家のなかに、參學眼そなはらざるともがら、おほく爪をながからしむ。あるひは一寸・兩寸、および三・四寸にながきもあり。これ、非法なり、佛法の身心にあらず。佛家の稽古あらざるによりて、かくのごとし。有道の尊宿は、しかあらざるなり。

Thus, the nails should not be long. To have long nails is itself a precedent of other paths; so it is especially important to cut the nails. Nevertheless, at present, in the monastic order of the Land of the Great Song, the types not endowed with the eye of study frequently grow their nails long. Some are one inch or two inches, or even three or four inches long. This is improper; it is not the body and mind of the buddha dharma. They

8 we are fully endowed with and perfectly attain his original practice long ago (kuon no hongyō o gusoku enjō seri 久遠の本行を具足圓成せり): Allusion to the career of Buddha Śākyamuni, as told in the Lotus Sūtra. The expression "original practice" (hongyō 本行), which occurs several times in the Shōbōgenzō, recalls a famous passage (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:42c22-23):

諸善男子、我本行菩薩道所成壽命、今猶未盡、復倍上數。

Good sons, the lifespan attained by my original practice of the bodhisattva path is even now still not exhausted; it is twice the above number.

Similarly, the terms "long ago" (kuon 久遠) and "perfectly attain" (enjō 圓成) suggest the stock phrase "actually attained long ago" (kuon jitsujō 久遠實成), regularly used to describe Śākyamuni's ancient attainment of buddhahood (at Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:42b12).

are like this because they lack investigation of the ancients in the house of the buddhas. Venerables who possess the way are not like this.

Again, there are those who grow their hair long, which is also improper. Do not mistakenly think that, because it is done by monastics of a great country, it is correct practice. My former master, the Old Buddha, had severe words of admonishment for monastics throughout the land who had long hair and long nails, saying,<sup>10</sup>

不會淨髮、不是俗人、不是僧家、便是畜生。古來佛祖、誰是不淨髮者。如今不會淨髮、箇真箇是畜生。

Those who do not keep the tonsure are not laymen and are not monastics; they are beasts. From ancient times, who among the buddhas and ancestors did not keep the tonsure? Anyone at present who does not keep the tonsure truly is a beast.

[54:12]

かくのごとく示衆するに、年來不剃頭のともがら、剃頭せるおほし。

When he instructed the assembly in this way, there were many of those who had not shaved their heads for years who shaved their heads.

[54:13]

あるいは上堂、あるいは普説のとき、彈指かまびすしくして責呵す、

Whether in convocations or in public sermons, he loudly snapped his fingers and rebuked them, [saying],<sup>11</sup>

10 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): I.e., Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227). The source of Dōgen's report of Rujing's words, given here in Chinese, is not known, but a similar passage, including the phrase, "truly is a beast" (shinko ze chikushō 眞箇是畜生), occurs in Dōgen's record of his conversations with Rujing; see Hōkyō ki 寶慶記, DZZ.7:14, number 9.

11 he loudly snapped his fingers and rebuked them (danshi kamabisushiku shite shakuka su 彈指かまびすしくして責呵す): The snapping of the fingers can, among other uses, indicate a warning; see below, section 23. What follows in the next section is offered as a report, in Japanese, of Rujing's words — though, without independent textual evidence, it is unclear to what extent Dōgen is paraphrasing his master's teachings.

いかなる道理としらず、胡亂に長髪・長爪なる。あはれむべし、南浮の身心をして非道におけること。近來二三百、祖師道、癈せるゆえに、しかのごとくのとものがらおほし。かくのごとくのやから、寺院の主人となり、師號に署して、爲衆の相をなす、人天の無福なり。いま天下の諸山に、道心箇渾無なり、得道箇久絶なり、祇管破落儻のみなり。

For whatever reason, they wantonly grow out their hair and grow out their nails. How pitiful that they would put a body and mind of Jambudvīpa on the wrong path.<sup>12</sup> Because the way of the ancestral masters has been abandoned over these past two or three hundred years, there are many such types. That a bunch like this has become the heads of monasteries, has been granted “master” titles, and has served as officials of the saṃgha — this is misfortune for humans and devas.<sup>13</sup> At the various mountains throughout the land at present, those with the mind of the way are entirely absent, those who have gained the way are long extinct, and all that remain are just a gang of degenerates.<sup>14</sup>

かくのごとく普説するに、諸方に長老の名をみだりにせるともがら、うらみず、陳説なし。しるべし、長髪は佛祖のいましむるところ、長爪は外道の所行なり。佛祖の兒孫、これらの非法をこのむべからず。身心をきよからしむべし、剪爪・剃髪すべきなり。

When he gave public sermons in this way, those from all quarters improperly named “elders” did not resent it and had nothing to say for themselves. We should know that growing out one’s hair is warned against by the buddhas and ancestors, and that growing out one’s nails is a practice of other paths. Descendants of the buddhas and ancestors should not be attracted to these improprieties. They should keep their bodies and minds pure and should cut their nails and shave their heads.

12 put a body and mind of Jambudvīpa on the wrong path (Nanbu no shinjin o shite hidō ni okeru 南浮の身心をして非道における): The term Nanbu 南浮 indicates “Jambudvīpa in the south”: i.e., the continent to the south of Mount Sumeru in Buddhist cosmology. Of the four continents, it is the one on which a buddha appears; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four Continents.” “Wrong path” translates hidō 非道, which has a range of connotations, including “not the way of the buddhas (butsudō 佛道),” “not in accord with the principles (dōri 道理) of Buddhism,” “not consistent with the way (dō 道) of humans,” “characteristic of, or leading to, the ‘evil paths’ of animals, ghosts, and denizens of hell.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Body and mind,” and “Six paths.”

13 served as officials of the saṃgha (ishu no sō o nasu 爲衆の相をなす): I.e., ministers or officials appointed by the imperial court to oversee the multitude (shu 衆) of monks and nuns.

14 various mountains (shozan 諸山): Also read shosan; a term for the major Buddhist monasteries.

Do not neglect to wash when urinating and defecating. There was an instance when Śāriputra, by means of this procedure, converted the follower of an other path.<sup>15</sup> It was not the prior expectation of the follower of the other path, nor was it the original intention of Śāriputra; but where the deportment of the buddhas and ancestors is manifested, the false dharma submits of its own accord.<sup>16</sup>

When engaging in practice under trees and in the open, there are no buildings.<sup>17</sup> One engages in purification with handfuls of earth, using a convenient valley stream or river water. For this there are no ashes, just two sets of seven balls of earth.<sup>18</sup> The procedure for using the two sets of seven balls is: first, remove, fold, and set aside one's dharma robe; then, taking earth that is yellowish, not black, shape it into balls that are about the size of large beans, arrange them in a single row of seven balls on a rock or some other convenient spot, and lay out a second row parallel to the first one, so that there are two sets of seven balls.<sup>19</sup> Next, 15 Śāriputra (Sharihotsu 舍利弗): The story, which occurs in several sources, tells of a brahmin who was so impressed by the toilet practices of the Buddha's disciple, Śāriputra, that he joined the Buddhist order. See, e.g., Yijing's 義淨 translation of the Mūla-sarvāstivāda-vinaya (Pinaiye zashi 毘奈耶雜事, T.1451.24:0276c29-277b4).

16 It was not the prior expectation of the follower of the other path (gedō no hon-go ni arazu 外道の本期にあらず): At least in Yijing's version of the story, the brahmin seems in fact to have had a fixation on purity and had been visiting religious orders precisely to observe their toilet practices. The same passage also notes that Śāriputra was well aware that his actions were being observed.

なる土): I.e., light brown earth that is mostly sand or clay, with little organic soil mixed in.

20 toilet stick (chū 箒): A wood or bamboo instrument, shaped like a handled scoop or spatula, used to wipe oneself after defecating; discussed below, section 24.

21 First, take three balls of earth and perform the washing and purifying (mazu sangan no tsuchi o tazusaete senjō su まづ三丸の土をたづさへて洗淨す): It is strange that Dōgen, after explaining how to prepare “two sets of seven balls” (ni shichi gan 二七丸), concludes this section on relieving oneself outdoors by outlining a procedure that uses only three balls of earth: one for washing after urinating, a second for washing after defecating, and a third for washing “the hand that has touched filth” (sokushu 觸手). Also, he says nothing about the “scouring stone” (maseki 磨石) that he mentions four sentences earlier.

22 begin by washing and purifying the urine (mazu shōben o senjō su まづ小便を洗淨す). Because this sentence uses the euphemism “lesser ease” (shōben 小便) to refer to “urine” or “urinating,” and treats that noun as the object of the compound verb “to wash and purify” (senjō 洗淨), it is not clear what this action entails. We know from more explicit accounts of this procedure in Buddhist monastic rules that the mixture of dirt and water is used to wash the area around the urethral opening (in males, the tip of the penis). The muddy water would then be rinsed off with clean water, but the directions given by Dōgen do not make that explicit. The same ambiguity is found in Dōgen’s subsequent discussion of the washing and purifying of “the place of greater ease” (daibensho 大便處), or “defecation.”

23 “eastern office” (tōsu 東司): The name for this facility is clearly a euphemism, but its derivation is not known. In the Song monasteries that Dōgen visited, there was an eastern office (tōsu 東司, or “toilet,” as we shall call it here) for use by the great assembly of monks who resided in the saṃgha hall, but it was located on the western side of the monastery. Major monasteries had a number of smaller toilets located in other places, as well, such as in the administrative wing and the abbot’s quarters.

“toilet.” It is a room or building that must always exist wherever monastics reside.

The procedure for going to the toilet requires that one always carry a hand cloth. The method for that is to fold the hand cloth in two and drape it over the left arm below the crook of the elbow, on top of the robe sleeve. Having arrived at the toilet, one should hang the hand cloth over the pure pole.<sup>24</sup> The method for hanging it is like that when draping it over the arm. If one comes wearing a nine-panel or seven-panel kāṣāya, or the like, one should hang that alongside the hand cloth. One should align them so they do not fall; do not toss them on the pole in haste.<sup>25</sup> Be very careful to take note. “Taking note” refers to the fact that there are letters written on the pure pole, called “designations”; they are written on white paper, made into a circle like the disc of the moon, and attached at intervals to the pure pole. “Taking note” means to avoid mix-ups by not forgetting by which letter one’s own long robe has been left. When the community has many people in it, we should not confuse one’s own pole place with those of others.

24 pure pole (jōkan 淨竿): A raised horizontal pole used for hanging clothes, etc.

25 One should align them so they do not fall (ochizaran yō ni tahei su beshi おちざらんやうに打併すべし). That is, one should make sure that the two ends of the cloth or robe that hang down on either side of the pole are lined up (tahei 打併) at the same height so the item is balanced and does not slip off.

During this time, if a member of the community comes and stands next to one, one should fold one's hands and then make a bow with hands clasped. In bowing with hands clasped, one does not necessarily face the other person and bend one's body: just fold one's hands, hold them up to one's chest, and give an indication of bowing with hands clasped. In the toilet, even if one is not wearing one's long robe, one gives an indication of bowing with hands clasped to a member of the community. If both of one's hands have yet to touch filth, and neither hand is holding anything, then one should fold the two hands and bow. If one hand has already touched filth, or if one hand is holding something, one should bow with a single hand. To bow with a single hand, turn the hand palm up, bend the fingers slightly, holding them as if scooping up a handful of water, and make a slight nod as if to lower one's head, thereby suggesting a bow with hands clasped. If the other person makes a particular sort of bow, we should reciprocate with that sort of bow; if we bow in a certain way, the other person should also bow in that way.

The procedure for removing both partial robes and long robes and hanging them next to the hand cloth is as follows.<sup>26</sup> Take off the long robe, fold the two sleeves to the rear and match them up; if one aligns the two armpits and lifts them up, the two sleeves will double up. At this point, if one grasps the inside of the nape of the long robe with the left hand and holds the waist with the right hand and lifts, the two sleeves and the lapels on the left and right will fold over each other. With the two sleeves and two lapels thus doubled up, again fold in half lengthwise and throw the collar of the long robe over the far side of the pole. The skirt of the long robe, together with the armholes of the sleeves, etc., hang on the near side of the pole. In other words, the joined waist of the long robe is what hangs on the pure pole. Next, take the two ends of the hand cloth that are hanging over the near and far sides of the pole, cross them, wrap them around the long robe, cross them again and tie them in a knot on the side where the hand cloth is not attached to the pole. By wrapping it two or three times around and tying it, the long robe is kept from falling on the ground from the pure pole. One may also face the long robe and bow with hands together.

26 partial robes and long robes (hensan oyobi jikitotsu 褌衫および直裾): "Partial robe" (hensan 褌衫; also written 偏衫 and read henzan) refers to the upper garment of a two-part robe, worn with a skirt (kunsu 裙子); "long robe" (jikitotsu 直裾) refers to a single-piece robe, in which the upper and lower parts have been sewn together.

Next, take a binding cord and tie up [the sleeves of] both arms.<sup>27</sup> Next, go to the washstand, fill a cleaning bucket with water, carry it in the left hand and climb up to the toilet stall. The procedure for putting water into the cleaning bucket is not to fill it all the way, but to stop when it is nine-tenths full. When in front of the toilet stall door, one should change footwear. To put on the reed slippers and leave one's own footwear in front of the lavatory door is called "changing footwear."

When one wishes to go to the toilet, one should set out in advance; do not let the onset of internal pressure compel you to rush.<sup>28</sup> Then, fold the kāśāya, leaving it on the bench in one's quarters or on the pure pole.

27 binding cord (bansu 絆子): A cord to tie back the sleeves. It is tied in such a way that it forms a horizontal figure eight: the two ends of the "8" are looped over both shoulders, and the cross is in the center of the back. This effectively ties up the rectangular sleeves of a robe or undergarment, keeping them out of the way and clean when one is using the toilet or working with one's hands (preparing food, cleaning, etc.). Dōgen does not say here what garment is to be tied up, but it cannot be the "partial robe" (hensan 褊衫) or long robe (jikitotsu 直裰), because those have already been removed; it must be a sleeved undershirt, worn next to the skin.

28 Rules of Purity for the Chan Park (Zennen shingi 禪苑清規): Chanyuan qinggui 禪苑清規, ZZ.111:912a4-5, from the opening lines of a section entitled "Defecating and Urinating" (daxiao bianli 大小便利), on which Dōgen is relying in the following account of toilet practice.

Once inside the toilet stall, use the left hand to close the door panels. Next, pour just a little water from the cleaning bucket inside the toilet bowl.<sup>29</sup> Next, set the cleaning bucket down at the cleaning bucket place in front of you. Next, while still standing, face the toilet bowl and snap your fingers three times.<sup>30</sup> When snapping the fingers, make the left hand into a fist and hold it against the left side of the waist. Next, one gathers up the hem of one's underpants and the corners of one's robe, faces the door, straddles the toilet bowl with one foot on each of the opposite edges, squats, and relieves oneself. Do not dirty the area on either side, and do not contaminate the area in front or behind. During this time one should be in silent illumination.<sup>31</sup> Do not speak or titter with people on the other side of the partition wall, or raise one's voice and sing songs. Do not get “snot and spit scattered about”; do not grunt with exertion or act in haste.<sup>32</sup> We should not write words on the partition wall. Do not 29 toilet bowl (sō 槽): A pot, typically made of clay, that was set into (flush with) the floor inside each lavatory stall and served as the receptacle for human waste. Since it had to be cleaned out by hand periodically, the purpose of sprinkling water in it before use may have been to prevent feces from sticking to it.

30 snap your fingers three times (danji sange 彈指三下): According to the “Defecating and Urinating” section of the Rules of Purity for the Chan Park, which Dōgen is using as a reference here, the purpose of snapping the fingers is to warn away the excrement-eating ghosts (tanfun shi ki 噉糞之鬼) that haunt the toilet (Chanyuan qinggui 禪苑清規, ZZ.111:912a9-10).

31 During this time one should be in silent illumination (kono aida mokushō naru beshi このあひだ默照なるべし). “Silent illumination” (mokushō 默照) was a type of meditation promoted by Hongzhi Zhengjue 宏智正覺 (1091–1157), Zhenxie Qingliao 眞歇清了 (1088–1151), and other leaders of the Caodong 曹洞 lineage in Song China. The translation follows Kawamura's edition; but other textual witnesses have here, “one should maintain silence” (mokunen 默然), which in the context would seem the better reading. The Rules of Purity for the Chan Park, on which Dōgen is relying, says nothing of silent illumination in the toilet.

32 “snot and spit scattered about” (tei da rōzeki 涕唾狼藉): A set phrase, quoted from Chanyuan qinggui 禪苑清規, ZZ.111:912a10.

grunt with exertion or act in haste (doki sotsubō 努氣卒暴): The text may have been corrupted here. The compound expression “act in haste” (sotsubō 卒暴) seems out of context, and in fact the Rules of Purity for the Chan Park has at this point the more likely, use the toilet stick to draw on the earthen floor.

After relieving oneself of feces and stepping back, one should use the toilet stick. Also, there are rules for using paper: one must not use waste paper, and one must not use paper that has words written on it. Be sure to keep clean toilet sticks separate from soiled toilet sticks. A toilet stick is made eight inches long and is triangular. Its thickness is that of a thumb. There are some that are coated with lacquer, and some that are not lacquered. Soiled ones are to be thrown into the toilet stick receptacle. Clean ones are normally on the toilet stick stand. The toilet stick stand is placed near the plank that is in front of the toilet bowl.

The procedure for washing and purifying after using toilet sticks or using paper is as follows. Carry the cleaning bucket with the left hand. After thoroughly wetting the left hand, make a cup with the left hand and scoop out some water. Begin by washing and purifying the urine three times.<sup>33</sup> Next, wash and purify the [place of] defecation. In washing and purifying, one must maintain propriety and keep one's thoughts pure. During this time, be careful not to run out of water too soon by roughly tipping the cleaning bucket, spilling excess water out of one's hand, or splashing it about.

“make sounds by grunting with exertion” (nuqi zuosheng 努氣作聲). (Chanyuan qinggui 禪苑清規, ZZ.111:912a10.)

33 Begin by washing and purifying the urine (mazu shōben o senjō su まづ小便を洗淨す): As above, section 16, the term shōben here is no doubt synonymous with “the place of urination” (shōbensho 小便處) — i.e., the genitals or the urethral opening.

洗淨しをはりて、淨桶を安桶のところにおきて、つぎに籌をとりてのごひかはかす。あるいは紙をもちいるべし。大小兩處、よくよくのごひかはかすべし。つぎに、右手にて袴口・衣角をひきつくろひて、右手に淨桶を提して廁門をいづるちなみに、蒲鞋をぬぎて自鞋をはく。つぎに淨架にかへりて、淨桶を本所に安ず。

When finished washing and purifying, one puts the cleaning bucket back in the place for resting buckets, then takes a toilet stick and wipes oneself dry. Or, one should use paper. Thoroughly wipe and dry the places of urination and defecation.<sup>34</sup> Next, using the right hand, one straightens up one's underpants and robes and, carrying the cleaning bucket in the right hand, goes out the toilet stall door. At that point, one takes off the reed slippers and puts on one's own footwear. Next, one returns to the washstand and sets down the cleaning bucket in its original place.

Next, we should wash our hands. One takes the ash spoon in the right hand, scoops out an initial portion [of ash], places it on the surface of the tile stone, adds an appropriate amount of water with the right hand, and washes the hand that has touched filth, rubbing it clean on the tile stone. It is, for example, like grinding a rusty sword on a whetstone. One should wash in this manner three times with ash. Next, one should place some earth, add water to it, and wash three times. Next, take some black pod in the right hand, mix it into the water in a small bucket, and wash both hands by rubbing them together.<sup>35</sup> Wash thoroughly, even up to the wrists. One should devote oneself to this with sincerity and wash assiduously: three times with ashes, three times with earth, and once with black pod. Altogether, one set of seven times is the rule. Next, one washes with the large bucket. At this time, one does not use a medicinal

When going to pick up the water ladle, one must always use the right hand. During this time, do not make noise with the bucket or ladle or otherwise raise a clamor. Do not spill water, spill black pod, let the area around the water stand get wet, or hurry in whatever one is doing, and do not leave things scattered about. Next, one wipes one's hands on a communal hand cloth, or wipes them on one's own hand cloth. When finished wiping the hands, go before the long robe at the pure pole, remove the sleeve-binding cord and hang it on the pole. Next, after bowing with palms together, untie the hand cloth, take the long robe, and put it on. Next, hang the hand cloth over the crook of the left arm and rub on incense. In the common area, there is incense for rubbing; it is incense wood, shaped like a treasure bottle.<sup>38</sup> Its thickness is the size of a thumb.

In length, it measures four fingers. A string more than a foot long is threaded through holes in both ends of the incense, and it is hung over the pure pole. When one rubs it between one's two palms, its fragrant aroma perfumes both hands. When hanging the [sleeve-binding] cord on the pole, loop it over the same place at the top; do not let it touch other cords, resulting in tangled lines. Everything done in this way is purifying a buddha land, adorning a buddha land; one should do them with the utmost care, never precipitately. Do not entertain the thought, "If only I can finish and get back quickly." One should think to oneself about the principle of "not teaching the buddha dharma in the toilet."<sup>39</sup>

When a member of the community has come in [to the toilet], do not fix your gaze in his direction. For washing and purifying within a toilet stall, cold water is good; hot water is said to bring on hemorrhoids.<sup>40</sup> For washing hands, use hot water; there is no impediment to that. The provision of a cauldron is for the purpose of washing the hands with heated water.

used (among other functions) by monks in Song China to carry perfumed water for washing the hands. The piece of fragrant wood that Dōgen describes must have been a cylindrical spindle that had a slight narrowing at both ends, a shape that would suggest the neck and narrow area above the base of a water bottle.

39 "not teaching the buddha dharma in the toilet" (tōsu jō fusetsu buppō 東司上不説佛法). From the words of Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 (778-897) to the novice Wen Yuan (shami Wen Yuan 沙彌文遠, a disciple and frequent interlocutor of Zhaozhou in records of that master's sayings) (Zhaozhou Zhenji chanshi yulu 趙州真際禪師語錄, Guzunsu yulu 古尊宿語錄, ZZ.118.330b10-11):

因上東司、召文遠。文遠應諾。師云、東司上不可與爾説佛法也。

Once, in the toilet, [Zhaozhou] called to Wen Yuan.

Wen Yuan said, "Yes?"

The Master said, "I can't teach you the buddha dharma in the toilet."

The toilet, together with the saṃgha hall (sōdō 僧堂) and bathhouse (yokushitsu 浴室), was one of the "three silent halls" (san mokudō 三默堂) in a monastery — i.e., places where talking was forbidden.

40 cold water is good; hot water is said to bring on hemorrhoids (reisui o yoroshi to su, nettō wa chōfū o hikiokosu to iu 冷水をよろしとす、熱湯は腸風をひきおこすといふ): Paraphrasing Chanyuan qinggui 禪苑清規, ZZ.111:912a12.

In the Rules of Purity, it is said,<sup>41</sup>

After the evening [convocation], [the toilet manager] heats water and tops up the oil.<sup>42</sup> He always insures that hot water is in continuous supply so as not to cause the monks of the great assembly to be concerned.

しかあればしりぬ、湯・水ともにもちいるなり。もし廁中の、觸せることあらば、門扇を掩して觸牌をかくべし。もしあやまりて落桶あらば、門扇を掩して落桶牌をかくべし。これらの牌、かかれらん局には、のぼることなかれ。もしさきより廁上にのぼれらん、ほかに人ありて彈指せば、しばらくいづべし。

Thus, we know that hot water and cold water are both used. If there is anything soiled within a toilet stall, one should shut the door panels and hang up a “soiled” placard. If one has accidentally spilled a bucket, one should shut the door panels and hang up a “spilled bucket” placard. In the event that one of these placards has been hung up, do not enter [that toilet stall]. When one has already entered a toilet stall and there is a person outside who snaps his fingers, one should withdraw in due course.

45 duṣkṛta offense (tokira zai 突吉羅罪). A “misdeed,” the least serious of five grades of offence (gohin 五篇) explained in the Vinaya; expiation requires confession before one other monk, or repentance by oneself.

[54:35] {2:90}

しかあればすなはち、辨道功夫の道場、この儀をさきにすべし。あに三寶を禮せざらんや、あに人の禮拜をうけざらんや、あに人を禮せざらんや。佛祖の道場、かならずこの威儀あり。佛祖道場中人、かならずこの威儀具足あり。これ自己の強爲にあらず、威儀の云爲なり、諸佛の常儀なり、諸祖の家常なり。ただ此界の諸佛のみにあらず、十方の佛儀なり、淨土・穢土の佛儀なり。小聞のともがらおもはくは、諸佛には廁屋の威儀あらず、娑婆世界の諸佛の威儀は、淨土の諸佛のごとくにあらず、とおもふ。これは學佛道にあらず。しるべし、淨穢は離人の滴血なり、あるときはあたたかなり、あるときはすさまじ。諸佛に廁屋あり、としるべし。

We see from this that in practice places where there is concentrated effort in pursuit of the way, these observances should be of primary concern. How could one not pay obeisance to the three treasures? How could one not receive obeisance from other people? How could one not make obeisance to other people? In a practice place of the buddhas and ancestors, there is always this deportment. The people in a practice place of the buddhas and ancestors are always fully endowed with this deportment. This is not something one forces oneself to do; it is the word and deed of deportment; it is the usual practice of the buddhas; it is the everyday routine of the ancestors. These are buddha observances of the buddhas not only of this world but of the ten directions; they are the buddha observances of the pure lands and impure lands. What those of limited experience think is that buddhas have no deportment for the toilet room. They think that the deportment of the buddhas of this sahā world is not like that of the buddhas of the pure lands. This is not studying the way of the buddhas. We should know that pure and impure are a drop of blood from a person's body: at one point, it was warm; at the next, it is cold.<sup>46</sup> The buddhas have toilet rooms: we should know this.

十誦律第十四云、羅睺羅沙彌、宿佛廁。佛覺了、佛以右手摩羅睺羅頂、說是偈言、汝不爲貧窮、亦不失富貴、但爲求道故、出家應忍苦。

In fascicle 14 of the Ten Chapter Vinaya, it is said,<sup>47</sup>

46 pure and impure are a drop of blood from a person's body: at one point, it was warm; at the next, it is cold (jō e wa rinin no tekiketsu nari, aru toki wa atataka nari, aru toki wa susamaji 淨穢は離人の滴血なり、あるときはあたたかなり、あるときはすさまじ): The term susamaji すさまじ (“cold”) can also mean “weird,” “horrible,” etc. Dōgen's point here may simply be that “pure” and “impure” are not absolute categories; but it is worth remembering that, in Dōgen's cultural context, blood leaving the body (whether from menstruation or wounds) was considered a defilement (kegaré 穢).

47 Ten Chapter Vinaya (Jūju ritsu 十誦律): From a story found at Shisong lü 十誦律, T.1435.23:105b19-c9. The novice Rahula, unable to find proper lodging, lies down to sleep in the Buddha's toilet room, using the toilet foot rest as his pillow. The Buddha, concerned that Rahula might be bitten by a snake that inhabited the toilet room, brings

The Śrāmaṇera Rahula lodged in the Buddha's toilet. When the Buddha became aware of it, the Buddha rubbed Rahula's head with his right hand and spoke this gāthā:

*Not because you are poor and destitute,
Nor because you neglected your wealth and honor,
But only for the sake of seeking the way,
You have left home and had to endure hardships.*

しかあればすなはち、佛道場に廁屋あり。佛廁屋裏の威儀は洗淨なり、祖祖相傳しきたれり。佛儀のなほのこれる、慕古の慶快なり、あひがたきにあへるなり。いはんや如來かたじけなく廁屋裏にして、羅睺羅のために説法します。廁屋は佛轉法輪の一會なり。この道場の進止、これ佛祖正傳せり。

We see from this that a buddha's practice place has a toilet room. The deportment inside a buddha's toilet room is washing and purifying, and that has been passed down by ancestor after ancestor. That observances of the Buddha still exist is a blessing and comfort that derives from appreciation for the ancients; it is being able to encounter that which is difficult to encounter. Not to mention that the Tathāgata was so gracious as to preach the dharma for Rahula inside the toilet room. The toilet room is one assembly where buddhas turn the wheel of dharma. What to do and what not to do in this practice place has been directly transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors.

49 The same applies to urination (shōgyō yaku nyoze 小行亦如是): A sentence, likely referring to the placement of urinals, that does not in fact occur in the Taishō edition of the Vinaya text and the source of which is uncertain.

この方宜によるべし。これ西天竺國の諸精舎の圖なり、如來現在の建立なり。しるべし、一佛の佛儀のみにあらず、七佛の道場なり、精舎なり、諸佛の道場なり、精舎なり。はじめたるにあらず、諸佛の威儀なり。これらをあきらめざらんよりさきは、寺院を草創し、佛法を修行せん、あやまりはおほく、佛威儀そなはず、佛菩提いまだ現前せざらん。もし道場を建立し、寺院を草創せんには、佛祖正傳の法儀によるべし。これ正嫡正傳なるがゆえに、その功德、あつめかさなれり。佛祖正傳の嫡嗣にあらざれば、佛法の身心、いまだしらず、佛法の身心しらざれば、佛家の佛業あきらめざるなり。いま、大師釋迦牟尼佛の佛法、あまねく十方につたはれるといふは、佛身心の現成なり。佛身心現成の正當恁麼時、かくのごとし。

This standard should be followed. This was the ground plan of the vihāras in the Land of Sindhu in the West, the constructions when the Tathāgata was manifest in this world. We should recognize that it is not the buddha observance of only one buddha: it is [true of] the practice places, the vihāras, of the seven buddhas; it is the practice places, the vihāras, of all the buddhas.<sup>50</sup> It is not something newly started; it is the deportment of the buddhas.<sup>51</sup>

As long as we are not clear on these matters, when we go to found a monastery and practice the buddha dharma, we will make many mistakes, will not be endowed with the deportment of a buddha, and the bodhi of a buddha will not have appeared. If we wish to construct a practice place or found a monastery, we should follow the dharma regulations directly transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors. Because this is a direct transmission by direct descendants, its merit has accumulated and piled up. If one is not a legitimate heir to the direct transmission of the buddhas and ancestors, one still does not know the body and mind of the buddha dharma; if one does not know the body and mind of the buddha dharma, one is not clear about the buddha work of the house of the 50 it is not the buddha observance of only one buddha: it is [true of] the practice places, the vihāras, of the seven buddhas (ichibutsu no butsugi nomi ni arazu, shichi butsu no dōjō nari, shōja nari 一佛の佛儀のみにあらず、七佛の道場なり、精舎なり): The “seven buddhas” (shichi butsu 七佛), indicating Śākyamuni and six buddhas said to have preceded him, are the first figures in the Zen lineage of buddhas and ancestors as that was understood in Dōgen’s day; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas.” The subject of this sentence is unstated and ambiguous. The obvious candidate would be the rule for locating the toilet just mentioned, but one could understand it as all the observances for “washing and purifying” that Dōgen has described up to this point in the chapter. It is also unclear whether by describing “it” as “the practice places of the seven buddhas” Dōgen means simply that it is true of such practice places or is itself such practice places.

51 It is not something newly started (hajimetaru ni arazu はじめたるにあらず): Presumably, meaning that the procedure for toilets was not invented or first implemented by Buddha Śākyamuni.

buddhas. The fact that the buddha dharma of the Great Master, Buddha Śākyamuni, has now been transmitted widely in the ten directions means that the buddha body and mind are manifest. At the very time the buddha body and mind are manifest, this is what it is like.

INTRODUCTION

This chapter was composed at Kippōji in the last days of 1243, a very productive period for Dōgen's work on the Shōbōgenzō. It appears as number 55 in the seventy-five-chapter compilation, number 45 in the sixty-chapter compilation, and number 60 in the ninety-five-chapter Honzan edition.

As its title indicates, the text focuses on several passages using the expression “the ten directions” (i.e., the four cardinal and four ordinal points, plus the zenith and nadir), a standard Buddhist locution for “all directions,” “everywhere.” The discussion opens with comments on a reference, by Buddha Śākyamuni, to “buddha lands of the ten directions.” Dogen warns us not to think of the buddhas, their lands, and the ten directions as separate, much less to judge among the various buddhas — no doubt a criticism of those among his contemporaries who favored the Western Pure Land of Buddha Śākyamuni over our defiled Sahā realm of Buddha Śākyamuni. He goes on to identify the ten directions with the “one direction,” or location, in which each thing occurs, and concludes, “the buddhas and buddha lands are not two . . . they are just the ten directions.”

The text then takes up a series of sayings, by the ninth-century Chan Master Changsha Jingcen 長沙景岑, that identify “all the worlds in the ten directions” with the eye, speech, and body of the śramaṇa, and with the “radiance of the self.” After commenting on two more Chan sayings, the work ends with the remark, “In sum, we just study that the living nose is the ten directions.”

The Ten Directions

[55:1] {2:92}

拳頭一隻、只箇十方なり。赤心一片、玲瓏十方なり。敲出骨裏髓了也。

A single fist is just the ten directions; a single bare mind is the ten directions crystal clear.<sup>1</sup> The marrow has been beaten from the bones.<sup>2</sup>

[55:2]

釋迦牟尼佛、告大衆言、十方佛土中、唯一乘法。

Buddha Śākyamuni addressed the great assembly, saying, “In the buddha lands of the ten directions, there is only the dharma of the one vehicle.”<sup>3</sup>

[55:3]

いはゆる十方は、佛土を把來してこれをなせり。このゆえに、佛土を拈來せざれば、十方いまだあらざるなり。佛土なるゆえに、以佛爲主なり。この娑婆國土は、釋迦牟尼佛土なるがごとし。この娑婆世界を舉拈して、八兩半斤をあきらかに記して、十方佛土の七尺八尺なることを參學すべし。

These “ten directions” have been formed by grasping “the buddha lands.” Therefore, if we did not take up “the buddha lands,” there would be no “ten directions.” Since they are “buddha lands,” a buddha is their

1 A single fist (kentō isseki 拳頭一隻): The “fist” appears often in Zen texts, and in Dōgen’s writings, as a synecdoche for the true self or a true master; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Fist.”

a single bare mind (sekishin ippen 赤心一片): More literally, “a single piece of bare mind.” A “bare (or ‘red’) mind” (chixin 赤心) is a common Chinese idiom for a sincere, or straightforward, mind (or heart). Zen texts often speak of “a bare mind in pieces” (sekishin henpen 赤心片片); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bare mind in pieces.”

2 The marrow has been beaten from the bones (kōshutsu kotsuri zui ryō ya 敲出骨裏髓了也): A sentence in Chinese, expressing a fairly common metaphor for divulging the truth.

3 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miao-fa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:8a17). The “one vehicle” (ichijō 一乘) is the form of Buddhism leading to (or in some interpretations, expressing) the complete awakening of a buddha; a central teaching of the Lotus Sūtra.

ruler, as this Sahā world is the buddha land of Buddha Śākyamuni. Holding up this Sahā world and noting clearly eight tael and half a catty, we should study that the buddha lands of the ten directions are seven feet or eight feet.<sup>4</sup>

この十方は、一方にいり、一佛にいる。このゆえに、現十方せり。十方・一方、是方・自方・今方なるがゆえに、眼睛方なり、拳頭方なり、露柱方なり、燈籠方なり。かくのごとくの十方佛土の十方佛、いまだ大小あらず、淨穢あらず。このゆえに、十方の唯佛與佛、あひ稱揚讚歎するなり。さらにあひ誹謗してその長短・好惡をとくを、轉法輪とし説法とせず。諸佛および佛子として、助發問訊するなり。

These ten directions enter one direction, enter one buddha. Therefore, they have manifested the ten directions.<sup>5</sup> Because the ten directions are one direction, this direction, one's own direction, the present direction, they are the direction of the eye, the direction of the fist, the direction of the pillar, the direction of the lantern.<sup>6</sup> The buddhas of the ten directions of such "buddha lands in the ten directions" are not large or small, are not pure or dirty.<sup>7</sup> Therefore, "only buddhas with buddhas" in the ten

4 eight tael and half a catty (hachi ryō han kin 八兩半斤): A tael (ryō 兩) is a Chinese unit of weight (varying throughout history) equal to 1/16 catty (kin 斤); hence the expression "eight tael, half a catty" (hachi ryō han kin 八兩半斤) is akin to English "six of one, a half dozen of the other." The implication here seems to be that the one buddha land of Śākyamuni is equivalent to the buddha lands of the ten directions.

seven feet or eight feet (shichi shaku hachi shaku 七尺八尺): Dōgen may have in mind here a conversation between Chan Masters Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 (835-908) and Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908), which he includes in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 正法眼藏三白則 (DZZ.5:158, case 60) and on which he comments in "Shōbōgenzō juki" 正法眼藏授記; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Seven feet or eight feet."

5 they have manifested the ten directions (gen jippō seri 現十方せり): Or "they have appeared as (or in) the ten directions."

6 Because the ten directions are one direction, this direction, one's own direction, the present direction (jippō ippō, zehō jihō konpō naru ga yue ni 十方・一方、是方・自方・今方なるがゆえに): It is unclear just how to parse this passage, which offers no clues to the grammatical relationships among the five "directions" given. Taken together, the implication seems to be that "the ten directions" are this one direction where one is now.

the direction of the eye, the direction of the fist, the direction of the pillar, the direction of the lantern (ganzei hō nari, kentō hō nari, rochū hō nari, tōrō hō nari 眼睛方なり、拳頭方なり、露柱方なり、燈籠方なり): In this context, the former pair of "directions" may suggest the self (or Zen practitioner); the latter pair, the objective world (or the monastery). Alternatively, the former pair may suggest the Zen master; the latter pair the assembly of monks under his tutelage. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Eye," "Fist," "Pillars and lanterns."

7 are not large or small, are not pure or dirty (daishō arazu, jōe arazu 大小あらず、淨穢あらず): Probably indicating attributes of the buddha lands, rather than of the directions praise and admire each other.<sup>8</sup> They do not take condemning each other, talking of their strengths and weaknesses, likes and dislikes, as turning the dharma wheel and preaching the dharma.<sup>9</sup> As buddhas and buddhas' children, they assist and greet [each other].<sup>10</sup>

佛祖の法を稟受するには、かくのごとく參學するなり。外道・魔黨のごとく是非毀辱することあらざるなり。いま眞丹國につたはれる佛經を披閱して、一化の始終を觀見するに、釋迦牟尼佛、いまだかつて、他方の諸佛それ劣なり、ととかず、他方の諸佛それ勝なり、ととかず、また、他方の諸佛は諸佛にあらず、ととかず。おほよそ一代の説教にすべてみえざるところは、諸佛のあひ是非する佛語なり。他方の諸佛また、釋迦牟尼佛を是非したてまつる佛語つたはれず。

In receiving the dharma of the buddhas and ancestors, one studies in this way. One does not slander and insult over rights and wrongs like followers of other paths or the minions of Māra.<sup>11</sup> When we peruse the scriptures of the Buddha transmitted to the Land of Cīnasthāna and look at the entirety of his ministry, Buddha Śākyamuni never preached that the buddhas of other directions are inferior, or preached that the buddhas of other directions are superior; nor did he preach that the buddhas of buddhas themselves. The land of Buddha Amitābha is known as the “pure land” (jōdo 淨土) in contrast to this “defiled” Sahā (shaba 娑婆) world of Buddha Śākyamuni.

8 “only buddhas with buddhas” (yui butsu yo butsu 唯佛與佛): Probably, to be understood simply as “the buddhas.” Dōgen uses here a phrase from the Lotus Sūtra often invoked in the Shōbōgenzō; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas.”

praise and admire (shōyō santan 稱揚讚歎): A common fixed expression in Buddhist literature; not found elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

9 talking of their strengths and weaknesses, likes and dislikes (sono chōtan kōaku o toku その長短・好惡をとく): Probably reflecting a line in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing, T.262.9:38a3):

不説他人好惡長短。

[Those who wish to preach this sūtra] do not talk of the likes and dislikes, strengths and weaknesses of others.

10 assist and greet (johotsu monjin 助發問訊): It may be recalled that a buddha is expected to have studied under many buddhas in his career as a bodhisattva. The somewhat troubling term johotsu 助發, appearing several times in the Shōbōgenzō, seems to carry the sense “helps to develop, or promote”; in Zen usage, monjin 問訊 (“to inquire,” “to question”) typically denotes the act of bowing with palms together (gasshō 合掌) when greeting someone.

11 followers of other paths or the minions of Māra (gedō matō 外道 魔黨): Common pejoratives in Dōgen’s writing. The former expression, the “other paths,” refers to members of non-Buddhist religious traditions (S. tīrthika); the latter expression indicates the followers of Māra, the Evil One (S. papīyān), lord of the sixth heaven of the realm of desire (S. kāma-loka), who seeks to obstruct Buddhist awakening.

other directions are not buddhas.<sup>12</sup> In sum, what one does not see in all the teachings of his entire life is a word of the Buddha judging other buddhas; nor has there been transmitted any word of a buddha in which the buddhas of the other directions judge Buddha Śākyamuni.

このゆえに、釋迦牟尼佛、告大衆言、唯我知是相、十方佛亦然。

Therefore, Buddha Śākyamuni addressed the great assembly saying, “I alone know its marks, as do the buddhas in the ten directions.”<sup>13</sup>

[55:7]

しるべし、唯我知是相の相は、打圓相なり。圓相は、遮竿得恁麼長、那竿得恁麼短なり。十方佛道は、唯我知是相、釋迦牟尼佛亦然の説著なり。唯我證是相、自方佛亦然なり。我相・知相・是相・一切相・十方相・娑婆國土相・釋迦牟尼佛相なり。

We should know that the “mark” in “I alone know its marks” is “making a circular mark.”<sup>14</sup> The circular mark is “this bamboo is this long; that bamboo is that short.”<sup>15</sup> In the words of the buddhas in the ten direc-

---

12 Land of Cīnasthāna (Shintan koku 眞丹國): A common Chinese transliteration, Zhendan 眞丹, of a Sanskrit term for China.

buddhas of other directions are not buddhas (tahō no shobutsu wa shobutsu ni arazu 他方の諸佛は諸佛にあらず): Supplying wa shobutsu は諸佛, missing in the Kawamura text — which, if unamended, would yield, “nor did he preach that [they] are not buddhas of other directions.”

13 Buddha Śākyamuni addressed the great assembly (Shakamuni butsu koku daishu 釋迦牟尼佛告大衆): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:6a18-20):

又告舍利弗、無漏不思議、甚深微妙法、我今已具得。唯我知是相、十方佛亦然。

Again I declare, Śāriputra,
The undefiled, inconceivable,
Extremely profound and subtle dharma,
I have now fully acquired.
I alone know its marks,
As do the buddhas in the ten directions.

14 “making a circular mark” (da ensō 打圓相): Or “making a full circle.” The translation strains to retain Dōgen’s play with the graph sō 相, rendered here as “mark,” from the Lotus Sūtra passage. Zen texts regularly depict a monk’s making or drawing a circle (ichi ensō 一圓相) with his hand or some object to express the perfect suchness of things.

15 “this bamboo is this long; that bamboo is that short” (sha kan toku inmo chō, na kan toku inmo tan 遮竿得恁麼長、那竿得恁麼短): From a saying of Cuiwei Wuxue 翠微無學 (dates unknown) included in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:162, case 71), and treated elsewhere in his writings. Here is the version from the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:318c4-7):

This essential point — this is the sūtras of the buddhas.<sup>19</sup> The buddhas and the lands of the buddhas are not two; they are not sentient or insentient; not deluded or awakened; not good, bad, or neutral; not pure, not dirty; not formation, not continuation, not destruction, not emptiness; not permanent, not impermanent; not existent, not nonexistent; not themselves.<sup>20</sup> They are free from the four propositions; they have cut off

[Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃 (864-949)] asked, “What is the clear intention of [Bodhidharma’s] coming from the west?”

Cuiwei said, “Once no one’s around, I’ll tell you.”

The Master [i.e., Yunmen] waited a while and said, “No one’s around; I ask the Master to tell me.”

Cuiwei got down from his meditation seat and led the Master into the bamboo garden.

The Master said again, “No one’s around; I ask the Reverend to tell me.”

Cuiwei pointed at the bamboo and said, “This bamboo is this long; that bamboo is that short.”

16 In the words of the buddhas in the ten directions (jippō butsu dō 十方佛道): Dōgen is here imagining the perspective of these buddhas.

17 “I alone verify its marks” (yui ga shō ze sō 唯我證是相): The translation assumes that this sentence represents a continuation of the imagined words of the buddhas in the ten directions; it is unclear whether the following list of “marks” is also to be treated as such.

18 the mark of “I,” the mark of “know,” the mark of “its” (gasō chisō zesō 我相・知相・是相): Playing with the Lotus Sūtra line, “I alone know its marks” (yui ga chi ze sō 唯我知是相).

19 This essential point — this is the sūtras of the buddhas (kono shūshi wa, kore bukyō nari この宗旨は、これ佛經なり): The antecedent of “this” (kono この) is unclear. Perhaps, the meaning is simply, “such is the teaching [on the ten directions] of the sūtras.”

20 not formation, not continuation, not destruction, not emptiness (jō ni arazu jū ni arazu e ni arazu kū ni arazu 成にあらず・住にあらず・壞にあらず・空にあらず):

the hundred negations.<sup>21</sup> They are just the ten directions; they are just the buddha lands. Hence, the ten directions are just a fellow with a head and without a tail.<sup>22</sup>

Dōgen gives here a standard list of the four phases in the life of a world system, from its appearance to its disappearance in emptiness.

not themselves (ji ni arazu 自にあらず): Or "not the self." The Honzan 本山 edition of the text follows this with the phrase "not another" (ta ni arazu 他にあらず).

21 They are free from the four propositions; they have cut off the hundred negations (ri shiku nari, zetsu hyappi nari 離四句なり、絶百非なり): From the common Zen expression, "free from the four propositions and cutting off the hundred negations" (ri shiku zetsu hyappi 離四句絶百非). The "four propositions" (S. catuṣkoṭi) refers to the classical technique in Buddhist rhetoric that discusses a topic from four perspectives: true, not true, both true and not true, neither true nor not true. "The hundred negations" refers to the refutation of all an opponent's claims. Together, the two terms suggest the practice of reasoning and argumentation.

22 a fellow with a head and without a tail (u tō mu bi kan 有頭無尾漢): This expression, appearing with some frequency in Zen texts, is generally interpreted to indicate a person beyond distinctions.

23 Chan Master Changsha Jingcen (Chōsha Keishin zenji 長沙景岑禪師): Dates unknown; a disciple of Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-835). For his saying, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "All the worlds in the ten directions are the single eye of the śramaṇa." The saying and the variations that Dōgen will discuss below here appear together in his "Shōbōgenzō kōmyō" 正法眼藏光明.

24 the Śramaṇa Gautama (Kudon shamon 瞿曇沙門): A common reference to Buddha Śākyamuni. It is unclear whether Changsha had Gautama in mind in his use of śramaṇa ("ascetic"), and the translation will thus treat the term as a generic reference to the Buddhist monk.

25 "I have the treasury of the true dharma eye" (go u shōbōgenzō 吾有正法眼藏): The famous statement of the Buddha in the founding legend of the Zen tradition maṇa Gautama. Each horn and each point of all the worlds in the ten directions is the eye of Gautama.<sup>26</sup> “All the worlds in the ten directions” here is one among the eyes of the Śramaṇa. Beyond this, he has so many eyes.<sup>27</sup>

[55:11]

盡十方界、是沙門家常語。

“All the worlds in the ten directions are the everyday words of the śramaṇa.”<sup>28</sup>

[55:12]

家常は尋常なり。日本國の俗のことばには、よのつね、といふ。しかあるに、沙門家のよのつねの言語は、これ盡十方界なり、言端語端なり。家常語は盡十方界なるがゆえに、盡十方界は家常語なる道理、あきらかに參學すべし。この十方、無盡なるゆえに、盡十方なり。家常にこの語をもちいるなり。かの索馬・索鹽・索水・索器のごとし、奉水・奉器・奉鹽・奉馬のごとし。たれかしらん、没量大人、この語脈裏に轉身轉腦することを。語脈裏に轉語するなり、海口山舌、言端語直の家常なり。しかあれば、掩口し掩耳する、十方の眞箇是なり。

The “everyday” is the ordinary; in the vernacular idiom of the Land of Japan, we say “the common.”<sup>29</sup> Thus, the common speech in the house of transmission from master to disciple; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Treasury of the true dharma eye.”

26 Each horn and each point (kakukaku sensen 角角尖尖): Usually taken to mean “each and every thing.” Possibly, reflecting the Chan saying, “each leaf of the lotus is round, round, round like a mirror; each horn of the water caltrop is pointed, pointed, pointed like an awl” (he ye tuantuan tuan si jing, ling jiao jianjian jian si zhui 荷葉團團團似鏡、菱角尖尖尖似鉤).

27 so many eyes (nyo kota gen 如許多眼): Possibly, reflecting the question, posed by Yunyan Tansheng 雲巖曇晟 (782-841), about the thousand-armed, thousand-eyed Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, which Dōgen discusses in his “Shōbōgenzō Kannon”:

大悲菩薩、用許多手眼作麼。

How does the Bodhisattva of Great Compassion use so many hands and eyes?

28 “everyday words of the śramaṇa” (shamon kajō go 沙門家常語): This sentence also appears in Dōgen’s quotation of Changsha’s saying in “Shōbōgenzō kōmyō” 正法眼藏光明, but extant Chinese sources of the saying do not seem to include it. The expression “everyday words” may reflect a remark of Furong Daokai 芙蓉道楷 (1043-1118) included in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:202, case 143) and often quoted by Dōgen; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Everyday tea and rice.”

29 The “everyday” is the ordinary (kajō wa jinjō nari 家常は尋常なり): Dōgen is here simply explaining the Chinese idiom jiachang 家常 to his Japanese audience. The English “everyday” is a loose translation of a colloquial expression, meaning more literally something like “usual at home,” most often associated with the daily fare of the household (what we might call “home-style” cooking); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Everyday tea and rice.”

of the śramaṇa is “all the worlds in the ten directions.”<sup>30</sup> It is, “The speech is straightforward; the words are straightforward.”<sup>31</sup> Because the everyday words are “all the worlds in the ten directions,” we should clearly study the principle that “all the worlds in the ten directions” are “everyday words.”<sup>32</sup> Because these “ten directions” are inexhaustible, they exhaust the ten directions.<sup>33</sup> We use these words in the everyday.<sup>34</sup> They are like that requesting a horse, requesting salt, requesting water, and requesting a bowl; like offering water, offering a bowl, offering salt, and offering a horse.<sup>35</sup> Who knows how the immeasurably great person

“the common” (yonotsune よのつね): Often written 世の常; “the way of the world,” “what is commonly or usually done.”

30 the common speech in the house of the *śramaṇa (shamon ke no yonotsune no gongo 沙門家のよのつねの言語): Dōgen seems here to be playing with the term kajō 家常, taking the first glyph in its primary sense of “house.”

31 “The speech is straightforward; the words are straightforward” (gontan gotan 言端語端): Also read gentan gotan. An expression perhaps best known from its use in the Biyān lu 碧巖錄 (T.2003.48:142a5):

至道無難、言端語端。

The supreme way isn’t hard. The speech is straightforward; the words are straightforward.

32 Because the everyday words are “all the worlds in the ten directions” (kajō go wa jin jippō kai naru ga yue ni 家常語は盡十方界なるがゆえに): The translation follows the punctuation in Kawamura. This passage might also be parsed, “The speech is straightforward; the words are straightforward, because the everyday words are all the worlds in the ten directions. We should clearly study the principle that all the worlds in the ten directions are everyday words.”

33 Because these “ten directions” are inexhaustible, they exhaust the ten directions (kono jippō, mujin naru ga yue ni, jin jippō nari この十方、無盡なるゆえに、盡十方なり): The translation of the expression jin jippō kai 盡十方界 as “all the worlds in the ten directions” has obscured the play here with the initial glyph jin 盡, “to exhaust,” “exhaustive.” Dōgen is here reading the expression as if jin governed “the ten directions,” rather than “the worlds” — i.e., “the worlds in all the ten directions.”

34 We use these words in the everyday (kajō ni kono go o mochiiru nari 家常にこの語をもちいるなり): The grammatical antecedent of “these” here is unclear; a likely sense might be, “we use words in everyday speech that are ‘inexhaustible,’ or ‘exhaust the ten directions.’”

35 requesting a horse, requesting salt, requesting water, and requesting a bowl (saku ba saku en saku sui saku ki 索馬・索鹽・索水・索器): Allusion to a classic simile of the multivalent referents that must be discerned in the Buddha’s “secret” or “cryptic words” (mitsugo 密語), on which Dōgen comments in his “Shōbōgenzō ō saku sendaba” 正法眼藏王索仙陀婆, from the Nirvāṇa Sūtra (Da banniepan jing 大般涅槃經, T.374.12:421a29-b8):

如來密語甚深難解。譬如大王告諸群臣先陀婆來。先陀婆者一名四實。一者鹽、二者器、三者水、四者馬。如是四法皆同此名。有智之臣善知此名。若王洗時索先陀婆即便奉水。若王食時索先陀婆即便奉鹽。若王食已將欲飲漿索先陀婆即便奉器。若王欲遊索先陀婆即便奉馬。如是智臣善解大王四種密語。是大乘經亦復如是。有四無常。大乘智臣應當善知。

turns his body and turns his brain within this flow of words?<sup>36</sup> He turns the words within the flow of words. The mouth of the ocean and the tongue of the mountain — these are the “everyday” of “speech straightforward and words direct.”<sup>37</sup> Therefore, covering the mouth and covering the ears are what the ten directions truly are.<sup>38</sup>

盡十方界、沙門全身。

“All the worlds in the ten directions are the entire body of the śramaṇa.”<sup>39</sup>

---

The cryptic words of the Tathāgata are extremely profound and difficult to interpret. They are, for example, like the case of the great king who calls for his ministers to bring him saindhava [“Sindhu-born”]. Saindhava is a single term with four referents: salt, a bowl, water, and a horse. These four things all have the same term. The wise minister well understands [how to interpret] this term. If the king requests saindhava when he is bathing, [the minister] offers him water; if the king requests saindhava when he is eating, he offers him salt; if the king requests saindhava when he will drink the broth after the food is brought, he offers him a bowl; if the king requests saindhava when he will travel, he offers him a horse. In this way, the wise minister well interprets the fourfold cryptic words of the great king. The scriptures of the great vehicle similarly have four [senses of] “impermanence.” The wise ministers of the great vehicle should well understand them.

36 the immeasurably great person turns his body and turns his brain within this flow of words (motsuryō dainin, kono gomyaku ri ni tenshin [or tenjin] tennō suru 没量大人、この語脈裏に轉身轉腦する): Perhaps after the saying (e.g., in the Biyan lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:169a19):

没量大人語脈裏轉却。

The immeasurably great person turns round [or is turned round] within the flow of words.

37 the mouth of the ocean and the tongue of the mountain (kaiku sanzetsu 海口山舌): I.e., the “speech” of the natural world.

38 covering the mouth and covering the ears (en ku shi en ni suru 掩口し掩耳する): I.e., stopping talk. Zen masters are often depicted covering their ears (yan er 掩耳) in response to a student; Master Shitou 石頭 famously covered the mouth (yan kou 掩口) of the Layman Pang 龐居士 (740?-808) when the latter inquired about “the one who doesn’t keep company with the myriad dharmas” (bu yu wanfa wei lü zhe 不與萬法爲侶者) (see, e.g., Zongmen tongyao ji 宗門統要集, ZTS.1:70a6-7).

what the ten directions truly are (jippō no shinko ze 十方の眞箇是): An unusual construction, presumably derived from the common pattern “X ‘truly is’ (shinko ze 眞箇是) Y.”

39 “the entire body of the śramaṇa” (shamon zenshin 沙門全身): Continuing the quotation of Changsha’s saying, begun in section 9; see above, Note 23.

一手指天是天、一手指地是地。雖然如是、天上天下、唯我獨尊。これ沙門全身なる十方盡界なり。頂顙・眼睛・鼻孔・皮肉・骨髓の箇箇、みな透脱盡十方の沙門身なり。盡十方を動著せず、かくのごとくなり、擬議量をまたず。盡十方界沙門身を拈來して、見盡十方界沙門身するなり。

“One hand pointing to the heavens” is heaven; “one hand pointing to the earth” is the earth.<sup>40</sup> Although they are such, “in the heavens above and beneath the heavens, I alone am honored” — this is all the worlds in the ten directions as “the entire body of the śramaṇa.”<sup>41</sup> The crown of the head, the eye, the nose, the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow — each is the body of the śramaṇa that transcends all the ten directions.<sup>42</sup> It is like this without moving all the ten directions; it does not depend on considering and thinking.<sup>43</sup> Taking up the body of “the śramaṇa of all the worlds in the ten directions,” we see the body of the śramaṇa of all the worlds in the ten directions.<sup>44</sup>

40 “One hand pointing to the heavens” is heaven (isshu shi ten ze ten 一手指天是天): This passage, ending “I alone am honored,” is given in Chinese, as if quoting a text; in fact, it is a combination of quotation and Dōgen’s interpolation. The quotation comes from the legend, popular in Zen texts, of the remarkable behavior of the Buddha at the time of his birth; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “I alone am honored.”

41 Although they are such (sui nen nyo ze 雖然如是): The subject is unexpressed; hence the antecedent of the interpolated “they” is ambiguous (most likely, “heaven and earth”). “Such” (nyo ze 如是) may be taken either simply as “like this” or as the more technical Buddhist term “suchness.” The translation masks what seems to be play here with the ze 是, introduced in the last line of the preceding section, “what the ten directions truly are (ze 是),” and recurring in the lines “one hand pointing to the heavens is (ze 是) heaven” and “one hand pointing to the earth is (ze 是) the earth.” Presumably, the repetition is intended to reinforce the identification of the buddha with heaven and earth.

42 The crown of the head, the eye, the nose, the skin, flesh, bones and marrow (chōnei ganzei bikū hi niku kotsu zui 頂顙・眼睛・鼻孔・皮肉・骨髓): All these body parts figure frequently in Zen texts as synecdoches for the (true) person. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Crown of the head,” “Nose,” “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

43 considering and thinking (gigi ryō 擬議量): Taking ryō 量 here as shiryō 思量; a somewhat unusual combination with gigi 擬議, a common term with the sense “to consider saying [something],” “to be on the verge of speaking.” Alternatively, the three glyphs could be parsed, “the measure (i.e., “extent”) of considering.”

44 Taking up the body of “the śramaṇa of all the worlds in the ten directions” (jin jippō kai shamō shin o nenrai shite 盡十方界沙門身を拈來して): The grammatical subject being unexpressed, the agent here is ambiguous. The translation follows the punctuation in Kawamura’s text, but the passage could be parsed differently: “It is like this without moving all the ten directions. Without depending on considering and thinking, taking up the body of the śramaṇa of all the worlds in the ten directions, we see the body of the śramaṇa of all the worlds in the ten directions.” The expression “taking up” (nenrai shite 拈來して), typically meaning “to take up for consideration,” harks back to the line near the beginning of our text, “if we did not take up (nenrai sezureba 拈來せざれば) the buddha lands, there would be no ten directions.”

“The self” means the nose “before your father and mother were born.”<sup>46</sup> The nose inadvertently in the hand of the self is called “all the ten directions.”<sup>47</sup> Still, the self is realized and is the “kōan realized,” is “opening the hall and seeing the buddha.”<sup>48</sup> Nevertheless, the eye has been switched by another for a soapberry seed.<sup>49</sup> Nevertheless, it’s right in

45 “the radiance of the self” (jiko kōmyō 自己光明): Continuing the quotation of Changsha’s saying (see above, Note 23). A somewhat unusual expression, likely derived from the more common “radiance of the buddha” (butsu kōmyō 佛光明), used for the nimbus surrounding a buddha’s body and, by metaphorical extension, his wisdom.

46 the nose “before your father and mother were born” (bumo [also read fubo] mishō izen no bikū 父母未生以前の鼻孔): Variation on the more common Zen expression “your original face (honrai menmoku 本來面目) before your father and mother were born” (some would read this, “before your father and mother gave birth”). The “nose” (or “nostril”), in a similar sense, has already appeared just above, section 14. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose,” “Before your father and mother were born.”

47 The nose inadvertently in the hand of the self (bikū ayamarite jiko no shuri ni aru 鼻孔あやまりて自己の手裏にある): A decidedly odd expression, presumably meaning something like “the person being by nature (or finding itself) in the self.” Perhaps playing with combinations of sayings in Zen texts such as “the nose is in another person’s hand” (bikū zai tanin shuri 鼻孔在他人手裏) (Congrong lu 從容錄, T.2004.48:262b14), or “all the whole earth is at once in my hand” (jin daichi ichiji zai ga shuri 盡大地一時在我手裏) (Biyan lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:145b12). For more on the metaphorical uses of the word “nose,” see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose.”

48 Still, the self is realized (shika aru ni, jiko genjō shite しかあるに、自己現成して): The adverbial “still” here reads shika aru ni しかあるに in an adversative sense; it might also be taken to mean “thus.”

“opening the hall and seeing the buddha” (kaiden kenbutsu 開殿見佛): Likely from the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:121c10). A similar expression appears in the “Henzan” 遍參 chapter: “Opening the hall and seeing the buddhas and ancestors” (shobutsu shoso o kaiden sanken suru 諸佛諸祖を開殿參見する).

49 the eye has been switched by another for a soapberry seed (ganzei hi betsunin kankyaku mokukansu ryō ya 眼睛被別人換却木楔子了也): Generally taken to mean that one has come to see with authentically Buddhist eyes. The soapberry seed (mokukansu 木楔子) is used for Buddhist prayer beads (juzu 珠數). Dōgen has a similar line in his “Shōbōgenzō butsu kōjō ji” 正法眼藏佛向上事, probably after a saying of Chan Master your face; everyone should be able to see it.<sup>50</sup> Furthermore, while it may be that “summoning him is easy but sending him off is hard,” “when called, he turns his head; what’s the use” of turning the head ourselves? Make this fellow turn his head.<sup>51</sup> When the food waits for the person to eat it, and the clothes wait for the person to wear them, though we seem to be groping for it without touching it, how sad that I’ve already given you the thirty blows.<sup>52</sup>

Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃 (Yunmen yulu 雲門語錄, T.1988.47:544a11-12):

若說佛說祖、佛意祖意大似將木楔子換却爾眼睛相似。

If we talk of the buddhas and talk of the ancestors, the intention of the buddhas and the intention of the ancestors resembles switching soapberry seeds for your eyes.

50 Nevertheless, it’s right in your face; everyone should be able to see it (hek-imen [also read hitsumen] rai, daike shōken suru koto o u beshi 劈面來、大家相見することをうべし): A passage largely in Chinese syntax, for which no source has been identified. “Right in your face” renders the Chinese colloquialism pimian lai 劈面來, meaning something like “to come head on.” The compound pimian has a literal sense “to split the face,” and some interpreters, beginning with the Shōbōgenzō shō 正法眼藏抄 (CKZS.7:313) suggest that Dōgen has this sense in mind here.

51 while it may be that “summoning him is easy but sending him off is hard,” “when called, he turns his head; what’s the use” of turning the head ourselves? Make this fellow turn his head (ko soku i, ken soku nan nari to iedomo, kan toku kai tō, ji kai tō kan sa ka yō, ben chaku sha kan kai tō nari 呼則易、遣則難なりといへども、喚得廻頭、自廻頭堪作何用、便著者漢廻頭なり): A tentative translation of a passage, almost entirely in Chinese syntax, that is variously interpreted. Apart from the last sentence, the wording directly reflects the comments on case 56 of the Biyān lu 碧巖錄 (T.2003:48.190a18), in which the master Qinshan 欽山 calls a monk to him. The comment:

呼則易遣則難。喚得回頭。堪作什麼。

Summoning him is easy; sending him off is hard. Having been called, he turns his head. What good is that?

52 the food waits for the person to eat it, and the clothes wait for the person to wear them (han tai kitsu nin, e tai jaku nin 飯待喫人、衣待著人): Seemingly a proverb (though the source is unidentified), in Chinese syntax, meaning something like “it is the eater that makes the food and the wearer that makes the clothes.” The translation masks what may be play with the predicate chaku 著, translated as “wears” here, as “make” in the phrase “make this fellow turn the head” in the preceding sentence, and as “touching” in the phrase just following.

groping for it without touching it (mo saku fu jaku 摸索不著): I.e., “being unable to find it”; a fairly common idiom in Zen texts, used as we might say one “doesn’t get it.” The presumed antecedent for the interpolated “it” here is “the person” who eats the food and wears the clothes.

how sad that I’ve already given you the thirty blows (kashakuko, zō yo ni sanjū bō 可惜許、曾與爾三十棒): Again, in Chinese syntax. The Chinese kexi xu 可惜許 (“how sad”) is a common lament in Chan texts; “the thirty blows” (sanshi bang 三十棒) is a standard figure of speech used by the Chan master to indicate the “guilt” of the student.

The eyelid is “the radiance of the self.” Suddenly to open it is “are within.” The dependence of seeing on what is in the eye is called “all the worlds in the ten directions.”<sup>54</sup> Nevertheless, though this is the case, when you sleep on the same bench, you know the holes in the quilt.<sup>55</sup>

Therefore, of every “maestro,” every “fist,” there is no one of the ten directions that is not the self.<sup>57</sup> Because they are the self, each and every 53 “are within the radiance of the self” (zai jiko kōmyō ri 在自己光明裏): Continuing the quotation of Changsha’s saying (see above, Note 23).

54 The dependence of seeing on what is in the eye (ken yu zai gen 見由在眼): Perhaps reflecting the common Chan saying, “what’s in the eye is called ‘seeing’; what’s in the ear is called ‘hearing’” (zai yan yue jian, zai er yue wen 在眼曰見、在耳曰聞).

55 when you sleep on the same bench, you know the holes in the quilt (dō shō min chi hi sen 同牀眠知被穿): Generally taken to mean that one knows the reality of the self and the worlds when they are one. The same metaphor can be found in the Biyan lu 碧巖錄 (T.2003.48:178b21):

若不同床睡、焉知被底穿。

If they’re not sleeping on the same bench,

How would he know the holes in the quilt?

56 “there is no one that is not the self” (mu ichinin fu jiko 無一人不自己): Continuing the quotation of Changsha’s saying (see above, Note 23).

57 every “maestro,” every “fist” (ko ko no soka, ko ko no kentō 箇箇の作家、箇箇の拳頭): “Maestro” attempts to render the Chinese zuojia 作家, regularly used of an author or poet and, in Zen usage, of an accomplished master; we had the “fist” used in reference to such a master in section 1, above.

self is the ten directions; the ten directions of each and every self themselves obstruct the ten directions.<sup>58</sup> Because the vital artery of each and every self is in the hand of the self, it is return his original lot of feed.<sup>59</sup> Why would Dharma's eye and Gautama's nose now be freshly in the womb of the pillar?<sup>60</sup> It is because going in and out are left entirely to the ten directions, the ten sides.<sup>61</sup>

玄沙院宗一大師云、盡十方界、是一顆明珠。

Great Master Zongyi of Xuansha Cloister said, “All the worlds in the ten directions are one bright pearl.”<sup>62</sup>

[55:22]

あきらかにしりぬ、一顆明珠は、これ盡十方界なり。神頭鬼面、これを窟宅とせり、佛祖兒孫、これを眼睛とせり。人家男女、これを頂顙・拳頭と

58 each and every self (ji ji ko ko 自自己己): Loose translation of a playful expression that doubles each of the two elements in the compound term jiko 自己 (“self”); as if one were to say something like, “itself, itself, myself, myself.”

themselves obstruct the ten directions (shitashiku jippō o keige suru したしく十方を罣礙する): The use of keige su 罣礙す (“to obstruct,” “to hinder”) here follows a familiar pattern in Dōgen's writings, in which the term seems to mean “to define,” “to identify as.”

59 return his original lot of feed (gen ta honbun sōryō 還他本分草料): Reflecting a fairly common expression in Zen texts, which treats the person as a domestic animal to be fed; see, e.g., the comment in the Biyan lu 碧巖錄 (T.2003.48:157c24):

何不與他本分草料。

Why doesn't he give him his original lot of feed?

60 in the womb of the pillar (rōchū no tai ri 露柱の胎裏): The question here would seem to be, in what sense is the self in the world? “Pillars pregnant” (rochū kaitai 露柱懷胎), commonly found in Zen texts, suggests vitality within an apparently lifeless object; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Pillars and lanterns.”

61 going in and out are left entirely to the ten directions, the ten sides (shutsu nyū ya jippō jūmen ichinin 出入也十方十面一任): The “ten sides” are synonymous with the “ten directions.” Perhaps somewhat as one might say in English, “let the four winds blow,” Zen texts often speak of “leaving things to” (yiren 一任) the directions — as in such locutions as, “leave it entirely to the four directions and eight sides” (yiren sifang bamian 一任四方八面); “leave it entirely to east and west” (yiren tongxi 一任東西); or simply “leave it entirely to the directions” (yiren zhufang 一任諸方).

62 Great Master Zongyi of Xuansha Cloister (Gensha in Shūitsu daishi 玄沙院宗一大師): I.e., Chan Master Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備. His saying, “all the worlds in the ten directions are one bright pearl,” appears in Dōgen's shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:132, case 15) and is treated in “Shōbōgenzō ikka myōjū” 正法眼藏一顆明珠. For sources of the saying, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “One bright pearl.”

せり、初心晩學、これを著衣喫飯とせり。先師、これを泥彈子として兄弟を打著す。しかもこれ單提の一著子なりといへども、祖宗の眼睛を抉出きたれり。抉出するとき、祖宗ともに壺隻手をいだす。さらに眼睛裏放光するのみなり。

Clearly, we know that “one bright pearl” is all the worlds in the ten directions. Spirits and demons take it as their cave; the descendants of the buddhas and ancestors take it as the eye; the men and women of families take it as a head or a fist; beginners and latecomers take it as wearing clothes and having meals.<sup>63</sup> My former master took it as a ball of mud and hit the brothers with it.<sup>64</sup> Moreover, though we may say this is “one move directly presented,” he has gouged out the eye of the ancestor.<sup>65</sup> When he gouges it out, the ancestors “each put out a hand.”<sup>66</sup> Going further, it is just “from within their eyes shines a light.”<sup>67</sup>

* * * * *

63 Spirits and demons (jinzū kimen 神頭鬼面): More literally, perhaps, “spirit heads and demon faces”; a fixed phrase appearing in a number of Dōgen’s texts.

beginners and latecomers (shoshin bangaku 初心晩學): A casual translation of an expression quite common in Dōgen’s writings for the inexperienced practitioner; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Beginner’s mind.”

64 My former master (senshi 先師): I.e., Dōgen’s late teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227). For the remark to which Dōgen alludes here, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Gouge out Bodhidharma’s eye.”

65 “one move directly presented” (tantei no ichi jakusu 單提の一著子): “One move” (ichi jakusu) is used in reference to moving a piece in a board game; in Zen texts, often a “move” in a dialogue. “Directly presented” (tantei 單提) renders a term referring to a Zen master’s direct teaching style. For the Chinese equivalent of this phrase, danti yizhuo 單提一著, see, e.g., Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:123c16.

66 “each put out a hand” (tomo ni isseki shu o idasu ともに壺隻手をいだす): Perhaps reflecting a phrase from a story recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:175-176, case 97: A monk asked Luoshan Daoxian 羅山道閑 how much he should pay to have a stūpa built. Luoshan said,

若將三文錢與匠人、和尚此生決定不得塔。若將兩文錢與匠人、和尚與匠人共出一隻手。若將一文錢與匠人、帶累匠人眉鬚墮落。

If you offer the artisan three cash, the Reverend will definitely not get a stūpa in this lifetime. If you offer the artisan two cash, the Reverend and the artisan will each put out one hand. If you offer the artisan one cash, you’ll so perplex him that the artisan’s eyebrows and beard will fall off.

67 “from within their eyes shines a light” (ganzei ri hōkō suru 眼睛裏放光する): Probably again from the words of Rujing 如淨 (Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:123b17):

眼睛裡放光、鼻孔裡出氣。

From within the eyes shines a light;
From within the nose issues a breath.

[55:23] {2:97}

乾峰和尚、因僧問、十方薄伽梵、一路涅槃門。未審、路頭在什麼處。乾峰以拄杖畫一畫云、在遮裏。

Reverend Qianfeng was once asked by a monk, “The bhagavats in the ten directions are on one road to the gate of nirvāṇa. I don’t understand, where are they on that road?”<sup>68</sup>

Qianfeng drew a mark with his staff and said, “They’re here.”

いはゆる在遮裏は十方なり、薄伽梵とは拄杖なり、拄杖とは在遮裏なり、一路は十方なり。しかあれども、瞿曇の鼻孔裏に、拄杖をかくすことなかれ、拄杖の鼻孔に、拄杖を撞著することなかれ。しかもかくのごとくなりとも、乾峰老漢、すでに十方薄伽梵・一路涅槃門を料理すると認ずることなかれ。ただ在遮裏と道著するのみなり。在遮裏はなきにあらず、乾峰老漢、はじめより拄杖に瞞ぜられざらん、よし。おほよそ、活鼻孔を十方と參學するのみなり。

This “they’re here” is the “ten directions”; the “bhagavats” are the “staff”; the “staff” is “they’re here”; the “one road” is the “ten directions.” Nevertheless, do not hide the staff in the nose of Gautama; do not ram the staff in the nose of the staff. Nevertheless, though this is the case, do not think that old man Qianfeng has managed “the bhagavats in the ten directions” or “the road to the gate of nirvāṇa”: he just says, “they’re here.”<sup>69</sup> It is not that “they’re here” is not the case, and it is fine so long as old man Qianfeng is not from the start deceived by his staff. In sum, we just study the living nose as the ten directions.

68 Reverend Qianfeng (Kenpō oshō 乾峰和尚): Dates unknown; a follower of Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869). This incident appears in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:136, case 37; see also Zongmen tongyao ji 宗門統要集, ZTS.I:175b7-8.

bhagavats (bagyabon 薄伽梵): “Revered Ones”; a common epithet of the buddhas. Rendered here in the Chinese transliteration, bojiāfan, it is typically translated as shizun 世尊 (“World-Honored One”).

69 old man Qianfeng has managed “the bhagavats in the ten directions” or “the road to the gate of nirvāṇa” (Kenpō rōkan, sude ni jippō bagyabon ichiro nehan mon o ryōri suru 乾峰老漢、すでに十方薄伽梵・一路涅槃門を料理する): The translation follows Kawamura’s punctuation in taking “the bhagavats in the ten directions” and “the road to the gate of nirvāṇa” as two topics; the passage could also be read, “old man Qianfeng has managed the bhagavats in the ten directions on the road to the gate of nirvāṇa.” “To manage” here translates the verb ryōri su 料理す, “to organize,” “to arrange.”

INTRODUCTION

This work was composed at the site known as Yamashibu 禪師峰 (or Zenji Peak) in the winter of 1243, Dōgen's first in the snow country of Echizen. It occurs as number 56 in the seventy-five-chapter compilation of the Shōbōgenzō, number 47 in the sixty-chapter compilation, and number 61 in the Honzan edition.

As its title indicates, the essay is devoted to the question of what it means to see a buddha. It opens with a passage from the Diamond Sūtra, in which the Buddha teaches that one truly sees him when one understands that all his identifying characteristics are empty of ultimate reality. While affirming this famous teaching, Dōgen proceeds in his essay to explore a richer understanding of seeing buddha that identifies it with all the acts of Buddhist piety and practice — an understanding he develops largely through a series of comments on relevant passages from his favorite scripture, the Lotus Sūtra. Finally, the essay closes with remarks on the famous story of the Arhat Piṇḍola's re-enactment of his seeing Buddha Śākyamuni.

見佛

Seeing Buddha

[56:1] {2:98}

釋迦牟尼佛、告大衆言、若見諸相非相、即見如來。

Buddha Śākyamuni addressed the great assembly saying, “If one sees that the marks are no-marks, that is seeing the Tathāgata.”<sup>1</sup>

[56:2]

いまの見諸相と見非相と、透脱せる體達なり、ゆえに見如來なり。この見佛眼、すでに參開なる現成を見佛とす。見佛眼の活路、これ參佛眼なり。自佛を他方にみ、佛外に自佛をみるとき、條條の蔓枝なりといへども、見佛を參學せると、見佛を辦肯すると、見佛を脱落すると、見佛を得活すると、見佛を使得ると、日面佛見なり、月面佛見なり。恁麼の見佛、ともに無盡面・無盡身・無盡心・無盡手眼の見佛なり。而今脚尖に行履する發心發足よりこのかた、辦道功夫、および證契究徹、みな見佛裏に走入する活眼睛なり、活骨髓なり。

The “seeing marks” and seeing “no-marks” here are liberated personal realizations; hence, they are “seeing the Tathāgata.”<sup>2</sup> The manifestation

1 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): A well-known passage from the Diamond Sūtra (Jingang bore boluomi jing 金剛般若波羅蜜經, T.235.8:749a24-25), widely cited in Zen and other Buddhist texts. The sūtra is playing here on the technical term “mark” (sō 相; S. lakṣana), which is used in reference to both (a) the attribute by which a thing is identified as being what it is, and (b) a member of the list of thirty-two distinctive features of the body of a buddha. Here is the original context in Kumārajīva’s translation of the sūtra (T.235.8:749a21-25):

須菩提、於意云何。可以身相見如來不。不也世尊。不可以身相得見如來。何以故。如來所說身相即非身相。佛告須菩提。凡所有相皆是虛妄。若見諸相非相則見如來。

“Subhūti, what do you think? Can one see the Tathāgata by his bodily marks?”

“No, World-Honored One, one cannot see the Tathāgata by his bodily marks. Why? What are called the bodily marks of the Tathāgata are no-bodily-marks.”

The Buddha addressed Subhūti, “Whatever marks there are, they are all deceptive. If one sees that marks are no-marks, one sees the Tathāgata.”

2 The “seeing marks” and seeing “no-marks” here (ima no ken shosō to ken hisō to いまの見諸相と見非相と): As he himself makes clear in section 3, below, Dōgen departs here from the standard understanding of the Diamond Sūtra line, by taking “marks” of this eye of seeing buddha as truly studied and opened is called “seeing buddha.”<sup>3</sup> The life-saving path of the eye of seeing buddha — this is the buddha eye of study.<sup>4</sup> When we see our own buddha elsewhere, or see our own buddha apart from buddha, this may be various vines and branches; but to have studied seeing buddha, to confirm seeing buddha, to slough off seeing buddha, to revive seeing buddha, and to employ seeing buddha — these are the seeing of the Sun-faced Buddha and the seeing of the Moon-faced Buddha.<sup>5</sup> This kind of seeing buddha is, at the same time, seeing buddha of inexhaustible faces, inexhaustible bodies,

(shosō 諸相) and “no-marks” (hisō 非相) as two distinct objects of the verb “to see” (ken 見), a reading crucial to his subsequent argument.

3 The manifestation of this eye of seeing buddha as truly studied and opened (kono kenbutsu gen, sude ni sankai naru genjō この見佛眼、すでに参開なる現成): The expression kenbutsu gen 見佛眼 is more naturally rendered “the eye that sees the buddha”; the translation “eye of seeing buddha” seeks to preserve the possibility that “buddha” is both the agent and the object of “seeing.” The unusual sankai 参開 (“study and open”) occurs several times in the Shōbōgenzō, always in connection with the opening of the eye; the translation takes san 参 here as sangaku 参學.

4 The life-saving path of the eye of seeing buddha — this is the buddha eye of study (kenbutsugen no katsuro, kore sanbutsugen nari 見佛眼の活路、これ参佛眼なり): The expression sanbutsugen 参佛眼 could also be parsed “the eye that studies the buddha.” The translation here takes the sense to be that the spiritual practice of seeing buddha is the awakened buddha eye with which we practice. A similar usage is found in the “Shōbōgenzō baika” 正法眼藏梅華:

親曾見佛の道旨、しづかに参佛眼あるべし。

For the meaning of the words, “[Pinḍola had] personally once seen the Buddha,” we should have the buddha eye that quietly studies it.

The term katsuro 活路 (“life-saving path”), appearing frequently in Dōgen’s writing, is often taken as “vital path,” though its colloquial meaning is a “path to life” — i.e., an escape route from a deadly situation.

5 When we see our own buddha elsewhere, or see our own buddha apart from buddha (jibutsu o tahō ni mi, butsugai ni jibutsu o miru toki 自佛を他方にみ、佛外に自佛をみるとき): The exact implications are unclear; perhaps “when we see the buddha as other than ourselves, or see ourselves as other than a buddha.”

vines and branches (manshi 蔓枝): An unusual expression, repeated below (section 10), but not found elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; suggests a dense tangle. Here, perhaps, expressing the myriad ways we may see buddha.

to have studied seeing buddha (kenbutsu o sangaku seru 見佛を参學せる): The series beginning with this phrase appears to represent stages on the “life-saving path” of “seeing buddha”: study, understanding, transcendence, return, and application.

to revive seeing buddha (kenbutsu o tokkatsu suru 見佛を得活する): The expression tokkatsu 得活 (“to revive”) here suggests the words of Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869), “In death, he lives” (shichū tokkatsu 死中得活), said in answer to the question of who it is that “talks of the mind and talks of the nature” (sesshin sesshō 説心説性; treated by Dōgen in the Shōbōgenzō chapter of that name).

inexhaustible minds, inexhaustible hands and eyes.<sup>6</sup> Now, ever since bringing forth the mind [of bodhi] and setting out to engage in the conduct on tiptoe, our concentrated effort in pursuit of the way, as well as our complete mastery of verification and accord, are all the living eye, the living bones and marrow, that run into seeing buddha.<sup>7</sup>

しかあれば、自盡界・他盡方、遮箇頭・那箇頭、おなじく見佛功夫なり。如來道の若見諸相非相を拈來するに、參學眼なきともがらおもはくは、諸相を相にあらざとみる、すなはち見如來、といふ。そのおもむきは、諸相は相にはあらざ、如來なりとみる、といふとおもふ。まことに少量の一邊は、しかのごとくも參學すべしといへども、佛意の道成は、しかにはあらざるなり。しるべし、諸相を見取し、非相を見取する、即見如來なり。如來あり、非如來あり。

Thus, all the worlds of self and all the directions of other, over here and over there, are equally the concentrated effort of seeing buddha.<sup>8</sup> In taking up the Tathāgata's words, "If one sees that the marks are no-marks," those without the eye of study think that he is saying, "to see marks as to employ seeing buddha (kenbutsu o shitoku suru 見佛を使得する): Possibly recalling the well-known Zen expression "employ the twelve times" (shitoku jūni ji 使得十二時) attributed to Zhaozhou 趙州; see Supplementary Notes.

seeing of the Sun-faced Buddha (Nichimen butsu ken 日面佛見); seeing of the Moon-faced Buddha (Gachimēn butsu ken 月面佛見): From the names of two buddhas given in the Fōming jing 佛名經; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Sun face, moon face." Dōgen's phrasing, like its translation here, can be read with these two buddhas as either the objects or the agents of the "seeing" (or both).

6 seeing buddha of inexhaustible faces, inexhaustible bodies, inexhaustible minds, inexhaustible hands and eyes (mujin men mujin shin mujin shin mujin shugen no kenbutsu 無盡面・無盡身・無盡心・無盡手眼の見佛): Playing off the "Sun-faced" and "Moon-faced" buddhas just above; probably to be taken as seeing all the faces, bodies, minds, hands, and eyes of the buddhas. "Inexhaustible hands and eyes" (mujin shugen 無盡手眼) may reflect the hands, each with an eye in the palm, of the thousand-armed Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara (Senju Kannon bosatsu 千手觀音菩薩), who appears several times in the Shōbōgenzō.

7 Now, ever since bringing forth the mind [of bodhi] and setting out to engage in the conduct on tiptoe (nikon kyakusen ni anri suru hosshin hossoku yori kono kata 而今脚尖に行履する發心發足よりこのかた): I.e., ever since we undertook Buddhist practice; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Bring forth the mind." A somewhat awkward locution that plays with terms related to the foot: "tip of the foot" (kyakusen 脚尖), "to tread" (anri 行履), "to step forth" (hossoku 發足); to be followed by the curious image of the eye, bones, and marrow "running into" (sōnyū 走入) seeing buddha.

