JAPANESE DEATH POEMS

Written by Zen Monks and Haiku Poets on the Verge of Death

compiled and with an Introduction by Yoel Hoffmann
JAPANESE DEATH POEMS
(Frontispiece). Calligraphy "Death" by Hakuin. (See p. 6.)
JAPANESE DEATH POEMS

Written by Zen Monks and Haiku Poets on the Verge of Death

compiled with an Introduction and commentary by YOEL HOFFMANN

TUTTLE Publishing
Tokyo | Rutland, Vermont | Singapore
The Tuttle Story: "Books to Span the East and West"

Many people are surprised to learn that the world's largest publisher of books on Asia had its humble beginnings in the tiny American state of Vermont. The company's founder, Charles E. Tuttle, belonged to a New England family steeped in publishing.

Immediately after WW II, Tuttle served in Tokyo under General Douglas MacArthur and was tasked with reviving the Japanese publishing industry. He later founded the Charles E. Tuttle Publishing Company, which thrives today as one of the world's leading independent publishers.

Though a westerner, Tuttle was hugely instrumental in bringing a knowledge of Japan and Asia to a world hungry for information about the East. By the time of his death in 1993, Tuttle had published over 6,000 books on Asian culture, history and art—a legacy honored by the Japanese emperor with the "Order of the Sacred Treasure," the highest tribute Japan can bestow upon a non-Japanese.

With a backlist of 1,500 titles, Tuttle Publishing is more active today than at any time in its past—inspired by Charles Tuttle's core mission to publish fine books to span the East and West and provide a greater understanding of each.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>TABLE OF CONTENTS</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Acknowledgments</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Preface</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PART ONE: Introduction</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Poetry of Japan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Death and Its Poetry in the Cultural History of Japan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Note on the Poems</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PART TWO: Death Poems by Zen Monks</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PART THREE: Death Poems by Haiku Poets</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bibliographical Notes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Index of Poetic Terms</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>General Index</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table> Wakaishu ya
shinu ga iya nara ima shiniyare hito-tabi shineba mō shinanu zo ya

O young folk—if you fear death, die now!
Having died once,
you won't die again

(Frontispiece). Calligraphy by Japanese Zen master Hakuin (1685-1768). The poem is written above the character 死 (shi, death). (Courtesy of Tanaka Dai-saburo and Graphic-sha, Tokyo.)
ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

MY DEEPEST THANKS go to Professor Mitsuda Kazunobu of Kyoto University, without whose help and advice I could not have written this book; to Mr. LaVern Lenz, with whose invaluable help this book now appears in English; to my father, Abraham Hoffmann, who read through the manuscript and offered helpful suggestions; and to my good friends, Zen master Hirano Sojo and his wife Hiroko, who opened their home to me and took me in as one of their family.

I wish to express my gratitude to the Fund for Basic Research administered by the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities and to the University of Haifa for their support of the research involved in putting together the book.

For permission to publish in translation the Zen poems anthologized in his Zenso no Yuige and Zenso no Shoji, thanks go to Dr. Furuta Shokin (b. 1911), professor of Hokkaido University and Nihon University, director of Matsugaoka Bunko founded by Daisetsu Suzuki, and author of Furuta Shokin Chosakushu (14 vols.) and other works. I also wish to thank Mr. Tanaka Daisaburo, the owner of the calligraphy by Hakuin shown in the Frontispiece, and Graphic-sha Publishing Company of Tokyo for the use of their photograph of that work.

Finally, I would like to acknowledge the assistance rendered by members of the editorial staff of the Charles E. Tuttle Company, who were able to refine many points of detail throughout the manuscript.
PREFACE

Death in itself is nothing; but we fear
To be we know not what, we know not where.
—DRYDEN

Death may indeed be nothing in itself, yet the consciousness of death is in most cultures very much a part of life. This is perhaps nowhere more true than in Japan, where the approach of death has given rise to a centuries-old tradition of writing a "death poem." Hundreds of such poems, many with a commentary describing the poet and the circumstances of his or her death, have been gathered from Japanese sources and translated here into English, the great majority of them for the first time. As poems, they share the beauty of a poetry that has already gained the admiration of the West; as death poems, they reflect important aspects of a culture that is still largely unfamiliar to many Western readers.