8 all the worlds of self and all the directions of other, over here and over there (jijinkai tajinhō, shakotō nakotō 自盡界・他盡方、遮箇頭・那箇頭): Unusual expressions; perhaps meaning something like, "our world and other realms, both subject and object." Taken literally, the claim seems to be that everything is engaged in the practice of "seeing buddha."

not being marks is seeing the Tathāgata.”<sup>9</sup> They think the point is to see that the marks are not marks but the Tathāgata. To be sure, a small one-sided [view] might well understand it like this, but the expression of the Buddha’s intention is not like this.<sup>10</sup> We should recognize that to see the marks and to see the no-marks — this is “seeing the Tathāgata.” There is a Tathāgata and there is a No-Tathāgata.<sup>11</sup>

清涼院大法眼禪師云、若見諸相非相、即不見如來。

Chan Master Da Fayan of Qingliang Cloister said, “If one sees that the marks are no-marks, that is not seeing the Tathāgata.”<sup>12</sup>

[56:5]

いまこの大法眼道は、見佛道なり。これに法眼道あり、見佛道ありて、通語するに、競頭來なり、共出手なり。法眼道は、耳處に聞著すべし、見佛道は、眼處聞聲すべし。

Here, these words of Da Fayan are the words of seeing buddha.<sup>13</sup> We have in this the words of Fayan, and we have the words of seeing bud-

9 “If one sees that the marks are no-marks” (nyaku ken shosō hisō 若見諸相非相): Given in the original Chinese of the sūtra passage; rendered here as “those without the eye of study” would read it. According to Dōgen’s preferred reading, this should be read, “If one sees the marks and the no-marks.” Such a reading likely reflects the common claim that a buddha can discern all phenomena (dharmas) while at the same time seeing that they are empty of independent reality.

10 small one-sided [view] (shōryō no ippen 小量の一邊): Literally, “one side of little measure”; presumably, one shallow, partial viewpoint.

expression of the Buddha’s intention (butsui no dōjō 佛意の道成): Taking dōjō 道成 as the more familiar dō genjō 道現成.

11 There is a Tathāgata and there is a No-Tathāgata (nyorai ari, hi nyorai ari 如來あり、非如來あり): Perhaps meaning, “there is seeing the Buddha in the marks and seeing the Buddha in the no-marks.”

12 Chan Master Da Fayan of Qingliang Cloister (Seiryōin Dai Hōgen zenji 清涼院大法眼禪師): I.e., Fayan Wenyi 法眼文益 (885-958). Qingliang Cloister 清涼院 was located in the Jiangning 江寧 district of Jiangsu. This saying appears in several Chan sources; see, e.g., Hongzhi chanshi guanglu 宏智禪師廣錄 (T.2001.48:28c26-28; 55a10-13). The translation follows the standard (rather than Dōgen’s) reading of the first clause, likely as Fayan would have parsed it.

13 Here, these words of Da Fayan are the words of seeing buddha (ima kono Dai Hōgen dō wa, kenbutsu dō nari いまこの大法眼道は、見佛道なり): The expression “words of seeing buddha” (kenbutsu dō 見佛道) is open to various interpretations. The most likely here is probably that, when Fayan speaks of “not seeing the Tathāgata,” he is speaking of “seeing buddha.” Hence, in the following sentence, the two ways of speaking contend with each other even as they both offer us something.

dha; and, put in common terms, they are competing head to head, they are mutually extending a hand.<sup>14</sup> The words of Fayān, we should hear with the ear; the words of seeing buddha, we should hear with the eye.<sup>15</sup>

しかあるを、この宗旨を參學する從來のおもはくは、諸相は如來相なり、一相の、如來相にあらず、まじはれることなし。この相を、かりにも非相とすべからず。もしこれを非相とするは、捨父逃逝なり。この相すなはち如來相なるがゆえに、諸相は諸相なるべしと道取するなり、といひきたれり。まことにこれ大乘の極談なり、諸方の所證なり。しかのごとく決定一定して、信受參受すべし、さらに隨風東西の輕毛なることなかれ。諸相は如來相なり、非相にあらず、と參究見佛し、決定證信して、受持すべし、諷誦通利すべし。かくのごとくして、自己の耳目に見聞ひまなからしむべし、自己の身心骨髓に脱落ならしむべし、自己の山河盡界に透脱ならしむべし、これ參學佛祖行履なり。自己の云爲にあれば、自己の眼睛を發明せしむべからず、とおもふことなかれ。自己の一轉語に轉ぜられて、自己の一轉佛祖を見脱落するなり。これ佛祖の家常なり。

Be that as it may, what has been thought by those who study the essential point of this is that the marks are marks of the Tathāgata, and there is not mixed in with them a single mark that is not the mark of the Tathāgata.<sup>16</sup> These marks should not, even provisionally, be considered no-marks; to consider them no-marks is “forsaking one’s father and running away.”<sup>17</sup> They have said that, since these marks are marks of 14 We have in this the words of Fayān, and we have the words of seeing buddha (kore ni Hōgen dō ari, kenbutsu dō arite これに法眼道あり、見佛道ありて): I.e., here, we have Fayān’s statement on “not seeing the Tathāgata” and the Buddha’s statement on “seeing the Tathāgata.”

put in common terms (tsūgo suru ni 通語するに): A tentative translation, based on the usual sense of tsūgo 通語 as “common parlance,” “ordinary speech”; but here the phrase is often interpreted to mean something like, “in what the two kinds of words share.”

15 we should hear with the eye (gensho monshō su beshi 眼處聞聲すべし): Perhaps, recalling the verse of Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价, recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:204, case 148) and discussed in “Shōbōgenzō mujō seppō” 正法眼藏無情說法:

也太奇、也太奇、無情說法不思議、若將耳聽終難會、眼處聞聲方得知。

How strange! How strange!

The insentient preaching the dharma is inconceivable.

If we use the ear to hear it, it’s hard in the end to understand;

Only when the eye hears the voices do we know it.

16 what has been thought by those who study the essential point of this (kono shūshi o sangaku suru jūrai no omowaku wa この宗旨を參學する從來のおもはくは): Presumably, a reference to the opinions of those who have commented on Fayān’s saying, but neither the antecedent of “this” nor the authorities Dōgen alludes to here is clear.

17 “forsaking one’s father and running away” (shafu tōzei 捨父逃逝): A phrase from the parable of the prodigal son (gūji 窮子) that appears in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:16b26, 17c14): the son of a wealthy landowner wanders the Tathāgata, he is saying that the marks must be marks. Truly, this is the ultimate discourse of the Great Vehicle, verified in all quarters. Determining once and for all that it is like this, we should believe and accept it, study and accept it; do not, whatever you do, be a wisp of down following the wind east and west.<sup>18</sup> Investigating it and seeing buddha, determining it and verifying our faith, we should receive and keep, recite and become well versed in [the truth that] the marks are the marks of the Tathāgata, not no-marks. In this way, we should not rest from seeing and hearing it with our own ears and eyes; we should cause it to be sloughed off from our own body and mind, bones and marrow; we should cause it to be liberated from our own mountains and rivers, and all the worlds. This is the conduct of studying the buddhas and ancestors. Do not think that, since it is our own word and deed, it should not open and illuminate our own eyes: turned by our own turning word, we see and slough off our own turning buddhas and ancestors.<sup>19</sup> This is the everyday life of the buddhas and ancestors.

このゆえに、参取する隻條道あり。いはゆる諸相すでに非相にあらず、非相すなはち諸相なり。非相これ諸相なるゆえに、非相まことに非相なり。喚作非相の相、ならびに喚作諸相の相、ともに如來相なりと参學すべし。参學の屋裏に兩部の典釋あり、いはゆる参見典と参不見典となり。これ活眼睛の所参學なり。もしいまだこれらの典籍を著眼看の参徹せざれば、参徹眼にあらず。参徹眼にあざれば、見佛にあらず。見佛に諸相處見・非相處見あり、吾不會佛法なり。不見佛に諸相處不見・非相處不見あり、會佛法人得なり。法眼道の八九成、それかくのごとし。

There is, therefore, a single path of inquiry: it is that the marks are definitely not no-marks, and no-marks are precisely marks. Since no-marks are marks, no-marks are truly no-marks. We should recognize that the marks we call no-marks, as well as the marks we call marks, are both abroad for many years forgetting his father and his patrimony. Dōgen's reassertion of the Tathāgata's marks here may well reflect a common preference of his Japanese Buddhist contemporaries for a higher affirmation of the phenomenal world beyond insight into its emptiness.

18 a wisp of down following the wind east and west (zuifū tōzai no keimō 隨風東西の輕毛): A fixed expression, here in mixed Japanese and Chinese, for instability, "fickleness," "following fashion," etc.

19 turned by our own turning word, we see and slough off our own turning buddhas and ancestors (jiko no ittengo ni ten zerarete, jiko no itten busso o ken datsuraku suru nari 自己の一轉語に轉ぜられて、自己の一轉佛祖を見脱落するなり): I.e., we can act as our own buddha and ancestor in providing ourselves with a master's "turning word" (ittengo 一轉語) that will cause us to "turn around" and see things from a different perspective. For the use of "slough off" (datsuraku 脱落), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Slough off."

marks of the Tathāgata. Within the house of study are two modes of textual exegesis: texts that investigate “seeing” and texts that investigate “not seeing.”<sup>20</sup> This is what is studied by the living eye. If we have not yet thoroughly investigated looking at these texts, it is not the eye of thorough investigation; if it is not the eye of thorough investigation, it is not seeing buddha. In seeing buddha, there is seeing marks and seeing no-marks; this is “I don’t understand the buddha dharma”; in not seeing buddha, there is not seeing marks and not seeing no-marks; this is “people who understand the buddha dharma have got it.”<sup>21</sup> The eight or nine tenths of Fayān’s words are like this.<sup>22</sup>

texts that investigate “seeing” and texts that investigate “not seeing” (san ken ten to san fuken ten 參見典と參不見典): Or, perhaps, “investigating texts of seeing and investigating texts of not seeing”; presumably, texts that speak of “seeing the Tathāgata” and of “not seeing the Tathāgata” respectively.

21 “I don’t understand the buddha dharma” (go fue buppō 吾不會佛法); “people who understand the buddha dharma have got it” (e buppō nin toku 會佛法人得): The words of the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能, in a well-known dialogue recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:158, case 59):

曹溪山大鑑禪師〈嗣大滿〉因僧問、黃梅意旨何人得。師曰、會佛法人得。僧曰、和尚還得否。師曰、我不得。僧曰、和尚爲甚不得。師曰、我不會佛法。

Chan Master Dajian of Mount Caoxi (succeeded Daman) was asked by a monk: “What people have got the meaning of Huangmei [the Fifth Ancestor, Hongren]?”

The Master said, “People who understand the buddha dharma have got it.”

The monk said, “Has the Reverend got it or not?”

The Master said, “I haven’t got it.”

The monk said, “Why has the Reverend not got it?”

The Master said, “I don’t understand the buddha dharma.”

According to Dōgen here, Śākyamuni’s “seeing the Tathāgata” corresponds to Huineng’s “not understanding the buddha dharma,” while Fayān’s “not seeing the Tathāgata” is equivalent to people “understanding the buddha dharma.”

22 The eight or nine tenths of Fayān’s words are like this (Hōgen dō no hakku jō, sore kaku no gotoshi 法眼道の八九成、それかくのごとし): The term hakku jō 八九成 (“eight or nine tenths”) is a common expression in Zen commentary used to evaluate a saying as “not bad,” “almost there,” sometimes as ironic high praise; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eight or nine tenths complete.”

If one becomes close to the dharma master,

One attains at once the bodhisattva path.

If one studies in accordance with this master,

One will be able to see buddhas numerous as the sands of the Ganges.

23 “cause of this one great matter” (kono ichidaiji innen この一大事因縁): A famous phrase from the Lotus Sūtra, in which Buddha Śākyamuni reveals that the buddhas come into this world only to lead beings to buddhahood; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas, the world-honored ones, appear in the world for the reason of one great matter alone.”

“If one sees the real marks of the marks” (nyaku ken shosō jissō 若見諸相實相): A play, in Chinese, on the famous expression “the real marks of the dharmas” (shohō jissō 諸法實相), known especially from the Lotus Sūtra; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas.”

24 empowered by Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu shi sho kabi riki 釋迦牟尼佛之所加被力): Variant of a fixed expression for the power granted one by a sacred being, as, for example, when one is granted a vision.

they are not the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of a different face (i menmoku no hi niku kotsu zui ni arazu 異面目の皮肉骨髓にあらず): I.e., such sayings are not the teachings of anyone but Buddha Śākyamuni. The expression “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow” (hi niku kotsu zui 皮肉骨髓) occurs very often throughout the Shōbōgenzō, indicating the essence or truth or entirety of something or someone. From the famous story, recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:230, case 201), of Bodhidharma’s testing of four disciples, to whom he said of each in turn that he (or, in one case, she) had gotten his skin, flesh, bones, and marrow. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

The introduction to the verse here represents Dōgen’s rewriting of the opening line of the chapter (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:30b29):

爾時世尊、因藥王菩薩、告八萬大士。

At that time, the World-Honored One, through the Bodhisattva Bhaiṣajyarāja, addressed the eighty thousand great persons.

What is called here “becoming close to the dharma master” is like the Second Ancestor’s eight years of serving his master; thereafter, his whole arm got the marrow.<sup>26</sup> It is like Nanyue’s fifteen years of pursuing the way.<sup>27</sup> Getting the master’s marrow is called “becoming close.” “The bodhisattva path” is “I’m also like this, and you’re also like this.”<sup>28</sup> It is “attaining at once” so many observances, like vines and branch-26 the Second Ancestor’s eight years of serving his master (niso no hassai jishi 二祖の八載事師): Traditional biographies of the Second Ancestor, Huike 慧可 (487–593), do not typically record that he spent eight years serving his master, Bodhidharma. The influential Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:220c4-5) says rather that, before he met Bodhidharma, Huike had taken the precepts under Chan Master Baojing 寶靜 of Mount Xiang 香山 in Longmen and subsequently spent eight years there, sitting in meditation all day long. In his “Shōbōgenzō gyōji” 正法眼藏行持 (part 2, section 21), Dōgen again speaks of Huike’s “eight years of attendance” (shūji hachinen 執侍八年), seemingly on Bodhidharma (though this is not entirely clear). He uses the same phrase elsewhere (e.g., in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:178, case 101) in reference to the study of Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744) under the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能; and it may be that the legends of these two masters, mentioned together here, have somehow been conflated.

his whole arm got the marrow (zenpi tokuzui 全臂得髓): A tentative translation of an unusual phrase, which might otherwise be parsed, “his arm was made whole, and he got the marrow.” Reference to the legends that Huike cut off his arm and presented it to Bodhidharma, and that Bodhidharma subsequently recognized Huike as having “gotten the marrow” of his teachings; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Cut off an arm” and “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.” The problematic expression zenpi 全臂 (“whole arm”) has been variously interpreted: as “the whole arm of the dharma” (hō no zenpi 法の全臂); as “the indestructible whole body” (fue zenshin 不壞全身), not scarred by the severed arm. The suggestion that Huike’s arm might have been restored in some sense suggests the story, in the “Bhaiṣajyarāja” chapter of the Lotus Sūtra, of the Bodhisattva Priyadarśana, who sacrificed his arms to the dharma, only to have them restored.

27 Nanyue’s fifteen years of pursuing the way (Nangaku no jūgo nen no bendō 南嶽の十五年の辨道): Reference to the tradition, recorded, e.g., in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:240c17), that Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 spent fifteen years serving under the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能.

28 “I’m also like this, and you’re also like this” (go yaku nyoze, nyo yaku nyoze 吾亦如是、汝亦如是): Words of Huineng to Nanyue, said in response to Nanyue’s saying that he is “not defiled” by practice and verification; from the famous dialogue recorded at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:178, case 101) and cited often throughout the Shōbōgenzō. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “You’re also like this, I’m also like this.”

es.<sup>29</sup> “Attaining at once” is not attaining by pulling in what has been apparent since ancient times; it is not attaining by producing what is not yet arisen; it is not rounding up what is presently scattered about: rather, sloughing off attaining by “becoming close” is called “attaining at once.”<sup>30</sup> Therefore, all attainment is “attaining at once.”

[56:11]

“Studying in accordance with this master” is the old example of “still just his acolyte”; we should investigate it.<sup>31</sup> In this very moment of engaging in conduct, there is accession to being “able to see.” That juncture is “seeing buddhas numerous as the sands of the Ganges.” “Buddhas numerous as the sands of the Ganges” is each one brisk liveliness itself.<sup>32</sup> Definitely, do not go rushing to ingratiate yourself to “seeing buddhas numerous as the Ganges.” First, we should exert ourselves in study fol-

29 It is “attaining at once” so many observances, like vines and branches (nyokota no manshi anri o sokutoku suru nari 如許多の蔓枝行履を即得するなり): From the line in the Lotus Sūtra verse, “One attains at once the bodhisattva path.”

30 sloughing off attaining by “becoming close” is called “attaining at once” (shin-gon toku o, datsuraku suru o sokutoku to iu 親近得を、脱落するを即得といふ): Presumably meaning that “attaining at once the bodhisattva path” means to transcend what one has got from “becoming close to the dharma master.” For the use of “slough off” (datsuraku 脱落), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Slough off.”

31 old example of “still just his acolyte” (yūze jisha no koshō 猶是侍者の古蹤): Possibly reflecting a saying found in the biography of Taiyang Ming'an 太陽明安 (or Taiyang Jingxuan 太陽警玄 or Jingyan 警延, 942-1027) in the Zongmen liandeng huiyao 宗門聯燈會要 (ZZ.136:899a7-9):

33 study following a master is attaining the seeing of buddha (zuishi gaku toku bukken nari 隨師學得佛見なり): Dōgen plays here in Chinese syntax with the last two lines of the Lotus Sūtra verse. “The seeing of buddha” (bukken 佛見) is ambiguous: “buddha” may be read either as the object or the agent of “seeing.”

34 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): A quotation (with an introduction in Chinese supplied by Dōgen) of two lines from a verse in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:39c5):

又見自身、在山林中、修習善法、證諸實相、深入禪定、見十方佛。

十方佛土中、唯有一乘法。

Within the buddha lands of the ten directions,

There is only the dharma of the one vehicle.

kore これ (“it”) is “deep”; perhaps meaning that this “deep” is not the “deep” of terms like “wide,” etc.

37 When we take it up, we take up “what goes along with it” (ko sureba zui ta ko su 舉すれば隨他舉す): Perhaps meaning something like, “when we discuss the term ‘deep,’ we are also discussing all it entails.” The term zui ta ko 隨他舉 (translated here “take up what goes along with it”) is likely a play on the homophonous zui ta ko 隨他去 (“goes along with it”), from a saying of Dasui Fazhen 大隋法真 (834-919), recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:138, case 24), that “this” (shako 這箇) “goes along with it” when the chiliocosm is destroyed at the end of the kalpa; see Supplementary Notes.

completely included (zenshū 全収): I.e., [“deep” is] all inclusive. Likely reflecting a common phrase in Zen literature, “the whole earth is completely included” (daichi zenshū 大地全収), associated especially with Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃 (864-949) (see, e.g., Yunmen Kuangzheng chanshi guanglu 雲門匡真禪師廣錄, T.1988.47:547a23-24):

一塵纔起、大地全收。

When a single mote barely arises, the whole earth is completely included.

38 It is not seven feet; it is not eight feet; it is not ten feet (kore shichi shaku ni arazu, hachi shaku ni arazu, ichi jō ni arazu これ七尺にあらず、八尺にあらず、一丈にあらず): Perhaps recalling two stories recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, involving Chan masters Xuansha Shibeī 玄沙師備 (835-908) and Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908). In the first (DZZ.5:158, case 60), when Xuefeng described the height of a proposed monument stone by merely looking up and down, Xuansha preferred to measure it at “seven feet or eight feet” (shichi shaku hachi shaku 七尺八尺); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven or eight feet.” In the second (DZZ.5:184, case 109), Xuefeng said, “If the breadth of the world is ten feet (ichi jō 一丈), the breadth of the old mirror is ten feet”; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bare mind in pieces.”

“the one word ‘enter.’” (nyū shi ichiji 入之一字): Perhaps alluding to a conversation between Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂 (803-887) and the magistrate Lu Xisheng 陸希聲 (d. 895) appearing as case 139 in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:200); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “The one word ‘enter.’”

39 Since it is “fine,” “entered deeply” in there, with “no one who engages him” (jinnnyū riko mu nin sekko ni shite tokuzai naru ga yue ni 深入裏許無人接渠にして得在なるがゆえに): Drawing on the language of a dialogue recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:216, case 179); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eight or nine tenths complete.”

40 “whatever he came up with, he wouldn’t have accepted it” (shesshi shōrai, ta yaku fujū 設使將來、他亦不受): A phrase from a dialogue between Chan Master Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 and an unnamed monk regarding a line in the famous poem contest between Shenxiu 神秀 (d. 706) and Huineng 慧能 to succeed the Fifth Ancestor, Hongren 弘忍 (602-675) (found, e.g., at Hongzhi chanshi guanglu 宏智禪師廣錄, T.2001.48:34c6-14):

舉僧問洞山、時時勤拂拭、莫使惹塵埃。爲什麼不得他衣鉢。山云、直饒道本來無一物、也未合得他衣鉢。且道、什麼人合得。僧下九十六轉語、不契。末後云、設使將來他亦不受。山深肯之。

Raised: A monk asked Dongshan, “‘Always strive to polish it, and do not let the dust collect.’ Why did this [line in Shenxiu’s verse] not get his [Hongren’s] robe and bowl?”

Shan said, “Even if he had said [the line in Huineng’s verse], ‘From the beginning, not one thing,’ he still would not have qualified to get his robe and bowl.” He added, “Who’s qualified to get them?”

The monk gave ninety-six turning words, but none fit. Finally, he said, “Whatever he came up with, he wouldn’t have accepted it.”

Shan deeply approved it.

For Shenxiu’s full verse and the context of this story, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bright mirror.”

41 “you can’t get it out for a long, long time” (chōchō shutsu futoku 長長出不得): The words of Changsha Jingcen 長沙景岑 (dates unknown), in answer to the question, “What is the eye of the śramaṇa?” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “All the worlds in the ten directions are the single eye of the śramaṇa.” Also alluded to in “Shōbōgenzō genjō kōan” 正法眼藏現成公案.

“I only saw a recumbent tathāgata” (shi ken ga nyorai 只見臥如來): The words of Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 (778-897) in coming upon Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-835) while the latter was taking a nap (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈, T.2076.51:6c9-11):

而問曰、近離什麼處。師曰、近離瑞像院。曰還見瑞像麼。師曰、不見瑞像只見臥如來。

[Nanquan] asked, “Where are you coming from?”

The Master [Zhaozhou] said, “I’ve just come from Ruixiang Cloister [‘Cloister of the Auspicious Image’].”

He said, “And did you see the auspicious image?”

The Master said, “I didn’t see the auspicious image; I only saw a recumbent tathāgata.”

you can’t come in or out (nyūrai shuttō futoku 入來出頭不得): A tentative translation; some would read, “once in, you can’t get out.” Though given in Chinese as if quoting a text, this six-word phrase does not seem to be a fixed expression; rather, it probably combines the expressions, “admission is not possible” (nyūrai futoku 入來不得) and “egress (or ‘appearance’ or ‘attendance’) is not possible” (shuttō futoku 出頭不得).

42 In the present time of seeing buddha, those who do not doubt or fear the real dragon need not cast off further doubts (shinryū o ayashimi kufu sezu wa, kenbutsu no nikon, sara ni gijaku o hōsha su bekarazu 眞龍をあやしみ恐怖せずは、見佛の而今、さらに疑著を抛捨すべからず): A tentative translation taken to mean that, if one can accept the real thing, one will not doubt the experience of seeing buddha. “The real one sees buddha from “seeing buddha,” one enters deeply into meditative concentration from “meditative concentration.”<sup>43</sup> The principles of “meditative concentration,” “seeing buddha,” “entering deeply,” and the like, are not something constructed in the past by someone idly pondering them and then passed down to people now. Though they are not something new in the present, such principles are necessary. All transmission of the way and acceptance of the work is like this; practicing the cause and getting the effect are like this.

釋迦牟尼佛、告普賢菩薩言、若有受持讀誦正憶念修習書寫是法華經者、當知、是人則見釋迦牟尼佛、如從佛口聞此經典。

Buddha Śākyamuni addressed Bodhisattva Samanthabhadra, saying,<sup>44</sup>
If there is anyone who receives and keeps, reads and recites, and correctly memorizes, practices, or copies this Lotus Sūtra, you should know this person thereby sees Buddha Śākyamuni and hears this scripture as if coming from the mouth of the Buddha.”

[56:15]

おほよそ一切諸佛は、見釋迦牟尼佛、成釋迦牟尼佛するを、成道作佛といふなり。かくのごとくの佛儀、もとよりこの七種の行處の條條よりうるなり。七種行人は、當知是人なり、如是當人なり。これすなはち見釋迦牟尼佛處なるがゆえに、したしくこれ如從佛口、聞此經典なり。釋迦牟尼佛は、見釋迦牟尼佛よりこのかた釋迦牟尼佛なり。これによりて、舌相あまねく三千を覆す、いづれの山海か、佛經にあらざらん。このゆえに、書寫の當人ひとり、見釋迦牟尼佛なり。佛口はよのつねに萬古に開す、いづれの時節か經典にあらざらん。このゆえに、受持の行者のみ見釋迦牟尼佛なり。乃至眼・耳・鼻等の功德も、またかくのごとくなるべきなり。および前後・左右・取捨・造次、かくのごとくなり。いまの此經典にむまれあふ、見釋迦牟尼佛をよろこばざらんや。生値釋迦牟尼佛なり。身心をはげまして受持・讀誦・正憶念・修習・書寫、是法華經者、則見釋迦牟尼佛なるべし。如從佛口、聞此經典、たれかこれをきほひきかざらん。いそがずつとめざるは、貧窮無福慧の衆生なり。修習するは、當知是人、則見釋迦牟尼佛なり。

dragon” (shinryū 眞龍) alludes to the well-known story of the Duke of She (Sekkō 葉公), who loved dragon carvings but was terrified of real dragons; a trope occurring several times in Dōgen’s writing.

43 one sees buddha from “seeing buddha” (kenbutsu yori kenbutsu suru 見佛より見佛する): Perhaps meaning that the experience of seeing buddha follows (either temporally or logically) from the state (or understanding?) of “seeing buddha”; similarly, mutatis mutandis, the experience of meditative concentration.

44 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miao-fa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:61c22-24), with an introductory clause by Dōgen.

In sum, for all the buddhas, their “seeing Buddha Śākyamuni,” their becoming Buddha Śākyamuni, is called “attaining the way and becoming a buddha.”<sup>45</sup> Such observances of the buddhas are from the beginning gained from each of these seven types of practice.<sup>46</sup> The practitioner of the seven types is “you should know this person,” is the very person like this.<sup>47</sup> Since this is precisely where one “sees Buddha Śākyamuni,” it is intimately to “hear this scripture as if coming from the mouth of the Buddha.” Buddha Śākyamuni has been Buddha Śākyamuni ever since “seeing Buddha Śākyamuni.”

Consequently, “his tongue covers everywhere in the trichiliocosm”; what mountain or ocean is not a sūtra of the buddhas?<sup>48</sup> Therefore, the very person who copies it “sees Buddha Śākyamuni.” The mouth of the Buddha has always been open for ten thousand ages; what moment is not a scripture? Therefore, only the practitioner who “receives and keeps” it is “seeing Buddha Śākyamuni.” Down to, the merit of eye, ear, nose, and so on, will also be like this.<sup>49</sup> And forward and back, left and right, 45 for all the buddhas (issai shobutsu 一切諸佛): The claim here that all the buddhas see and become Buddha Śākyamuni no doubt reflects Śākyamuni’s revelation in the Lotus Sūtra that the buddhas of the ten directions are all his emanations (bunshin 分身; S. ātma-bhāva-vigraha).

46 these seven types of practice (kono shichishu no gyōsho この七種の行處): I.e., the seven practices mentioned in the quoted passage of the Lotus Sūtra.

47 “you should know this person” (tō chi ze nin 當知是人); the very person like this (nyoze tōnin 如是當人): Dōgen here plays with the Lotus Sūtra passage, “you should know this person thereby sees Buddha Śākyamuni” (tō chi ze nin soku ken Shakamuni butsu 當知是人則見釋迦牟尼佛). His second phrase rearranges the first, shifting the sense of the term tō 當 from the modal verb “should” to the adjective “the very,” and replaces the two glyphs chi ze 知是 (“know this”) with nyoze 如是 (“like this”), a term used for the metaphysical concept “such” or “suchness.” Cf. Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Such a person.”

48 “his tongue covers everywhere in the trichiliocosm” (zessō amaneku sanzen ofuku su 舌相あまねく三千を覆す): I.e., his teachings are everywhere. A Japanese reflection of a common image found throughout the Mahāyāna literature; see, e.g., the Mahā-prajñā-pāramitā-sūtra (Da bore boluomiduo jing 大般若波羅蜜多經, T.220.5:53b26-28):

爾時、世尊現廣長舌相、遍覆三千大千世界。復從舌相出無量無數種種色光、普照十方殑伽沙等諸佛世界。

At that time, the World-Honored One showed his long, broad tongue, which covered everywhere in the trichiliocosm; and, from that tongue emerged immeasurable, innumerable variably colored lights, universally illumining buddha fields in the ten directions equal to the sands of Ganges.

49 Down to, the merit of eye, ear, nose, and so on, will also be like this (naishi gen ni bi tō no kudoku mo, mata kaku no gotoku naru beki nari 乃至眼・耳・鼻等の功德も、またかくのごとくなるべきなり): Presumably, the antecedent of “like this” is “seeing Buddha Śākyamuni.” The sense here of the adverbial naishi 乃至 (“down to”), which normally marks an elision, is unclear. Dōgen may be recalling a line in the Lotus Sūtra choosing and discarding, and hasty acts are like this.<sup>50</sup>

Having been born with “this scripture” here, how could one not be delighted to “see Buddha Śākyamuni”?<sup>51</sup> It is born to meet Buddha Śākyamuni.<sup>52</sup> Those who, exerting body and mind, “receive and keep, read and recite, and correctly memorize, practice, or copy this Lotus Sūtra” will “thereby see Buddha Śākyamuni.” “Hearing this scripture as if coming from the mouth of the Buddha,” who would not vie to hear it? Those who do not make haste and make effort are “living beings,” “impoverished and without merit or wisdom.”<sup>53</sup> Those who practice, “you should know this person thereby sees Buddha Śākyamuni.”

* * * * *

(Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:50b24-28):

爾時、佛告得大勢菩薩摩訶薩、汝今當知、若比丘比丘尼優婆塞優婆夷持法華經者、若有惡口罵詈誹謗、獲大罪報、如前所說。其所得功德、如向所說、眼耳鼻舌身意清淨。

At that time, the Buddha addressed the Mahāsattva-Bodhisattva Mahāsthāmaprāpta, “You should know that, if there are bhikṣus, bhikṣuṇīs, upāsakas, upāsikās who keep the Lotus Sūtra, those who insult, revile, and slander them will reap great evil retribution, as I have previously explained; while the merit that they get, as I have explained, will be the purification of eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind.”

50 And forward and back, left and right, choosing and discarding, and hasty acts are like this (oyobi zengo sayū shusha zōji, kaku no gotoku nari および前後・左右・取捨・造次、かくのごとくなり): A rather odd list, the exact sense of which is uncertain; if we take “forward and back, left and right” as physical movements, perhaps the point is that, all our acts, like our six senses, are cases of “seeing Buddha Śākyamuni.” The term zōji 造次 (translated here “hasty acts”) is sometimes taken as referring to an instant of time, rather than flurried activity — hence, here perhaps, “our fleeting moments.”

51 Having been born with “this scripture” here (ima no shi kyōten ni mumareau いまの此經典にむまれあふ): I.e., born with the scripture mentioned here in the sūtra line, “hears this scripture as if coming from the mouth of the Buddha.”

52 born to meet Buddha Śākyamuni (shō chi Shakamuni butsu nari 生値釋迦牟尼佛なり): Perhaps reflecting a line in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:60b1):

而我等宿福深厚、生値佛法。

Because the merits of our past lives are deep, we are born to meet the buddha dharma.

53 “living beings,” “impoverished and without merit or wisdom” (bingū mu fukue no shujō 貧窮無福慧の衆生): From a verse in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:9b25-26):

舍利弗當知、我以佛眼觀、見六道衆生、貧窮無福慧。

Śāriputra, you should know

That, with the buddha eye, I see

Living beings of the six paths,

Impoverished and without merit or wisdom.

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Six paths.”

釋迦牟尼佛、告大衆言、若善男子善女人、聞我說壽命長遠、深心信解、則爲見佛常在耆闍崛山、其大菩薩・諸聲聞衆圍遶說法。又見此娑婆世界、其地瑠璃、坦然平正。

Buddha Śākyamuni addressed the great assembly, saying,<sup>54</sup>

If good sons and good daughters, upon hearing me explain that my lifespan is so long, believe it with deep mind, they will thereby see the Buddha always residing on Mount Gr̥dhrakūṭa, surrounded by an assembly of great bodhisattvas and śrāvakas, preaching the dharma. And they will see this Sahā world, its ground of vaiḍūrya, smooth and level.<sup>55</sup>

この深心といふは、娑婆世界なり。信解といふは、無廻避處なり。誠諦の佛語、たれか信解せざらん。この經典にあひたてまつれるは、信解すべき機縁なり。深心信解是法華、深心信解壽命長遠のために、願生此娑婆國土しきたれり。如來の神力・慈悲力・壽命長遠力、よく心を拈じて信解せしめ、身を拈じて信解せしめ、盡界を拈じて信解せしめ、佛祖を拈じて信解せしめ、諸法を拈じて信解せしめ、實相を拈じて信解せしめ、皮肉骨髓を拈じて信解せしめ、生死去來を拈じて信解せしむるなり。これらの信解、これ見佛なり。

This “deep mind” is the “Sahā world”; “believe” is there’s nowhere to escape.<sup>56</sup> The truthful words of the Buddha, who would not “believe” them?<sup>57</sup> That we have been granted an encounter with this scripture is an opportunity in which we should “believe.” Due to “believing with deep mind” this Dharma Blossom, and “believing with deep mind” that 54 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miao-fa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:45b16-20), with an introductory clause by Dōgen. At this point in the sūtra, Śākyamuni has revealed that, though he appears to have a human lifespan, in fact he became a buddha incalculable ages ago and will continue to exist for twice that long before entering parinirvāṇa.

55 And they will see this Sahā world, its ground of vaiḍūrya, smooth and level (yū ken shi shaba sekai, ki chi ruri, tannen byōshō 又見此娑婆世界、其地瑠璃、坦然平正): I.e., they will see our world as a pure buddha land, in which the ground is level and consists of jewels. The Sanskrit vaiḍūrya (ruri 瑠璃; also written ruri 琉璃) is used for beryl, crystal, and other minerals; one of the seven precious substances.

56 there’s nowhere to escape (mu kaihi sho 無廻避處): Or, perhaps, “a place of no escape”; also written 無廻避處. A fixed expression occurring in several Chan records, especially in works associated with Hongzhi Zhengjue 宏智正覺 (1091-1157).

57 truthful words of the Buddha (jōtai no butsugo 誠諦の佛語): Likely, variation on a line in the Lotus Sūtra (Miao-fa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:42b1-2):

爾時佛告諸菩薩及一切大衆、諸善男子汝等當信解如來誠諦之語。

At that time, the Buddha declared to the bodhisattvas and the entire great assembly, “Good sons, you should trust and understand the truthful words of the Tathāgata.”

“my lifespan is so long,” they have been vowing to be born in this Sahā world.<sup>58</sup> The spiritual power, the power of compassion, the power of his “lifespan so long” — these cause us to take up mind and believe, cause us to take up body and believe, cause us to take up all the worlds and believe, cause us to take up the buddhas and ancestors and believe, cause us to take up the dharmas and believe, cause us to take up the real marks and believe, cause us to take up the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow and believe, cause us to take up birth and death, coming and going and believe.<sup>59</sup> Believing in these — this is “seeing buddha.”<sup>60</sup>

しかあればしりぬ、心頭眼ありて見佛す、信解眼をえて見佛す。ただ見佛のみにあらず、常在耆闍崛山をみるといふは、耆闍崛山の常在は、如來壽命と一齊なるべし。しかあれば、見佛常在耆闍崛山は、前頭來も、如來および耆闍崛山、ともに常在なり。後頭來も、如來および耆闍崛山、ともに常在なり。菩薩・聲聞もおなじく常在なるべし、說法もまた常在なるべし。娑婆世界、其地瑠璃、坦然平正、をみる。娑婆世界をみることを、動著すべからず、高處高平、低處低平なり。この地は、これ瑠璃地なり。これを、坦然平正なるとみる目をいやすくすることなかれ。瑠璃爲地の地は、かくのごとし。この地を瑠璃にあらざとせば、耆闍崛山は耆闍崛山にあらず、釋迦牟尼佛は釋迦牟尼佛にあざらん。其地瑠璃を信解する、すなはち深信解相なり、これ見佛なり。

Thus, we know that it is by having the eye of the mind that they see buddha; it is by attaining the eye of belief that they see buddha. To say that they not only see buddha but see him “always residing on Mount Gr̥dhrakūṭa” means that his “always residing” on Mount Gr̥dhrakūṭa

they have been vowing to be born in this Sahā world (gan shō shi Shaba kokudo shi-kitareru 願生此娑婆國土しきたれり): Or, perhaps, “we have vowed . . .” The grammatical subject is unstated; the translation assumes it is the “good sons and good daughters” who “believe and understand with deep mind,” and who will thereby “see this Sahā world” of Buddha Śākyamuni. Though it is given in Chinese, as if quoting a scripture, there does not seem to be a clear source for this phrase; it may recall the bodhisattvas in the Lotus Sūtra who vow to teach the sūtra in the Sahā world after the nirvāṇa of the Buddha.

59 cause us to take up the dharmas and believe, cause us to take up the real marks and believe (shohō o nenjite shinge seshime, jissō o nenjite shinge seshime 諸法を拈じて信解せしめ、實相を拈じて信解せしめ): Based on the common fixed expression “the real marks of the dharmas” (shohō jissō 諸法實相), used in reference to the ultimate reality of things.

birth and death, coming and going (shōji korai 生死去來): I.e., rebirth in saṃsāra; a fixed expression, associated especially with a saying of Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤 (1063–1135) to the effect that these are “the true human body” (shinjitsu nintai 眞實人體); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “True human body.”

60 Believing in these (korera no shinge これらの信解): Or “these [instances of] believing.”

must be equivalent to the “lifespan” of the Tathāgata. This being so, “seeing the Buddha always residing on Mount Gr̥dhrakūṭa” is the “constant residing,” before, of both the Tathāgata and Mount Gr̥dhrakūṭa; it is the “constant residing,” after, of both the Tathāgata and Mount Gr̥dhrakūṭa. Similarly, the “bodhisattvas and śrāvakas” must also be “constantly residing”; “preaching the dharma” must also be “constantly residing.” They see the “Sahā world, its ground of vaiḍūrya, smooth and level.” We should not be moved by [such] seeing of the Sahā world: it is “high places are high and level; low places are low and level.”<sup>61</sup> This earth — this is a vaiḍūrya earth.<sup>62</sup> Do not scorn the eye that sees this as “smooth and level”: the earth that has vaiḍūrya as ground is like this. If one were to maintain that this earth is not vaiḍūrya, Mount Gr̥dhrakūṭa would not be Mount Gr̥dhrakūṭa, and Buddha Śākyamuni would not be Buddha Śākyamuni. To believe in “its ground of vaiḍūrya” is in itself a “mark of deep belief”; it is seeing buddha.<sup>63</sup>

釋迦牟尼佛、告大衆言、一心欲見佛、不自惜身命、時我及衆僧、俱出靈鷲山。

Buddha Śākyamuni addressed the great assembly saying,<sup>64</sup>

If they, with single-mind, desire to see the buddha,

Without caring for their own bodies and lives,

At that time, will I and my assembly of monks,

Appear together on Vulture Peak.

61 “high places are high and level; low places are low and level” (kōsho kōhei, teisho teihei 高處高平、低處低平): From the response of Weishan Lingyou 潯山靈祐 (771-853) to the suggestion that an uneven rice paddy should be leveled; the anecdote is found in a number of Chan sources, as well as in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:138, case 23); see Supplementary Notes.

62 This earth — this is a vaiḍūrya earth (kono chi wa, kore ruri chi nari この地は、これ瑠璃地なり): Dōgen plays here with the term chi 地, which can have the senses “earth,” “land,” “ground,” “soil,” etc.

63 “mark of deep belief” (jinshinge sō 深信解相): A phrase from the Lotus Sūtra concluding the section on which Dōgen is commenting here (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:45b21-22):

若有能如是觀者、當知是爲深信解相。

If there are those who can see like this, you should know that this is a mark of their deep belief.

64 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): From a verse in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:43b23-24), with an introductory clause by Dōgen.

[56:20] {2:105}

いふところの一心は、凡夫・二乗等のいふ一心にあらず、見佛の一心なり。見佛の一心といふは、靈鷲山なり、及衆僧なり。而今の箇箇、ひそかに欲見佛をもよほすは、靈鷲山心をこらして欲見佛するなり。しかあれば、一心、すでに靈鷲山なり、一身、それ心に俱出せざらんや、俱一身心ならざらんや。身心すでにかくのごとし、壽者命者、またかくのごとし。かるがゆえに、自惜を靈鷲山の但惜無上道に一任す。このゆえに、我及衆僧、靈鷲山俱出なるを見佛の一心と道取す。

The “single mind” spoken of here is not the “single mind” spoken of by common people, those of the two vehicles, and the like: it is the “single mind” of seeing buddha. “The single mind of seeing buddha” is “Vulture Peak,” is “and my assembly of monks.” Each present individual privately having the “desire to see buddha” is desiring to see buddha by concentrating the mind of Vulture Peak. Thus, the “single mind” is in itself “Vulture Peak”; and the single body, how could it not “appear together” with the mind? How could they not be a single body and mind together? Since body and mind are like this, their “lifespan and lives” are also like this.<sup>65</sup> Therefore, they entirely give over “caring for their own” to “caring only for the unsurpassed way” of Vulture Peak.<sup>66</sup> Therefore, he speaks of [the fact that] “I and my assembly of monks” are an “appearance together” on “Vulture Peak” as the “single mind” of “seeing buddha.”<sup>67</sup>

* * * * *

65 their “lifespan and lives” are also like this (jusha myōsha, mata kaku no gotoshi 壽者命者、またかくのごとし): i.e., are also themselves “Vulture Peak.” A tentative translation, taking jusha myōsha 壽者命者 as equivalent to jumyōsha 壽命者 (“lifespan”); the two terms may also be read as “those with lifespans, those with lives” (i.e., “living beings”: S. jīva, etc.). Dōgen seems to be playing here on the sūtra line, “without caring for their own bodies and lives” (fu jishaku shinmyō 不自惜身命).

66 “caring only for the unsurpassed way” (tan shaku mujō dō 但惜無上道): From a line of verse by bodhisattvas in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:36c18):

我不愛身命、但惜無上道。

We shall not love our bodies or lives,

But care only for the unsurpassed way.

67 “I and my assembly of monks” are an “appearance together” on “Vulture Peak” (ga kyū shusō, Ryōjusen ku shutsu naru 我及衆僧、靈鷲山俱出なる): A tentative translation; the phrase could also be [more interestingly] parsed, “[the fact that] ‘I and my assembly of monks’ and ‘Vulture Peak’ are an ‘appearance together.’”

[56:22]

説此經は、我常住於此、以諸神通力、令顛倒衆生、雖近而不見なり。この表裏の神力如來に、則爲見我等の功德そなはる。

To “preach this sūtra” is,

While always residing here,

By means of my spiritual powers,

I prevent the perverse living beings

From seeing me, though I am near.<sup>70</sup>

The Tathāgata with these spiritual powers of surface and interior is endowed with the virtue of “they will thereby see me” and the others.<sup>71</sup>

68 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): From a verse in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:34a14-15), with an introductory clause by Dōgen.

69 Tathāgata Prabhūtaratna (Tahō nyorai 多寶如來): The buddha who appears within his great stūpa at the scene of the preaching of the Lotus Sūtra; Buddha Śākyamuni joins him within the stūpa.

transformation buddhas (kebutsu 化佛): Buddhas appearing in human form; here, no doubt, to be taken as the “emanations of [Śākyamuni’s] body” (bunshin 分身) mentioned below, section 23.

70 While always residing here (ga jō jū o shi 我常住於此): Quoting a verse from the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:43b18-19), in which the Buddha explains his apparent disappearance into parinirvāṇa.

71 The Tathāgata with these spiritual powers of surface and interior (kono hyōri no jinriki nyorai この表裏の神力如來): Likely meaning the Buddha, with his paranormal powers to appear or remain invisible.

Buddha Śākyamuni addressed the great assembly, saying,<sup>72</sup>

Have thereby already seen me;

And they see Prabhūtaratna

As well as the emanations of my body.

[56:24] {2:106}

この經を持することかたきゆえに、如來、よのつねにこれをすすむ。もしおのづから持是經者あるは、すなはち見佛なり。はかりしりぬ、見佛すれば持經す。持經のもの、見佛のものなり。しかあればすなはち、乃至聞一偈一句受持するは、得見釋迦牟尼佛なり、亦見多寶佛なり、見諸分身佛なり、傳佛法藏なり、得佛正眼なり、得見佛命なり、得佛向上眼なり、得佛頂額眼なり、得佛鼻孔なり。

Because it is difficult to keep this sūtra, the Tathāgata regularly encourages it. If perchance there are “those who can keep this sūtra,” that itself is seeing buddha. It is clear that, when one sees the buddha, one keeps the sūtra. The one who keeps the sūtra is the one who sees the buddha. Thus, “to receive and keep” it, “hearing even so much as a single gāthā or a single line,” is being “able to see” Buddha Śākyamuni.<sup>73</sup> It is “and they see Buddha Prabhūtaratna”; it is seeing the buddhas that are “emanations of my body”; it is transmitting the treasury of the buddha dharma; it is getting the true eye of the buddha; it is being able to see the lifespan of the Buddha; it is getting the eye beyond the buddha; it is getting the eye of the buddha’s crown; it is getting the buddha’s nose.<sup>74</sup>

72 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): Quoting a verse from the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:52b12-13), with an introductory clause by Dōgen.

73 “to receive and keep” it, “hearing even so much as a single gāthā or a single line” (naishi mon ichige ikku juji suru 乃至聞一偈一句受持する): Combining two phrases from a passage in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:50a18-21):

若善男子善女人、如來滅後受持是經、若讀若誦若解說若書寫、得千二百意功德。以是清淨意根、乃至聞一偈一句、通達無量無邊之義。

If, after the extinction of the Tathāgata, a good son or good daughter receives and keeps this sūtra, reads or recites it, explains or copies it, they will attain twelve hundred mental virtues. With this purified mental faculty, hearing even so much as a single gāthā or a single line, they will penetrate incalculable, limitless meanings.

74 eye beyond the buddha (butsu kōjō gen 佛向上眼): “Beyond the buddha” (butsu kōjō 佛向上) is a common expression in Zen texts and Dōgen’s writings; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Beyond the buddha.”

Buddha Jaladhara-garjita-ghoṣa-susvara-nakṣatra-rāja-saṃkusumitābhijñā addressed King Śubhavyūha, saying, “Great king, you should know that the wise friend is the great cause and condition, the guide who enables one to see buddha and bring forth the thought of anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.”<sup>75</sup>

At present, in this great assembly, the sitting mats are still not rolled up.<sup>76</sup> Although we call them the buddhas of past, present, and future, we should not subscribe to the three times of common people: the past is the mind; the present is the fist; the future is the back of the head. Thus, Buddha Jaladhara-garjita-ghoṣa-susvara-nakṣatra-rāja-saṃkusumitābhijñā is seeing buddha manifested by mind. The common term, “seeing buddha,” is like this.<sup>77</sup> “The guide” is seeing buddha; seeing buddha is “giving rise to the thought of anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.” Giving rise to the thought of bodhi is the truth from head to tail of seeing buddha.

and eye.” Dōgen regularly uses the term chōnei 頂額 (“crown of the head”), like “eye” (ganzei 眼睛) and “nose” (bikū 鼻孔), as (a) synecdoche for the person, and (b) the “pinnacle” or best of someone (or something). In some contexts, as possibly here, chōnei 頂額 may suggest a buddha’s uṣṇīṣa, the protuberance on the top of his head that is one of his thirty-two marks, sometimes taken as symbolic of his wisdom. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye,” “Crown of the head.”

75 Buddha Jaladhara-garjita-ghoṣa-susvara-nakṣatra-rāja-saṃkusumitābhijñā (Unraion shukuō kechi butsu 雲雷音宿王華智佛): From a passage of the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:60c5-10). This buddha’s unwieldy name might be rendered something like “Buddha Florid Wisdom of the Roar of Cloud Thunder, King of Constellations.”

76 At present, in this great assembly, the sitting mats are still not rolled up (ima kono daie wa, imada mushiro o makazu いまこの大會は、いまだむしろをまかず): Presumably, meaning that the assembly in which the Lotus Sūtra was being taught has not ended even today.

77 The common term, “seeing buddha,” is like this (kenbutsu no tsūgo, ima no gotoshi 見佛の通語、いまのごとし): Perhaps, meaning something like, “this is true in general of the term ‘seeing buddha’” — i.e., that it refers to “seeing a buddha manifested by mind.”

79 dragged through the mud and drenched with water (tadei taisui 拖泥帶水): Also read dadei taisui and written 拖泥滯水. A fixed expression, used in Zen especially in ironic reference to getting “sullied” by the compromises involved in teaching; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dragged through the mud and drenched with water.”

chasing the waves and following the billows (zuiha chikuro 隨波逐浪): An idiom akin to English “going with the flow” (i.e., adapting to circumstance), known in Zen literature especially as one of “the three phrases” (sanku 三句) of Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Yunmen’s three phrases.”

Be that as it may, in the Land of the Great Song these days, there are many who are called “Chan masters.”<sup>82</sup> They do not know the length and breadth of the buddha dharma, and they have little experience. Reciting from memory just two or three sayings of Linji or Yunmen, they think that is the entire way of the buddha dharma.<sup>83</sup> If the buddha dharma were exhaustively conveyed by two or three sayings of Linji or Yunmen, the buddha dharma would not have reached us today. It is hard to call Linji or Yunmen the epitome of the buddha dharma. How much less so the present types, a bunch not worth mentioning, who do not come up to Linji or Yunmen. Being themselves dull-witted and finding it difficult to clarify the heart of the Buddha’s sūtras, they arbitrarily disparage the sūtras of the buddhas, disregarding them without putting them into practice; we should call them followers of other paths. They are not descendants of the buddhas and ancestors; still less do they reach the realm of seeing buddha. They are a bunch that does not even get as far as the tenets of Confucius or Laozi. Children of the house of the buddhas and ancestors, do not associate with the bunch called “Chan masters.” We should just investigate and personally realize the eye of “the eye of seeing buddha.”

* * * * *

82 there are many who are called “Chan masters” (zenji, to shō suru tomogara ooshi 禪師、と稱するともがらおほし): Or “who call themselves ‘Chan masters.’” Dōgen appears here to be dismissive of those called “Chan masters.” Elsewhere (e.g., in the “Shōbōgenzō butsudō” 正法眼藏佛道), he sharply criticizes the appellation “Chan school” (zenshū 禪宗) for the lineage of the buddhas and ancestors; but the term “Chan master” (zenji 禪師) has a history outside the Chan school in reference to practitioners of meditation, and of course Dōgen himself regularly uses the term in reference to members of his lineage.

83 Linji or Yunmen (Rinzai Unmon 臨濟・雲門): I.e., Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866) and Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃. A preference for the sayings of these two famous masters over the sūtras is also criticized in “Shōbōgenzō bukkō” 正法眼藏佛經.

いはゆる見佛は、見自佛にあらず、見他佛にあらず、見佛なり。一枝梅は見一枝梅のゆえに、開華明明なり。

“Seeing buddha” is not seeing one’s own buddha, nor is it seeing another’s buddha: it is seeing buddha. Because a single branch of plum is seeing a single branch of plum, its blossoming is perfectly clear.<sup>87</sup>

84 My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong (senshi Tendō kobutsu 先師天童古佛): After a record in the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:130c7-11); also treated in “Shōbōgenzō baika” 正法眼藏梅華.

85 Piṇḍola (Binzuru 賓頭盧): A prominent arhat among the Buddha’s followers, often depicted as having long, drooping eyebrows. Prasenajit (Hashinoku ō 波斯匿王) was king of Kośala and a devout patron of the Buddha. The more common version of this story (as seen below, section 33) gives King Aśoka as Piṇḍola’s interlocutor. Though the Zen story is quite different, it is ultimately derived from an account of Aśoka’s interview with Piṇḍola in the Ayuwang jing 阿育王經 (T.2043.50:139c14-140a22).

“personally seen the Buddha” (shin ken butsu rai 親見佛來): Correcting Kawamura’s shin butsu ken rai 親佛見來.

86 Worthy of offerings (ōgu 應供): A translation of Sanskrit arhat (rakan 羅漢). Piṇḍola was famous as the eldest of the arhats.

four continents (shitenge 四天下): I.e., the four great continents said to surround Mount Sumeru in Buddhist cosmology; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four Continents.” Humans inhabit the southern continent, Jambudvīpa.

87 Because a single branch of plum is seeing a single branch of plum (isshi bai wa ken isshi bai no yue ni 一枝梅は見一枝梅のゆえに): Probably to be understood, “a plum branch is the seeing of a plum branch.”

いま波斯匿王の問取する宗旨は、尊者すでに見佛なりや、作佛なりや、と問取するなり。尊者、あきらかに眉毛を策起せり、見佛の證驗なり、相瞞すべからず。至今していまだ休罷せず、應供あらはれてかくることなし、親曾の見佛たどるべからず。かの三億家の見佛といふは、この見佛なり、見三十二相にはあらず。見三十二相は、たれか境界をへだてん。この見佛の道理をしらざる人天・聲聞・緣覺の類、おほかるべし。たとへば、拂子を豎起するおほしといへども、拂子の豎起するはおほきにあらず、といふがごとし。見佛は被佛見成なり、たとひ自己は覆藏せんことをおもふとも、見佛さきだちて漏泄せしむるなり、これ見佛の道理なり。如恒河沙數量の身心を功夫して、審細にこの策起眉毛の面目を參究すべし。たとひ百千萬劫の晝夜、つねに釋迦牟尼佛に共住せりとも、いまだ策起眉毛の力量なくば、見佛にあらず。たとひ二千餘載よりこのかた、十萬餘里の遠方にありとも、策起眉毛の力量したしく見成せば、空王以前より見釋迦牟尼佛なり。見一枝梅なり、見梅梢春なり。しかあれば、親曾見佛は、禮三拜なり、合掌問訊なり、破顔微笑なり、拳頭飛霹靂なり、跏趺坐蒲團なり。

The essential point of King Prasenajit's question was to ask whether the Venerable had seen buddha or had become buddha. The Venerable clearly brushed up his eyebrows, proof that he had seen buddha; he could not deceive. To the present day, he has never desisted; his "worthiness of offerings" has been on display and never hidden; we need not trace the seeing of buddha that he "once personally" [experienced].<sup>88</sup> The "seeing buddha" of those three koṭis of households was this seeing buddha; it was not seeing his thirty-two marks.<sup>89</sup> Were it seeing the thirty-two marks, who would have been blocked from the object?<sup>90</sup> There must be many among the classes of humans and devas, śrāvakas, and pratyeka-buddhas who do not know the principle of this seeing buddha.

88 we need not trace the seeing of buddha that he "once personally" [experienced] (shinzō no kenbutsu tadoru bekarazu 親曾の見佛たどるべからず): Here, as elsewhere in his writing Dōgen plays with Rujing's adverbial expression "once personally" (shinzō 親曾).

89 The "seeing buddha" of those three koṭis of households (kano san oku ke no kenbutsu かの三億家の見佛): Reference to the tradition that only one-third of the (impossibly large) population of Śrāvastī actually saw the Buddha during his residence there; see the Dazhidu lun 大智度論 (T.1509.25:125c5-7):

舍衛城中九億家。三億家眼見佛。三億家耳聞有佛而眼不見。三億家不聞不見。

In the city of Śrāvastī, there were nine koṭis [90,000,000] of households. Three koṭis of households saw the Buddha; three koṭis of households heard that there was a buddha but did not see him; three koṭis of households neither heard of nor saw him.

90 Were it seeing the thirty-two marks, who would have been blocked from the object (ken sanjūni sō wa, tare ka kyōgai o hedaten 見三十二相は、たれか境界をへだてん): I.e., who could not have seen the thirty-two physical marks on the body of the Buddha? In fact, Buddhists have disagreed on the question of whether these marks adorn the human body visible to anyone or the "reward" body" (hōshin 報身; S. sambhogakāya) seen only by advanced adepts.

It is like saying, for example, that, while those who stand up a whisk may be many, there are not many who stand up a whisk.<sup>91</sup> Seeing buddha is made manifest by buddha; even if we ourselves think to conceal it, seeing buddha is there first and leaks it out.<sup>92</sup> This is the principle of seeing buddha.

Exerting bodies and minds numerous as the sands of the Ganges, we should investigate in detail the face of this “brushing up his eyebrows.”<sup>93</sup> Even were we constantly to dwell together with Buddha Śākyamuni, day and night, for hundreds of thousands of myriads of kalpas, if we still lack the strength to “brush up our eyebrows,” it would not be “seeing buddha.” Even though, over two thousand years later, we are in a distant quarter over a hundred thousand miles away, if we personally realize the strength to “brush up our eyebrows,” it is seeing Buddha Śākyamuni from before King of Emptiness.<sup>94</sup> It is seeing a single branch of plum; it is seeing the “spring” of “the twigs of the plum.” Thus, “having once personally seen the Buddha” is paying respects with three prostrations; it is joining the palms and making inquiries; it is breaking into a smile; it

91 while those who stand up a whisk may be many, there are not many who stand up a whisk (hossu o juki suru ooshi to iedomo, hossu no juki suru wa ooki ni arazu 拂子を豎起するおほしといへども、拂子の豎起するはおほきにあらず): I.e., teachers of Zen may be common enough, but authentic teachers are not. The whisk was a ritual implement held by an abbot when he ascended the high seat in a dharma hall for a formal teaching; raising this whisk as a visual display was a common gesture. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Whisk.”

92 Seeing buddha is made manifest by buddha (kenbutsu wa hi butsu genjō nari 見佛は被佛見成なり): Taking genjō 見成 as equivalent to genjō 現成 (“realized,” “obvious,” “immediately available,” etc.). Dōgen is playing here with the glyph ken 見 (“to see”), tempting us to read the phrase something like, “seeing buddha is seen (and realized?) by the buddha.” Presumably, this and the immediately following clause represent an explanation of Rujing’s line, “He once personally saw the Buddha; he doesn’t deceive.”

93 bodies and minds numerous as the sands of the Ganges (nyo Goga sha sūryō no shinjin 如恒河沙數量の身心): Presumably, referring to innumerable lifetimes.

94 over two thousand years later (nisen yo sai yori kono kata 二千餘載よりこのかた); in a distant quarter over a hundred thousand miles away (jūman yo ri no enpō 十萬餘里の遠方): I.e., far removed in time and space from Buddha Śākyamuni. The time span reflects the traditional East Asian Buddhist reckoning of the date of the parinirvāṇa of the Buddha as 949 BCE. The number of Chinese “miles” (ri 里) from the Buddha’s homeland to Dōgen’s Japan represents a standard expression (often given as “one hundred eight thousand miles” [jūman hassen ri 十萬八千里]) for a great distance. At roughly three ri to an English mile, the actual distance in ri from the Buddha’s homeland to Dōgen’s Japan would be closer to ten thousand.

before King of Emptiness (Kūō izen 空王以前): An unusual expression, likely based on the the common Zen saying “before King Majestic Voice” (Ion ō izen 威音王已前), used in reference to what precedes all differentiation; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before King of Emptiness.”

The essential point of King Aśoka’s question is that the words, “The Venerable One has personally seen the Buddha. Is this right?” are asking, “Is the Venerable One already a venerable one?” At the time, the Venerable One immediately parted his eyebrows. This causes “seeing 95 joining the palms and making inquiries (gasshō monjin 合掌問訊): A fixed expression for a polite greeting, with palms pressed together and head slightly lowered.

breaking into a smile (hagan mishō 破顔微笑): Reference to the famous story of the first transmission of the “treasury of the true dharma eye” (shōbōgenzō 正法眼藏) from Śākyamuni to Mahākāśyapa at an assembly on Vulture Peak; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Break into a smile.”

96 Venerable Piṇḍola (Binzuru sonja 賓頭盧尊者): Variant of the story raised by Rujing (above, section 30), found in several Chan texts; see, e.g., Chanzong songgu lianzhu tongji 禪宗頌古聯珠通集, ZZ.115:31a8-11. The famous King Aśoka is thought to have reigned c. 268-232 BCE.

He says, “When the Nāga King Anavatapta invited the Buddha to a maigre feast, this humble wayfarer was also included in that number.” We should recognize that, in an assembly of “invited buddhas,” “only buddhas with buddhas” will be as “rice, hemp, bamboo, and reeds.”<sup>99</sup> Those of the fourth fruit and pratyeka-buddhas would not participate.<sup>100</sup> Even if those of the fourth fruit and pratyeka-buddhas were to come, they would not be held up as numbering among the “invited buddhas.” The Venerable has clearly claimed of himself, “when [King Anavatapta] invited the Buddha to a maigre feast, this humble wayfarer was in that it causes becoming a buddha to be “personally seen” (sabutsu o shin ken seshimuru nari 作佛を親見せしむるなり): Further play with the phrase from Rujing’s verse, “He once personally saw the Buddha” (shin zō ken butsu 親曾見佛); perhaps meaning something like, “Piṇḍola’s act of parting his eyebrows reveals that becoming a buddha is a matter of personally seeing.” The clause might also be read, “it causes [us? King Aśoka?] to see ‘becoming a buddha.’”

98 This causes “seeing buddha” to appear in the world (kore kenbutsu o shutsugen o se seshimuru nari これ見佛を出現於世せしむるなり): Perhaps meaning something like, “Piṇḍola’s act of parting his eyebrows reveals what it means to see the buddha.” The predicate “to appear in the world” (shutsugen o se 出現於世) is a fixed expression for the advent of a buddha; best known, perhaps, from the Lotus Sūtra sentence (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:7a21-22) quoted above, Note 23.

99 in an assembly of “invited buddhas,” “only buddhas with buddhas” will be as “rice, hemp, bamboo, and reeds” (shōbutsu no e ni wa, yui butsu yo butsu, tōmachikui su beshi 請佛の會には、唯佛與佛、稻麻竹葦すべし): The introductory phrase could also be rendered, “in the assembly to which the Buddha was invited”; but Dōgen plays in this section with the expression shō butsu 請佛 (“invited the Buddha”), treating it as an adjective-noun construction, to make the point that the Arhat Piṇḍola was invited to a feast reserved for buddhas. “Only buddhas with buddhas” (yui butsu yo butsu 唯佛與佛) is a phrase from the Lotus Sūtra, see above, Note 23. “Rice, hemp, bamboo, and reeds” (tōmachikui 稻麻竹葦), a simile for great crowds, also comes from the Lotus Sūtra, where it is used to describe a great crowd of bodhisattvas (see Supplementary Notes); Dōgen playfully treats it as a verb here.

100 Those of the fourth fruit (shika 四果): I.e., arhats, the last of the four stages of the śrāvaka path leading to nirvāṇa. Piṇḍola, of course, was an arhat.

number.” It is a statement about himself that came from nowhere; the truth of his seeing buddha is clear.<sup>101</sup> To say that [the king] “invited the Buddha” does not refer to inviting only Buddha Śākyamuni; it is inviting all the incalculable, inexhaustible buddhas of the three times and ten directions. It is the nameless, unnamed “buddhas once personally seen” who number among the invited buddhas.<sup>102</sup> Instructions about seeing buddha, seeing a teacher, seeing oneself, or seeing you should be like this.

101 It is a statement about himself that came from nowhere (mutan ni kitareru ji dōshu nari 無端にきたれる自道取なり): I.e., he had no reason to make this claim [other than to make clear his “seeing buddha” made him an “invited buddha”].

102 nameless, unnamed “buddhas once personally seen” (mui fui no shinzō kenbutsu 無諱不諱の親曾見佛): Further play with Rujing’s line, “he once personally saw the Buddha” (shinzō kenbutsu 親曾見佛). The sense might be “all those unidentified buddhas ever personally seen” or, perhaps, “the buddhas personally seen, who are without name.”

103 Lake Anavatapta (Anokudatchi 阿耨達池): Dōgen shifts here to a more common transliteration of the Sanskrit anavatapta (“unheated”). A lake, imagined to be north of the Himalayas (sometimes identified with Lake Manasarovar, in western Tibet), the name of which is said to derive from the fact that the dragons residing here are not subject to the hot sands and winds that represent one of their afflictions.

104 is called here “Lake without the Affliction of Heat” (koko ni wa Munetsunō chi to iu ここには無熱惱池といふ): I.e., the Chinese translation of the lake name, which could also be taken as “Lake without Torment.”

105 Chan Master Renyong of Baoning (Honei Jin’yū zenji 保寧仁勇禪師): After the version at Chanzong songgu lianzhu tongji 禪宗頌古聯珠通集, ZZ.115:31a16-17.

his eyebrows rough (sōbi so 雙眉麤): The reading seems dubious here; the version at Baoning Renyong chanshi yulu 保寧仁勇禪師語錄 (ZZ.120:371a9-11) gives the more likely “his eyes rough” (sōmoku so 雙目麤), perhaps in the sense, “his visage fierce.”

106 An moni xili sulu (on mani shiri soro 唵摩尼悉哩蘇嚧): A dharāṇī, of unknown origin, the orthography of which varies slightly according to the text.

The Master said, “Zhenzhou produces big radishes.”

[56:40]

いまの道現成は、親見南泉の證驗なり。有語にあらず、無語にあらず、下語にあらず、通語にあらず。策起眉毛にあらず、撥開眉毛にあらず、親見眉毛なり。たとひ軼才の獨歩なりとも、親見にあらずよりは、かくのごとくなるべからず。この鎮州出大蘿蔔頭の語は、眞際大師の、鎮州寶家園眞際院に住持なりしときの道なり。のちに眞際大師、の號をたてまつる。

The statement here is proof that he “personally saw Nanquan.” It is not having words; it is not lacking words; it is not a comment [on another’s words]; it is not a common expression. It is not “brushing up his eyebrows”; it is not “parting his eyebrows”; it is “personally seeing” the eyebrows. Even if it was the solitary step of an exceptional talent, had it not been based on “personally seeing,” it would not have been as it was.<sup>108</sup> These words, “Zhenzhou produces big radishes,” were said when Great Master Zhenji was abbot of Zhenji Cloister, in Doujiayuan, Zhenzhou. Later, the posthumous title Great Master Zhenji was bestowed on him.

107 Great Master Zhenji of Zhaozhou (Jōshū Shinsai daishi 趙州眞際大師): I.e., Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗, dharma heir of the Nanquan Puyan 南泉普願 mentioned here. This dialogue appears in several Chan texts; see, e.g., Zongmen liandeng huiyao 宗門聯燈會要 (ZZ.136:533b17-18). The Tang district of Zhenzhou 鎮州 was in present-day Hebei, Zhaozhou’s home area.

108 the solitary step of an exceptional talent (issai no doppo 軼才の獨歩): I.e., the unique expression of a genius like Zhaozhou.

かくのごとくなるがゆえに、見佛眼を參開するよりこのかた、佛祖正法眼藏を正傳せり。正法眼藏の正傳あるとき、佛見雍容の威儀現成し、見佛、ここに巍巍堂堂なり。

Because he was like this, ever after he opened the eye that sees buddha, he directly transmitted the treasury of the true dharma eye of the buddhas and ancestors. When there is a direct transmission of the treasury of the true dharma eye, the graceful deportment of the buddha's seeing is manifest, and seeing buddha is here solemn and imposing.

INTRODUCTION

This chapter is extant in two versions: one, the version translated here, representing number 57 of the seventy-five-chapter compilation of the Shōbōgenzō and number 62 in the ninety-five-chapter Honzan edition; the other, similar but somewhat shorter, occurring as number 37 in the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō compilation (and translated below, in Volume 7). Both texts bear colophons indicating that the work was produced in the winter of 1243-44, at Yamashibu 禪師峰 (or Zenji Peak), the temple in Echizen (modern Fukui prefecture), where Dōgen delivered several Shōbōgenzō texts following his arrival from the capital in the summer of the same year; but it is thought that our text here represents an edited version of the draft found in the sixty-chapter compilation.

The title theme of the essay, henzan 遍參 (or hensan; also written 徧參) is the traditional Zen practice of traveling widely to study with various masters. The essay opens with a conversation between two famous Tang-dynasty monks, Xuansha Shibeī 玄沙師備 and his teacher, Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存. Xuefeng suggests that his student undertake a trip of extensive study, but Xuansha remarks that the first Chan ancestor in China, Bodhidharma, never came to China from India and the second ancestor, Huīke 慧可, never went to India from China.

In his comments on this conversation, which occupy the first half of the essay, Dōgen makes it clear that “extensive study” is not a matter of consulting widely but of penetrating the essential meaning of the buddha dharma — what he describes at one point as jumping into Bodhidharma’s eye and plucking it out. Extensive study is not about traveling from place to place but about understanding that, in the words of Xuansha, “all the worlds in the ten directions are the true human body.”

In the second half of the essay, Dōgen turns to an example of extensive study: the odd claim by Xuansha that he and Buddha Śākyamuni studied together under “the Xie’s third boy in a fishing boat” — i.e., under Xuansha himself when he was boy who loved fishing. Here Dō-gen's comments focus on the notion that extensive study means studying together with another. He quotes a verse by his own master, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, celebrating an assembly of wise friends with whom Rujing had trained, and goes on to cite the examples of famous Chinese monks who spent years of study with their teachers.

Finally, Dōgen concludes the text by invoking a favorite theme of his writing and a famous centerpiece of Sōtō Zen teaching: "Extensive study," he says, "is just sitting and sloughing off body and mind."

Extensive Study

[57:1] {2:112}

佛祖の大道は、究竟參徹なり、足下無絲去なり、足下雲生なり。しかもかくのごとくなりといへども、華開世界起なり、吾常於此切なり。このゆえに、甜瓜徹蒂甜なり、苦瓠連根苦なり、甜甜徹蒂甜なり。かくのごとく參學しきたれり。

The great way of the buddhas and ancestors is study and penetration of the ultimate; it is to “go without a string at your feet”; it is “clouds arose underfoot.”<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless, though this is so, it is “a flower opens, and the world arises”; it is “I’m always close to this.”<sup>2</sup> Therefore, it is the sweet

1 Extensive Study (hensan 遍參): Also read hensan and written 遍參. A term used in Zen literature for the monk’s practice of traveling widely to study with various masters; it conveys the sense of something like “universal, or wide-ranging, consultation.” The glyph san 參, here suggesting an audience with the teacher, occurs in such common compound expressions for Zen “study” or “investigation” as sangaku 參學, sankyū 參究, and santetsu 參徹 — all of which occur below in this text.

study and penetration of the ultimate (kukyō santetsu 究竟參徹): The “ultimate” is a common Buddhist expression, used for both the ultimate goal and the extreme efforts to reach it.

“go without a string at your feet” (sokuka mu shi ko 足下無絲去; also read sokka mu shi ko; also written 足下無糸去): Typically interpreted to mean untrammelled freedom; perhaps reflecting the simile that training the mind to concentrate is like training a bird to sit on your shoulder by tying a string to its foot. From a saying, also invoked in the “Shōbōgenzō zazen shin” 正法眼藏坐禪箴, attributed to the Tang-dynasty master Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dongshan’s three roads.”

“clouds arose underfoot” (sokuka unshō 足下雲生): An allusion to the power of flight, one of the standard spiritual powers of the Buddhist adept; an expression best known from an incident, told in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:218b2-6) and elsewhere, in which one of Bodhidharma’s Indian followers flies on a cloud to rescue a fellow disciple.

2 “a flower opens, and the world arises” (ke kai sekai ki 華開世界起): The final line of the dharma transmission verse attributed to Bodhidharma’s master, Prajñātāra. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “A flower opens, and the world arises.”

“I’m always close to this” (go jō o shi setsu 吾常於此切): A phrase also cited in melon is sweet through to its stem; it is the bitter gourd is bitter to its root; it is the sweet sweetness is sweet through to the stem.<sup>3</sup> This is how it has been studied.

Great Master Zongyi of Mount Xuansha was once addressed by Xuefeng, who said, “Bei Dhūta, why don’t you go off on an extensive study?”<sup>4</sup>

“Shōbōgenzō jinzū” 正法眼藏神通 and (in the variant go jō o ze setsu 吾常於是切) in “Shōbōgenzō gabyō” 正法眼藏画餅. The sense of the glyph setsu 切 here is subject to interpretation: the translation takes it as sekkin 切近 (“to be familiar with,” “to be intimate with”), but it could also be, and has been, understood as shinsetsu 深切 (“to be ardent,” “to care deeply,” etc.). From a remark attributed to Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价, in answer to a question about the three bodies of a buddha. The Dongshan yulu 洞山語錄 (T.1986A.47:510b24-25) gives the question as:

問、三身之中、阿那身不墮衆數。

[A monk] asked, “Among the three bodies [of the buddha], which body doesn’t fall among the numbered?”

Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:152, case 55) has a variant version:

洞山因僧問、三身中那身說法。師曰、吾常於此切。僧後問曹山、洞山道吾常於此切、意旨云何。山云、要頭斫將去。僧又問雪峰。峯以拄杖劈口打曰、我也曾到洞山來。

Dongshan was asked by a monk, “Among the three bodies, which preaches the dharma?”

The Master said, “I’m always close to this.”

The monk later asked Caoshan [i.e., Caoshan Benzhi 曹山本寂, 840-901], “Dongshan said, ‘I’m always close to this.’ What does that mean?”

Shan said, “If you want my head, cut it off and take it.”

The monk again asked Xuefeng [i.e., Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908)]. Feng struck him in the mouth with his staff and said, “I’ve been to Dongshan.”

3 the sweet melon is sweet through to its stem (ten ka tettai ten 甜瓜徹蒂甜); the bitter gourd is bitter to its root (ku ka ren kon ku 苦瓠連根苦): A saying, more often in reverse order, occurring with some frequency in Chan texts; see, e.g., its use by Yunfeng Wen Yue 雲峰文悅 (998-1061), Guzunsu yulu 故尊宿語錄, ZZ.118:688b7. The third clause here is Dōgen’s variation.

4 Great Master Zongyi of Mount Xuansha (Genshasan Shūitsu daishi 玄沙山宗一大師): i.e., the Tang-dynasty Chan master Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 (835-905). “Xuefeng” (Seppō 雪峰) refers to Shibei’s master, Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存. “Bei Dhūta” (Bizuda 備頭陀; “Bei the Ascetic”) is said to have been Shibei’s nickname, deriving from his austere practice. Their conversation here occurs at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:344a6-7.

The Master said, “Dharma didn’t come to the Land of the East; the Second Ancestor didn’t go to Sindh in the West.”<sup>5</sup>

[57:3]

いわく、遍參底の道理は、翻巾斗參なり、聖諦亦不爲なり、何階級之有なり。

The principle of extensive studying is the study of a flip; it is “don’t do even the sacred truths”; it is “what stages are there?”<sup>6</sup>

* * * * *

[57:4]

南嶽大慧禪師、はじめて曹溪古佛に參ずるに、古佛いはく、是甚麼物恁麼來。この泥彈子を遍參すること、始終八年なり。末上に遍參する一著子を古佛に白してまうさく、懷讓會得當初來時、和尚接懷讓、是甚麼物恁麼來。ちなみに曹溪古佛道、爾作麼生會。ときに大慧まうさく、説似一物即不中。これ遍參現成なり、八年現成なり。曹溪古佛とふ、還假修證否。大慧まうさく、修證不無、染汚即不得。すなはち曹溪いはく、吾亦如是、汝亦如是、乃至西天諸佛諸祖亦如是。これより、さらに八載遍參す。頭正尾正、かぞふるに、十五白の遍參なり。

When Chan Master Dahui of Nanyue first visited the Old Buddha of Caoxi, the Old Buddha said, “What thing is it that comes like this?”<sup>7</sup>

5 “Dharma didn’t come to the Land of the East; the Second Ancestor didn’t go to Sindh in the West” (Daruma furai Tōdo, niso fuō Saiten 達磨不來東土、二祖不往西天): “Dharma” here refers to the First Ancestor, Bodhidharma, said to have brought the Zen lineage to China; “the Second Ancestor” is Bodhidharma’s disciple Huike 慧可.

6 study of a flip (honkinto san 翻巾斗參): Or “a flip study.” The “flip,” or “somersault,” is a common expression for Zen action.

“don’t do even the sacred truths” (shōtai yaku fui 聖諦亦不爲); “what stages are there?” (ka kaikyū shi u 何階級之有): From a conversation between Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744) and his master, the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 六祖慧能 (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:240a19-21):

後聞曹溪法席乃往參禮。問曰。當何所務即不落階級。祖曰。汝曾作什麼。師曰。聖諦亦不爲。祖曰。落何階級。曰聖諦尚不爲。何階級之有。祖深器之。

Later, upon hearing of the dharma seat at Caoxi, he [i.e., Huairang] went and paid his respects. He asked, “What business would avoid falling down the stages [of the bodhisattva path]?”

The Ancestor said, “How do you understand it?”

The Master said, “Don’t do even the sacred truths.”

The Ancestor said, “What stage will you fall to?”

He said, “If you don’t do even the sacred truths, what stages are there?” The Ancestor deeply respected him.

7 Chan Master Dahui of Nanyue (Nangaku Daie zenji 南嶽大慧禪師): Dōgen here relates a famous dialogue between Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 and the Sixth Ancestor,

His extensive study of this ball of mud was eight years from start to finish.<sup>8</sup> In the end, he announced to the Old Buddha the one move of his extensive study, saying, “Huairang has understood what the Reverend put to me when I first came: ‘What is it that comes like this?’”

Thereupon, the Old Buddha of Caoxi said, “How do you understand it?”

At this point, Dahui said, “To say it’s like any thing wouldn’t hit it.”

This is the realization of extensive study, the realization of eight years.<sup>10</sup>

The Old Buddha of Caoxi said, “Then does it depend on practice and verification?”

Dahui said, “It’s not that it lacks practice and verification, but it can’t be defiled by them.”

Caoxi said, “You’re also like this, I’m also like this, and all the ancestors of Sindh in the West are also like this.”

Thereafter, he spent eight years more in extensive study.<sup>11</sup> True from head to tail, all told it was fifteen autumns of extensive study.

[57:5] {2:113}

恁麼來は、遍參なり。説似一物即不中、諸佛諸祖を開殿參見する、すなはち亦如是遍參なり。入畫看よりこのかた、六十五百千萬億の轉身遍參す、等閑の入一叢林、出一叢林を遍參とするにあらず、全眼睛の參見を遍參とす、打得徹を遍參とす。面皮厚多少を見徹する、すなはち遍參なり。

“Coming like this” is extensive study. “To say it’s like anything wouldn’t hit it”: to “open the hall and see the buddhas and ancestors”

---

Huineng 六祖慧能, that appears regularly throughout the Shōbōgenzō; for the version of the story given in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “What thing is it that comes like this?” The text here mixes Chinese quotation with Japanese translation, paraphrase, and comment.

8 His extensive study of this ball of mud was eight years from start to finish (kono deidansu o henzan suru koto, shiju hachinen nari この泥彈子を遍參すること、始終八年なり): Like the shinji Shōbōgenzō text, some versions of the story do say that it took Nanyue eight years to come up with his answer; but the characterization of those years as “extensive study of this ball of mud” is Dōgen’s comment, perhaps influenced by a saying of Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227) that appears several times in the Shōbōgenzō; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Gouge out Bodhidharma’s eye.”

9 one move (ichi jakusu 一著子): Used in reference to moving a piece in a board game; in Zen texts, often a “move” in a dialogue.

10 This is the realization of extensive study, the realization of eight years (kore henzan genjō nari, hachinen genjō nari これ遍參現成なり、八年現成なり): This sentence represents Dōgen’s comment.

11 Thereafter (kore yori これより): The final two sentences of this section represent Dōgen’s comment.

is the extensive study of “also like this.”<sup>12</sup> Ever since he “entered the picture and looked,” he has extensively studied transforming the body “sixty-five hundreds of thousands of myriads of kojis” of times.<sup>13</sup> He does not take the casual entering a grove and leaving a grove as extensive study; he takes seeing with the entire eye as extensive study, being able to penetrate it as extensive study.<sup>14</sup> Seeing through the thickness of the skin of the face — this is extensive study.<sup>15</sup>

雪峰道の遍參の宗旨、もとより出嶺をすすむるにあらず、北往南來をすすむるにあらず、玄沙道の、達磨不來東土、二祖不往西天、の遍參を助發するなり。玄沙道の達磨不來東土は、來而不來の亂道にあらず、大地無寸土の道理なり。いはゆる達磨は、命脈一尖なり。たとひ東土の全土、たちまちに極涌して、參侍すとも、轉身にあらず、さらに語脈の翻身にあらず。不來東土なるゆえに、東土に見面するなり。東土たとひ佛面祖面相見すとも、來東土にあらず、拈得佛祖失却鼻孔なり。

The essential point of the “extensive study” spoken of by Xuefeng, of course, does not recommend his leaving the peak, does not recommend his going north or coming south: it assists him in the extensive study of “Dharma didn’t come to the Land of the East; the Second Ancestor

12 “open the hall and see the buddhas and ancestors” (shobutsu shoso o kaiden sanken suru 諸佛諸祖を開殿參見する): Likely reflecting the words of Dōgen’s teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:121c10). A similar expression, “opening the hall and seeing the buddha” (kaiden kenbutsu 開殿見佛), occurs in the “Shōbōgenzō jippō” 正法眼藏十方。

13 “entered the picture and looked” (nyū ga kan 入畫看): Again, likely reflecting Rujing (at Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:128a13); here, no doubt equivalent to the preceding “open the hall and see” (kaiden sanken 開殿參見). Both expressions suggest seeing from the perspective of Buddhist teachings.

“sixty-five hundreds of thousands of myriads of kojis” (rokujūgo hyaku sen man oku 六十五百千萬億): An unusual number perhaps inspired by the twenty-seventh chapter of the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:60c12), in which a buddha says of the two pious princes, Vimalagarbha and Vimalanetra:

此二子已曾供養六十五百千萬億那由多恒河沙諸佛。

These two boys have already made offerings to sixty-five hundreds of thousands of myriads of kojis of nayutas of buddhas.

14 entering a grove and leaving a grove (nyū ichi sōrin, shutsu ichi sōrin 入一叢林、出一叢林): I.e., going from one monastery to the next.

the entire eye (zenganzei 全眼睛); being able to penetrate it (tatokutetsu 打得徹): Two expressions not occurring elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō. The former seems to be Dōgen’s invention; the latter, a fairly common phrase.

15 thickness of the skin of the face (menpi kō tashō 面皮厚多少): A fairly common expression in Zen texts, often seeming to suggest what we might call “thick skinned,” but here sometimes interpreted as the “original face” (honrai menmoku 本來面目).

didn't go to Sindh in the West" that Xuansha speaks of.<sup>16</sup> The "Dharma didn't come to the Land of the East" that Xuansha speaks of is not some confused words about coming or not coming: it is the principle that "the whole earth lacks an inch of ground."<sup>17</sup> "Dharma" here is the tip of the vital artery.<sup>18</sup> Even if the entire land of the Land of the East were suddenly completely to gush up and attend upon him, this would not be transforming the body, nor would it be flipping the body in the stream of words.<sup>19</sup> Since he "didn't come to the Land of the East," he meets the Land of the East face-to-face. Though the Land of the East encounters buddha faces and ancestor faces, this is not "coming to the Land of the East": it is getting hold of the buddhas and ancestors and losing the nose.<sup>20</sup>

16 it assists him (johotsu suru nari 助發するなり): The sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō version of "Henzan" adds after this clause the sentence:

たとへばなんぞ遍參にあらざらんといはんがごとし。

It is, for instance, as if he were to say, "How could this not be extensive study?"

17 "the whole earth lacks an inch of ground" (daichi mu sun do 大地無寸土): A saying appearing in several Chan texts (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:464a26), usually attributed to Changling Shouzhou 長靈守卓 (1065-1123). The sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō text has here simply:

遍參の道理を通達するなり。

It penetrates the principle of extensive study.

18 tip of the vital artery (meimyaku no issen 命脈一尖): An unusual image, perhaps suggesting that Bodhidharma here represents the ultimate meaning of the ancestral lineage.