Part One of this book explores the tradition of writing a death poem against a detailed background of attitudes toward death throughout the cultural history of Japan. Part Two contains death poems by Zen Buddhist monks, and Part Three is an anthology of haiku, hitherto unassembled even in Japan, written by some three hundred twenty Japanese poets on the verge of death. The death poems of most of the better-known haiku poets, and many by lesser-known poets as well, are included in this last part.
Note: Throughout the book, Japanese names are rendered in traditional order, that is, surname followed by given name. Japanese words are romanized in the Hepburn system; macrons, for long vowels, are retained only in the transcriptions of the poems, to show correct syllable count.
INTRODUCTIONS
THE POETRY OF JAPAN

The earliest known examples of Japanese lyric poetry are verses found in the first records of Japanese history, the Ko-ikki (Record of ancient matters), completed in 712 A.D. Simple in structure and free of formal constraints, these verses celebrate the beauty of nature, love and longing, and loyalty to the sovereign in what seem like bursts of spontaneous expression. Japan's first anthology of poetry, the Man'yoshu (Collection of myriad words), appeared at the end of the eighth century. Containing more than four thousand poems, it seems to have been compiled by court officials, and yet, along with verses composed by emperors and noblemen, there is the work of monks, of warriors, and even of common people. It seems that the writing of poetry was not the pastime of an exclusive few with special talent, nor was it confined to any particular class. The lyricism of the Man'yoshu is simple and direct, and its themes—the beauty of nature, love and parting, wine and merrymaking, grief and sorrow over the transience of all things—have remained unchanged throughout Japan's history. The vigorous style of this early poetry, however, soon gave way to court poetry, in which artifice, wit, and subtle plays on words often overshadow strong emotions.

The poems in the Man'yoshu are of two primary forms: the tanka, "short poem," a verse of thirty-one syllables in five lines, the syllables distributed in the pattern 5-7-5-7-7; and the choka, "long poem," also consisting of five- and seven-syllable lines, but indefinite in length. In the years following the appearance of the Man'yoshu, the long form was retained only for elegies, and the tanka became the conventional form of poetry.

Throughout the Heian period (794-1185), the writing of poetry became more and more popular among the nobility. Poetic competitions were held in the emperor's court, and several anthologies of poetry were compiled. The best known of these is the Kokinshu (or Kokinwakashu, Collection of ancient and new Japanese poems), put together under the auspices of Emperor Daigo in 905. Already under the influence of Chinese culture, the poems here are more sophisticated, more trenchant, and wittier than those of the Man'yoshu. Most of them were composed by court noblemen, some by the emperor himself, and by Buddhist priests and monks. Poetry at the time of the Kokinshu had become a major occupation of noblemen and ladies of the court, poetic ability often being a means of advancement to positions of power and prestige. Inclusion of one's verses in the imperial anthology was a great distinction. In addition to anthologies published by decree of the emperor, collections of poems by single individuals appeared as well. Rival schools of poetry arose, each adhering to different aesthetic ideals, each with its own masters who guarded the "secrets of the poetic art" and passed them on to only a chosen few. Writing poetry had gradually come to require more knowledge than before, and it thus became the pastime only of those with the leisure to pursue it, the nobles.

Chinese influence on Japanese poetry began to be felt in the eighth century. Chinese culture reached a peak during the T'ang dynasty (618-907), and the Japanese eagerly adopted Chinese patterns of thought in government, philosophy, literature, and art. Members of the court and other educated people felt compelled to express themselves in the Chinese language, which enjoyed a status much like that of Latin in medieval Europe. But Chinese poetry, though much admired and studied with persistence and devotion, never effected a significant change in native forms of poetry. The Japanese merely took on, beside their traditional tanka form, a foreign genre—the kanshi, "Chinese poem." Writing poems in classical Chinese has persisted among the learned up to the present century, but it can hardly be said that the Japanese have made a significant contribution to Chinese poetry. This is understandable given the considerable difference between the Chinese and Japanese languages. Although the Japanese adopted the Chinese system of writing, and although thousands of Chinese words passed into their written and spoken language, very few Japanese poets really mastered Chinese.