19 flipping the body in the stream of words (gomyaku no honshin 語脈の翻身): A version of an expression appearing elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō as "turning the body in the stream of words" (gomyaku ri tenshin [or tenjin] 語脈裏轉身); doubtless reflecting a fairly common Zen usage, as, e.g., in case 29 of the Biyan lu 碧巖錄 (T.2003.48:169a19):

没量大人語脈裏轉却。

The immeasurably great person turns round [or is turned round] within the stream of words.

The parallel passage in the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō gives:

たとひ、東土の全土、たちまちに極涌して達磨に参侍轉身する遍參ありとも、屋裏の兒孫としては、かへりてこれ遍參を参ずべし。この道は、遍參して雪峰と同参、見取せしむるなり。

Even if there were the extensive study in which the entire land of the Land of the East were suddenly to gush up, attending on Dharma and transforming the body, as the offspring within the house, [we] should still study this [as] extensive study. These words let [us] see [him] extensively studying, and studying together with Xuefeng.

20 getting hold of the buddhas and ancestors and losing the nose (nentoku buso shitsukyaku bikū 拈得佛祖失却鼻孔): Perhaps, meaning something like, "losing his identity in the lineage." "To lose the nose" (shitsukyaku bikū 失却鼻孔) is a fixed expression occurring with some frequency in Zen texts, in the sense to lose face or reputation; but, here, Dōgen seems to be playing with a saying found in several Chan sources (see, e.g., Hongzhi chanshi yulu 宏智禪師廣錄, T.2001.48:16c9):

[57:7] {2:114}

おほよそ、土は、東西にあらず、東西は土にかかはれず。二祖不往西天は、西天を遍参するには不往西天なり。二祖もし西天にゆかば、一臂落了也。しばらく二祖なにとしてか西天にゆかざる。いはゆる碧眼の眼睛裏に跳入するゆえに、不往西天なり。もし碧眼裏に跳入せずば、必定して西天にゆくべし。袂出達磨眼睛を遍参とす。西天にゆき東土にきたる、遍参にあらず。天台・南嶽にいたり、五臺・上天にゆくをもて、遍参とするにあらず。四海五湖、もし透脱せざらんは、遍参にあらず。四海五湖に往來するは、四海五湖をして遍参せしめず、路頭を滑ならしむ、脚下を滑ならしむ、ゆえに遍参を打失せしむ。

In sum, the “land” is not east or west; east and west have nothing to do with the “land.” “The Second Ancestor didn’t go to Sindh in the West” is, in extensively studying Sindh in the West, he “didn’t go to Sindh in the West.” If the Second Ancestor had gone to Sindh in the West, one arm would have fallen off.<sup>21</sup> Now, why did the Second Ancestor not go to Sindh in the West? Because he jumped into the eye of Blue Eyes, he “didn’t go to Sindh in the West.”<sup>22</sup> If he had not jumped into Blue Eyes, he would definitely have gone to Sindh in the West. He made “gouging out Dharma’s eye” his extensive study.<sup>23</sup> Going to Sindh in the West or coming to the Land of the East is not extensive study; going to Tiantai or Nanyue is not extensive study; we do not take going to Wutai or the heavens as extensive study.<sup>24</sup> If we have not transcended the four seas

拈得鼻孔失却口。

To get hold of the nose and lose the mouth.

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose.”

21 one arm would have fallen off (ippi rakuryō ya 一臂落了也): No doubt playful allusion to the famous legend that Huike cut off his arm as an offering to Bodhidharma; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Cut off an arm.” The sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō text here is rather different:

二祖、もし西天にゆかば、佛法、いま東土にいたるべからず。達磨、もし東土にきたらば、佛法、いま東土に正傳すべからず。不來親曾不來なり、不往無外不往なり。これを動著せば、なにをか遍参とせん。

If the Second Ancestor had gone to Sindh in the West, the buddha dharma would not now have reached the Land of the East. If Dharma had come to the Land of the East, the buddha dharma would not now have been correctly transmitted to the Land of the East. “Not coming” is the not coming that is “personally once”; “not going” is the not going that is “without outside.” If you move these, what do we take as extensive study?

22 Blue Eyes (heigan 碧眼): A common reference to Bodhidharma.

23 “gouging out Dharma’s eye” (kesshutsu Daruma ganzei 袂出達磨眼睛): No doubt recalling the remark by Rujing cited above, Note 8.

24 Tiantai (Tendai 天台); Nanyue (Nangaku 南嶽); Wutai (godai 五臺); the heavens (jōten 上天): The first three represent famous mountains of China associated with Buddhism; the referent of “the heavens” (jōten 上天) is somewhat ambiguous here: ordinarily, it would indicate the various heavens of Buddhist cosmology; but, given the context, and five lakes, it is not extensive study.<sup>25</sup> Coming and going to the four seas and five lakes does not make the four seas and five lakes study extensively: it makes the road slippery; it makes the footing slippery; hence, it makes one lose extensive study.<sup>26</sup>

おほよそ、盡十方界、是箇眞實人體、の參徹を遍參とするゆえに、達磨不來東土、二祖不往西天、の參究あるなり。遍參は、石頭大底大、石頭小底小なり。石頭を動著せしめず、大參・小參ならしむるなり。百千萬箇を百千萬頭に參見するは、いまだ遍參にあらず、半語脈裏に百千萬轉身なるを遍參とす。たとへば、打地唯打地は遍參なり。一番打地、一番打空、一番打四方八面來は遍參にあらず。俱胝參天龍得一指頭は、遍參なり、俱胝唯豎一指は、遍參なり。

In sum, because he makes mastery of “all the worlds in the ten directions are the true human body” his extensive study, he has the investigation of “Dharma didn’t come to the Land of the East; the Second Ancestor didn’t go to Sindh in the West.”<sup>27</sup> Extensive study is “the bigness of the stones is big, the smallness of the stones is small”; it is, without moving the stones, to make them a big study, a small study.<sup>28</sup> To see it may simply mean the “Western Heavens” (Saiten 西天; i.e., India).

---

25 four seas and five lakes (shikai goko 四海五湖): I.e., the entire realm of China; a fixed expression, sometimes in reverse order. The four seas are the oceans in the four directions; the five lakes are variously listed.

26 it makes the road slippery (rotō o katsu narashimu 路頭を滑ならしむ): Perhaps recalling the words of the Tang-dynasty Chan master Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709-788) warning of the dangers of going to study with the Chan master Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (700-790): “The Shitou road is slippery” (Shitou lu hua 石頭路滑) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:246b9).

27 he makes mastery of “all the worlds in the ten directions are the true human body” his extensive study (jin jippō kai, ze ko shinjitsu nintai, no santetsu o henzan to suru 盡十方界、是箇眞實人體、の參徹を遍參とする): Reference to words attributed to Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備, recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:196, case 131; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “True human body.”

28 “the bigness of the stones is big, the smallness of the stones is small” (sekitō daitei dai, sekitō shōtei shō 石頭大底大、石頭小底小): A saying attributed to Guizong Daoquan 歸宗道詮 (930-985) (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:403b10-12):

問、九峯山中還有佛法也無。師曰、有。曰、如何是九峯山中佛法。師曰、山中石頭大底大小底小。

[A monk] asked, “Does the buddha dharma exist on Mount Jiufeng?”

The Master [Daoquan] said, “It does.”

He asked, “What is the buddha dharma on Mount Jiufeng?”

The Master said, “On the mountain, the bigness of the stones is big, the smallness is small.”

make them a big study, a small study (daisan shōsan narashimuru nari 大參・小參ならしむるなり): Or, perhaps, “to have them study the big, study the small.” The terms the hundreds of thousands of myriads in the hundreds of thousands of myriads is not yet extensive study; the turning of the body hundreds of thousands of myriad times within the flow of half a word is extensive study.<sup>29</sup> For example, “Dadi just struck the ground” is extensive study.<sup>30</sup> Once striking the ground, once striking the sky, once striking the four quarters and eight sides is not extensive study.<sup>31</sup> Juzhi’s studying with Tianlong and getting one finger is extensive study; Juzhi’s just holding up one finger is extensive study.<sup>32</sup> daisan 大參 and shōsan 小參 can also refer to greater and lesser convocations for study in a Chan monastery.

29 the turning of the body hundreds of thousands of myriad times within the flow of half a word (hangomyaku ri ni hyaku sen man tenshin 半語脈裏に百千萬轉身): Dōgen is here playing with the Zen saying, “to be turned within the flow of words”; see above, Note 19.

30 “Dadi just struck the ground” (Tachi yui ta chi 打地唯打地): From the account of the monk called “Reverend Strike the Ground” (Dadi heshang 打地和尚), who just struck the ground with his staff whenever he was asked a question. (See Jingde chuangdeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:261c2-3). The juxtaposition here of this expression with the following evocation of Juzhi’s 俱胝 “one finger” (ichi shi 一指) suggests that Dōgen may be recalling the line praising the compassionate teaching techniques of the Chan masters, “like Juzhi’s one finger and Dadi’s just striking the ground” (ru Juzhi yi zhi, Dadi wei da di 如俱胝一指、打地唯打地), found in the Yuanwu Foguo chanshi yulu 圓悟佛果禪師語錄 (T.1997.47:784b13).

31 striking the four quarters and eight sides (ta shihō hachimen rai 打四方八面來): Seemingly recalling a well-known passage in the Linji yulu 臨濟語錄 (T.1985.47:503b20-22), in which Linji Yixuan’s 臨濟義玄 (d. 866) eccentric follower Puhua 普化 (dates unknown), says,

明頭來、明頭打、暗頭來、暗頭打。四方八面來、旋風打、虛空來、連架打。

When the bright comes, the bright does it. When the dark comes, the dark does it.
When the four quarters and eight sides come, the whirlwind does it. When empty space comes, the flail does it.

This translation treats the verb ta 打 simply as a generic predicate marker (“to do,” “to deal with,” etc.); but it is often taken in its primary sense, “to hit,” “to strike,” as in Dōgen’s reading here, which seems to break the Chinese passage so that the verb at the end of the second clause gets attached to the head of the third clause.

32 Juzhi’s studying with Tianlong and getting one finger (Gutei san Tenryū toku ichi shitō 俱胝參天龍得一指頭): Reference to the well-known story of the Tang-dynasty Chan master Juzhi of Mount Jinhua 金華山俱胝 (dates unknown), who was said to have attained awakening when his teacher Tianlong 天龍 (dates unknown) held up one finger. Thereafter, Juzhi himself always held up one finger to teach his own students. (See, e.g., Jingde chuangdeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:288a23-11.) The sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō has here:

俱胝唯豎一指を、遍參なりとす、更豎拳頭せば、遍參にあざらん。爲人もかくのごとくなるべし、爲自もかくのごとくなるべし。

We take “Juzhi’s just holding up one finger” as extensive study; if he then held up his fist, this would not be extensive study. “For the sake of the other” should be like this; for the sake of oneself should be like this.

玄沙示衆云、與我釋迦老子同參。時有僧出問、未審、參見甚麼人。師云、釣魚船上謝三郎。

Xuansha addressed the assembly, saying, “Old Master Śākya and I studied together.”<sup>33</sup>

At that time, a monk came forward and asked, “I don’t understand. With whom did you study?”

The Master said, “The Xie’s third boy on a fishing boat.”<sup>34</sup>

釋迦老子參底の頭正尾正、おのづから釋迦老子と同參なり。玄沙老漢參底の頭正尾正、おのづから玄沙老漢と同參なるゆえに、釋迦老子と玄沙老漢と同參なり。釋迦老子と玄沙老漢と、參足・參不足を究竟するを、遍參の道理とす。釋迦老子は玄沙老漢と同參するゆえに古佛なり、玄沙老漢は釋迦老子と同參なるゆえに兒孫なり。この道理、審細に遍參すべし。

釣魚船上謝三郎、この宗旨、あきらめ參學すべし。いはゆる釋迦老子と玄沙老漢と、同時同參の時節を遍參功夫するなり。釣魚船上謝三郎を參見する玄沙老漢ありて同參す、玄沙山上禿頭漢を參見する謝三郎ありて同參す。同參・不同參、みづから功夫せしめ、他づから功夫ならしむべし。玄沙老漢と釋迦老子と同參す、遍參す。謝三郎と與我と參見甚麼人の道理を、遍參すべし、同參すべし。いまだ遍參の道理現在せざれば、參自不得なり、參自不足なり、參他不得なり、參他不足なり、參人不得なり、參我不得なり、參拳頭不得なり、參眼睛不得なり、自釣自上不得なり、未釣先上不得なり。

33 Xuansha addressed the assembly (Gensha jishu 玄沙示衆): i.e., Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備; an anecdote found, e.g., in the Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要, ZZ.136:823a14-15.

34 “The Xie’s third boy on a fishing boat” (chōgyō senjō Sha sanrō 釣魚船上謝三郎): A self reference. Xuansha’s biography reports that his family name was Xie 謝, and that he loved fishing as a boy. (See Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:343c24-25.)

“The Xie’s third boy on a fishing boat”: the essential point of this, we should clarify and study. This is the concentrated effort at extensive study of the moment when Old Master Śākya and Old Man Xuansha study together at the same time. They study together, as Old Man Xuansha is there studying with “the Xie’s third boy on a fishing boat”; they study together, as the Xie’s third boy is there studying with the bald-headed fellow on Mount Xuansha.<sup>35</sup> We should have ourselves concentrate, have the other concentrate, on studying together and not studying together.<sup>36</sup>

Old Man Xuansha and Old Master Śākya study together, study extensively. We should study extensively, study together, the principle of “with whom” the Xie’s third boy and “I” studied. So long as the principle of extensive study is not immediately present to us, study of ourselves is not possible, study of ourselves is insufficient; study of the other is not possible, study of the other is insufficient; study of the person is not possible, study of the self is not possible; study of the fist is not possible, study of the eye is not possible; fishing for oneself and rising by oneself are not possible, rising before being caught is not possible.<sup>37</sup>

すでに遍参究盡なるには、脱落遍参なり。海枯不見底なり、人死不留心なり。海枯といふは、全海全枯なり。しかあれども、海もし枯竭しぬれば、不見底なり。不留全留、ともに人心なり。人死のとき、心不留なり。死を拈來せるがゆえに、心不留なり。このゆえに、全人は心なり、全心は人なりとしりぬべし。かくのごとくの一の方の表裏を参究するなり。

When extensive study has been exhaustively investigated, it is extensive study sloughed off. It is, “when the ocean dries up, we cannot see the bottom”; it is, “when a person dies, he does not leave his mind be-

35 baldheaded fellow on Mount Xuansha (Genshasan jō tokutō kan 玄沙山上秃頭漢): I.e., Xuansha as a monk; “baldhead” (tokutō 秃頭) is a common term for the tonsured cleric.

36 We should have ourselves concentrate, have the other concentrate (mizukara kufū seshime, tazukara kufū narashimu beshi みづから功夫せしめ、他づから功夫ならしむべし): Or perhaps, “we should have ourselves concentrate and make it the other’s concentration.” The “other” (ta 他) here is presumably the one with whom one studies together. The subject is unstated, and the sentence could still be referring to Xuansha and Śākyamuni.

37 rising before being caught (michō sen jō 未釣先上): Reminiscent of Dōgen’s reference, in a passage on Xuansha’s fishing in the “Shōbōgenzō ikka myōju” 正法眼藏一顆明珠, to “the golden-scaled one that rises of itself without being caught” (fuchō jijō no kinrin 不釣自上の金鱗). May reflect the words of Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:127a17):

盡大地人不釣自上。

The person of all the whole earth rises of themselves without being caught.

hind.<sup>38</sup> “When the ocean dries up” means the entire ocean is entirely dried up. Nevertheless, when the ocean is entirely dried up, “we cannot see the bottom.” “Not leaving” and entirely leaving are both the person’s mind. “When a person dies,” the mind is not left behind. Since he has taken up death, the mind is not left behind. Therefore, we know that the entire person is mind, the entire mind is the person. This is the study of the surface and interior of such a single side.<sup>39</sup>

My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong, on one occasion when old associates among the elders from all quarters assembled and requested a convocation, said in his convocation address,<sup>40</sup>

38 “when the ocean dries up, we cannot see the bottom” (kai ko fukē tei 海枯不見底); “when a person dies, he does not leave his mind behind” (nin shi furyū shin 人死不留心): The expression ryūshin 留心, translated here “leave his mind behind,” normally has the sense “to pay attention,” “to take heed”; hence, the second clause might also be understood, “when a person dies, he no longer cares.” Variation on a saying, drawn from a verse by the poet Du Xunhe 杜荀鶴 (846-907), that occurs often in Zen literature (See, e.g., Zongjing lu 宗鏡錄, T.2016.48:564b12):

海枯終見底、人死不知心。

When the ocean dries up, we finally see the bottom;

When a person dies, we do not know his mind.

Dōgen’s version here reflects a saying he attributes to Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 in the Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.4:86, no. 503). Elsewhere, he plays with other variants of the saying. In “Shōbōgenzō kokyō” 正法眼藏古鏡, he has, “Though the ocean dries up, it does not reveal the bottom” (kai ko futō ro tei 海枯不到露底); in “Shōbōgenzō hotu bodai shin” 正法眼藏發菩提心, he has “When the ocean dries up, the bottom remains; though a person dies, the mind will remain” (kai karete nao soko nokori, hito wa shi sutomo shin nokoru beki 海かれてなほ底のこり、人は死すとも心のこるべき).

39 surface and interior of such a single side (kaku no gotoku no ippō no hyōri かくのごとくの一方の表裏): A tentative translation; perhaps, ippō 一方, rendered here as “a single side,” refers to the unity of the person and the mind.

40 My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong (senshi Tendō kobutsu 先師天童古佛): Introducing a quotation of the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:122a16-19).

old associates (dōkyū 道舊): Literally, “to talk of the old”; by extension, “old friends.”

*The great way has no gate;
 It springs from the crowns in all quarters.<sup>41</sup>
 Empty space ends the road;
 It enters the nostrils of Qingliang.<sup>42</sup>

而今の上堂は、先師古佛、ときに建康府の清涼寺に住持のとき、諸方の長老きたれり。これらの道舊とは、あるときは賓主とありき、あるひは隣單なりき。諸方にしてかくのごとくの舊友なり、おほからざらめやは。あつまりて上堂を請するときなり。渾無箇話の長老は交友ならず、請する、ものかずにあらず。大尊貴なるをかしづき請するなり。

This convocation address is from the time when my former master, the Old Buddha, was abbot of Qingliang Monastery, in the Prefecture of Jiankang, to which the elders from all quarters had come.<sup>46</sup> That these were “old associates” means they had once been guest and host or been

41 It springs from the crowns in all quarters (shohō chōnei jō chōshutsu 諸方頂額上跳出): Probably to be understood to mean, “[the great way] springs from the crown of the heads of [the assembled] masters from monasteries everywhere.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Crown of the head.”

42 the nostrils of Qingliang (Seiryō bikū ri 清涼鼻孔裏): I.e., Rujing's nostril. As Dōgen notes below, Rujing was at the time the abbot of the Qingliangsi 清涼寺. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose.”

43 Gautama's traitorous seed, Linji's disastrous embryo (Kudon zokushu, Rinzai katai 瞿曇賊種、臨濟禍胎): Teasing reference to the assembled inheritors of the legacy of Buddha Śākyamuni and Chan master Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄. The latter expression may reflect an exchange in the Linji lu 臨濟錄 (T.1985.47:497a2-3):

僧問、如何是劍刃上事。師云、禍事禍事。

A monk asked, “What is it at the edge of the sword?”

The Master [Linji] said, “Disaster, disaster.”

44 Ii! (ii 咦): An interjection (pronounced yi in Mandarin), typically indicating a laugh or expression of surprise or delight.

45 Everyone toppled over (taike tendō 大家顛倒): The term taike, translated here as “everyone,” can refer to a “great figure” or “great house”; or, as probably here, to the assembled audience. The term tendō 顛倒, translated as “toppled over,” is regularly used for mistaken views that are “upside down” (S. viparyasta). Hence, the image of everyone overturned can be read as Rujing's teasing of the entire assembly as misguided.

46 Qingliang Monastery (Seiryōji 清涼寺): In modern Jiangsu Province. Rujing became abbot there in 1210.

neighboring seats.<sup>47</sup> While from all quarters, they were thus his old friends; how could they not have been many? It was a time when they had assembled and requested a convocation. Elders completely lacking this talk were not his friends, were not numbered among those who requested [the lecture].<sup>48</sup> Though themselves great worthies, they attended him and requested [the lecture].

おほよそ先師の遍參は、諸方のきはむるところにあらず。大宋國二三百年来は、先師のごとくなる古佛あらざるなり。

In general, the extensive study of my former master was not something fulfilled by those from all quarters. In the last two or three hundred years in the Land of the Great Song, there have been no old buddhas like my former master.

[57:16] {2:117}

大道無門は、四五千條華柳巷、二三萬座管絃樓なり。しかあるを、渾身跳出するに餘外をもちいず、頂顙上に跳出するなり、鼻孔裏に入來するなり、ともにこれ參學なり。頂顙上の跳脱、いまだあらず、鼻孔裏の轉身、いまだあざるは、參學人ならず、遍參漢にあらず。遍參の宗旨、ただ玄沙に參學すべし。

“The great way has no gate” is “four or five thousand lanes of flowers and willows, twenty or thirty thousand pavilions of flutes and zithers.”<sup>49</sup>

47 guest and host (hinju 賓主); neighboring seats (rintan 隣單): The former term indicates the relationship between a visiting monk and an abbot respectively; the latter refers to assigned positions in the saṃgha hall.

48 completely lacking this talk (kon mu ko wa 渾無箇話): An unusual expression, not occurring elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings; presumably, those with nothing significant to say.

49 “four or five thousand lanes of flowers and willows, twenty or thirty thousand pavilions of flutes and zithers” (shigosen jō keryū kō, nisanman za kan genrō 四五千條華柳巷、二三萬座管絃樓): “Flower and willow” (keryū 華柳) evoke the pleasure quarters, and the two phrases together suggest an endless entertainment district. Dōgen is here quoting (with minor variation) the verse comment by Chan master Yuantong Xian 圓通僊 on a saying of Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 (778-897) recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:150, case 46):

趙州因僧問、如何是趙州。師曰、東門南門西門北門。僧曰、不問這箇。師曰、爾問趙州。響。

Zhaozhou was once asked by a monk, “What is Zhaozhou.”

The Master said, “East Gate, South Gate, West Gate, North Gate.”

The monk said, “I didn’t ask about that.”

The Master said, “You asked about Zhaozhou, right?”

Yuantong’s comment (at Chanzong songgu lianzhu tongji 禪宗頌古聯珠通集, ZZ.115:245a18-b1):

四門開豁往來遊。脚下分明到地頭。四五百條花柳巷。二三千處管絃樓。

Still, when the whole body springs forth, without using anything else, it springs forth from “the crowns,” it enters into “the nostril”; and both of these are study. One who has not sprung forth from “the crowns,” has not turned the body in “the nostril,” is not a person of study, is not a fellow of extensive study. We should just study with Xuansha the essential point of extensive study.

50 The Fourth Ancestor's spending nine years in study with the Third Ancestor (shiso katsute sanso ni sangaku suru koto kusai seshi 四祖かつて三祖に參學すること九載せし): i.e., the fourth Chinese ancestor, Daoxin 道信 (580-651), who is said to have studied with the Third Ancestor, Sengcan 僧璨 (d. 606), for nine years after his awakening at the age of fourteen (see Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:221c18-21). This section is lacking in the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō text.

51 Chan Master Yuan of Nanquan's staying at Chiyang (Nansen Gan zenji, sono kami chiyō ni ichijū shite 南泉願禪師、そのかみ池陽に一住して): i.e., Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-834), who is said to have entered Mount Nanquan, in Chiyang 池陽 (modern Anhui), in 795 and remained there for over thirty years (see Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:257b25-26).

52 Yunyan, Daowu, and others, making concentrated effort and studying during forty years at Yaoshan (Ungan Dōgo tō, zai Yakusan shijū nen no aida kufū sangaku suru 雲巖・道吾等、在藥山四十年のあひだ功夫參學する): Reference to Yunyan Tancheng 雲巖曇晟 (782-841) and Daowu Yuanzhi 道吾圓智 (769-835), who studied with Yaoshan Weiyuan 藥山惟儼 (751-834).

53 The study of the Second Ancestor at Songshan was eight years (niso, sono kami Sūzan ni sangaku suru koto hassai nari 二祖、そのかみ嵩山に參學すること八載なり): The second Chinese ancestor of Chan, Huike 慧可, who is held to have studied with Bodhidharma at Shaolin 少林 on Mount Song 嵩山 (in modern Henan).

he exhausted the extensive study of skin, flesh, bones, and marrow (hi niku kotsu zui

Extensive study is simply “just sitting” with “body and mind sloughed off.”<sup>54</sup> The present “going over there and coming over here,” as if there were no gap between them, is extensive study with the whole body, is the whole body of the great way.<sup>55</sup> “Walking atop the head of Vairocana” is “the insentient samādhi”; definitely “getting such” is the walking of Vairocana.<sup>56</sup>

o henzan shitsukusu 皮肉骨髓を遍參しつくす): Reference to the tradition that, at the time he was to choose a successor among his four disciples, Bodhidharma said of each in turn that he (or, in one case, she) had gotten his “skin,” “flesh,” “bones,” and, to Huike, “marrow.” Dōgen regularly uses the four-character phrase to refer to the essence of Zen tradition. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

54 “just sitting” with “body and mind sloughed off” (shikan taza, shinjin datsuraku 祇管打坐、身心脱落): Combining two famous lines that Dōgen attributes to Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Just sit,” and “Body and mind sloughed off.” This sentence is lacking in the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō text, which has at this point simply:

いままでも見一知識の風流聞一頭話の工夫みなこれよりするなり。

Even up till now, the tradition of seeing a wise friend, the concentrated effort of hearing a saying, have all derived from this.

55 “going over there and coming over here,” as if there were no gap between them (ko nahan ko rai shari rai, sono kenkyaku arazaru ga gotoku naru 去那邊去來遮裏來、その間隙あらざるがごとくなる): Likely reflecting the words of Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, in a lecture commemorating the construction of a bridge (Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:128a10-11):

56 “Walking atop the head of Vairocana” is “the insentient samādhi” (Biru chō jō gyō wa, mujō zanmai nari 毘盧頂上行は、無情三昧なり): The Buddha Vairocana often symbolizes the dharma, or “cosmic,” body of the buddha. The translation “insentient samādhi” follows Kawamura’s text, which has the unusual mujō 無情 (“insentient”), where other texts, including the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō version, have the more familiar mujō 無諍 (“unconflicted”; S. araṇa). The likely source for this phrase is a conversation between the Tang Emperor Suzong 肅宗 and Chan master Nanyang Huizhong 南陽慧忠 (d. 775) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:244c15-17):

又曰、如何は無諍三昧。師曰、檀越踏毘盧頂上行。曰、此意如何。師曰、莫認自己清淨法身。

[Suzong] said again, “What is the samādhi without conflict?”

The Master said, “The Dānapati [‘patron’; i.e., Suzong] treading atop the head of Vairocana.”

[Suzong] said, “What does this mean?”

Thoroughly to study the extensive study that “springs forth” — this is the bottle gourd springing forth from the bottle gourd; for long, “atop the head” of the bottle gourd has been made the practice place where the buddha is selected.<sup>57</sup> It is, “his life is like a thread”; it is the bottle gourd extensively studying the bottle gourd.<sup>58</sup> We have merely set up “one blade of grass” and taken it as extensive study.<sup>59</sup>

The Master said, “Don’t acknowledge your own pure dharma body.”

definitely “getting such” is the walking of Vairocana (ketsu toku inmo wa, Biru gyō nari 決得恁麼は、毘盧行なり): The expression Biru gyō 毘盧行 (“walking of Vairocana”) leaves unclear whether Vairocana is walking or someone is walking on Vairocana. The sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō text reads here “since you have got such” (ki toku inmo 既得恁麼), a phrase that suggests Dōgen may have had in mind the famous saying attributed to Yunju Daoying 雲居道膺 (d. 902); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Such a person.”

57 the bottle gourd springing forth from the bottle gourd (koro no koro o chōshutsu suru 葫蘆の葫蘆を跳出する): Likely an allusion to the saying by Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 much appreciated by Dōgen; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “The bottle gourd vine entwines the bottle gourd.”

practice place where the buddha is selected (senbutsu dōjō 選佛道場): An unusual expression, likely equivalent to the more common senbutsu jō 選佛場 (“site where a buddha is selected”), as given in the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō text.

58 “life is like a thread” (myō nyo shi 命如糸): Perhaps an indirect reference to the condition of having been selected as a buddha; likely an allusion to the warning of the Fifth Ancestor, Hongren 弘忍, to Huineng 慧能, upon the latter’s accession to the position of sixth ancestor, that he should go into hiding to avoid conflict (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:223a22-23):

所謂授衣之人命如懸絲也。

The person to whom the robe [of Bodhidharma] is said to have been transmitted — his life is as if hanging by a thread.

59 “one blade of grass” (ikkyō sō 一莖草): Likely reflecting a well-known Zen trope, invoked elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; that equates a single blade of grass with the sixteen-foot tall body of the buddha; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “One blade of grass.” This sentence does not occur in the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō text.

INTRODUCTION

This work bears a colophon, identical with that of the “Kajō” 家常 chapter, stating that it was produced in the winter of 1243-44, at Yamashibu 禪師峰 (or Zenji Peak), in Echizen. It represents number 58 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō, number 44 in the sixty-chapter compilation, and number 63 in the Honzan edition.

The essay proceeds by way of comments on nine sayings in the Chinese Chan literature involving the term ganzei 眼睛 (“eye” or “eyeball”), a word commonly used as metaphor for wisdom, as well as synecdoche for one possessed of wisdom. In his comments, Dōgen emphasizes an expanded sense of the term that includes “the mountains, rivers, and whole earth,” as well as the spiritual practices of those who “beg the eye” of the teacher.

Though Chan literature is littered with talk of “the eye,” in his choice of sayings on which to comment here, it is clear that Dōgen had in the mind the eye of his own teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, whose sayings dominate the text. Thus, like the “Baika” 梅華 chapter from the previous month, this work strongly suggests the degree to which Dōgen was focused on Rujing’s recorded sayings during this period.

眼睛

The Eye

[58:1] {2:118}

億千萬劫の參學を拈來して、團圓せしむるは、八萬四千の眼睛なり。

When we take up the study of kojis of thousands of myriads of kalpas and roll it up into a ball, it makes eighty-four thousand eyes.<sup>1</sup>

* * * * *

[58:2]

先師天童古佛、住瑞巖時、上堂示衆云、秋風清秋月明、大地山河露眼睛、瑞巖點睛重相見、棒喝交馳驗衲僧。

My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong, when residing at the Ruiyan Monastery, in a convocation, addressed the assembly, saying,<sup>2</sup>

The autumn breeze is pure; the autumn moon is bright;

The mountains, rivers, and the whole earth, exposed to the eye.

Ruiyan is blinded; we meet again.<sup>3</sup>

1 study of kojis of thousands of myriads of kalpas (oku senman gō no sangaku 億千萬劫の參學): I.e., the study [of Buddhism] over virtually innumerable æons; the time span here is a fixed expression for an enormous number.

eighty-four thousand eyes (hachiman shisen no ganzei 八萬四千の眼睛): The figure 84,000 is regularly used for the number of Buddhist teachings; hence, the implication here, “eyes that can perceive all the teachings.”

2 My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong (senshi Tendō kobutsu 先師天童古佛): I.e., Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227); served as abbot of the Ruiyansi 瑞巖寺 (in present-day Zhejiang province) before becoming abbot of Tiantongshan 天童山 (also in Zhejiang). His verse here is found at Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:126a3-4.

3 Ruiyan is blinded; we meet again (Zuigan tenkatsu jō shōken 瑞巖點睛重相見): A tentative translation. Rujing here refers to himself as head of the monastery. “Blinded” renders the unusual tenkatsu 點睛, which is variously interpreted (some, e.g., taking it to mean “to peer with one eye closed”) but generally understood to indicate transcendence of normal vision; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye.” The translation “we meet again” for jūshōken 重相見 assumes (with Dōgen’s commentary, below) that the verb is reciprocal (“we see each other again”); some would take it simply as “I see anew.”

Stick and shout one after another, testing the patch-robed monks.<sup>4</sup>

いま、衲僧を驗す、といふは、古佛なりや、と驗するなり。その要機は、棒喝の、交馳せしむるなり、これを點瞎とす。恁麼の見成活計は、眼睛なり。山河大地、これ眼睛露の朕兆不打なり。秋風清なり、一老なり。秋月明なり、一不老なり。秋風清なる、四大海も比すべきにあらず。秋月明なる、千日月よりもあきらかなり。清明は、眼睛なる山河大地なり。衲僧は、佛祖なり。大悟をえらばず、不悟をえらばず、朕兆前悟をえらばず、眼睛なるは、佛祖なり。驗は、眼睛露なり、瞎現成なり、活眼睛なり。相見は、相逢なり。相逢相見は、眼頭尖なり、眼睛霹靂なり。おほよそ、渾身はおほきに、渾眼はちひさかるべし、とおもふことなかれ。往往に老老大大なりとおもふも、渾身大なり、渾眼小なり、と解會せり。これ未具眼睛のゆえなり。

“Testing the patch-robed monk” here means to test whether he is an old buddha. Its essential function is the “stick and shout” coming “one after another” — this, he takes as “blinded.” A way of life like that expressed here is “the eye.” “The mountains, rivers, and the whole earth” — these are the non-occurrence of any portent of “exposed to the eye.”<sup>5</sup> “The autumn breeze is pure,” “one old”; “the autumn moon is bright,” “one not old.”<sup>6</sup> “The purity of the autumn breeze” cannot be compared even to the four great oceans; “the brightness of the autumn moon” is brighter than a thousand suns and moons.<sup>7</sup> Their “purity” and “brightness” are the “mountains and rivers” and “the whole earth” that are “the eye.” “The patch-robed monks” are the buddhas and ancestors. “The eye” that

4 Stick and shout (bōkatsu 棒喝): The Zen master’s classic pedagogic methods of beating and shouting at the student. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Staff.”

5 non-occurrence of any portent of “exposed to the eye” (ganzei ro no chinchō futa 眼睛露の朕兆不打): An awkward attempt to capture the phrasing of this difficult sentence; perhaps meaning something like, “[what exists] before the eye appears (or before what appears to the eye).” The unusual expression chinchō futa 朕兆不打 (“portent not happening”) is generally taken as equivalent to the common chinchō mibō 朕兆未萌 (“portent not yet germinated”).

6 “one old” (ich irō 一老); “one not old” (ichi furō 一不老): From the fixed phrase “one old, one not old” (ichirō ichi furō 一老一不老), used to express agelessness. Here, likely reflecting a verse by Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869) (Dongshan Wuben chanshi yulu 洞山悟本禪師語錄, T.1986A.47:510a19-20), quoted by Dōgen in his Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.3:226, no. 351):

道無心合人、人無心合道。欲識箇中意、一老一不老。

When the way is without mind, it matches the person;

When the person is without mind, they match the way.

If you want to know the point in this,

It’s one old, one not old.

7 four great oceans (shi daikai 四大海): Probably, the oceans on the four sides of Mount Sumeru in Buddhist cosmology.

does not choose great awakening, that does not choose non-awakening, that does not choose awakening prior to any portent — this is a buddha and ancestor. “Testing” is the “exposure” of “the eye,” is the occurrence of “blinded,” is the living “eye.” “Meeting” is encountering each other; encountering and meeting are the eye sharp, the eye thundering.<sup>8</sup> Do not think that, in general, the whole body is large, while the whole eye should be small. Even those thought to be of great age often understand the whole body to be great and the whole eye to be small.<sup>9</sup> This is because they are not yet endowed with the eye.

When Great Master Wuben of Dongshan was in the assembly of Yunyan, he came upon Yunyan making sandals.<sup>10</sup> The Master said to Yunyan, “I approached your Reverence to beg the eye.”

Yunyan said, “To whom did you give yours?”

Thus, fully manifest study is “begging the eye.” To pursue the way in

---

8 the eye sharp (gantō sen 眼頭尖): Here, probably not the common meaning “tip (corner) of the eye.”

9 Even those thought to be of great age (rōrō daidai nari to omou mo 老老大大なりとおもふも): The expression rōrō daidai 老老大大 occurs often in Zen texts, in the sense “old enough to know better.”

10 Great Master Wuben of Dongshan (Tōzan Gohon daishi 洞山悟本大師): I.e., Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价, disciple of Yunyan Tansheng 雲巖曇晟 (782-841). A slightly variant version of this conversation can be found at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:315b3-6.

the cloud hall, to attend lectures in the dharma hall and enter the room in the bed chambers, are “begging the eye.”<sup>11</sup> More generally, going along with the assembly to practice and coming along with the assembly to practice are in themselves “begging the eye.” The principle is clear that “the eye” is not one’s own and not another’s.

いはく、洞山すでに、就師乞眼睛、の請益あり。はかりしりぬ、自己ならんは、人に乞請せらるべからず、他己ならんは、人に乞請すべからず。汝底與誰去也、と指示す。汝底、の時節あり、與誰、の處分あり。某甲無、これ眼睛の自道取なり。かくのごとくの道現成、しづかに究理參學すべし。雲巖いはく、有向什麼處著。この道眼睛は、某甲無の無は、有向什麼處著なり、向什麼處著は、有なり、その慙麼道なり、と參究すべし。洞山無語、これ茫然にあらず、業識獨豎の標的なり。雲巖爲示するにいはく、乞眼睛底是眼睛否。これ點瞎眼睛の節目なり、活碎眼睛なり。いはゆる雲巖道の宗旨は、眼睛乞眼睛なり。水引水なり、山連山なり、異類中行なり、同類中生なり。洞山いはく、非眼睛。これ眼睛の自舉唱なり。非眼睛の身心・慮知・形段あらんところをば、自舉の活眼睛なりと相見すべきなり。三世諸佛は、眼睛の轉大法輪・說大法輪を立地聽しきたれり。畢竟じて參究する堂奥には、眼睛裏に跳入して、發心・修行・證大菩提するなり。この眼睛、もとよりこのかた、自己にあらず、他己にあらず。もろもろの罣礙なきがゆえに、かくのごとくの大事も罣礙あらざるなり。

It says that Dongshan has sought the benefit of approaching the teacher and begging the eye. Obviously, if it were one’s own, one would not be asked for it by someone else; and if it were another’s, one would not ask someone else for it. He is instructed, “To whom did you give yours?” There is a time that is “yours”; there is a way of dealing with it that is “to whom did you give it?”<sup>12</sup> “I don’t have it”: this is the eye itself speaking. We should quietly study and investigate the principle behind such a statement. Yunyan says, “You have it, but where did you put it?” The “eye” of these words, we should investigate as a saying such that the “don’t have” of “I don’t have it” is “you have it, where did you put it?” and the “where did you put it?” is “you have it.”<sup>13</sup> Dongshan “did not enter the room in the bed chambers (shindō ni nisshitsu suru 寢堂に入室する): I.e., seek instruction at the abbot’s private quarters, in the “parlor” where the abbot receives close friends and disciples.

12 there is a way of dealing with it that is “to whom did you give it?” (yo sui no shobun ari 與誰の處分あり): Or “there is a way of dealing with it that gives it to someone”; the translation tries to preserve Dōgen’s use of the original phrasing of Yunyan’s question.

13 The “eye” of these words, we should investigate as a saying such that the “don’t have” of “I don’t have it” is “you have it, where did you put it?” and the speak”: this is not because he was at a loss; it is a marker independently set up by his karmic consciousness.<sup>14</sup>

Yunyan instructed him, saying, “Begging the eye is the eye, isn’t it?” This is the juncture of “blinding” the eye; it is giving life to and smashing the eye. The essential point of what Yunyan says here is the eye “begging the eye”; it is water drawing water; it is mountains ranging across mountains; it is “moving among different types”; it is born among the same types.<sup>15</sup> Dongshan said, “It isn’t the eye.” This is the eye itself presenting its own song.<sup>16</sup> Where there are the body and mind, thought and shape of what “isn’t the eye,” we should see it as the living eye “presenting itself.” The buddhas of the three times have been standing and listening to the eye turning the great dharma wheel, preaching the great dharma wheel.<sup>17</sup> Ultimately, in the interior of the hall of our investigation, we spring into the eye and there bring forth the mind [of bodhi],

---

“where did you put it?” is “you have it” (kono dō ganzei wa, bōkō mu no mu wa, u kō jūmo sho chaku nari, kō jūmo sho chaku wa, u nari, sono inmo dō nari, to sankyū su beshi この道眼睛は、某甲無の無は、有向什麼處著なり、向什麼處著は、有なり、その恁麼道なり、と參究すべし): The translation struggles to reflect Dōgen’s retention of the Chinese phrases of his quotation; one possible paraphrase might be, “the eye Dongshan does not have is the very eye he put somewhere.”

14 a marker independently set up by his karmic consciousness (gosshiki dokuju no hyōteki 業識獨豎の標的): A tentative translation of an unusual phrase not occurring elsewhere; perhaps meaning something like, “an expression of the working of his mind” (i.e., an intentional gesture). For the term gosshiki 業識 (“karmic consciousness”), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Karmic consciousness.”

15 “moving among different types” (irui chū gyō 異類中行): An expression, occurring often in Dōgen’s writings, generally taken to indicate the salvific activities of the buddhas and bodhisattvas among the various forms of living beings; especially associated with a saying of Nanchuan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-834) found in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:154, case 57); see Supplementary Notes, s.v., “Move among different types.” “Born among the same types” (dōrui chū shō 同類中生) is Dōgen’s variant.

16 the eye itself presenting its own song (ji ko shō 自舉唱): Or “the eye itself singing its own praises.”

17 The buddhas of the three times have been standing and listening to the eye turning the great dharma wheel, preaching the great dharma wheel (sanze shobutsu wa, ganzei no ten dai hōrin setsu dai hōrin o ritchi chō shikitareri 三世諸佛は、眼睛の轉大法輪・說大法輪を立地聴きたれり): “To stand and listen” refers to the practice of the audience standing during a formal dharma talk. The sentence evokes a saying of Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 (835-905), on which Dōgen comments in his “Shōbōgenzō gyōbutsu iigi” 正法眼藏行佛威儀 (see Yuanwu Foguo chanshi yulu 圓悟佛果禪師語錄, T.1997.47:802b27-28; shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:270, case 287):

practice, and verify the great bodhi.<sup>18</sup> This eye is, from the beginning, not one's own, not another's. Since it is without any obstacles, a great matter such as this is also without obstacles.<sup>19</sup>

“The buddhas of the ten directions” he speaks of are “the eye”; “flowers in the eye” are “the buddhas of the ten directions.” Our present stepping forward and stepping back, sitting and sleeping, drawing on the eye's own power, are all like this, are all holding fast and letting go.<sup>21</sup>

18 in the interior of the hall of our investigation (sankyū suru dōō ni wa 参究する堂奥には): I.e., “at the deepest level of study.” The term dōō 堂奥 refers to the interior of the abbot's quarters, used metaphorically for the innermost recesses of the tradition; very common in Dōgen's writings.

19 a great matter such as this (kaku no gotoku no daiji かくのごとくの大事): Presumably, a reference to the great matter of “bringing forth the aspiration [for bodhi], practicing, and verifying the great bodhi.”

21 like this (inmo 恁麼): The antecedent of “this” is not clear; presumably, “flowers in the eye.”

holding fast and letting go (hajō hōgyō 把定・放行): An expression, often used by Dōgen, sometimes in reverse order, alluding to the teaching methods of the Zen master; perhaps reflecting a line by Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:122c18):

放行把住遑風流。

Letting go and holding on, full of style.

My former master, the Old Buddha said, “I gouge out Dharma’s eye, make a ball of mud, and hit people.”<sup>22</sup> Raising his voice, he said, “Look! The ocean, dried up right through to the bottom; the waves, so high they pound the heavens.”<sup>23</sup>

[58:10]

これは清涼寺の方丈にして、海衆に爲示するなり。しかあれば、打人といふは、作人といはんがごとし。打のゆえに、人人は箇の面目あり。たとへば、達磨の眼睛にて、人人をつくれりといふなり、つくれるなり。その打人の道理、かくのごとし。眼睛にて打生せる人人なるがゆえに、いま雲堂打人の拳頭、法堂打人の拄杖、方丈打人の竹篴拂子、すなはち達磨眼睛なり。達磨眼睛を抉出しきたりて泥彈子につくりて打人するは、いまの人、これを參請請益・朝上朝參・打坐功夫とらいふなり。打著什麼人、いわく、海枯徹底、浪高拍天なり。

This was instruction for the oceanic assembly, given in the abbot’s quarters at the Qingliang Monastery.<sup>24</sup> Thus, “to hit people” is like saying “to make people.” Because he hits them, each of the people has his or her own face. For instance, he is saying that he has made each of the people with Dharma’s eye; they have been made. Such is the principle of his “hitting people.” Because they are people born by the eye, the fist that now hits people in the cloud hall, the staff that hits people in the dharma hall, the bamboo staff and the whisk that hit people in the abbot’s quarters — these are “Dharma’s eye.”<sup>25</sup> Having gouged out Dharma’s eye, to make it into a ball of mud and hit people is what people today call “making inquiries and seeking benefit,” “attending morning convocations,” “sitting and making concentrated effort.”<sup>26</sup> Whom does

22 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): I.e., Dōgen’s teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨. Variant of remarks found in the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:121c12-13); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Gouge out Bodhidharma’s eye.”

23 “Look!” (chaku 著): The translation takes this verb in the sense chakugan 著眼 (“to look,” “to set one’s eye on”), a reading suggested by the Yulu 語錄 text (at T.2002A.48:121c13), which has kan 看 (“to look at,” “to regard”); others interpret chaku 著 in the sense “to hit”; hence, here, “a hit!”

24 oceanic assembly (kaishu 海衆): Dōgen introduces here a common term for the saṃgha, seen as a pure ocean, that plays on Rujing’s “ocean.”

Qingliang Monastery (Seiryōji 清涼寺): The monastery in modern Jiangsu province, where Rujing became abbot in 1210.

25 people born by the eye (ganzei nite tashō seru ninnin 眼睛にて打生せる人人): The translation loses Dōgen’s play with the element ta 打 (“to hit”), used as a verbal marker in tashō 打生 (“born”). Some texts read taza 打坐 (“to sit”) here; a version that would yield “people who have sat by means of the eye.”

26 “attending morning consultations” (chōjō chōsan 朝上朝參): An unusual expression; the meaning of chōjō 朝上 here is uncertain: some take it simply as “early morning”; others, as a reference to a formal convocation (jōdō 上堂) in the morning. By itself, he hit? It is, “the ocean, dried up to the bottom; the waves, so high they pound the heavens.”

“Awakened to the dawn star” is something said by a bystander at the very moment when “he lost the eye.” It is the “tangled vines” of “the whole body”; therefore, they easily “sprang out.” His seeking what he sought makes even its realization “nothing to seek”; and, even when not yet realized, he had “nothing to seek.”<sup>30</sup>

Briefly put, Gautama's "eye" was not just one, two, or three. Which is the eye he lost here? Perhaps he had an eye called "lost his eye." Going further, given such a context, he had an eye that was "just one branch of plum blossoms in the snow." It precedes the spring and reveals the mind of spring.<sup>32</sup>

The “diamond eyes” are “heavy rain for days on end,” are “opening up to great clear skies,” are “frogs croaking,” are “worms singing.” Because they are “never past,” they are “the old buddhas.”<sup>36</sup> Even if the old buddhas were past, it would not be the same as the past of those who are not old buddhas.

39 “seeing the mountain in the daylight” (nichiri kanzan 日裏看山): Perhaps meaning “as clear as seeing a mountain in broad daylight.” Likely reflecting the words of Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃 (864-949); see Supplementary Notes.

40 Such are the circumstances and the deportment in this (kono uchi no shōsoku igi, kaku no gotoshi このうちの消息威儀、かくのごとし): The antecedent of “in this” (kono uchi このうち) is unclear; perhaps, “the mountain” (“the circumstances”) and “seeing” (“the deportment”). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Deportment.”

41 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): From the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:124a1-4). The Jingcisi 淨慈寺, where Rujing served as abbot before his move to Tiantong, was a major monastery in Hangzhou 杭州, in present-day Zhejiang province.

42 With all my might, I take it away (jinjō nenkyaku 盡情拈却): Taking jinjō 盡情 in the common idiomatic sense, “whole-heartedly,” “completely,” etc.; traditionally read here more literally, as “having exhausted feelings.” The object of “take away” (nenkyaku 拈却) here is unclear; perhaps the whisk (or the subject of the whisk).

The “bumping into fences and bumping into walls” here is the whole fence bumping, the whole wall bumping; they have this “eye.”<sup>43</sup> “This morning” and “the second month,” as well as “the first,” are each individual instances of the “eye” — that is, are “the eye of the whisk.” Because it suddenly “leaps forth,” it is “this morning”; because it “swallows up heaven and earth” a thousand myriad times, it is “the second month; when he “takes it away with all his might” it is “the first.” Such is the life realized by the eye.

INTRODUCTION

This work bears a colophon, identical with that of the “Ganzei” chapter, stating that it was produced in January of 1244, at Yamashibu 禪師峰 (or Zenji Peak), in Echizen. It represents number 59 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō, number 43 in the sixty-chapter compilation, and number 64 in the Honzan edition.

The title of the essay, kajō 家常, rendered here “everyday matters,” is more literally something like “usual at home” — i.e., the quotidian life of the household. It is often, as here, applied to the daily fare of domestic cooking, as in the common expression “everyday tea and rice” (kajō sahan 家常茶飯). This use is well known in Zen texts from the saying, cited several times in the Shōbōgenzō, of the Song-dynasty master Furong Daokai 芙蓉道楷: “The intentions and the words of the buddhas and ancestors are like everyday tea and rice.” Beginning with this saying, Dōgen here takes up talk of “tea and rice” in the teachings of the Chan masters, including four examples from his own teacher, Tiantong Rujiing 天童如淨. In the end, he concludes, “the everyday matters of the buddhas and ancestors are only drinking tea and eating rice.”

おほよそ佛祖の屋裏には、茶飯これ家常なり。この茶飯の義、ひさしくつたはれて、而今の現成なり。このゆえに、佛祖茶飯の活計きたれるなり。

Within the house of the buddhas and ancestors, tea and rice are everyday matters.<sup>1</sup> The meaning of this tea and rice has long been passed on and is realized even now.<sup>2</sup> Therefore, the way of life of the tea and rice of the buddhas and ancestors has come down to us.

* * * * *

大陽山楷和尚、問投子云、佛祖意句、如家常茶飯。離此之餘、還有爲人言句也無。投子曰、汝道、寰中天子敕、還假禹湯堯舜也無。大陽擬開口。投子拈拂子掩師口曰、汝發意來時、早有三十棒分也。大陽於此開悟、禮拜便行。投子曰、且來闍梨。大陽竟不回頭。投子曰、子、到不疑之地耶。大陽以手掩耳而去。

Reverend Kai of Mount Dayang asked Touzi, “The intention and the words of the buddhas and ancestors are like everyday tea and rice. Apart from this, are there any other words to help people or not?”<sup>3</sup>

1 tea and rice are everyday matters (sahan kore kajō nari 茶飯これ家常なり): From the common expression “everyday tea and rice” (kajō sahan 家常茶飯), used for the “daily fare” of the home, what we might call “homestyle” cooking; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Everyday tea and rice.”

2 The meaning of this tea and rice (kono sahan no gi この茶飯の義): The Honzan edition has here the homophonous gi 儀 (“ritual,” “behavior,” etc.) — hence, “the practice of [taking] this tea and rice.”

3 Reverend Kai of Mount Dayang (Taiyōzan Kai oshō 大陽山楷和尚): I.e., Fulong Daokai 芙蓉道楷 (1043-1118); Mount Dayang 大陽山 is located in Yingzhou 郢州 in present-day Hubei province. His exchange with Touzi Yiqing 投子義青 (1032-1083) can be found in the Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要, ZZ.136:917a6-11; and Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:202, case 143). Some versions of the saying read “The words (gonku 言句) of the buddhas and ancestors.”

Touzi said, “Tell me, when the Son of Heaven, within his realm, issues a decree, does he rely on Yu, Tang, Yao, and Shun or not?”<sup>4</sup>

As Dayang was about to open his mouth, Touzi took up his whisk, covered the Master’s mouth, and said, “When you got the idea and came to me, you already deserved thirty blows.”

With this, Dayang had an awakening and, paying obeisance, went to leave.

Touzi said, “Ācārya, come back!”

Dayang did not look back.

Touzi said, “Has the young master reached a stage without doubts?”

しかあれば、あきらかに保任すべし、佛祖意句は、佛祖家常の茶飯なり。家常の麤茶淡飯は、佛祖意句なり。佛祖は、茶飯をつくる、茶飯、佛祖を保任せしむ。しかあれども、このほかの茶飯力をからず、このうちの佛祖力をつひやさざるのみなり。還假堯舜禹湯也無、の見示を功夫參學すべきなり。離此之餘、還有爲人言句也無、この問頭の頂額を參跳すべし。跳得也、跳不得也、と試參看すべし。

Thus, we should clearly maintain this: that “the intention and words of the buddhas and ancestors” are the everyday tea and rice of the buddhas and ancestors. The everyday fare of coarse tea and plain rice is “the intention and words of the buddhas and ancestors.” The buddhas and ancestors make tea and rice; tea and rice maintain the buddhas and ancestors. Nevertheless, it is not that they draw on the power of some other tea and rice, but they do not use up the power of the buddhas and ancestors within.<sup>5</sup> “Does he rely on Yu, Tang, Yao, and Shun or not?” We should make concentrated effort and study what this tells us. “Apart from this, are there any other words to help people or not?” We should

4 Yu, Tang, Yao, and Shun (U Tō Gyō Shun 禹湯堯舜): Four legendary emperors of early China. Yu and Tang were founders of the Xia and Shang dynasties, respectively; Yao and Shun were the last of the five emperors said to precede the Xia.

5 Nevertheless, it is not that they draw on the power of some other tea and rice, but they do not use up the power of the buddhas and ancestors within (shika are-domo, kono hoka no sahan riki o karazu, kono uchi no busso riki o tsuiyasazaru nomi nari しかあれども、このほかの茶飯力をからず、このうちの佛祖力をつひやさざるのみなり): A tentative translation of a sentence variously interpreted; taking the first clause to mean that, while “tea and rice maintain the buddhas and ancestors,” this does not mean that the tea and rice are other than the buddhas and ancestors; and taking the second clause to mean that, while “the buddhas and ancestors make tea and rice,” this does not require any special effort on their part.

study and spring forth from the head of this question.<sup>6</sup> We should try studying whether we can spring forth or not spring forth from it.

南嶽山石頭庵無際大師いはく、吾結草庵無寶貝、飯了從容圖睡快。

Great Master Wuji of the Shitou Hermitage on Mount Nanyue said,<sup>7</sup>

I built this thatched hut that has nothing of worth;

Finished my rice, I relaxed, figuring on a quick nap.

道來道去、道來去する飯了は、參飯佛祖意句なり。未飯なるは未飽參なり。しかあるに、この飯了從容の道理は、飯先にも現成す、飯中にも現成す、飯後にも現成す。飯了の屋裏に喫飯ありと錯認する、四五升の參學なり。

The words “finished my rice” that he says as he comes, says as he goes, says as he comes and goes, are “the intention and the words of a buddha and ancestor” who studies rice.<sup>8</sup> One who has not yet had his rice has not yet studied his fill. Nevertheless, the principle of this “finished my rice, I take it easy” is present before he has the rice, while he has the rice, and after he has the rice. Mistakenly to think that there is any having rice in the house where he has “finished his rice” is a study of four or five quarts.<sup>9</sup>

6 study and spring forth (sanchō 參跳): An unusual expression not encountered elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings; probably a combination of sangaku 參學 (“to study”) and chōshutsu 跳出 (“to spring forth”).

7 Great Master Wuji of the Shitou Hermitage on Mount Nanyue (Nangakusan Sekitōan Musai daishi 南嶽山石頭庵無際大師): I.e., Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (700-790). Mount Nanyue is located in present-day Hunan province. The quoted lines appear in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:461c9), as the opening lines of the Shitou heshang caoan ge 石頭和尚草庵歌, a verse quoted elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

8 “intention and words of a buddha and ancestor” who studies meals (sanpan busso iku 參飯佛祖意句): Some texts read here “the intention and words of a buddha and ancestor who has studied his fill” (sanpō busso iku 參飽佛祖意句), a version that uses a common expression for being fully trained in Buddhism in a play on “filling oneself” with rice, as seen again in the next sentence. For the sake of lexical continuity with “tea and rice,” the translation uses “rice” for the glyph 飯 throughout this chapter, though the word also carries the larger senses of “food” and “meal.”

9 Mistakenly to think that there is any having rice in the house where he has “finished his rice” is a study of four or five quarts (hanryō no okuri ni kippan ari to shakunin suru, shigo shō no sangaku nari 飯了の屋裏に喫飯ありと錯認する、四五升の參學なり): Probably meaning something like, “to think that the state of ‘having finished my rice’ concerns eating is a shallow understanding of Shitou’s words here.”

“Quart” translates shō 升, a dry measure (of rice, etc.) equal to one-tenth peck (to 斗).

10 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): I.e., Dōgen’s teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227); from the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:127b1-5). The same passage is quoted in “Shōbōgenzō hou” 正法眼藏鉢盂.

11 Baizhang (Hyakujō 百丈): I.e., Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 (749-814); his conversation occurs in several sources (see, e.g., Biyan lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:166c26-27).

12 “Daxiong Peak” (Daiyū hō 大雄峰): Another name for Mount Baizhang 百丈山, in present-day Jiangxi province.

13 Senior Seat Jing (Jō jōza 淨上座): A self-reference as abbot.

14 In the end, what is it? (hikkyō ikan 畢竟如何): Though this and the following sentence are treated here as Rujing’s final comment on the subject, they could as well be read as part of his answer to the question.

15 The Jinci pātra bowl: it has moved to Tiantong to have rice (Jinzu hou. Ika Tendō kippan 淨慈鉢盂。移過天童喫飯): A reference to Rujing’s relocation from his former post at Jingcisi 淨慈寺 to Tiantongshan 天童山, where his talk is taking place. “Pātra bowl” (hou 鉢盂) refers to the Buddhist alms bowl.

In the house of the buddhas and ancestors, there is always “the extraordinary matter”: it is “sitting alone on Daxiong Peak.” Even to encounter here “let this fellow sit there” — this is also “the extraordinary matter.” Going further, there is something even more extraordinary than that: it is “The Jinci pātra bowl has moved to Tiantong to have rice.” Each and every instance of “the extraordinary matter” is “having rice.” Thus, “sitting alone on Daxiong Peak” — this is “having rice.” The pātra bowl is used for having rice; what is used for having rice is the pātra bowl. Therefore, it is “the Jinci pātra bowl”; it is “to Tiantong to have rice.” There is knowing rice after being full; there is being full after having rice; there is being full of rice after knowing it; there is having rice after being full. Now, consider for the moment, what is the pātra bowl? I think it is not just wood; it is not black as lacquer. Is it dumb stone? Is it a man of iron?<sup>16</sup> It has no bottom; it has no nose. It swallows empty space in a single gulp, and empty space receives it with palms joined.

16 Is it dumb stone? Is it a man of iron? (ganseki naran ya, tekkan naran ya 頑石ならんや、鐵漢ならんや): “Dumb stone” (ganseki 頑石) recalls the common expression “the dumb stones nodded” (ganseki tentō 頑石點頭), from the legend that, when the monk Daosheng 道生 lectured on the Nirvāṇa Sūtra, the stones nodded in assent. “Man of iron” (tekkan 鐵漢) is a common Zen term, occurring frequently in Dōgen's writings, for the solid practitioner; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Man of iron.” Presumably, Dōgen is here simply playing with expressions including traditional materials from which the alms bowl was made: wood, lacquerware, stone, and iron.

饑來喫飯、困來即眠。愚人笑我、智乃知焉。

bellows spans the heavens."<sup>18</sup>

[59:9]

いはゆる飢來は、喫飯來人の活計なり。未曾喫飯人は、飢不得なり。しかあればしるべし、飢一家常ならんわれは、飯了人なりと決定すべし。困來は、困中又困なるべし、困の頂額上より全跳しきたれり。このゆえに、渾身の活計に都撥轉渾身せらるる而今なり。打眠は、佛眼・法眼・慧眼・祖眼・露柱燈籠眼を假借して、打眠するなり。

"When I get hungry" is the way of life of one who has "had rice"; one who has not "had rice" cannot be hungry. Thus, we should recognize that we for whom hunger is an everyday matter are definitely people who have "finished our rice." "When I get tired" is tiredness within tiredness; it has completely sprung forth from the crown of the head of tiredness. Therefore, it is the present in which the entire body is turned completely around by the way of life of the entire body. "I sleep" is to sleep by borrowing the buddha eye, the dharma eye, the wisdom eye, the ancestor eye, the pillar and lantern eye.<sup>19</sup>

先師古佛、ちなみに台州瑞巖寺より臨安府淨慈寺の請におもむきて、上堂にいはいく、半年喫飯坐鞞峰、坐斷煙雲千萬重、忽地一聲轟霹靂、帝鄉春色杏華紅。

My former master, the Old Buddha, having been invited to move from the Ruiyan Monastery in Taizhou to the Jingci Monastery in the Lin'an Prefecture, said in a convocation,<sup>20</sup>

18 "The bellows" (rohai 爐鞴): Used as a metaphor for what "fans the flames" of spiritual practice.

19 sleep by borrowing the buddha eye, the dharma eye, the wisdom eye, the ancestor eye, the pillar and lantern eye (butsugen hōgen egen sōgen rochū tōrō gen o keshaku shite, tamin suru 佛眼・法眼・慧眼・祖眼・露柱燈籠眼を假借して、打眠する): The first three eyes here belong to a standard hierarchy of "five eyes" in Buddhist literature: the physical eye of human vision, the deva eye of paranormal vision, the wisdom eye of the adept who recognizes emptiness, the dharma eye of the advanced bodhi-sattva, and the buddha eye of unsurpassed bodhi. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Eye." "Pillars and lanterns" (rochū tōrō 露柱燈籠), referring to the free-standing columns and the lanterns of monastic buildings, is an expression regularly used in Zen texts for the immediate surroundings of the phenomenal world (or of the monks' environment); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Pillars and lanterns."

20 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): A verse found in the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:123c6-8), from an address to community on the occasion of Rujing's departure for Jingcisi.

*For half a year, I had rice and sat at Man Peak;
 All clouds cut off — a thousand myriad layers.<sup>21</sup>
 Suddenly, a single sound, the clap of thunder;
 Spring colors of the capital — apricot blossoms of crimson.*

[59:11]

佛代化儀の佛祖、その化、みなこれ坐鞞峰喫飯なり。續佛慧命の參究、これ喫飯の活計見成なり。坐鞞峰の半年、これを喫飯いふ。坐斷する煙雲いくかさなりといふことをしらず。一聲の霹靂たとひ忽地なりとも、杏華の春色くれなゐなるのみなり。帝郷、といふは、いまの赤赤條條なり。これらの恁麼は、喫飯なり。鞞峰は、瑞巖寺の峰の名なり。

The buddhas and ancestors who engage in teaching in place of the Buddha — their teachings are all “sitting at Man Peak having rice.”<sup>22</sup> The investigation that continues the Buddha’s life of wisdom — this is the manifestation of the way of life of “having rice.” The “half year” of “sitting at Man Peak” — this, he calls “having rice.” There is no knowing how many layers of “clouds” are “cut off.” The “single sound” of “thunder” may be “sudden,” but the “spring colors” of “apricot blossoms” are just “crimson.” “The capital” means this present nakedness.<sup>23</sup> Such as these is “having rice.”<sup>24</sup> “Man Peak” is the name of the peak at Ruiyan Monastery.

* * * * *

21 Man Peak (Banpō 鞞峰): I.e., Ruiyansi, as Dōgen himself notes in his comment.

22 The buddhas and ancestors who engage in teaching in place of the Buddha (butsu dai kegi no busso 佛代化儀の佛祖): An odd phrase. The translation takes dai 代 here in the sense “to take the place of,” “to substitute for”; some take it in the sense “generation,” “age,” and read here “at the time of the Buddha.” “Engage in teaching” is a loose rendering of kegi 化儀, a technical term for the “manner of converting” a Buddhist audience.

23 this present nakedness (ima no shakushaku jōjō いまの赤赤條條): Variation on the colloquial seki jōjō 赤條條 (“stark naked”), perhaps to be interpreted here as each instance (jōjō 條條) of our present raw reality (shakushaku 赤赤).

24 Such as these is “having rice” (korera no inmo wa, kippan nari これらの恁麼は、喫飯なり): The antecedent of “these” (korera これら) here is not clear; it may be understood as the immediately preceding instances of “nakedness” or as the sentences of the paragraph as a whole.

先師古佛、ちなみに明州慶元府の瑞巖寺の佛殿にして示衆するにいはく、黄金妙相、著衣喫飯、因我禮彌。早眠晏起。咦。談玄說妙太無端、切忌拈華自熱瞞。

My former master, the Old Buddha, in the buddha hall of the Ruiyan Monastery in Qingyuan Prefecture in Mingzhou once addressed the assembly, saying,<sup>25</sup>

*The wondrous mark of gold —
Getting dressed and having rice.*<sup>26</sup>

*My obeisance to you —
Sleeping early and waking late.*

*Discussing the dark and talking of the wondrous, for no reason at all;

We should slip our burden right now.<sup>28</sup> “The wondrous mark of gold” means “getting dressed and having rice”; “getting dressed and having rice” is “the wondrous mark of gold.” Beyond this, do not grope for who is “getting dressed and having rice”; do not ask who is “the wondrous mark of gold.” When we act like this, this is a statement.<sup>29</sup> “My 25 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): From the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:125c11-12).

26 The wondrous mark of gold (ōgon myōsō 黄金妙相): Synecdoche for a buddha body, one of whose thirty-two physical marks is a golden-hued body.

Getting dressed and having rice (jakue kippan 著衣喫飯): Or (as rendered elsewhere in these translations) “wearing clothes and having meals,” a fixed expression for everyday life.

27 It's strictly forbidden to deceive oneself by taking up the flower (sekki nenge ji netsuman 切忌拈華自熱瞞): A sentence somewhat difficult to interpret; it can be understood to mean, “do not deceive yourself with regard to the legend that Buddha Śākyamuni held up a flower on Vulture Peak and silently transmitted the dharma to Mahākāśyapa.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Hold up a Flower.”

28 We should slip our burden (tōtanrai su beshi 透擔來すべし): An unusual expression not occurring elsewhere in Dōgen's writings; usually interpreted as “transcending the burden of our [limited] Buddhist commitments.”

29 When we act like this, this is a statement (kaku no gotoku sureba, kore dōjaku nari かくのごとくすれば、これ道著なり): The sense is uncertain; perhaps, “when we obeisance to you” is like this. It is, I have already had my rice; bow and have your rice. Because it is “strictly forbidden to take up the flower,” it is like this.

Reverend Daan, Chan Master Yuanzhi of Changqing Monastery in Fuzhou, in a convocation, addressed the assembly, saying,<sup>30</sup>

Daan stayed at Weishan for some thirty years, eating Weishan's rice and shitting Weishan's shit. I didn't study Weishan's Chan; I just watched over a single water buffalo.<sup>31</sup> If it strayed from the road into the grass, I would drag it out; if it damaged someone's crops, I would whip it. The discipline went on for a long time; how sad for it, having to take orders from someone. Now, it's changed into this white ox on open ground, always in front of me, everywhere exposed all day long; I can chase it off, and it still won't leave.<sup>32</sup>

あきらかにこの示衆を受持すべし。佛祖の會下に功夫なる三十來年は、喫飯なり、さらに雑用心あらず。喫飯の活計現成すれば、おのづから、看一頭水牯牛、の標格なり。

Clearly, we should receive and keep this address to the assembly. “Some thirty years” of concentrated effort in a community of the budget dressed and have rice” (or pay “my obeisance to you,” or “do not ask”), we are saying something (or expressing Rujing's words?).

31 Daan stayed at Weishan (Daian zai Isan 大安在瀉山): Daan speaks of himself in the third person. Weishan is Mount Dawei, in present-day Hunan, where Daan succeeded Weishan Lingyou 瀉山靈祐 (771-853).

32 white ox on open ground (roji byakugo 露地白牛): No doubt an allusion to the scene in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:12c13-23), in which a father, having enticed his children from their burning house (of saṃsāra) and seeing them now safely seated “in the open” (roji 露地) presents them with carts (the buddha vehicle) pulled by great “white oxen (byakugo 白牛).” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Burning house.”

dhas and ancestors was “having rice,” without any extraneous concerns. When the way of life of “having rice” is realized, naturally, “watching over a water buffalo” is its model.

Sanjūshichi hon bodai bunpō

INTRODUCTION

This work, one of the longer texts of the Shōbōgenzō, was composed in the spring of 1244, at Kippōji in Echizen. It represents number 60 in the seventy-five-chapter compilation and number 72 in the Honzan edition (or 73 in the Iwanami and Shūmichō versions). It is not included in the sixty-chapter compilation but is found in the twenty-eight text Himitsu collection, where it is listed as number 11 of fascicle 1.

The essay is noteworthy on at least two grounds. The first is its title theme. The thirty-seven factors of awakening (bodhi-pāṣika-dharma) is a venerable set of (sometimes overlapping) lists of spiritual desiderata found throughout Buddhist literature. As such, it represents precisely the sort of conservative Buddhist teaching often dismissed by the Zen masters; and, indeed, one does not normally find the list treated in the discourse of these masters. Here, however, Dōgen takes up the individual members of the list and treats them as if they were Zen teachings, providing each factor with comments in the language of the masters.

A second noteworthy feature of the essay is its strong dismissal of lay life as a vehicle for Buddhist awakening. In his treatment of the topic of right action, Dōgen departs from his practice of providing brief Zen comments on each factor and launches into an extended argument, covering over one-third of the text, for the superiority of the renunciant life. He is adamant in his denial that any lay person — even such famous laymen as Bodhisattva Vimalakīrti or Layman Pang Yun 龐蘊居士 — ever achieved an awakening; and he is scathing in his criticism of Zen masters who deny the spiritual difference between the householder and the monastic, calling them “evil dogs” that seek only to gain favor with the laity. In this section, and in this essay as a whole, we see a fascinating combination of radical and conservative elements in Dōgen’s Buddhism.

The Thirty-seven Factors of Bodhi

[60:1] {2:130}

古佛の公案あり、いはゆる三十七品菩提分法の教・行・證なり。昇降階級の葛藤する、さらに葛藤公案なり。喚作諸佛なり、喚作諸祖なり。

There is a kōan of the old buddhas: the teaching, practice, and verification of the thirty-seven factors of bodhi.<sup>1</sup> The entangling of the ascent and descent of their stages is a further kōan of entanglement.<sup>2</sup> They are called “the buddhas”; they are called “the ancestors.”

* * * * *

四念住、四念處とも稱す。

The four abodes of mindfulness (also called the four bases of mindfulness):<sup>3</sup>

1 kōan of the old buddhas (kobutsu no kōan 古佛の公案): Or “a kōan of the old Buddha” (i.e., Śākyamuni); the plural can refer to the seven buddhas of the past or, in Dōgen’s usage, to any of those in the lineage of the buddhas and ancestors. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Old buddha.”

2 thirty-seven factors of bodhi (sanjūshichi hon bodai bunpō 三十七品菩提分法): S. saptatrimśad-bodhi-pakṣikā-dharmāḥ; a venerable listing, found throughout the Buddhist canon, of seven (sometimes overlapping) sets of spiritual desiderata: (1) the four abodes of mindfulness (shinenjū 四念住; S. smṛty-upasthāna), (2) the four right abandonments (shishōdan 四正斷; S. samyak-prahāṇa), (3) the four bases of spiritual power (shijinsoku 四神足; S. rddhi-pāda), (4) the five faculties (gokon 五根; S. indriya), (5) the five powers (goriki 五力; S. bala), (6) the seven limbs of awakening (shichikakushi 七覺支; S. bodhyāṅga), and (7) the eightfold path (hasshōdō 八正道; S. mārga).

The entangling of the ascent and descent of their stages (shōkō kaikyū no kattō suru 昇降階級の葛藤する): “Entangling” here renders the verbal form of the term kattō 葛藤, for which, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Tangled vines.” The “steps,” or “stages” (kaikyū 階級), may refer to the members of the list of factors or to the stages of teaching, practice, and verification.

3 four abodes of mindfulness (shi nenjū 四念住): The first set of the thirty-seven factors of bodhi. The “four bases of mindfulness” (shi nenjo 四念處) represents an earlier translation of the Sanskrit smṛty-upasthāna. (The parenthetical remark is in the original.)

一者、觀身不淨。二者、觀受是苦。三者、觀心無常。四者、觀法無我。

1. Observing the body as impure; 2. observing sensation as suffering; 3. observing the mind as impermanent; and 4. observing the dharmas as without self.<sup>4</sup>

觀身不淨といふは、いまの觀身の一袋皮は、盡十方界なり。これ眞實體なるがゆえに、活路に跳跳する、觀身不淨なり。不跳ならんは、觀不得ならん、若無身ならん、行取不得ならん、説取不得ならん、觀取不得ならん。すでに觀得の現成あり、しるべし、跳跳得なり。いはゆる觀得は、毎日の行履、掃地・掃床なり。第幾月を舉して掃地し、正是第二月を舉して掃地・掃床するゆえに、盡大地の恁麼なり。

“Observing the body as impure”: the bag of skin of the body observed here is “all the worlds in the ten directions.”<sup>5</sup> Because it is “the true body,” its skipping along the life-saving path is “observing the body as impure.”<sup>6</sup> Were it not skipping, it could not be observed; it would be as if there were no body: it could not be practiced; it could not be talked of; it could not be observed.<sup>7</sup> That it can be observed definitely occurs; so we know that it can skip along. The words “can be observed” refer to everyday conduct — sweeping the ground, sweeping the platforms. We

4 1. Observing the body as impure (issha, kan shin fujō 一者、觀身不淨): Dōgen gives here the standard list of four objects of mindfulness, central to some systems of vipāśyanā practice: body (shin 身; S. kāya), sensation (ju 受; S. vedanā), mind (shin 心; S. citta), and dharma (hō 法); said to overcome, respectively, the four “inverted” (tendō 顛倒; S. viparyasta) views: purity (jō 淨; S. śubha), pleasure (raku 樂; S. sukha), permanence (jō 常; S. nitya), and self (ga 我; S. ātman).

5 “all the worlds in the ten directions” (jīn jippō kai 盡十方界): Given the expression “the true body” (shinjitsu tai 眞實體) in the following sentence, Dōgen is likely recalling here the words of Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 (835-908) recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:196, case 131) and quoted elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “True human body.”

6 its skipping along the life-saving path is “observing the body as impure” (katsuro ni chōchō suru, kan shin fujō nari 活路に跳跳する、觀身不淨なり): Following Kawamura’s punctuation after suru. The phrase could also be parsed, “it is an ‘observing the body as impure’ that skips along the life-saving path.” The verb chōchō 跳跳 (“to skip”), found in several Zen texts, does not occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō. The expression katsuro 活路 (“life-saving path” — i.e., “escape route”) occurs quite often in Dōgen’s writing; often taken as “vital path.”

7 it could not be practiced; it could not be talked of (gyōshu futoku naran, sesshu futoku naran 行取不得ならん、説取不得ならん): Perhaps reflecting the words, quoted elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, of Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869) (see, e.g., shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:164, case 77):

説取行不得底、行取説不得底。

I talk of what can’t be practiced and practice what can’t be talked of.

take up “what number moon” and sweep the ground; we take up “truly, this is the second moon” and sweep the ground, sweep the platforms.<sup>8</sup> Therefore, all the whole earth is like this.<sup>9</sup>

観身は身観なり、身観にて餘物観にあらず、正當観は卓卓來なり。身観の現成するとき、心観すべて摸未著なり、不現成なり。しかあるゆえに、金剛定なり、首楞嚴定なり、ともに観身不淨なり。

“Observing the body” is the body observing; it is the body that observes, not something else observing. Precisely such observation stands out: when observation by the body occurs, observation by the mind is nowhere to be found, does not occur.<sup>10</sup> Therefore, it is the diamond concentration, it is the śūraṃgama concentration; both are “observing the body as impure.”<sup>11</sup>

8 “what number moon” (daiiku getsu 第幾月); “truly, this is the second moon” (shō ze daini getsu 正是第二月): Reflecting a conversation between Yunyan Tansheng 雲巖曇晟 (782-841) and fellow student Daowu Yuanzhi 道吾圓智 (769-835) that is recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:166, case 83):

潭州雲巖山曇晟禪師〈嗣藥山〉一日掃地次、道吾曰、太區區生。師云、有不區區者。吾曰、恁麼則有第二月也。師豎起掃帚云、這箇是第幾月。吾休去。

Chan Master Tansheng of Mount Yunyan in Tanzhou (succeeded Yaoshan) was sweeping one day, when Daowu said, “How attentive!”

The Master said, “There’s one who’s not attentive.”

Wu said, “If so, there’s a second moon.”

The Master stood up his broom and said, “What number moon is this?”

Wu desisted.

The phrase “truly, this is the second moon” (shō ze daini getsu 正是第二月) comes from a comment on this conversation by Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 (see Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:315b1).

9 all the whole earth is like this (jin daichi no inmo nari 盡大地の恁麼なり): The antecedent of “like this” (inmo 恁麼) is unclear; and it is possible to read the phrase, “it [i.e., the ‘sweeping’] is the whole earth just as it is.”

10 nowhere to be found (mo mijaku 摸未著): A loose rendering of the idiom “to grope for but not touch.”

11 diamond concentration (kongō jō 金剛定); śūraṃgama concentration (shuryōgon jō 首楞嚴定): Two widely celebrated states of samādhi, neither of which is ordinarily associated with the four abodes of mindfulness. The former, the vajra-samādhi (or vajropama-samādhi) is identified in some literature as the trance from which one enters directly into nirvāṇa (or buddhahood); the latter, “the samādhi of the heroic march,” the subject of the Śūraṃgama-samādhi sūtra, is said to lead all beings to buddhahood.

おほよそ、夜半見明星の道理を觀身不淨といふなり、淨穢の比論にあらず。有身是不淨なり、現身便不淨なり。かくのごとくの參學は、魔作佛のときは、魔を拈じて降魔し作佛す、佛作佛のときは、佛を拈じて圖佛し作佛す、人作佛のときは、人を拈じて調人し作佛するなり。まさに拈處に通路ある道理を參究すべし。

In sum, the principle of seeing the dawn star in the middle of the night is called “observing the body as impure.”<sup>12</sup> It is not an issue of comparing purity and impurity. Having a body is impure; manifesting a body is impure.<sup>13</sup> In such study, when a demon becomes a buddha, in taking up the demonic, it subjugates the demonic and becomes a buddha; when a buddha becomes a buddha, taking up buddhahood, it figures on buddhahood and makes a buddha; when a human becomes a buddha, in taking up humanity, it tames its humanity and becomes a buddha.<sup>14</sup> We should investigate the principle that there is a passage in what is taken up.<sup>15</sup>

たとへば、浣衣の法のごとし。水は衣に染汚せられ、衣は水に浸却せらる。この水を用著して浣洗し、この水を換却して浣洗すといへども、なほこれ水をもちいる、なほこれ衣をあらふなり。一番洗・兩番洗に見淨ならざれば、休歇に滯累することなかれ。水盡更用水なり、衣淨更浣衣なり。水は、諸類の水、ともにもちいる、洗衣によろし。水濁知有魚の道理を參究するなり。衣は、諸類の衣、ともに浣洗あり。慙麼功夫して、浣衣公案現成なり。しかあれども、淨潔を見取るなり。この宗旨、かならずしも衣を水に浸却するを本期とせず、水の、ころもに染却するを本期とせず。染汚水をもちみて衣を浣洗するに、浣衣の本期あり。さらに、火・風・土・水・空を用著して衣をあらひ、物をあらふ法あり、地・水・火・風・空をもちて、地・水・火・風・空をあらひきよむる法あり。

12 seeing the dawn star in the middle of the night (yahan ken myōjō 夜半見明星): Despite the temporal incongruity, a common expression for the moment in which Sid-dhārtha, upon seeing Venus in the dawn sky, became a buddha.

13 Having a body is impure; manifesting a body is impure (u shin ze fujō nari, gen shin ben fujō nari 有身是不淨なり、現身便不淨なり): I.e., “impurity” is being embodied. For some reason, Dōgen has put these phrases in Chinese, though they do not appear to be quotations.

14 In such study (kaku no gotoku no sangaku wa かくのごとくの參學は): I.e., when we understand “impurity” in this way (as the state of being embodied).

it figures on buddhahood and makes a buddha (zubutsu shi sabutsu su 圖佛し作佛す): Allusion to the words of Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709-788), “I’m figuring to make a buddha” (zu sabutsu 圖作佛), which Dōgen will evoke again below, section 24.

15 there is a passage in what is taken up (nensho ni tsūro aru 拈處に通路ある): I.e. (as in the three preceding examples), it is by taking up what one is that one becomes a buddha.

For instance, it is like the way we wash our robes. The water is dirtied by the robe, and the robe is soaked by the water. We may use this water to wash it and change this water to wash it, but we are still using the water and still washing the robe. If it does not look clean after the first or second washing, do not stop and put it off. It is, when the water is used up, we use more water; it is, when the robe is clean, we still wash the robe.<sup>16</sup> As for water, we use the water of various types, all of which are good for washing robes.<sup>17</sup> It is the investigation of the principle that, when the water is muddied, you know there are fish.<sup>18</sup> As for the robes, the robes of various types all get washed. With concentrated effort like this, the kōan of washing the robe is manifest. Yet, we see cleanliness.<sup>19</sup> The essential point of this is that soaking the robe in water is not necessarily what we want, and dirtying the water with the robe is not what we want; what we want in washing the robe is to wash the robe using the dirty water. Going further, there is a way of washing the robe, of washing things, using fire, wind, earth, water, and space; there is a way of washing and purifying earth, water, fire, wind, and space with earth, water, fire, wind, and space.<sup>20</sup>

いまの観身不淨の宗旨、またかくのごとし。これによりて蓋身・蓋観・蓋不淨、すなはち嬢生袈裟なり。袈裟、もし嬢生袈裟にあらざれば、佛祖いまだもちいざるなり、ひとり商那和修のみならんや。この道理、よくよくこころをとめて參學究盡すべし。

The essential point of “observing the body as impure” here is also like this. According to this, the entire body, the entire observation, and the 16 It is, when the water is used up, we use more water; it is, when the robe is clean, we still wash the robe (sui jin kō yō sui nari, e jō kō kan e nari 水盡更用水なり、衣淨更浣衣なり): Phrases put in Chinese, though probably not a quotation.

17 water of various types (shorui no mizu 諸類の水): Perhaps reflecting the common Buddhist trope of “one water and four views” (issui shiken 一水四見): devas see water as jewels (or jeweled ground), humans as water, pretas (“hungry ghosts”) as pus and blood, fish as a dwelling.

18 when the water is muddied, you know there are fish (sui joku chi u gyo 水濁知有魚): Another phrase in Chinese, likely reflecting the fixed saying, “when the fish moves, the water is muddied” (yu xing shui zhao 魚行水濁).

19 Yet, we see cleanliness (shika aredomo, jōketsu o kenshu suru nari しかあれども、淨潔を見取するなり): The thrust of the adversative “yet” (shika aredomo しかあれども) here is unclear; perhaps, “despite the variety of water and robe mentioned here, we can apprehend the meaning of ‘cleanliness’ in the kōan of washing the robe.”

20 fire, wind, earth, water, and space (chi sui ka fū kū 地・水・火・風・空): The five primary elements (godai 五大) of Buddhist physics; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four elements and five aggregates.”

entire impurity are the kāṣāya born of mother.<sup>21</sup> If the kāṣāya were not the kāṣāya born of mother, the buddhas and ancestors would not use it. Could Śaṇavāsa be the only one? This principle, we should fix our minds on, study, and exhaustively investigate.

觀受是苦といふは、苦これ受なり。自受にあらず、他受にあらず、有受にあらず、無受にあらず。生身受なり、生身苦なり。甜熟苳を苦葫蘆に換却するをいふ、これ皮肉骨髓ににがきなり、有心・無心等ににがきなり、これ一上の神通修證なり、徹蒂より跳出し、連根より跳出する神通なり。このゆえに、將謂衆生苦、更有苦衆生なり。衆生は自にあらず、衆生は他にあらず。更有苦衆生、つひに瞞他不得なり。甜苳徹蒂甜、苦匏連根苦なりといへども、苦、これをたやすく摸索著すべきにあらず。自己に問著すべし、作麼生是苦。

“Observing sensation as suffering” means that suffering is sensation. It is not one’s own sensation, not another’s sensation; it is not having sensation, not lacking sensation.<sup>22</sup> It is the sensation of a birth body; it is the suffering of a birth body.<sup>23</sup> It means the sweet, ripe melon is replaced by the bitter gourd: it is bitter to skin, flesh, bones, and marrow; it is bitter equally in states with mind and without mind; it is the practice and verification of “a higher spiritual power.”<sup>24</sup> It is the spiritual power that

21 kāṣāya born of mother (jō shō kesa 孃生袈裟): Allusion to the legend, recorded in Xuanzang’s 玄奘 Datang xiyu ji 大唐西域記 (T.2087.51:873b28-c5), that the Third Ancestor, Śaṇavāsa, was born wearing a miraculous robe, which enlarged as he grew, became a monk’s habit when he left home, and a nine-panel saṃghātī robe when he took the full precepts.

22 not having sensation, not lacking sensation (uju ni arazu, muju ni arazu 有受にあらず、無受にあらず): Or, perhaps, “not an existent sensation, not a non-existent sensation.”

23 birth body (shōshin 生身): i.e., the body into which one is born.

24 the sweet, ripe melon is replaced by the bitter gourd (tenjuku ka o ku koro ni kankyaku suru 甜熟苳を苦葫蘆に換却する): The translation loses the play on the word ku 苦, used for both “suffering” and “bitter.” Dōgen alludes here to the saying he will quote just below:

甜苳徹蒂甜、苦匏連根苦。

The sweet melon is sweet through to its stem; the bitter gourd is bitter all the way to its root.

The saying, more often in reverse order, occurs with some frequency in Zen texts; it is perhaps especially associated with Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤 (1063–1135) (see, e.g., Yuanwu Foguo chanshi yu lu 圓悟佛果禪師語錄, T.1997.47:720b23–24).

bitter equally in states with mind and without mind (ushin mushin tō ni nigaki nari 有心・無心等ににがきなり): Taking tō 等 here as hitoshiku (“equally”), rather than nado (“etc.”). The contrasting pair ushin 有心 and mushin 無心 can indicate respectively (a) “conscious” and “unconscious,” (b) “discriminating consciousness” and “nondiscriminating consciousness,” or (c) “intentional” and “unintentional.”

springs forth from “through to the stem,” that springs forth from “all the way to its root.”<sup>25</sup>

Therefore, it is, “I thought that living beings suffer; and now there are suffering living beings.”<sup>26</sup> “Living beings” are not self; “living beings” are not other. “Now there are suffering living beings” is, in the end, “it can’t deceive anyone.”<sup>27</sup> Although it may be that “the sweet melon is sweet through to its stem, and the bitter gourd is bitter all the way to its root,” the bitterness is not easily to be found. We should ask ourselves, “What is bitterness?”<sup>28</sup>

観心無常は、曹溪古佛いはく、無常者即佛性也。しかあれば、諸類の所解する無常、ともに佛性なり。

“Observing the mind as impermanent.” The Old Buddha of Caoxi said, “Impermanence is the buddha nature.”<sup>29</sup> Thus, the impermanence understood by various types is equally buddha nature.

Great Master Zhenjue of Yongjia said, practice and verification of “a higher spiritual power” (ichijō no jinzū shushō 一上の神通修證): Likely recalling the saying of Weishan Lingyu 潯山靈祐 (771-853) that his disciple Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂 (803-887) had performed “a higher spiritual power” (yishang shentong 一上神通) by bringing him a wash basin and towel. (See, e.g., shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:158, case 61; discussed in “Shōbōgenzō jinzū” 正法眼藏神通.)

25 “through to the stem” (tettai 徹蒂); “all the way to its root” (renkon 連根): Again, from the saying, introduced just below, on the melon and gourd.

26 “I thought that living beings suffer; and now there are suffering living beings” (shōi shujō ku, kō u ku shujō 將謂衆生苦、更有苦衆生): An expression coined by Jingqing Daofu 鏡清道忞 (864-937) (see, e.g., Biyan lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:182c3); generally taken to mean that suffering and living beings are equivalent.

27 “it can’t deceive anyone” (man ta futoku 瞞他不得): Perhaps meaning “it is what it is” or “it is true to itself”; likely an allusion to the saying of Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744) about a bronze mirror recast as an image (e.g., at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:188-190, case 116):

雖不鑑照、瞞他一點也不得。

“Even though it doesn’t reflect, it can’t deceive anyone even one jot.”

28 “What is bitterness?” (somosan ze ku 作麼生是苦): Or “what is suffering?”

29 “The Old Buddha of Caoxi” (Sōkei kobutsu 曹溪古佛): I.e., the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能. His saying occurs at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:239a2.

Compounded things are impermanent; all are empty.<sup>30</sup>

いまの観心無常、すなはち如來大圓覺なり、大圓覺如來なり。心、もし不観ならんとするにも隨他去するがゆえに、心、もしあれば観もあるなり。おほよそ無上菩提にいたり、無上正等覺の現成、すなはち無常なり、観心なり。心かならずしも常にあらず、離四句、絶百非なるがゆえに、牆壁瓦礫・石頭大小、これ心なり、これ無常なり、すなはち観なり。

“Observing the mind as impermanent” here is “the great perfect awakening of the Tathāgata,” is the Tathāgata of great perfect awakening. Even if we say the mind is not observing, since it “goes along with it,” when there is mind, there is also observing.<sup>31</sup> In sum, reaching unsurpassed bodhi, the realization of unsurpassed, perfect awakening, is “impermanence,” is “observing the mind.” “The mind” is not necessarily permanent: because it is “free from the four propositions and cuts off the hundred negations,” “fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles,” stones big and small — these are “the mind,” these are “impermanent,” are “observing.”<sup>32</sup>

30 Great Master Zhenjue of Yongjia (Yōka Shinkaku daishi 永嘉眞覺大師): I.e., Yongjia Xuanjue 永嘉玄覺 (665–713). His words come from the Zhengdao ge 證道歌, traditionally attributed to him (T.2014.48:495c19-20).

31 “goes along with it” (zui ta ko 隨他去): Likely reflecting the recommendation of Dasui Fazhen 大隋法眞 (834-919) to go along with “this” (shako 這箇) when it is destroyed with the chiliocosm at the end of a kalpa. (See below, section 84.)

32 “free from the four propositions and cuts off the hundred negations” (ri shiku, zetsu hyappi 離四句、絶百非): A common Zen expression. The “four propositions” (S. catuskoṭi) refers to the classical technique in Buddhist rhetoric that discusses a topic from four perspectives: true, not true, both true and not true, neither true nor not true. “The hundred negations” refers to the refutation of all of an opponent’s claims. Together, the two terms suggest the practice of reasoning and argumentation.

“fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles” (shō heki ga ryaku 牆壁瓦礫): An expression, appearing often in Dōgen’s writing, attributed to Nanyang Huizhong 南陽慧忠 (d. 775), as a definition of “the buddha mind.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles.”

stones big and small (sekitō dai shō 石頭大小): Likely reflecting a saying attributed to Guizong Daoquan 歸宗道詮 (930-985) (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:403b10-12):

問、九峯山中還有佛法也無。師曰、有。曰、如何是九峯山中佛法。師曰、山中石頭大底大小底小。

[A monk] asked, “Does the buddha dharma exist on Mount Jiufeng?”

The Master [Daoquan] said, “It does.”

He asked, “What is the buddha dharma on Mount Jiufeng?”

The Master said, “The bigness of the stones on the mountain is big, the smallness is small.”

観法無我は、長者長法身、短者短法身なり。現成活計なるがゆえに無我なり。狗子佛性無なり、狗子佛性有なり、一切衆生無佛性なり、一切佛性無衆生なり、一切諸佛無衆生なり、一切諸佛無諸佛なり、一切佛性無佛性なり、一切衆生無衆生なり。かくのごとくなるがゆえに、一切法無一切法を、観法無我と參學するなり。しるべし、跳出渾身自葛藤なり。

“Observing the dharmas as having no self” is the long one is a long dharma body; the short one is a short dharma body.<sup>33</sup> It is “no self” because it is the way of life actually realized.<sup>34</sup> It is the “no” of the dog’s buddha nature; it is the “yes” of the dog’s buddha nature.<sup>35</sup> It is “all living beings have no buddha nature”; it is all buddha nature has no living beings; it is all the buddhas have no living beings; it is all the buddhas have no buddhas; it is all buddha nature has no buddha nature; it is all living beings have no living beings.<sup>36</sup> Since it is like this, we study all dharmas have no dharmas as “observing the dharmas as having no self.” We should recognize that it is “the whole body that springs forth is itself tangled vines.”<sup>37</sup>

33 the long one is a long dharma body; the short one is a short dharma body (chōsha chō hosshin, tansha tan hosshin 長者長法身、短者短法身): I.e., whether long or short, it is the dharma body of the buddha; a fixed phrase, found in a number of Zen texts, to which Dōgen also refers elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

34 the way of life actually realized (genjō kakkei 現成活計): Or, perhaps, “the realized way of life”; an unusual expression, the reverse of which — kakkei genjō 活計現成 (“realization of a way of life”) does occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

35 It is the “no” of the dog’s buddha nature; it is the “yes” of the dog’s buddha nature (kushi busshō mu nari, kushi busshō u nari 狗子佛性無なり、狗子佛性有なり): The translation assumes that the unexpressed subject here and in the following is “no self” (muga 無我); hence, the mu 無 (“no”) in that expression is equivalent to Zhaozhou’s 趙州 famously answering both “no” (mu 無) and “yes” (u 有) to the question of whether the dog has the buddha nature — sayings discussed at length in “Shōbōgenzō busshō” 正法眼藏佛性.

36 “all living beings have no buddha nature” (issai shujō mu busshō 一切衆生無佛性): A saying attributed to Weishan Lingyu 滙山靈祐; see, e.g., shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:188, case 115). The variations on the saying here are Dōgen’s invention.

37 “the whole body that springs forth is itself tangled vines” (chōshutsu konjin ji kattō 跳出渾身自葛藤): Variant of a verse, quoted in “Shōbōgenzō ganzei” 正法眼藏眼晴, by Dōgen’s teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227), in reference to Buddha Śākyamuni (Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:122b14-15):

六年落草野狐精、跳出渾身是葛藤。

For six years, a fox spirit, lurking in the grass;

The whole body that sprang forth was tangled vines.

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Tangled vines,” and “Eye.”

[60:14]

釋迦牟尼佛言、一切諸佛菩薩、長安此法、爲聖胎也。

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “All the buddhas and bodhisattvas regard long repose in this teaching as the womb of the sages.”<sup>38</sup>

[60:15]

しかあれば、諸佛菩薩、ともにこの四念住を聖胎とせり。しるべし、等覺の聖胎あり、妙覺の聖胎あり。すでに一切諸佛菩薩とあり、妙覺にあらざらん諸佛も、これを聖胎とせり。等覺よりさき、妙覺よりほかに超出せる菩薩、またこの四念住を聖胎とするなり。まことに諸佛諸祖の皮肉骨髓、ただ四念住のみなり。

Thus, the buddhas and bodhisattvas have all taken the four abodes of mindfulness as “the womb of the sages.” We should recognize that there is a womb of virtual awakening, and there is a womb of wondrous awakening.<sup>39</sup> Since he said “all the buddhas and bodhisattvas,” the buddhas who are not wondrously awakened also take them as “the womb of the sages”; and bodhisattvas who have surpassed [the path] prior to virtual awakening or outside wondrous awakening likewise take these four abodes of mindfulness as “the womb of the sages.”<sup>40</sup> Truly, the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of the buddhas and the ancestors is nothing but the four abodes of mindfulness.

* * * * *

38 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): Source unknown, although possibly reflecting a passage in the Renwang jing 仁王經 (T.245.8:826b29-30):

一切諸佛菩薩長養十心爲聖胎也。

All the buddhas and bodhisattvas nurture the ten minds as the womb of the sages.

“The sages” (shō 聖; S. ārya) refers to those advanced on the Buddhist path.

39 there is a womb of virtual awakening, and there is a womb of wondrous awakening (tōgaku no shōtai ari, myōgaku no shōtai ari 等覺の聖胎あり、妙覺の聖胎あり): I.e., wombs of the two highest stages of the sages: the former is the penultimate stage of the bodhisattva path; the latter (also read myōkaku) is the stage of buddhahood. Some texts read nari なり for ari あり in both cases here; hence, “they (i.e., the four abodes) are the womb of virtual awakening; they are the womb of wondrous awakening.”

40 buddhas who are not wondrously awakened (myōgaku ni arazaran shobutsu 妙覺にあらざらん諸佛); bodhisattvas who have surpassed [the path] prior to virtual awakening or outside wondrous awakening (tōgaku yori saki, myōgaku yori hoka ni chōshutsu seru bosatsu 等覺よりさき、妙覺よりほかに超出せる菩薩): Dōgen here introduces the unorthodox claims of Zen masters that they are beyond the traditional definitions of the path: that they are buddhas even without the unsurpassed, perfect bodhi of wondrous awakening; that they go “beyond the buddha” (butsu kōjō 佛向上). For the latter expression, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Beyond the buddha.”

四正斷、あるひは四正勤と稱す。

The four correct abandonments (also called the four correct efforts):<sup>41</sup>

[60:17]

一者、未生惡令不生。二者、已生惡令滅。三者、未生善令生。四者、已生善令增長。

1. Causing unarisen evil not to arise; 2. Causing arisen evil to cease; 3. Causing unarisen good to arise; 4. Causing arisen good to increase.

[60:18] {2:134}

未生惡令不生といふは、惡の稱、かならずしもさだまれる形段なし。ただ、地にしたがひ、界によりて立稱しきたれり。しかあれども、未生して不生ならしむるを佛法と稱し、正傳しきたれり。外道の解には、これ未萌我を根本とせり、といふ。佛法には、かくのごとくなるべからず。しばらく問取すべし、惡未生のとき、いづれのところにかある。もし未來にありといはば、ながくこれ斷滅見の外道なり。もし未來きたりて現在となるといはば、佛法の談にあらず、三世、混亂しぬべし。三世、混亂せば、諸法、混亂すべし。諸法、混亂せば、實相、混亂すべし。實相、混亂せば、唯佛與佛、混亂すべし。かるがゆえに、未來はのちに現在となる、といはざるなり。さらに問取すべし、未生惡とは、なにを稱すべきぞ。たれかこれを知取・見取せる。もし知取・見取することあらば、未生時あり、非未生時あらん。もししかあらば、未生法と稱すべからず、已滅の法と稱しつべし。外道および小乘聲聞等に學せずして、未生惡令不生の參學すべきなり。彌天の積惡、これを未生惡と稱す、不生惡なり。不生といふは、昨日説定法、今日説不定法なり。

“Causing unarisen evil not to arise.” What is designated “evil” does not necessarily have a fixed shape: the designation has been established according to the place and according to the realm. However, making the “unarisen” be [something that] “does not arise” is called the buddha dharma and has been directly transmitted.<sup>42</sup> In the opinion of other paths, it is said to have an unmanifest self as its basis; in the buddha dharma, this cannot be the case.<sup>43</sup> We should ask for a bit, when evil is “unarisen,”

41 four correct abandonments (shishōdan 四正斷): The second set of the thirty-seven factors of bodhi. “The four correct efforts” (shishōgon 四正勤) represents an alternative translation of samyak-prahāṇa. (The parenthetical remark is in the original.)

42 making the “unarisen” be [something that] “does not arise” (mishō shite fushō narashimuru 未生して不生ならしむる): An awkward attempt to capture Dōgen’s diction. Judging from the sentence immediately following, his point would seem to be that orthodox Buddhist doctrine denies that what occurs comes out of a pre-existent potential.

43 In the opinion of other paths, it is said to have an unmanifest self as its basis (gedō no ge ni wa, kore mihō ga o konpon to seri, to iu 外道の解には、これ未萌我を根本とせり、といふ): “Unmanifest self” renders mihō ga 未萌我, an unusual expression that could mean either (a) “a self that has not yet sprouted (i.e., occurred)” or “a self before it (i.e., evil) has sprouted.” The exact opinion is thus uncertain but perhaps a where is it? If we say it is in the future, this will be forever the other path of annihilationism.<sup>44</sup> If we say that the future becomes the present, this is not the talk of the buddha dharma; the three times have been confused.<sup>45</sup> When the three times are confused, the dharmas will be confused; when the dharmas are confused, their “real mark” will be confused; when their real mark is confused, “only buddhas with buddhas” will be confused.<sup>46</sup>

Therefore, we do not say that the future will later become the present. Further, we should ask, what is it that we are calling “un arisen evil? Who has known it or seen it? If it has been known or seen, there would be a time when it is un arisen and a time when it is not un arisen.<sup>47</sup> If so, it should not be called a dharma not yet arisen; it should be called a dharma already disappeared. We should study “causing un arisen evil not to arise” without learning from the other paths or the śrāvakas of the Small Vehicle. The accumulated evil filling the heavens — this is what is called “un arisen evil”; it is non-arising evil. “Non-arising” means “yesterday, I preached a determinate dharma; today, I’m preaching an indeterminate dharma.”<sup>48</sup> reference to the satkāryavāda position of the Sāṃkhya school of Hindu thought, which held that the effect is present in the cause (as the pot is latent in the clay from which it is fashioned).

44 this will be forever the other path of annihilationism (nagaku kore danmetsuken no gedō nari なかくこれ斷滅見の外道なり): Presumably, meaning that, if we hold that what has not yet happened is in the future, then it could never actually happen in the present — hence, the error of annihilationism (danken 斷見; S. uccheda-dṛṣṭi), which denies future rebirths in which the consequences of karma are experienced.

45 the three times have been confused (sanze, konran shinu beshi 三世、混亂しぬべし): I.e., if the future somehow turns into the present, the distinctions among past, present, and future would break down. A common argument in support of a Buddhist critique of the intelligibility of the occurrence of real dharmas.

46 the dharmas (shohō 諸法); “real mark” (jissō 實相); “only buddhas with buddhas” (yui butsu yo butsu 唯佛與佛): Playing on a line in Kumārajīva’s translation of the Lotus Sūtra; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas.”

47 there would be a time when it is un arisen and a time when it is not un arisen (mishō ji ari, hi mishō ji aran 未生時あり、非未生時あらん): I.e. for someone to take it as an object of perception, it must have occurred at some point.

48 “yesterday, I preached a determinate dharma; today, I’m preaching an indeterminate dharma” (sakujitsu setsu jōhō, konnichi setsu fujōhō 昨日説定法、今日説不定法): After words (also cited in “Shōbōgenzō ikka myōju” 正法眼藏一顆明珠) attributed to Buddha Śākyamuni in the Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要 (ZZ.136:443b9-11):

世尊因外道問、昨日説何法。云説定法。外道云、今日説何法、云説不定法。外道云、昨日説定法。今日何故説不定法。云昨日定。今日不定。

The World-Honored One was once asked by a non-Buddhist, “What dharma did you preach yesterday?”

He said, “I preached a determinate dharma.”

---

The non-Buddhist said, “What dharma do you preach today?”

He said, “I’m preaching an indeterminate dharma.”

The non-Buddhist said, “Yesterday, you preached a determinate dharma. Why are you preaching an indeterminate dharma today?”

He said, “Yesterday was determinate. Today is indeterminate.”

49 “arisen” is fully arising (ishō wa jinshō nari 已生は盡生なり): The translation masks the play throughout this section with the glyph shō 生, which has the sense “to arise” but also “to live,” “to be born,” “life,” “birth,” etc. Hence, the first three sentences here could also be rendered, “‘Arisen’ is an entire life. ‘An entire life’ is half a life; ‘half a life’ is this life. ‘This life’ is obstructed by ‘life’; it springs forth from the crown of the head of ‘life.’”

50 “This arising” is obstructed by “arising” (shishō wa hi shō ge nari 此生は被生礙なり): I.e., this arising is defined by, is nothing but, arising; an idiosyncratic use of the verb ge 礙 (“to obstruct”), quite common in Dōgen’s writing.

51 “Devadatta, in his birth body, enters hell” (Chōdatsu shōshin nyū jigoku 調達生身入地獄); “Devadatta, in his birth body, receives the prediction” (Chōdatsu shōshin toku juki 調達生身得授記): References to the legends of Buddha Śākyamuni’s cousin Devadatta, who is widely held to have fallen directly into the avīci hell for his evil deeds, but whose eventual attainment of buddhahood is predicted by Śākyamuni in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:35a1-3):

告諸四衆、提婆達多却後過無量劫、當得成佛、號曰天王如來。

I declare to the fourfold assembly that, after innumerable kalpas, Devadatta will become a buddha named Tathāgata Devarāja.

52 the birth body enters the womb of a donkey (shōshin nyū rotai 生身入驢胎); “the birth body becomes a buddha” (shōshin sabutsu 生身作佛): Likely a reference to the story, related in “Shōbōgenzō kie buppōsōbō” 正法眼藏歸依佛法僧寶, in which the god Śakra, just as he was taking refuge in Buddhism, suddenly died and was reborn in the womb of a donkey. Because of his having taken refuge, he was released from the womb, returned to his former body, and attained the stage of stream entry (yoru 預流; S. srotāpanna). In his comments in that chapter, Dōgen remarks that the god went on to attain the unsurpassed bodhi of a buddha. Some commentators suggest that the second clause is an allusion to the story in the Lotus Sūtra of the dragon girl who became a buddha.

that we should study the essential point of “causing to cease.” “Ceasing” means to spring forth and transcend ceasing.

未生善令生といふは、父母未生前、面目參飽なり、朕兆已前、明舉なり、威音以前の會取なり。

“Causing unarisen good to arise” means studying one’s fill of your face before your father and mother were born, means clearly taking up what is prior to any portent, means understanding what is before Majestic Voice.<sup>53</sup>

已生善令増長は、しるべし、已生善令生といはず、令増長するなり。自見明星訖、更教他見明星なり、眼睛作明星なり。胡亂後三十年、不曾闕鹽醋なり。たとへば、増長するゆえに已生するなり。このゆえに、溪深杓柄長なり、只爲有所以來なり。

“Causing arisen good to increase”: we should notice that it does not say, “causing arisen good to arise,” but “causing it to increase.” It is, having seen the dawn star oneself, then letting others see the dawn star; it is the eye becoming the dawn star.<sup>54</sup> It is “after confusion, for thirty years never lacking salt and vinegar.”<sup>55</sup> For instance, it is, because it “increases,” it has “arisen.” Therefore, it is “the stream is deep, the ladle handle long”; it is “he came only because it had it.”<sup>56</sup>

53 your face before your father and mother were born (bumo mishō zen, menmoku 父母未生前、面目); prior to any portent (chinchō izen 朕兆已前); before Majestic Voice (ion izen 威音以前): Three common fixed expressions, appearing often in the Shōbōgenzō, for that which precedes existence; presumably, to be understood here as examples of “unarisen good” (mishō zen 未生善). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before your father and mother were born” and “Before King Majestic Voice.”

54 having seen the dawn star oneself, then letting others see the dawn star (ji ken myōjō kitsu, kō kyō ta ken myōjō 自見明星訖、更教他見明星): A passage, in Chinese but without known source, referring to the awakening of Buddha Śākyamuni upon seeing Venus in the dawn sky and his subsequent teaching career.

55 “after confusion, for thirty years never lacking salt and vinegar” (uron go san-jū nen, fuzō ketsu enso 胡亂後三十年、不曾闕鹽醋): A version of the words of Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (See, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:241a23-24).

56 “the stream is deep, the ladle handle long” (kei shin shakuhei chō 溪深杓柄長): Response of an anonymous hermit to the question, “What was the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west?” A version of this story, cited elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, is recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:218, case 183), most likely taken from Dahui’s 大慧 Zhengfayanzang 正法眼藏 (ZZ.118:7b12-17).

“he came only because it had it” (shi i u shoi rai 只爲有所以來): The words of Yaoshan Weiyuan 藥山惟儼 (751-834) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:312b3-5):

僧問、祖師未到此土、此土還有祖師意否。師曰、有。僧曰、既有祖師意、又來作什麼。師曰、只爲有所以來。

四神足

The four bases of spiritual power:<sup>57</sup>

[60:23]

一者、欲神足。二者、心神足。三者、進神足。四者、思惟神足。

(1) The aspiration base of spiritual power, (2) the mind base of spiritual power, (3) the effort base of spiritual power, and (4) the thought base of spiritual power.<sup>58</sup>

[60:24]

欲神足は、圖作佛の身心なり、圖睡快なり、因我禮懺なり。おほよそ欲神足、さらに身心の因縁にあらざるなり。莫涯空の鳥飛なり、徹底水の魚行なり。

“The aspiration base of spiritual power” is the body and mind of “figuring to make a buddha,” is “figuring on a quick nap,” is “my obeisance to you.”<sup>59</sup> In sum, “the aspiration base of spiritual power” is not at all a

A monk asked, “Before the Ancestral Master [Bodhidharma] had come to this land, did this land have ‘the intention of the Ancestral Master’?”

The Master [Weiyang] said, “It did.”

The monk said, “Since it already had ‘the intention of the Ancestral Master,’ why did he come?”

The Master said, “He came only because it had it.”

57 four bases of spiritual power (shijinsoku 四神足): The third set of the thirty-seven factors of bodhi; literally, “spiritual feet,” a rendering of Sanskrit rddhi-pāda (as Dōgen will note below, section 28, often rendered shinyoisoku 四如意足). Four practices conducive to achieving spiritual powers, not to be confused with the magical powers (of flight, etc.), also called rddhi-pāda, that are the first of the five (or six) “higher knowledges” (S. abhijñā) of the contemplative adept.

58 The aspiration base of spiritual power (yoku jinsoku 欲神足): Dōgen’s version of this list is a bit unusual and reverses the more common order of numbers 2 and 3. The four are typically seen as a progression, from (1) the “wish” (S. chanda) to acquire the powers, through (2) the “endeavor” (S. vīrya) to acquire them, and (3) the “mental focus” (S. citta) on them, to (4) the “meditation” (S. mīmāṃsa) on them.

59 “figuring to make a buddha” (zu sabutsu 圖作佛): From the famous episode, much treasured by Dōgen, involving Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 and his teacher, Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (Jingde chuandeng lu, T.2076.51:240c20):

大德坐禪圖什麼。一曰、圖作佛。

[Nanyue asked,] “Most Virtuous One, what are you figuring to do, sitting there in meditation?”

Daoyi said, “I’m figuring to make a buddha.”

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nanyue polishes a tile.”

“figuring on a quick nap” (to suikai 圖睡快): From the opening lines of the Caoan cause and condition of body and mind: it is a bird flying in a horizonless sky; it is a fish going to the bottom of the water.<sup>60</sup>

心神足は、牆壁瓦礫なり、山河大地なり、條條の三界なり、赤赤の椅子・竹木なり。盡使得なるがゆえに、佛祖心あり、凡聖心あり、草木心あり、變化心あり。盡心は心神足なり。

“The mind base of spiritual power” is “fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles”; it is “mountains, rivers, and the whole earth”; it is the three realms in each instance; it is “chairs, bamboo, and wood” in their nakedness.<sup>61</sup> Since they are all usable, there is the mind of the buddhas and ancestors;

ge 草庵歌, by Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (700-790) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:461c9):

吾結草庵無寶貝、飯了從容圖睡快。

I built this thatched hut that has nothing of worth;

Finished my rice, I relaxed, figuring on a quick nap.

“my obeisance to you” (in ga rai ni 因我禮爾): From a verse by Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, in reference to Buddha Śākyamuni (Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:125c11-12):

因我禮爾、早眠晏起。

My obeisance to you —

Sleeping early and waking late.

60 cause and condition of body and mind (shinjin no innen 身心の因縁): The exact sense is uncertain; perhaps, “something caused by the individual.”

it is a bird flying in a horizonless sky; it is a fish going to the bottom of the water (makugai kū no chō hi nari, tettei sui no gyō kō nari 莫涯空の鳥飛なり、徹底水の魚行なり): After the final lines of the Zuochan zhen 坐禪箴, by Hongzhi Zhengjue 宏智正覺 (1091-1157) (on which Dōgen comments in his “Shōbōgenzō zazen shin” 正法眼藏坐禪箴; for the source, see Hongzhi chanshi guanglu 宏智禪師廣錄, T.2001.48:98a29-b5):

水清徹底兮、魚行遲遲。空闊莫涯兮、鳥飛杳杳。

The water is clear right through to the bottom;

A fish goes lazily along.

The sky is vast without horizon;

A bird flies far far away.

61 “fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles” (shō heki ga ryaku 牆壁瓦礫): The first of four sayings on “mind” (shin 心) that Dōgen lists here; this one, from the words, quoted often in Dōgen’s writing, attributed to Nanyang Huizhong 南陽慧忠. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles.”

“mountains, rivers, and the whole earth” (senga daichi 山河大地): A common expression for the natural world; here probably reflecting a saying of Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂 included in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:212, case 168); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Sun, moon, and stars.”

the three realms in each instance (jōjō no sangai 條條の三界): Likely reflecting the common expression, “the three realms are only mind” (sangai yui shin 三界唯心); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “The three realms are only mind.” “In each instance” renders jōjō 條條, which should probably be taken together with the parallel shakushaku 赤赤

there is the mind of the common person and the sage; there is the mind of grass and trees; there is the mind of transformation.<sup>62</sup> The entire mind is “the mind base of spiritual power.”<sup>63</sup>

進神足は、百尺竿頭驀直歩なり。いづれのところかこれ百尺竿頭。いはゆる不驀直不得なり、驀直一步は、なきにあらず。這裏是甚麼處在、説進説退。正當進神足時、盡十方界、隨神足到也、隨神足至也。

The effort base of spiritual power is “stepping straight off the tip of a hundred-foot pole.”<sup>64</sup> Where is “the tip of a hundred-foot pole”? It is, it can’t be not “straight off.” It is not that it is not one step “straight off”; but “where are we here,” that we’re talking about going forward or back?<sup>65</sup> Precisely when there is “the effort base of spiritual power,”

(“nakedness”), as a play with the colloquial seki jōjō 赤條條 (“stark naked”), seen also in “Shōbōgenzō kajō” 正法眼藏家常。

“chairs, bamboo, and wood” in their nakedness (shakushaku no isu chikuboku 赤赤の椅子竹木): From a discussion between Luohan Guichen 羅漢桂琛 (867-928) and Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 (835-908), recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:186, case 112), about whether to understand “the three realms are only one mind” (sangai yui isshin 三界唯一心) as a “chair” or as “bamboo and wood.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Chairs, bamboo, and wood.”

62 mind of the common person and the sage (bonshō shin 凡聖心): I.e., the minds of ordinary humans and those advanced on the Buddhist spiritual path.

mind of grass and trees (sōmoku shin 草木心): The sense here is uncertain. The expression can mean “the heart, or core, of plants” (used to explain one sense of Sanskrit hṛdaya [“heart”]); in “Shōbōgenzō hotsu bodai shin” 正法眼藏發菩提心, Dōgen uses it in reference to spiritual practice associated with trees.

mind of transformation (henge shin 變化心): An expression that could refer to (a) the mind that produces magical effects, (b) the mind of an apparitional being, or (c) the mind that undergoes change.

63 The entire mind (jinshin 盡心): Could also be rendered, “all minds” or, in the colloquial sense, “with all one’s heart.”

64 The effort base of spiritual power (shin jinsoku 進神足): Dōgen’s treatment of this topic here will play on the glyph shin 進 (“to advance,” “to proceed,” etc.), used for “effort” (shōjin 精進; S. vīrya).

“stepping straight off the top of a hundred-foot pole” (hyakushaku kantō maku jiki ho 百尺竿頭驀直歩): An expression variations on which occur often in Zen literature; Dōgen’s source here is likely a verse by Changsha Jingcen 長沙景岑 (dates unknown) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:274b6-8):

百丈竿頭不動人、雖然得入未爲眞。百丈竿頭須進步、十方世界是全身。

The person unmoving atop a thousand-foot pole —

Even though they’ve entered, it’s not yet the real thing.

They should step off the top of the thousand-foot pole;

The worlds in the ten directions are their entire body.

65 It is not that it is not one step “straight off”; but “where are we here,” that all the realms in the ten directions arrive with the spiritual power, go off with the spiritual power.

思惟神足は、一切佛祖、業識茫茫、無本可據なり。身思惟あり、心思惟あり、識思惟あり、草鞋思惟あり、空劫已前自己思惟あり。

The thought base of spiritual power is, in all the buddhas and ancestors, “the karmic consciousness is vague and confused, without a basis to rely on.”<sup>66</sup> There is the thinking of the body; there is the thinking of the mind; there is the thinking of consciousness; there is the thinking of straw sandals; there is the thinking of the self before the kalpa of emptiness.<sup>67</sup>

これをまた四如意足といふ、無躊躇なり。

These are also called “the four wish-fulfilling bases”: they are without delay.<sup>68</sup>

[60:29]

釋迦牟尼佛言、未運而到、名如意足。

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “To arrive before you have moved is called the ‘wish-fulfilling bases.’”<sup>69</sup>

we are talking about going forward or back? (makujiki ippo wa, naki ni arazu. shari ze jinmo sho zai, sesshin settai 葛直一步は、なきにあらず。這裏是甚麼處在、說進說退): The expression, “where are we here?” (shari ze jinmo sho zai 這裏是甚麼處在), used elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, is a fixed form appearing several times in Zen literature, in the sense, “how could we be talking about x here?” From this point to the end of the section, the text is in Chinese.

66 in all the buddhas and ancestors, “the karmic consciousness is vague and confused, without a basis to rely on” (issai busso, gosshiki bōbō, mu hon ka kyo 一切佛祖、業識茫茫、無本可據): Variation on the words of Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂, from a conversation with his teacher Weishan Lingyou 潁山靈祐 that is found in several Chinese sources. Dōgen records one version in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:196, case 130); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Karmic consciousness.”

67 straw sandals (sōai 草鞋): a common metonym for Buddhist study, from their use as footwear in the monk’s pilgrimage.

before the kalpa of emptiness (kūgō izen 空劫已前): An expression occurring regularly in Zen texts in reference to a state before even the kalpa before the emergence of the world; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before the kalpa of emptiness.”

68 “the four wish-fulfilling bases” (shi nyoi soku 四如意足): An alternative rendering of Sanskrit ṛddhi-pāda; “feet [that move] just as one wishes.” The sense here is that one can arrive “without delay” (mu chuchō 無躊躇) wherever one wishes to go.

69 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): No source has been identified.

しかあればすなはち、ときこと、きりのくちのごとし。方あること、のみのはのごとし。

Thus, their sharpness is like the point of the awl; their squareness, like the blade of the chisel.<sup>70</sup>

* * * * *

[60:31]

五根

The five faculties:<sup>71</sup>

[60:32]

一者、信根。二者、精進根。三者、念根。四者、定根。五者、慧根。

(1) The faculty of faith, (2) the faculty of effort, (3) the faculty of mindfulness, (4) the faculty of concentration, and (5) the faculty of wisdom.

[60:33]

信根は、しるべし、自己にあらず、他己にあらず、自己の強爲にあらず、自己の結構にあらず、他の牽挽にあらず、自立の規矩にあらざるゆえに、東西密相附なり、渾身似信を信と稱するなり。かならず佛果位と隨他去し、隨自去す。佛果位にあざれば信現成あらず。このゆえにいはく、佛法大海信爲能入なり。おほよそ信現成のところは、佛祖現成のところなり。

“The faculty of faith”: we should understand that it is not our own; it is not another’s; it is not something we ourselves force; it is not something we ourselves construct; it is not something induced by another; it is not a norm set up independently. Hence, it is “intimately bequeathed

70 their sharpness is like the point of the awl; their squareness, like the blade of the chisel (toki koto, kiri no kuchi no gotoshi. hō aru koto, nomi no ha no gotoshi ときこと、きりのくちのごとし。方あること、のみのはのごとし): An obscure remark in Japanese, likely reflecting a popular saying found in many Zen texts (see, e.g., Dahui Pujue chanshi yulu 大慧普覺禪師語錄, T.1998A.47:913b3-4):

俗諺所謂、只見錐頭利、不見鑿頭方。

As is said in the secular proverb, “To see only that the awl is sharp and not see that the chisel is square.”

If the Chinese saying is taken to mean, “seeing one kind of sharpness but not another,” Dōgen’s remark might imply that both the terms “spiritual power” and “wish-fulfilling” are accurate.

71 The five faculties (gokon 五根): The fourth set of the thirty-seven factors; spiritual faculties, or “strengths” (S. indriya), not to be confused with the five sense faculties, or organs (also gokon 五根; S. indriya).

in east and west.”<sup>72</sup> It is called faith when the whole body shows faith. As the stage of buddhahood, it always “goes along with it,” goes along with itself.<sup>73</sup> If it is not the stage of buddhahood, there is no realization of faith. Therefore, it is said, “In the great ocean of the buddha dharma, faith makes it possible to enter.”<sup>74</sup> In sum, where faith appears, there the buddhas and ancestors appear.

精進根は、省來祇管打坐なり、休也休不得なり、休得更休得なり、大區區生なり、不區區者なり、大區不區、一月二月なり。

“The faculty of effort” is, just sitting in reflection.<sup>75</sup> It is stopping but unable to stop; it is stopping and then stopping again.<sup>76</sup> It is “How attentive!”; it is “one who’s not attentive.”<sup>77</sup> It is how attentive and not attentive, a first moon and a second moon.

---

72 “intimately bequeathed in east and west” (tōzai mitsu sōfu 東西密相附): From the opening lines of the Cantong qi 參同契, of Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (Jingde chuan-deng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:459b8):

竺土大仙心、東西密相付。

The mind of the great sage of Sindhu,
Intimately bequeathed in east and west.

73 As the stage of buddhahood, it always “goes along with it,” goes along with itself (kanarazu bukka i to zui ta ko shi, zui ji ko su かならず佛果位と隨他去し、隨自去す): Play with the saying of Suishan Fazhen (seen above, section 12) on “going along” with “this” at the end of the kalpa. See below, section 84, for the text.

74 “In the great ocean of the buddha dharma, faith makes it possible to enter” (buppō daikai shin i nō nyū 佛法大海信爲能入): From the Dazhidu lun 大智度論 (T.1509.25:63a1-2):

佛法大海、信爲能入、智爲能度。

In the great ocean of the buddha dharma, faith makes it possible to enter, and wisdom makes it possible to cross.

75 just sitting in reflection (shōrai shikan taza 省來祇管打坐): Recalling the saying Dōgen famously attributes to Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 that studying Zen is “just sitting” (shikan taza 祇管打坐); possibly a variant of the line “sitting straight in reflection, totally drunk” (shōrai tanza sui kunkun 省來端坐醉醺醺) (Guren shiershi ge 古人十二時歌, Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄, ZZ.135:774a1).

76 stopping but unable to stop (kyū ya kyū futoku 休也休不得): Apparently a fixed phrase, appearing, for example, in the Xutang heshang yulu 虛堂和尚語錄 (T.2000.47:990b15); Dōgen’s source is unknown.

77 “How attentive!” (tai kuku sei 大區區生): More commonly written 太區區生. This expression and the following sentence reflect the conversation on sweeping to which Dōgen alluded above, section 4.

[60:35]

釋迦牟尼佛言、我常勤精進。是故我已得成阿耨多羅三藐三菩提。

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “I was always diligent in effort. It is for this reason, that I have already attained anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.”<sup>78</sup>

[60:36]

いはゆる常勤は、盡過現當來、頭正尾正なり。我常勤精進を、我已得成菩提とせり。我已得成阿耨菩提のゆえに、我常勤精進なり。しかあらずば、いかでか常勤ならん、しかあらずば、いかでか我已得ならん。論師・經師、この宗旨を見聞すべからず、いはんや參學せるあらんや。

“Always diligent” is right from head to tail through past, present, and future. He has taken “I was always diligent in effort” as “I have already attained bodhi”: because “I have already attained anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi,” “I was always diligent in effort.” If this were not the case, how could he have been “always diligent”? If this were not the case, how could it be “I have already attained”? The treatise masters and sūtra masters cannot see or hear this essential point, much less could they have studied it.

[60:37]

“The faculty of mindfulness” is the lump of red meat of the dried-up tree.<sup>79</sup> The lump of red meat is called “a dried-up tree.” A dried-up tree is “the faculty of mindfulness.” The self we find through our groping — this is “mindfulness.” There is the mindfulness when there is a body; there is the mindfulness when we have no mind. There is mindfulness with mind; there is mindfulness without body. The life faculty of the people of all the whole earth — this is taken as “the faculty of mindfulness”; the life faculty of the buddhas in all the ten directions — this is “the faculty of mindfulness.”<sup>80</sup> In a single moment of mindfulness, there are many people; in a single person, there are many moments of mindfulness.<sup>81</sup> Nevertheless, there are people with mindfulness, and there are people without mindfulness: people do not necessarily have mindfulness, and mindfulness does not necessarily have to do with people. Although this is the case, in maintaining this faculty of mindfulness, there are exhaustive virtues.

78 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:30a-5).

79 lump of red meat of the dried-up tree (koboku no shaku nikudan 枯木の赤肉團): Two common metaphors, mixed here to suggest the physical body in the seemingly lifeless state of meditation; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dried-up tree.”

80 life faculty (myōkon 命根): Dōgen plays on the glyph kon 根 (“faculty”) here in a term used for one’s allotted lifespan.

“The faculty of meditation” is caring for his eyebrows, is brushing up his eyebrows.<sup>82</sup> Therefore, it is, “he isn’t in the dark about cause and effect”; it is, “he doesn’t fall into cause and effect.”<sup>83</sup> With this, it is entering the womb of a donkey, entering the womb of a horse.<sup>84</sup> It is like “the stone containing the gem”: we cannot say it is all stone or all gem; it is like “the earth bearing the mountain”: we cannot say it is all the earth or all the mountain.<sup>85</sup> Nevertheless, it springs forth from and springs into the crown of the head.

81 In a single moment of mindfulness (ichi nen ni 一念に): The translation of the term nen 念 as “mindfulness” masks the fact that it is also used for “moment” and for “thought”; hence, this expression could also be rendered, “in a single moment” or “in a single thought.” Similarly, the sentences following could be read, “There are people with thought, and there are people with no thought: people do not necessarily have thought, and thought does not necessarily have to do with people.”

82 caring for his eyebrows (shakushu bimō 惜取眉毛); brushing up his eyebrows (sakuki bimō 策起眉毛): The former phrase is a fixed expression meaning to refrain from teaching Buddhism, lest one’s eyebrows fall off; the latter phrase is from the story that the arhat Piṇḍola brushed up his long, drooping eyebrows to indicate that he had personally seen the Buddha. Dōgen quotes this story from the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:130c7-11) in “Shōbōgenzō baika” 正法眼藏梅華.

83 “he isn’t in the dark about cause and effect” (fumai inga 不昧因果); “he doesn’t fall into cause and effect” (furaku inga 不落因果): From the famous tale of Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 (749-814) and the teacher who was reborn as a fox for saying that the person of great practice “doesn’t fall into cause and effect” (furaku inga 不落因果). The teacher is liberated from his fox body when Baizhang tells him that such a person “isn’t in the dark about cause effect” (fumai inga 不昧因果). The story, occurring widely in Zen sources, is recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:178-80, case 102) and discussed in “Shōbōgenzō daishugyō” 正法眼藏大修行 and “Jinshin inga” 深信因果.

84 entering the womb of a donkey, entering the womb of a horse (nyū rotai, nyū batai 入驢胎、入馬胎): Variation on the more common “the womb of a donkey or the belly of a horse” (nyū rotai bafuku 入驢胎馬腹), a fixed expression for rebirth as an animal.

85 “the stone containing the gem” (ishi no, tama o tsutsumeru いしの、玉をつつめる); “the earth bearing the mountain” (chi no, yama o itadakeru 地の、山をいただける): A Japanese rephrasing of a Chinese saying attributed to the eighth-century figure Panshan Baoji 盤山寶積 (dates unknown) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄,

“The faculty of wisdom” is “the buddhas of the three times, I don’t know they exist”; it is “cats and white oxen, on the other hand, I know they exist”<sup>86</sup> We should not ask, “Why is it like this?”; it cannot be said.<sup>87</sup> Nostrils have their breathing; fists have their fingertips. The donkey maintains the donkey; the well meets the well.<sup>88</sup> In sum, the faculties succeed the faculties.

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas of the three times, I don’t know they exist; cats and white oxen, on the other hand, I know they exist.”

87 “Why is it like this?” (i jin nyo shi 爲甚如此): An idiomatic phrase often encountered in Zen talk. Presumably, the sense of the sentence is, “we can’t say why the faculty of wisdom recognizes cats and cows but not the buddhas.”

88 The donkey maintains the donkey; the well meets the well (ro wa ro o hōnin su, i wa i ni shōken su 驢は驢を保任す、井は井に相見す): From a dialogue, featuring Caoshan Benzhi 曹山本寂 (840-901) and Senior Seat De 德上座 (dates unknown), recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:194, case 125); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Like the well looking at the donkey.”

89 The five powers (goriki 五力): The fifth set of the thirty-seven factors; spiritual powers (S. bala) derived from the cultivation of the five faculties.

90 (1) The power of faith (issha, shinriki 一者、信力): Like the five faculties, of which they are said to be the development, the five powers are regularly described as antidotes to the five hindrances (gogai 五蓋; S. nīvaraṇa) to dhyāna: faith (shin 信; S. śrad-

“The power of faith” is being deceived by yourself with no place of escape.<sup>91</sup> It is being called by another and invariably turning your head; it is “from birth to old age, it’s just this.”<sup>92</sup> It is falling over seven times and letting it go; it is falling down eight times and taking it up.<sup>93</sup> Therefore, it is “faith is like the water-purifying gem.”<sup>94</sup> Transmitting the dharma and 91 being deceived by yourself with no place of escape (hi ji man mu kaihi sho 被自瞞無迴避處): Dōgen has put this phrase in Chinese, as if quoting a text, but no source is known.

92 being called by another and invariably turning your head (hi ta kan hitsu kaitō 被他喚必廻頭); “from birth to old age, it’s just this” (jū shō shi rō, shi ze shako 從生至老、只是這箇): Perhaps, an allusion to an anecdote involving Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 and Wuxie Lingmo 五洩靈默 (747-818) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:254b10-11): Having failed to understand Shitou’s teaching, Wuxie was leaving.

石頭呼之云、闍梨。師迴顧。石頭云、從生至老只是遮箇。漢更莫別求。

Shitou called to him, “Ācārya.”

The Master [Wuxie] turned and looked back. Shitou said, “From birth to old age, it’s just this. A man shouldn’t look for anything else.”

In his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:126, case 4) and in the “Shōbōgenzō kokū,” Dōgen records a similar anecdote, involving Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 and his student Prelate Liang 亮座主:

師拂袖而去。祖召曰、座主。師回首。祖曰、從生至老、只是這箇。

The Master [i.e., Liang] shook out his sleeves and withdrew. Mazu called to him, “Prelate!”

The Master turned. Mazu said, “From birth to old age, it’s just this.”

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Prelate Liang.”

93 falling over seven times and letting it go (shichiten ya hōgyō 七顛也放行); falling down eight times and taking it up (hattō ya nenrai 八倒也拈來): From the idiom “fall over seven times and fall down eight times” (shichiten hattō 七顛八倒; also read shitten battō), meaning “to be utterly confused,” “to make one mistake after another.” The combination of “let it go” (hōgyō 放行) with “take it up” (nenrai 拈來) is unusual; the latter is typically used in reference to an object or a topic, while the former is often paired with “hold fast” (hajō 把定), in reference to a master’s restraining and releasing a student.

94 “faith is like the water-purifying gem” (shin nyo suishō ju 信如水精珠): The expression suishō ju 水精珠 here is often taken as “crystal” (suishō 水晶); the translation reflects the occurrence of Dōgen’s phrase in reference to the simile, in the Cheng weishi lun 成唯識論 (T.1585.31:29c4-6), of the gem that clarifies muddy water (suishō ju 水清珠; S. udaka-prabhāsa-maṇi).

精進力は、説取行不得底なり、行取説不得底なり。しかあればすなはち、説得一寸、不如説得一寸なり、行得一句、不如行得一句なり、力裏得力、これ精進力なり。

“The power of effort” is “talking of what can’t be practiced”; it is “practicing what can’t be talked of.”<sup>95</sup> Thus, it is talking of one inch is not like talking of one inch; it is practicing one line is not like practicing one line. To get power within power — this is “the power of effort.”

[60:44]

念力は、拽人鼻孔大殺人なり。このゆえに、鼻孔拽人なり、抛玉引玉なり、抛磚引磚なり。さらに未抛也三十棒なり、天下人用著未磷なり。

“The power of mindfulness” is a brute pulling a person’s nose.<sup>96</sup> Therefore, it is the nose pulling the person; it is tossing out a jade to take in a jade; it is tossing out a tile to take in a tile.<sup>97</sup> Further, it is, even if you have not tossed it out, thirty blows; it is, even if everyone in the world uses it, it won’t wear down.<sup>98</sup>

95 “talking of what can’t be practiced” (sesshu gyō futokutei 説取行不得底); “practicing what can’t be talked of” (gyōshu setsu futokutei 行取説不得底): From a comment of Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (e.g., at Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要, ZZ.136:549b14; see also shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:164, case 77):

杭州大慈山性空大師〈嗣百丈、諱襄中〉示衆云、説得一丈、不如行取一尺、説得一尺、不如行取一寸。洞山曰、説取行不得底、行取説不得底。

Great Master Xinggong of Mount Daci in Hangzhou (named Huangzhong) addressed the assembly saying, “To talk about ten feet is not like practicing one foot; to talk about one foot is not like practicing one inch.”

Dongshan said, “He talks about what can’t be practiced; he practices what can’t be talked about.”

96 a brute pulling a person’s nose (ei nin bikū taisatsunin 拽人鼻孔大殺人): Reference to the story (recorded at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:256, case 248) in which Shigong Huizang 石鞏慧藏 (dates unknown) demonstrated how to grasp space by pulling the nose of Xitang Zhizang 西堂智藏 (735-814); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose.”

97 tossing out a jade to take in a jade (hōgyoku ingyoku 抛玉引玉): Play on the idiom “tossing out a tile and taking in a jade”; in Chinese literary usage, a polite way to ask another for a capping verse for one’s poem; used in Zen for the give and take of Zen repartee (as, e.g., by Zhaozhou 趙州, at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:277a29-b2). See Supplementary Notes.

98 even if you have not tossed it out, thirty blows (mihō ya sanjū bō 未抛也三十棒); even if everyone in the world uses it, it won’t wear down (tenka nin yōjaku mirin 天下人用著未磷): Two phrases put in Chinese as if quotations but without known sources. The diction of the former phrase is reminiscent of the common expression, “If you can say it, thirty blows; if you can't say it, thirty blows” (dōtoku ya sanjū bō, dōfutoku ya sanjū bō 道得也三十棒、道不得也三十棒).

99 “like the child gaining its mother” (nyo shi toku go mo 如子得其母): Suggesting a line in the Cantong qi 參同契 (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:459b12-13):

四大性自復、如子得其母。

The four elements revert to their nature,

Like the child gaining its mother.

Judging from his use, immediately below, of the simile of the ferry boat, Dōgen must also have had in mind here the passage in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:54b15-16) in which the sūtra is said to satisfy all needs:

如子得母。如渡得船。

Like the child gaining its mother; like the ferry passenger getting a boat.

100 using the head to change the face (i tō kan men 以頭換面): An unusual variant of the multivalent idiom “renewing the head and changing the face” (kai tō kan men 改頭換面), or “turning the head and changing the face” (kai tō kan men 回頭換面); here, perhaps, used to indicate a merely superficial change. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Turning the head and changing the face.” The following “using gold to buy gold” (i kin mai kin 以金買金) has a similar sense. The implication here is uncertain; perhaps, that the four similes of mother and child are not merely restatements of the same relationship.

the song getting higher (shō ni mi kō 唱而彌高): Likely a (syntactically garbled) allusion to the idiom, “the higher the song, the fewer who can match it” (shō mi kō ni wa mi ka 唱彌高而和彌寡).

101 “years deep and long” (nendai jin'on 年代深遠): A phrase used in reference to Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866) (see Linji lu 臨濟錄, T.1985.47:505a11, 506a1).

like the boat meeting the ferry passenger (nyo sen gū to 如船遇度): Play on the Lotus Sūtra phrase, “like the ferry passenger getting a boat” (nyo to toku sen 如度得船) (see above, Note 99).

“the boat”; that the ferrying does not obstruct the ferrying is called “the boat.”<sup>102</sup> It is spring ice melts of its own accord.<sup>103</sup>

七等覺支

The seven limbs of perfect awakening:<sup>104</sup>

[60:48]

一者、擇法覺支。二者、精進覺支。三者、喜覺支。四者、除覺支。五者、捨覺支。六者、定覺支。七者、念覺支。

(1) The dharma analysis limb of awakening, (2) the vigor limb of awakening, (3) the joy limb of awakening, (4) the removal limb of awakening, (5) the equanimity limb of awakening, (6) the concentration limb of awakening, (7) the mindfulness limb of awakening.

[60:49]

擇法覺支は、毫釐有差、天地懸隔なり。このゆえに、至道不難易、唯要自揀擇のみなり。

“The dharma analysis limb of awakening” is “where there’s a hair’s breadth of distinction the gap is like that between heaven and earth.”<sup>105</sup>

102 “ferrying” is invariably “the boat” (to hitsu ze sen 度必是船): A phrase in Chinese that could also be read, “the ferry passenger is invariably the boat.” Perhaps more likely would be to read the term to 度 (translated here “ferrying”) in its common Buddhist sense of spiritual “deliverance.”

103 spring ice melts of its own accord (shunpyō ji shōhyō 春氷自消氷): Variant of a fixed phrase; here, likely reflecting a comment on the line of the Cantong qi 參同契 just following that cited above, Note 99 (see Rentian yenmu 人天眼目, T.2006.48:327a23-24):

四大性自復(隨所依)、如子得其母(可知也)。

火熱風動搖(春氷自消)、水濕地堅固(從旦至暮)。

The four elements revert to their nature (according to their bases),

Like the child gaining its mother (obvious).

Fire heats; wind blows (spring ice melts of itself);

Water is wet; earth, solid (from dawn to dusk).

104 seven limbs of perfect awakening (shichitōkakushi 七等覺支): The sixth set of the thirty-seven factors; S. bodhyaṅga (also rendered shichikakubun 七覺分). Dōgen regularly uses the term tōkaku (or tōgaku) 等覺 in the sense “virtual awakening,” for the penultimate stage of the bodhisattva path; but here, it renders Sanskrit sambodhi. The terminology and order of the seven members differs slightly according to the source; Dōgen’s list here corresponds to that found in the Fahua cidi chumen 法界次第初門 by Zhiyi 智顗 (538-597) (T.1925.46:682b18-c10).

105 “dharma analysis limb of awakening” (jakuho kakushi 擇法覺支): Analytic investigation of the teachings (S. dharma-pravicaya).

Therefore, it is only “the supreme way isn’t hard” or easy; you just need to make the choice yourself.<sup>106</sup>

“The vigor limb of awakening” is never having dominated the market.<sup>107</sup> Whether buying it oneself or selling it oneself, there is a fixed price, and there is knowing its value.<sup>108</sup> Although it may “look like humbling yourself and promoting another,” it is “thoroughly beaten but un-

“where there’s a hair’s breadth of distinction” (kōri u sha 毫釐有差): From the opening lines of the Xinxin ming 信心銘 (T.2010.48:376b20-21), on which Dōgen will play in the next sentence:

至道無難、唯嫌揀擇。但莫憎愛、洞然明白。毫釐有差、天地懸隔。

The supreme way isn’t hard:

Just dislike picking and choosing.

If we simply do not hate or love,

All will be open and clear.

Where there’s a hair’s breadth of distinction

The gap is like that between heaven and earth.

106 “the supreme way isn’t hard” or easy; you just need to make the choice yourself (shiidō bunan’i, yui yōji kenjaku 至道不難易、唯要自揀擇): Playing with the first two lines of the Xinxin ming 信心銘 (as in the preceding note).

107 “vigor limb of awakening” (shōjin kakushi 精進覺支): Diligent effort (S. vīrya) in spiritual training.

never having dominated the market (fuzō zandatsu kōshi 不曾攙奪行市): The idiom zandatsu kōshi 攙奪行市 (“to dominate the market”) appears several times in the Shōbōgenzō, probably reflecting a saying of Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:146, case 38); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dominate the market.”

108 Whether buying it oneself or selling it oneself, there is a fixed price, there is knowing its value (ji mai ji mai tomo ni teika ari, chi ki ari 自買自賣ともに定價あり、知貴あり): Possibly reflecting the words of Wuzu Fayan 五祖法演 (d. 1104) on his awakening (Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要, ZZ.136:684a14):

幾度賣來還自買。爲憐松竹引清風。

Having sold it so many times, I bought it myself;

For pity’s sake, the pine and bamboo take in the fresh breeze.

“There is a fixed price” (teika ari 定價あり) may reflect a verse by Tiantong Rujing quoted in “Shōbōgenzō shohō jissō” 正法眼藏諸法實相:

要買那堪無定價、一聲杜宇孤雲上。

If you want to buy it, how could it lack a fixed price?

The cry of a cuckoo above a single cloud.

“Knowing its value” (chi ki 知貴) may reflect the common Zen saying, “the god of the sea knows its value but doesn’t know its price” (kaishin chi ki fuchi ka 海神知貴不知價).

broken.”<sup>109</sup> Even while still selling a turning word oneself, one meets a merchant who buys a turning mind himself.<sup>110</sup> It is “before the donkey business is over, the horse business arrives.”<sup>111</sup>

“The joy limb of awakening” is “grandma’s mind is kind; the blood drips.”<sup>112</sup> The thousand hands and eyes of the Great Compassionate One;

109 “look like humbling oneself and promoting the other” (kukko suinin ni sōji nari 屈己推人に相似なり): After a saying of Touzi Datong 投子大同 (819-914) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:320a21-22):

問、七佛是文殊弟子。文殊還有師也無。師曰、適來恁麼道也、大似屈己推人。

[Someone] asked, “The seven buddhas are the disciples of Mañjuśrī. Does Mañjuśrī have a master?”

The Master said, “To talk the way you just did looks like humbling yourself and promoting another.”

“thoroughly beaten but unbroken” (tsūshin boku fusai 通身撲不碎): From another saying of Touzi Datong 投子大同 (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:320a15-17):

問、和尚未見先師時如何。師曰、通身不奈何。曰見先師後如何。師曰、通身撲不碎。

[Someone] asked, “Before the Reverend had met his former master, what were you like?”

The Master said, “Thoroughly hopeless.”

He asked, “After you met your former master, what were you like?”

The Master said, “Thoroughly beaten but unbroken.”

110 selling a turning word oneself (ittengo o jimai suru 一轉語を自賣する); a merchant who buys a turning mind himself (ittenshin o jimai suru shōkyaku 一轉心を自買する商客): Amending Kawamura, which reads “a merchant who sells a turning mind himself” (ittenshin o jimai suru shōkyaku 一轉心を自賣する商客). “A turning word” (ittengo 一轉語) is a teaching that “turns the mind” to understanding; “a turning mind” (ittenshin 一轉心) is Dōgen’s variation. In the context here, it would seem that the seller of the turning word is himself the merchant who buys the turning mind.

111 “before the donkey business is over, the horse business arrives” (roji miryō, baji tōrai 驢事未了、馬事到來): Generally taken to mean something like, “It’s just one damned thing after another.” A saying first attributed to Lingyun Zhiqin 靈雲志勤 (dates unknown) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:285b12-13):

僧問、如何是佛法大意。師曰、驢事未去馬事到來。

A monk asked, “What is the great meaning of the buddha dharma?”

The Master said, “Before the donkey business is over, the horse business arrives.”

112 “joy limb of awakening” (ki kakushi 喜覺支): Taking delight (S. prīti) in the dharma.

“grandma’s mind is kind; the blood drips” (rōbashin setsu ketsu tekiteki 老婆心切血滴滴): Line from a verse by Dōgen’s teacher, Rujing 如淨 (1162–1227); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Fist,” and “Karmic consciousness.”

113 The thousand hands and eyes of the Great Compassionate One (Daihi senjūgen 大悲千手眼): Reference to the thousand-armed Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara (Senju Kannon 千手觀音), who has an eye in the palm of each hand.

114 Plum blossoms in the year-end snow (rōsetsu baika 臘雪梅華): Two lines of Chinese verse, apparently of Dōgen’s creation. The final phrase may reflect the saying, “When it’s cold, everyone is cold” (kanji taika kan 寒時大家寒).

115 they are brisk and lively, laughing “ha ha” (kappatsupatsu, shō kaka 活鱖鱖、笑呵呵): Taking “everyone” as the grammatical subject, though this might also be read as a description of “joy.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Brisk and lively.”

116 “removal limb of awakening” (jo kakushi 除覺支): Also rendered as kyōan kakushi 輕安覺支 (“tranquility limb of awakening”; S. praśrabdhi); the sense of ease from removal of mental obstacles.

117 “I can do it; you can’t” (ga toku ni futoku 我得爾不得): The words of Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 (Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要, ZZ.136:824a5-8):

師見鼓山來。作圓相、示之。山云、人人出這箇不得。師云、情知爾向驢胎馬腹裏、作活計。山云、和尚又作麼生。師云、人人出這箇不得。山云、和尚與麼道卻得。某甲爲甚麼不得。師云、我得、汝不得。

The Master [Xuansha] saw Gushan coming; he made a circle to instruct him. Gushan said, “People can’t get out of it.”

The Master said, “It’s obvious to me that you’re headed for a life in the donkey’s womb or the horse’s belly.”

Gushan said, “How about the Reverend?”

The Master said, “People can’t get out of it.”

Gushan said, “If the Reverend can say this, why can’t I?”

The Master said, “I can do it; you can’t.”

118 “clearly, if you speak,” “you move among different types” (shakunen dōjaku, irui chū gyō 灼然道著、異類中行): Variation on the words of Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-834) recorded in shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:154, case 57): “Clearly, if you speak, horns will grow on your head”; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Move among different types.”

“whatever he came up with, he wouldn’t have accepted it” (shesshi shōrai, ta yaku fuju 設使將來、他亦不受): A sentence from a dialogue between Chan Master Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 and an unnamed monk regarding a line in the famous poem contest between Shenxiu 神秀 and Huineng 慧能 to determine the successor of the Fifth Ancestor, Hongren 弘忍 (found, e.g., at Hongzhi chanshi guanglu 宏智禪師廣錄, T.2001.48:34c6-14):

舉僧問洞山、時時勤拂拭、莫使惹塵埃。爲什麼不得他衣鉢。山云、直饒道本來無一物、也未合得他衣鉢。且道、什麼人合得。僧下九十六轉語、不契。末後云、設使將來他亦不受。山深肯之。

Raised: A monk asked Dongshan, “‘Always strive to polish it, and do not let the dust collect.’ Why did this [line in Shenxiu’s verse] not get his [Hongren’s] robe and bowl?”

Shan said, “Even if he had said [the line in Huineng’s verse], ‘From the beginning, not one thing,’ he still would not have qualified to get his robe and bowl.” He added, “Who’s qualified to get them?”

The monk gave ninety-six turning words, but none fit. Finally, he said, “Whatever he came up with, he wouldn’t have accepted it.”

Shan deeply approved it.

The second is a variant of a line of verse at Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄 (ZZ.135:762a10); the first phrase seems to have no precedent but may represent a play on the expression “the barefoot Persian enters the Great Tang” (shakukyaku Hashi nyū Daitō 赤脚波斯入大唐) (see, e.g., Jitai pudeng lu 嘉泰普燈錄, ZZ.137:288a6).

in the sense of the original state of things before they have become active; the unusual term “eye before the function” (kisen gen 機先眼), then, suggests a vision of matters before they occur.

“drilling one’s own nostrils oneself” (jike bikū jike sen 自家鼻孔自家穿); “pulling oneself with one’s own rope” (jike ha saku jike ken 自家把索自家牽): Two lines from a verse by Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:132b9). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose.”

122 “managing to herd a single water buffalo” (bokutoku ittō suikogyū 牧得一頭水牯牛): From a saying, quoted elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō (“Gyōji jō” 行持上), of Changqing Da’an 長慶大安 (793-883); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Water buffalo.”

123 “mindfulness limb of awakening” (nen kakushi 念覺支): Sanskrit smṛti; sometimes listed as the first of the seven limbs.

a pillar walking across the sky (rochū ho kū gyō 露柱歩空行): A phrase in Chinese but with no known source. The free-standing columns of temple buildings (rochū 露柱) are regularly treated as sentient in Zen texts; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Pillars and lanterns.”

124 “a mouth resembling a mallet and an eye like an eyebrow” (kū ni sui gen nyo bi 口似椎眼如眉): After a line at Yuanwu Foguo chanshi yulu 圓悟佛果禪師語錄, T.1997.47:802c18-19.

“burning sandalwood in a sandalwood grove, a lion roaring in a cave of lions” (sendan rin ri zetsu sendan, shishi kutchū shishi ku 梅檀林裏熱梅檀、師子窟中師子吼): Again, after lines in Yuanwu Foguo chanshi yulu 圓悟佛果禪師語錄, T.1997.47:802c11.

“The correct view limb of the path” is hiding the body inside the eye.<sup>125</sup> However, it is before the body, we must possess an eye before the body.<sup>126</sup> While it may be “imposing and manifest” from the past, it is “the kōan is realized”; it is “he once personally saw.”<sup>127</sup> In sum, those who do not “hide the body inside the eye” are not buddhas or ancestors.

125 hiding the body inside the eye (ganzei ri zō shin 眼睛裏藏身): Also written, as below here, gan ri zō shin 眼裏藏身. Dōgen uses the same expression in “Shōbōgenzō butsu kōjō ji” 正法眼藏佛向上事. “The eye” does not seem to occur often as a hiding place for the body in Zen texts; more commonly, the body is hidden in “the big dipper” (hokuto 北斗), in “flames” (kaen 火燄), etc.

126 before the body, we must possess an eye before the body (shinsen shu gu shinsen 身先須具身先眼): A sentence given in Chinese, for which there seems no precedent. Dōgen regularly uses the term shinsen 身先 (which can mean “one’s future”) in reference to what lies “before one has a body.”

127 “imposing and manifest” from the past (kyōzen no dōdō jōken 向前的堂堂成見): The phrase dōdō jōken 堂堂成見 might also be taken as “an imposing fixed view”; it likely reflects a line in the Yuanwu Foguo chanshi yulu 圓悟佛果禪師語錄, T.1997.47:799a6:

堂堂成見密密難見。

Imposing and manifest; intimate and imperceptible.

Though lost in the translation, Dōgen is playing here and below in this sentence with meanings of the glyph ken 見 (“to see”), used in the sense “view” (S. dr̥ṣṭi) in the phrase “correct view limb of the path.”

“the kōan is realized” (kōan genjō 公案見成): From the famous expression genjō kōan 現成公案 (also written 見成公案), often rendered “the realized kōan” and regularly used in Dōgen’s writing for what is manifestly so; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Realized kōan.” Here, the term genjō 見成 (“realized”) plays on the preceding jōken 成見 (“manifest”) by reversing the order of its two elements.

“he once personally saw” (shinzō ken 親曾見): From a line of verse by Rujing alluded to several times in the Shōbōgenzō:

親曾見佛不相瞞。

He once personally saw the Buddha; he doesn’t deceive.

In Rujing’s verse (Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:130c7-11), the reference is to the arhat Piṇḍola and his claim to have seen Buddha Śākyamuni.

128 “When I had this thought, the buddhas of the ten directions all appeared” (sa ze shiyui ji, jippō butsu kai gen 作是思惟時、十方佛皆現): From a verse in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:9c19) on the Buddha’s decision to teach the three vehicles; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Three vehicles.”

129 “After thinking this, I immediately proceeded to Vārāṇasī” (shiyui ze ji i, soku shu Harana 思惟是事已、即趣波羅奈): From a later line (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:10a3) in the Lotus Sūtra verse just quoted, on the Buddha’s decision to go to the Deer Park at Vārāṇasī to give his first sermon.

示衆云、爾若一生不離叢林、不語十年五載、無人喚爾作啞漢、已後佛也不奈爾何。

[Zhaozhou] addressed the assembly, saying, “If for a lifetime you don’t leave the grove and don’t talk for ten years or five years, no one will call you a mute; after that, even the buddha won’t know what to make of you.”

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “The thirty-seven factors are the action of the monk.”<sup>135</sup> “The action of the monk” is not about the Great Vehicle or the Small Vehicle: among monks, there are buddha monks, bodhisattva monks, śrāvaka monks, and so on. Those who have not left home have never yet succeeded to the correct action of the buddha dharma, have never yet correctly transmitted the great way of the buddha dharma. While there may have been householders who studied the way somewhat as male and female lay followers, there is no precedent of their having mastered the way. When they master the way, they invariably 133 It is “not admiring the sages”; it is “not valuing one’s own spirit” (fubo shoshō nari, fujū korei nari 不慕諸聖なり、不重己靈なり): From a question of Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 to his teacher Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思 (d. 740) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:240b21):

不慕諸聖不重己靈時如何。

How about when one doesn’t admire the sages nor value one’s own spirit?

The two clauses could also read, “They [i.e., ‘people in the realm of the mute’] ‘do not admire the sages; they do not value their own spirit.’”

The Buddha said, “If they are counted as bhikṣu, practice the actions of the monk, and attain the benefits of the monk, these may receive donations. Those at the four fruits and four accesses are counted as monks; the thirty-seven factors are the actions of the monk; the four fruits are the benefits of the monk.”

leave home. How could those who cannot bear to leave home succeed to the rank of a buddha?

しかあるに、二三百年来のあひだ、大宋國に禪宗僧と稱するともがら、おほくはいく、在家の學道と出家の學道と、これ一等なり、といふ。これ、ただ在家人の屎尿を飲食とせんがために狗子となれる類族なり。あるひは國王・大臣にむかひていはく、萬機の心はすなはち祖佛心なり、さらに別心あらず、といふ。王・臣いまだ正説・正法をわきまへず、大悦して師號等をたまふ。かくのごとくの道ある諸僧は、調達なり。啼唾をくらはんがために、かくのごとくの小兒の狂話あり、啼哭といふべし。七佛の眷属にあらず、魔儻・畜生なり。いまだ身心學道をしらず、參學せず、身心出家をしらず。王・臣の、法政にくらく、佛祖の大道をゆめにもみざるによりてかくのごとし。

Nevertheless, for the last two or three hundred years, in the Land of the Great Song, many calling themselves monks of the Chan school have said that the study of the way of householders and the study of the way of renunciants are equivalent. They are a gang that has become dogs only in order to eat the shit and drink the piss of the householders. Sometimes, they tell the king and his ministers that the mind of the myriad affairs of state is the mind of the ancestors and the buddhas, apart from which there is no other mind. The king and his ministers, not having distinguished the true teaching and true dharma, are delighted and confer on them titles of master and the like. Monks with words like this are Devadattas.<sup>136</sup> In order to lick up snot and spittle, they have this sort of crazy talk of little children. How lamentable. They are not followers of the seven buddhas, they are the minions of Māra and beasts. They have never known studying the way with body and mind; they have not investigated, have never known, leaving home with body and mind. Things are like this because the kings and ministers are ignorant of law and governance and have never seen the great way of the buddhas and ancestors even in their dreams.<sup>137</sup>

138 The layman Vimalakīrti (Yuima koji 維摩居士): Protagonist of the popular Vimalakīrti-nirdeśa-sūtra (Yuima kyō 維摩經), in which he appears as a wealthy lay follower of the Buddha. Dōgen’s claim that Vimalakīrti was unable to express many teachings seems to be a sarcastic reference to his famous silence when asked to explain the teaching of nonduality. This is not the only place in the Shōbōgenzō where this celebrated bodhisattva comes in for criticism.

139 The layman Pang Yun (Hō Un koji 龐蘊居士): Renowned lay Chan figure (740?-808), said to have studied under the famed masters Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 and Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷.

he was not admitted to the interior of the hall of Yaoshan and did not reach Jiangxi (Yakusan no, dōō o yurusarezu, Kōzei ni oyobazu 藥山の、堂奥をゆるされず、江西におよばず): I.e., he did not receive the personal instruction of Yaoshan Weiyān 藥山惟儼, successor to Shitou 石頭, nor did he reach the level of his teacher Mazu of Jiangxi 江西馬祖.

140 the Escort Li or the Duke of Wen Yang (Li fuba Yō bunkō 李駙馬・楊文公): I.e., Li Zunxu 李遵勗 (988-1038), high-ranking military officer, student of Chan master Guyin Yuncong 谷隱蘊聰 (965-1032) and compiler of the important collection of Chan biographies Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄; and Yang Yi 楊億 (974-1020), famed literary scholar, student of Shoushan Xingnian 首山省念 (926-993) and an editor of the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, for which he wrote a preface.

“painted cake” (gabyō 晝餅): Best known from the saying that “a painted cake can’t satisfy hunger” (gabyō fujū ki 晝餅不充飢); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “A painted cake can’t satisfy hunger.” Here, likely reflecting Dōgen’s opinion, as expressed in the “Shōbōgenzō gabyō” 正法眼藏晝餅, that our hunger is itself painted and can only be satisfied by a painted cake. This entire sentence is a play on the food metaphor of “studying one’s fill” (sanpō 參飽).

pātra bowl (hou 鉢盂): I.e., the Buddhist monk’s alms bowl.

We widely recommend that deva beings, human beings, dragon beings, and all the beings throughout the ten directions, longing for the distant dharma of the Tathāgata, hasten to leave home, practice the way, and succeed to the rank of a buddha and the rank of an ancestor. Do not listen to the imperfect words of the Chan masters. It is because they do not know the body and do not know the mind that they talk as they do. Or, again, lacking all feeling of compassion for living beings or thought of preserving the buddha dharma, solely to feed on the excrement of householders, they have become evil dogs, dogs with human faces, dogs with human skin, who talk as they do. We should not sit with them; we should not talk with them; we should not rely on them. They have already fallen into the state of beasts while still in this body. If renunciants had more plentiful excrement, they would say that the renunciants are superior; it is because the excrement of renunciants is not enough for these beasts that they talk like this.

The claim that the mind of the householder and the mind of the renunciant are equivalent, whether in the form of evidence or of reasoning, is not to be seen in the texts of the five thousand and more scrolls and has left no trace in the two thousand and more years.<sup>141</sup> The buddhas and ancestors of fifty generations or of forty and more generations have never had this saying.<sup>142</sup> Even becoming a bhikṣu who breaks the precepts or is without the precepts, who is without dharma and without wisdom, is superior to the householder having wisdom and keeping the precepts; for the action of the monk itself is wisdom, is awakening, is the way, is the dharma. Although householders have the good roots and merit appropriate to their lot, they are poor in the good roots and merit of body and mind.<sup>143</sup> Over a lifetime of proselytizing, there was not a single instance of a householder gaining the way.<sup>144</sup> This is because the householder life is not a practice place for studying the way of the buddhas, and because it presents many obstacles. If we seek out the body and mind of those who say that the mind of the myriad affairs of state and the mind of the ancestral masters are equivalent, we will find that they are not yet the body and mind of the buddha dharma, that they have not yet received transmission of the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors. What a pity that, while encountering the true dharma of the buddhas, they have become beasts.

The great master, Śākya, the Honored One, humbly declined to succeed to the rank of his father the king, not because the rank of king was not exalted, but in order to succeed to the highest rank of buddha. The rank of buddha is the rank of a renunciant, a rank respectfully honored by deva beings and human beings of the three realms. It is not one in which King Brahmā or King Śakra share the seat, much less is it a rank in which the human kings and dragon kings of lower realms share the seat; it is the rank of unsurpassed, perfect awakening.<sup>150</sup> This rank preaches the dharma and delivers living beings, radiates light and manifests auspicious signs. The action of this rank of renunciant — this is “correct action,” the action cherished by the buddhas, by the seven buddhas. It is something not “exhaustively investigated” by those who are not “only buddhas with buddhas.”<sup>151</sup> Those who have not left home should attend and serve those who have left home, should prostrate and pay obeisance to them, should cast aside their very lives in offering.

150 King Brahmā or King Śakra (Bonnō Shakuō 梵王・釋王): King of the devas of the brahmā heaven in the first dhyāna heaven of the form realm, and king of the heaven of the thirty-three devas (S. Trāyastriṃśa) in the desire realm, respectively.

151 It is something not “exhaustively investigated” by those who are not “only buddhas with buddhas” (yui butsu yo butsu ni arazareba, gūjin sezarū tokoro nari 唯佛與佛にあらざれば、究盡せざるところなり): From the Lotus Sūtra line; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas.”

釋迦牟尼佛言、出家受戒、是佛種子也、已得度人。

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “To leave home and receive the precepts is the seed of buddhahood. One has already attained deliverance.”<sup>152</sup>

[60:70]

しかあればすなはちしるべし、得度といふは、出家なり。未出家は沈淪にあり、かなしむべし。おほよそ一代の佛説のなかに、出家の功德を讃歎せること、稱計すべからず。釋尊誠説し、諸佛證明す。出家人の破戒不修なるは、得道す、在家人の得道、いまだあらず。帝者の、僧尼を禮拜するとき、僧尼、答拜せず。諸天の、出家人を拜するに、比丘・比丘尼、まったく答拜せず。これ、出家の功德すぐれたるゆえなり。もし出家の比丘・比丘尼に拜せられれば、諸天の宮殿・光明・果報等、たちまちに破壊墜墮すべきがゆえに、かくのごとし。

Thus, we should recognize that “attaining deliverance” is “leaving home”; those who have not yet left home are sunk and are to be pitied. In general, in the Buddha’s preaching over a lifetime, the number of times he praised the merits of leaving home cannot be reckoned. Śākya, the Honored One, preached it with sincerity, and the buddhas attested it. Renunciants who broke the precepts and did not practice have gained the way, while there has never been a householder who gained the way. When the emperor pays obeisance to the monk or nun, the monk or nun does not bow in return. When the devas pay obeisance to the renunciant, the bhikṣu or bhikṣuṇī never bows in return; for the merit of the renunciant is superior. This is so because, were they to receive the bows of the bhikṣu or bhikṣuṇī, their palaces, radiance, karmic rewards, and the like, would immediately disintegrate and collapse.

おほよそ佛法東漸よりこのかた、出家人の得道は、稻麻竹葦のごとし。在家ながら得道せるもの、一人もいまだあらず。すでに佛法その眼耳におよぶときは、いそぎて出家をいとなむ。はかりしりぬ、在家は佛法の在處にあらず。しかあるに、萬機の身心すなはち佛祖の身心なり、といふやからは、いまだかつて佛法を見聞せざるなり、黒闇獄の罪人なり、おのれが言語、なほ見聞せざる愚人なり、國賊なり。萬機の心をもて佛祖の心に同ずるを詮とするは、佛法のすぐれたるによりて、しかいふを帝者よろこぶ。しるべし、佛法すぐれたりといふこと。萬機の心は、假令おのづから佛祖の心に同ずとも、佛祖の身心おのづから萬機の身心とならんとき、萬機の身心なるべからず。萬機心と佛祖心と一等なり、といふ禪師等、すべて心法のゆきかた、様子をしらざるなり。いはんや、佛祖心をゆめにもみることあらんや。

In general, ever since the buddha dharma’s spread to the east, the renunciants who gained the way are like “rice, hemp, bamboo, and reeds,” 152 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): Source unknown.

while there has not been a single person who gained the way as a householder.<sup>153</sup> As soon as the buddha dharma reaches their eyes and ears, they hasten to leave home. We should realize that the householder life is no place for the buddha dharma. Those who nevertheless claim that the body and mind of the myriad affairs of state are the body and mind of the buddhas and ancestors have never seen or heard the buddha dharma; they are evil people in a dark hell; they are ignoramuses who do not see and hear even their own words; they are traitors to the country. They assert that the mind of the myriad affairs of state is the same as the mind of the buddhas and ancestors since the emperors are delighted to hear this said, precisely because the buddha dharma is superior. We should realize that the buddha dharma is superior. Even if the mind of the myriad affairs of state happened to be the same as the mind of the buddhas and ancestors, when the body and mind of the buddhas and ancestors happens to become the body and mind of the myriad affairs of state, it will not be the body and mind of the myriad affairs of state.<sup>154</sup> The Chan masters who claim that the mind of the myriad affairs of state and the mind of the buddhas and ancestors are equivalent know nothing of how the mind works or what it is like; how much less have they seen the mind of the buddhas and ancestors even in their dreams.

おほよそ梵王・釋王・人王・龍王・鬼神王等、おのおの三界の果報に著することなかれ。はやく出家受戒して、諸佛諸祖の道を修習すべし、曠大劫の佛因ならん。みずや、維摩老、もし出家せましかば、維摩よりもすぐれたる維摩比丘をみん。今日はわづかに空生・舍利子・文殊・彌勒等をみる、いまだ半維摩をみず。いはんや三四五の維摩をみんや。もし三四五の維摩をみず、しらざれば、一維摩いまだみず、しらず、保任せざるなり。一維摩いまだ保任せざれば、維摩佛をみず。維摩佛をみざれば、維摩文殊・維摩彌勒・維摩善現・維摩舍利子等、いまだあらざるなり。いはんや維摩山河大地、維摩草木瓦礫・風雨水火・過去現在未來等あらんや。維摩、いまだこれらの光明功德みえざることは、不出家のゆえなり。維摩、もし出家せば、これらの功德あるべきなり。當時、唐朝・宋朝の禪師等、これらの宗旨に達せず、みだりに維摩を擧して作得是とおもひ、道得是といふ。これらのともがら、あはれむべし、言教をしらず、佛法にくらし。

153 “rice, hemp, bamboo, and reeds” (tō ma chiku i 稻麻竹葦): i.e., they are dense and profuse; a simile from Kumārajīva’s translation of the Lotus Sūtra; see Supplementary Notes.

154 Even if the mind of the myriad affairs of state happened to be the same as the mind of the buddhas and ancestors (banki no shin wa, keryō onozukara busso no shin ni dōzu tomo 萬機の心は、假令おのづから佛祖の心に同ずとも): This sentence might be understood to be saying that, even were emperors occasionally to think like Buddhist adepts, when Buddhist adepts occasionally concern themselves with affairs of state, they never think like emperors.

In sum, [we urge] King Brahmā, King Śakra, human kings, dragon kings, demon kings, and the like: do not be attached to your particular karmic consequences in the three realms. You should quickly leave home, receive the precepts, and study the way of the buddhas and ancestors, the cause of buddhahood for vast kalpas. Do you not see that, had old Vimalakīrti left home, we would see a bhikṣu Vimalakīrti superior to Vimalakīrti? Today, we see merely Subhūti, Śāriputra, Mañjuśrī, Maitreya, and the rest; we do not see even half a Vimalakīrti, let alone see three, four or five Vimalakīrtis.<sup>155</sup> If we do not see, do not know, three, four or five Vimalakīrtis, then we have not seen, known or maintained, a single Vimalakīrti. If we have not maintained a single Vimalakīrti, we do not see Buddha Vimalakīrti. If we do not see Buddha Vimalakīrti, then Mañjuśrī Vimalakīrti, Maitreya Vimalakīrti, Subhūti Vimalakīrti, Śāriputra Vimalakīrti, and the rest, do not yet exist. How much less could there be Vimalakīrti of mountains, rivers, and the whole earth; Vimalakīrti of grass, trees, tiles, and pebbles, of wind, rain, water, and fire, of past, present, and future, and so on? That such radiance and virtues are not seen in Vimalakīrti is because he did not leave home; had he left home, he should have these virtues. Now, the Chan masters of the Tang dynasty and Song dynasty, having failed to master these essential points, rashly hold up Vimalakīrti, thinking that what he did was right, and saying that what he said was right. These types are to be pitied: they do not know the spoken teachings and are ignorant of the buddha dharma.

あるいは亦あまりさへは、維摩と釋尊と、その道ひとしとおもひいへるおほし。これらまた、いまだ佛法をしらず、祖道をしらず、維摩をもしらず、はからざるなり。かれらはいく、維摩、默然無言して諸菩薩にしめす、これ如來の無言爲人にひとし、といふ。これ、おほきに佛法をしらず、學道の力量なし、といふべし。如來の有言、すでに自餘とことなり、無言もまた諸類とひとしかるべからず。しかあれば、如來の一黙と維摩の一黙と、相似の比論にすらおよぶべからず。言説はことなりとも、默然はひとしかるべし、と憶想せるともがらの力量をさぐるには、佛邊人とするにもおよばざるなり。かなしむべし、かれらいまだ聲色の見聞なし、いはんや跳聲色の光明あらんや。いはんや默の默を學すべしとだにもしらず、ありとだにもきかず。おほよそ諸類と諸類と、その動靜なほことなり、いかでか釋尊と諸類とおなじといひ、おなじからずと比論せん。これ佛祖の堂奥に參學せざるともがら、かくのごとくいふなり。

155 Today, we see merely Subhūti, Śāriputra, Mañjuśrī, Maitreya, and the rest (konnichi wa wazuka ni Kūshō Sharishi Monju Miroku tō o miru 今日わづかに空生・舍利子・文殊・彌勒等をみる): Likely meaning that one finds regular mention of these famous monks in the Buddhist sūtras but not of Vimalakīrti (who, of course, is a literary creation of the Vimalakīrti Sūtra).

Then, on top of that, there are many who think and who say that the words of Vimalakīrti and Śākya, the Honored One, are equivalent. These also have never known the buddha dharma, never known the way of the ancestors, never known or evaluated Vimalakīrti. They say that Vimalakīrti's instructing the bodhisattvas in silence, without a word, is equivalent to the Tathāgata's being without a word for the sake of the other. This has to be called knowing nothing of the buddha dharma and having no ability to study the way. Since the words of the Tathāgata are different from those of others, his wordlessness must also not be the equivalent of other types. Thus, the silence of the Tathāgata and the silence of Vimalakīrti do not even warrant a comparison of their similarities. When we seek out the abilities of those who imagine that, while their speech is different, their silence must be equivalent, they do not amount even to those we might take to be in the vicinity of the Buddha. How sad! They have yet to see and hear the sights and sounds, let alone have the radiance springing forth from sights and sounds. Not to mention that they do not even know that we should study the silence of silence, have not even heard that it exists.<sup>156</sup> In general, the various types differ in their behaviors; how could we compare Śākya, the Honored One, and the various types, saying they are the same or not the same? It is those who do not study in the interior of the hall of the buddhas and ancestors who talk like this.

あるいは邪人おほくおもはく、言説動容はこれ假法なり、寂默凝然はこれ眞實なり。かくのごとくいふ、また佛法にあらず。梵天・自在天等の經教を傳聞せるともがらの所計なり。佛法いかでか動靜にかかはらん。佛道に動靜ありや、動靜なしや、動靜を接すや、動靜に接せらるや、と審細に參學すべし。而今の晩學、たゆむことなかれ。

Or, again, there are many misguided people who think that speech and behavior are provisional dharmas, whereas silence and stillness are true reality. Talk like this is also not the buddha dharma; it is the thinking of those who have heard the scriptures of the deva Brahmā or the deva Īśvara, and the like.<sup>157</sup> How could the buddha dharma be concerned with movement and stillness? In the way of the buddhas, is there motion and stillness or is there not motion and stillness? Does it engage with motion and stillness? Is it engaged by motion and stillness? We should study this in detail. Late students of the present, do not be lax.

156 we should study the silence of silence (moku no moku o gaksu beshi 黙の黙を學すべし): This phrase might also be parsed, "silence should study silence."

157 the scriptures of the deva Brahmā or the deva Īśvara, and the like (Bonten Jizaiten tō no kyōgyō 梵天・自在天等の經教): i.e., the texts of Hinduism.

現在大宋國をみるに、佛祖の大道を參學せるともがら、斷絶せるがごとし、兩三箇あるにあらず。維摩は是にして一黙あり、いまは一黙せざるは維摩よりも劣なり、とおもへるともがらのみあり、さらに佛法の活路なし。あるいは亦、維摩の一黙はすなはち世尊の一黙なり、とおもふともがらのみあり、さらに分別の光明あらざるなり。かくのごとくおもひ、いふともがら、すべて、いまだかつて佛法見聞の參學なし、といふべし。大宋國人にあればとて、佛法なるらん、とおもふことなかれ。その道理、あきらめやすかるべし。

When we look at the Land of the Great Song at present, it is as if those who study the great way of the buddhas and ancestors are extinct, with not even two or three remaining. There are only those who think that Vimalakīrti was right in his silence, while now those who are not silent are inferior to Vimalakīrti; they are completely without the life-saving path of the buddha dharma. Or, again, there are only those who think that the silence of Vimalakīrti is the silence of the World-Honored One; they are completely without the light of discrimination.<sup>158</sup> It must be said that those who think and talk like this have no study of the experience of the buddha dharma. Do not think that, because they are people of the Land of the Great Song, [what they say] is the buddha dharma. The truth of this should be easy to understand.

joining the palms and making inquiries (gasshō monjin 合掌問訊): I.e., greeting one another with a bow.

161 exchanging head for tail (i tō kan bi 以頭換尾): A Chinese colloquialism meaning “to get something backwards.” The subsequent phrases are Dōgen’s variations.

162 our eyebrows and beard will fall off and our face will break up (bishu daraku shi, menmoku hagan suru 眉鬚墮落し、面目破顔する): The former phrase occurs often in Zen texts as the consequence of a mistake; the latter phrase is unusual, and the likely sense of hagan 破顔 (normally, “break into a smile”) here does not seem to occur elsewhere in the literature.

163 gruel in the morning and rice at noon (sōchō shuku goji han 早朝粥午時飯); staying in the grove, playing with the spirit (zai sōrin rō zeikon 在叢林弄精魂); pointing directly from the curved wood chair (kyokumoku zājō jikishi 曲木座上直指): Three six-character Chinese phrases on the monastic life. The “grove” (sōrin 叢林) is a standard expression for the monastery; “playing with the spirit” (rō zeikon 弄精魂) is a common sarcastic reference to meditation. The “curved wood chair” (shukumoku za 曲木座) is the seat from which the master teaches.

164 Old Zhaozhou’s assembly of less than twenty (rō Jōshū no fuman nijū shu 老趙州の不滿二十衆): Reference to the community of Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗, the small size of which is also noted in “Shōbōgenzō hakujushi” 正法眼藏柏樹子.

165 Yaoshan’s assembly of less than ten (Yakusan no fuman jū shu 藥山の不滿十衆): The community of Yaoshan Weiyan 藥山惟嚴.

166 Fenyang’s assembly of seven or eight (Funyō no shichi hachi shu 汾陽の七八衆): The community of Fenyang Shanzhao 汾陽善昭 (947-1024).

167 wrong livelihood (jamyō 邪命): A term traditionally referring to improper ways of making a living for a bhikṣu or bhikṣuṇī.

[60:78]

釋迦牟尼佛言、諸聲聞人、未得正命。

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “Śrāvakas have not yet attained correct livelihood.”<sup>168</sup>

[60:79] {2:149}

しかあればすなはち、聲聞の教・行・證、いまだ正命にあらざるなり。しかあるを、近日庸流いはく、聲聞・菩薩を分別すべからず、その威儀・戒律、ともにもちいるべし、といひて、小乗聲聞の法をもて、大乘菩薩法の威儀・進止を判ず。

Thus, the teaching, practice, and verification of the śrāvaka are not yet “correct livelihood.” Nevertheless, mediocrities in recent days, declaring that we should not distinguish between śrāvaka and bodhisattva, but should follow the deportment and precepts of both, use the dharma of the śrāvaka of the Small Vehicle to judge the deportment and behavior of the bodhisattva of the Great Vehicle.

[60:80]

釋迦牟尼佛言、聲聞持戒、菩薩破戒。

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “The śrāvaka keeps the precepts; the bodhisattva breaks the precepts.”<sup>169</sup>

[60:81]

しかあれば、聲聞の持戒とおもへる、もし菩薩戒に比望するがごときは、聲聞戒みな破戒なり。自餘の定慧も、またかくのごとし。たとひ不殺生等の相、おのづから聲聞と菩薩あひにたりとも、かならず別なるべきなり、天地懸隔の論におよぶべからざるなり。いはんや佛佛祖祖正傳の宗旨と諸聲聞と、ひとしからんや。正命のみにあらず、清淨命あり。しかあればすなはち、佛祖に參學するのみ、正命なるべし。論師等の見解、もちいるべからず、未得正命なるがゆえに、本分命にあらず。

Thus, were we to compare what is thought of as the śrāvaka's keeping the precepts with the bodhisattva precepts, the śrāvaka precepts are 168 Buddha Śākyamuni (Śākyamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): Source unknown.

169 Buddha Śākyamuni (Śākyamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): Perhaps based (very loosely) on a passage in the Ratnakūṭa-sūtra (Da baoji jing 大寶積經, T.310:11.516c19-22):

爾時世尊告優波離、汝今當知、聲聞菩薩學清淨戒、所發心所修行異。優波離、有聲聞乘持清淨戒、於菩薩乘名大破戒。有菩薩乘持清淨戒、於聲聞乘名大破戒。

At that time, the World-Honored One addressed Upāli, saying, “Now you should know that, while the śrāvaka and the bodhisattva study the pure precepts, what they aspire to and what they practice are different. Upāli, keeping the pure precepts in the śrāvaka vehicle is called seriously breaking the precepts in the bodhisattva vehicle; and keeping the pure precepts in the bodhisattva vehicle is called seriously breaking the precepts in the śrāvaka vehicle.

all “breaking the precepts.” The others, concentration and wisdom, are also like this.<sup>170</sup> Even though the forms of not taking life and the rest happen to resemble each other for the śrāvaka and the bodhisattva, they are necessarily different; we cannot even discuss it in terms of the gap between heaven and earth.<sup>171</sup> How much less could the instruction directly transmitted by buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor be equivalent to that of the śrāvakas. It is not only correct livelihood; there is pure livelihood.<sup>172</sup> Thus, only studying with the buddhas and ancestors is correct livelihood. Do not use the interpretation of the treatise masters and the like; since they have not attained correct livelihood, it is not the livelihood of the original lot.<sup>173</sup>

正精進道支とは、袂出通身の行李なり、袂出通身打人面なり。倒騎佛殿打一匝、兩匝三四五匝なるがゆえに、九九算來八十二なり、重報君の千萬條なり、換頭也十字縱横なり、換面也縱横十字なり、入室來・上堂來なり、望州亭相見了なり、烏石嶺相見了なり。僧堂前相見了なり、佛殿裏相見了なり。兩鏡相對して三枚影あるをいふ。

“The correct effort limb of the path” means the observance of gouging out the body throughout; it means gouging out the body throughout and hitting the person’s face.<sup>174</sup> Since it means riding backwards in the buddha hall, circling it once, circling it twice, circling it three, four or five times, it is nine nines adding up to eighty-two.<sup>175</sup> It means “repeatedly

170 The others, concentration and wisdom (jiyo no jō e 自餘の定慧): I.e., the other two members of the threefold discipline of precepts (kai 戒), meditation (jō 定), and wisdom (e 慧).

171 the forms of not taking life and the rest (fusesshō tō no sō 不殺生等の相): I.e., the form in which the precept against killing and the other precepts are given.

172 It is not only correct livelihood; there is pure livelihood (shōmyō nomi ni arazu, shōjōmyō ari 正命のみにあらず、清淨命あり): The sense is not certain; perhaps the claim is that livelihood in the tradition of the buddhas and ancestors has a purity that goes beyond the merely correct livelihood of the precepts.

173 livelihood of the original lot (honbun myō 本分命): An unusual expression, perhaps meaning something like “authentic livelihood.” The term honbun 本分 (“original lot”) is used in reference to one’s fundamental nature, what one truly is.

174 gouging out the body throughout and hitting the person’s face (kesshutsu tsūshin ta ninmen 袂出通身打人面): Variation on the words of Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Gouge out Bodhidharma’s eye.” In his discussion of this saying in “Shōbōgenzō ganzei” 正法眼藏眼睛, Dōgen glosses the predicate tanin 打人 (“hit people”) here as “to make people”; hence, our passage might be rendered, “gouging out the entire body and making a person’s face of it.” For the expression tsūshin 通身 (“body throughout”), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “His body throughout is hands and eyes.”

175 riding backwards in the buddha hall (tōki butsuden 倒騎佛殿): A common image in Zen literature for the untrammelled action of the adept; see, e.g., Biyan lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:211c17:

repaying the lord” a thousand myriad times; it means changing the head is crisscross, vertical and horizontal; changing the face is “vertical and horizontal, crisscross.”<sup>176</sup> It is entering the room and ascending to the hall.<sup>177</sup> It is “having met at Wangzhou pavilion”; it is “having met at Wushi ridge”; it is “having met in front of the monks’ hall”; it is having met inside the buddha hall.<sup>178</sup> It means two mirrors facing each other and three reflections.<sup>179</sup>

倒騎牛兮入佛殿

Riding backwards on an ox, entering the buddha hall.

nine nines adding up to eighty-two (kyū kyū sanrai hachijūni 九九算來八十二): Play on a saying of Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃 (864-949) (Yunmen Kuangzhen chanshi guanglu 雲門匡真禪師廣錄, T.1988.47:545c4):

問、如何是向上一路。師云、九九八十一。

[Someone] asked, “What is the one road beyond?”

The Master said, “Nine nines are eighty-one.”

176 “repeatedly repaying the lord” (jū hō kun 重報君); changing the head is crisscross, vertical and horizontal (kantō ya jūji jūō 換頭也十字縱橫); “changing the face is vertical and horizontal, crisscross” (kanmen ya jūō jūji 換面也縱橫十字): Dōgen seems here to be reflecting capping phrases by Xuedou Zhongxian 雪竇重顯 (980-1052) on the Cantong qi 參同契 of Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (Mingjue chanshi yu lu 明覺禪師語錄, T.1996.47:697b6):

然於一一法(重報君)。

Thus, for each and every dharma (repeatedly repaying the lord).

And T.1996.47:697b10):

當言用及處(縱橫十字)。

Expressed according to function and place (vertical and horizontal, crisscross).

For the expressions “changing the head” (kantō 換頭) and “changing the face” (kanmen 換面), see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Turning the head and changing the face.”

177 entering the room and ascending to the hall (nisshitsu rai jōdō rai 入室來・上堂來): I.e., the student entering the abbot’s quarters for personal instruction, and the master delivering a formal convocation address in the dharma hall.

178 “having met at Wangzhou pavilion” (Bōshū tei shōken ryō 望州亭相見了): This and the following clauses of this sentence reflect the words of Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908), e.g., at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:272, case 290):

雪峰示衆云、望州亭與諸人相見了也、烏石嶺與諸人相見了也、僧堂前與諸人相見了也。

Xuefeng addressed the assembly, saying, “I met everyone in front of the saṃgha hall. I met everyone at Wangzhou Pavilion. I met everyone at Wushi Ridge.”

Wangzhou Pavilion (Bōshū tei 望州亭) and Wushi Ridge (Useki rei 烏石嶺) are spots renowned for their beauty — the former at Xuefeng 雪峰; the latter, probably the mountain of that name in Fujian.

179 two mirrors facing each other and three reflections (ryōkyō sōtai shite sanmai yō aru 兩鏡相對して三枚影ある): “Two mirrors facing each other” is a common image in Buddhist texts, though the “three reflections” here is unusual.

正念道支は、被自瞞の八九成なり。念よりさらに發智すると學するは、捨父逃逝なり、念中發智と學するは、纏縛之甚なり。無念はこれ正念、といふは、外道なり。また、地水火風の精靈を念とすべからず、心意識の顛倒を念と稱せず。まさに汝得吾皮肉骨髓、すなはち正念道支なり。

“The correct mindfulness limb of the path” is eight- or nine-tenths deceived by yourself. To study that wisdom is generated after mindfulness is “abandoning the father and running away”; to study that wisdom is generated in the midst of mindfulness is bondage in the extreme.<sup>180</sup> To say that no thought is correct mindfulness is an other path.<sup>181</sup> Again, we should not take the spirits of earth, water, fire, and wind as mindfulness; we do not designate as mindfulness the inverted views of mind, mentation, and consciousness.<sup>182</sup> Truly, you’ve gotten my skin, flesh, bones, and marrow is “the correct mindfulness limb of the path.”<sup>183</sup>

“The correct concentration limb of the path” means sloughing off the buddhas and ancestors; it means sloughing off correct concentration; it means he can take it up; it means splitting the crown of the head to make

180 “abandoning the father and running away” (shafu tōzei 捨父逃逝): From the famous parable of the prodigal son in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:16b26).

181 To say that no thought is correct mindfulness is an other path (munen wa kore shōnen, to iu wa, gedō nari 無念はこれ正念、といふは、外道なり): “Other path” renders gedō 外道, used in reference to non-Buddhist religions (S. tīrthika). The celebration of “no thought” (munen 無念) was a common feature of some early Chan texts, especially of the Southern School, though it is not clear whether Dōgen had a particular example in mind here. The translation masks the play here with the term nen 念: the passage could as well be read “no thought is correct thought” or “no mindfulness is correct mindfulness.”

182 inverted views of mind, mentation, and consciousness (shin i shiki no tendō 心意識の顛倒): i.e., our ordinary deluded states of mind. “Inverted” renders tendō 顛倒 (S. viparyasta), used for views that are “upside down,” or, as we might say, “just backwards.”

183 you’ve gotten my skin, flesh, bones, and marrow (nyo toku go hi niku kotsu zui 汝得吾皮肉骨髓): From the famous story, known as Daruma hi niku kotsu zui 達摩皮肉骨髓, of Bodhidharma’s testing of four disciples, to whom he said of each in turn that he (or, in one case, she) had gotten his skin, flesh, bones, and marrow. See shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:230, case 201; and Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

* * * * *

184 he can take it up (ta ze nō ko 他是能舉): Perhaps reflecting another of Xuedou's 雪竇 capping phrases on the Cantong qi 參同契 (see above, Note 176) (Mingjue chanshi yu lu 明覺禪師語錄, T.1996.47:697a27):

竺土大仙心(誰是能舉)

The mind of the great sage of Sindhu (who can take this up?).

splitting the crown of the head to make nostrils (bōrai chōnei sa bikū 剖來頂額作鼻孔): This and the following two phrases are given in Chinese, as if quoting a text, but no source is known. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Crown of the head,” “Nose.”

185 holding up an udumbara flower within the treasury of the true dharma eye (Shōbōgenzō ri nen udonge 正法眼藏裏拈優曇華): This and the next phrase play on the famous legend of the first transmission of Zen on Vulture Peak, in which Śākyamuni held up a flower (in Dōgen's version, identified as an udumbara blossom) and his disciple Mahākāśyapa smiled. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Hold up a flower.”

186 the wooden ladle is broken (mokushaku ha 木杓破): The “broken wooden ladle” (ha mokushaku 破木杓) is regularly used in Zen texts for something worthless (often in an ironic positive sense).

187 lurking in the grass for six years; the flower opening in a single night (raku sō rokunen, ke kai ichiya 落草六年、華開一夜): Reference to the six years Prince Siddhārtha spent in spiritual practice and the night of his awakening under the bodhi tree. The expression “lurking in the grass for six years” (raku sō rokunen 落草六年) likely reflects a line of verse by Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:122b14) quoted elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō:

六年落草野狐精

For six years, a fox spirit, lurking in the grass.

“The flower opening in a single night” is also reminiscent of the verse by Xuedou Zhijian 雪竇智鑑 (1105-1192) (at Jiatai pudeng lu 嘉泰普燈錄, ZZ.137:258a2-3) that Dōgen quotes in his “Shōbōgenzō mitsugo 密語”:

The World-Honored One has secret words;

For Kāśyapa, they are not concealed.

Throughout the night, a rain of falling blossoms;

In the whole city, the streams are fragrant.

188 “when the conflagration at the end of kalpa rages, and the chiliocosm is all destroyed,” “go along with it” (kōka tōnen, daisen ku e, zui ta ko 劫火洞然、大千俱壞、隨他去): From a conversation involving Dasui Fazhen 大隋法真 (834-919) cited in Dōgen's shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:138, case 24); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Goes along with it.”

190 We should cut them off; we should slough them off (zadan subeshi, datsuraku subeshi 坐斷すべし、脱落すべし): The term zadan 坐斷, in ordinary parlance meaning “to occupy [a territory]”, is used in Zen texts in the sense “to break completely,” “to reject totally” (where za 坐 is taken as za 挫); it is often interpreted in Sōtō literature as “sitting completely” or “sitting and cutting off.” Here, its juxtaposition with datsuraku 脱落 is reminiscent of the admonition Dōgen attributes to Rujing that we should “just sit” (shikan taza 只管打坐) and “slough off body and mind” (shinjin datsuraku 身心脱落). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Just sit” and “Body and mind sloughed off.”

INTRODUCTION

This chapter was composed in the winter of 1243, at Yamashibu 禪師峰 (or Zenji Peak), in Echizen. It occurs as number 61 in the seventy-five-chapter compilation of the Shōbōgenzō, number 51 in the sixty-chapter compilation, and number 65 in the Honzan edition.

The text, one of the shortest in the Shōbōgenzō, represents a commentary on two sayings on the phrase, “the song of the dragon in the dried-up tree” — a common Zen metaphor for vitality within repose (or the spiritual functions of a Zen master), reflected in similar expressions in our text: “the roar of the lion in the skull,” “the eyeball in the skull,” “the pregnant column.” Dōgen begins his comments by distinguishing the “dried-up tree” in these sayings from the common phrase “dried-up tree and dead ashes,” often used to represent a state of mental quiescence. Unlike such a state, Dōgen says, the “dried-up tree” of the buddhas and ancestors can “meet the spring” and “sprout.” This “sprouting” is “the song of the dragon,” and it is precisely the state of being “dried” that enables one to sing it. He concludes his brief remarks by identifying the Zen masters’ talk about “the song of the dragon” with the countless tunes sung by the dragon.

Song of the Dragon

舒州投子山慈濟大師、因僧問、枯木裏還有龍吟也無。師曰、我道、髑髏裏有師子吼。

Great Master Ciji of Mount Touzi from Shuzhou was asked by a monk, “Within the dried-up tree, is there the song of the dragon or not?”<sup>1</sup>

The Master said, “I say, within the skull, there’s the roar of the lion.”<sup>2</sup>

枯木死灰の談は、もとより外道の所教なり。しかあれども、外道のいふところの枯木と、佛祖のいふところの枯木と、はるかにことなるべし。外道は枯木を談すといへども、枯木をしらず、いはんや龍吟をきかんや。外道は、枯木は朽木ならん、とおもへり、不可逢春と學せり。

1 Great Master Ciji of Mount Touzi from Shuzhou (Joshū Tōsuzan Jisai daishi 舒州投子山慈濟大師): i.e., Touzi Datong 投子大同 (819-914), a disciple of Cuiwei Wuxue 翠微無學, in the lineage of Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思. “Great Master Ciji” 慈濟大師 is a posthumous title. Shuzhou 舒州 is in the vicinity of present-day Anqing 安慶 in Anhui. This conversation can be found at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:319a29-b1.

“dried-up tree” (koboku 枯木): Or “dead tree,” “withered tree,” etc.; the somewhat infelicitous translation “dried-up” seeks to preserve lexical continuity with Dōgen’s other uses of ko 枯 (“to dry out,” “to be dried out”) in this text. The term is regularly used in Zen literature for an immobile state of meditation; see below, Note 3. The phrase “dragon’s song in the dried-up tree” (koboku ryūgin 枯木龍吟) evokes the sound of the wind in bare branches; often used in Zen to suggest action within repose, or the power of life within the seemingly inanimate.

“song of the dragon” (ryūgin 龍吟): The word gin (translated here as “song”) is used in reference to a range of sounds, both human and animal, from singing, chanting, and reciting, to crying, moaning, sighing, humming, etc. The term ryūgin (“dragon song”) is used in traditional music to refer both to a type of flute (ryūteki 龍笛), and to a melody in court music (ryūgin chō 龍吟調).

2 “skull” (dokuro 髑髏): i.e., of a skeleton; often used in Zen texts in a sense similar to “dried-up tree.”

“Roar of the lion” (shishi ku 師子吼): S. simha-nāda; regularly used in Buddhist literature for the preaching of a buddha.

Talk of “dried-up trees and dead ashes” is originally a teaching of an other path.<sup>3</sup> Nevertheless, there should be a big difference between the “dried-up tree” spoken of by other paths and the “dried-up tree” spoken of by the buddhas and ancestors. While the other paths talk of “dried-up trees,” they do not know “dried-up trees,” much less do they hear “the song of the dragon.” The other paths think that the “dried-up tree” is a rotted tree; they study that it cannot “meet the spring.”<sup>4</sup>

佛祖道の枯木は、海枯の參學なり。海枯は木枯なり、木枯は逢春なり。木の不動著は枯なり。いまの山木・海木・空木等、これ枯木なり。萌芽も枯木龍吟なり、百千萬圍とあるも、枯木の兒孫なり。枯の相・性・體・力は、佛祖道の枯椿なり、非枯椿なり。山谷木あり、田里木あり。山谷木、よのなかに松栢と稱す。田里木、よのなかに人天と稱す。依根葉分布、これを佛祖と稱す。本末須歸宗、すなはち參學なり。かくのごとくなる、枯木の長法身なり、枯木の短法身なり。もし枯木にあらざれば、いまだ龍吟せず、いまだ枯木にあらざれば、龍吟を打失せず。幾度逢春不變心は、渾枯の龍吟なり。宮・商・角・徵・羽に不群なりといへども、宮・商・角・徵・羽は、龍吟の前後二三子なり。

The “dried-up trees” that the buddhas and ancestors speak of is the study of “the ocean drying up.”<sup>5</sup> The ocean drying up is the tree drying out; the tree drying out is “meeting the spring.” The tree’s not moving is “dried.” The present mountain trees, ocean trees, sky trees, and teaching of an other path (gedō no shokyō 外道の所教): I.e., something taught in non-Buddhist religious traditions. While the term gedō (S. tīrthika) is usually used in reference to Hinduism and other Indian religions, Dōgen is no doubt thinking here of Daoist texts like the Zhuangzi 莊子. The second book (Qiwu lun 齊物論, KR.5c0126.02.1a) of this work opens with Jiqi of Nanguo 南郭子綦 leaning on his armrest and gazing at the heavens. His companion Yancheng Ziyou 顏成子遊 exclaims,

3 “dried-up trees and dead ashes” (koboku shikai 枯木死灰): Or, as we might say, “dead wood and cold ashes”; a common expression in Zen texts, often used in a pejorative sense, for the mind in trance. A term regularly used in Zen literature for an immobile state of meditation. In his “Shōbōgenzō butsudō” 正法眼藏佛道, Dōgen quotes the passage in the Linjian lu 林間錄, by Juefan Huihong 覺範慧洪 (1071-1128), that criticizes those who would treat Bodhidharma as a practitioner of dhyāna, thus locating him among the partisans of “dried-up trees and dead ashes.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dried-up tree” and “Practitioner of dhyāna.”

何居乎、形固可使如槁木、而心固可使如死灰乎。

“What’s this? Can you actually make the body like a dried-up tree and the mind like dead ashes?”

4 “meet the spring” (hō shun 逢春): Dōgen here introduces a term from the verse by Damei Fachang 大梅法常 (752-839) that he will quote in the next section. The sense here is likely “revive after the dead of winter.”

5 “the ocean drying up” (kaiko 海枯): Allusion to a saying, drawn from a verse by the poet Du Xunhe 杜荀鶴 (846-907), that occurs often in Zen literature (See, e.g., Zongjing lu 宗鏡錄, T.2016.48:564b12):

the rest — these are the “dried-up tree.” The “germination of a sprout” is the “song of the dragon in the dried-up tree”; though it may have a circumference measured in hundreds of thousands of myriads, it is the descendant of the dried-up tree.<sup>6</sup> The mark, nature, substance, and power of “dried” is “a dried post” and “not a dried post,” spoken of by the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>7</sup>

There are trees of mountains and valleys; there are trees of paddies and villages. The trees of mountains and valleys are known in the world as pines and cypress; the trees of paddies and villages are known in the world as humans and devas. “The leaves spread based on the root”: this is known as the buddhas and ancestors; “root and branch return to the source”: this is their study.<sup>8</sup> Being like this is the dried-up tree’s long

海枯終見底、人死不知心。

When the ocean dries up, we finally see the bottom;

When a person dies, we do not know his mind.

Dōgen plays with variations on this saying elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō and will return to it in section 7, below.

6 “germination of a sprout” (hōga 萌芽): Presumably the “sprout” that appears when the dried-up tree “meets the spring.” While seemingly not a term of art in Zen literature and not used elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings, this expression is somewhat reminiscent of the common “before the germination of any portent” (chinchō mibō 朕兆未萌), used to represent the “unborn” (mushō 無生).

7 The mark, nature, substance, and power of “dried” (ko no sō shō tai riki 枯の相・性・體・力): Probably here indicating something like “the ultimate meaning of ‘dried.’” The phrase draws on a famous line in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:5c11-13) to which Dōgen often refers; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas.”

“a dried post” (koshō 枯椿); “not a dried post” (hi koshō 非枯椿): Or, we might say, “a rotted stake.” Likely a reference to a saying by Shushan Guangren 疏山光仁 (or Kuangren 匡仁, 837-909) included in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:270, case 285):

疏山示衆云、病僧咸通年已前、會法身邊事。咸通年已後、會法身向上事。雲門出問云、如何是法身邊事。師曰、枯椿。曰、如何是法身向上事。師曰、非枯椿。

Shushan addressed the assembly, saying, “Before the Xiantong years [860-873], I understood things in the vicinity of the dharma body; after the Xiantong years, I understood things beyond the dharma body.”

Yunmen asked, “What are things in the vicinity of the dharma body?”

The Master said, “A dried post.”

[Yunmen] asked, “What are things beyond the dharma body?”

The Master said, “Not a dried post.”

8 “The leaves spread based on the root” (e kon yō bunpu 依根葉分布); “root and branch return to the source” (honmatsu shu ki shū 本末須歸宗): From the famous poem Cantong qi 參同契, by Shitou Xiqian 石頭希遷 (700-790) (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:459b15).

dharma body, the dried-up tree's short dharma body.<sup>9</sup> One who is not a dried-up tree does not yet sing the dragon song; one who is not a dried-up tree does not lose the dragon song.<sup>10</sup> “How many springs has it met without changing its mind?” — this is the song of the dragon entirely dried.<sup>11</sup> It does not belong with kyū shō kaku chi u; but kyū shō kaku chi u are the second or third sons of the song of the dragon.<sup>12</sup>

しかあるに、這僧道の枯木裏還有龍吟也無は、無量劫のなかにはじめて問頭に現成せり、話頭の現成なり。投子道の我道髑髏裏有師子吼は、有甚麼掩處なり、屈己推人也未休なり、髑髏遍野なり。

Nevertheless, this monk's saying, “In the dried-up tree, is there the song of the dragon or not?” is realized in a question for the first time in innumerable kalpas; it is the realization of a statement.<sup>13</sup> Touzi's saying, “I say there's the roar of the lion in the skull,” is, “is there something

---

9 long dharma body (chō hosshin 長法身); short dharma body (tan hosshin 短法身): From the popular Zen saying, “the long one is a long dharma body; the short one is a short dharma body” (chōsha chō hosshin tansha tan hosshin 長者長法身短者短法身); i.e., whether long or short, it is the dharma body of the buddha.

10 does not lose the dragon song (ryūgin o tashitsu sezu 龍吟を打失せず): Perhaps reflecting the use of tashitsu 打失 (“to lose”) in the sense “to slough off,” “to leave behind” — as in the expression (quoted several times in the Shōbōgenzō) “to lose the eyes” (tashitsu ganzei 打失眼睛) in reference to awakening.

11 “How many springs has it met without changing its mind?” (kido hō shun fu hen shin 幾度逢春不變心): Or “without changing its core.” From a verse by Damei Fachang 大梅法常 (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:254c12-13):

摧殘枯木倚寒林、幾度逢春不變心。

Broken dried-up tree keeping to the cold forest.

How many times has it met the spring without changing its mind?

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dried-up tree.”

12 It does not belong with *kyū shō kaku chi u (kyū shō kaku chi u ni fugun nari 宮・商・角・徵・羽に不群なり): i.e., it is not music as understood through the five notes of the traditional scale of Chinese music: gong 宮, shang 商, jue 角, zheng 徵, yu 羽. Dōgen is here playing on the common uses of ryūgin in reference to music (see above, Note 1) — a play he will continue below.

the second or third sons of the song of the dragon (ryūgin no zengo nisan shi 龍吟の前後二三子): Or, perhaps, “two or three former or later sons of the song of the dragon.” Taking shi 子 here as “child” (as read at Shōbōgenzō monge 正法眼藏聞解, SCZ:7:563). The point would seem to be that the musical scale is derivative of the dragon's song.

13 the realization of a statement (watō no genjō 話頭の現成): i.e., not merely a question but a significant utterance.

香嚴寺襲燈大師、因僧問、如何是道。師云、枯木裏龍吟。僧曰、不會。師云、髑髏裏眼睛。後有僧問石霜、如何是枯木裏龍吟。霜云、猶帶喜在。僧曰、如何是髑髏裏眼睛。霜云、猶帶識在。又有僧問曹山、如何是枯木裏龍吟。山曰、血脈不斷。僧曰、如何是髑髏裏眼睛。山云、乾不盡。僧曰、未審、還有得聞者麼。山云、盡大地未有一箇不聞。僧曰、未審、龍吟是何章句。山云、也不知是何章句。聞者皆喪。

Great Master Xideng of Xiangyan Monastery was asked by a monk, “What is the way?”<sup>16</sup>

The Master said, “The dragon song in the dried-up tree.”

The monk said, “I don’t understand.”

The Master said, “The eyeball in the skull.”

Later, a monk asked Shishuang, “What is the dragon song in the dried-up tree?”<sup>17</sup>

Shuang said, “Still harboring joy.”

14 “is there something concealed?” (u jinmo en sho 有甚麼掩處): i.e., it is everywhere obvious. Likely reflecting another saying of Touzi 投子 (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:319b25-26):

問、如何是火焰裏藏身。師曰、有什麼掩處。

[Someone] asked, “What is the body hidden within flames?”

The Master said, “Is there something concealed?”

15 “his humbling himself and promoting others never ceases” (kukko suinin ya mikyū 屈己推人也未休): The sense here may be simply that Touzi’s words are “never ceasing.” Likely reflecting another saying of Touzi 投子 (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:320a21-22):

問、七佛是文殊弟子。文殊還有師也無。師曰、適來恁麼道也、大似屈己推人。

[Someone] asked, “The seven buddhas are the disciples of Mañjuśrī. Does Mañjuśrī have a master?”

The Master said, “To talk the way you just did looks like humbling yourself and promoting another.”

“skulls fill the fields” (dokuro hen ya 髑髏遍野): Though this Zen expression might be read in a negative sense, presumably in its context here it is intended to suggest that the roaring skulls Touzi speaks of are ubiquitous. The expression can be found, e.g., attributed to Gushan 鼓山 at Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:347c11).

16 Great Master Xideng of Xiangyan Monastery (Kyōgenji Shūtō daishi 香嚴寺襲燈大師): i.e., Xiangyan Zhixian 香嚴智閑 (d. 898). This discussion of the dragon song occurs in several collections, including Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:142, case 28).

17 Shishuang (Sekisō 石霜): i.e., Shishuang Qingzhu 石霜慶諸 (807-888).

The monk said, “What is the eyeball in the skull?”

Shuang said, “Still harboring consciousness.”

Again, a monk asked Caoshan, “What is the dragon song in the dried-up tree?”<sup>18</sup>

Shan said, “The blood vessel not severed.”<sup>19</sup>

The monk said, “What is the eyeball in the skull?”

Shan said, “Not entirely dry.”

The monk said, “Well, can anyone hear it?”

Shan said, “On all the whole earth, there isn’t one who can’t hear it.”

The monk said, “Well, what verse does the dragon sing?”

Shan said, “I don’t know what verse it is. Everyone who hears it loses his life.”<sup>20</sup>

[61:6] {2:153}

The hearer and the singer of whom they are trying to speak here are not equal to the singer of the dragon’s song; this tune is the dragon’s singing.<sup>21</sup> “In the dried-up tree,” “in the skull” — these are not about inside

18 Caoshan (Sōzan 曹山): i.e., Caoshan Benzhi 曹山本寂 (840-901).

19 “The blood vessel” (kechimyaku 血脈): Or “bloodline”; a standard Zen expression for the lineage of the buddhas and ancestors.

20 “Everyone who hears it loses his life” (monja kai sō 聞者皆喪): Or “all who hear it are to be mourned”; taking sō here as in sōshitsu 喪失 (“loss”). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Forfeit one’s body and lose one’s life.”

21 The hearer and the singer they are trying to speak of here are not equal to the singer of the dragon’s song (ima gidō suru monja ginja wa, gin ryūgin ja ni fusei nari いま擬道する聞者・吟者は、吟龍吟者に不齊なり): A tentative translation of a passage subject to varied interpretation. The sentence might also be read, “the hearing and singing they are trying to speak of here are not equal to the singing of the singing dragon (ginryū ginja).” The commentary of the influential Shōbōgenzō monge 正法眼藏聞解 (SCZ.7:566-67) suggests that the point here is that the authentic “song of the dragon” is beyond the active and passive opposites of “singing” and “hearing”; it also offers an alternative opinion to the effect that what the monks are discussing is not the authentic “song of the dragon.”

this tune is the dragon’s singing (kono kyokuchō wa ryūgin nari この曲調は龍吟なり): The antecedent of “this” is unclear; it could refer either to the quoted passage or to Dōgen’s comment on it. “Tune” (kyokuchō 曲調 here), while playing on the music of the dragon’s song, might be taken as the exploration of the theme of the dragon’s song — i.e., the study of the dragon’s song is the singing of the dragon.

or outside, not about self or other; they are the present and the past.<sup>22</sup> “Still harboring joy” is further “horns growing on your head”; “still harboring consciousness” is “skin entirely sloughed off.”<sup>23</sup>

曹山道の血脈不斷は、道不諱なり、語脈裏轉身なり。乾不盡は、海枯不盡底なり。不盡是乾なるゆえに、乾上又乾なり。聞者ありや、と道著せるは、不得者ありや、といふがごとし。盡大地未有一箇不聞は、さらに聞著すべし、未有一箇不聞は、しばらくおく、未有盡大地時、龍吟在甚麼處、速道速道なり。未審龍吟は何章句は、爲問すべし、吟龍は、おのれづから泥裏の作聲擧拈なり、鼻孔裏の出氣なり。也不知は何章句は、章句裏有龍なり。聞者皆喪は、可惜許なり。

Caoshan’s saying, “the blood vessel not severed,” is speaking without avoidance; it is “turning the body in the stream of words.”<sup>24</sup> “Not entirely dry” is “when the ocean dries up, it is not entirely to the bottom.”<sup>25</sup> Since “not entirely” is “dry,” there is “dry” beyond “dry.” His saying, “can anyone hear it?” is like saying, “is there anyone who can’t?” About “on all the whole earth, there isn’t one who can’t hear it,” we should ask further: leaving aside “there isn’t one who can’t hear it,” when there isn’t any “all the whole earth,” where is the song of the dragon? Speak! Speak! Well, what passage does the dragon sing?” should be questioned. The singing dragon is itself raising its voice and bringing it up within the

22 the present and the past (nikon niko 而今而古): Probably to be taken in the sense “at once present and past” or, perhaps, “timeless.”

23 “horns growing on your head” (zu kaku shō 頭角生): Perhaps, recalling the saying of Nanquan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-835), introduced elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; see Supplementary Note, s.v. “Move among different types.”

24 speaking without avoidance (dō fuki 道不諱): Or, perhaps, “a saying that does not conceal.” A rather unusual expression, in Chinese syntax, not appearing elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings.

“turning the body in the stream of words” (gomyaku ri tenshin [or tenjin] 語脈裏轉身): The translation loses Dōgen’s play here with the graph myaku 脈 (“stream”), rendered as “vessel” in Caoshan’s saying. The expression, variations on which occur elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, reflects a common Zen usage — as, e.g., in the Biyān lu 碧巖錄 (T.2003.48:169a19, case 29):

没量大人語脈裏轉却。

The immeasurably great person turns round [or is turned round] within the stream of words.

25 “when the ocean dries up, it is not entirely to the bottom” (kaiko fujin tei 海枯不盡底): Variation on the saying, “When the ocean dries up, you finally see the bottom”; see above, Note 5.

mud, is breathing it out within its nostrils.<sup>26</sup> “I don’t know what verse it is” means there is a dragon within the verse. “Everyone who hears it loses his life”: what a pity!

The singing that this dragon of Xiangyan, Shishuang, and Caoshan has been doing forms clouds and forms water.<sup>27</sup> It does not talk about the way; it does not talk about the eyeball or skull: it is just a thousand tunes, ten thousand tunes of the song of the dragon.<sup>28</sup> “Still harboring joy” is “the croaking of frogs”; “still harboring consciousness” is “the singing of worms.”<sup>29</sup> By these, “the blood vessel is not severed,” “the 26 raising its voice and bringing it up within the mud (dei ri no sashō konen 泥裏の作聲擧拈): The translation supplies the object pronoun “it,” assuming the preceding “question” as antecedent. To “bring up” (konen 擧拈) is often used for a Zen master’s presentation of a topic for comment; the word “mud” (ni 泥), while here no doubt suggestive of the “bottom” of the ocean, is often used in Zen for the sphere of the master’s teaching activities.

27 The singing that this dragon of Xiangyan, Shishuang, and Caoshan has been doing (ima Kyōgen Sekiso Sōzan tō no ryū gin rai いま香巖・石霜・曹山等の龍吟來): An attempt to accommodate in English Dōgen’s surprising insertion here of the modal verb rai 來 (akin to the present perfect progressive), which would seem to require that ryūgin 龍吟 be taken as a subject-predicate construction.

forms clouds and forms water (kumo o nashi, mizu o nasu くもをなし、水をなす): Evoking the association of the Chinese dragon with clouds, rain, and bodies of water, no doubt here suggesting spiritual nourishment for those who study the dragon’s singing.

28 It does not talk about the way; it does not talk about the eyeball or skull (fudō dō, fudō ganzei dokuro 不道道、不道眼睛觸體): Dōgen here shifts into Chinese syntax. The translation takes “song of the dragon” as the unexpressed subject; “the way” (dō) here likely refers back to the opening question put by the monk to Xianyan in our quotation, “what is the way?”

29 “the croaking of frogs” (gama tei 蝦蟇啼); “the singing of worms” (kyūin mei 蚯蚓鳴): Gama (“frogs”) is more commonly written 蝦蟆; the reader may supply for the verb mei 鳴 whatever sound she would like worms to make. Frogs and worms appear regularly in Zen sayings. The reference here is likely drawn from a verse by Dōgen’s teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227) (at Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:124a5-6), quoted in “Shōbōgenzō ganzei” 正法眼藏眼睛 (DZZ.2:122), composed one week before our text:

先師古佛上堂云、霖霖大雨、豁達大晴。蝦蟇啼、蚯蚓鳴。古佛不曾過去、発揮金剛眼睛。呬。葛藤葛藤。

In a convocation, my former master, the Old Buddha, said,

INTRODUCTION

This chapter was composed early in 1244, probably at Kippōji, the monastery in the province of Echizen, where Dōgen was residing at the time. It occurs as number 62 of the seventy-five-chapter compilation of the Shōbōgenzō and number 52 in the sixty-fascicle compilation; in the Honzan edition, it represents number 67.

Like several of the Shōbōgenzō chapters from this period, the work is rather short. It focuses on a single episode in Zen literature: the famous problem, posed by the ninth-century Chan master Xiangyan Zhixian 香嚴智閑, of the person, hanging by his teeth from the branch of a tree over a thousand-foot precipice, who is asked Bodhidharma's intention in coming to China from India. Though this problem was very well known and often discussed by subsequent masters, Dōgen explicitly rejects the commentarial tradition as rarely having anything significant to say. At the end of his piece, he does, however, offer a remark on one comment, by the eleventh-century figure Xuedou Zhongxian 雪竇重顯.

Dōgen begins his own comments with the advice that the problem should be addressed by thinking of “not thinking” and thinking of “non-thinking” while “sitting fixedly” on the same meditation cushion as its author, Xiangyan — a reference to the famous statement, much admired by Dōgen, of Yaoshan Weiyān 藥山惟儼 (751-834) that his practice was “sitting fixedly,” “thinking of not thinking.” Dōgen then goes on to question the meaning here of the “person” and the “thousand-foot precipice”; to identify the person's mouth with the branch he bites, and the act of his questioner with biting the branch. In the end, Dōgen “solves” Xiangyan's problem by rejecting the distinction between the man's biting the branch and his opening his mouth to answer the question: both biting the branch and answering the question are Bodhidharma's intention in coming from the west.

The Intention of the Ancestral Master's Coming from the West

香巖寺襲燈大師<嗣大滙、諱智閑>示衆云、如人千尺懸崖上樹、口嚼樹枝、脚不踏樹、手不攀枝、樹下忽有人問、如何是祖師西來意。當恁麼時、若開口答他、即喪身失命、若不答他、又違他所問。當恁麼時、且道、作麼生即得。時有虎頭照上座、出衆云、上樹時即不問、未上樹時、請和尚道、如何。師乃呵呵大笑。

Great Master Xideng of the Xiangyan Monastery (succeeded Dagui; known as Zhixian) addressed the assembly, saying, “A person is up a tree above a thousand-foot precipice.<sup>1</sup> His mouth bites the tree branch; his feet don’t stand on the tree; his hands don’t hang on a branch. Beneath the tree, all of a sudden, there is a person who asks him, ‘What is the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west?’<sup>2</sup> At that time, if he opens his mouth to answer him, he forfeits his body and loses his life; if he doesn’t answer him, he fails his question. Tell me, what should he do?”

At that time, the Senior Seat Hutou Zhao came forth from the assembly and said, “I’m not asking about when he’s up the tree; please tell us, Reverend, how about when he’s not yet up the tree?”<sup>3</sup>

1 Great Master Xideng of the Xiangyan Monastery (Kyōgenji Shōtō daishi 香巖寺襲燈大師): i.e., Xiangyan Zhixian 香巖智閑 (d. 898); also written 香巖; disciple of Weishan Lingyou 滙山靈祐, known as Dawei 大滙 (771-853). This famous episode appears in several sources (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:284b21-25), including Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:254, case 243). Parentheses in the quotation here are in the original text.

2 “the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west” (soshi seirai i 祖師西來意): A favorite topic in Zen literature, often the subject of lectures and discussions. The “Ancestral Master” here is of course the first ancestor of Chan in China, Bodhidharma, said to have come from India in the sixth century. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west.”

3 Senior Seat Hutou Zhao (Kotō Shō jōza 虎頭照上座): Biography unknown. In the Jingde chuandeng lu version of this story, his name is given as Hutou Zhao 虎頭招; in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 version, he is identified simply as “Senior Seat Hutou” (kotō jōza 虎頭上座).

The Master gave a great laugh, “Ha ha.”

而今の因縁、おほく商量・拈古あれど、道得箇まれなり。おそらくはすべて茫然なるがごとし。しかありといへども、不思議を拈來し、非思量を拈來して思量せんに、おのづから香嚴老と一蒲團の功夫あらん。すでに香嚴老と一蒲團上に兀坐せば、さらに香嚴未開口已前に、この因縁を參詳すべし。香嚴老の眼睛をぬすみて覷見するのみにあらず、釋迦牟尼佛の正法眼藏を拈出して覷破すべし。

Although there have been many discussions and comments on the present episode, those that have said something are rare.<sup>4</sup> Generally speaking, they all seem to be at a loss. Nevertheless, when we take up “not thinking,” when we take up “non-thinking,” and think about it, we will naturally have concentrated effort on the same cushion as old Xiangyan.<sup>5</sup> Since we are “sitting fixedly” on the same cushion as old Xiangyan, we should go on to a detailed investigation of this episode before Xiangyan has opened his mouth.<sup>6</sup> Not only should we steal old Xiangyan’s eye and look at it; we should take out “the treasury of the true dharma eye” of Buddha Śākyamuni and look through it.

[62:3]

如人千尺懸崖上樹。この道、しづかに參究すべし。なにをか人といふ、露柱にあらずば、木樛といふべからず。佛面祖面の破顔なりとも、自己他己の相見あやまらざるべし。いま人上樹のところは、盡大地にあらず、百尺竿頭にあらず、これ千尺懸崖なり。たとひ脱落去すとも、千尺懸崖裏なり。落時あり、上時あり。如人千尺懸崖裏上樹といふ、しるべし、上時ありといふこと。しかあれば、向上也千尺なり、向下也千尺なり、左頭也千尺なり、右頭也千尺なり、遮裏也千尺なり、那裏也千尺なり、如人也千尺なり、上樹也千尺なり。向來の千尺は、恁麼なるべし。且問すらくは、千尺量多少。いはく、如古鏡量なり、如火爐量なり、如無縫塔量なり。

“A person is up a tree above a thousand-foot precipice”: we should quietly investigate these words. What is the “person”? If it is not a pillar,

4 those that have said something (dōtoku ko 道得箇): I.e. “those that are able to offer a meaningful remark.”

5 when we take up “not thinking,” when we take up “non-thinking,” and think about it (fushiryō o nenrai shi, hishiryō o nenrai shite shiryō sen ni 不思議を拈來し、非思量を拈來して思量せんに): Allusion to the words of Yaoshan Weiyan 藥山惟儼 (751-834), in a dialogue found in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:196, case 129) and much cited by Dōgen; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Yaoshan’s not thinking.”

the same cushion (ichi futon 一蒲團): I.e., the same meditation cushion; in Zen usage, futon typically refers to a round cushion stuffed with rushes or cattails (kama 蒲).

6 “sitting fixedly” (gotsuza 兀坐): From the conversation, alluded to just above, on “thinking of not thinking”; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Sit fixedly.”

we should not call it a stake.<sup>7</sup> Though it be the face of a buddha and the face of an ancestor breaking into a smile, we should not be mistaken about the meeting of self and other.<sup>8</sup> This place where the “person” is “up a tree” is not all the whole earth, not “the tip of a hundred-foot pole”; it is “a thousand-foot precipice.”<sup>9</sup> Even if he drops off, he is within “a thousand-foot precipice.”<sup>10</sup> There is a time of dropping, a time of climbing. Where he says, “A person is up a tree above a thousand-foot precipice,” we should realize that this is saying there is a time of climbing. Consequently, ascent is a thousand feet, descent is a thousand feet; left is a thousand feet, right is a thousand feet; here is a thousand feet, there is a thousand feet.<sup>11</sup> “A person” is a thousand feet; “up a tree” is a thousand

7 If it is not a pillar, we should not call it a stake (rochū ni arazuba, bokuketsu to iu bekarazu 露柱にあらずば、木櫪といふべからず): Likely, an allusion to a saying of Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866) (see Linji lu lu 臨濟錄, T.1985.47:503c3-6; Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄, ZZ.135:687b17-688a2):

師因入軍營赴齋。門首見員僚。師指露柱問、是凡是聖。員僚無語。師打露柱云、直饒道得、也祇是箇木櫪。便入去。

The Master [Linji] once entered a military camp to attend a meal offering. At the entrance, he saw an officer. Pointing to a pillar, the Master asked, “Is this a commoner or a sage?”

The officer said nothing.

Hitting the pillar, the Master said, “Even if you had something to say, it’s still just a wooden stake.” Then, he went in.

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Pillars and lanterns,” “Wooden stake.”

8 the face of a buddha and the face of an ancestor breaking into a smile (butsumen somen no hagan 佛面祖面の破顔): Allusion to the famous story of the first transmission of the “treasury of the true dharma eye” (shōbōgenzō 正法眼藏) from Śākyamuni to Mahākāśyapa at an assembly on Vulture Peak. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddha faces, ancestor faces,” “Break into a smile,” and “Treasury of the true dharma eye.”

we should not be mistaken about the meeting of self and other (jiko tako no shōken ayamazaru beshi 自己他己の相見あやまらざるべし): The implication is unclear; perhaps simply that, even the accord between buddhas and ancestors, should be understood as a “person” meeting a “person.”

9 “the tip of a hundred-foot pole” (hyakushaku kantō 百尺竿頭): A common expression in Chan literature for the extreme limit of religious practice, as in the saying, “proceed one step beyond the tip of a hundred-foot pole” (hyakushaku kantō shin ippō 百尺竿頭進一步).

10 Even if he drops off (tatoi datsuraku ko su tomo たとひ脱落去すとも): Taking datsuraku as an intransitive verb. Dōgen here seems to be playing with this term, more commonly used as a transitive verb meaning to “drop,” or “slough off,” something — as in Dōgen’s well-known expression “body and mind sloughed off” (shinjin datsuraku 身心脱落); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Slough off,” and “Body and mind sloughed off.”

11 ascent is a thousand feet, descent is a thousand feet (kōjō ya senjaku nari, kōge ya senjaku nari 向上也千尺なり、向下也千尺なり): Dōgen switches into Chinese syntax for these and the following members of this list. The terms kōjō 向上 (“ascent”) and kōge 向下 (“descent”) can also be read as “above” and “below” — a sense suggested here by feet. So far, a thousand feet should be like this. Now, what I ask is, “what size is a thousand feet?” It is the size of “the old mirror”; it is the size of “the brazier”; it is the size of “the seamless stūpa.”<sup>12</sup>

口嚼樹枝。いかにあらんかこれ口。たとひ口の全闊全口をしらずといへども、しばらく樹枝より尋枝摘葉しもてゆきて、口の所在しるべし。しばらく樹枝を把拈して、口をつくれるあり。このゆえに、全口是枝なり、全枝是口なり、通身口なり、通口是身なり。樹自踏樹、ゆえに脚不踏樹といふ、脚自踏脚のごとし。枝自攀枝、ゆえに手不攀枝といふ、手自攀手のごとし。しかあれども、脚跟、なほ進歩退歩あり、手頭、なほ作拳開拳あり。自他の人家、しばらくおもふ、掛虚空なり、と。しかあれども、掛虚空、それ嚼樹枝にしかむや。

“His mouth bites the tree branch.” What is the “mouth”? Even though we do not know the whole mouth, the whole vastness of the mouth, we will know the location of the mouth by starting from “the tree branch” and “searching the branches and plucking at the leaves” for a while.<sup>13</sup> There is making a mouth by grasping the branch for a while. Therefore, the whole mouth is the branch; the whole branch is the mouth. It is the mouth throughout the body; it is the mouth throughout is the body.<sup>14</sup> their pairing with the following “left” (satō 左頭) and “right” (utō 右頭). The two terms are sometimes used to indicate the two phases of the bodhisattva path: “ascending” toward liberation, and “descending” into the world for the sake of sentient beings.

12 “the old mirror” (kokyō 古鏡); “the brazier” (karo 火爐): Allusion to a conversation between Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908) and his disciple Xuansha Shibei 玄沙師備 (835-908); recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:184, case 109) and treated in his “Shōbōgenzō kokyō” 正法眼藏古鏡 (DZZ.1:234); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Old mirror.”

“the seamless stūpa” (muhō tō 無縫塔): i.e., a stone memorial for a deceased monk. Likely an allusion to another story of Xuefeng and Xuansha, found in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:158, case 60) and treated in “Shōbōgenzō juki” 正法眼藏授記; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven or eight feet.”

13 “searching the branches and plucking at the leaves” (jinshi tekiyō 尋枝摘葉): Probably indicating something like “examining the particulars.” Recalls lines from the famous poem Zhengdao ge 證道歌, attributed to the early Chan figure Yongjia Xuanjue 永嘉玄覺 (d. 723) (T.2014.48:395c21-22):

直截根源佛所印。摘葉尋枝我不能。

Just cutting off the root source — this is sealed by the Buddha;

Plucking at the leaves and searching the branches — this I can’t do.

14 It is the mouth throughout the body; it is the mouth throughout is the body (tsūshin ku nari, tsūku ze shin nari 通身口なり、通口是身なり): The first clause could also be read “throughout the body is the mouth.” Dōgen is likely recalling here the dialogue between Yunyan Tansheng 雲巖曇晟 (782-841) and fellow disciple Daowu Yuanzhi 道吾圓智 (769-835) regarding the thousand-armed, thousand-eyed Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara (senju sengen Kannon 千手千眼觀音); quoted at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:182, case 105) and discussed in “Shōbōgenzō Kannon” 正法眼藏觀

The tree itself stands on the tree; therefore, it says, “his feet don’t stand on the tree,” as if his feet themselves stand on his feet. The branch itself hangs on the branch; therefore, it says, “his hands don’t hang on a branch,” as if his hands themselves hang on his hands. Nevertheless, his feet still step forward and step back; his hands still make a fist and open a fist. We and others think at first he is “hanging in empty space”; but, can “hanging in empty space” compare with “biting the tree branch”?<sup>15</sup>

樹下忽有人問、如何是祖師西來意。この樹下忽有人は、樹裏有人といふがごとし、人樹ならんがごとし。人下忽有人問、すなはちこれなり。しかあれば、樹問樹なり、人問人なり。舉樹舉問なり、舉西來意、問西來意なり。問著人、また口嚙樹枝して問來するなり。口嚙枝にあらざれば、問著することあたはず。満口の音聲なし、満言の口あらず。西來意を問著するときは、嚙西來意にて問著するなり。

“Beneath the tree, all of a sudden, there is a person who asks him, ‘What is the intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west?’” This “beneath the tree, all of a sudden, there is a person” is like saying “there is a person within the tree,” as if it were a person tree. “Beneath the person, all of a sudden, there is a person who asks him”— this is what this is. Therefore, it is the tree asks the tree; it is the person asks the person. It is, they raise the tree and raise the question; it is, they raise “the intention of coming from the west” and question “the intention of coming from the west.” The questioner also asks the question with “his mouth biting the tree branch.” If his mouth were not biting the branch, he could not be questioning: he would have no sound filling his mouth; he would have no mouth filled with words.<sup>16</sup> When he asks about “the intention of coming from the west,” he asks while biting “the intention of coming from the west.”

---

音. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “His body throughout is hands and eyes.”

15 “hanging in empty space” (ka kokū 掛虚空): Perhaps reflecting a verse on the wind chime by Dōgen’s teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227), cited in “Shōbō-genzō maka hannya haramitsu” 正法眼藏摩訶般若波羅蜜 and elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings:

渾身似口掛虚空、不問東西南北風、一等爲他談般若、滴丁東了滴丁東。

Its whole body, like a mouth, hanging in empty space,

Without asking if the winds are from north, south, east, or west.

Equally, for them, it talks of prajñā:

16 he would have no sound filling his mouth; he would have no mouth filled with words (manku no onjō nashi, mangon no ku arazu 満口の音聲なし、満言の口あらず): Dōgen is here playing with the colloquial expression manku (“filling the mouth”), which carries the sense “to speak at length” or, as we might say, “to say a mouthful.” He will return to this term below.

[62:6]

若開口答他、即喪身失命。いま若開口答他の道、したしくすべし。不開口答他もあるべし、ときこゆ。もししかあらんときは、不喪身失命なるべし。たとひ開口・不開口ありとも、口嚙樹枝をさまたぐべからず。開・閉、かならずしも全口にあらず、口に開・閉もあるなり。しかあれば、嚙枝は全口の家常なり、開閉口をさまたぐべからず。開口答他といふは、開樹枝答他するをいふか、開西來意答他するをいふか。もし開西來意答他にあらざば、答西來意にあらず。すでに答他あらず、これ全身保命なり、喪身失命といふべからず。さきより喪身失命せば、答他あるべからず。しかあれども、香嚴のころ、答他を辞せず、ただおそらくは喪身失命のみなり。しるべし、未答他時、護身保命なり。忽答他時、翻身活命なり。はかりしりぬ、人人満口は道なり。答他すべし、答自すべし、問他すべし、問自すべし。これ口嚙道なり、口嚙道を口嚙枝といふなり。若答他時、口上更開一隻口なり。若不答他、違他所問なりといへども、不違自所問なり。

“If he opens his mouth to answer him, he forfeits his body and loses his life.” We should get familiar with the words here, “if he opens his mouth to answer him.” It sounds as if there must also be “not opening his mouth to answer him.” If such is the case, he should not “forfeit his body and lose his life.” Whether there is opening the mouth or not opening the mouth, they should not prevent “his mouth biting the tree branch.” Opening and closing are not necessarily the whole mouth, though the mouth does have opening and closing. Therefore, biting the branch is the everyday routine of the whole mouth; it should not prevent opening and closing the mouth.<sup>17</sup> Does saying “he opens his mouth to answer him” mean he opens “the tree branch” to answer him? He opens “the intention in coming from the west” to answer him? If it is not opening “the intention of coming from the west” to answer him, it is not answering [the question of] “the intention of coming from the west.” And, since it is not answering him, this is “his whole body protecting his life”; we cannot say that “he forfeits his body and loses his life.” If he had already “forfeited his body and lost his life,” he would not answer him. Nevertheless, in Xiangyan’s mind, he does not avoid answering him; it seems he has simply “forfeited his body and lost his life.” We should realize that before he has answered him, he is guarding his body and protecting his life; once he suddenly answers him, he is flipping his body and saving his life.<sup>18</sup> Thus, we know that each person with a mouth full is the way:

17 everyday routine (kajō 家常): A loose translation of a colloquial expression, meaning more literally something like “usual at home,” most often associated with the daily fare of the household (what we might call “home-style” cooking) — as in the expression, often encountered in Zen texts, “everyday tea and rice” (kajō sahan 家常茶飯; see Supplementary Notes). Dōgen seems to be playing here with the notion that the branch is the everyday fare of the “whole mouth.”

18 flipping his body and saving his life (honshin katsumyō 翻身活命): To “flip one’s he should answer him; he should answer himself; he should ask him; he should ask himself.<sup>19</sup> This is the mouth biting the way; the mouth biting the way is called “his mouth bites the branch.” If he answers him, he opens a mouth on top of his mouth; if he does not answer him, “he fails his question,” but he does not fail his own question.

[62:7] {2:158}

しかあればしるべし、答西來意する一切の佛祖は、みな上樹口嚙樹枝の時節にあひあたりて、答來するなり。問西來意する一切の佛祖は、みな上樹口嚙樹枝の時節にあひあたりて、答來せるなり。

Therefore, we should realize that all the buddhas and ancestors who answer [the question of] “the intention of coming from the west” answer it as they encounter the moment of “up a tree, his mouth biting the tree branch”; all the buddhas and ancestors who ask about “the intention of coming from the west” have been answering it as they encounter the moment of “up a tree, his mouth biting the tree branch.”<sup>20</sup> body” (honshin 翻身; also written 翻身) is a common Zen expression for spiritual transformation.

19 each person with a mouth full is the way (ninnin manku ze dō 人人滿口是道): A phrase in Chinese syntax that might also be rendered “each person with a mouth full is a saying.” Similarly, the phrase translated below as “the mouth biting the way” (ku kan dō 口嚙道) can be read “the mouth biting the saying.” Dōgen seems to be playing here with two common Zen expressions: (1) “X is the way” (as in, e.g., “the ordinary mind is the way” [byōjō shin ze dō 平常心是道]); and (2) “though his mouth is full, he can’t say it” (manku dō futoku 滿口道不得).

he should answer him (tō ta su beshi 答他すべし): The unexpressed subject of this and the following three imperatives could also be taken as “we.”

20 have been answering it (tōrai seru 答來せる): Following Kawamura’s edition here; some texts read monrai seru 問來せる (“have been asking it”).

21 Chan Master Mingjue of Xuedou, Reverend Zhongxian (Setchō Myōkaku zenji Jūken oshō 雪寶明覺禪師重顯和尚): i.e., Xuedou Zhongxian 雪寶重顯 (980-1052). The saying here appears as a comment (nenko 拈古) on Xiangyan’s case in the Mingjue chanshi yulu 明覺禪師語錄, T.1996.47:685c19-20.

いま致將一問來は、たとひ盡力來すとも、この問、きたることおそくして、うらむらくは、答よりものちに問來せることを。あまねく古今の老古錐にとふ、香嚴呵呵大笑する、これ、樹上道なりや、樹下道なりや、答西來意なりや、不答西來意なりや。試道看。

About this “bring me a question,” though we bring it with all our might, the question will arrive too late; regrettably, we will have brought the question after the answer [has been given]. I ask the venerable old awls everywhere in past and present: Xiangyan's great laugh, “ha ha” — is this “saying something up a tree,” or is it “saying something down a tree”?<sup>22</sup> Is it answering “the intention of coming from the west,” or is it not answering “the intention of coming from the west”? Try saying something.

Bringing Forth the Mind of Bodhi

Hotsu bodai shin

INTRODUCTION

This work was composed in the spring of 1244, at Kippōji, in the province of Echizen (present-day Fukui prefecture). It appears as number 63 in the seventy-five-chapter compilation of the Shōbōgenzō. The work is perhaps more often known as “Hotsu mujō shin” 發無上心 (“bringing forth the mind of the unsurpassed [bodhi]”), the title supplied in the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō, where it occurs as number 53, and used in the ninety-five chapter Honzan edition, where it represents number 69 (number 70 in the Iwanami and Shūmichō versions). This text is not to be confused with a second, undated essay bearing the title “Hotsu bodai shin” that is also found in the sixty-chapter compilation, as number 34, and reproduced as number 4 in the twelve-chapter Shōbōgenzō: despite the identical title, there is no overlap of its content with our text here.

The term hotsu bodai shin 發菩提心 refers to the aspiration of the bodhisattva to attain the supreme awakening of a buddha. In his treatment of this theme, Dōgen expands the sense of the term in two directions. On the one hand, from the very outset, he identifies the bodhisattva's aspiration with “trees and rocks,” with “the whole earth,” with the mind that is the reality of all things. On the other hand, he associates this aspiration with the concrete acts of Buddhist piety and practice — from offering alms, reciting a buddha's name, and sponsoring temple building, to entering the clerical order, practicing meditation, and preaching the dharma. Dōgen describes such acts as “unconditioned” and “unproduced,” and strongly criticizes those Buddhists who dismiss them as merely good deeds generating merit for the agent. Fashioning an icon or erecting a stūpa, he says, is itself “making a buddha and practicing buddhahood.”

The celebration here of the common acts of Buddhist ritual practice seems something of a departure from a teaching Dōgen elsewhere attributes to his master Tiantong Ruji 天童如淨: that offering incense, bowing, invoking the buddhas, practicing repentance, and reading scriptures are all unnecessary in the study of Zen. Some interpreters have suggested that the message of the “Hotsu bodai shin” was intended especially for the lay supporters of Dōgen’s new temple, Daibutsuji, the ground-breaking ceremony for which took place only five days after the date of the text.

Bringing Forth the Mind of Bodhi

[63:1] {2:160}

西國高祖曰、雪山喻大涅槃。

The Eminent Ancestor of the Western Land said, “The Snowy Mountains are comparable to the great nirvāṇa.”<sup>1</sup>

1 Bringing Forth the Mind of Bodhi (hotsu bodai shin 發菩提心): Or “producing the thought of bodhi”; S. bodhi-cittotpāda. A standard expression in the literature of the Mahāyāna for the aspiration of the bodhisattva to become a buddha; often abbreviated, as in our text, to the expression “bringing forth the mind (or thought)” (hosshin 發心). The translation of shin 心 (S. citta) as “mind” (rather than “thought”) here seeks to maintain lexical continuity with Dōgen’s other uses of this term and reflects the common theological practice of treating bodhi-citta, not only as an aspiration for awakening, but as an inherent quality of awakening in the mind that the bodhisattva seeks to activate, or manifest. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bring forth the mind.”

The Eminent Ancestor of the Western Land (Saigoku kōso 西國高祖): A saying attributed to Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 (749-814); see Guzunsu yulu 古尊宿語錄, ZZ.118:179b9; Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄, ZZ.135:682b5-6. “Eminent ancestor” here refers to Buddha Śākyamuni; the title is not a common epithet of the Buddha and is typically used rather for the founder of a lineage. “Western Land” is a standard term for India.

“The Snowy Mountains are comparable to the great nirvāṇa” (Sessen yu dai nehan 雪山喻大涅槃): Or, we might say, “the Snowy Mountains represent the great nirvāṇa.” The term Sessen 雪山 (“snowy mountains”) usually refers to the Himalayas; dai nehan 大涅槃 (“the great nirvāṇa”) here, though likely indicating the mahā-parinirvāṇa of the Buddha, could also be taken as a reference to the sūtra of the same name (Da banniepan jing 大般涅槃經).

This saying, though attributed by Baizhang to the Buddha, does not seem to occur in any Buddhist sūtra. The most likely source would seem to be a parable in the Nirvāṇa Sūtra (T.374.12:554a27ff) in which seven men enter the Ganges River. Six of them for various reasons fail to cross, but the seventh crosses to the other shore of the river, climbs a great mountain, and attains bliss without fear. The sūtra then relates the seven men to seven types of icchantika (those who have “cut off their good roots” [dan zenkon 斷善根]) who seek to cross “the great river of birth and death,” adding at the end (T.374.12:555a20-21),

善男子、彼岸山者喻於如來。受安樂者喻佛常住。大高山者喻大涅槃。

Sons of good family, the mountain of the other shore is comparable to the tathāgata;

[63:2]

しるべし、たとふべきをたとふ。たとふべき、といふは、親曾なるなり、端的なるなり。いはゆる雪山を拈來するは、喩雪山なり。大涅槃を拈來する、大涅槃にたとふるなり。

We should realize that this compares what should be compared. To say that they should be compared is [to say] they are personally once, they are immediately obvious.<sup>2</sup> To take up “the Snowy Mountains” is “comparable to the Snowy Mountains”; to take up the great nirvāṇa is to compare it to the great nirvāṇa.<sup>3</sup>

震旦初祖曰、心心如木石。

The First Ancestor of Cīnasthāna said, “Each mind is like trees and rocks.”<sup>4</sup> attaining ease and joy is comparable to the buddha’s permanently abiding; the great high mountain is comparable to the great nirvāṇa.

2 personally once (shinzō 親曾): An adverbial expression that Dōgen likes to use as a noun expressing intimate relationship; probably derived from a verse by Dōgen’s teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227), quoted more than once in the Shōbōgenzō.

3 To take up “the Snowy Mountains” is “comparable to the Snowy Mountains” (iwayuru Sessen o nenrai suru wa, yu sessen nari いはゆる雪山を拈來するは、喩雪山なり): This and the following odd sentence presumably represent the explanation of what Dōgen means here by “personally once” and “immediately obvious”: i.e., that the Snowy Mountains and the great nirvāṇa are comparable to each other because they are “comparable” to themselves — or, we might say, each is just what it is.

4 The First Ancestor of Cīnasthāna (Shintan shoso 晨旦初祖): A continuation of the quotation from Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海, Guzunsu yulu 古尊宿語錄, ZZ.118:179b10; Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄, ZZ.135:682b6; the Chinese texts have “the First Ancestor of this land” (cidu chuzu 此土初祖). The reference is to Bodhidharma, the first Chinese ancestor in the Chan lineage; the term Shintan 晨旦 represents a transliteration of a Sanskrit term for China, Cīnasthāna (“Land of the Qin”).

“Each mind is like trees and rocks” (shinjin nyo bokuseki 心心如木石): Or “each thought is like wood and stone”; though somewhat awkward, the translation “mind” here seeks to retain a consistent English rendering of shin 心 throughout. The expression “a mind like trees and rocks” (shin nyo bokuseki 心如木石) occurs often in Zen literature, including in the appended material to the Erru sixing lun 二入四行論 attributed to Bodhidharma. (Yanagida Seizan 柳田聖山, Daruma no goroku: Ninyū shigyō ron 達磨の語録: 二入四行論, Zen no goroku 禪の語録 1:98.) Baizhang himself uses it in a description of the Chan teaching of sudden awakening (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:250a17-21):

僧問、如何是大乘頓悟法門。師曰、汝等先歇諸緣休息萬事。善與不善世出世間、一切諸法莫記憶莫緣念。放捨身心令其自在。心如木石無所辯別。心無所行心地若空。慧日自現如雲開日出。

A monk asked, “What is the dharma gate of the sudden awakening of the great vehicle?” The Master answered, “First put to rest the various involvements and stop the myriad affairs. Do not recall, do not think about any dharmas, good or not good, mundane or “Mind” here is “mind is like.”<sup>5</sup> It is the mind of all the whole earth. Therefore, it is the mind of self and other. Each mind of the humans of all the whole earth, as well as of the buddhas and ancestors, and of the devas and dragons of all the worlds in the ten directions — these are “trees and rocks”; there is no mind apart from them.<sup>6</sup> These “trees and rocks” are by their nature not cooped up in the realm of being and non-being, emptiness and form.<sup>7</sup>

With this mind of trees and rocks, we bring forth the mind [of bodhi], practice and verify; for they are trees of mind, rocks of mind.<sup>8</sup> Through transmundane. Cast aside body and mind, and set them free, so the mind is like trees and rocks, without disputation or distinction. When the mind is without activity, the ground of the mind is as the sky; the sun of wisdom appears of its own, like the sun emerging when the clouds part.”

Dōgen is likely alluding to Baizhang’s text elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, in remarks such as “[the spiritual powers (jinzū 神通)] are the same as the Snowy Mountains, are like trees and rocks” (dō Sessen nari nyo bokuseki nari 同雪山なり如木石なり) (“Shōbōgenzō jinjū” 正法眼藏神通, DZZ.1:392), or “the Snowy Mountains have great awakening because of the Snowy Mountains; trees and rocks have great awakening through trees and rocks” (Sessen no Sessen no tame ni daigo suru ari bokuseki wa bokuseki o karite daigo su 雪山の雪山のために大悟するあり木石は木石をかりて大悟す) (“Shōbōgenzō daigo” 正法眼藏大悟, DZZ.1:97). For the association between “Snowy Mountains” and “trees and rocks,” see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Whether on trees or on rocks.”

5 “mind is like” (shinnyo 心如): Dōgen is here playfully creating a compound expression from the subject and predicate of Bodhidharma’s saying, the sense of which might be something like “mind as such,” “mind as it is.”

6 as well as of the buddhas and ancestors, and of the devas and dragons of all the worlds in the ten directions (oyobi jin jippō kai no busso, oyobi ten ryū nado および盡十方界の佛祖、および天龍等): The phrase might also be parsed, “as well as of the buddhas and ancestors of all the worlds in the ten directions, and of the devas and dragons.” The “ten directions” (the four cardinal and four ordinal points, plus the zenith and nadir) is standard Buddhist usage for “everywhere.”

7 not cooped up (rōra serarezu 籠籬せられず): A loose translation of a variant of the more common rarō 籠籠 (“nets and cages”), here put in a passive verbal form; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nets and cages.”

8 we bring forth the mind [of bodhi], practice and verify (hosshin shushō 發心・修證): I.e., we develop the aspiration for bodhi, practice on the bodhisattva path, and realize buddhahood.

the power of these trees of mind and rocks of mind, the present “thinking of not thinking” is realized.<sup>9</sup> Upon hearing the “sound of the wind” in the trees of mind and rocks of mind, we first transcend the followers of other paths; before that, it is not the way of the buddhas.<sup>10</sup>

大證國師曰、牆壁瓦礫、是古佛心。

The National Teacher Dazheng said, “Fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles — these are the old buddha mind.”<sup>11</sup>

[63:6]

いまの牆壁瓦礫、いづれのところにかある、と參詳看あるべし、是什麼物恁麼現成と問取すべし。古佛心、といふは、空王那畔にあらず、粥足飯足なり、草足水足なり。

We should try studying in detail: “where are these “fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles”; we should ask: “what thing is it that appears like this?”<sup>12</sup>

for they are trees of mind, rocks of mind (shin boku shin seki naru ga yue nari 心木・心石なるがゆえなり): Or “they are mind trees, mind rocks.” The grammatical subject is unexpressed here; presumably, the activities of “bringing forth the mind, practicing and verifying” (hosshin shushō 發心修證) in the previous sentence.

9 “thinking of not thinking” (shiryō ko fushiryō tei 思量箇不思量底): An expression for meditation practice appearing prominently in Dōgen’s writings; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Yaoshan’s not thinking.”

10 the “sound of the wind” in the trees of mind and rocks of mind (shinboku shinseki no fūshō 心木・心石の風聲): The translation seeks to preserve the concrete image of wind among the trees and rocks. The term fūshō 風聲, translated here as “sound of the wind,” while sometimes understood as the “ways (fū 風) and words (shō 聲)” of the masters, is perhaps more simply taken as the “good news” (of the mind trees and rock trees). The term does not appear elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

followers of the other paths (gedō no rurui 外道の流類): I.e., those of non-Buddhist religious traditions (S. tīrthika), a common pejorative in Dōgen’s writings.

11 National Teacher Dazheng (Daishō kokushi 大證國師): I.e., Nanyang Huizhong 南陽慧忠 (d. 775), disciple of the Sixth Ancestor and the subject of a number of famous kōans. While a source of this exact phrasing has not been identified, the content reflects a well-known saying by Nanyang occurring in several Chan texts; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles.”

“the old buddha mind” (kobutsushin 古佛心): A common expression in Zen texts, it plays on the ambiguity between “the mind of the ancient buddhas (leading to Śākyamuni)” and “the ancient (i.e., eternal) buddha mind.” See “Shōbōgenzō kobutsushin” 正法眼藏古佛心 for Dōgen’s treatment of the term.

12 “what thing is it that appears like this?” (ze jūmo butsu inmo genjō 是什麼物恁麼現成): A variation on the question, in one of Dōgen’s favorite stories, posed by the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能, upon the approach of his disciple Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744). Quoted at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:178, case 101; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “What thing is it that comes like this?”

“The old buddha mind” is not on that side of King of Emptiness: it is “the gruel is enough, the rice is enough”; it is “the grass is enough, the water is enough.”<sup>13</sup>

かくのごとくなるを拈來して、坐佛し作佛するを、發心と稱す。おほよそ發菩提心の因縁、ほかより拈來せず、菩提心を拈來して、發心するなり。菩提心を拈來する、といふは、一莖草を拈して造佛し、無根樹を拈じて造經するなり。いさごをもて供佛し、漿をもて供佛するなり。一搏の食を衆生にほどこし、五莖の華を如來にたてまつるなり。他のすすめによりて片善を修し、魔に嬈せられて禮佛する、また發菩提心なり。しかのみにあらず、知家非家捨家出家、入山・修道、信行・法行するなり、造佛・造塔するなり、讀經・念佛するなり、爲衆說法するなり、尋師訪道するなり、結跏坐するなり、一禮三寶するなり、一稱南無佛するなり。

Taking it up like this, “sitting as a buddha” and “making a buddha” are called “bringing forth the mind.”<sup>14</sup> Generally speaking, in the cases of [those] bringing forth the mind of bodhi, rather than taking it up from elsewhere, they bring forth the mind by taking up the mind of bodhi [itself]. To “take up the mind” means to take up “one blade of grass” and construct a buddha, to take up “a tree without roots” and construct

13 that side of King of Emptiness (Kūō nahan 空王那畔): An unusual expression, found only here and in the “Sansui kyō” 山水經 chapter; presumably derived from the common Zen saying, “that side of King Majestic Voice” (Ion’ō nahan 威音王那畔), used in reference to what precedes all differentiation; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Before King of Emptiness.”

“the gruel is enough, the rice is enough” (shuku soku han soku 粥足飯足); “the grass is enough, the water is enough” (sōsoku suisoku 草足水足): The first phrase is a fairly common Zen expression meaning that the monk’s meals are sufficient and suggesting, by metaphorical extension, that the monk’s practice is complete. The second, somewhat less common phrase extends the image to provisions for cattle; its source here may be a verse by Haihui Shouduan 海會守端 (1025-1072) (Chanlin paoxun 禪林寶訓, T.2022.48:1019b25-26):

牛來山中、水足草足。牛出山去、東觸西觸。

The ox enters the mountain;

The water is enough, the grass is enough.

The ox leaves the mountain;

Butting to the east, butting to the west.

Dōgen also uses these two phrases together in a lecture (jōdō 上堂) in his Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.3:200, no. 305).

14 Taking it up like this (kaku no gotoku naru o nenrai shite かくのごとくなるを拈來して): The grammatical object here is unexpressed; presumably, “the old buddha mind” of the preceding passage.

“sitting as a buddha” and “making a buddha” (zabutsu shi sabutsu su 坐佛し作佛す): More literally, given the double predicates in each phrase, something like “do a sitting buddha and do a making buddha.” References to seated meditation, alluding to the story known as “Nanyue polishes a tile”; see Supplementary Notes.

a sūtra.<sup>15</sup> It is to offer sand to a buddha, to offer slop to a buddha.<sup>16</sup> It is to provide one ball of food to a living being, to offer five flowers to a tathāgata.<sup>17</sup> To practice a bit of good when encouraged by another, to bow to a buddha when charmed by a demon, are also to bring forth the mind of bodhi.<sup>18</sup> Not only this: [to bring forth the mind is] to recognize that one's home is not a home, abandon the home and leave the home, enter the mountains and practice the way, proceeding by faith and pro-

15 “one blade of grass” (ikkyō sō 一莖草): Likely reflecting a well-known Zen trope, invoked elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, that equates a single blade of grass with the sixteen-foot tall body of the buddha; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “One blade of grass.”

“a tree without roots” (mu kon ju 無根樹): A popular expression in Zen texts. Here, probably reflecting its use as a metaphor for the bodhi-citta in the Avatamsaka-sūtra (Huayen jing 華嚴經, T.279.10:434a19-23):

非餘衆生善根處生。善男子、譬如有樹名曰無根。不從根生、而枝葉華果悉皆繁茂。菩薩摩訶薩菩提心樹、亦復如是無根可得。

[The bodhi-citta] is not born from the good roots (S. kuśala-mūla) of beings. Good men, it is like the tree called “without roots”: it is not born from roots, yet its branches, leaves, flowers, and fruit all flourish. Similarly, the tree of the mind of bodhi of the bodhisattva, the mahāsattva, is attained without roots.

16 offer sand to a buddha (isago o mote kubutsu shi いさごをもて供佛し): Likely an allusion to the story of a prior life of King Aśoka, when, as a boy, he offered sand to Buddha Śākyamuni; see, e.g., Ayu wang jing 阿育王經 (T.2043.50:131c9ff).

offer slop to a buddha (shō o mote kubutsu su 漿をもて供佛す): The term shō (“starch,” “paste,” “thick fluid”) here is generally thought to refer to the water left from washing rice. Perhaps an allusion to a story recorded in the Dazhidu lun 大智度論 (T.1509.25:115a14ff), in which an old servant woman offers Buddha Śākyamuni “foul slops” (chou pan dian 臭糞淀) from the kitchen.

17 provide one ball of food to a living being (ittan no jiki o shujō ni hodokoshi 一搏の食を衆生にほどこし): A common expression in Buddhist texts for a simple act of charity; see, e.g., the Dasheng bensheng xindi guan jing 大乘本生心地觀經 (T.159.3:306a6-7):

於末法中善男子、一搏之食施衆生、以是善根見彌勒、當得菩提究竟道。

During the final dharma, if a son of good family

Provides one ball of food to a living being,

By these good roots, he will see Maitreya

And attain the ultimate path of bodhi.

offer five flowers to a tathāgata (gokyō no ke o nyorai ni tatematsuru 五莖の華を如來にたてまつる): Perhaps alluding to the story of Buddha Śākyamuni in a previous life as the Bodhisattva Māṇava, who offered five flowers to Buddha Dīpaṃkara and received a prediction of his eventual buddhahood; see, e.g., Taizi ruiying benqi jing 太子瑞應本起經 (T.185.3:472c18-473a22-23).

18 To practice a bit of good when encouraged by another, to bow to a buddha when charmed by a demon (ta no susume ni yorite henzen o shu shi, ma ni nyō serarete raibutsu suru 他のすすめによりて片善を修し、魔に嬈せられて禮佛する): While some commentators have tried to identify scriptural sources for these remarks, none seems particularly apt; and it may well be that here, as is likely the case in the succeeding examples of bringing forth the mind in this section, Dōgen has no specific passages in mind.

ceeding by dharma.<sup>19</sup> It is to build buddhas and build stūpas; it is to recite sūtras and recollect the buddhas.<sup>20</sup> It is to preach the dharma for the multitude. It is to seek a master and inquire of the way. It is to sit with legs crossed.<sup>21</sup> It is to make one bow to the three treasures.<sup>22</sup> It is to make one call, “namo buddhāya.”<sup>23</sup>

In this way, the cases in the eighty-thousandfold aggregate of dharmas

19 recognize that one's home is not a home (chi ke hi ke 知家非家): This and the following three clauses represent variation on a standard trope in Buddhist literature describing the process by which one “leaves home” (shukke 出家) to enter the order. This same four-character phrase appears elsewhere in Dōgen's writings, but the more common expression is “believing that one's home is not a home” (shin ke hi ke 信家非家).

proceeding by faith and proceeding by dharma (shingyō hōgyō 信行・法行): Or “engaging in the practices of faith and the practices of dharma.” The translation takes the two terms here as abbreviations of zuishingyō 隨信行 (S. śraddhānusāra) and zuihōgyō 隨法行 (S. dharmānusāra) respectively, a common distinction between two approaches to Buddhist spiritual development.

20 build buddhas and build stūpas; recite sūtras and recollect the buddhas (zōbutsu zōtō suru nari, dokyō nenbutsu suru nari 造佛・造塔するなり、讀經・念佛するなり): I.e., the standard practices of the pious Buddhist laity: to sponsor the making of icons and building of monuments, to read and recite scripture and invoke the name of a buddha. The last practice here, nenbutsu, may refer merely to recollection of a buddha but most often implies the vocal invocation of a buddha's name (shōmyō 稱名) mentioned just below.

21 sit with legs crossed (kekka za 結跏坐): I.e., in the traditional posture of meditation (S. paryāṅka), sometimes called the “lotus posture” (S. padmāsana); more commonly given as kekkaфуza 結跏趺坐.

22 make one bow to the three treasures (ichirai sanbō 一禮三寶): I.e., pay obeisance to the three treasures (or “jewels”; S. triratna) of buddha, dharma, and saṃgha.

23 make one call, “namo buddhāya” (issō namu butsu 一稱南無佛): I.e., an invocation of a buddha. The phrase here may reflect a passage in the Lotus Sūtra (T.262.9:9a24-25):

若人散亂心、入於塔廟中、一稱南無佛、皆已成佛道。

If any people, with distracted mind,

Enter a stūpa or shrine

And make one call, “namo buddhāya,”

They will all have attained the way of the buddhas.

are without exception bringing forth the mind.<sup>24</sup> There are those who gained the way having brought forth the mind in a dream; there are those who gained the way having brought forth the mind while drunk.<sup>25</sup> Or they bring forth the mind and gain the way amidst flying blossoms and falling leaves; or they bring forth the mind and gain the way amidst peach blossoms and jade bamboo.<sup>26</sup> Or they bring forth the mind and gain the way while being in the heavens; or they bring forth the mind

24 the cases in the eighty-thousandfold aggregate of dharmas (hachiman hōun no innen 八萬法蘊の因縁): I.e., the instances cited in Buddhist scripture. The term hachiman 八萬 is here likely an abbreviation for the more common hachiman shisen 八萬四千 (“eighty-four thousand”); hōun 法蘊 (S. dharma-skandha) is a standard expression for the collection of the Buddha’s teachings.

25 brought forth the mind in a dream (muchū ni hosshin su 夢中に發心す): See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bring forth the mind.” It is not clear that Dōgen had a particular case in mind here. If he did, one possibility might be a passage in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:39b20-c15), quoted in “Shōbōgenzō muchū setsumu” 正法眼藏夢中說夢, that offers the dream of a bodhisattva career as one of the benefits promised devotees of the scripture.

又夢作國王、捨宮殿眷屬、及上妙五欲。行詣於道場、在菩提樹下、而處師子座、求道過七日、得諸佛之智。

They also dream of becoming the king of a country,
Who abandons his palace and his entourage,
And the most marvelous pleasures of the five senses;
And, going to the place of awakening,
There, beneath the bodhi tree,
Then sits upon the lion throne
And, seeking the way for seven days,
Attains the wisdom of the buddhas.

brought forth the mind while drunk (suichū ni hosshin su 醉中に發心す): Perhaps an allusion to a story, retold in “Shōbōgenzō shukke” 正法眼藏出家, found in the Dazhidu lun 大智度論 (T.1509.25:161b17-23); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bring forth the mind.”

26 amidst flying blossoms and falling leaves (hike rakuyō no naka yori 飛華・落葉のなかより): The term hike rakuyō 飛華落葉 (more often read hika rakuyō) is a fixed expression in Japanese literature for the evidence of evanescence that prompts a turn to Buddhism. In Buddhist literature, it is especially associated with the “conditions” (en 緣; S. pratyāya) by which the pratyeka-buddha (engaku 緣覺) awakens.

amidst peach blossoms and jade bamboo (tōke suichiku no naka yori 桃華・翠竹のなかより): Likely allusion to two popular stories in the Chan corpus, which appear together in Dōgen’s “Shōbōgenzō keisei sanshoku” 正法眼藏溪聲山色. The first concerns the monk Lingyun Zhiqin 靈雲志勤 (dates unknown), a student of Dawei Lingyou 大滙靈祐 (771-853), who gained an understanding upon seeing peach trees in bloom; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Peach blossoms.” The reference to “jade (i.e., jade green) bamboo” recalls the famous story of the Chan monk Xiangyan Zhixian 香嚴智閑 (d. 898), who is said to have gained an understanding upon hearing the sound of a bit of debris strike a bamboo stalk; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “A painted cake can’t satisfy hunger.”

and gain the way while being in the ocean.<sup>27</sup> All of these bring forth the mind of bodhi while being within bringing forth the mind of bodhi. They bring forth the mind of bodhi while being within body and mind; they bring forth the mind of bodhi while being within the body and mind of the buddhas; they bring forth the mind of bodhi while being within the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>28</sup>

しかあれば、而今の造塔・造佛等は、まさしくこれ發菩提心なり、直至成佛の發心なり、さらに中間に破廢すべからず。これを無爲の功德とす、これを無作の功德とす。これ眞如觀なり、これ法性觀なり、これ諸佛集三昧なり、これ得諸佛陀羅尼なり、これ阿耨多羅三藐三菩提心なり、これ阿羅漢果なり、これ佛現成なり。このほか、さらに無爲・無作等の法なきなり。

Thus, the present building stūpas, building buddhas, and the like, are surely bringing forth the mind of bodhi.<sup>29</sup> They are bringing forth the mind of “directly attaining buddhahood”; [they] should not be aban-

27 while being in the heavens (tenjō ni shite 天上にして): There are many accounts of Buddhism in the deva realms, and it seems impossible to say from this brief reference which, if any, particular story Dōgen may have been thinking of here. Elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, he mentions two unusual examples of teaching Buddhism in the deva realms. In the “Gyōbutsu iigi” 行佛威儀 (DZZ.1:65), he remarks:

祖宗いはく、釋迦牟尼佛、自從迦葉佛所傳正法往兜率天、化兜率陀天、于今有在。

The ancestors say, “The Buddha Śākyamuni, after receiving transmission of the true dharma from Buddha Kāśyapa, went to the Tuṣita Heaven and converted the devas of Tuṣita, where he remains even now.”

In the “Kobutsushin” 古佛心 (DZZ.1:89), he reports of Chan Master Nanyang Huizhong 南陽慧忠:

いはんやまた帝釋宮の請をえて、はるかに上天す。諸天衆のなかにして、帝釋のために説法す。

Moreover, receiving an invitation to Lord Śakra’s palace, he ascended to the distant heavens, where amidst the devas, he preached the dharma for Lord Śakra.

while being in the ocean (kaichū ni shite 海中にして): Undoubtedly the most famous case of aquatic awakening is that of the daughter of the dragon king Sāgara presented in Chapter 12 of the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:35b12-19).

28 while being within the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors (bussō no hi niku kotsu zui no naka ni shite 佛祖の皮肉骨髓のなかにして): The expression “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow” (hi niku kotsu zui 皮肉骨髓) occurs repeatedly throughout Dōgen’s writings to indicate the essence or entirety of something or someone. The phrase derives from the famous story of Bodhidharma’s testing of four disciples, to whom he said of each in turn that he (or, in one case, she) had gotten his skin, flesh, bones, and marrow. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

29 the present building stūpas, building buddhas (nikon no zōtō zōbutsu 而今の造塔・造佛): The implication of nikon 而今 (“the present”) here is unclear: it may well mean simply “here, in the above”; but it is at least possible that it refers to such activities “nowadays,” or specifically to the activities involved in the founding of Dōgen’s Daibutsuji 大佛寺 at the time this text was composed.

doned halfway.<sup>30</sup> They represent unconditioned merit; they represent unproduced merit.<sup>31</sup> They are the contemplation of suchness; they are the contemplation of the dharma nature.<sup>32</sup> They are the samādhi of the assembly of the buddhas; they are acquiring the dhāraṇī of the buddhas.<sup>33</sup>

30 bringing forth the mind of “directly attaining buddhahood” (jikishi jōbutsu no hosshin 直至成佛の發心): An ambiguous expression that could be interpreted as “the aspiration directly to become a buddha,” “the aspiration that leads directly to becoming a buddha,” or “the aspiration that directly becomes a buddha.” The expression “directly attain buddhahood” (jikishi jōbutsu 直至成佛) is commonly used in Buddhist literature in reference to the bodhisattva who will proceed to buddhahood without further rebirths in undesirable states.

should not be abandoned halfway (chūgen ni hahai su bekarazu 中間に破廢すべからず): Or “will not be abandoned halfway.” Given the discussion that follows here, the translation takes zōtō zōbutsu tō 造塔造佛等 (“constructing of stūpas, constructing of buddhas, and the like”) as the unexpressed subject here, a reading that suggests that these devotional practices should be continued throughout one’s spiritual career. It is also possible to supply hosshin 發心 (“bringing forth the mind”) as the subject.

31 unconditioned merit (mui no kudoku 無爲の功德); unproduced merit (musa no kudoku 無作の功德): Or, perhaps, the “merit (or virtue) of not doing”; the “merit of not making.” Tentative translations of somewhat ambiguous phrases that can be understand either as “the merit (i.e., good karma; S. punya) that is without conditions (or production),” or as “the virtue (i.e., attribute; S. guṇa) of being without conditions (or production).”

32 the contemplation of suchness (shinnyo kan 眞如觀): I.e., the contemplation of things as they ultimately are. The term shinnyo 眞如 (“truly such”) can represent the Sanskrit tathatā (“thusness”), often associated with the “emptiness” (S. sūnyatā) of things. This contemplation is not commonly mentioned in Zen literature and does not appear elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings.

the contemplation of the dharma nature (hosshō kan 法性觀): I.e, the contemplation of dharmatā, the ultimate nature of things; roughly synonymous with the shinnyo kan 眞如觀, immediately above. As seen in our text, below, the terms shinnyo 眞如 and hosshō 法性 often occur together as a single concept, “the dharma nature of suchness.”

33 samādhi of the assembly of the buddhas (shobutsu shū zanmai 諸佛集三昧): Presumably a contemplative state in which the buddhas are assembled before one. Perhaps reflecting a line in Chapter 27 of the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:60b7-8):

其王夫人得諸佛集三昧、能知諸佛祕密之藏。

The queen attained the samādhi of the assembly of the buddhas and was able to know the treasury of the secrets of the buddhas.

acquiring the dhāraṇī of the buddhas (toku shobutsu darani 得諸佛陀羅尼): Presumably one or more dhāraṇī preached by the buddhas. Possibly recalling the dhāraṇī acquired by the daughter of the dragon king alluded to above (section 8). Such spells taught by the buddhas are described in Chapter 26 of the Lotus Sūtra — e.g., at Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:58c4-5:

世尊、是陀羅尼神咒、六十二億恒河沙等諸佛所說。

World-Honored One, this dhāraṇī spell has been preached by buddhas [equal to] the sands of sixty-two koṭis of Ganges Rivers.

They are the mind of anuttara-samyak-sambodhi; they are the fruit of the arhat; they are the realization of the buddha.<sup>34</sup> Beyond these, there is no unconditioned or unproduced dharma.

しかるあるに、小乗愚人いはく、造像・起塔は有爲の功業なり、さしおきていとなむべからず、息慮凝心、これ無爲なり、無生・無作、これ眞實なり、法性・實相の觀行、これ無爲なり。かくのごとくいふを、西天東地の古今の習俗とせり。これによりて重罪・逆罪をつくるといへども、造像・起塔せず。塵勞稠林に染汚すといへども、念佛・讀經せず。これただ人天の種子を損壞するのみにあらず、如來の佛性を撥無するともがらなり。まことにかなしむべし、佛法僧の時節にあひながら、佛法僧の怨敵となりぬ。三寶の山にのぼりながら、空手にしてかへり、三寶の海にいりながら、空手にしてかへらんことは、たとひ千佛萬祖の出世にあふとも、得度の期なく、發心の方を失するなり。これ、經卷にしたがはず、知識にしたがはざるによりて、かくのごとし。おほく外道・邪師にしたがふによりて、かくのごとし。造塔等は發菩提にあらず、といふ見解、はやくなげすつべし。こころをあらひ、身をあらひ、みみをあらひ、めをあらうて、見聞すべからざるなり。まさに、佛經にしたがひ、知識にしたがひて、正法に歸し、佛法を修學すべし。

Nevertheless, stupid people of the Small Vehicle say that constructing images and erecting stūpas are conditioned meritorious deeds; one should leave off and not perform them.<sup>35</sup> “To stop thinking and congeal the mind” — this is the unconditioned; the unborn, the unproduced — this is the true reality; the contemplations of the dharma nature and the fruit of the arhat (arakan ka 阿羅漢果): I.e., the last of the “four fruits” (shika 四果) of the śrāvaka path to nirvāṇa.

realization of the buddha (butsu genjō 佛現成): Or “the appearance of a buddha”; an expression not occurring elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, it could be taken to mean either “the attainment of buddhahood” or “the manifestation of buddhahood (or of a buddha).” The last reading is suggested by the line in the text below, “making buddha after buddha appear” (butsu butsu o genjō seshimete 佛佛を現成せしめて).

35 stupid people of the Small Vehicle (shōjō gunin 小乘愚人): The reference here to the “Small Vehicle” does not necessarily reflect the standard divisions between the Mahāyāna and non-Mahāyāna literature: Dōgen regularly uses the term shōjō 小乘 (S. hīnayāna) in pejorative reference to those versions of Buddhism that do not accord with what he considers the ultimate teachings of the tradition. Indeed, while it is not clear just whom he may have had in mind here, views of the sort he attributes to the “stupid people” can be found in the literature of the Mahāyāna (including Chan).

conditioned meritorious deeds (ui no kugō 有爲の功業): Also read ui no kugyō (or kōgyō). I.e., acts bringing forth good karma.

real marks — this is the unconditioned.<sup>36</sup> They have made this kind of talk their custom throughout past and present in Sindh in the West and the Land of the East. Accordingly, though they commit grave offenses and heinous offenses, they do not construct images or erect stūpas; though they are defiled in the thicket of the afflictions, they do not recollect the buddhas or read the sūtras.<sup>37</sup> This is a bunch that not only damages the seeds of humans and devas but discards the buddha nature of the tathāgatas.<sup>38</sup> It is truly sad that, though they have encountered the time of buddha, dharma, and saṃgha, they have become enemies of buddha, dharma, and saṃgha. While climbing the mountain of the three treasures, they have returned empty handed; while entering the ocean of the 36 “To stop thinking and congeal the mind” (soku ryo gyō shin 息慮凝心): Two terms implying a concentrated state of meditation, as in common expressions such as “stop thinking and forget objects” (soku ryo bō en 息慮忘緣) or “congeal the mind and enter samādhi” (gyō shin nyū jō 凝心入定). The terms occur as positive descriptions of meditation but are also used pejoratively in Zen texts to dismiss such practice. In his “Shōbōgenzō zazen shin” 正法眼藏坐禪箴, Dōgen strongly rejects what he calls there “the enterprise of stopping thinking and congealing in tranquility” (soku ryo gyō jaku no keiei 息慮凝寂の經營).

the unborn, the unproduced (mushō musa 無生・無作): “The unborn” (or “un arisen”) is an exceedingly common term in Buddhism and Zen for the ultimate, “empty” nature of things; a near synonym for “the unproduced” and “the unconditioned” with, perhaps, the added connotation of “that which exists before anything arises.”

contemplations of the dharma nature and the real marks (hosshō jissō no kangyō 法性・實相の觀行): Or “contemplation of the real marks of the dharma nature.” I.e., meditation on the ultimate reality of phenomena. The translation follows Kawamura’s punctuation, which suggests that hosshō jissō 法性實相 refers to two well-known meditations, hosshō kan 法性觀 and jissō kan 實相觀; alternatively, it could be read as a single expression, occurring often in Buddhist texts, for the ultimate truth.

37 grave offenses and heinous offenses (jūzai gyakuzai 重罪・逆罪): The former term is often associated with violations of the ten grave precepts of the Chinese Fanwang jing 梵網經: killing, stealing, adultery, lying, using immoral language, slandering, equivocating, coveting, anger, and false views. The latter term can refer most specifically to the five offenses (gogyaku 五逆; S. pañcānantarya) leading to the avīci hell: matricide, patricide, killing an arhat, injuring a buddha, and disrupting the saṃgha.

the thicket of the afflictions (jinrō chūrin 塵勞稠林): More literally, “the dense grove of dust and toil.” The term jinrō 塵勞 is regularly used for the kleśa (bonnō 煩惱), or “defilements,” that keep beings in saṃsāra. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dust.”

they do not recollect the buddhas or read the sūtras (nenbutsu dokyō sezu 念佛・讀經せず): Dōgen’s dismissal here of those who do not engage in these practices seems in some tension with a remark by his teacher, Rujing 如淨, that Dōgen quotes with approval in several places; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Body and mind sloughed off.”

38 the seeds of humans and devas (ninten no shūji 人天の種子): I.e., the karmic potential (S. bīja) for birth in the favorable states of human and deva.

three treasures, they have returned empty handed.<sup>39</sup> Thus, though they encounter the appearance in the world of a thousand buddhas and ten thousand ancestors, they have no prospect of attaining deliverance and have lost the means to bring forth the mind.<sup>40</sup> They are like this because they do not follow the sūtra scrolls and do not follow wise friends; they are like this because many of them follow other paths and false teachers.<sup>41</sup> We should quickly discard the opinion that constructing stūpas and the like is not bringing forth bodhi. Washing our minds, washing our bodies, washing our ears, washing our eyes, we should not listen to it. Following the sūtras of the buddhas and following wise friends, we should return to the true dharma and study the buddha dharma.

In the great way of the buddha dharma, there is a chiliocosm of sūtra scrolls within a single dust mote; there are incalculable buddhas within a single dust mote.<sup>42</sup> One blade of grass and one tree are both body and 39 the three treasures (sanbō 三寶): I.e., the “buddha, dharma, and saṃgha” mentioned in the preceding sentence of the text.

40 attaining deliverance (tokudo 得度): Taken here in its sense “be able to cross over (to the other shore of nirvāṇa),” rather than its common use in reference to taking the precepts.

41 they do not follow the sūtra scrolls and do not follow wise friends (kyōkan ni shitagawazu, chishiki ni shitagawazaru 經卷にしたがはず、知識にしたがはざる): I.e., they do not learn from either Buddhist texts or Buddhist teachers; reflecting the fixed expression, occurring often in Dōgen’s writings, “whether from a wise friend, whether from a sūtra scroll” (waku jū chishiki waku jū kyōkan 或從知識或從經卷). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Whether from a wise friend, whether from a sūtra scroll.”

other paths and false teachers (gedō jashi 外道・邪師): Following Kawamura’s punctuation, which treats the four glyphs as two separate terms; alternatively, they may be read as “false teachers of other paths” (gedō jashi 外道邪師): i.e., non-Buddhist teachers (S. tīrthika).

42 a chiliocosm of sūtra scrolls (daisen no kyōkan 大千の經卷): Or, as we might say, “a universe of scriptures.” The term daisen 大千 is generally used as an abbreviation for sanzen daisen sekai 三千大千世界 (S. trisāhasra-mahāsāhasra-lokadhātu), the “three-thousandfold great thousandfold” that constitutes the domain of a buddha. A great chiliocosm equals one billion worlds (1000<sup>3</sup>).

mind.<sup>43</sup> Where “the myriad dharmas do not arise,” the one mind also does not arise; where it is “the real marks of the dharmas,” it is the real marks of a single dust mote.<sup>44</sup> Therefore, the one mind is the dharmas; the dharmas are the one mind, are the entire body.<sup>45</sup> Were constructing stūpas and so on conditioned, the bodhi of the buddha fruit and the buddha nature of true suchness would also be conditioned.<sup>46</sup> Since suchness and buddha nature are unconditioned, constructing images, erecting stūpas and so on are not conditioned: they are the unconditioned bringing forth of the mind of bodhi; they are merit unconditioned and uncontaminated.<sup>47</sup> We should firmly believe that constructing images and erecting stūpas are bringing forth the mind of bodhi. From them will grow a vow [to last] koṭis of kalpas; they are bringing forth the mind that will not decay for a single dust mote (ichijin 一塵): i.e., the tiniest particle, a “grain,” an “atom” (S. aṇu). The term jin 塵 is also used to indicate a sense object (kyō 境; S. viśaya); hence, this expression could also be rendered “a single object [of perception].” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Dust.”

43 One blade of grass and one tree are both body and mind (issō ichiboku tomo ni shinjin nari 一草一木ともに身心なり): An odd claim that should probably be interpreted through the statement just below that “the dharmas are the one mind, are the entire body.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Body and mind.”

44 “the myriad dharmas do not arise” (manbō fushō 萬法不生): Probably to be taken in the sense, all things are “empty” of real arising and ceasing; seen in a common saying in Zen texts, “When the mind is without concerns, the myriad dharmas do not arise” (shin nyaku buji manbō fushō). The translation here of fushō 不生 as “not arise” obscures its close semantic relationship with mushō 無生, rendered above (section 10) as “unborn.”

the one mind also does not arise (isshin mo fushō 一心も不生): Or “a single thought also does not arise.” A conclusion no doubt reflecting the common notion that the myriad dharmas all arise as the content of experience.

“the real marks of the dharmas” (shohō jissō 諸法實相): A popular phrase occurring widely throughout the Chinese Buddhist canon. The translation here takes it to mean simply “what the dharmas really are,” but there is a long tradition of reading the phrase as “the dharmas are the real mark”—i.e., the phenomena of our experience are the ultimate reality.

45 the dharmas are the one mind, are the entire body (shohō wa isshin nari, zenshin nari 諸法は一心なり、全身なり): Presumably, a rephrasing of the previous claim that each grass and tree is the body and mind.

46 the bodhi of the buddha fruit and the buddha nature of true suchness (bukka bodai shinnyo busshō 佛果菩提・眞如佛性): Two common expressions for ultimate wisdom and reality; alternatively, the four glyphs can be read separately as “buddhahood, bodhi, suchness, and buddha nature.”

47 merit unconditioned and uncontaminated (mui muro no kudoku 無爲・無漏の功德): The term muro 無漏 (S. anāsrava) refers to the undefiled states of the advanced adept (sheng 聖; S. ārya).

koṭis of koṭis of myriads of kalpas. This is called “seeing the buddha and hearing the dharma.”<sup>48</sup>

[63:12]

しるべし、木石をあつめ、泥土をかさね、金銀七寶をあつめて造佛・起塔する、すなはち一心をあつめて造塔・造像するなり。空空をあつめて作佛するなり、心心を拈じて造佛するなり、塔塔をかさねて造塔するなり、佛佛を現成せしめて造佛するなり。

We should realize that to construct a buddha or erect a stūpa by collecting wood and stone, piling up mud, or collecting gold, silver, and the seven treasures is to construct a stūpa or construct an image by collecting the one mind.<sup>49</sup> It is to make a buddha by collecting emptiness after emptiness; it is to construct a buddha by taking up mind after mind.<sup>50</sup> It is to construct a stūpa by piling up stūpa after stūpa; it is to construct a buddha by making buddha after buddha appear.

かるがゆえに、經にいはく、作是思惟時、十方佛皆現。しるべし、一思惟の作佛なるときは、十方思惟佛皆現なり。一法の作佛なるときは、諸法作佛なり。

Hence, it is said in the sūtra, “When I had this thought, the buddhas of the ten directions all appeared.”<sup>51</sup> We should understand that, when one thought is making a buddha, the “thought buddhas of the ten directions” all appear. When one dharma is making a buddha, all the dharmas are making a buddha.

48 “seeing the buddha and hearing the dharma” (kenbutsu monpō 見佛聞法): A standard expression found throughout the Buddhist canon. The antecedent of kore これ (“this”) here is unclear; presumably, “constructing images and erecting stūpas.”

49 gold, silver, and the seven treasures (kin gin shippō 金銀七寶): A standard expression meaning “the seven treasures beginning with gold and silver.” Lists in Buddhist scriptures of the seven precious substances (S. sapta-ratna) vary somewhat; a popular version in East Asia is that given in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:21b20-21): gold, silver, beryl, moonstone, agate, pearl, and cornelian.

50 emptiness after emptiness (kūkū 空空): Here, and in the following three clauses, Dōgen simply duplicates the glyph. The implied syntactical relationships are unclear; hence, the expression could be interpreted as “various emptinesses” (“minds,” “stūpas,” “buddhas”), “each individual instance of emptiness (etc.),” “emptiness upon emptiness (etc.).”

51 “When I had this thought, the buddhas of the ten directions all appeared” (sa ze shiyui ji, jippō butsu kai gen 作是思惟時、十方佛皆現): The speaker here is Buddha Śākyamuni. Reference to a passage in Chapter 2 of the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:9c17-20), in which Śākyamuni explains why he decided to preach the three vehicles as an expedient device.

釋迦牟尼佛言、明星出現時、我與大地有情、同時成道。

Buddha Śākyamuni said, “When the dawn star appeared, I, together with the whole earth and sentient beings, simultaneously attained the way.”<sup>52</sup>

[63:15]

しかあれば、發心・修行・菩提・涅槃は、同時の發心・修行・菩提・涅槃なるべし。佛道の身心は、草木瓦礫なり、風雨水火なり。これをめぐらして佛道ならしむる、すなはち發心なり。虚空を撮得して造塔・造佛すべし、溪水を掬啗して造佛・造塔すべし、これ發阿耨多羅三藐三菩提なり。一發菩提心を、百千萬發するなり、修證もまたかくのごとし。

Thus, bringing forth the mind [of bodhi], practice, bodhi, and nirvāṇa must be a “simultaneous” bringing forth the mind, practice, bodhi, and nirvāṇa.<sup>53</sup> The body and mind on the way of the buddhas is grass and trees, tiles and pebbles, is wind and rain, water and fire. To turn these into the way of the buddhas — this is bringing forth the mind. We should grab hold of empty space and construct a stūpa, construct a buddha; we should swallow a handful of the valley stream and construct a buddha, construct a stūpa.<sup>54</sup> This is bringing forth anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi. It

52 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): A description of the Buddha’s awakening under the bodhi tree. This line is quoted in several chapters of the Shōbōgenzō, as well as in Dōgen’s Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.3:28, no. 37). Although the passage does appear in Chan texts from this period (see, e.g., Jianzhong Jingguo xudeng lu 建中靖國續燈錄, ZZ.136:36b17-18), it has not been located in any extant sūtra, and Dōgen’s source for it is unknown.

“dawn star” (myōjō 明星): I.e., the planet Venus.

“the whole earth and sentient beings” (daichi ujō 大地有情): The translation follows a common interpretation of this phrase; it could also be parsed “sentient beings of the great earth.”

53 “simultaneous” bringing forth the mind, practice, bodhi, and nirvāṇa (dōji no hosshin shugyō bodai nehan 同時の發心・修行・菩提・涅槃): Dōgen is here borrowing the term dōji 同時 (“simultaneous”) from the passage just above and seems, in the process, to be shifting (or, perhaps, extending) its sense from the claim that all things achieve awakening with the Buddha to the view that all stages of the bodhisattva path occur at the same time.

54 grab hold of empty space (kokū o sattoku shi 虚空を撮得し): Perhaps reflecting the words of the Tang-dynasty monk Shigong Huizang 石鞏慧藏 (dates unknown), in a conversation recorded at Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:256, case 248, and discussed in the “Shōbōgenzō koku” 正法眼藏虚空; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose.”

swallow a handful of the valley stream (keisui o kikutan shi 溪水を掬啗し): Stream water figures in two sources much appreciated by Dōgen. One is the story, found in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:218, case 183) and discussed in “Shōbōgenzō dōtoku” 正法眼藏道得, of a hermit who drank from a stream. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west.” The notion of making is a hundred thousand myriad instances of bringing forth one instance of bringing forth the mind of bodhi. Practice and verification are also like this.

しかあるに、發心は一發にしてさらに發心せず、修行は無量なり、證果は一證なり、とのみきくは、佛法をきくにあらず、佛法をしれるにあらず、佛法にあふにあらず。千億發の發心は、さだめて一發心の發なり、千億人の發心は、一發心の發なり、一發心は、千億の發心なり。修證・轉法もまたかくのごとし。草木等にあらずば、いかでか身心あらん、身心にあらずば、いかでか草木あらん、草木にあらずば、草木にあらざるがゆえに、かくのごとし。

Despite this, to hear only that bringing forth the mind is one bringing forth without further instances of bringing forth the mind, or that the practices are incalculable while the fruit of verification is one verification — this is not hearing the buddha dharma, is not knowing the buddha dharma, is not encountering the buddha dharma.<sup>55</sup> The bringing forth the mind of a thousand million instances of bringing forth is definitely bringing forth one instance of bringing forth the mind. A thousand million people's bringing forth the mind is bringing forth one bringing forth the mind; one bringing forth the mind is a thousand million instances of bringing forth the mind. Practice and verification and turning the dharma are also like this.<sup>56</sup> Were they not grass, trees, and the rest, how could there be body and mind?<sup>57</sup> Were they not body and mind, how could there be grass and trees? This is so because, were they not grass and trees, they would not be grass and trees.

a buddha with mountain stream water is also reminiscent of a verse by the famed poet Su Shi 蘇軾 (Su Dongpo 蘇東坡, 1037-1101) that provides the title theme for Dōgen's "Shōbōgenzō keisei sanshoku" 正法眼藏溪聲山色 (DZZ.1:274):

溪聲便是廣長舌、山色無非清淨身、夜來八萬四千偈、他日如何舉似人。

The sound of the stream is his long, broad tongue;

The mountain form, his pristine body.

This evening's 84,000 gāthās —

How will I tell them tomorrow?

55 one bringing forth without further instances of bringing forth the mind (ichi-hotsu ni shite sara ni hosshin sezu 一發にしてさらに發心せず): The argument here is likely against the common use of "bringing forth the mind" in reference specifically to the initial aspiration of the bodhisattva.

56 Practice and verification and turning the dharma (shushō tenbō 修證轉法): I.e., the entire bodhisattva spiritual career, from practice, through awakening, to teaching as a buddha.

57 Were they not grass, trees, and the rest (sōmoku tō ni arazuba 草木等にあらずば): The subject here is unexpressed; presumably, "practice and verification" (as well, perhaps, as "bringing forth the mind"). The argument here points back to the statement in the preceding section, "the body and mind on the way of the buddhas is grass and trees," etc.

Pursuing the way in seated meditation — this is bringing forth the mind of bodhi. Bringing forth the mind is neither one with nor different from it; seated meditation is neither one with nor different from it; they are not at two or three times; they are not arranged.<sup>58</sup> Each should be investigated in this way.<sup>59</sup> If collecting grass and trees and the seven treasures to construct stūpas and construct buddhas were conditioned throughout and were not attaining the way, the thirty-seven factors of bodhi would also be conditioned.<sup>60</sup> Humans and devas of the three realms taking up body and mind to practice would all be conditioned and would have no ultimate stage.<sup>61</sup> Grass and trees, tiles and pebbles, and the four elements

58 Bringing forth the mind is neither one with nor different from it (zazen wa ichii ni arazu 坐禪は一異にあらず): The translation supplies “it,” assuming the antecedent to be “pursuing the way in seated meditation” (and “bringing forth the mind” in the next clause); but this passage might also be translated in more abstract terms: “Bringing forth the mind is not [a matter of] oneness or difference. Sitting in meditation is not oneness or difference, is not two or three times, is not an arrangement. Each thing should be studied in this way.”

not at two or three times; not arranged (saisan ni arazu, shobun ni arazu 再三にあらず、處分にあらず): The sense here is likely “do not occur one after the other, are not distinguishable as separate categories.” The term shobun 處分, rendered here “arranged,” typically means to “deal with,” or “handle.”

59 Each (tōtō 頭頭): The antecedent is not clear; presumably “seated meditation” and “bringing forth the mind,” but it is also possible to take this as a more general reference: “each thing (or topic).”

60 attaining the way (jōdō 成道): A term typically referring to the attainment of bodhi, perhaps especially in the context of Śākyamuni’s attainment under the bodhi tree.

the thirty-seven factors of bodhi (sanjūshichi hon bodai bunpō 三十七品菩提分法): A Buddhist technical term for a common list of factors in the attainment of bodhi. Dōgen discusses the list in the Shōbōgenzō chapter of this name.

61 Humans and devas of the three realms (sangai ninten 三界・人天): Or, as Kawamura punctuates, “the three realms, humans and devas.”

How could grass and trees, and the like, not be the buddha nature of true suchness? The *dharma*s are not conditioned, not unconditioned; they are the real marks.<sup>64</sup> The real marks are the real marks of suchness; suchness is the present body and mind.<sup>65</sup> We should bring forth the mind with this body and mind. Do not dislike walking on water and walking on rocks.<sup>66</sup> Just taking up one blade of grass and constructing a sixteen-foot golden body, taking up a single infinitesimal dust mote would have no ultimate stage (kukyō chi aru bekarazu 究竟地あるべからず): I.e., would not culminate in buddhahood. “Ultimate stage” is a standard Buddhist term referring to the culmination (S. niṣṭha) of the bodhisattva path.

62 four elements and five aggregates (shidai goun 四大五蘊): I.e., the four primary forms of matter (S. mahābhūta), earth, water, fire, and wind, of which the physical world is composed; and the five “heaps” (S. skandha), form, sensation, perception, formations, and consciousness, into which the psychophysical organism can be analyzed. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four elements and five aggregates.”

only mind (yui shin 唯心): A version of the common claim, found throughout Zen (and other Buddhist) texts, that “the three realms are only mind” (sangai yui shin 三界唯心) or “the three realms are only one mind” (sangai yui isshin 三界唯一心). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “The three realms are only mind.”

63 All the worlds in the ten directions, the buddha nature of true suchness (jin jippō kai shinnyo busshō 盡十方界眞如佛性): The grammatical relationship between these two phrases is unclear. Perhaps the most likely choice is to read them with an implied conjunction; it is also possible to take them in apposition or to treat them as a single phrase (“the buddha nature of the true suchness of all the worlds in the ten directions”).

64 the real marks (jissō 實相): I.e., are ultimately real. See above, Note 44.

65 the real marks of suchness (nyoze jissō 如是實相): Or “such real marks.” No doubt a variant of the common nyoze sō 如是相 (“such marks” or “such a mark”). Though seemingly not particularly popular in Chan, this expression is not uncommon in Tiantai texts. It likely reflects the famous passage in Kumārajīva’s translation of the Lotus Sūtra, from which Tiantai derives its characteristic teaching of the “ten suchnesses” (jū nyoze 十如是); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the *dharma*s.”

66 Do not dislike walking on water and walking on rocks (mizu o fumi, ishi o fumu o, kirau koto nakare 水をふみ、石をふむを、きらふことなかれ): The suggestion would seem to be, “do not disdain action in the world of grass and trees, tiles and pebbles.” “Walking on water” (risui 履水) is commonly associated with the spiritual powers (jin-soku 神足; S. ṛddhi-pāda) of the contemplative adept, often occurring in the expression “walking on water as if it were earth; walking on earth as if it were water” (risui nyo chi richi nyo sui 履水如地履地如水).

67 taking up one blade of grass and constructing a sixteen-foot golden body (ik-kyō sō o nenjite jōroku konjin o zōsa shi 一茎草を拈じて丈六金身を造作し): “A sixteen-foot golden body” refers to the body of a buddha (or an image of the buddha). The phrase reflects a well-known Zen saying; see above, Note 15.

68 it is making a buddha; it is practicing buddhahood (sabutsu nari, gyōbutsu nari 作佛なり、行佛なり): The second phrase might also be rendered “it is a practicing buddha,” an expression appearing often in Dōgen’s writings and the title theme of his “Shōbōgenzō gyōbutsu iigi” 正法眼藏行佛威儀. The rendering here tries to retain the verb-object construction of the preceding statements.

69 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): The source of this quotation is unknown.

70 Upāsakas and upāsikās, good sons and good daughters (ubasoku ubai zennan-shi zennyonin 優婆塞・優婆夷・善男子・善女人): I.e., the Buddhist laity. The terms “upāsakas” and “upāsikās” refer to observant laymen and laywomen respectively; “good sons” (S. kula-putra) and “good daughters” (S. kula-duhitṛ) are standard forms of polite address to the laity in Buddhist texts. Note that, though the compound grammatical subject here is gender inclusive, the offering of wives assumes a male donor. The practice of offering wives and children, as well as one’s own body, for the sake of awakening is celebrated in various Buddhist texts. One example occurs in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:3a13-14), in a speech by the Bodhisattva Maitreya to which Dōgen will allude below (section 25):

復見菩薩、身肉手足、及妻子施、求無上道。

Again, I see bodhisattvas,

Donating the flesh of their bodies, their arms and legs,

As well as their wives and children,

In their quest for the unsurpassed way.

The most famous example of the offering of wives and children occurs in the story of Śākyamuni’s own previous life as the Bodhisattva Prince Sudāna (Xudana taizi 須達拏太子; better known in the Pali accounts as Vessantara), who practiced the virtue of charity by giving away his wife and children. (See, e.g., Taizi xudana jing 太子須大拏經, T.171.3:422a6ff.) The offering of one’s own flesh is reminiscent of the well-known story in the Prajñā-pāramitā-sūtra of the Bodhisattva Sadāprarudita (Changti pusa 常啼菩薩), who offered to sell his body parts to a brahman in the course of his quest for the perfection of wisdom. (See, e.g., Mohe bore boluomi jing 摩訶般若波羅蜜經, T.223.8:419a1-10.)

these donations of the faithful not practice?<sup>71</sup>

しかあればしりぬ、飲食・衣服・臥具・医薬、僧房・田林等を三寶に供養するは、自身および妻子等の身肉皮骨髓を供養したてまつるなり。すでに三寶の功德海にいりぬ、すなはち一味なり。すでに一味なるがゆえに三寶なり。三寶の功德、すでに自身および妻子の皮肉骨髓に現成する、精勤の辨道功夫なり。いま世尊の性相を擧して、佛道の皮肉骨髓を參取すべきなり。いまこの信施は、發心なり、受者比丘、いかでか不修ならん、頭正尾正なるべきなり。

Therefore, we know that making offerings to the three treasures of food and robes, bedding and medicines, monastic lodgings, fields and woodlands, and the like, is making offerings of the flesh, skin, bones, and marrow of “one’s own body” and of the bodies of “one’s wife and children.”<sup>72</sup> Entered into the ocean of the merit of the three treasures, they are of one taste.<sup>73</sup> Since they are of one taste, they are the three treasures. The merit of the three treasures appearing in the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of “one’s own body” and that of one’s “wife and children” is our exertion’s concentrated effort in pursuit of the way. Now, taking up the nature and marks of the World-Honored One, we should study the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of the way of the buddhas.<sup>74</sup> These “donations of the faithful” are bringing forth the mind; how could the bhikṣus who receive them not practice? They must be correct from head to tail.

---

flesh of their own bodies (jishin niku 自身肉): Or, “offer their own flesh.” Here and below, the glyphs jishin 自身 may be taken either as “one’s own” or as “own body.”

71 donations of the faithful (shinse 信施): Or “donations [given] in faith.”

72 flesh, skin, bones, and marrow (niku hi kotsu zui 肉皮骨髓): Here and below, Dōgen is playing on the expression hi niku kotsu zui associated with Bodhidharma; see above, Note 28.

73 they are of one taste (ichi mi nari 一味なり): From the common Buddhist metaphor that the Buddha’s teachings are all of a single purport, as the waters of the ocean all have the single taste (S. eka-rasa) of salt. The grammatical subject here is unexpressed; presumably, the “offerings” of the preceding sentence.

74 nature and marks of the World-Honored One (seson no shōsō 世尊の性相): I.e., the essential nature (S. svabhāva) and phenomenal characteristics (S. lakṣana) of the Buddha.

Hence, as soon as one dust mote is brought forth, one mind is brought forth in accordance with it; once one mind is first brought forth, one emptiness is just barely brought forth.<sup>75</sup> In sum, it is when the conscious and non-conscious bring forth the mind that they can first plant one buddha nature.<sup>76</sup> When, turning the four elements and five aggregates, they practice with a sincere mind, they will gain the way; when, turning the grass and trees, fences and walls, they practice with a sincere mind, they will gain the way; for the four elements and five aggregates and the grass and trees, fences and walls, have the same study, for they have the same nature, for they have the same mind, the same life, for they have the same body, the same function.<sup>77</sup>

75 one mind (isshin 一心): The term seems multivalent here : “a single thought [of the dust mote],” “one mind [of bodhi],” “the one mind,” “the whole mind,” etc. The rather awkward translation seeks to preserve the text’s play with the verb hotsu 發, as both “to produce” and “to occur,” and with the terms jin 塵, as both “particle” and “object,” and shin 心, as both “mind” and “thought.” For jin 塵, see above, Note 42.

one emptiness (ikkū 一空): Perhaps, one of the multiple emptinesses taken up to make a buddha in section 12; perhaps, the whole of empty space pinched to make a buddha or stūpa in section 15. The sense of wazuka ni わづかに (tentatively rendered “just barely”) here is uncertain.

76 conscious and non-conscious (ukaku mukaku 有覺・無覺): Read here as equivalent to “sentient and insentient” (ujō mujō 有情無情) (as, e.g., at Zongjing lu 宗鏡錄, T.2016.48:853a6-7) — perhaps in reference to the “mind” and “dust mote,” respectively. This pair of terms occurs several times in the Shōbōgenzō, usually in the sense “awakened and non-awakened.” Some manuscript witnesses read here ugaku mugaku 有學無學 (“student and non-student” — i.e., one in training on the Buddhist path and one who has completed training).

can first plant one buddha nature (hajimete ichi busshō o shutoku su はじめて一佛性を種得す): The figure of “planting” the buddha nature here likely serves to introduce the examples of horticultural practice in the following paragraph. The notion that the buddha nature is “planted” both before and after completion of training seems akin to Dōgen’s treatment of the concept elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō — e.g., in “Hakujushi” 柏樹子 (DZZ.1:442):

佛性は成佛以後の莊嚴なり、さらに成佛と同生同參する佛性もあるべし。

The buddha nature is an adornment after one attains buddhahood; further, there must be a buddha nature that is born together and studies together with attaining buddhahood.

77 the same study (dōsan 同參): Or “study together”; a term usually referring to fellow students. The translation seeks to retain the parallel with the following nominal forms, “same nature” (dōshō 同性), etc.

the same function (dōki 同機): A tentative translation of an unusual expression, not occurring elsewhere in Dōgen’s writing. The glyph ki 機 may also refer to the “faculties” or “abilities” of students.

Accordingly, in the communities of the buddhas and ancestors, there are many who pursued the way by taking up the mind of grass and trees; this is the form of bringing forth the mind of bodhi.<sup>78</sup> The Fifth Ancestor was once a practitioner who grew pines.<sup>79</sup> Linji worked at planting fir and pine on Mount Huangbo.<sup>80</sup> On Dongshan, there was old Mr. Liu, who planted pines.<sup>81</sup> In this, they take up the discipline of pine and cypress and gouge out the eye of the buddhas and ancestors; in this, they show that the power to play with the living eye is opening the clear eye.<sup>82</sup>

78 this is the form of bringing forth the mind of bodhi (kore hotsu bodai shin no yōsu nari これ發菩提心の様子なり): Or “this is a form of bringing forth the mind of bodhi.” The term yōsu 様子, occurring often in Dōgen’s writing, carries the sense both of the “shape” of something and a “model” of something.

79 The Fifth Ancestor was once a practitioner who grew pines (goso wa, ichiji no saishō dōsha nari 五祖は、一時の栽松道者なり): Reference to a story about the Fifth Ancestor of Chan in China, Daman Hongren 大滿弘忍 (602-675), recounted in “Shōbōgenzō busshō” 正法眼藏佛性. The term dōsha 道者 (“person of the way”) may refer to any Buddhist (or Daoist) practitioner or to a Buddhist acolyte.

80 Linji worked at planting fir and pine on Mount Huangbo (Rinzai wa, Ōbakusan no sai sanshō no kufū ari 臨濟は、黃檗山の栽杉松の功夫あり): Reference to a story about the famed Chan master Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866), recounted in “Shōbōgenzō gyōji” 正法眼藏行持. The term sanmatsu 杉松 (“fir [or cedar] and pine”) may also be taken simply as a generic term for conifers.

81 On Dongshan, there was old Mr. Liu, who planted pines (Tōzan ni wa, Ryū shi ō ari, saishō su 洞山には、劉氏翁あり、栽松す): Old man Liu figures in the life of Chan master Dongshan Siqian 洞山師虔 (d. 904), as recorded in the Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄 (T.2076.51:338b24-27):

師在洞山栽松。有劉翁者從師求偈。師作偈曰、長長三尺餘、薔薔覆荒草、不知何代人、得見此松老。

The Master [Dongshan Siqian] was on Mt. Dong planting pines. A certain old man Liu asked the Master for a gāthā. The Master composed a gāthā saying,

Tall, tall, more than three feet;

Dense, dense, covered with weeds.

Who knows what generation

Will see these pines grow old.

82 discipline of pine and cypress (shō haku no sōsetsu 松栢の操節): The term sōsetsu 操節 (“discipline”) does not occur elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings; likely synonymous with the more common sōgyō 操行 (“restrained conduct”). The notion of a discipline of cypress is reminiscent of Zhaozhou’s 趙州 famous “cypress at the front of the garden” (teizen hakujushi 庭前柏樹子), which Dōgen treats at length in his “Shōbōgenzō hakujushi” 正法眼藏柏樹子. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Cypress tree at the front of the garden.”

To construct stūpas, construct buddhas, and the like, is to play with the eye, is to taste bringing forth the mind, is to deploy bringing forth the mind.<sup>83</sup> Those who have not acquired the eye of constructing stūpas and the like have not attained the way of the buddhas and ancestors. It is after we acquire the eye of constructing buddhas that we make a buddha and make an ancestor. To say that constructing stūpas and the like will eventually turn to dust, that it is not the true merit; to say that training in the unborn is firm and stable, that it is not defiled by dust — these are not the words of a buddha.<sup>84</sup> If we say that stūpas turn to dust, then the unborn will also turn to dust. If the unborn does not turn to dust, the gouge out the eye of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no ganzei kesshutsu su 佛祖の眼睛抉出す): An idiomatic expression for getting the point of Zen, used interchangeably with the more common tosshutsu ganzei 突出眼睛 (“poke out the eye”); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye,” and “Gouge out Bodhidharma’s eye.”

in this, they show that the power to play with the living eye is opening the clear eye (kore rō katsu ganzei no chikara, kai mei ganzei naru koto o genjō suru nari これ弄活眼睛のちから、開明眼睛なることを見成するなり). This sentence might also be parsed, “This reveals the power to play with the living eye, the opening of the clear eye.” The expression “to open the eye” (kaigen 開眼) typically refers to the final act of consecrating a buddhist icon, though Chan masters regularly use it as a metaphor for spiritual awakening.

83 taste bringing forth the mind (kitsu hosshin 喫發心); deploy bringing forth the mind (shi hosshin 使發心): Tentative translations of two odd expressions. The verbs kitsu 喫 (“to eat” or “to drink”; “to endure”) and shi 使 (“to use,” “to employ,” “to send off,” etc.) might be taken as passive and causative markers respectively; hence “to suffer bringing forth the mind”; “to cause bringing forth the mind.”

84 not defiled by dust (jin'ai ni zenna serarezu 塵埃に染汚せられず): The image shifts here from the “dust” (jindo 塵土) that remains from the ruined stūpa to the “dust” (jin'ai 塵埃) that defiles the mind; possibly recalling the famous verse attributed to the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能; see, e.g., Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄, ZZ.135:645a6-7:

菩提本無樹、明鏡亦非臺。本來無一物、何處有塵埃。

Bodhi originally has no tree,

The bright mirror, no stand.

From the beginning, not one thing;

Where is there any dust?

See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bright mirror,” and “Dust.”

stūpas also will not turn to dust. Where are we here, that we're talking about "conditioned" and talking about "unconditioned"?<sup>85</sup>

[63:23] {2:167}

經曰、菩薩於生死、最初發心時、一向求菩提、堅固不可動。彼一念功德、深廣無涯際、如來分別說、窮劫不能盡。

It is said in a sūtra,<sup>86</sup>

*When the bodhisattva, in the midst of birth and death,
First brings forth the mind,
Solely seeking bodhi,
Firmly and immovably,
The merit of that one thought
Is so deep, broad, and boundless that,
Were the Tathāgata to explain its particulars,
He could not exhaust them by the end of the kalpa.*

[63:24]

あきらかにしるべし、生死を拈來して發心する、これ一向求菩提なり。彼一念は、一草一木とおなじかるべし、一生一死なるがゆえに。しかあれども、その功德の深も無涯際なり、廣も無涯際なり。窮劫を言語として、如來、これを分別すとも、盡期あるべからず。海かれてなほ底のこり、人は死すとも心のこるべきがゆえに、不能盡なり。彼一念の深廣無涯際なるがごとく、一草一木・一石一瓦の深廣も、無涯際なり。一草一石、もし七尺八尺なれば、彼一念も七尺八尺なり、發心もまた七尺八尺なり。

We should clearly recognize that taking up birth and death and bringing forth the mind is “solely seeking bodhi.” “That one thought” must be the same as one blade of grass, one tree; for it is one “birth,” one “death.” Nevertheless, the “depth” of its “merit” is “boundless,” the “breadth” of its “merit” is “boundless.” Even if “the Tathāgata” were to “describe its particulars” in the language of the “end of the kalpa,” he could not expect to exhaust them.<sup>87</sup> He could not exhaust them because, “when the ocean dries up,” the bottom remains; “though a person dies,” the mind

85 Where are we here, that we're talking about "conditioned" and talking about "unconditioned"? (shari ze jinmo shozai, setsu ui setsu mui nari 遮裡是甚麼處在、說有爲說無爲なり): Dōgen here slips into Chinese to ask a common form of Chan rhetorical question.

86 a sūtra (kyō 經): From the Avataṃsaka-sūtra (Huayan jing 華嚴經, T.278.9:432c29-433a3).

87 in the language of the "end of the kalpa" (gūgō o gongo toshite 窮劫を言語として): A tentative translation of an odd play on the sūtra passage; literally, “taking ‘the end of the kalpa’ as his words.” Dōgen seems to want to parse the Chinese phrase rulai fenbie shuo qiong jie bu neng jin 如來分別說窮劫不能盡 (“Were the Tathāgata to explain its particulars, he could not exhaust them by the end of the kalpa”) as if qiong jie 窮劫 (“end of the kalpa”) were the object of the predicate shuo 說 (“to explain”). Possibly the sense is, “to speak from the ultimate position.”

remains.<sup>88</sup> Just as the depth and breadth of “that one thought” are boundless, so the depth and breadth of one blade of grass, one tree, one rock, one tile, are also boundless. When one blade of grass, one rock, is seven feet or eight feet, “that one thought” is also seven feet or eight feet, and bringing forth the mind is likewise seven feet or eight feet.<sup>89</sup>

しかあればすなはち、入於深山、思惟佛道は、容易なるべし、造塔・造佛は、甚難なり。ともに精進無怠より成熟すといへども、心を拈來すると、心に拈來せらるると、はるかにことなるべし。かくのごとくの發菩提心、つもりて佛祖現成するなり。

Therefore, “entering the deep mountains and thinking on the way of the buddhas” is easy; building stūpas and building buddhas is extremely difficult.<sup>90</sup> Both may be developed from vigor and perseverance, but there is a great difference between taking up the mind and being taken up by the mind. As this kind of bringing forth the mind of bodhi builds up, the buddhas and ancestors appear.

88 “when the ocean dries up,” the bottom remains; “though a person dies,” the mind remains (kai karete nao soko nokori, hito wa shisu tomo shin nokoru beki 海かれてなほ底のこり、人は死すとも心のこるべき): Presumably, we are to understand “mind” here as “the mind of bodhi.” Dōgen is playing here, as he does elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, with a saying, drawn from a verse by the poet Du Xunhe 杜荀鶴 (846-907), that occurs often in Chan literature. See, e.g., Zongjing lu 宗鏡錄, T.2016.48:564b12:

海枯終見底、人死不知心。

When the ocean dries up, we finally see the bottom;

When a person dies, we do not know his mind.

89 seven feet or eight feet (shichi shaku hachi shaku 七尺八尺): The use of this measurement occurs regularly in the Shōbōgenzō, generally in ironic reference to something immeasurable. Given his identification of bringing forth the mind with constructing a stūpa, Dōgen may here be recalling in particular Chan Master Xuansha’s 玄沙 proposal, cited in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:158, case 60) for a seamless stūpa of seven or eight feet; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven feet or eight feet.”

90 “entering the deep mountains and thinking on the way of the buddhas” (nyū o shinzan, shiyui butsudō 入於深山、思惟佛道): I.e., the practices of the renunciant. From the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:3a20-22):

又見菩薩、勇猛精進、入於深山、思惟佛道。又見離欲、常處空閑、深修禪定、得五神通。

And I [Maitreya] see bodhisattvas,

Courageous and vigorous,

Entering the deep mountains

And thinking on the way of the buddhas.

And I see them, free from desire,

Dwelling always in the wild,

Deeply cultivating meditation

And attaining the five spiritual powers.

INTRODUCTION

This short text was composed in the early spring of 1244, at Kippōji, in Echizen province. Number 64 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō, it occurs as number 54 in the sixty-chapter compilation and number 68 in the Honzan edition.

The title theme is the rare udumbara flower said (in Dōgen's version of the story) to have been held up by Buddha Śākyamuni on Vulture Peak at the time he transmitted his treasury of the true dharma eye to his disciple Mahākāśyapa, the First Ancestor of the Zen lineage. Dōgen opens with the famous legend, and then proceeds to comment on the meaning of "holding up the flower" and other elements of the tale. In closing, he introduces two poems by his own teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, on plum and peach blossoms.

靈山百萬衆前、世尊拈優曇華瞬目。于時摩訶迦葉、破顏微笑。世尊云、我有正法眼藏涅槃妙心、附囑摩訶迦葉。

On Vulture Peak, before an assembly of a million, the World-Honored One held up an udumbara flower and blinked his eyes.<sup>1</sup> At that time, Mahākāśyapa broke into a smile. The World-Honored One said, “I have the treasury of the true dharma eye, the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa; I now bequeath it to Mahākāśyapa.

[64:2]

七佛・諸佛は、おなじく拈華來なり。これを向上の拈華と修證現成せるなり、直下の拈華と裂破開明せり。

The seven buddhas, all the buddhas, have similarly been holding up a flower. They have practiced and verified it and realized it as a higher holding up a flower; they have broken it open and revealed it as the immediate holding up the flower.<sup>2</sup>

1 Vulture Peak (Ryōzen 靈山): I.e., Sacred Vulture Peak (Ryōjusen 靈鷲山; S. Grdhrakūṭa-parvata), the mountain near Rājagṛha in Magadha said to be the site of the legendary first transmission of Zen, described here, from Śākyamuni to Mahākāśyapa. The legend occurs often in Chan literature, but Dōgen’s version here (variations of which occur elsewhere in his writings), while given in Chinese as if quoting a source, does not seem to have any extant Chinese precedent.

the World-Honored One held up an udumbara flower and blinked his eyes (Seson nen undonge shunmoku 世尊拈優曇華瞬目): See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Holding up a flower and blinking the eyes.” The udumbara flower (udonge 優曇華), often identified as the cluster fig (ficus glomerata), is said to bloom only rarely (by some accounts, only once every three thousand years) and, hence, used in Buddhist literature to represent a rare and precious event. While mention of the flower (and occasionally of the “blink,” or “wink”) occurs in other accounts of the first transmission, the identification of the flower as an udumbara blossom seems to lack extant precedent.

2 a higher holding up a flower (kōjō no nenge 向上の拈華); the immediate holding up the flower (jikige no nenge 直下の拈華): Perhaps meaning something like, “an act that is at once beyond the historical buddhas and yet immediately present in history.”

[64:3]

しかあればすなはち、拈華裏の向上下、向自他、向表裏等、ともに渾華拈なり。華量・佛量・心量・身量なり。いく拈華も、面面の嫡嫡なり、附嘱有在なり。世尊拈華來、なほ放下著いまだし。拈華世尊來、ときに嗣世尊なり。拈華時すなはち盡時のゆえに、同參世尊なり、同拈華なり。

Thus, within holding up a flower, toward higher and lower, toward self and other, toward surface and interior, and so on, are all the holding up of the entire flower.<sup>3</sup> It is the measure of the flower, the measure of the buddha, the measure of the mind, the measure of the body.<sup>4</sup> However many [instances of] holding up a flower there may be, they are successor after successor, one after another; they are the continued existence of the bequest. The World-Honored One has been holding up a flower; he has never let it go. When the World-Honored One comes holding up a flower, that is succeeding the World-Honored One.<sup>5</sup> Because the time of holding up a flower is all time, it is studying together with the World-Honored One; it is holding up the flower together.

[64:4] {2:170}

いはゆる拈華といふは、華拈華なり、梅華・春華・雪華・蓮華等なり。いはくの梅華の五華は、三百六十餘會なり、五千四十八卷なり、三乘十二分教なり、三賢十聖なり。これによりて、三賢十聖およぼざるなり。大藏あり、奇特あり、これを華開世界起といふ。一華開五葉、結果自然成とは、渾身是已掛渾身なり。桃華をみて眼睛を打失し、翠竹をきくに耳處を不現ならしむる、拈華の而今なり。腰雪斷臂、禮拜得髓する、華自開なり。石碓米白、夜半傳衣する、華已拈なり。これら世尊手裏の命根なり。

“Holding up a flower” means a flower holding up a flower; it means plum flowers, spring flowers, snow flowers, lotus flowers, and so on. What we speak of as the five petals of the plum blossom are the three hundred sixty-four plus assemblies; they are the five thousand forty-eight

---

The English “higher” and “immediate” mask the directional parallelism of kōjō 向上 (“toward up”) and jikige 直下 (“straight down”) with which Dōgen will open his next sentence.

3 the holding up of the entire flower (kon ge nen 渾華拈): Or “the entire holding up of the flower.”

4 It is the measure of the flower, the measure of the buddha, the measure of the mind, the measure of the body (keryō butsuryō shinryō shinryō nari 華量・佛量・心量・身量なり): Presumably, meaning that the dimensions of the flower, buddha, mind, and body are all equivalent to “holding up a flower.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Measure of the buddha.”

5 The World-Honored One has been holding up a flower (Seson nenge rai 世尊拈華來); the World-Honored One comes holding up a flower (nenge Seson rai 拈華世尊來): Dōgen plays here with the syntax of the Chinese phrase, in the process shifting the sense of the glyph rai 來 from a present perfect progressive marker to the verb “to come.”

6 What we speak of as the five petals of the plum blossom (iwaku no baika no goke いはくの梅華の五華): Reading goyō 五葉 (“five petals”) for Kawamura’s goke 五華 (“five blossoms”). The plum blossom is in fact composed of five petals, though here Dōgen is no doubt alluding to a line in the transmission verse attributed to Bodhidharma, in which the “five petals” are generally taken as a prediction of the five generations of ancestors after Bodhidharma (or, sometimes, of the five houses into which the lineage would develop after the Sixth Ancestor); see Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:219c17-18:

吾本來茲土、傳法救迷情、一華開五葉、結果自然成。

I originally came to this land

To transmit the dharma and save deluded sentient beings.

A single flower opens five petals;

The fruit forms, ripening naturally of itself.

For more on this verse, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “A single flower opens five petals.”

the three hundred sixty-four plus assemblies (sanbyaku rokujū yo e 三百六十餘會): The number of gatherings at which Buddha Śākyamuni is said to have preached during the course of his ministry (see, e.g., Biyān lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:146c3).

five thousand forty-eight scrolls (gosen shijūhachi kan 五千四十八卷): The number of fascicles in the imperially-sponsored catalog of Buddhist scriptures, the Kaiyuan shijiao lu 開元釋教錄 (T.2154), compiled in 730 by Zhisheng 智昇.

the three vehicles and twelvefold teachings (sanjō jūnibun kyō 三乘十二分教): I.e., the vehicles of śrāvaka, pratyeka-buddha, and bodhisattva; and the twelve genres into which the literature of the Buddhist canon is sometimes divided (discussed by Dōgen in “Shōbōgenzō bukkyō” 正法眼藏佛教); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Three vehicles and twelvefold teachings.”

the three worthies and ten sages (sanken jissshō 三賢十聖): A common reference to those on the bodhisattva path: the three levels of “worthies” (ken 賢; S. bhadra), and the ten higher stages, or “grounds” (ji 地; S. bhūmi) of the sage (sheng 聖; S. ārya).

7 the three worthies and ten sages do not reach them (sanken jissshō oyobazaru nari 三賢十聖およばざるなり): Presumably meaning that the petals of the plum blossom include but go beyond the bodhisattva path. That the tradition of the buddhas and ancestors transcends even the most advanced stages of the bodhisattva path is a common refrain in Dōgen’s writing.

8 There is the great treasury; there is the extraordinary (daizō ari, kitoku ari 大藏あり、奇特あり): Probably meaning that the petals of the plum blossom contain both the complete teachings of Buddhism (the “great treasury” of the Buddhist canon) and the practices of the Buddhist adepts (the extraordinary matter of Chan life). The expression “the extraordinary” (or “weird”; kitoku 奇特) here may recall the saying, quoted in “Shōbōgenzō kajō” 正法眼藏家常, of Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 (749-814) that the “extraordinary matter” (kitoku ji 奇特事) was “sitting alone on Daxiong Peak.” (See, e.g. Biyān lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:166c26-27.)

als; the fruit forms, ripening naturally of itself” means “the whole body is the self hanging on the whole body.”<sup>9</sup> Seeing the peach blossoms and losing the eyes; making the ears disappear upon hearing the jade bamboo — these are the present of holding up a flower.<sup>10</sup> Hip-deep in snow and cutting off an arm; making a bow and getting the marrow — these are a flower opening of itself.<sup>11</sup> A stone pestle and whitened rice, transmitting the robe in the middle of the night — these are the flower already held up.<sup>12</sup> They are the root of life in the hand of the World-Honored One.

“a flower opens, and the world arises” (ke kai sekai ki 華開世界起): The final line of the dharma transmission verse attributed to Bodhidharma’s master, Prajñātāra. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “A flower opens, and the world arises.”

9 “A single flower opens five petals; the fruit forms, ripening naturally of itself” (ikke kai goyō, kekka jinen jō 一華開五葉、結果自然成): Two lines of the transmission verse attributed to Bodhidharma (Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:219c17-18); see above, Note 6.

“the whole body is the self hanging on the whole body” (konjin ze ko ka konjin 渾身是已掛渾身): Variation on a line from a verse on the wind chime by Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227), quoted elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō (from Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:132b15-16):

渾身似口掛虛空、不問東西南北風、一等爲他談般若、滴丁東了滴丁東。

The whole body, like a mouth, hanging in empty space,

Without asking if the winds are from east, west, south, or north,

Equally, for them, it talks of prajñā:

10 Seeing the peach blossoms and losing the eyes (tōka o mite ganzei o tashitsu shi 桃華をみて眼睛を打失し): These two clauses seem to combine allusions to two different passages in Chan literature to which Dōgen will return below: the former, treated in sections 14 and 15, recalls the case of Lingyun Zhiqin 靈雲志勤 (dates unknown), who is said to have attained an awakening from seeing peach trees in bloom; the latter, quoted in section 12, suggests lines of a verse by Tiantong Rujing. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Peach blossoms,” “Eye.”

making the ears disappear upon hearing the jade bamboo (suichiku o kiku ni nisho o fugen narashimuru 翠竹をきくに耳處を不現ならしむる): Allusion to the famous story of Xiangyan Zhixian 香嚴智閑 (died 898) (cited in shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:134, case 17, and discussed in “Shōbōgenzō keisei sanshoku” 正法眼藏溪聲山色), who attained an understanding when he heard the sound of a bit debris striking a bamboo stalk.

11 Hip-deep in snow and cutting off an arm; making a bow and getting the marrow (yōsetsu danpi, raihai tokuzui 腰雪斷臂、禮拜得髓): Reference, in Chinese, to two famous incidents, appearing often in the Shōbōgenzō, in the hagiography of the Second Ancestor, Huike 慧可: the first recalls the legend that Huike stood all night in a snow-storm waiting to be recognized by Bodhidharma and finally cut off one of his arms as an offering to the Indian master (see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Cut off an arm”); the second evokes the transmission of the ancestral lineage to Huike when Bodhidharma acknowledged his silent bow with the words, “You’ve gotten my marrow” (see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow”).

[64:5]

おほよそ拈華は、世尊成道より已前にあり、世尊成道と同時なり、世尊成道よりものちにあり。これによりて、華成道なり。拈華、はるかにこれらの時節を超越せり。諸佛諸祖の發心・發足・修證・保任、ともに拈華の春風を蝶舞するなり。しかあれば、いま瞿曇世尊、はなのなかに身をいれ、空のなかに身をかくせるによりて、鼻孔をとるべし、虚空をとれり、拈華と稱す。拈華は眼睛にて拈ず、心識にて拈ず、鼻孔にて拈ず、華拈にて拈ずるなり。

In sum, “holding up a flower” is before the World-Honored One attained the way, is at the same time that the World-Honored One attained the way, is after the World-Honored One attained the way. Consequently, it is the flower attaining the way. “Holding up the flower” has far transcended these times. The buddhas and ancestors’ bringing forth the mind, setting out, practicing and verifying, and maintaining [bodhi] are all the flowers they hold dancing like butterflies in the spring wind. Thus, since now Gautama, the World-Honored One, has put himself inside the flower, has hidden himself in the sky, that we should grab his nose, that we have grabbed empty space, is called “holding up a flower.”<sup>13</sup> “Holding up a flower” is holding it up with the eye, holding it up with the consciousness, holding it up with the nose, holding it up with holding up the flower.

night (sekitai bei haku, yahan den'e 石碓米白、夜半傳衣): Reference to the famous story, mentioned often in the Shōbōgenzō, of the transmission of the ancestral lineage to the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能. The layman Huineng is working pounding rice at the monastery of the Fifth Ancestor, Hongren 弘忍 (602-675); when his verse is recognized, he is invited into the master’s quarters and given the ancestral robe of Bodhidharma during the night.

13 now Gautama, the World-Honored One, has put himself inside the flower, has hidden himself in the sky (ima Kudon Seson, hana no naka ni mi o ire, kū no naka ni mi o kakuseru いま瞿曇世尊、はなのなかに身をいれ、空のなかに身をかくせる): Or, perhaps, “has hidden himself in emptiness.” The translation assumes that Dōgen has in mind here the expression “sky flowers” (kūge 空華; S. khapuspa), the optical illusion of spots appearing to the diseased eye, used as metaphor for what is mere appearance without objective reality. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Clouded eyes and sky flowers.”

that we should grab his nose, that we have grabbed empty space (bikū o toru beshi, kokū o toreri 鼻孔をとるべし、虚空をとれり): Likely reflecting a story, included in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:256, case 248) and discussed in the “Shōbōgenzō kokū” 正法眼藏虚空, in which grabbing hold of a nose is taken as grabbing hold of space; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose.”

おほよそこの山河・大地・日月風雨・人畜草木のいろいろ、角角拈來せる、すなはちこれ拈優曇華なり。生死去來も、はなのいろいろなり、はなの光明なり。いまわれら、かくのごとく參學する、拈華來なり。

In sum, the holding up at every turn of this assortment of mountains, rivers, and the whole earth, sun, moon, wind, and rain, humans, beasts, grass, and trees — this is precisely “holding up the udumbara flower.” Birth and death, coming and going are an assortment of flowers, are the radiance of the flower. Our study like this here has been “holding up a flower.”

[64:7]

佛言、譬如優曇華、一切皆愛樂。

Buddha said, “It is like the udumbara, in which everyone delights.”<sup>14</sup>

[64:8] {2:171}

いはくの一切は、現身藏身の佛祖なり、草木昆蟲の自有光明在なり。皆愛樂とは、面面の皮肉骨髓、いまし活鱗鱗なり。

“Everyone” refers to the buddhas and ancestors who show themselves and hide themselves, to the radiance naturally possessed by the grass, trees, and insects.<sup>15</sup> “Everyone delights” means the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of each one is brisk and lively right now.

[64:9]

しかあればすなはち、一切はみな優曇華なり。かるがゆえに、すなはちこれを、まれなり、といふ。瞬目とは、樹下に打坐して、明星に眼睛を換却せしときなり。このとき、摩訶迦葉、破顔微笑するなり。顔容、はやく破して、拈華顔に換却せり。如來、瞬目のときに、われらが眼睛、はやく打失きたれり。この如來瞬目、すなはち拈華なり。優曇華のころ、おのづからひらくなり。

Thus, “everyone” is the udumbara flower; precisely for this reason it is said to be rare. “Blinked his eyes” refers to the time that, sitting under the tree, he exchanged his eye for the dawn star.<sup>16</sup> At this time, 14 The Buddha (butsu 佛): From a verse in the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:10a28); the antecedent of “it” here is the teaching of the sūtra.

15 the radiance naturally possessed by the grass, trees, and insects (sōmoku konchū no ji u kōmyō zai 草木昆蟲の自有光明在): Perhaps variation on words attributed to Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃 (864–949), recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:166, case 81), probably from the Yuanwu yulu 圓悟語錄 (T.1997.47:803a25–26):

人人盡有光明在。看時不見暗昏昏。

People all have a radiance,

But when they look for it, they can’t see it in the dark.

16 sitting under the tree, he exchanged his eye for the dawn star (juge ni taza

Mahākāśyapa broke into a smile. His countenance had long since broken and changed into the face holding up the flower.<sup>17</sup> When the Tathāgata blinked, our eyes were lost from the start. The Tathāgata's blinking is itself his holding up the flower. The heart of the udumbara flower opens of itself.

拈華の正當恁麼時は、一切の瞿曇、一切の迦葉、一切の衆生、一切のわれら、ともに一隻の手をのべて、おなじく拈華すること、只今までもいまだやまざるなり。さらに手裏藏身三昧あるがゆえに、四大五蘊といふなり。

At the very moment that he holds up the flower, all Gautamas, all Kāśyapas, all living beings, all of us together extend a hand and similarly hold up a flower, without interruption even to the present.<sup>18</sup> And further, because they have the saṃādhi of concealing oneself in the hand, they are called “the four elements and five aggregates.”<sup>19</sup> shite, myōjō ni ganzei o kankyaku seshi 樹下に打坐して、明星に眼睛を換却せし): Reference to the Buddha's awakening experience; seated at the foot of the bodhi tree, he achieved buddhahood upon seeing Venus rising in the dawn sky.

17 His countenance had long since broken (gan'yō, hayaku hashite 顔容、はやく破して): A play on the expression hagan bishō 破顔微笑 (literally, “his face broke into a slight smile”). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Break into a smile.”

18 together extend a hand (tomo ni isseki no shu o nobete ともに一隻の手をのべて): A fixed expression occurring elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; best known from a story recorded in Dōgen's shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:175-176, case 97): A monk asked Luoshan Daoxian 羅山道閑 how much he should pay to have a stūpa built. Luoshan said,

若將三文錢與匠人、和尚此生決定不得塔。若將兩文錢與匠人、和尚與匠人共出一隻手。若將一文錢與匠人、帶累匠人眉鬚墮落。

If you offer the artisan three cash, the Reverend will definitely not get a stūpa in this lifetime. If you offer the artisan two cash, the Reverend and the artisan will each put out one hand. If you offer the artisan one cash, you'll so perplex him that the artisan's eyebrows and beard will fall off.

19 “four elements and five aggregates” (shidai goun 四大五蘊): Likely reflecting a saying by Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 (778-897), which Dōgen quotes in his shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:270, case 88) and elsewhere; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four elements and five aggregates.”

すかさなるなり。さらに僧堂、いま板をとりて雲中に拍し、佛殿、いま筭をふくむで水底にふく。

“I have” is to “bequeath it”; to “bequeath it” is “I have.” To “bequeath it” is invariably impeded by “I have.”<sup>20</sup> “I have” is the crown of the head; in studying it, we study with the dimensions of the crown of the head as our nose grip.<sup>21</sup> When we take up “I have” and change it to “bequeath it,” we maintain the treasury of the true dharma eye. “The Ancestral Master’s coming from the west” — this is to come holding up the flower.<sup>22</sup>

“Holding up the flower” is called “playing with the spirit.”<sup>23</sup> “Playing with the spirit” means “just sitting, sloughing off body and mind.”<sup>24</sup> Becoming a buddha, becoming an ancestor, is called “playing with the spirit”; wearing clothes and taking meals is called “playing with the spirit.” In general, the matter of the ultimate standard of the buddhas and ancestors is invariably “playing with the spirit.” In being met by the buddha hall, in meeting with the saṃgha hall, their flowers are endowed with ever more colors, their colors accumulate more and more brilliance.<sup>25</sup>

20 To “bequeath it” is invariably impeded by “I have” (fuzoku wa, kanarazu ga u ni keige seraruru nari 附嘱は、かならず我有に罣礙せらるるなり): The use of keige 罣礙 (“to obstruct,” “to hinder”) here follows a familiar pattern in Dōgen’s writings, in which the term is used to mean “to define,” “to identify.”

21 we study with the dimensions of the crown of the head as our nose grip (sono sangaku wa, chōnei ryō o habi shite sangaku suru nari その參學は、頂額量を巴鼻して參學するなり): Perhaps meaning something like, “to understand the meaning of ‘I have’ we need to grasp the dimensions of the true person.” “Nose grip” renders habi 巴鼻 (also written 把鼻), to have a “hold” or “handle” on something, from the nose rope or ring for leading livestock; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Crown of the head,” “Nose.”

22 “The Ancestral Master’s coming from the west” (soshi seirai 祖師西來): I.e., Bodhidharma’s advent in China; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Intention of the Ancestral Master’s coming from the west.”

23 “playing with the spirit” (rō zeikon 弄精魂): A fixed expression occurring often in Chan literature for a distracted, or “possessed,” state of mind; sometimes, as likely here, used in ironic reference to meditation.

24 “just sitting, sloughing off body and mind” (shikan taza, datsuraku shinjin 祇管打坐、脱落身心): Variation on an expression Dōgen famously attributes in several places to his teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Just sit,” and “Body and mind sloughed off.”

25 In being met by the buddha hall, in meeting with the saṃgha hall (butsuden ni shōken serare, sōdō o shōken suru 佛殿に相見せられ、僧堂を相見する): Play likely inspired by the saying, cited elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, of Xuefeng Yicun 雪峰義存 (822-908), e.g., at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:272, case 290):

雪峰示衆云、望州亭與諸人相見了也、烏石嶺與諸人相見了也、僧堂前與諸人相見了也。

Xuefeng addressed the assembly, saying, “I met everyone at Wangzhou Pavilion. I met everyone at Wushi Ridge. I met everyone in front of the saṃgha hall.”

Further, now the samgha hall “takes the board and strikes it amidst the clouds”; now the buddha hall “holds the panpipe and plays it at the bottom of the water.”<sup>26</sup>

[64:12] {2:172}

到恁麼のとき、あやまりて梅華引を吹起せり。いはゆる先師古佛いはく、
瞿曇打失眼睛時、雪裏梅華只一枝、而今到處成荊棘、却笑春風繚亂吹。

When it comes to this, they have mistakenly started playing a plum blossom tune.<sup>27</sup> That is, my former master, the Old Buddha, said,<sup>28</sup>

*At the time that Gautama lost his eye,
It was just one branch of plum blossoms in the snow.
Now, it's a thicket wherever you go;
Yet we laugh as the spring wind swirls them about.*

いま如來の眼睛、あやまりて梅華となれり、梅華、いま彌綸せる荊棘をなせり。如來は眼睛に藏身し、眼睛は梅華に藏身す、梅華は荊棘に藏身せり。いまかへりて春風をふく。

Now, “the eye” of the Tathāgata has mistakenly become “plum blossoms”; now, the “plum blossoms” form “a thicket” spreading everywhere. The Tathāgata has hidden himself in the eye; the eye has hidden itself in the plum blossoms; the plum blossoms have hidden themselves in the thicket. And, now, instead, they blow “the spring wind.”

26 “takes the board and strikes it amidst the clouds” (han o torite unchū ni hakushi 板をとりて雲中に拍し); “holds the panpipe and plays it at the bottom of the water” (shō o fukumude suitei ni fuku 笙をふくむで水底にふく): Dōgen plays here in Japanese with a couplet found (in slightly variant forms) in a number of Chan texts (e.g., at Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:122c13):

木人執板雲中拍、石女含笙水底吸。

The wooden man takes the board and strikes it amidst the clouds;

The stone woman holds the panpipe and plays it at the bottom of the water.

27 they have mistakenly started playing a plum blossom tune (ayamarite baika in o suiki seri あやまりて梅華引を吹起せり): Ironic reference to the verse by Rujing 如淨 that Dōgen is about to quote.

28 my former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): From the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:122c29-123a1. Dōgen also quotes this verse in his “Shōbōgenzō ganzei” 正法眼藏眼睛 and “Baika” 梅華 chapters.

[64:14]

しかもかくのごとくなりといへども、桃華樂を慶快す。先師天童古佛云、
靈雲見處桃華開、天童見處桃華落。

Nevertheless, while this may be so, he enjoys the music of the peach blossom.<sup>29</sup> My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong said,<sup>30</sup>

What Lingyun sees is the peach blossoms opening;

What Tiantong sees is the peach blossoms falling.<sup>31</sup>

[64:15]

しるべし、桃華開は、靈雲の見處なり、直至如今更不疑なり。桃華落は、
天童の見處なり。桃華のひらくるは、春のかぜにもよほされ、桃華のおつ
るは、春のかぜににくまる。たとひ春風ふかく桃華をにくむとも、桃華お
ちて身心脱落せん。

We should understand that “the peach blossoms opening” is “what Lingyun sees;” it is “I’m like this now, without further doubts.”<sup>32</sup> “The peach blossoms falling” is “what Tiantong sees.” The peach blossoms open at the urging of the spring wind; the peach blossoms fall hated by the spring wind. The spring wind may deeply hate the peach blossoms, but, as the peach blossoms fall, “body and mind are sloughed off.”

INTRODUCTION

This work bears a colophon identical to that of the “Zanmai ō zanmai” 三昧王三昧 chapter, stating that it was presented to the assembly on 25 March 1244, at Kippōji in Echizen. Number 65 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō, it occurs as number 55 in the sixty-chapter compilation and number 70 in the Honzan edition (or 71 in the Iwanami and Shūmichō versions).

The text is a brief discussion of a passage from the Lotus Sūtra, in which the Buddha says that, “wherever the sūtra is preached, read, recited, or copied,” a stūpa should be built and worshiped as if it contained a śarīra, a sacred relic of the Buddha; for the sūtra represents “the entire body of the Tathāgata.” In his remarks, Dōgen identifies the sūtra with the “real marks of the dharmas” (i.e., the ultimate reality of all things), and the preaching, reading, reciting, and copying of the sūtra with “the entire body of the Tathāgata.”

[65:1] {2:173}

爾時、釋迦牟尼佛、住王舍城耆闍崛山。告藥王菩薩摩訶薩言、藥王、在處處、若說、若讀、若誦、若書、若經卷所住之處、皆應起七寶塔、極令高廣嚴飾。不須復安舍利、所以者何。此中已有如來全身。此塔應以一切華香・瓔珞・繒蓋・幢幡・妓樂・歌頌、供養・恭敬・尊重・讚歎。若有人得見此塔、禮拜供養、當知、是等皆近阿耨多羅三藐三菩提。

At that time, Buddha Śākyamuni was staying on Mount Gṛdhra-kūṭa at Rājagṛha.<sup>1</sup> He addressed the Bodhisattva-mahāsattva Bhaiṣajyarāja, saying,

Bhaiṣajyarāja, wherever it is preached, read, recited, or copied, wherever a sūtra scroll resides, there should be erected a seven-jeweled stūpa, made exceedingly tall and wide, and richly adorned. There need not be a śarīra placed within it.<sup>2</sup> Why? Within it there is already the entire body of the Tathāgata. This stūpa should be given offerings, honored, venerated, and praised with all kinds of flowers and incense, jeweled necklaces, silk canopies, banners and pennants, music, song, and verse. If there are people able to see this stūpa, to pay obeisance and make offerings to it, you should know that they are all close to anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.

1 At that time (ni ji 爾時): Dōgen here provides his own Chinese introduction to a passage from the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:31b26-c3).

2 There need not be a śarīra placed within it (fusu bu an shari 不須復安舍利): Reflecting the typical practice of interring a physical relic of the Buddha’s body in stūpas.

scroll” is “the real mark” itself.<sup>3</sup> “There should be erected a seven-jeweled stūpa” is saying that “the real mark” is a “stūpa.” “Made exceedingly tall and wide”: its size will invariably be the size of “the real mark.” “Within it there is already the entire body of the Tathāgata”: “the sūtra scroll” — this is “the entire body.”

しかあれば若説・若讀・若誦・若書等、これ如來全身なり。一切の華香・瓔珞・繪蓋・幢幡・妓樂・歌頌をもて、供養、恭敬、尊重、讚歎すべし。あるいは天華・天香・天繪蓋等なり、みなこれ實相なり。あるいは人中上華・上香・名衣・名服なり、これらみな實相なり。供養・恭敬、これ實相なり。

Thus, “preaching, reading, reciting, and copying” — this is the “entire body of the Tathāgata.” [It] “should be given offerings, honored, venerated, and praised with all kinds of flowers and incense, jeweled necklaces, silk canopies, banners and pennants, music, song and verse.”<sup>4</sup> They may be heavenly flowers, heavenly incense, heavenly silk canopies, and the like; all of them are “the real mark.” Or they may be the best flowers and best incense, the finest robes and finest garments; they are all “the real mark.” “Giving offerings and venerating” — these are “the real mark.”

起塔すべし、不須復安舍利といふ。しりぬ、經卷はこれ如來舍利なり、如來全身なり、といふことを。まさしく佛口の金言、これを見聞するよりもすぎたる大功德あるべからず。いそぎて功をつみ、徳をかさぬべし。もし人ありて、この塔を禮拜供養するは、まさにしるべし、皆近阿耨多羅三藐三菩提なり。この塔をみんとき、この塔を、誠心に禮拜供養すべし。すなはち阿耨多羅三藐三菩提に皆近ならん。近は、さりて近なるにあらず、きたりて近なるにあらず、阿耨多羅三藐三菩提を、皆近といふなり。而今われら、受持・讀誦・解説・書寫をみる、得見此塔なり。よろこぶべし、皆近阿耨多羅三藐三菩提なり。

It says a stūpa should be erected, and “there need not be a śarīra placed” in it. We know from this, it is saying that “the sūtra scroll” is itself the śarīra of the Tathāgata, is “the entire body of the Tathāgata.” Truly, golden words from the mouth of the Buddha — there can be no

3 “The sūtra scroll” is “the real mark” itself (kyōkan wa, jissō, kore nari 經卷は、實相、これなり): i.e., the sūtra in question here is just the reality of all things. From a line in the Lotus Sūtra; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Only buddhas with buddhas can exhaustively investigate the real marks of the dharmas.”

4 [It] “should be given offerings, honored, venerated, and praised” (kuyō, kugyō, sonjū, santan su beshi 供養、恭敬、尊重、讚歎すべし): Dōgen here translates the sūtra sentence into Japanese. His omission of the original subject (“this stūpa”) makes it seem likely he wants us to read “the entire body of the Tathāgata” as the subject.

greater merit than seeing and hearing them. We should hurry to accumulate merit and pile up virtue. “If there are people who pay obeisance and make offerings to this stūpa, you should know that they are all close to anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.”<sup>5</sup> When we see this stūpa, we should sincerely pay obeisance and make offerings to this stūpa. This itself should be “all close” to “anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.”<sup>6</sup> “Close” does not mean [somewhere] is close from here or here is close [to somewhere]: “anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi” is called “all close.” Our present seeing of receiving and keeping, reading and reciting, interpreting, and copying [the sūtra] is being “able to see this stūpa.” We should rejoice: it is “all close to anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi.”

しかあれば、經卷は、如來全身なり。經卷を禮拜するは、如來を禮拜したてまつるなり。經卷にあひたてまつれるは、如來にまみえたてまつるなり、經卷は、如來舍利なり。かくのごとくなるゆえに、舍利は此經なるべし。たとひ、經卷はこれ舍利なり、としるといふとも、舍利はこれ經卷なり、としらば、いまだ佛道にあらず。而今諸法實相は、經卷なり。人間・天上、海中・虚空、此土・他界、みなこれ實相なり、經卷なり、舍利なり。舍利を受持・讀誦・解説・書寫して、開悟すべし、これ、或從經卷なり。古佛舍利あり、今佛舍利あり、辟支佛舍利あり、轉輪王舍利あり、獅子舍利あり、あるいは木佛舍利あり、繪佛舍利あり、あるいは人舍利あり。現在大宋國諸代の佛祖、いきたるとき、舍利を現出せしむるあり、闍維ののち、舍利を生ぜる、おほくあり、これみな經卷なり。

Thus, the sūtra scroll is “the entire body of the Tathāgata.” To pay obeisance to the sūtra scroll is to pay obeisance to the Tathāgata. To encounter the sūtra scroll is to meet the Tathāgata. The sūtra scroll is the śarīra of the Tathāgata; since such is the case, the śarīra must be the sūtra. Though one may know that the sūtra scroll is the śarīra, if one does not know that the śarīra is the sūtra scroll, it is not yet the way of the buddhas. The present “real marks of the dharmas” are the sūtra scroll; among humans and in the heavens above, in the ocean and empty space, this land and other worlds — all are the real marks, are the śarīra. We should awaken by receiving and keeping, reading and reciting, interpreting, and copying the śarīra; this is whether from a sūtra scroll.<sup>7</sup>

5 “If there are people who pay obeisance and make offerings to this stūpa” (moshi hito arite, kono tō o raihai kuyō suru もし人ありて、この塔を禮拜供養する): This sentence represents a partial Japanese rendering of the line from the sūtra quotation.

6 This itself should be “all close” to “anuttara-samyak-saṃbodhi” (sunawachi anokutara sanmyaku sanbodai ni kai gon naran すなはち阿耨多羅三藐三菩提に皆近ならん): Dōgen plays here with Chinese, treating the pronoun “all” (kai 皆) as an adverb modifying “close”; presumably, meaning something like “completely close” or, perhaps “close to everything.”

7 this is whether from a sūtra scroll (kore, waku jū kyōkan nari これ、或從經卷な

There are the śarīra of the ancient buddhas; there are the śarīra of the present buddhas; there are the śarīra of pratyeka-buddhas; there are the śarīra of the wheel-turning kings; there are the śarīra of lions. Or there are the śarīra of wooden buddhas; there are the śarīra of painted buddhas. Or there are the śarīra of humans. At present among the buddhas and ancestors in the Land of the Great Song, there are those who manifest śarīra during their lifetimes, and there are many who produce śarīra after their jhyāpita.<sup>8</sup> These are all the sūtra scroll.

8 after their *jhyāpita (jai no nochi 闍維ののち): I.e., “upon cremation”; Dōgen uses a transliteration of the Indic term (also rendered dabi 荼毘, jabi 闍毘, etc.)

如是我成佛已來甚大久遠。壽命無量阿僧祇劫、常住不滅。諸善男子。我本行菩薩道所成壽命、今猶未盡、復倍上數。

In this way, since I attained buddhahood, it has been a very long time. My lifespan is incalculable asamkhyeya kalpas, constantly abiding without extinction. Good sons, the lifespan attained by my original practice of the bodhisattva path is even now still not exhausted; it is twice the above number.

10 The present eight bushels four pecks of *śarīra (ima hachikoku shitō no shari いま八斛四斗の舍利): From the tradition that the cremation of the Buddha’s body yielded eighty-four pecks of relics.

11 not just trichiliocosms (sanzen daisen sekai nomi ni arazu 三千大千世界のみにあらず): A trichiliocosm, or “three-thousandfold great thousandfold,” equaling one billion Mount Sumeru world systems. Here, likely recalling the Lotus Sūtra passage (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:42b13-16) in which the Buddha likens the length of his lifespan to the total distance traveled by one who took all the atoms of an incalculable number of trichiliocosms and, traveling eastward, dropped one of the atoms each time he passed an incalculable number of lands, until he had exhausted the lot.

body of the Tathāgata”; this is “the sūtra scroll.”

智積菩薩言、我見釋迦如來、於無量劫、難行苦行、積功累德、求菩薩道、未曾止息。觀三千大千世界、乃至無有如芥子許、非是菩薩捨身命處、爲衆生故。然後乃得成菩提道。

Bodhisattva Prajñākūṭa said,<sup>12</sup>

I see that Tathāgata Śākyamuni for innumerable kalpas has engaged in difficult practices and painful practices, accumulating merit and amassing virtue, seeking the bodhisattva path without ever stopping. I see that in the trichiliocosm, there is not a single place, even the size of a mustard seed, in which the Bodhisattva has not abandoned his life for the sake of living beings. Only after this did he attain the way of bodhi.

はかりしりぬ、この三千大千世界は、赤心一片なり、虚空一隻なり、如來全身なり、捨・未捨にかかはるべからず。舍利は、佛前佛後にあらず、佛とならべるにあらず。無量劫の難行苦行は、佛胎佛腹の活計消息なり、佛皮肉骨髓なり。すでに未曾止息といふ、佛にいたりてもいよいよ精進なり、大千界に化しても、なほすすむなり。全身の活計、かくのごとし。

It is obvious that this “trichiliocosm” is a single piece of bare mind, is a single bit of empty space, is the entire body of the Tathāgata; it has nothing to do with his “abandoning” or not “abandoning.”<sup>13</sup> The śarīra are not before the Buddha nor after the Buddha; they are not alongside the Buddha.<sup>14</sup> The “difficult practices and painful practices” of “innumerable kalpas” are the circumstances of the life of the womb of the Buddha and the belly of the Buddha, are the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of the Buddha.<sup>15</sup> Since it says, “without ever stopping,” even after reaching buddhahood, he exerts himself all the more; even having converted the trichiliocosm, he still proceeds. Such is the life of the “entire body.”

12 Bodhisattva Prajñākūṭa (Chishaku bosatsu 智積菩薩): Quoting the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:35b21-25).

13 a single piece of bare mind (sekishin ippen 赤心一片); a single bit of empty space (kokū iseki 虚空一隻): The former expression is a fixed phrase; the latter is unusual. A “bare (or ‘red’) mind” (sekishin 赤心) is a common Chinese idiom for a sincere, or straightforward, mind (or heart). Chan texts often speak of “a bare mind in pieces” (sekishin henpen 赤心片片); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bare mind in pieces.”

14 The śarīra are not before the Buddha nor after the Buddha (shari wa, butsuzen butsugo ni arazu 舍利は、佛前佛後にあらず): Perhaps indicating that the Buddha’s relics are not only spatially but also temporally coterminous with the “entire body of the Tathāgata” (and, hence, with the “trichiliocosm”).

15 the circumstances of the life of the womb of the Buddha and the belly of the Buddha (buttai buppuku no kakkei shōsoku 佛胎佛腹の活計消息): An unusual expression, perhaps meaning something like “the inner, or personal, life of the Buddha.”

INTRODUCTION

This short chapter was composed early in 1244 at Kippōji, the monastery where Dōgen taught in the period from his arrival in Echizen (present-day Fukui prefecture) till the opening of the Daibutsuji (later renamed Eiheiji). The work appears as number 66 in the seventy-five-chapter compilation of the Shōbōgenzō and number 71 in the Honzan edition (or 72 in the Iwanami and Shūmichō versions); it is not included in the sixty-chapter compilation but is found in the twenty-eight-text Himitsu collection, where it is listed as number 10 of fascicle 1.

The notion of a samādhi (i.e., state of mental concentration) that is the king of samādhis (S. samādhi-rāja-samādhi) occurs with some frequency throughout the Buddhist literature, without consistent reference to a specific spiritual practice or state of mind. Dōgen's essay here draws on a passage from the influential Dazhidu lun 大智度論 (Treatise on the Great Perfection of Wisdom), a commentary, traditionally attributed to Nāgārjuna, on the 25,000-line Prajñā-pāramitā-sūtra. A line in the sūtra reads, "At that time, the World-Honored One spread his lion seat and, sitting with legs crossed, straightening his body and binding his thoughts before him, entered into the king of samādhis samādhi, in which all samādhis are included." The commentary on this line in the Treatise extols the spiritual advantages of cross-legged sitting and goes on to explain that this samādhi is first among samādhis because it is "freely able to take innumerable dharmas as its object."

Dōgen's own comments here focus especially on the practice of sitting with legs crossed (kekkaфу za 結跏趺坐; S. paryāṅka), the posture sometimes known as the "lotus position" (S. padmāsana). This practice, he associates with a famous teaching he attributes to his Chinese master, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, that the study of Zen is "just sitting" (shikan taza 祇管打坐), with "body and mind sloughed off" (shinjin datsuraku 身心脱落). Through this association, Dōgen is able to claim that sitting with legs crossed is itself the king of samādhis, is itself the complete practice and teaching of the Buddha, is itself the spiritual lineage of the first Chinese Chan ancestor, Bodhidharma. The emphasis on such claims makes this short text one of the more important sources for understanding Dōgen's approach to zazen practice.

驀然として盡界を超越して、佛祖の屋裏に大尊貴生なるは、結跏趺坐なり、外道・魔黨の頂額を踏翻して、佛祖の堂奥に箇中人なることは、結跏趺坐なり。佛祖の極之極を超越するは、ただこの一法なり。このゆえに、佛祖、これをいとなみて、さらに餘務あらず。

Abruptly transcending all the worlds, to be greatly honored within the house of the buddhas and ancestors — this is sitting with legs crossed.<sup>1</sup> Trampling the heads of the followers of other paths and the minions of Māra, to be the one here within the halls of the buddhas and ancestors — this is sitting with legs crossed.<sup>2</sup> Transcending the extreme of the extreme of the buddhas and ancestors is just this one dharma.<sup>3</sup> Therefore, the buddhas and ancestors engage in it, without any further task.

1 greatly honored within the house of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no okuri ni tai sonki sei 佛祖の屋裏に太尊貴生): Possibly reflecting a description by Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869) (Dongshan dashi yulu 洞山大師語錄, T.1986A.47:509a26-b6) of the “greatly honored” (tai zungui sheng 太尊貴生) official (guanchashi 觀察使), without name or duties, who simply remains within his chambers (langmu 廊幕), never going in or out. The Chinese envelope construction tai . . . sheng 太生 here functions as an intensive. The term okuri 屋裏 (also written 屋裡) can be understood as a reference either to the “house” (i.e., lineage) of the buddhas and ancestors or to their “rooms” (i.e., innermost dwelling place). See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas and ancestors.”

sitting with legs crossed (kekkaфу za 結跏趺坐): A standard Buddhist term for the traditional meditation posture (S. paryanka) sometimes called the “lotus position” (S. padmāsana).

2 followers of other paths and the minions of Māra (gedō matō 外道・魔黨): The former expression refers to members of non-Buddhist traditions (S. tīrthika); the latter expression indicates the followers of Māra, the Evil One (S. papīyān), lord of the sixth heaven of the realm of desire (S. kāma-loka), who seeks to obstruct Buddhist awakening.

the one here within the halls of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no dōō ni kochūnin 佛祖の堂奥に箇中人): I.e., an authentic representative of the tradition. “Within the halls of the buddhas and ancestors” is a common expression virtually synonymous with busso no okuri 佛祖の屋裏, above; “the one here” (kochūnin 箇中人) is a common term for the real or accomplished person.

3 the extreme of the extreme of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no kyoku shi kyoku 佛祖の極之極): An unusual expression, not found elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō,

[66:2]

まさにしるべし、坐の盡界と餘の盡界と、はるかにことなり。この道理をあきらめて、佛祖の發心・修行・菩提・涅槃を辦肯するなり。正當坐時は、盡界、それ豎なるか、横なるか、と參究すべし。正當坐時、その坐、それいかん。翻筋斗なるか、活鱚地なるか、思量か、不思議か、作か、無作か。坐裏に坐すや、身心裏に坐すや、坐裏・身心裏等を脱落して坐すや。恁麼の千端萬端の參究あるべきなり。身の結跏趺坐すべし、心の結跏趺坐すべし、身心脱落の結跏趺坐すべし。

We should realize that there is a vast difference between all the worlds of sitting and all the other worlds.<sup>4</sup> Clarifying this principle, we confirm the bringing forth of the mind [of bodhi], the practice, the bodhi, and the nirvāṇa of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>5</sup> We should investigate: at the very moment we are sitting, are all the worlds vertical?<sup>6</sup> Are they horizontal? At the very moment we are sitting, what about that sitting? Is it a flip? Is it brisk and lively?<sup>7</sup> Is it thinking? Is it not thinking?<sup>8</sup> Is it making? Is presumably suggesting the “highest reaches” or “outermost limits” of the tradition — an image in contrast to the innermost recesses of the “quarters” and “halls” in the previous two sentences.

this one dharma (kono ippō この一法): Or “this one method,” “this one truth,” or simply “this one thing”; as is so often the case in Buddhist usage, the term hō 法, translated here as “dharma,” is multivalent.

4 all the worlds of sitting (za no jinkai 坐の盡界): The translation seeks to preserve Dōgen’s repetition here of jinkai (rendered as “all the worlds” above), but one might well take this expression simply as “the world of sitting.”

5 we confirm (benkō su 辦肯す): A predicate, common in Dōgen’s writing, carrying the sense “to discern and assent.” The grammatical subject is unclear in the original and could be taken not as “we” (or “one”) but as the “buddhas and ancestors.”

the bringing forth of the mind [of bodhi], the practice, the bodhi, and the nirvāṇa (hosshin shugyō bodai nehan 發心・修行・菩提・涅槃): I.e., the spiritual career of the bodhisattva, from the initial aspiration for unsurpassed bodhi (S. bodhi-cittotpāda), through training on the path and the attainment of buddhahood, to final extinction. The point here would seem to be that, when one clarifies the principle of sitting, one comprehends the entirety of the Buddhist spiritual life. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Bring forth the mind.”

6 at the very moment we are sitting (shōtō za ji 正當坐時): It is unclear whether this adverbial phrase governs the verb “to investigate” (sankyū 參究). Hence, though the form of the following passage suggests otherwise, the sentence could also be parsed, “At the very moment we are sitting, we should investigate: are all the worlds vertical? Are they horizontal?”

7 a flip (honkinto 翻筋斗); brisk and lively (kappatsupatchi 活鱚地): Two terms, common in Chan texts, expressing unimpeded freedom and vigorous energy. For the latter, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Brisk and lively.”

8 Is it thinking? Is it not thinking? (shiryō ka, fushiryō ka 思量か、不思議か): Likely an allusion to one of Dōgen’s favorite dialogues about seated meditation; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Yaoshan’s not thinking.”

it without making?<sup>9</sup> Are we sitting within sitting? Are we sitting within body and mind? Are we sitting having sloughed off “within sitting,” “within body and mind,” and the like? We should investigate one thousand points, ten thousand points, such as these. We should do cross-legged sitting of the body; we should do cross-legged sitting of the mind; we should do cross-legged sitting of “body and mind sloughed off.”<sup>10</sup>

[66:3] {2:178}

先師古佛云、參禪者、身心脱落也、祇管打坐始得。不要燒香・禮拜・念佛・修懺・看經。

My former master, the Old Buddha, said,<sup>11</sup>

Studying Chan is body and mind sloughed off. You only get it when you just sit; you don't need to offer incense, make bows, recollect the buddha, practice repentance, or read scripture.<sup>12</sup>

9 Is it making? Is it without making? (sa ka, musa ka 作か、無作か): While one need not assume a specific source for these questions, given the juxtaposition elsewhere in Dōgen's writing of “Yaoshan's not thinking” with the story known as “Nanyue polishes a tile” (Nangaku ma sen 南嶽磨甎), they are suggestive of the famous episode involving Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709-788) and his teacher, Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744). When Mazu says that he is practicing seated meditation to “make a buddha” (sabutsu 作佛), Nanyue likens this to trying to make a mirror by polishing a clay tile. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nanyue polishes a tile”; for Dōgen's treatment of the story, see, e.g., “Shōbōgenzō zazen shin” 正法眼藏坐禪箴。

10 we should do cross-legged sitting of “body and mind sloughed off” (shinjin datsuraku no kekkaфу za subeshi 身心脱落の結跏趺坐すべし): Dōgen here introduces the expression “body and mind sloughed off” (shinjin datsuraku 身心脱落) from the saying attributed to Rujing that he will quote immediately following this passage.

11 My former master, the Old Buddha (senshi kobutsu 先師古佛): An epithet, occurring often in Dōgen's writings, for his teacher Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227). This saying, variant versions of which appear elsewhere in Dōgen's writings, has no known source in extant Chinese texts and is generally assumed to be the private recollection of Dōgen.

12 body and mind sloughed off (shinjin datsuraku 身心脱落); just sit (shikan taza 祇管打坐; also written 只管打坐): Two unusual expressions, not found in Chan literature (including that of Rujing 如淨); occurring several times in Dōgen's writings and much used in subsequent Sōtō tradition as technical terms for correct seated meditation. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Just sit” and “Body and mind sloughed off.”

offer incense, make bows, recollect the buddha, practice repentance, or look at scripture (shōkō raihai nenbutsu shusan kankin 燒香・禮拜・念佛・修懺・看經): Standard Buddhist devotional practices. In Dōgen's day, recollection of the buddha (nenbutsu 念佛) typically referred to the recitation of the name of a buddha, especially Buddha Amitābha. The term kankin 看經, translated here as “look at scripture,” is used in Chan and Zen to refer either to the reading or chanting of texts.

あきらかに佛祖の眼睛を抉出しきたり、佛祖の眼睛裏に打坐すること、四五百年よりこのかたは、ただ先師ひとりなり、震旦國に齊肩すくなし。打坐の佛法なること、佛法は打坐なることをあきらめたる、まれなり。たとひ打坐を佛法と體解すといふとも、打坐を打坐としれる、いまだあらず。いはんや佛法を佛法と保任するあらんや。

For the last four or five hundred years, clearly my former master is the only one who has plucked out the eye of the buddhas and ancestors, who sits within the eye of the buddhas and ancestors. There are few of equal stature in the Land of Cīnasthāna.<sup>13</sup> It is rare to have clarified that sitting is the buddha dharma, that the buddha dharma is sitting. Even if [some] realize sitting as the buddha dharma, they have not understood sitting as sitting — let alone maintained the buddha dharma as the buddha dharma.<sup>14</sup>

しかあれべすなはち、心の打坐あり、身の打坐とおなじからず。身の打坐あり、心の打坐とおなじからず。身心脱落の打坐あり、身心脱落の打坐とおなじからず。既得恁麼ならん、佛祖の行解相應なり。この念想觀を保任すべし。この心意識を參究すべし。

This being the case, there is the sitting of the mind, which is not the same as the sitting of the body. There is the sitting of the body, which is not the same as the sitting of the mind. There is the sitting of “body and mind sloughed off,” which is not the same as the sitting of “body and mind sloughed off.” To have got such is the accordance of practice and understanding of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>15</sup> We should maintain this thought, idea, and perception; we should investigate this mind, mentation, and consciousness.<sup>16</sup>

13 Land of Cīnasthāna (Shintan koku 震旦國): A Buddhist term for China derived from the transliterated Sanskrit name.

14 realize (taige 體解): A loose translation for a term suggesting something like “to understand with one’s body” — i.e., to have direct personal experience. The only instance of its use in the Shōbōgenzō.

15 To have got such (ki toku inmo 既得恁麼): Dōgen here uses the Chinese phrase de renmo (literally, “get such”), often encountered in Chan texts in casual reference to spiritual attainment — as in the well-known saying attributed to Yunju Daoying 雲居道膺 (d. 902); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Such a person.”

16 thought, idea, and perception (nen sō kan 念想觀); mind, mentation, and consciousness (shin i shiki 心意識): A paired set of six types of mental activity appearing elsewhere in Dōgen’s writings, where — contrary to his injunction here to “maintain” and “investigate” them — they are dismissed as irrelevant to zazen. (See “Shōbōgenzō zazen gi” 正法眼藏坐禪儀, DZZ.1:100.)

釋迦牟尼佛、告大衆言、若結跏趺坐、身心證三昧、威德衆恭敬、如日照世界。除睡懶覆心、身輕不疲懈、覺悟亦輕便、安坐如龍蟠。見畫跏趺坐、魔王亦驚怖、何況證道人、安坐不傾動。

Buddha Śākyamuni addressed the great assembly, saying,<sup>17</sup>

*When sitting with legs crossed,
Body and mind realizing samādhi,
One's majesty, the multitudes respect,
Like the sun illumining the world.
Removed, the lethargy clouding the mind,
The body light, without pain or fatigue;
The awareness similarly light and easy,
One sits calmly, like the dragon coiled.
King Māra is startled and fearful
On seeing depicted one sitting with legs crossed,
How much more [on seeing] one who realizes the way,
Sitting calmly without stirring.*

[66:7] {2:179}

しかあれば、跏趺坐を畫圖せるを見聞するを、魔王なほおどろき、うれへおそるなり。いはんや眞箇に跏趺坐せん、その功德、はかりつくすべからず。しかあればすなはち、よのつねに打坐する福德無量なり。

Thus, King Māra is startled and frightened to perceive the depiction of [someone] sitting with legs crossed — how much more [someone] really sitting with legs crossed; the merit cannot be fully reckoned.<sup>18</sup> This being the case, the merit of our ordinary sitting is immeasurable.<sup>19</sup>

釋迦牟尼佛、告大衆言、以是故、結跏趺坐。復次如來世尊、教諸弟子應如是坐。或外道輩、或常翹足求道、或常立求道、或荷足求道。如是狂狷心、沒邪海、形不安穩。以是故、佛教弟子結跏趺坐直心坐。何以故。直身心易正故。其身直坐、則心不懶。端心正意、繫念在前。若心馳散、若身傾動、攝之令還。欲證三昧、欲入三昧、種種馳念、種種散亂、皆悉攝之。如此修習、證入三昧王三昧。

17 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): A slightly variant version of a verse appearing in the Dajidu lun 大智度論 (T.1509.25:111b-c). Dōgen's introductory clause here is not in the original passage, which does not in fact represent the words of the Buddha but occurs in the commentary on a line in the Dapin bore jing 大品般若經.

18 really sitting with legs crossed (shinko ni kafu za 眞箇に跏趺坐): The sense of shinko ni 眞箇に here could be taken either as “truly” (i.e., authentically) or as “actually” (as opposed to a depiction).

19 our ordinary sitting (yo no tsune ni taza よのつねに打坐): The exact implication is not clear; presumably, the routine practice of the monk sitting with legs crossed.

Buddha Śākyamuni addressed the great assembly, saying,<sup>20</sup>

Therefore, [the Buddha] sits with legs crossed. Further, the Thus Come One, the World-Honored One, instructs his disciples that they should sit like this. Followers of other paths seek the way while always keeping [one] leg raised, or seek the way while always standing, or seek the way with their legs on their shoulders.<sup>21</sup> Thus, their minds are crazed, sinking in the sea of falsity, and their bodies are ill at ease. Therefore, the Buddha instructs his disciples to sit with legs crossed, to sit with mind upright. Why? Because, when the body is upright, the mind is easily corrected. When one's body is sitting upright, the mind will not slacken. With straightforward mind and correct attention, one fastens thought in front of one. If the mind wanders, if the body leans, one controls them and brings them back. Wishing to realize samādhi, wishing to enter samādhi, one collects the multiple wandering thoughts, the multiple distractions. Training in this way, one enters verification of the king of samādhis samādhi.

あきらかにしりぬ、結跏趺坐、これ三昧王三昧なり、これ證入なり。一切の三昧は、この王三昧の眷属なり。結跏趺坐は、直身なり、直心なり、直身心なり、直佛祖なり、直修證なり。直頂頼なり、直命脈なり。

It is clear from this that sitting with legs crossed is the king of samādhis samādhi, is entering verification. All the samādhis are the attendants of this king samādhi. Sitting with legs crossed is upright body, is upright mind, is upright body and mind, is upright buddha and ancestor, is upright practice and realization; it is upright crown of the head, upright vital artery.

いま人間の皮肉骨髓を結跏して、三昧中王三昧を結跏するなり。世尊、つねに結跏坐を保任します、諸弟子にも結跏趺坐を正傳します、人天にも結跏趺坐ををしへしますなり。七佛正傳の心印、すなはちこれなり。

Now crossing the legs of the human skin, flesh, bones, and marrow, one crosses the legs of the king of samādhis samādhi. The World-Honored One always maintains sitting with legs crossed; and to the disciples he correctly transmits sitting with legs crossed; and to the humans and 20 Buddha Śākyamuni (Shakamuni butsu 釋迦牟尼佛): Dōgen is here quoting (with some variation) the prose immediately following the Dajidu lun 大智度論 verse cited above (T.1509.25:111b22-29). Again, he has added the line, “Buddha Śākyamuni addressed the great assembly, saying,” to what in the original is part of the commentary.

21 Followers of other paths (gedō hai 外道輩): Reference to non-Buddhist yogis.

22 The mind seal directly transmitted by the seven buddhas (shichi butsu shōden on shin'in 七佛正傳の心印): “The seven buddhas” refers to the series of ancient buddhas ending with Buddha Śākyamuni; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas.” “The mind seal” (shin'in 心印), or “buddha mind seal” (busshin'in 佛心印), is a common Chan expression for the state of mind of a buddha transmitted from master to disciple or for the verification of that transmission.

23 fifty small kalpas (gojū shōkō 五十小劫); sixty kalpas (rokuju kō 六十劫): Accounts of Śākyamuni's time under the bodhi tree do not typically reckon it in fifty or sixty kalpas. Rather, these periods of sitting may reflect two scenes in the Lotus Sūtra in which the Buddha and his community pass fifty and sixty small æons sitting without moving (Miaofa lianhua jing 妙法蓮華經, T.262.9:39c19-21 and T.262.9:4a23-26, respectively).

24 twenty-one days (san shichi nichi 三七日): Literally “three [times] seven days”; reference to the legend that the Buddha sat for three weeks under the bodhi tree.

turning the wheel of the wondrous dharma (ten myōhō rin 轉妙法輪): I.e., the promulgation of the buddha dharma.

25 yellow roll and vermilion roller (ōkan shujiku 黄卷朱軸): Reference to the paper and spindle of a roll of text; i.e., a scripture or, by extension here, the teachings of the buddha.

Prior to the First Ancestor's coming from the west, beings in the Land of the East had not known of sitting with legs crossed; after the Ancestral Master came from the west, they knew of it.<sup>28</sup>

Therefore, for one life or ten thousand lives, grasping the tail and taking in the head, without leaving the grove, just sitting with legs crossed day and night, without other business — this is the king of samādhis samādhi.<sup>29</sup>

26 nine autumns (kuhaku 九白): Literally, “nine whites,” taking “white” in the sense of “autumn,” from its association with this season in the Chinese system of the five phases (wuxing 五行). Reference to the famous legend that Bodhidharma sat for nine years “facing a wall” (menpeki 面壁). The question of whether the term menpeki should be taken literally or metaphorically (as, for example, sitting with a “wall-like mind”) is debated.

Shaolin Monastery at Shaoshi Peak on Mount Song (Sōgaku Shōshippō [or Shitsuō] Shōrinji 嵩嶽少室峰少林寺): Monastery in the present Chengfeng District 澄封縣 of Henan prefecture, where Bodhidharma is said to have resided.

27 crown of his head and his eyes (chōnei ganzei 頂額眼睛): Terms often used in Chan texts as synecdoche for a Chan master's wisdom or essential message; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Crown of the head” and “Nose.”

have been in realms everywhere throughout the Land of Cīnasthāna (Shintan koku ni henkai seri 震旦國に遍界せり): I.e., have been pervasive in China. The translation attempts to preserve Dōgen's unusual use of henkai 遍界 (“realms everywhere”) as a verb.

28 Prior to the First Ancestor's coming from the west, beings in the Land of the East had not known of sitting with legs crossed (shoso seirai yori saki wa, Tōdo no shujō, imada katsute kekkaфу za o shirazariki 初祖西來よりさきは、東土の衆生、いまだかつて結跏趺坐をしらざりき): An odd claim, since of course Chinese Buddhists had been practicing seated meditation for centuries before the sixth century, when Bodhidharma was said to have arrived; perhaps Dōgen has in mind here some distinction between authentic and inauthentic cross-legged sitting, or between sitting and knowing the meaning of sitting.

29 grasping the tail and taking in the head (ha bi shu tō 把尾収頭): I.e., “from head to tail,” “from start to finish.”

without leaving the grove (furi sōrin 不離叢林): “The grove” is a common idiom for the monastic institution. The expressions “for one life” and “without leaving the grove” seem to reflect a saying of Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 (778-897) that is referred to in several of Dōgen's writings:

爾若一生不離叢林、不語十年五載、無人喚爾作啞漢、已後佛也不奈爾何。

If for a lifetime you don't leave the grove and don't talk for ten years or five years,

INTRODUCTION

This short work was produced in the spring of 1244, at Kippōji in Echizen. Number 67 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō and number 73 in the Honzan edition (or 74 in the Iwanami and Shūmichō versions), it is not included in the sixty-chapter compilation but appears as number 5 in fascicle 2 of the twenty-eight-text Himitsu Shōbōgenzō.

The work deals with a passage from the Śūraṅgama-sūtra and the comments on it of several Chan masters, including Dōgen's own teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨. Our author himself adds a comment, but, in fact, he is less interested here in the content of the passage and the comments on it than in the canonical status of the passage and the effect of the comments on that status.

The Śūraṅgama-sūtra, although a popular work in Dōgen's day, was widely suspected to have been composed in China and, hence, to be an apocryphal scripture. In the Hōkyō ki 寶慶記, the record of his interviews with Rujing, Dōgen himself expresses his doubts about the text's authenticity and the quality of its teachings. Yet he argues here that the fact that Chan masters have taken up the sūtra passage for comment has rendered it authentic. Not only textual passages, he goes on to say, but everything taken up by the buddhas and ancestors of the tradition becomes thereby an authentic turning of the dharma wheel.

Turning the Dharma Wheel

先師天童古佛上堂、舉、世尊道、一人發真歸源、十方虛空、悉皆消殞。師拈云、既是世尊所說、未免盡作奇特商量。天童則不然、一人發真歸源、乞兒打破飯碗。

My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong, in a convocation, raised [the following]:<sup>1</sup>

The World-Honored One said, “When someone reveals the truth and returns to the source, space throughout the ten directions completely vanishes.”

The Master took this up, saying, “Since this was spoken by the World-Honored One, inevitably, there have been endless extraordinary deliberations about it. Tiantong is not like this. When someone reveals the truth and returns to the source, the beggar breaks his rice bowl.”

[67:2]

五祖山法演和尚道、一人發真歸源、十方虛空、築著磕著。佛性法泰和尚道、一人發真歸源、十方虛空、只是十方虛空。夾山円悟禪師克勤和尚云、一人發真歸源、十方虛空、錦上添華。大佛道、一人發真歸源、十方虛空、發真歸源。

Reverend Fayen of Mount Wuzu said, “When someone reveals the truth and returns to the source, space throughout the ten directions “hits and bangs.”<sup>2</sup>

1 My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong (senshi Tendō kobutsu 先師天童古佛): i.e., Dōgen’s teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227). The passage is quoted from the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:128b5-8). Rujing’s quotation of the Buddha is based on a passage in the Śūraṅgama-sūtra (Shoulengyan jing 首楞嚴經, T.945.19:147b10-11). The material in this and the following section appears in a slightly different form in Dōgen’s Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.3:118, no. 179).

2 Reverend Fayen of Mount Wuzu (Gosozan Hōen oshō 五祖山法演和尚): i.e., Wuzu Fayen 五祖法演 (d. 1104), teacher to Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤 (whose words appear just below). His saying here can be found in the Fayen chanshi yulu 法演禪師語錄 (T.1995.47:650a7-9). “Hits and bangs” translates chikujaku katsujaku 築著磕著, a

Reverend Foxing Fatai said, “When someone reveals the truth and returns to the source, space throughout the ten directions is just space throughout the ten directions.”<sup>3</sup>

Chan Master Yuanwu of Jiashan, Reverend Keqin, said, “When someone reveals the truth and returns to the source, space throughout the ten directions adds flowers to brocade.”<sup>4</sup>

Daibutsu says, “When someone reveals the truth and returns to the source, space throughout the ten directions reveals the truth and returns to the source.”<sup>5</sup>

いま擧するところの、一人發眞歸源、十方虚空、悉皆消殞は、首楞嚴經のなかの道なり。この句、かつて數位の佛祖、おなじく擧しきたれり。いまよりこの句、まことに佛祖骨髓なり、佛祖眼睛なり。しかいふところは、首楞嚴經一部拾軸、あるいはこれを偽經といふ、あるいは偽經にあらずといふ、兩説すでに往古よりいまにいたれり。舊譯有り、新譯ありといへども、疑著するところ、神龍年中の譯をうたがふなり。しかあれども、いますでに五祖の演和尚・佛性泰和尚・先師天童古佛、ともにこの句を擧しきたれり。ゆえにこの句、すでに佛祖の法輪に轉ぜられたり、佛祖法輪轉なり。このゆえに、この句、すでに佛祖を轉じ、この句、すでに佛祖をとく。佛祖に轉ぜられ、佛祖を轉ずるがゆえに、たとひ偽經なりとも、佛祖、もし轉擧しきたらば、眞箇の佛經・祖經なり、親曾の佛祖法輪なり。たとひ瓦礫なりとも、たとひ黄葉なりとも、たとひ優曇華なりとも、たとひ金襴衣なりとも、佛祖すでに拈來すれば佛法輪なり、佛正法眼藏なり。

What is taken up here — “When someone reveals the truth and returns to the source, space throughout the ten directions completely vanishes” — are words from the Śūraṅgama-sūtra. This passage has previously been taken up by several buddhas and ancestors. So now, the passage is truly the bones and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors, the eyes of buddhas and ancestors. I speak of this because, from long ago till today, there have been two opinions [on the text], some holding that the Śūraṅgama-sūtra in ten rolls is an apocryphal sūtra and some saying that it is not an apocryphal sūtra. There is an older translation and a new-common expression in Zen texts for things colliding or bumping together; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Hitting and banging.”

3 Reverend Foxing Fatai (Busshō Hōtai oshō 佛性法泰和尚): I.e., Dawei Fatai 大滄法泰 (dates unknown), another disciple of Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤. His saying appears in the Jiatai pudeng lu 嘉泰普燈錄, ZZ.137:371a8-11.

4 Chan Master Yuanwu of Jiashan, Reverend Keqin (Kassan Engo zenji Kokugon oshō 夾山円悟禪師克勤和尚): I.e., Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤 (1063–1135). His saying can be found in the Yuanwu chanshi yulu 圓悟禪師語錄 (T.1997.47:748a25-28).

5 Daibutsu (Daibutsu 大佛): I.e., Dōgen, who was at this time abbot of Daibutsuji 大佛寺, the monastery subsequently renamed Eiheiiji 永平寺.

er translation; but the one about which there are doubts is the translation done during the Shenlong years.<sup>6</sup>

Nevertheless, now Reverend Yan of Wuzu, Reverend Foxing Tai, and my former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong have all taken up this passage. Hence, this passage has been turned by the dharma wheel of the buddhas and ancestors; it is a turning of the dharma wheel of the buddhas and ancestors. For this reason, this passage has turned the buddhas and ancestors; this passage has preached the buddhas and ancestors. Because it has been turned by the buddhas and ancestors and has turned the buddhas and ancestors, even if it is [found in] an apocryphal sūtra, if the buddhas and ancestors have been turning it and taking it up, it is an authentic sūtra of the buddhas and sūtra of the ancestors; it is a dharma wheel of the buddhas and ancestors personally experienced.<sup>7</sup> Even tiles and pebbles, even yellow leaves, even the udumbara flower, even the gold brocade robe — since the buddhas and ancestors have taken them up, they are the dharma wheel of the buddhas, the treasury of the true dharma eye of the buddhas.<sup>8</sup>

6 There is an older translation and a newer translation (kyūyaku ari, shinyaku ari 舊譯有り、新譯あり): Likely a reference to two different sūtras, with similar titles, that are often confused: (a) the Shoulengyan sanmei jing 首楞嚴三昧經 (Śūramga-samādhi-sūtra), in two rolls, known in Dōgen's day from the early fifth-century translation of Kumārajīva (T.642); and (b) the Shoulengyan jing 首楞嚴經 (Śūramga-sūtra; T.945), in ten rolls, said to have been translated in 705 by someone named Bolamidi 般刺蜜帝 but generally thought to have been composed in China. "The Shenlong years" (Jinryū nenchū 神龍年中) in the next clause refers to the Chinese era, 705-707.

Interestingly, given what he says here, Dōgen himself seems to have shared the doubts about the Indian provenance of the Śūramga-sūtra. In his Hōkyō ki 寶慶記 (DZZ.7:12, section 6), the work purporting to record his conversations with Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, Dōgen expresses his doubts about the authenticity of the sūtra (as well as another sūtra of Chinese origin, the Yuanjue jing 圓覺經) and receives assurance from Rujing that he is right to question it.

7 dharma wheel of the buddhas and ancestors personally experienced (shinzō no busso hōrin 親曾の佛祖法輪): Or, perhaps, "a dharma wheel of the buddhas and ancestors who have personally experienced it." "Personally experienced" is a loose rendering of the unusual expression shinzō 親曾 (literally, "once personally"), appearing several times in the Shōbōgenzō to indicate what is personal or intimate; probably adopted by Dōgen from a line in a poem by his teacher, Rujing 如淨: "He [Piṇḍola] once personally saw the Buddha" (shin zō ken butsu 親曾見佛).

8 tiles and pebbles (ga ryaku 瓦礫): Likely recalling the well-known definition of the buddha mind first attributed to Nanyang Huizhong 南陽慧忠 (d. 775); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Fences, walls, tiles, and pebbles."

yellow leaves (kōyō 黃葉): Likely recalling the well-known case, found in the Nirvāṇa Sūtra (Da banniepan jing 大般涅槃經, T.375.12:729a3-6) of the yellow willow leaf that is given to a crying child, who takes it for gold and is thereby consoled.

[67:4]

しるべし、衆生、もし超出成正覺すれば、佛祖なり、佛祖の師資なり、佛祖の皮肉骨髓なり。さらに従來の兄弟衆生を兄弟とせず、佛祖これ兄弟なるがごとく、拾軸の文句たとひ偽なりとも、而今の句は超出の句なり、佛句・祖句なり、餘文・餘句に群すべからず。たとひこの句は超越の句なりとも、一部の文句・性相を佛言祖語に擬すべからず、參學眼睛とすべからず。

We should recognize that, when living beings transcend themselves and attain correct awakening, they are buddhas and ancestors; they are the teachers and disciples of the buddhas and ancestors; they are the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors. Furthermore, they do not regard as brothers their former brother living beings; the buddhas and ancestors are their brothers. Similarly, even if the text of the ten rolls is apocryphal, the present passage is a transcendent passage, is a buddha passage, an ancestor passage, not to be grouped with the other texts or other passages. Although this passage is a transcendent passage, we should not judge the nature and marks of the entire text to be the speech of the buddhas and words of the ancestors; we should not take them as the eye of study.

而今の句を諸句に比論すべからざる道理おほかる、そのなかに、一端を舉拈すべし。いはゆる、轉法輪は佛祖儀なり、佛祖いまだ不轉法輪あらず。その轉法輪の様子、あるいは聲色を舉拈して聲色を打失す、あるいは聲色を跳脱して轉法輪す、あるいは眼睛を抉出して轉法輪す、あるいは拳頭を舉起して轉法輪す、あるいは鼻孔をとり、あるいは虚空をとるところに、法輪自轉なり。而今の句をとる、いましこれ明星をとり、鼻孔をとり、桃華をとり、虚空をとる、すなはちなり。佛祖をとり、法輪をとる、すなはちなり。この宗旨、あきらかに轉法輪なり。

Among the many reasons why the present passage should not be compared with the other passages, we should take up one point. Turning the dharma wheel is the praxis of the buddhas and ancestors; there have never been buddhas and ancestors who did not turn the dharma wheel. In their manner of turning the dharma wheel, they may take up sound and form to lose sound and form; they may turn the dharma wheel by jumping out of sound and form; they may turn the dharma wheel by udumbara flower (udonge 優曇華): A flower said to bloom only rarely (in some accounts, only once every three thousand years) and, hence, used in Buddhist literature to represent a rare and precious event; often identified as the cluster fig (ficus glomerata). Here, the reference is likely to the udumbara flower that, in Dōgen's telling of the story, the Buddha held up when he transmitted the dharma to Mahākāśyapa on Vulture Peak.

gold brocade robe (kinran 金襴衣): Likely recalling the legend that Buddha Śākyamuni bestowed a gold brocade robe on Mahākāśyapa, to be handed on to the next buddha, Maitreya (see, e.g., Jingde chuandeng lu 景德傳燈錄, T.2076.51:205c3-5).

轉法輪といふは、功夫參學して一生不離叢林なり、長連牀上に請益辨道するをいふ。

“Turning the dharma wheel” means making concentrated effort and studying, “for a lifetime without leaving the grove”; it means seeking instruction and pursuing the way on the long platform.<sup>11</sup>

9 grab a nose (bikū o tori 鼻孔をとり); grab empty space (kokū o toru 虚空をとる): Likely allusion to the story, recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:256, case 248) and discussed in the “Shōbōgenzō kokū” 正法眼藏虚空, in which grabbing hold of a nose is taken as grabbing hold of space; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose.”

10 grab the dawn star (myōjō o tori 明星をとり): Reference to the tradition that Prince Siddhārtha achieved buddhahood upon seeing Venus in the morning sky.

grab the peach blossoms (tōka o tori 桃華をとり): Likely an allusion to the story, cited several times in the Shōbōgenzō, of Lingyun Zhiqin 靈雲志勤 (dates unknown), who was awakened upon seeing peach trees in bloom; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Peach blossoms.”

11 “for a lifetime without leaving the grove” (isshō furi sōrin 一生不離叢林): “The grove” is a common idiom for the monastic institution. Perhaps, recalling a saying of Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 (778-897) that is referred to in several of Dōgen’s writings.

爾若一生不離叢林、不語十年五載、無人喚爾作啞漢、已後佛也不奈爾何。

If for a lifetime you don’t leave the grove and don’t talk for ten years or five years, no one will call you a mute; after that, even the Buddha won’t know what to make of you.

For sources of the saying, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “For a lifetime not leaving the grove.”

long platform (chōrenshō 長連牀): The extended daises in the saṃgha hall (sōdō 僧堂) on which monks of the great assembly (daishu 大衆) sat in meditation, chanted sūtras in prayer services, took their meals, and slept at night.

INTRODUCTION

This work was composed in the spring of 1244, at Dōgen's Kippōji in Echizen. Occurring as number 68 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō, it represents number 75 in the Honzan edition (or 76 in the Iwanami and Shūmichō versions); it is not included in the sixty-chapter compilation but appears as number 7 in fascicle 2 of the twenty-eight-text Himitsu collection.

The work is a commentary on the famous kōan of Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 and a fox, with which the essay opens. The kōan turns on the question of whether the person of “great practice” (dai shugyō 大修行) is subject to the laws of cause and effect. The fox was once a monk on Mount Baizhang who taught that such a person is not subject to cause and effect, as a consequence of which he has been reborn as a fox for five hundred lifetimes. He is liberated from his fox body upon hearing Baizhang say that the person of great practice is “not in the dark about cause and effect.” The corpse of the fox is then given the funeral rites of a monk.

In his comments, Dōgen identifies “great practice” with “great cause and effect” and goes on to criticize those who think that the monk was wrong and Baizhang right in their answers. Indeed, he is strongly critical more generally of what he considers naive readings of the story, pointing out a variety of interpretive issues arising from a literal reading. Among these, he is particularly dismissive of the notion that a fox corpse could be given a monastic funeral, a dangerous precedent, he warns, for lay householders expecting the same.

It is instructive to compare Dōgen's comments in this essay with his remarks on the fox kōan in the “Jinshin inga” 深信因果 essay in the twelve-chapter Shōbōgenzō.

洪州百丈山大智禪師<嗣馬祖諱懷海>、凡參次、有一老人、常隨衆聽法、大衆若退、老人亦退。忽一日不退。師遂問、面前立者、復是何人。老人對曰、某甲是非人也。於過去迦葉佛時、曾住此山、因學人問、大修行底人、還落因果也無。某甲答他云、不落因果。後五百生、墮野狐身。今請和尚代一轉語、貴脫野狐身。遂問曰、大修行底人、還落因果也無。師云、不昧因果。老人於言下大悟、作禮曰、某甲已脫野狐身、住此山後、敢告和尚、乞依亡僧事例。師令維那白槌告衆曰、食後送亡僧。大衆言議、一衆皆安。涅槃堂又無病人、何故如是。食後只見師領衆、至山後巖下、以杖指出一死野狐。乃依法火葬。師至晚上堂、舉前因緣。黃檗便問、古人錯對一轉語、墮五百生野狐身、轉轉不錯、合作箇什麼。師云、近前來、與爾道。檗遂近前、與師一掌。師拍手笑云、將爲胡鬚赤、更有赤鬚胡。

Whenever Chan Master Dazhi of Mount Baizhang in Hongzhou (succeeded Mazu, named Huaihai) held a convocation, there was an old man who always joined the assembly to hear the dharma and who also withdrew when the great assembly withdrew.<sup>1</sup> One day, unexpectedly, he did not withdraw. Whereupon, the Master asked him, “Just who are you, standing there?”

The old man answered, “I’m not a human. At the time of the past Buddha Kāśyapa, I once lived on this mountain.<sup>2</sup> A student asked me,

1 Chan Master Dazhi of Mount Baizhang in Hongzhou (succeeded Mazu, named Huaihai) (Kōshū Hyakujōzan Daichi zenji [shi Baso ki Ekai] 洪州百丈山大智禪師<嗣馬祖諱懷海>): Parenthetical matter is in the original. I.e., Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 (749-814). This famous story of Baizhang and the fox occurs in many sources, including Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:178, case 102). Dōgen also quotes and comments on the story in his “Shōbōgenzō jinshin inga” 正法眼藏深信因果.

2 “At the time of the past Buddha Kāśyapa” (o kako Kashō butsu ji 於過去迦葉佛時): Or “in the past, at the time of Buddha Kāśyapa.” Kāśyapa is the sixth in the series of seven buddhas of the past culminating with Buddha Śākyamuni; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Seven buddhas.”

“I once lived on this mountain” (sō jū shi san 曾住此山): The suggestion is that he served as abbot of a monastery on Mount Baizhang 百丈山; hence, below he will be referred to as “the former Baizhang.”

‘Does the person of great practice fall into cause and effect?’ I answered him saying, ‘He doesn’t fall into cause and effect.’ Thereafter, for five hundred lives, I have descended into the body of a fox. Now I beg the Reverend to say a turning word in my stead and let me shed this fox body.” Whereupon, he asked, “Does the person of great practice fall into cause and effect?”

The Master said, “He’s not in the dark about cause and effect.”<sup>3</sup>

At these words, the old man had a great awakening. He made a prostration and said, “I’ve shed the body of the fox, which lived behind this mountain. May I be so bold as to beg the Reverend for the rites for a deceased monk?”

The Master had the rector strike the mallet and announce to the assembly, “After the meal, we send off a deceased monk.”<sup>4</sup>

The great assembly expressed doubt, [saying] “The assembly is all well, and there is no one ill in the nirvāṇa hall.<sup>5</sup> So, what is this?”

But after the meal, the Master led the assembly beneath a cliff behind the mountain, where he uncovered a dead fox with his staff. They then cremated it in accordance with the dharma.

In a convocation that evening, the Master raised the above incident. Huangbo then asked, “The man of old, with the single turning word of a mistaken response, descended for five hundred lives into the body of a fox.<sup>6</sup> What would happen if he turned and turned without a mistake?”<sup>7</sup>

The Master said, “Come forward and I’ll tell you.”

Po thereupon came forward and gave the Master a blow.

3 “He’s not in the dark about cause and effect” (fumai inga 不昧因果): The predicate fumai 不昧 is variously interpreted as “not blind to,” “not oblivious to,” “not ignorant of (or about),” “not confused by (or about),” etc.

4 had the rector strike the mallet (rei ino byakutsui 令維那白椎): The rector (ino 維那) is the administrator in charge of the assembly of monks, one of the six principle monastic offices (roku chiji 六知事). “Strike the mallet” translates byakutsui 白椎 (also written 白槌), the “announcement mallet” with the sound of which the ino signals the assembly.

5 “nirvāṇa hall” (nehan dō 涅槃堂): I.e., the monastic infirmary, also called the “life-prolonging hall” (enju dō 延壽堂); the designation “nirvāṇa hall” comes from the fact that it also served as a hospice for dying monks.

6 Huangbo (Ōbaku 黄檗): I.e., Huangbo Xiyun 黄檗希運 (dates unknown), famous disciple of Baizhang 百丈.

7 “turned and turned without a mistake” (tenden fushaku 轉轉不錯): “Turned and turned” (tenden 轉轉) here is generally taken to mean “through lifetime after lifetime.”

The Master clapped his hands and laughed, saying, “Here, I thought the foreigner’s beard is red, but now here’s a red-bearded foreigner.”<sup>8</sup>

[68:2] {2:186}

而今現成の公案、これ大修行なり。老人道のごときは、過去迦葉佛のとき洪州百丈山あり、現在釋迦牟尼佛のとき洪州百丈山あり。これ現成の一轉語なり。かくのごとくなりといへども、過去迦葉佛時の百丈山と、現在釋迦牟尼佛時の百丈山と、一にあらざ、異にあらざ、前三三にあらざ、後三三にあらざ。過去の百丈山きたりて、而今の百丈山となれるにあらざ、いまの百丈山、さきだちて、迦葉佛時の百丈山にあらざれども、曾住此山の公案あり。爲學人道、それ今百丈の爲老人道のごとし。因學人間、それ今老人間のごとし。舉一不得舉二、放過一著、落在第二なり。

The kōan realized here is “the great practice.”<sup>9</sup> What the old man said is that, at the time of “the past Buddha Kāśyapa,” there was Mount Baizhang in Hongzhou; at the time of the present Buddha Śākyamuni, there is Mount Baizhang in Hongzhou.<sup>10</sup> This is a realized “turning word.”<sup>11</sup> Although this is the case, Mount Baizhang at the time of the past Buddha Kāśyapa and Mount Baizhang at the time of the present Buddha Śākyamuni are not one, not different, not three three in front, not three three in back.<sup>12</sup> It is not that the past Mount Baizhang has come down to become the present Mount Baizhang; it is not that the present Mount Baizhang existed before and was the Mount Baizhang at the time of Buddha Kāśyapa. Nevertheless, there is the kōan of “I once lived on 8 “Here, I thought the foreigner’s beard is red, but now here’s a red-bearded foreigner” (shō i koshu shaku, kō u shakushu ko 將爲胡鬚赤、更有赤鬚胡): A saying often used in the sense of a distinction without a difference, but here perhaps meaning something like, “while I knew that foreigners had red beards, I didn’t expect to encounter such a person.” The term hu (ko 胡), often translated “barbarian,” is used to refer to non-Han people to the north and west of the Chinese heartland.

9 The kōan realized here (nikon genjō no kōan 而今現成の公案): I.e., “the present case,” “the case occurring here.” Dōgen uses here a version of the famous expression “the realized kōan” (genjō kōan 現成公案); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Realized kōan.”

10 the time of the present Buddha Śākyamuni (genzai Shakamuni butsu no toki 現在釋迦牟尼佛のとき): Presumably, the reference here is to the present age, of which Śākyamuni is the buddha (not the time in which Śākyamuni lived).

11 This is a realized “turning word” (kore genjō no itten go nari これ現成の一轉語なり): I.e., the old man’s saying that Mount Baizhang in Hongzhou existed at both the time of Kāśyapa and the time of Śākyamuni is “an obvious turning word” — a statement that expresses what is at stake in the case.

12 three three in front (zen sansan 前三三); three three in back (go sansan 後三三): Or, perhaps, “three three of the former”; “three three of the latter.” From a dialogue included in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:194-195, case 127) and cited elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Three three in front, three three in back.”

this mountain.” His saying something for the student is like Baizhang here saying something for the old man.<sup>13</sup> A student once asked is like the old man here asking. “If you take up one, you can’t take up a second; if you let the first move go, you fall into the second.”<sup>14</sup>

過去學人間、過去百丈山の大修行底人、還落因果也無。この問、まことに卒爾に容易會すべからず。そのゆえは、後漢永平のなかに、佛法東漸よりのち、梁代普通のなか、祖師西來ののち、はじめて老野狐の道より、過去の學人間をきく。これよりさきは、いまだあらざるところなり。しかあれば、まれにきくといふべし。

The past student asked, “Does the person of great practice on the past Mount Baizhang fall into cause and effect?” Truly, we should not easily understand this question too quickly. For, only after the buddha dharma progressed eastward in the Yongping [era] of the Later Han, after the Ancestral Master came from the west in the Putong [era] of the Liang dynasty, do we hear of the past student’s question from the words of the old fox.<sup>15</sup> It is something that did not exist prior to this. Hence, we have to say it is something rarely heard.

大修行を摸得するに、これ大因果なり。この因果、かならず圓因滿果なるがゆえに、いまだかつて落・不落の論あらず、昧・不昧の道あらず。不落因果、もしあやまりならば、不昧因果もあやまりなるべし。將錯就錯すといへども、墮野狐身あり、脱野狐身あり。不落因果、たとひ迦葉佛時にはあやまりなりとも、釋迦佛時はあやまりにあらざる道理もあり。不昧因果、たとひ現在釋迦佛のときは脱野狐身すとも、迦葉佛時、しかあらざる道理も現成すべきなり。

13 His saying something for the student (i gakunin dō 爲學人道): A fixed expression in Chinese for a word of teaching from the master, repeated below, in section 20. The point here is, presumably, that the old man’s having answered the student in the past corresponds to Baizhang’s answering the old man in the present. Similarly, in the next sentence, the student’s past questioning corresponds to the old man’s present questioning.

14 “If you take up one, you can’t take up a second; if you let the first move go, you fall into the second” (ko ichi futoku ko ni, hōka ichijaku, raku zai dai ni 舉一不得舉二、放過一著、落在第二): A saying appearing with some frequency in Chan texts, attributed to the Tang-dynasty monk Qianfeng 乾峰 (dates unknown), a follower of Dongshan 洞山. (See, e.g., Biyan lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:165b4.) The reference to “moves” is to a board game: “if you pass on your turn, play goes to the other.” The exact meaning in this context is subject to interpretation; it is most often taken to mean that, since the two answers in the story are equivalent, whichever one considers, it obviates the other. (See, e.g., SZ.22:392-393.)

15 the Yongping [era] of the Later Han (Gokan Eihei 後漢永平): 58-75 CE, the date traditionally given for the transmission of Buddhism to China.

the Putong [era] of the Liang dynasty (Ryōdai Futsū 梁代普通): 520-527 CE, a date traditionally given for the arrival in China of the “Ancestral Master,” Bodhidharma.

When we get hold of the “great practice,” it is great “cause and effect.” Since this cause and effect is always the perfect cause and the complete effect, there has never been an issue of “falling” or “not falling,” nor words about “in the dark” or “not in the dark.”<sup>16</sup> If “not falling into cause and effect” is a mistake, “not being in the dark about cause and effect” should also be a mistake. Though it may be making a mistake of a mistake, there is descending into the body of a fox, there is shedding the body of a fox.<sup>17</sup> There is also the reasoning that, while “not falling into cause and effect” may be a mistake at the time of Kāśyapa, it is not a mistake at the time of Buddha Śākyamuni. And there should also occur the reasoning that, while “not being in the dark about cause and effect” may “shed the body of a fox” in the present time of Buddha Śākyamuni, it does not at the time of Buddha Kāśyapa.

老人道の後五百生墮野狐身は、作麼生是墮野狐身。さきより野狐ありて、先百丈をまねきおとさしむるにあらず、先百丈、もとより野狐なるべからず。先百丈の精魂いでて野狐皮袋に撞入す、といふは外道なり。野狐きたりて先百丈を吞却すべからず。もし、先百丈さらに野狐となる、といはば、まづ脱先百丈身あるべし、のちに墮野狐身すべきなり。以百丈山換野狐身なるべからず、因果の、いかでかしかならん。因果の、本有にあらず、始起にあらず。因果のいたづらなるありて、人をまつことなし。

The old man said, “Thereafter, for five hundred lives, I have descended into the body of a fox.” How did he descend into the body of a fox? It is not the case that there was a previously existing fox that attracted the former Baizhang to fall [into its body]; nor could the former Baizhang have originally been a fox.<sup>18</sup> To say that the spirit of the former Baizhang emerged from him and forced its way into the skin bag of a fox would be non-Buddhist. The fox could not have come up and swallowed the former Baizhang. If we say the former Baizhang became a fox, he must first have shed the body of the former Baizhang and then descended into the body of the fox. One cannot exchange Mount Baizhang for the body of a fox.<sup>19</sup> How could cause and effect be like this? Cause and effect is 16 the perfect cause and the complete effect (en'in manka 圓因滿果): An expression presumably rearranging the phrase “perfect and complete cause and effect” (enman inga 圓滿因果); generally understood as affirming the absolute value of both cause and effect, or the non-differentiation of spiritual training and its fruit.

17 making a mistake of a mistake (shōshaku jushaku 將錯就錯): An idiom, found in Zen texts, meaning “to recognize one’s mistake as such,” “to turn a mistake to one’s advantage,” or “to make one mistake after another”; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Make a mistake of a mistake.”

18 the former Baizhang (sen Hyakujō 先百丈): I.e., the monk formerly living on Mount Baizhang.

19 Mount Baizhang (Hyakujōzan 百丈山): I.e., again, the monk formerly on Mount Baizhang.

neither originally existent nor newly arisen.<sup>20</sup> Cause and effect does not waste time waiting for the person.

たとひ不落因果の祇對、たとひあやまれりとも、かならず野狐身に墮すべからず。學人の問著を錯對する業因によりて、野狐身に墮すること必然ならば、近來ある臨濟・徳山、およびかの門人等、いく千萬枚の野狐にか墮在せん。そのほか二三百年来の杜撰長老等、そこばくの野狐ならん。しかあれども、墮野狐せりときこえず。おほからば、見聞にもあまるべきなり。あやまらずもあるらんといふつべしといへども、不落因果よりもはなはだしき胡亂答話のみおほし。佛法の邊におくべからざるも、おほきなり。參學眼ありてしるべきなり、未具眼はわきまふべからず。しかあればしりぬ、あしく祇對するによりて野狐身となり、よく祇對するによりて野狐身とならず、といふべからず。この因縁のなかに、脱野狐身ののちいかなりといはず、さだめて皮袋につつめる眞珠あるべきなり。

Even if the answer, “he does not fall into cause and effect,” were a mistake, one would not necessarily descend into the body of a fox. If it were inevitable that one descended into the body of a fox by the karmic cause of giving a mistaken answer to a student’s question, how many thousand or myriad times more recently would Linji, Deshan, and their followers have descended into a fox?<sup>21</sup> In addition, how many of the illiterate elders of the past two or three hundred years would be foxes?<sup>22</sup> Yet one does not hear that they have descended into foxes. If there were many of them, there would be more than enough to hear of them. Though we may grant that there are some who are not mistaken, there are many more confused answers worse than “he does not fall into cause and effect.” There are many not to be placed in the proximity of the buddha dharma. We know them when we have the eye of study; those unendowed with the eye will not distinguish them. Thus, we know that we cannot say either that one becomes a fox body by giving a bad answer or that one does

20 Cause and effect is neither originally existent nor newly arisen (inga no hon'u ni arazu, shiki ni arazu 因果の、本有にあらず、始起にあらず): A reference, presumably, to the relationship between the effect (the fox) and its cause (the monk): the effect neither inheres in the cause nor is wholly independent of it.

21 Linji, Deshan, and their followers (Rinzai Tokusan oyobi kano monjin tō 臨濟・徳山およびかの門人等): I.e., Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866), founder of the Linji lineage; and his contemporary Deshan Xuanjian 徳山宣鑑 (780-865). These two figures are singled out for criticism elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

22 illiterate elders (zusan chōrō tō 杜撰長老等): “Illiterate” is a loose translation for zusan 杜撰, more literally, “Du composition,” used in pejorative reference to a literary work that, like those of Du, is ignorant of classical precedents. (Du is most often identified as the Song-dynasty poet Du Mo 杜默; for alternative theories, see M.14477.122.) Dōgen regularly uses the term to refer to those in the Chan tradition who are ignorant of the tradition. “Elders” (chōrō 長老) here likely refers to the abbots of Chinese monasteries.

not become a fox body by giving a good answer. In this episode, nothing is said of what happens after he “sheds the body of the fox.” Surely, there is a true pearl wrapped in a skin bag.

しかあるに、すべていまだ佛法を見聞せざるともがらいはく、野狐を脱しをはりぬれば、本覺の性海に歸するなり、迷妄によりて、しばらく野狐に墮生すといへども、大悟すれば、野狐身はすてて本性に歸するなり。これは、外道の本我にかへる、といふ義なり、さらに佛法にあらず。もし、野狐は本性にあらず、野狐に本覺なし、といふは、佛法にあらず、大悟すれば野狐身は、はなれぬ、すてつる、といはば、野狐の大悟にあらず、閑野狐なるべし。しかいふべからざるなり。

Yet those who have not yet heard the buddha dharma all say that when he had shed the fox he returned to the ocean of the nature of original awakening.<sup>23</sup> Although by delusion he temporarily descended to birth as a fox, when he had his great awakening, he discarded the fox body and returned to his original nature. This is the theory of other paths, that one returns to an original self; it is not at all the buddha dharma.<sup>24</sup> To say that the fox is not the original nature, that the fox lacks original awakening, this is not the buddha dharma. If we say that, when he had his great awakening, he left the fox body and cast it off, this is not the great awakening of the fox, it is just a useless fox. We should not say this.

今百丈の一轉語によりて、先百丈五百生の野狐、たちまちに脱野狐すといふ、この道理あきらむべし。もし、傍觀の、一轉語すれば傍觀脱野狐身す、といはば、從來のあひだ、山河大地、いく一轉語となくおほくの一轉語しきりなるべし。しかあれども、從來いまだ脱野狐身せず、いまの百丈の一轉語に脱野狐身す。これ疑殺古先なり。山河大地いまだ一轉語せず、といはば、今百丈、つひに開口のところなからん。

Now, we should clarify the reasoning whereby, through Baizhang’s “turning word,” the fox of the former Baizhang’s five hundred lives suddenly “shed the fox.” If we say that, because an onlooker gives a turning word, the onlooker sheds the body of a fox, the mountains, rivers, and the whole earth up till now have been giving, not a single turning word, 23 ocean of the nature of original awakening (hongaku no shōkai 本覺の性海): “The ocean of the nature” (shōkai 性海) is a common term in East Asian Buddhist texts, perhaps especially popular in Huayan literature, for the ultimate realm of suchness. “Original awakening” (hongaku 本覺) is widely used in East Asian Buddhism to designate the bodhi inherent in the buddha nature, in contrast to the “initial awakening” (shikaku 始覺) attained at the culmination of the bodhisattva path.

24 theory of other paths, that one returns to an original self (gedō no hongā ni kaeru to iu gi 外道の本我にかへるといふ義): Likely a reference to Hindu theories of a universal ātman.

but so many turning words. Yet he did not shed the body of a fox up till now and sheds the body of the fox only now by Baizhang's turning word. This raises doubts about our old forebears.<sup>25</sup> If we say that the mountains, rivers, and the whole earth have not given a turning word, Baizhang would never have opened his mouth.

また往往の古徳、おほく、不落・不昧の道、おなじく道是なる、といふを競頭道とせり。しかあれども、いまだ不落・不昧の語脈に體達せず。かるがゆえに、墮野狐身の皮肉骨髓を參ぜず、脱野狐身の皮肉骨髓を參ぜず、頭正あらざれば尾正いまだし。老人道の後五百生墮野狐身、なにかこれ能墮、なにかこれ所墮なる。正當墮野狐身のとき、從來の盡界、いまいかなる形段かある。不落因果の語脈、なにとしてか五百枚なる。いま山後巖下の一條皮、那裏得來なりとかせん。不落因果の道は、墮野狐身なり、不昧因果の聞は、脱野狐身なり。墮・脱ありといへども、なほこれ野狐の因果なり。

Again, the virtuous of old have frequently competed in saying that the words “not falling” and “not being in the dark” are equally words that are right. Yet they have not personally realized the stream of the words “not falling” and “not being in the dark.”<sup>26</sup> For this reason, they do not study the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of “descending into the body of a fox,” they do not study the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow of “shedding the body of the fox”; since the head is not true, the tail is not true.<sup>27</sup> The old man said, “Thereafter, for five hundred lives, I have descended into

25 This raises doubts about our old forebears (kore gisatsu kosen nari これ疑殺古先なり): Perhaps meaning that this raises the question of how the turning words of the mountains, rivers, and the whole earth differ from those of the old forebears.

26 have not personally realized the stream of the words (gomyaku ni taitatsu sezu 語脈に體達せず): I.e., “have not understood the sense of the words.” “Personally realize” translates a term, taiatatsu 體達, that is variously interpreted: some take the element tai 體 here in its basic sense of “body”; others, in its more abstract sense of essence; still others treat it as a verb meaning “to penetrate” (tsū 通). “The stream of words” (gomyaku 語脈) refers to the reasoning, or logic, of a statement; the term occurs often in Zen texts in the expression “to turn round in the stream of words” (gomyaku ri tenkyaku 語脈裏轉却).

27 the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow (hi niku kotsu zui 皮肉骨髓): An expression, occurring very often throughout the Shōbōgenzō, indicating the essence or truth or entirety of something or someone. From the famous story, known as Daruma hi niku kotsu zui 達摩皮肉骨髓, of Bodhidharma's testing of four disciples, to whom he said of each in turn that he (or, in one case, she) had gotten his skin, flesh, bones, and marrow; recorded in the shinji Shōbōgenzō 真字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:230, case 201) and alluded to often in Dōgen's writings. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.”

since the head is not true, the tail is not true (zushin arazareba bishin imadashi 頭正あらざれば尾正いまだし): From the idiom, “true from head to tail.” Here, perhaps, “the head” refers to “descending,” “the tail” to “shedding.” Alternatively, “the head” may refer to the failure to understand “not falling” and “not being in the dark”; the tail, to not studying “descending” and “shedding.”

the body of a fox.” What is the one that “descended”? What is the one into which it “descended”? At the very time that he “descended into the body of a fox,” what shape did all the previous worlds have now?<sup>28</sup> Why did the stream of the words, “does not fall into cause and effect,” amount to five hundred times?<sup>29</sup> Where did the single pelt “beneath a cliff behind the mountain” come from? The saying, “does not fall into cause and effect” is “descending into the body of a fox”; the hearing of “not in the dark about cause and effect” is “shedding the body of the fox.” Though we may say there is “descending” and “shedding,” they are still the “cause and effect” of the fox.

しかあるに、古來いはく、不落因果は撥無因果に相似の道なるがゆえに墜墮す、といふ。この道、その宗旨なし、くらき人のいふところなり。たとひ、先百丈ちなみありて、不落因果、と道取すとも、大修行の瞞他不得なるあり、撥無因果なるべからず。またいはく、不昧因果は因果にくらからずといふは、大修行は超脱の因果なるがゆえに脱野狐身す、といふ。まことにこれ八九成の參學眼なり。しかありといへども、迦葉佛時曾住此山、釋迦佛時今住此山。曾身今身、日面月面、遮野狐精、現野狐精するなり。

Nevertheless, from ancient times it has been said that he descended because “he doesn’t fall into cause and effect” are words that seem to eliminate cause and effect. These words are meaningless, something said by the blind. Even if the former Baizhang did have occasion to say, “he doesn’t fall into cause and effect,” he has “the great practice” that cannot deceive; he is not eliminating cause and effect.<sup>30</sup> It is also said that he “sheds the body of the fox” because “he is not in the dark about cause and effect” — i.e., he is not blind to cause and effect — means that “great practice” is a transcendent cause and effect.<sup>31</sup> This is truly an eye of study eight or nine tenths complete.<sup>32</sup> While this may be so,

28 what shape did all the previous worlds have now? (jūrai no jinkai, ima ikanaru gyōdan ka aru 從來の盡界、いまいかなる形段がある): I.e., “how was the universe affected by the former Baizhang’s rebirth as a fox.”

29 Why did the stream of the words “does not fall into cause and effect” amount to five hundred times? (furaku inga no gomyaku, nani toshite ka gohyaku mai naru 不落因果の語脈、なにとしてか五百枚なる): I.e., “why did the former Baizhang’s words result in five hundred rebirths as a fox?”

30 he has “the great practice” that cannot deceive (dai shugyō no manta futoku naru ari 大修行の瞞他不得なるあり): The expression “cannot deceive” (manta futoku 瞞他不得) is a fixed idiom; the sense here is likely “the one of great practice does not deceive.”

31 he is not blind to cause and effect (inga ni kurakarazu 因果にくらからず): Or “he is not ignorant about (or oblivious of) cause and effect.” Dōgen is giving a Japanese reading of the Chinese verb bumei 不昧 (translated here as “not in the dark about”).

野狐、いかにしてか五百生の生をしらん。もし、野狐の知をもちいて五百生をしる、といはば、野狐の知、いまだ一生の事を盡知せず、一生いまだ野狐皮に撞入するにあらず。野狐は、かならず五百生の墮を知取する、公案現成するなり。一生の生を盡知せず、しることあり、しらざることあり。もし身知ともに生滅せずば、五百生を算數すべからず。算數することあたはずば、五百生の言、それ虚設なるべし。もし、野狐の知にあらざる知をもちいてしる、といわば、野狐のしるにあらず。たれ人か野狐のためにこれを代知せん。知・不知の通路、すべてなくば、墮野狐身といふべからず。墮野狐身せずば、脱野狐身あるべからず。墮・脱ともになくば、先百丈あるべからず、先百丈なくば、今百丈あるべからず。みだりにゆるすべからず、かくのごとく參詳すべきなり。この宗旨を擧拈して、梁・陳・隋・唐・宋のあひだに、ままにきこゆる謬説、ともに勘破すべきなり。

How could the fox know the lives of its “five hundred lives”? If we say it uses the knowledge of a fox to know the five hundred lives, the knowledge of a fox does not thoroughly know even the things of a single life; a single life does not push its way into the skin of the fox.<sup>34</sup> That the fox knows invariably about its descent over five hundred lives is the realizing of a kōan.<sup>35</sup> It does not thoroughly know the life of a single life: it knows [some]; it does not know [some]. If both its body and its knowledge are not born and extinguished together, it could not calculate five hundred lives; and, if its calculations are off, the words, “five hundred lives,” would be empty conjecture. If we say that it knows using knowledge that is not 參學眼): “Eight or nine tenths” (hakku jō 八九成) is a fixed idiom used to express both praise and criticism; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eight or nine tenths complete.”

33 “At the time of Buddha Kāśyapa, he once lived on this mountain” (Kashō butsu ji sō jū shi san 迦葉佛時曾住此山): Dōgen here shifts into a set of four-character Chinese lines, beginning with the fox’s report of his origins. The grammatical subject is unexpressed and might also be taken as “I.”

34 a single life does not push its way into the skin of the fox (isshō imada yako hi ni tōnyū suru ni arazu 一生いまだ野狐皮に撞入するにあらず): An odd locution playing on a common Zen expression, “to push one’s way into” (tonyū 撞入) a womb or skin bag.

the knowledge of a fox, then it is not the fox that knows. So, who knows in place of the fox? If there is no passage [to resolve this issue] of knowing or not knowing, we cannot say that he descended into the body of a fox. If he did not descend into the body of a fox, he could not shed the body of the fox. If there is neither descent nor shedding, there is no former Baizhang. If there is no former Baizhang, there is no present Baizhang. Do not rashly accept [this story]; we should investigate it in detail in this way. Taking up its meaning, we should see through all the absurd theories that we occasionally hear from the Liang, Chen, Sui, Tang, and Song.<sup>36</sup>

老非人、また今百丈に告していはいく、乞依亡僧事例。この道、しかあるべからず。百丈よりこのかた、そこばくの善知識、この道を疑著せず、おどろかず。その宗趣は、死野狐いかにしてか亡僧ならん、得戒なし、夏臘なし、威儀なし、僧宗なし。かくのごとくなる物類、みだりに亡僧の事例に依行せば、未出家の何人死、ともに亡僧の例に準すべきならん。死優婆塞、死優婆夷、もし請することあらば、死野狐のごとく亡僧の事例に依準すべし。依例をもとむるに、あらず、きかず、佛道にその事例を正傳せず。おこなはんとおもふとも、かなふべからず。いま百丈の、依法火葬す、といふ、これあきらかならず、おそらくはあやまりなり。しるべし、亡僧の事例は、入涅槃堂の功夫より、到菩提園の辨道におよぶまで、みな事例ありて、みだりならず。巖下の死野狐、たとひ先百丈の自稱すとも、いかでか大僧の行李あらん、佛祖の骨髓あらん、たれか先百丈なることを證據する。いたづらに野狐精の變怪をまことなりとして、佛祖の法儀を輕慢すべからず。佛祖の兒孫としては、佛祖の法儀をおもくすべきなり。百丈のごとく、請するにまかすることなかれ。一事・一法もあひがたきなり。世俗にひかれ、人情にひかれざるべし。

The old “non-human” now addresses Baizhang, saying, “I beg the rites for a deceased monk.” These words cannot be right. Ever since Baizhang, so many wise friends have failed to doubt or be surprised by these words.<sup>37</sup> The issue here is how a dead fox could be a deceased monk. It lacks the precepts; it lacks tenure; it lacks deportment; it lacks the essentials of a monk.<sup>38</sup> If we rashly perform the rites for a deceased monk for such a creature, we should follow the precedents for a deceased monk at all the deaths of anyone who has not left home. If it were requested for the dead upāsaka and dead upāsikā, as with the dead fox, we should follow the rites for a deceased monk. If we look for such precedents, there are not any, we hear of none; this precedent is not correctly transmitted in the way of the buddhas. Even if we thought to do it, we could not accomplish it. It says here that Baizhang “cremated it in accordance with the dharma.” This is not clear and is likely a mistake. We should realize that the procedures for a deceased monk, from the exertions on entering the nirvāṇa hall to pursuing the way on reaching the bodhi grounds, all have their procedures and are not random.<sup>39</sup> Even if it called itself the former Baizhang, how could the dead fox beneath the cliff have the observances of a fully ordained monk, have the bones and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors? Who verified that it was the former Baizhang? We should not demean the rites of the buddhas and ancestors, foolishly taking as true the apparitions of a fox spirit. As descendants of the buddhas and ancestors, we should take seriously the rites of the buddhas and ancestors. Do not go along with requests as Baizhang did. Each procedure, each dharma is hard to encounter; we should not be tempted by the worldly or tempted by human emotion.

この日本國のごとくは、佛儀祖儀あひがたく、ききがたかりしなり。而今、まれにもきくことあり、みることあらば、ふかく髻珠よりもおもく崇重すべきなり。無福のともがら、尊崇の信心あつからず。あはれむべし、それ、事の輕重を、かつていまだしらざるによりてなり。五百歳の智なし、一千年の智なきによりてなり。しかありといふとも、自己をはげますべし、他己をすすむべし。一禮拜なりとも、一端坐なりとも、佛祖より正傳することあらば、ふかくあひがたきにあふ、大慶快をなすべし、大福德を權喜すべし。このころなからんともがら、千佛の出世にあふとも、一功德あるべからず、一得益あるへからず、いたづらに附佛法の外道なるべし。くちに佛法をまなぶに相似なりとも、くちに佛法をとくに證實あるべからず。

In a place like this Land of Japan, it has been difficult to encounter, difficult to hear, the rites of the buddha and the rites of the ancestors. Now, if we do rarely hear and see them, we should seriously respect them more deeply than the jewel in the topknot.<sup>40</sup> The unfortunate types have a limited sense of reverence. What a pity. It is because they have never understood how to evaluate things. It is because they lack the wisdom of five hundred years, the wisdom of one thousand years.<sup>41</sup> Nevertheless, we should brace ourselves, we should encourage others. Even a single bow, even a single upright sitting, if it is correctly transmitted from the buddhas and ancestors, we should feel deeply as a great felicity, difficult to encounter, and rejoice at our great good fortune. Those who lack this attitude, though they encounter the appearance in the world of a thousand buddhas, will not have a single merit, will not have a single benefit. They are followers of other paths vainly appended to the buddha dharma. Though they have the appearance of learning the buddha dharma with their mouths, they lack the authenticity to speak the buddha dharma with their mouths.

39 bodhi grounds (bodai on 菩提園): I.e., the monastic cemetery.

40 jewel in the topknot (keiju 髻珠): I.e., the king's most precious possession.

しかあればすなはち、たとひ國王・大臣なりとも、たとひ梵天・釋天なりとも、未作僧のともがら、きたりて亡僧の事例を請せん、さらに聽許することなかれ。出家受戒し大僧となりてきたるべし、と答すべし。三界の業報を愛惜して、三寶の尊位を願求せざらんともがら、たとひ千枚の死皮袋を拈來して亡僧の事例をけがし、やぶるとも、さらにこれ、をかしのはなはだしきなり、功德となるべからず。もし佛法の功德を結良縁せんとおもはば、すみやかに佛法によりて出家受戒し、大僧となるべし。

Therefore, if those who have not yet become monks — even if it be the king of the land or a great minister, even if it be the Deva Śakra of the Heaven of Brahmā — should come to you requesting the rites of a deceased monk, do not listen to them. We should respond by saying they should come back to us when they have left home, received the precepts, and become fully ordained monks. Although those who are attached to the karmic rewards of the three realms and do not aspire to the exalted state of the three treasures were to bring a thousand dead skin bags and [try to] defile and destroy the rites of the deceased monk, this is just ludicrous and would not result in merit. If they would form good conditions for merit in the buddha dharma, then in accordance with the buddha dharma, they should quickly leave home, receive the precepts, and become fully ordained monks.

今百丈至晚上堂、舉前因緣。この舉底の道理、もとも未審なり、作麼生舉ならん。老人すでに五百生來のをはり、脱從來身といふがことし。いまいふ五百生、そのかず人間のごとく算取すべきか、野狐道のごとく算數すべきか、佛道のごとく算數するか。いはんや老野狐の眼睛、いかでか百丈を覩見することあらん。野狐に覩見せらるるは、野狐精なるべし、百丈に覩見せらるるは、佛祖なり。

Now, regarding this, “In a convocation that evening,” Baizhang “raised the above incident”: the rationale of this “raising” is very unclear. How did he raise it? It seems that the old man had ended his five hundred lives and shed the body he had up till then. These “five hundred lives” — should we calculate their number according to humans? Should we calculate according to the way of the fox? Calculate according to the way of the buddha? Moreover, how could the eye of the old fox see Baizhang? What is seen by the fox must be a fox spirit; what is seen by Baizhang is the buddhas and ancestors.

[68:16] {2:192}

このゆえに、枯木禪師法成和尚、頌曰、百丈親曾見野狐、爲渠參請太心麤、而今敢問諸參學、吐得狐涎盡也無。

*Therefore, Chan Master Kumu, Reverend Facheng, says in a verse,<sup>42</sup> Baizhang once personally encountered a fox;
Consulted by it, he got really rough.
Now, I take the liberty of asking you students,
Have you finished vomiting up the fox slaver?*

[68:17]

しかあれば、野狐は百丈親曾眼睛なり。吐得狐涎、たとひ半分なりとも、出廣長舌、代一轉語なり。正當恁麼時、脱野狐身、脱百丈身、脱老非人身、脱盡界身なり。

So, the fox is the eye of “Baizhang once personally.”<sup>43</sup> In “vomiting up the fox slaver,” even if it is half, he “sticks out his long broad tongue,” and it is “a turning word in my stead.”<sup>44</sup> At this very time, “he sheds the body of the fox”; he sheds the body of Baizhang; he sheds the body of the old non-human; he sheds the body of all the worlds.

黄檗便問、古人錯對一轉語、墮五百生野狐身、轉轉不錯、合作箇什麼。

Huangbo asked, “The man of old, with the single turning word of a mistaken response, fell for five hundred lives into the body of a fox. What would happen if he turned and turned without a mistake?”

[68:19]

42 Chan Master Kumu, Reverend Facheng (Koboku zenji Hōjō oshō 枯木禪師法成和尚): i.e., Kumu Facheng 枯木法成 (1071-1128). His verse can be found at Chanzong songgu lianzhu tonji 禪宗頌古聯珠通集, ZZ.115:113a4-5.

43 the fox is the eye of “Baizhang once personally” (yako wa Hyakujō shinzō ganzei nari 野狐は百丈親曾眼睛なり): Presumably, meaning something like, “the fox is what Baizhang personally saw.”

44 “sticks out his long broad tongue” (shutsu kōchō zetsu 出廣長舌): A fixed expression for the tongue (or, by extension, the speech) of a buddha.

This question here is a statement of the buddhas and ancestors. Among the worthies under Nanyue, there were none like Huangbo before him or after him. Nevertheless, the old man did not say that he gave a mistaken response to the student; Baizhang also did not say that he gave a mistaken response. Why then does Huangbo rashly say, “the old man, with the single turning word of a mistaken response”? If we say that he said it because [he thought] it was mistaken, then Huangbo has not got Baizhang’s larger intention. It seems Huangbo has not yet investigated the mistaken response and unmistaken response of the way of the buddhas and ancestors. We should study that, in this episode, the former Baizhang has not said it was a mistaken response, the present Baizhang has not said it was a mistaken response.

Nevertheless, with five hundred fox skins three inches thick, he “once lived on this mountain,” “saying something for his students.”<sup>45</sup> Since the fox skins have their fur sloughed off, the present Baizhang has his one stinking skin bag.<sup>46</sup> If you gauge it, it is half the fox skin shedding.<sup>47</sup> There is the “descending” and the “shedding” of his “turning and turning without a mistake”; there is the “cause and effect” of his turning and turning a word in his stead: it is “the great practice” of “the distinct.”<sup>48</sup>

45 with five hundred fox skins three inches thick (yako hi gohyaku mai, atsusa sansun naru o mote 野狐皮五百枚、あつさ三寸なるをもて): i.e., wearing a fox skin five hundred times. The thickness here suggests the common idiom “facial skin three inches thick” (menpi kō sanzun 面皮厚三寸) — i.e., “thick skinned,” normally used in the sense of “shameless” or “impudent.”

46 Since the fox skins have their fur sloughed off, the present Baizhang has his one stinking skin bag (yako hi ni datsuraku no senmō aru ni yorite, kon Hyakujō ichimai no shū hitai ari 野狐皮に脱落の尖毛あるによりて、今百丈一枚の臭皮袋あり): Presumably meaning that Baizhang’s human skin is the pelt of the fox devoid of its fur. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Slough off,” and “Bag of skin.”

47 half the fox skin shedding (han yako hi no datsurai 半野狐皮の脱來): Perhaps meaning that Baizhang is still half a fox — i.e., that the fox and Baizhang are inseparable.

48 “the great practice” of “the distinct” (rekinen no dai shugyō 歴然の大修行): Or “the distinct great practice.” The translation assumes that Dōgen has in mind here the fixed expression “cause and effect are distinct” (inga rekinen 因果歴然). If this assumption is correct, the sense of this difficult passage would seem to be that the great practice is the distinct cause and effect of the present Baizhang repeatedly speaking for the former Baizhang.

If Huangbo were now to come and ask, “What would happen if he turned and turned without a mistake?” we should say, “He’d still fall into the fox body.” If Huangbo asked why, we should say, “This fox spirit!”<sup>49</sup> Still, this is not a matter of “mistaken” or “not mistaken.” Do not excuse Huangbo’s question, saying that his question got it right. Again, when Huangbo asks, “What would happen?” we should say, “Have you felt the skin of your face or not?” Or we should say, “Have you been released yet from the body of a fox or not?” Or we should say, “Do you answer to the student so that he doesn’t fall into cause and effect or not?”

49 “This fox spirit!” (sha yako ze 這野狐精): A fixed expression of opprobrium for one pretending to be what one is not.

50 forgetting himself (bōzen shitsugo 亡前失後): An idiomatic expression (more often written 忘前失後; literally “forgetting before and losing after”) meaning “to lose sight of who one is.”

51 The Master clapped his hands (Hakujō hakushu 百丈拍手): Dōgen merely repeats here the Chinese of his text in section 1.

This saying is not a spirit ten tenths complete; it is barely eight or nine tenths complete. Even if we accept eight or nine tenths complete, it still lacks eight or nine tenths complete. Even if we accept ten tenths complete, it is something lacking eight or nine tenths complete. Be this as it may, we should say,

*Baizhang's words penetrate the quarters;
Yet he hasn't got out of the fox's den.
Huangbo's feet touch the earth;
Yet he's still stuck on the mantis track.
They give a blow; they clap their hands.
One exists; two do not.
The red-bearded foreigner; the foreigner's beard is red.*

The Samādhi of Self-Verification

Jishō zanmai

自證三昧

The Samādhi of Self-Verification

Jishō zanmai

INTRODUCTION

This work was composed in the spring of 1244, at Kippōji in Echizen. It represents number 69 of the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō and number 74 of the Honzan edition (or 75 in the Iwanami and Shūmuchiō versions). It is not included in the sixty-chapter Shōbōgenzō compilation but is found as the sixth text in fascicle 2 of the Himitsu collection.

The title of the work, jishō zanmai 自證三昧, is not a common expression: while it occurs occasionally in the East Asian tantric literature, it is not favored in Zen texts and is not used by Dōgen elsewhere. Like the English “self-verification,” the term jishō 自證 is slightly ambiguous and could be understood as indicating a validating experience “of oneself,” “by oneself,” or “for oneself.” Dōgen emphasizes here that the Buddhist study of the self is not done on one’s own but always guided by scripture and the instruction of teachers. Moreover, it is not done solely for one’s own edification but also in order to share that study with others.

These remarks occupy the first half of his essay. For the remainder of the piece, Dōgen engages in an ad hominem attack on the influential twelfth-century Chan figure Dahui Zonggao 大慧宗杲, who liked to use the expression “self-verification and self-awakening” (jishō jigo 自證自悟). Dōgen dismisses this monk as an ambitious lightweight, never certified by his teachers. Dahui was the most prominent representative of the Linji lineage in his day and the teacher of Zhuoan Deguang 拙菴德光, some of whose Japanese dharma descendants made up the leadership of Dōgen’s community. Hence, the comments on Dahui here are often read as a contribution to those descendants’ re-education. Dōgen ends his essay with the claim that only his own Caodong lineage represents the line of direct descent of the buddhas and ancestors.

自證三昧

The Samādhi of Self-Verification

[69:1] {2:196}

諸佛・七佛より、佛佛祖祖の正傳するところ、すなはち修證三昧なり。いはゆる或從知識・或從經卷なり、これはこれ佛祖の眼睛なり。

From the buddhas, from the seven buddhas, what buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor has correctly transmitted is the samādhi of practice and verification.<sup>1</sup> It is what is called whether from a wise friend, whether from a sūtra scroll; this is the eye of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>2</sup>

[69:2]

このゆえに、曹溪古佛、問僧云、還假修證也無。僧云、修證不無、染汚即不得。

Therefore,

The Old Buddha of Caoxi asked the monk, “Does it nevertheless depend on practice and verification?”<sup>3</sup>

The monk answered, “It’s not that it lacks practice and verification, but it can’t be defiled by them.”

1 samādhi of practice and verification (shushō zanmai 修證三昧): Some MS witnesses read here jishō zanmai 自證三昧 (“the samādhi of self-verification”). While the term samādhi has the narrow sense of a paranormal psychological state of extreme concentration, it is likely used here in the broader sense, found often in the literature, of a spiritual practice. The unusual expression “samādhi of practice and verification” is often understood here as a spiritual practice in which the practice and its fruit are coterminous. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Practice and verification.”

2 whether from a wise friend, whether from a sūtra scroll (waku jū chishiki waku jū kyōkan 或從知識・或從經卷): I.e., whether [one’s understanding of Buddhism derives] from a teacher or from a text. Fixed expressions occurring together several times in the Shōbōgenzō; see Supplementary Notes. Below (sections 4-8), Dōgen will discuss each in turn.

3 The Old Buddha of Caoxi (Sōkei kobutsu 曹溪古佛): I.e., the Sixth Ancestor, Huineng 慧能. “The monk” here is the Ancestor’s disciple Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (677-744); the topic is the Ancestor’s question to Nanyue, “What thing is it that comes like this?” Their famous exchange is recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:178, case 101) and quoted often in his writings.

[69:3]

しかあればしるべし、不染汚の修證、これ佛祖なり、佛祖三昧の霹靂風雷なり。

Thus, we know that nondefiling practice and verification are the buddhas and ancestors, are the thunder and lightning of the samādhi of the buddha and ancestors.<sup>4</sup>

[69:4]

或從知識の正當恁麼時、あるひは半面を相見す、あるひは半身を相見す、あるひは全面を相見す、あるひは全身を相見す、半自を相見することあり、半他を相見することあり。神頭の披毛せるを相證し、鬼面の戴角せるを相修す。異類行の隨他來あり、同條生の變異去あり。かくのごとくのところを爲法捨身すること、いく千萬廻といふことをしらず。爲身求法すること、いく億百劫といふことをしらず。これ或從知識の活計なり、參自從自の消息なり。瞬目に相見するとき破顔あり、得髓を禮拜するちなみに斷臂す。

At the very moment of whether from a wise friend, we may see half the face; we may see half the body; we may see the whole face; we may see the whole body. There is seeing half oneself; there is seeing half the other. We verify that the spirit's head is clad in fur; we practice that the demon's face is crowned by horns.<sup>5</sup> There is the coming along with it of the moving of different types; there is the going on transforming of those born together.<sup>6</sup> In such circumstances, we do not know how many

4 samādhi of the buddha and ancestors (busso zanmai 佛祖三昧): Another unusual expression not found in the literature or elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō.

5 We verify that the spirit's head is clad in fur; we practice that the demon's face is crowned by horns (jinzū no himō seru o sōshō shi, kimen no taikaku seru o sōshu su 神頭の披毛せるを相證し、鬼面の戴角せるを相修す): Perhaps meaning something like, “we realize what we really are.” Dōgen is playing here with two fixed expressions sometimes used in self-deprecating reference to monks: “spirit heads and demon faces” (jinzū kimen 神頭鬼面; i.e., “weird things”), and “clad in fur and crowned by horns” (himō taikaku 披毛戴角; i.e., “beastly”).

6 There is the coming along with it of the moving of different types; there is the going on transforming of those born together (irui gyō no zui ta rai ari, dōjō shō no hen'i ko ari 異類行の隨他來あり、同條生の變異去あり): Perhaps meaning something like, “[practice and verification involve] ‘coming back’ to help others and ‘going on’ transforming oneself.” The awkward translation struggles to retain Dōgen's continued play with familiar idioms. “Coming along with it” (zui ta rai 隨他來) would seem to be a variation on the recommendation, seen elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, of Dasui Fazhen 大隋法眞 (834-919) to “go along” (zui ta ko 隨他去) with “this” (shako 這箇) when it is destroyed with the chiliocosm at the end of a kalpa. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Goes along with it.”

“The moving of different types” (irui gyō 異類行) derives from the expression, “moving among different types” (irui chū gyō 異類中行), generally taken to indicate the salvific activities of the buddhas and bodhisattvas among the various forms of living beings;

thousands of myriads of times we discard the body for the sake of the dharma; we do not know how many millions of hundreds of kalpas we seek the dharma for the sake of our bodies.<sup>7</sup> This is the way of life of whether from a wise friend, the circumstances of attending the self and following the self.<sup>8</sup> It has breaking into a smile upon seeing the blink; it cuts off an arm when making a bow to get the marrow.<sup>9</sup>

おほよそ七佛の前後より、六祖の左右にあまれる見自の知識、ひとりにあらず、ふたりにあらず。見他の知識、むかしにあらず、いまにあらず。

In sum, from before and after the seven buddhas, to beyond the left and right of the Sixth Ancestor, the wise friends who have seen themselves are not one, are not two; the wise friends who have seen the other are not past, are not present.<sup>10</sup>

[69:6]

或從經卷のとき、自己の皮肉骨髓を參究し、自己の皮肉骨髓を脱落するとき、桃華眼睛づから突出來相見せらる、竹聲耳根づから霹靂相聞せらる。おほよそ經卷に従學するとき、まことに經卷出來す。その經卷といふは、盡十方界・山河大地・草木自他なり、喫飯著衣・造次動容なり。この一の經典にしたがひ學道するに、さらに未曾有の經卷、いく千萬卷となく出現在前するなり。是字の句ありて宛然なり、非字の偈あらたに歴然なり。これらにあふことをえて、拈身心して參學するに、長劫を消盡し、長劫を擧起すといふとも、かならず通利の到處あり。放身心して參學するに、朕兆を挾出し、朕兆を趯飛すといふとも、かならず受持の功、成ずるなり。

---

especially associated with Nanchuan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-835) and occurring often in Dōgen's writings; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Move among different types."

7 discard the body for the sake of the dharma (i hō sha shin 爲法捨身): A fixed expression for Buddhist asceticism. The following "seek the dharma for the sake of the body" (i shin gu hō 爲身求法) is Dōgen's variation. Elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, we find the variant "discard the dharma for the sake of the body" (ishin shahō 爲身捨法).

8 attending the self and following the self (san ji jū ji 參自從自): An unusual phrase, perhaps playing off the glyph jū 從 in the expression "whether from a wise friend" (waku jū chishiki 或從知識).

9 breaking into a smile (hagan 破顔); cuts off an arm (danpi 斷臂): Reference to two famous tales of dharma transmission: 1) the story of the first transmission on Vulture Peak, when the Buddha held up a flower and (in Dōgen's version) blinked, and Mahākāśyapa smiled (see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Break into a smile"); and 2) the legend of the Second Ancestor, Huīkē 慧可, who cut off his arm as an offering to Bodhidharma and subsequently succeeded the latter when he expressed his understanding with a wordless bow and was praised as having gotten Bodhidharma's marrow (see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Cut off an arm").

10 are not past, are not present (mukashi ni arazu, ima ni arazu むかしにあらず、いまにあらず): Likely in the sense "beyond past and present" (chōkokon 超古今), "timeless" or "for all time."

At the time of whether from a sūtra scroll, when we investigate our own skin, flesh, bones, and marrow and slough off our own skin, flesh, bones, and marrow, the peach blossoms and the eye themselves are seen to pop out; the bamboo sound and the ear themselves are heard to thunder.<sup>11</sup> In general, when we study from a sūtra scroll, the sūtra scroll truly emerges. This “sūtra scroll” means the entire world in the ten directions; the mountains, rivers, and the whole earth; grass and trees, self and other; it is our having meals and wearing clothes, our hasty acts and demeanor.<sup>12</sup>

In studying the way from each one of these scriptures, so many thousands of myriads of previously non-existent sūtra scrolls appear before us. They have lines in positive terms, exactly so; they have gāthās in negative terms, distinctly so.<sup>13</sup> Having been able to encounter them, when we take up body and mind and study them, though we may exhaust long kalpas and take up long kalpas, we will inevitably be well versed in them everywhere. When we cast aside body and mind and study them, though we may gouge out any portent and jump free from any portent, the merit of receiving and upholding them will invariably be attained.<sup>14</sup>

いま西天の梵文を、東土の法本に翻譯せる、わづかに半萬軸にたらず。これに三乗・五乗・九部・十二部あり。これらみな、したがひ學すべき經卷なり。したがはざらんと迴避せんとすとも、うべからざるなり。かるがゆえに、あるひは眼睛となり、あるひは吾髓となりきたれり。頭角正なり、尾條正なり。他よりこれをうけ、これを他にさづくといへども、ただ眼睛の活出なり、自他を脱落す。ただ吾髓の附屬なり、自他を透脱せり。眼睛・吾髓、それ自にあらず、他にあらざるがゆえに、佛祖、むかしよりむかしに正傳しきたり、而今より而今に附屬するなり。拄杖經あり、横説

11 peach blossoms and the eye (tōka ganzei 桃華眼睛): Allusion to the story, cited several times in the Shōbōgenzō, of Lingyun Zhiqin 靈雲志勤 (dates unknown), who was awakened upon seeing peach trees in bloom. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Peach blossoms” and “Eye.”

bamboo sound and the ear (chikusei nikon 竹聲耳根): Allusion to the story, cited several times in the Shōbōgenzō, of Xiangyan Zhixian 香嚴智閑 (d. 898), who gained an understanding upon hearing the sound of a bit of debris striking a bamboo stalk; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “A painted cake can’t satisfy hunger.” Dōgen recounts the episode in his “Shōbōgenzō keisei sanshoku” 正法眼藏溪聲山色.

12 mountains, rivers, and the whole earth (senga daichi 山河大地): A standard expression for the natural world.

13 lines in positive terms (zeji no ku 是字の句); gāthās in negative terms (hiji no ge 非字の偈): Unusual expressions, perhaps meaning texts that use what we would call cataphatic and apophatic language respectively.

14 gouge out any portent and jump free from any portent (chinchō o kesshutsu shi, chinchō o tekihi su 朕兆を抉出し、朕兆を趯飛す): Probably meaning “gone beyond all being”; from the stock expression “before the germination of any portent” (chinchō mibō 朕兆未萌), used to describe what precedes being.

縦説、おのれづから空を破し、有を破す。拂子經あり、雪を澡し、霜を澡す。坐禪經の一會・兩會あり、袈裟經一卷十秩あり。これら、諸佛祖の護持するところなり。かくのごとくの經卷にしたがひて、修證得道するなり。あるひは天面・人面、あるひは日面月面あらしめて、從經卷の功夫現成するなり。

At present, the translations of the Sanskrit texts of Sindh in the West into the dharma books of the Land of the East do not amount to half a myriad spindles.<sup>15</sup> There are the three vehicles, the five vehicles, the nine sections, the twelve sections.<sup>16</sup> They are all sūtra scrolls we should follow and study; even if we try to avoid following them, we cannot. Hence, they have become the eye, or become “my marrow”; they are right at the horns and right at the tail.<sup>17</sup> Though we may receive them from another or confer them on another, it is just the vital emergence of the eye, sloughing off self and other; it is just the bequest of “my marrow,” transcending self and other. Because the eye and “my marrow” are not self and are not other, the buddhas and ancestors have directly transmitted them from the past to the past and bequeath them from the present to the present. There are staff scriptures; preaching horizontally and preaching vertically, they themselves break up emptiness and break up being. There are whisk scriptures; they clean off the snow and clean off the frost.<sup>18</sup> There are one or two collections of seated meditation scrip-

15 half a myriad spindles (hanman jiku 半萬軸): I.e., five thousand scrolls. The imperially sponsored catalog of the Buddhist canon, the Kaiyuan shijiao lu 開元釋教錄, compiled in 730 by Zhisheng 智昇, is said to record a total of 5,048 fascicles; but, of course, many of these titles were not translations from Sanskrit.

16 the three vehicles, the five vehicles, the nine sections, the twelve sections (sanjō gojō kubu jūnibu 三乘・五乘・九部・十二部): Various divisions of the Buddhist teachings. “The three vehicles” (sanjō 三乘) refers to the śrāvaka, pratyeka-buddha, and bodhisattva vehicles; “the five vehicles” (gojō 五乘) is an East Asian innovation that adds to the three vehicles the teachings for humans and for devas; “the nine sections” and “the twelve sections” are venerable lists (the latter including all the former) of sacred genres. For Dōgen’s understanding of these, see “Shōbōgenzō bukyō” 正法眼藏佛教.

17 they have become the eye, or become “my marrow” (arui wa ganzei to nari, arui wa gozui to narikitareri あるひは眼睛となり、あるひは吾髓となりきたれり): “My marrow” (gozui 吾髓) alludes to Bodhidharma’s words to his dharma heir, Huike 慧可, “You’ve gotten my marrow” (nyo toku go zui 汝得吾髓); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.” Though less certain, given the context of transmission here, “the eye” (ganzei 眼睛) may evoke the “eye” in the “treasury of the true dharma eye” (shōbōgenzō 正法眼藏) transmitted on Vulture Peak. See above, Note 9.

they are right at the horns and right at the tail (zukaku shin nari, bijō shin nari 頭角正なり、尾條正なり): I.e., true from head to tail; variant of the more common zushin bishin 頭正尾正.

18 staff scriptures (shujō kyō 拄杖經); whisk scriptures (hossu kyō 拂子經): I.e., the master’s ceremonial staff and fly whisk as scriptures. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Staff,” “Whisk.”

tures; there is one roll in ten spindles of kāṣāya scriptures. These are what the buddhas and ancestors protect and maintain. From such sūtra scrolls, they practice and verify and gain the way. Causing a deva face or a human face, or a sun face or moon face, the work of “from a sūtra scroll” is realized.<sup>19</sup>

しかあるに、たとひ知識にもしたがひ、たとひ經卷にもしたがふ、みなこれ自己にしたがふなり。經卷おのれづから自經卷なり、知識おのれづから自知識なり。しかあれば、遍參知識は遍參自己なり、拈百草は拈自己なり、拈萬木は拈自己なり、自己はかならず恁麼の功夫なりと參學するなり。この參學に、自己を脱落し、自己を契證するなり。

Nevertheless, whether one follows a wise friend or follows a sūtra scroll, they are both following oneself. Sūtra scrolls are themselves sūtra scrolls of oneself; wise friends are themselves wise friends of oneself. Therefore, to study widely with a wise friend is to study widely with oneself; to take up the hundred grasses is to take up oneself; to take up the myriad trees is to take up oneself.<sup>20</sup> We study that one's self is always such concentrated effort. In this study, we slough off ourselves, we accord with and verify ourselves.

これによりて、佛祖の大道に、自證自悟の調度あり、正嫡の佛祖にあらざれば正傳せず、嫡嫡相承する調度あり、佛祖の骨髓にあらざれば正傳せず。かくのごとく參學するゆえに、人のために傳授するときは、汝得吾髓の附囑有在なり、吾有正法眼藏附囑摩訶迦葉なり。爲説は、かならずしも自他にかかはれず。他のための説著、すなはちみづからのための説著なり、自と自と同參の聞・説なり。一耳はきき、一耳はとく、一舌はとき、一舌はきく、乃至、眼・耳・鼻・舌・身・意・根・識・塵等もかくのごとし。さらに一身一心ありて、證するあり、修するあり。みみづからの聞・説なり、舌づからの聞・説なり。昨日は他のために不定法をとくといへども、今日はみづからのために定法をとかるなり。かくのごとくの日面あひつらなり、月面あひつらなれり。他のために法をとく、法を修するは、生生のところに法をきき、法をあきらめ、法を證するなり。今生にも法を他のためにとく。誠心あれば、自己の得法やすきなり。あるひは、他人の法をきくをもたすけすすむれば、みづからが學法、よきたよりをうるなり。身中にたよりをえ、心中にたよりをうるなり。聞法を障礙するがときは、みづからが聞法を障礙せらるるなり。生生の身身に法をとく、法をきくは、世世に聞法するなり。前來わが正傳せし法を、さらに今世にもき

19 sun face or moon face (nichimen gachimen 日面月面): Likely an allusion to two buddhas named in the Foming jing 佛名經, or to a famous saying by Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一 (709-788); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Sun face, moon face.”

20 hundred grasses (hyakusō 百草); myriad trees (manboku 萬木): I.e., the natural world as a scripture. In his “Shōbōgenzō bukkyō” 正法眼藏佛經, Dōgen writes that there are scriptures written “using the script of the hundred grasses or using the script of the myriad trees.”

くなり。法のなかに生じ、法のなかに滅するがゆえに、盡十方界のなかに法を正傳しつれば、生生にきき、身身に修するなり。生生を法に現成せしめ、身身を法ならしむるゆえに、一塵・法界ともに拈來して、法を證せしむるなり。

Based on this, in the great way of the buddhas and ancestors, there is an implement for self-verification and self-awakening that is not directly transmitted by those who are not buddhas and ancestors of direct succession; there is an implement inherited by successor after successor that is not directly transmitted to those who are not the bones and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors. Because we study in this way, when we transmit it to someone, there is a bequest of “you’ve gotten my marrow”; it is “I have a treasury of the true dharma eye, which I bequeath to Mahākāśyapa.”<sup>21</sup> Preaching for someone’s sake does not necessarily have to do with self or other: preaching for the sake of the other is preaching for one’s own sake; it is a hearing and preaching in which self and self study together.<sup>22</sup> One ear hears, and one ear preaches; one tongue preaches and one tongue hears; and so on in the same way for eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind; for organ, consciousness, and object.<sup>23</sup> Further, they have one body and one mind, have verifying and practicing: the ear itself hears and preaches; the tongue itself hears and preaches.<sup>24</sup> Yesterday, we may preach an indeterminate dharma for another’s sake; but today, a determinate dharma is preached for our sake.<sup>25</sup>

21 “I have a treasury of the true dharma eye, which I bequeath to Mahākāśyapa” (go u shōbōgenzō fuzoku Makakashō 吾有正法眼藏附囑摩訶迦葉): The Buddha’s words upon transmitting the dharma on Vulture Peak; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Treasury of the true dharma eye.”

22 it is a hearing and preaching in which self and self study together (ji to ji to dōsan no mon setsu nari 自と自と同參の聞・説なり): I.e., the self as speaker and self as listener study together.

23 eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind; for organ, consciousness, and object (gen ni bi zetsu shin i kon shiki jin 眼・耳・鼻・舌・身・意・根・識・塵): I.e., the six senses and the sense organ, sense consciousness, and sense object.

24 they have one body and one mind (isshin isshin arite 一身一心ありて): Or “there is one body and one mind”; the translation assumes this refers to each of the items listed in the previous sentence — i.e., each has its own identity, with its own practice and verification.

25 Yesterday, we may preach an indeterminate dharma for another’s sake (sakujitsu wa ta no tame ni fujō hō o toku to iedomo 昨日は他のために不定法をとくといへども): After words (also cited in “Shōbōgenzō ikka myōju” 正法眼藏一顆明珠) attributed to Buddha Śākyamuni in the Liandeng huiyao 聯燈會要 (ZZ.136:443b9-11):

世尊因外道問、昨日説何法。云説定法。外道云、今日説何法、云説不定法。外道云、昨日説定法。今日何故説不定法。云昨日定。今日不定。

The World-Honored One was once asked by a non-Buddhist, “What dharma did you preach yesterday?”

Such sun faces are lined up, and moon faces are lined up.<sup>26</sup>

To preach the dharma, to practice the dharma, for the sake of another is to hear the dharma, to clarify the dharma, to verify the dharma, in lifetime after lifetime. In this life as well, we are preaching for the sake of others; yet, when we do it with a sincere mind, we ourselves easily attain the dharma. Or, when we help and encourage others to hear the dharma, our own study of the dharma gains good advantage; it gains an advantage in our bodies, and it gains an advantage in our minds. Those who obstruct [others from] hearing the dharma are themselves obstructed from hearing the dharma. To preach the dharma, to hear the dharma, in body after body of life after life is to hear the dharma in generation after generation: the dharma that we directly transmitted previously, we now hear again in this generation.<sup>27</sup> Since we are born in the dharma and expire in the dharma, when we have directly transmitted the dharma in the entire world in the ten directions, we hear it in life after life, we practice it in body after body.<sup>28</sup> Since we manifest life after life in the dharma and make body after body into the dharma, we take up both a single dust mote and the dharma realm and cause the dharma to be verified.

しかあれば、東邊にして一句をききて、西邊にきたりて、一人のためにとくべし。これ、一自己をもて、聞著・説著を一等に功夫するなり、東自・西自を一齊に修證するなり。なにとしても、ただ佛法祖道を自己の身心にあひちかづけ、あひいとなむを、よろこび、のぞみ、こころぎすべし。一時より一日におよび、乃至一年より一生までのいとなみとすべし。佛法を精魂として弄すべきなり。これを、生生をむなくすごさざるとす。

He said, "I preached a determinate dharma."

The non-Buddhist said, "What dharma do you preach today?"

He said, "I'm preaching an indeterminate dharma."

The non-Buddhist said, "Yesterday, you preached a determinate dharma. Why are you preaching an indeterminate dharma today?"

He said, "Yesterday was determinate. Today is indeterminate."

26 Such sun faces are lined up, and moon faces are lined up (kaku no gotoku no nichimen aitsuranari, gachimen aitsuranareru かくのこくつの日面あひつらなり、月面あひつらなれり): Perhaps meaning no more than that such days pass one after another; but, given the allusion just above to the Buddhas Sun Face and Moon Face, the sense may also be that there is a new buddha with a new teaching each day.

27 hear the dharma in generation after generation (sese ni monpō suru 世世に聞法する): I.e., our preaching of the dharma in our past lives enables us to hear the dharma in our future lives. "Generation" (or "age"; se 世) here refers to the individual's rebirth.

28 Since we are born in the dharma and expire in the dharma (hō no naka ni shōji, hō no naka ni messuru ga yue ni 法のなかに生じ、法のなかに滅するがゆえに): The translation follows Kawamura's punctuation here. This clause could also be read with the preceding sentence: "The dharma that we directly transmitted previously, we now hear again in this generation; for we are born in the dharma and expire in the dharma."

Thus, hearing a phrase in the east, we should come to the west and teach it to someone. This is by a single self, working equally at hearing and preaching, practicing and verifying equally our eastern self and western self. Whatever we do, we should rejoice in, hope for, and aspire to bringing near to our bodies and minds, and living by, the dharma of the buddhas and the way of the ancestors. We should live by them from one hour to one day, from one year to one lifetime. We should play with the buddha dharma as the spirit.<sup>29</sup> This is what it means not to pass life after life in vain.

しかあるを、いまだあきらめざればひとのためにとくべからず、とおもふことなかれ。あきらめんことをまたんは、無量劫にもかなふべからず。たとひ人佛をあきらむとも、さらに天佛あきらむべし。たとひ山のころをあきらむとも、さらに水のころをあきらむべし。たとひ因縁生法をあきらむとも、さらに非因縁生法をあきらむべし。たとひ佛祖邊をあきらむとも、さらに佛祖向上をあきらむべし。これらを一世にあきらめをはりて、のちに他のためにせんと擬せんは、不功夫なり、不丈夫なり、不參學なり。

However, do not think that we should not teach others when we have not yet got clear ourselves. If we wait to be clear, we will not be able to do it for innumerable kalpas. Even should we clarify human buddhas, we must still clarify deva buddhas.<sup>30</sup> Even should we clarify the mind of mountains, we must still clarify the mind of waters. Even should we clarify dharmas arising from causes and conditions, we must still clarify dharmas not arising from causes and conditions.<sup>31</sup> Even should we clarify the vicinity of the buddhas and ancestors, we must still clarify what is beyond the buddhas and ancestors. To imagine that we will clarify these in one lifetime and then teach them to others is not making concentrated effort, is not being resolute, is not studying.

29 We should play with the buddha dharma as the spirit (buppō o seikon toshite rō su beki nari 佛法を精魂として弄すべきなり): From the common expression “playing with the spirit” (rō zeikon 弄精魂), occurring often in Chan literature; it can indicate a distracted, or “possessed,” state of mind but is sometimes used in ironic reference to spiritual practice.

30 human buddhas (ninbutsu 人佛); deva buddhas (tenbutsu 天佛): Unusual terms; as used in “Shōbōgenzō gyōbutsu iigi” 正法眼藏行佛威儀, they indicate buddhas appearing in the human and deva realms respectively.

31 dharmas arising from causes and conditions (innen shō hō 因縁生法); dharmas not arising from causes and conditions (hi innen shō hō 非因縁生法): Presumably, “conditioned (ui 有爲; S. samskrta) dharmas” and “unconditioned (mui 無爲; S. asamskrta) dharmas,” respectively.

[69:12]

おほよそ學佛祖道は、一法一儀を參學するより、すなはち爲他の志氣を衝天せしむるなり。しかあるによりて、自他を脱落するなり。さらに自己を參徹すれば、さきより參徹他己なり。よく他己を參徹すれば、自己參徹なり。この佛儀は、たとひ生知といふとも、師承にあらざれば、體達すべからず。生知、いまだ師にあはざれば、不生知をしらず、不生不知をしらず。たとひ生知といふとも、佛祖の大道はしるべきにあらず、學してしるべきなり。自己を體達し、他己を體達す、佛祖の大道なり。ただまさに自初心の參學をめぐらして、他初心の參學を同參すべし。初心より自他ともに同參しもてゆくに、究竟同參に得到するなり。自功夫のごとく、他功夫をもすすむべし。

In general, in studying the way of the buddhas and ancestors, once we have studied a single dharma or a single behavior, we let our determination to help others assault the heavens.<sup>32</sup> Through this, we slough off self and other. Going further, when we study and master ourselves, it is our previous study and mastery of the other; when we study and master the other, it is study and mastery of ourselves. This buddha behavior, even those of innate knowledge cannot personally realize if it is not received from a teacher.<sup>33</sup> Those of innate knowledge, if they have not encountered a teacher, do not know non-innate knowledge, they do not know non-innate non-knowledge.<sup>34</sup> They may have innate knowledge, but they cannot know the great way of the buddhas and ancestors; they must study it to know it. Personally to realize oneself and personally to realize the other, is the great way of the buddhas and ancestors. Reflecting on our own study as beginners, we should study together the study of others' study as beginners. When self and other go on studying together from their time as beginners, they reach an ultimate study together. Like our own concentrated effort, we should encourage the concentrated effort of others.

32 assault the heavens (shōten 衝天): A fixed phrase for vaulting ambition or high aspiration; occurs several times in Dōgen's writings.

33 innate knowledge (shōchi 生知): See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Knowledge at birth."

34 do not know non-innate knowledge, they do not know non-innate non-knowledge (fushōchi o shirazu, fushō fuchi o shirazu 不生知をしらず、不生不知をしらず): Or perhaps the latter clause should be read, "they do not know what is neither innate nor knowledge." The English "innate" here masks Dōgen's play with the glyph shō 生 ("birth") in shōchi 生知 ("knowledge at birth"), used for those innately wise; and fushō 不生 ("unborn"), used in reference to the emptiness, or "non-arising," of phenomena. Hence, this sentence could be read, "They do not know the knowledge of the unborn; they do not know the non-knowledge of the unborn."

しかあるに、自證自悟等の道をききて、癡人おもはくは、師に傳受すべからず、自學すべし。これは、おほきなるあやまりなり。自解の思量分別を邪計して師承なきは、西天の天然外道なり。これをわきまへざらんともがら、いかでか佛道人ならん。いはんや自證の言をききて、積聚の五蘊ならんと計せば、小乗の自調に同ぜん。大乘・小乗をわきまへざるともがら、おほく佛祖の兒孫と自稱するおほし。しかあれども、明眼人、だれか瞞ぜられん。

However, upon hearing the words “self-verification,” “self-awakening,” and the like, crude people think that one should not receive transmission from a teacher but should study on one’s own. This is a big mistake. To be without instruction from a teacher, reckoning mistakenly with the discriminations of the thinking of one’s own understanding, is an other path of natural occurrence in Sindh in the West.<sup>35</sup> How could those types who do not discern this be people of the way of the buddhas? Not to mention that, upon hearing the term “self-verification,” if we reckon it to be the accumulated five aggregates, it will be the same as the self-control of the Small Vehicle.<sup>36</sup> There are many of the types unable to distinguish between the Great Vehicle and the Small Vehicle who call themselves descendants of the buddhas and ancestors. However, among those with clear eyes, who would be deceived by them?

* * * * *

35 other path of natural occurrence in Sindh in the West (Saiten no tennen gedō 西天の天然外道): I.e., non-Buddhist religious teaching of India that denies the laws of cause and effect.

36 if we reckon it to be the accumulated five aggregates (shakujū no goon naran to keiseba 積聚の五蘊ならんと計せば): Presumably meaning that, “if we take the self of ‘self-verification’ to be the self of the five skandhas,” then, like the followers of the Small Vehicle, we think this is a matter of disciplining oneself. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Four elements and five aggregates.”

[69:14]

大宋國紹興のなかに、徑山の大慧禪師宗杲といふあり。もとはこれ經論の學生なり。遊方のちなみに、宣州の瑄禪師にしたがひて、雲門の拈古、および雪竇の頌古・拈古を學す、參學のはじめなり。雲門の風を會せずして、つひに洞山の微和尚に參學すといへども、微、つひに堂奥をゆるさず。微和尚は、芙蓉和尚の法子なり、いたづらなる席末人に齊肩すべからず。杲禪師、ややひさしく參學すといへども、微の皮肉骨髓を摸著することあたはず、いはんや、塵中の眼睛ありとだにもしらず。

In the Land of the Great Song, during the Shaoxing, there was a certain Zonggao, Chan Master Dahui of Mount Jing.<sup>37</sup> Originally a student of the sūtras and treatises, during his wanderings, he became a follower of Chan Master Chen of Xuanzhou, under whom he studied the comments on old cases by Yunmen, as well as the verses and comments on old cases by Xuedou; this was the beginning of his study.<sup>38</sup>

Failing to understand the style of Yunmen, he eventually studied with Reverend Wei of Dongshan; but, in the end, Wei did not admit him into the interior of the hall.<sup>39</sup> Reverend Wei was a dharma child of Reverend Furong; he should not be of equal stature to some insignificant person in the last seat.<sup>40</sup> Though Chan Master Gao may have studied with him for quite some time, he was unable touch Wei's skin, flesh, bones, and marrow, much less know that the eye in the dust even exists.<sup>41</sup>

37 Shaoxing (Jokō 紹興): The era covering 1131-1162, in the reign of the Song-dynasty Emperor Gaozong 高宗.

Zonggao, Chan Master Dahui of Mount Jing (Kinzan no Daie zenji Sōkō 徑山の大慧禪師宗杲): I.e., Dahui Zonggao 大慧宗杲 (1089-1163), who twice served as abbot of the Xingsheng Wanshou Chan Monastery 興聖萬壽禪寺 on Jingshan 徑山 in Hangzhou 杭州. Dōgen's account here of Dahui's studies is loosely derived (though quite different) from the Dahui Puzue chanshi zongmen wuku 大慧普覺禪師宗門武庫, T.1998B.47:953a25ff.

38 Chan master Chen of Xuanzhou (Senshū no Tei zenji 宣州の瑄禪師): I.e., Mingjiao Shaochen 明教紹理 (dates unknown).

Yunmen (Unmon 雲門); Xuedou (Seppō 雪竇): I.e., Yunmen Wenyan 雲門文偃 (864-949); Xuedou Zhongxian 雪竇重顯 (980-1052).

39 Reverend Wei of Dongshan (Tōzan no Bi oshō 洞山の微和尚): I.e., Dongshan Daowei 洞山道微 (dates unknown).

did not admit him into the interior of the hall (dōō o yurusazu 堂奥をゆるさず): I.e., did not grant him private interviews in the abbot's quarters.

40 Reverend Furong (Fuyō oshō 芙蓉和尚): I.e., the important Caodong master Furong Daokai 芙蓉道楷 (1043-1118).

some insignificant person in the last seat (itazura naru sekimatsu nin いたづらなる席末人): The "end of the seats" (sekimatsu 席末) refers to the lowest ranking place in a seating arrangement.

41 touch Wei's skin, flesh, bones, and marrow (Bi no hi niku kotsu zui o mojakuru 摸著 Wei の皮肉骨髓): I.e., to touch Wei's skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.

[69:15]

あるとき、佛祖の道に、臂香嗣書の法あり、とばかりききて、しきりに嗣書を微和尚に請す。しかあれども、微和尚ゆるさず。つひにいはく、なんぢ、嗣法を要せば、倉卒なることなかれ。直須功夫勤學すべし。佛祖受授不妄付授也、吾不惜付授、只是爾未具眼在。ときに宗杲いはく、本具正眼、自證自悟、豈有不妄付授也。微和尚、笑而休矣。のちに湛堂準和尚に參ず。

Once, upon hearing that, in the way of the buddhas and ancestors, there is a procedure of forearm incense and inheritance certificate, he repeatedly begged an inheritance certificate of Reverend Wei.<sup>42</sup>

Reverend Wei, however, did not approve, finally saying, “If you want to inherit the dharma, do not be hasty. You should make effort and pursue your study. The conferral of the buddhas and ancestors is not transferred indiscriminately. I do not begrudge conferring it; it is just that you still do not possess the eye.”

At this point, Zonggao replied, “The true eye originally possessed is self-verified and self-awakened. How could it be conferred indiscriminately?”<sup>43</sup>

Reverend Wei laughed and retired.

Thereafter, [Zonggao] studied with Reverend Zhantang Zhun.<sup>44</sup>

微の皮肉骨髓を摸著する): I.e., “understand Wei’s teaching.” “Touch” here loosely renders mojaku 摸著 (“to grope”), from the common expression, “to grope but not touch it” (mo fujaku 摸不著) — i.e., “look for it without finding it.”

eye in the dust (jinchū no ganzei 塵中の眼睛): An unusual expression, likely meaning “the eye of the buddhas and ancestors within the world of the six senses” — “dust” (jin 塵) being a common term for the objects of the senses; no doubt the same eye discussed by Daowei and Dahui in the following section. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Eye,” and “Dust.”

42 Once (aru toki あるとき): Dōgen’s account here continues loosely to reflect the Dahui Puzue chanshi zongmen wuku 大慧普覺禪師宗門武庫 (T.1998B.47:953b4-6). The exchange between Daowei and Dahui, however, does not occur here, and Dōgen’s source (if any) is unclear.

forearm incense and inheritance certificate (hikō shisho 臂香嗣書): A rite of burning incense on the forearm and receiving a document of succession from a master.

43 “The true eye originally possessed is self-verified and self-awakened” (hon gu shōgen, jishō jigo 本具正眼、自證自悟): Though Dahui’s words are given in Chinese, as if quoting a text, the Zongmen wuku 宗門武庫 (T.1998B.47:953b5-6) has a rather different version here: Dahui is dismissive of the ceremony of burning incense and transmitting the dharma, thinking to himself,

豈佛祖自證自悟之法。

How can it be the dharma of the self-verification and self-awakening of the buddhas and ancestors?

44 Reverend Zhantang Zhun (Tandō Jun oshō 湛堂準和尚): I.e., Zhantang Wenzhun 湛堂文準 (1061-1115).

[69:16] {2:202}

湛堂一日問宗杲云、爾鼻孔、因什麼今日無半邊。杲云、寶峰門下。湛堂云、杜撰禪和。杲看經次、湛堂問、看什麼經。杲曰、金剛經。湛堂云、是法平等、無有高下、爲什麼、雲居山高、寶峰山低。杲曰、是法平等、無有高下。湛堂云、爾作得箇座主。使下。又一日、湛堂見於粧十王處、問宗杲上座曰、此官人、姓什麼。杲曰、姓梁。湛堂以手自摸頭曰、爭奈姓梁底、少箇幞頭。杲曰、雖無幞頭、鼻孔髣髴。湛堂曰、杜撰禪和。

One day, Zhantang asked Zonggao, “Why is your nose half missing today?”<sup>45</sup>

Gao said, “In the tradition of Baofeng.”<sup>46</sup>

Zhantang said, “Illiterate Chan monk.”

Once when Gao was looking at a sūtra, Zhantang asked him, “What sūtra are you looking at?”

Gao said, “The Diamond Sūtra.”

Zhantang said, “This dharma is equal, without high or low. Why is Mount Yunju high and Mount Baofeng low?”

Gao said, “This dharma is equal, without high or low.”

Zhantang said, “You’ve become quite the prelate,” and sent him away.<sup>47</sup>

Again, one day, Zhantang, looking at depictions of the ten kings, asked Senior Seat Zonggao, “What’s this official’s name?”<sup>48</sup>

Gao said, “His name is Liang.”<sup>49</sup>

Zhangtang felt his own head and said, “Why is the one named Liang missing his headdress?”

Gao said, “He may not have the headdress, but the nose looks just the same.”

Zhantang said, “Illiterate Chan monk.”

45 One day (ichinichi 一日): Though their order differs, the following three dialogues are in the Chinese of the Zongmen wuku 宗門武庫 (T.1998B.47:953b6-14).

46 “In the tradition of Baofeng” (Hōhō monka 寶峰門下): Or “A follower of Baofeng.” I.e., “I’m your student.” “Baofeng” 寶峰 refers to Zhantang’s monastery, the Baofengsi 寶峰寺 at Letan 泐潭 in modern Jiangxi prefecture.

47 “prelate” (zasu 座主): The abbot of a Teachings monastery (kyōji 教寺 or kyōin 教院) — an institution where the abbacy is restricted to members of the Tiantai school; likely used here sarcastically, in the sense “know it all” or “smart ass.” See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Prelate Liang.”

48 the ten kings (jūō 十王): The ten kings of the underworld.

49 “His name is Liang” (Shō Ryō tei 姓梁底): Zhangtang’s lay surname was Liang 梁.

湛堂一日問宗杲云、杲上座、我這裏禪、爾一時理會得。教爾說也說得、教爾參也參得、教爾做頌古・拈古・小參・普說・請益、爾也做得。祇是爾有一件事未在、爾還知否。杲曰、甚麼事未在。湛堂曰、爾祇缺這一解在、因。若作不得這一解、我方丈與爾說時、便有禪、爾纔出方丈、便無了也。惺惺思量時、便有禪、纔睡著、便無了也。若如此、如何敵得生死。杲曰、正是宗杲疑處。

One day, Zhangtang asked Zonggao, “Senior Seat Gao, you understood my Chan here at once.<sup>50</sup> I have you teach it, and you can teach it. I have you study it, and you can study it. I have you do verses on the old cases, comments on the old cases, small convocations, public sermons, requests for instruction, and you can do them. There’s just one thing still missing. Do you know what it is?”

Gao said, “What thing is missing?”

Zhangtang said, “You just lack this one understanding: Ha! So long as you don’t get this one understanding, when I’m talking with you in the abbot’s quarters, you have Chan, but, as soon as you leave the abbot’s quarters, you don’t; when you’re wide awake and thinking, you have Chan, but, as soon as you go to sleep, you don’t. If you’re like this, how can you confront life and death?”

Gao said, “This is exactly what Zonggao has doubts about.”

後稍經載、湛堂示疾。宗杲問曰、和尚百年後、宗杲依附阿誰、可以了此大事。湛堂囑曰、有箇勤巴子、我亦不識他。雖然、爾若見他、必能成就此事。爾若見他了、不可更他遊、後世出來參禪也。

Some years later, Zhangtang became ill. Zonggao asked him, “After the Reverend’s hundredth year, on whom should Zonggao rely to comprehend this great matter?”<sup>51</sup>

Zhangtang advised him, “There is a certain Qin Bazi.<sup>52</sup> I don’t know him, but if you happen to meet him, you will definitely be able to achieve this matter. Once you’ve met him, don’t wander off to others. Study Chan when you come back in the next life.”

50 One day (ichinichi 一日): Continuing to quote the Chinese of the Zongmen wuku 宗門武庫 (T.1998B.47:953b14-22).

51 Some years later (go shō kei sai 後稍經載): Continuing to quote (with slight variation) the Zongmen wuku 宗門武庫 (T.1998B.47:953b22-25).

52 “Qin Bazi” (Gon Hasu 勤巴子): I.e., Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤 (1063–1135). The name Bazi 巴子 refers to Yuanwu’s origins in Sichuan.

[69:19] {2:204}

この一段の因縁を検點するに、湛堂、なほ宗杲をゆるさず。たびたび開發を擬すといへども、つひに缺一件事なり。補一件事あらず、脱落一件事せず。微和尚、そのかみ嗣書をゆるさず、なんぢいまだしきことあり、と勸勵する、微和尚の觀機あきらかなること、信仰すべし。正是宗杲疑處、を究參せず、脱落せず、打破せず、大疑せず、被疑礙なし。そのかみ、みだりに嗣書を請する、參學の倉卒なり、無道心のいたりなり、無稽古のはなはだしきなり、無遠慮なりといふべし、道機ならずといふべし、疏學のいたりなり。貪名愛利によって、佛祖の堂奥を、をかさんとす。あはれむべし、佛祖の語句をしらざることを。稽古はこれ自證と會せず、萬代を涉獵するは自悟ときかず、學せざるによりて、かくのごとく不是あり、かくのごとくの自錯あり。かくのごとくなるによりて、宗杲禪師の門下に、一箇半箇の眞巴鼻あらず、おほくこれ假低なり。佛法を會せず、佛法を不會せざるは、かくのごとくなり。而今の雲水、かならず審細の參學すべし、疏慢なることなかれ。

When we examine this episode, Zhangtang did not accept Zonggao. While he sought repeatedly to discover it, he was still lacking the “one thing.” He did not fill in the “one thing”; he did not slough off the “one thing.” Previously, Reverend Wei denied him an inheritance certificate, urging him on by saying, “You’re not ready.” We should trust the clarity of Reverend Wei’s insight into his abilities. “This is exactly what Zonggao has doubts about”: he did not investigate this; he did not slough it off; he did not break through it; he did not have the great doubt about it; he was not obstructed by the doubt. Previously, his recklessly begging a document of succession was precipitate, was an extreme case of one lacking the mind of the way, was a flagrant case of lacking learning from the ancients. We have to say he was thoughtless; we have to say he was not fit for the way; he was an extreme case of neglect of study. From his lust for fame and love of profit, he would violate the interior of the hall of the buddhas and ancestors. How pitiful that he did not know the words of the buddhas and ancestors. Because he did not understand that learning from the ancients is self-verification, and had not heard, had not studied, that perusing the myriad generations is self-awakening, he had this kind of error, he had this kind of self-mistake.<sup>53</sup> Because he was like this, among the followers of Chan Master Zonggao, there is not one or one half with a real nose grip; most of them are fakes and inferiors.<sup>54</sup>

53 perusing the myriad generations (bandai o shōryō suru 萬代を涉獵する): i.e., reading through the classical literature.

self-mistake (jisaku 自錯): Playing on “self-verification” (jishō 自證) and “self-awakening” (jigo 自悟).

54 a real nose grip (shin habi 眞巴鼻): i.e., a real grasp; a common metaphor, from the nose ring used to lead cattle. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose.”

fakes and inferiors (ketei 假低): A tentative translation of an unusual compound expres-

Failure to understand the buddha dharma, and failure not to understand the buddha dharma, are like this.<sup>55</sup> Monks of the present should study in detail; do not be neglectful.

[69:20] {2:205}

宗杲因湛堂之囑、而湛堂順寂後、參圓悟禪師於京師之天寧。圓悟一日陞堂、宗杲有神悟、以悟告呈圓悟。悟云、未也、子雖如是、而大法故未明。

On Zhangtang's advice, following Zhangtang's quiescence, Zonggao studied with Chan Master Yuanwu at Tianning in the capital.<sup>56</sup> One day, when Yuanwu ascended to the hall, Zonggao had a spiritual awakening.<sup>57</sup> He reported his awakening to Yuanwu.

Wu said, "Not yet. You may be like this, but the great dharma is not yet clarified."

又一日、圓悟上堂、舉五祖演和尚、有句無句語。宗杲聞、而言下得大安樂法。又呈解圓悟。圓悟笑曰、吾不欺汝耶。

Again, one day, in a convocation, Yuanwu took up the words of Reverend Yan of Wuzu on "affirmative statements and negative statements."<sup>58</sup> Upon hearing it, Zonggao attained the dharma of great bliss. Again, he expressed his understanding to Yuanwu. Yuanwu laughed and said, "I didn't trick you?"

[69:22]

これ宗杲禪師、のちに圓悟に參ずる因縁なり。圓悟の會にして、書記に充す。しかあれども、前後いまだあらたなる得處みえず、みづから普説・陞堂のときも、得處を舉せず。しるべし、記録者は神悟せるといひ、得大安樂法と記せりといへども、させることなきなり。おもくおもふことなかれ、ただ參學の生なり。

sion. Some MS witnesses read ketei 假底, perhaps meaning "frauds."

55 failure not to understand the buddha dharma (buppō o fue sezarū 佛法を不會せざる): Perhaps meaning "failure to avoid misunderstandings of the buddha dharma."

56 Chan Master Yuanwu at Tianning in the capital (Engo zenji o kyōshi shi tennei 圓悟禪師於京師之天寧): I.e., Yuanwu Keqin 圓悟克勤, at the Tianningsi 天寧寺 in the Northern Song capital of Bianjing 汴京 (modern Kaifeng). This and the following dialogue are based on the "Dahui Pujue chansi taming" 大慧普覺禪師塔銘 (at Dahui Pujue chansi yulu 大慧普覺禪師語錄, T.1998A.47:836b19-24).

57 ascended to the hall (shindō 陞堂): I.e., held a formal convocation in the dharma hall; synonymous with jōdō 上堂 ("convocation"), used in the next section.

58 the words of Reverend Yan of Wuzu on "affirmative statements and negative statements" (Goso En oshō uku muku go 五祖演和尚有句無句語): I.e., Yuanwu's teacher, Wuzu Fayan 五祖法演 (d. 1104). The words in question are likely comments on the popular saying attributed to Weishan Lingyou 潯山靈祐 (771-853) found at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:208, case 157; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. "Like vines relying on a tree."

This is an episode of Chan Master Zonggao's later studying with Yuanwu. He served as secretary in Yuanwu's community.<sup>59</sup> Nevertheless, we do not see that he had any new attainments before or after; and, in his own public sermons and formal convocations, he does not bring up any attainments. We should recognize that, while his biographer wrote that he had a "spiritual awakening" and "attained the dharma of great bliss," we need not make anything of this.<sup>60</sup> Do not take it seriously: he was just an ordinary student.

圓悟禪師は古佛なり、十方中の至尊なり。黄檗よりのちは、圓悟のことくなる尊宿、いまだあらざるなり、他界にも、まれなるべき古佛なり。しかあれども、これをしれる人天まれなり、あはれむべき娑婆國土なり。いま圓悟古佛の說法を擧して、宗杲上座を檢點するに、師におよべる智、いまだあらず、師にひとしき智、いまだあらず、いかにいはんや、師よりもすぐれたる智、ゆめにもいまだみざるがごとし。

Chan Master Yuanwu was an old buddha, most honored in the ten directions. After Huangbo, there is no venerable like Yuanwu; he was an old buddha who must be rare even in the other world.<sup>61</sup> Nevertheless, there are few humans or devas who recognize this; ours is a sad Sāhā land. If we examine Senior Seat Zonggao by holding up the teachings of Old Buddha Yuanwu, it seems he lacked wisdom approaching his master's, lacked wisdom equaling his master's; how much less did he ever see, even in his dreams, wisdom exceeding his master's.

[69:24] {2:206}

しかあればしるべし、宗杲禪師は滅師半徳の才におよばざるなり。ただわづかに華嚴・楞嚴等の文句を誦誦して傳説するのみなり、いまだ佛祖の骨髓あらず。宗杲おもはくは、大小の隠倫わづかに依草附木の精靈にひかれて保任せるところの見解、これを佛法とおもへり。これを佛法と許せるをもて、はかりしりぬ、佛祖の大道いまだ參究せずといふことを。圓悟よりのち、さらに他遊せず、智識をとぶらはず。みだりに大利の主として、雲水の參頭なり。のこれる語句、いまだ大法のほとりにおよばず。しかあるを、しらざるともがらおもはくは、宗杲禪師、むかしにもはぢざるとおもふ、み、しれるものは、あきらめざると決定せり。つひに大法をあきらめず、いたづらに口吧吧地のみなり。

59 secretary (shoki 書記): One of the six monastic offices, in charge of records and correspondence.

60 his biographer (kirokusha 記録者): I.e., the official Zhang Jun 張浚, author of the "Dahui Pujue chansi taming" 大慧普覺禪師塔銘 passages Dōgen has just quoted.

61 Huangbo (Ōbaku 黄檗): I.e., the famous ninth-century figure Huangbo Xiyun 黄檗希運.

Thus, we should realize that the talents of Chan Master Zonggao did not amount to reducing the teacher's merits by half.<sup>62</sup> He just memorized and conveyed a few passages of the Huayan, Laṅkā, and the like; he still lacked the bones and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>63</sup> Zonggao thought that the view maintained by major and minor hermits simply taken by the spirits that adhere to the grasses and attach to the trees — that this was the buddha dharma.<sup>64</sup> Given that he accepted this as the buddha dharma, it is clear that he never investigated the great way of the buddhas and ancestors. After Yuanwu, he did not travel to others or consult wise friends; he brazenly headed up the monks as the master of great monasteries. The words he has left us do not reach the vicinity of the great dharma. Those who do not know, however, think that Chan Master Zonggao owes no apologies even to the ancients; those who see and know are certain that he did not understand. In the end, he did not understand the great dharma but just meaninglessly ran his mouth, blah, blah.<sup>65</sup>

しかあればしりぬ、洞山の微和尚、まことに後鑑あきらかにあやまらざりけりといふことを。宗杲禪師に參學せるともがらは、それすゑまでも、微和尚をそねみ、ねたむこと、いまにたえざるなり。微和尚はただゆるさざるのみなり。準和尚のゆるさざることは、微よりもはなはだし、まみゆるごとには、勘過するのみなり。しかあれども、準和尚をねたまず。而今およびこしかたのねたむともがら、いくばくの懺懺なりとかせん。

Thus, we know that Reverend Wei of Dongshan was truly a clear mirror on the future and was not mistaken. The resentment of and hostility toward Reverend Wei among those, to the last, who studied with Chan Master Zonggao remains unabated even now. Reverend Wei simply failed to acknowledge him; Reverend Zhang's failure to acknowledge 62 reducing the teacher's merits by half (gen shi han toku 減師半德): From the Chan saying, "A view equal to the master's reduces the master's virtue by half" (ken yo shi sai gen shi han toku 見與師齊減師半德).

63 the Huayan, Laṅkā, and the like (Kegon Ryōgon tō 華嚴・楞嚴等): I.e., the Avatamsaka, Laṅkāvatāra, and other sūtras.

64 major and minor hermits (daishō no inrin 大小の隠倫): From the common trope expressed in the well-known verse by the Jin-dynasty poet Wang Kangju 王康琚:

小隱隱林藪、大隱隱朝市。

The minor hermit secludes himself in woods and marshes;

The major hermit secludes himself in court and market.

the spirits that adhere to the grasses and attach to the trees (esō fuboku no shōryō 依草附木の精靈): A fixed idiom for spirits of the dead that cling to the world; used in Chan texts for those who cling to words.

65 just meaninglessly ran his mouth, blah, blah (itazura ni ku haha chi nomi いたづらに口吧地のみ): From the Chinese onomatopoeia baba 吧吧 for blathering on.

him was even more severe than Wei's: at every encounter, he did nothing but point out his mistakes. Yet, they do not resent Reverend Zhang. How shameful are those in present and past who resent [Reverend Wei].

おほよそ大宋國に佛祖の兒孫と自稱するおほかれども、まことを學せるすくなきゆえに、まことををしふるすくなし。そのむね、この因縁にてもはかりしりぬべし。紹興のころ、なほかくのごとし。いまはそのころよりもおとれり、たとふるにもおよばず。いまは佛祖の大道、なにとあるべしとだにもしらざるともがら、雲水の主人となれり。

Generally speaking, although there are many in the Land of the Great Song who call themselves descendants of the buddhas and ancestors, since there are few who have studied the real thing, there are few who teach the real thing. That point can be clearly seen in this episode as well. It was like this even in the Shaoxing period; now things are even worse than then, beyond compare. Nowadays, those who do not even know what the great way of the buddhas and ancestors is supposed to be have become the leaders of the monks.

[69:27] {2:207}

しるべし、佛佛祖祖、西天東土、嗣書正傳は、青原山下これ正傳なり。青原山下よりのち、洞山おのづから正傳せり。自餘の十方、かつてしらざるところなり。しるものはみなこれ洞山の兒孫なり、雲水に聲名をほどこす。宗杲禪師、なほ生前に自證自悟の言句をしらず、いはんや自餘の公案を參徹せんや。いはんや宗杲禪老よりも晩進、たれか自證の言をしらん。

We should understand that, in the direct transmission of the inheritance certificates of buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor in Sindh in the West and the Land of the East, it is the line under Mount Qingyuan that is the direct transmission.<sup>66</sup> From the line under Mount Qingyuan, naturally it was directly transmitted by Dongshan.<sup>67</sup> This is something unknown to others in the ten directions; those who know it are all descendants of Dongshan, who spread his name among the clouds and water.<sup>68</sup> Chan Master Zonggao throughout his life did not understand the words “self-verification” and “self-awakening,” much less did he master any other kōan. How much less, then, among the latecomers after Chan Elder Zonggao could anyone understand the words “self-verification.”

66 it is the line under Mount Qingyuan that is the direct transmission (Seigenzanka kore shōden nari 青原山下これ正傳なり): i.e., the lineage of the Sixth Ancestor's disciple Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思 (d. 740) is the main line of descent.

67 Dongshan (Tōzan 洞山): i.e., Dongshan Liangjie 洞山良价 (807-869), in the fourth generation after Qingyuan; founder of Dōgen's Caodong 曹洞 (J. Sōtō) lineage.

68 clouds and water (unsui 雲水): i.e., the monastic community.

しかあればすなはち、佛祖道の道自道他、かならず佛祖の身心あり、佛祖の眼睛あり。佛祖の骨髓なるがゆえに、庸者の得皮にあらず。

Thus, speaking of the self and speaking of the other in the way of the buddhas and ancestors always has the body and mind of the buddhas and ancestors, the eye of the buddhas and ancestors. Since it is the bones and marrow of the buddhas and ancestors, it is not the skin got by the mediocre.

INTRODUCTION

This short chapter was composed in the spring of 1245, at Dōgen's new Daibutsu Monastery in Echizen. Number 70 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō, it occurs as number 56 in the sixty-chapter compilation and number 76 in the Honzan edition (or 77 in the Iwanami and Shūmuchiō versions).

True to its title, the essay discusses several passages from Zen literature on the topic of space. Most of the piece is devoted to a line-by-line commentary on the story of the Tang-dynasty monks Shigong Huizang 石鞏慧藏 and Xitang Zhizang 西堂智藏 in conversation on how to grab hold of space. Following this, Dōgen adds some rather cursory remarks on three additional passages and ends with the advice that space be understood as “the treasury of the true dharma eye, the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa” transmitted by the buddhas and ancestors.

Empty Space

這裏是什麼處在のゆえに、道現成をして佛祖ならしむ。佛祖の道現成、おのづから嫡嫡するゆえに、皮肉骨髓の渾身せる、掛虚空なり。虚空は、二十空等の群にあらず。おほよそ、空ただ二十空のみならんや、八萬四千空あり、およびそこばくあるべし。

Due to “where are we here?” the buddhas and ancestors are made from their statements.<sup>1</sup> Because the statements of the buddhas and ancestors themselves pass from successor to successor, their skin, flesh, bones, and marrow form “the whole body” that “hangs in empty space.”<sup>2</sup> “Empty

1 Due to “where are we here?” the buddhas and ancestors are made from their statements (shari ze jūmo sho zai no yue ni, dōgenjō o shite busso narashimu 這裏是什麼處在のゆえに、道現成をして佛祖ならしむ): A tentative translation of a difficult sentence variously interpreted. Perhaps the most interesting reading might be that it is the sacred space they inhabit (“where are we here”) that makes the statements of the masters the words of buddhas and ancestors. “Where are we here?” (shari ze jūmo sho zai 這裏是什麼處在) is a fixed rhetorical question warning the interlocutor to keep the conversation at the highest level of truth, beyond dualities. It is best known, perhaps, from the retort of the monk Puhua 普化 (dates unknown), when charged with being rough by Linji Yixuan 臨濟義玄 (d. 866) (Linji lu 臨濟錄, T.1985.47:b5-6; recorded also at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏, DZZ.5:174, case 96):

這裏是什麼所在、說麤說細。

Where are we here, that we’re talking of rough and talking of fine?

An identical remark is attributed to Huangbo Xiyun 黃檗希運 (dates unknown) in the Biyan lu 碧巖錄 (T.2003.48:152c9-10; quoted by Dōgen in the first part of his “Shōbōgenzō gyōji” 正法眼藏行持).

2 their skin, flesh, bones, and marrow form “the whole body” that “hangs in empty space” (hi niku kotsu zui no konjin seru, ka kokū nari 皮肉骨髓の渾身せる、掛虚空なり): Another difficult sentence, perhaps meaning that the teachings passed down from successor to successor in the lineage (the “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow” of Bodhidharma) reverberate throughout space (like the wind chime speaking of wisdom to the winds). The expression “skin, flesh, bones, and marrow” (hi niku kotsu zui 皮肉骨髓) is commonly used by Dōgen for the essence or truth or entirety of something or someone, as handed down in the ancestral tradition of Zen; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow.” “The whole body hanging in space” evokes a verse on the wind chime by Dōgen’s teacher, Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨 (1162-1227), the first space” does not belong among the twenty aspects of emptiness, and the like.<sup>3</sup> More generally, how could emptiness be of only twenty types? There must be eighty-four thousand types of emptiness and so many more.<sup>4</sup> line of which Dōgen will quote below, section 13 (from Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄, T.2002A.48:132b15-16):

渾身似口掛虛空、不問東西南北風、一等爲他談般若、滴丁東了滴丁東。

Its whole body, like a mouth, hanging in empty space,

Without asking if the winds are from east, west, south, or north,

Equally, for them, it talks of prajñā:

3 the twenty aspects of emptiness, and the like (nijū kū tō 二十空等): A list of empty categories found in Xuanzang’s translation of the Mahā-prajñā-pāramitā sūtra (Da bore poluomiduo jing 大般若波羅蜜多經, T.220.5:13b22-26). “And the like” (tō 等) here likely indicates other such lists of emptiness, of eighteen, sixteen, etc.

4 eighty-four thousand (hachiman shisen kū 八萬四千空): A standard figure for an enormous number, as in “eighty-four thousand afflictions,” “eighty-four thousand teachings,” etc.

石鞏道の、汝還解捉得虚空麼。なんぢまた通身是手眼なりや、と問著するなり。

Shigong's words, "Can you grab hold of empty space?" are asking, "Is your body throughout hands and eyes?"<sup>6</sup>

[70:4]

西堂道の、解捉得。虚空一塊触而染汚なり。染汚よりこのかた、虚空落地しきたれり。

Xitang's words, "I can," are empty space is a single lump; touch it, and it's defiled.<sup>7</sup> After it is defiled, "empty space has fallen on the ground."<sup>8</sup>

[70:5]

石鞏道の、爾作麼生捉、喚作如如、早是變了也なり。しかもかくのごとくなりといへども、隨變而如去也なり。

Shigong's words, "How do you do it?" are "As soon as you call it such and such, it's already changed."<sup>9</sup> Nevertheless, while this may be so, following along with change, it goes thus.<sup>10</sup>

[70:6]

"Xitang pinched empty space with his hand." He "only knew how to ride on the tiger's head but not how to pull the tiger's tail."<sup>11</sup>

---

6 "Is your body throughout hands and eyes?" (nanji mata tsūshin ze shugen nari ya なんぢまた通身是手眼なりや): After the words of Daowu Yuanzhi 道吾圓智 (769-835), describing how the Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara uses his thousand hands, each with an eye in the palm. The dialogue in which the line occurs is recorded in Dōgen's shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:182, case 105) and discussed in "Shōbōgenzō Kan-non" 正法眼藏觀音. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. "His body throughout is hands and eyes."

7 "empty space is a single lump; touch it, and it's defiled" (kokū ikkai soku ni zenna 虚空一塊触而染汚): Given in Chinese, as if quoting a text, but no source is known.

8 "empty space has fallen on the ground" (kokū raku chi 虚空落地): Recalling the words of Zhaozhou Congshen 趙州從諗 (778-897) describing the time when the cypress tree becomes a buddha; in a dialogue found, for example, in the Zhaozhou lu 趙州錄 (ZZ.118:321b14-16) and discussed in "Shōbōgenzō hakujushi" 正法眼藏柏樹子.

9 "As soon as you call it such and such, it's already changed" (kan sa nyonyo, sō ze henryō ya 喚作如如、早是變了也): An oft-quoted saying attributed to Nanchan Puyuan 南泉普願 (748-835) (see, e.g., Biyan lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:199a6-7).

10 following along with change, it goes thus (zui hen ni nyo ko ya 隨變而如去也): In Chinese, as if a quotation, but no source is known. "It goes thus" translates nyoko 如去, a term used for a tathāgata ("one gone thus").

11 He "only knew how to ride on the tiger's head but not how to pull the tiger's tail" (shi e ki kotō, mie ha kobi 只會騎虎頭、未會把虎尾): A saying attributed to Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂 (803-887) (see, e.g., Yangshan Huiji chanshi yulu 仰山慧寂禪師語錄, T.1990.47:587c3).

[70:8]

西堂道、師兄作麼生。和尚也道取一半、莫全靠某甲なり。

12 "the age is so remote, I wouldn't want to bring it up with him" (nendai jin'on, fuyoku i i koji 年代深遠、不欲爲伊舉似): After another remark by Yangshan Huiji 仰山慧寂, when asked whether anyone else besides Linji received transmission from Huangbo (see, e.g., Linji yulu 臨濟語錄, T.1985.47:5a10-12; Tiansheng guangdeng lu 天聖廣燈錄, ZZ.135:684b6-8):

仰云、有。祇是年代深遠、不欲舉似和尚。

Yang said, "There was. But the age is so remote that I wouldn't want to bring it up with the Reverend."

13 "Reverend, say half; don't rely entirely on me" (oshō ya dōshu ippan, mo zen kō bōkō 和尚也道取一半、莫全靠某甲): The words of Shitou Qixian 石頭希遷 (700-790) to his master Qingyuan Xingsi 青原行思, found in various texts; here is the version recorded in shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:126, case 1):

吉州青原山弘濟禪師〈嗣大鑑、諱行思〉曾問石頭、爾從甚處來。石頭曰、曹溪來。師乃拈拂子曰、曹溪還有這箇麼。頭曰、非但曹溪、西天亦無。師曰、子莫曾到西天否。頭曰、若到即有也。師曰、未在更道。頭曰、和尚也須道取一半。莫全靠希遷。師云、不辭向汝道。恐已後無人承當。

Chan Master Hongji of Mount Qingyuan in Jizhou (succeeded Dajian, called Xingsi) once asked Shitou, "Where did you come from."

Shitou said, "From Caoxi."

The Master held up his whisk and said, "In Caoxi, do they have this?"

Tou said, "Not just Caoxi; they don't even have it in Sindh in the West."

The Master said, "Have you actually been to Sindh in the West?"

Tou said, "If I'd been there, they'd have it."

The Master said, "Not yet. Say more."

Tou said, "Reverend, you should also say half; don't rely entirely on Qixian."

The Master said, "I don't refuse to say something for you, but I'm afraid that afterwards, no one will accept it."

“Shigong grabbed Xitang’s nose and pulled it.” We should study this a bit. Shigong hid himself in Xitang’s nose; or perhaps there is a statement “the nose pulled Shigong.”<sup>14</sup> Nevertheless, while this may be so, the single ball of empty space bangs and hits.<sup>15</sup>

[70:10] {2:210}

西堂作忍痛聲曰、太殺人、拽人鼻孔、直得脱去。從來は人にあふとおもへども、たちまちに自己にあふことをえたり。しかあれども、染汚自己即不得なり、修己すべし。

“Xitang cried out in pain and said, ‘What a brute. You could pull a person’s nose right off!’” Up till now he had thought to meet another, but suddenly he was able to meet himself. Nevertheless, he cannot defile the self, he should practice the self.<sup>16</sup>

[70:11]

石鞏道、直得恁地捉始得。恁地捉始得は、なきにあらず。ただし、石鞏と石鞏と、共出一隻手の捉得なし、虚空と虚空と共出一隻手の捉得あらざるがゆえに、いまだみづからの費力をからず。

Shigong said, “That’s how you have to grab hold of it.” It is not that it is not “how you have to grab hold of it”; but, because he does not have a “grabbing hold” in which Shigong and Shigong “each extends a single hand,” or a “grabbing hold” in which empty space and empty space “each extends a single hand,” he has not made use of his own efforts.<sup>17</sup>

---

14 Shigong hid himself in Xitang’s nose (Seidō no bikū ni Shakukyō zōshin seri 西堂の鼻孔に石鞏藏身せり): From the stock phrase “to hide oneself in the nostrils” (bikū ri zōshin 鼻孔裏藏身). The term bikū 鼻孔 (“nose” or “nostrils”) is regularly used to indicate the true person, what one really is; see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Nose.”

15 bangs and hits (katsujaku chikujaku 磕著築著): Variant of the fixed expression chikujaku katsujaku 築著磕著 (“hits and bangs”; said to express the sound of stones hitting together), best known from a remark (quoted in “Shōbōgenzō ten hōrin” 正法眼藏轉法輪) of Wuzu Fayān 五祖法演 (d. 1104); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Hitting and banging.”

16 he cannot defile the self; he should practice the self (zenna jiko soku futoku nari, shu ko su beshi 染汚自己即不得なり、修己すべし): Reminiscent of the famous exchange, so often cited by Dōgen, between the Sixth Ancestor and his student Nanyue Huairang 南嶽懷讓 (e.g., at shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:178, case 101):

祖曰、還假修證否。師曰、修證即不無、染汚即不得。

The Ancestor said, “Then does it [‘the thing that comes like this’] depend on practice and verification?”

The Master [Huairang] answered, “It’s not that it lacks practice and verification, but it can’t be defiled by them.”

For the full context, see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Not defiled.”

17 “each extends a single hand” (gu shutsu isseki shu 共出一隻手): Words, alluded to elsewhere in the Shōbōgenzō, of Luoshan Daoxian 羅山道閑 (dates unknown), in a story recorded in Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:175-176, case 97):

[70:12]

おほよそ盡界には、容虚空の間隙なしといへども、この一段の因縁、ひさしく虚空の霹靂をなせり。石鞏・西堂よりのち、五家の宗匠と稱する參學おほしといへども、虚空を見聞測度せるまれなり、石鞏・西堂より前後に、弄虚空を擬するともがら面々なれども、著手せるすくなし。石鞏は虚空をとれり、西堂は虚空を覷見せず。大佛、まさに石鞏に爲道すべし、いはゆる、そのかみ西堂の鼻孔をとる、捉虚空なるべくば、みづから石鞏の鼻孔をとるべし。指頭をもて指頭をとることを會取すべし。しかあれども、石鞏、いささか捉虚空の威儀をしれり。たとひ捉虚空の好手なりとも、虚空の内外を參學すべし、虚空の殺活を參學すべし、虚空の輕重をしるべし。佛佛祖祖の功夫辨道・發心修證・道取聞聲、すなはち捉虚空なると保任すべし。

In sum, while there may be no interstices in all the worlds to accommodate empty space, this one episode has long been a thunderbolt in empty space. Ever since Shigong and Xitang, while the students of it calling themselves masters of the five houses may have been many, the ones who saw and heard, fathomed and measured empty space have been rare; although before and after Shigong and Xitang various types have thought to play with empty space, few have laid their hands on it.<sup>18</sup>

Shigong took hold of empty space; Xitang did not see empty space. Daibutsu should say this to Shigong: if taking hold of Xitang's nose before was "grabbing hold of empty space," you should have taken hold of Shigong's nose; you should understand taking hold of your finger with your finger.<sup>19</sup> Still, Shigong did understand something of the deportment of "grabbing hold of empty space." Yet, even if we are skilled at "grabbing hold of empty space," we should study the interior and exterior of empty space; we should study how to kill and give life to space; we should know the weight of space. We should maintain the understanding that the concentrated effort and pursuit of the way, the bringing forth of the mind [of bodhi], the practice and verification, the speech and the hearing, of buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor — this is "grabbing hold of empty space."

A monk asked Luoshan how much he should pay to have a stūpa built. Luoshan said,

若將三文錢與匠人、和尚此生決定不得塔。若將兩文錢與匠人、和尚與匠人共出一隻手。若將一文錢與匠人、帶累匠人眉鬚墮落。

If you offer the artisan three cash, the Reverend will definitely not get a stūpa in this lifetime. If you offer the artisan two cash, the Reverend and the artisan will each put out one hand. If you offer the artisan one cash, you'll so perplex him that the artisan's eyebrows and beard will fall off.

18 the students of it calling themselves masters of the five houses (goke no shūshō to shō suru sangaku 五家の宗匠と稱する參學): I.e., teachers in the five lineages into which Chan was organized by the Song historians who took up this topic for study.

The Master said, “I lecture with the mind.”

Mazu said, “‘The mind is like the lead actor; the intellect, like a supporting actor; the six consciousnesses make up the cast.’<sup>23</sup> How can they lecture on the sūtra?”

20 My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong (senshi Tendō kobutsu 先師天童古佛): i.e., Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨. See above, Note 2.

21 Prelate Liang of Xishan in Hongzhou (Kōshū Seizan Ryō zasu 洪州西山亮座主): Xishan Liang 西山亮 (dates unknown), a student of Mazu Daoyi 馬祖道一. “Prelate” (zasu 座主) refers to the abbot of a Teachings monastery (kyōji 教寺 or kyōin 教院) — an institution where the abbacy is restricted to members of the Tiantai school; a title implying a mastery of Buddhist learning that could invite the sarcasm of Chan masters. “Xishan” 西山 is the mountain in present-day Jiangxi province. This dialogue is found in various Chan sources, as well as Dōgen’s shinji Shōbōgenzō 眞字正法眼藏 (DZZ.5:126, case 4); see Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Prelate Liang.”

22 “The Heart Sūtra” (Shingyō 心經): i.e., the popular Bore boluomiduo xin jing 般若波羅蜜多心經 (T.251). The subsequent discussion of “the mind” here plays on the two meanings (“heart” and “mind”) of the glyph shin 心 in the sūtra title.

23 “The mind is like the lead actor” (shin nyo kōgiji 心如工伎兒): Mazu quotes here a verse in the Laṅkāvatāra-sūtra (Dasheng ru lengqie jing 大乘入楞伽經, T.672.16:620a17-18):

The Master said, “Since the mind can’t lecture, isn’t it empty space that can lecture?”

Mazu said, “In fact, it’s empty space that can lecture.”

The Master shook out his sleeves and withdrew. Mazu called after him, “Prelate.”<sup>24</sup>

The Master turned. Mazu said, “From birth to old age, it’s just this.”<sup>25</sup>

The Master thereupon had an insight. He subsequently hid himself in Mount Xi and was not heard of again.

[70:15]

しかあればすなはち、佛祖はともに講經者なり。講經はかならず虚空なり、虚空にあらざれば、一經をも講ずることをえざるなり。心經を講ずるにも、身經を講ずるにも、ともに虚空をもて講ずるなり。虚空をもて思量を現成し、不思議を現成せり。有師智をなし、無師智をなす、生知をなし、學而知をなす、ともに虚空なり。作佛作祖、おなじく虚空なるべし。

Thus, the buddhas and ancestors are all lecturers on the sūtras. Lecturing on the sūtras is invariably empty space; were it not empty space, there could be no lecturing on a single sūtra. Whether we lecture on a “mind sūtra” or we lecture on a “body sūtra,” we use empty space to lecture.<sup>26</sup> We use empty space to realize thinking and to realize not thinking.<sup>27</sup> Producing the wisdom gained with a teacher, producing wisdom gained without a teacher, producing innate knowledge, producing knowledge gained from study — all these are empty space. Becoming a buddha and becoming an ancestor must similarly be empty space.

INTRODUCTION

This short chapter was presented to the assembly in the spring of 1245, at Daibutsuji, in Echizen. Number 71 in the seventy-five-chapter Shōbōgenzō, it is number 42 in the sixty-chapter compilation and number 77 in the ninety-five-chapter Honzan edition (or 78 in the Iwanami and Shūmichō versions).

The compound term hou 鉢盂 (also read hatsuu), used for the alms bowl of the Buddhist mendicant, combines the transliteration of a Sanskrit word for “bowl” or “vessel” (pātra) with a Chinese word for “bowl” or “basin.” Along with the robe (kāṣāya), the alms bowl was one of the few possessions permitted the bhikṣu and bhikṣuṇī and, therefore, was emblematic of the renunciant status. In Zen tradition, the legend developed that, along with the kāṣāya, the ancestors passed on their pātra to their disciples. Here, Dōgen expands on that tradition, to invest the pātra with meanings that transcend the physical bowl itself and its historical understandings.

七佛向上より七佛に正傳し、七佛裏より七佛に正傳し、渾七佛より渾七佛に正傳し、七佛より二十八代正傳しきたり、第二十八代の祖師、菩提達磨高祖、みづから神丹國にいりて、二祖大祖正宗普覺大師に正傳し、六代つたはれて曹溪にいたる。傳東西、都盧五十一傳、すなはち正法眼藏涅槃妙心なり、袈裟・鉢盂なり。ともに先佛は先佛の正傳を保任せり。かくのごとくして佛佛祖祖正傳せり。

Directly transmitted from beyond the seven buddhas to the seven buddhas, directly transmitted from within the seven buddhas to the seven buddhas, directly transmitted from the whole of the seven buddhas to the whole of the seven buddhas, it was directly transmitted from the seven buddhas through the twenty-eight generations; the ancestral master of the twenty-eighth generation, the Eminent Ancestor Bodhidharma, personally entering the Land of Cīnasthāna, directly transmitted it to the Second Ancestor, Great Master Pujue, the Great Ancestor Zhengzong; passed down through six generations, it reached Caoxi. What was transmitted east and west, through fifty-one transmissions in all, was the treasury of the true dharma eye, the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa, was the kāśāya and the pātra bowl.<sup>1</sup> Each of the prior buddhas maintained the direct transmission of the prior buddhas. In this way, they were directly transmitted by buddha after buddha and ancestor after ancestor.

1 fifty-one transmissions in all (toro gojūichi den 都盧五十一傳): Some versions read “fifty-one generations” (gojūichi dai 五十一代). This figure represents the twenty-eight ancestors in India plus the twenty-three generations of ancestors from Bodhidharma’s disciple Huike 慧可 — here identified by his title, Great Master Pujue (Fukaku daishi 普覺大師) — through Dōgen’s master, Tiantong Rujiing 天童如淨 (1162-1227). “Caoxi” (Sōkei 曹溪) is Huineng of Caoxi 曹溪慧能, the famous Sixth Ancestor. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Buddhas and ancestors.”

しかあるに、佛祖を參學する、皮肉骨髓・拳頭眼睛、おのおの道取あり。いはゆる、あるいは、鉢盂はこれ佛祖の身心なり、と參學するあり、あるいは、鉢盂はこれ佛祖の飯椀なり、と參學するあり、あるいは、鉢盂はこれ佛祖の眼睛なり、と參學するあり、あるいは、鉢盂はこれ佛祖の光明なり、と參學するあり、あるいは、鉢盂はこれ佛祖の眞實體なり、と參學するあり、あるいは鉢盂はこれ佛祖の正法眼藏涅槃妙心なり、と參學するあり、あるいは、鉢盂はこれ佛祖の轉身處なり、と參學するあり、あるいは、佛祖はこれ鉢盂の縁底なり、と參學するあり。かくのごとくのとものらゝの參學の宗旨、おのおの道得の處分ありといへども、さらに向上の參學あり。

Thus, the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow, the fists and eyes, who study the buddhas and ancestors each has their own saying: there are those who understand that the pātra bowl is the body and mind of the buddhas and ancestors; there are those who understand that the pātra bowl is the meal bowl of the buddhas and ancestors; there are those who understand that the pātra bowl is the eye of the buddhas and ancestors; there are those who study that the pātra bowl is the radiance of the buddhas and ancestors; there are those who study that the pātra bowl is the true body of the buddhas and ancestors; there are those who study that the pātra bowl is the treasury of the true dharma eye, the wondrous mind of nirvāṇa, of the buddhas and ancestors; there are those who study the pātra bowl as the place where the buddhas and ancestors turn around; there are those who study the buddhas and ancestors as the rim and bottom of the pātra bowl.<sup>2</sup> While the essential points understood by such people may each have the status of a saying, there is a further understanding beyond them.<sup>3</sup>

2 the skin, flesh, bones, and marrow, the fists and eyes (hi niku kotsu zui kotō ganzai 皮肉骨髓・拳頭眼睛): I.e., the Chan masters. See Supplementary Notes, s.v. “Skin, flesh, bones, and marrow,” “Fist,” “Eye.”

the radiance of the buddhas and ancestors (busso no kōmyō 佛祖の光明): Reference to the aureola surrounding the body, one of the thirty-two marks of a buddha’s body.

the place where the buddhas and ancestors turn around (busso no tenshin sho 佛祖の轉身處): The term tenshin sho 轉身處 (also read tenjin sho; “where one turns oneself” or “turns one’s body”) occurs frequently in Chan texts for an occasion of spiritual transformation; the only instance of its use in the Shōbōgenzō.

3 have the status of a saying (dōtoku no shobun ari 道得の處分あり): I.e., qualify as a significant utterance. The sense of shobun 處分 (rendered here “status”) is open to interpretation: it could be read as “disposition” or “judgment” but also simply as “allotment” or “portion.”

4 My former master, the Old Buddha of Tiantong (senshi Tendō kobutsu 先師天童古佛): I.e., Tiantong Rujing 天童如淨, who became abbot of the Jingdesi 景德寺 on Mount Tiantong 天童山 in 1225, during Dōgen’s sojourn in China. Quoted from the Rujing heshang yulu 如淨和尚語錄 (T.2002A.48:127b1-5). The same passage is quoted in “Shōbōgenzō kajō” 正法眼藏家常。

5 Baizhang (Hyakujō 百丈): I.e., Baizhang Huaihai 百丈懷海 (749-814); his conversation occurs in several sources (see, e.g., Biyan lu 碧巖錄, T.2003.48:166c26-27). Dōgen cites Baizhang’s words several times in his Eihei kōroku 永平廣錄 (DZZ.3:92, no. 147; 3:242, no. 378; 4:30, no. 443).

6 “Daxiong Peak” (Daiyū hō 大雄峰): Another name for the location of Baizhang’s monastery, Mount Baizhang 百丈山, in present-day Jiangxi province.

7 Senior Seat Jing (Jō jōza 淨上座): A self-reference as abbot.

8 “In the end, what is it?” (hikkyō ikan 畢竟如何): Though this and the following sentence are treated here as Rujing’s final comment on the subject, they could as well be read as part of his answer to the question.

9 The Jinci pātra bowl has moved to Tiantong (Jinzu hou ika Tendō 淨慈鉢盂移過天童): A reference to Rujing’s relocation from his former post at the Jingcisi 淨慈寺 to Mount Tiantong 天童山.

should be used.<sup>10</sup> This is an extraordinary occasion. Thus, where extraordinary matters occur, the extraordinary is the pātra bowl.<sup>11</sup> Consequently, to have the four deva kings protect it and to have the dragon kings support it are the profound standards of the way of the buddhas.<sup>12</sup> Therefore, it is offered up to the buddhas and ancestors and handed down from the buddhas and ancestors.<sup>13</sup>

佛祖の堂奥に參學せざるともがらいはく、佛袈裟は、絹なり、布なり、化糸のおりなせるところなり、といふ、佛鉢盂は、石なり、瓦なり、鐵なり、といふ。かくのごとくいふは、未具參學眼のゆえなり。佛袈裟は佛袈裟なり、さらに、絹・布の見あるべからず、絹・布等の見は、舊見なり。佛鉢盂は佛鉢盂なり、さらに、石・瓦といふべからず、鐵・木といふべからず。

The types that do not study in the interior of the halls of the buddhas and ancestors say the kāṣāya of the Buddha is silk, or is linen, or is woven of transformation thread; they say the pātra bowl of the Buddha is stone, or is earthenware, or is iron.<sup>14</sup> That they say this is because they

10 extraordinary matters are due to extraordinary people (kitokuji wa, masa ni kitokunin no tame ni su beshi 奇特事は、まさに奇特人のためにすべし): Some readers take tame ni here, not as “due to,” but as “for the sake of,” and thus read, “extraordinary matters should be done for extraordinary people.” More likely, here and in the next clause, Dōgen is praising Rujing and his bowl as “extraordinary.” In the subsequent sentence, “This is an extraordinary occasion” (kore sunawachi kitoku no jisetsu nari これすなはち奇特の時節なり), the antecedent of “this” is unclear: perhaps, the combination of an extraordinary person and extraordinary implement; or perhaps, the arrival of Rujing as abbot of Tiantong.

11 the extraordinary is the pātra bowl (kitoku hou nari 奇特鉢盂なり): Or, perhaps, “it [i.e., where extraordinary matters occur] is the pātra bowl.”

12 to have the four deva kings protect it and to have the dragon kings support it (shitenno o shite goji seshime, sho ryūō o shite yōgo seshimuru 四天王をして護持せしめ、諸龍王をして擁護せしむる): Perhaps reflecting the Buddha’s prediction, found in the Lianhuamian jing 蓮華面經 (T.386.12:1075b16ff) that, when his alms bowl was broken and the Buddha dharma was threatened in Jambudvīpa, the bowl would travel to the palace of the dragon king and thence to the palace of the four deva kings, there to be protected and venerated.

13 offered up to the buddhas and ancestors (busso ni bugon shi 佛祖に奉獻し): Likely reflecting the tradition that the four deva kings give alms bowls to the buddhas (see, e.g., Mohe bore boluomi jing 摩訶般若波羅蜜經, T.223.8:221a22-25; Fo benxing ji jing 佛本行集經, T.190.3:801c23ff).

14 transformation thread (keshi 化絲): Likely a reference to the notion that the silk thread of the Buddha’s kāṣāya does not involve injury because it does not come from the mouth of the silkworm, but rather emerges as a “transformation,” or “manifestation” (ke 化), or from the mouths of “transformation girls” (kenyo 化女; presumably, females born spontaneously, rather than from the womb) on another continent. (See Fayuan zhulin 法苑珠林, T.2122.53:561a16-23; b22-c8.) In his “Shōbōgenzō den’e” 正法眼藏傳 are not yet equipped with the eye of study. The kāṣāya of the Buddha is the kāṣāya of the Buddha; there should be no further views about silk or linen; views about silk, linen, and the like, are old views.<sup>15</sup> The pātra bowl of the Buddha is the pātra bowl of the Buddha; we should not say further it is stone or earthenware; we should not say it is iron or wood.