Until the sixteenth century, nearly all poetry written in Japanese took the thirty-one-syllable tanka form. The development from tanka to the more well-known haiku can be understood in connection with the renga, "linked poem," which provides a kind of historical tie between the tanka and haiku structures. Toward the end of the Heian period, there had been a tendency among tanka poets to divide their poems into two units with syllabic counts of 5-7-5 (three lines) and 7-7 (two lines), each unit containing a poetic image of its own. During the fourteenth century, the renga developed alongside the tanka. Two or more poets would take part in writing renga, composing, in turns, verses of seventeen (5-7-5) and fourteen (7-7) syllables. Each such verse is linked to the preceding and following verses in accordance with strict conventions by means of images, associations, or plays on words. The results of these gatherings are "chain poems" sometimes scores of verses long—collective creations that changed the writing of poetry from an art with social functions to a genuinely social pastime.

Before long, two styles of poetry arose in the renga tradition, each differing in the class and temperament of its participants. One style tended toward rigid, formal rules, serious subject matter, and refined language, in the traditional manner of court poetry. The other, which prevailed increasingly during the sixteenth century, was formally less rigorous and more popular in tone. Poets writing haikai no renga, the latter style, made use of images drawn from everyday life, expressed simply and often humorously. This was the style adopted by Matsuo Basho (1644-94), one of the greatest of haiku poets. He and his pupils often chose to compose only the opening passage of a renga, the hokku, "opening phrase," as a verse in itself, forgoing the rest of the chain. In this manner the opening unit of seventeen syllables in three lines came to be considered a poem in its own right, and more and more poets began to test their talents with it rather than with the tanka. This shortened style was at times called haikai and later received the name it holds today—haiku.

If we except renga, a special form of "collective poetry," and the Chinese poem, which is ultimately a grafted branch of Japanese culture, we find two major forms of poetry in Japan at the beginning of the sixteenth century: the thirty-one-syllable tanka and the seventeen-syllable haiku.* These two compact structures have accounted for almost all of Japanese poetry. Even among the Japanese, however, there are those who feel that these structures are too brief to express the full range of human emotions. In the nineteenth century, when Japan opened her doors to the influence of Western culture, some Japanese poets began to experiment with foreign styles, setting no specific limits as to form and length. Traditional Japanese poetry was never abandoned, however, and though imitations of Western modes were made with varying degrees of success, none of them capture the beauty of the native forms. Today "modern poetry" in the manner of the West is written by only a few hundred Japanese, most of them from among the intelligentsia, but millions of people from all ranks of society write tanka and haiku.
It should perhaps be mentioned that there is no direct historical link between the early Zen monks whose Chinese poems are presented in Part Two of this book and the haiku poets of the sixteenth century onward, represented in Part Three. The attitude expressed by haiku poets, however, often reflects Zen Buddhist elements; indeed, many haiku poets took a deep interest in Zen Buddhism, some to the point of donning a robe and wandering up and down Japan begging rice from door to door, after the manner of Zen monks. Despite the historical gap and the consequent cultural differences, a strong spiritual kinship can be discerned between the farewell poems written in Chinese by Zen monks and many of the poems written by haiku poets. By contrast, tanka, at least with regard to death poems written in this genre, tend to reflect a rather different perception of the world. These poems are treated only in this Introduction.

In order to understand further the background of the death poetry of Zen monks and haiku poets, we shall first examine the structure of Chinese poetry, then distinguish further between the tanka and the haiku forms, and finally, discuss the peculiar characteristics of haiku.

CHINESE POETRY

There are several general principles governing classical Chinese poetry. The number of "words," that is, characters, in a line is fixed; poems of five characters per line and of seven characters per line are the most common. Most poems are rhymed and have definite patterns of tone, Chinese being a tone language. (When Chinese words entered Japanese, the tones were ignored, but Japanese writers of Chinese poetry developed systems of symbols to keep track of the tones for the purpose of writing the poems correctly.) Syntactically, the lines do not depend on one another; each line is a separate phrase. There are short poems of fixed length and longer ones that are divided more or less into verses.

Let us take as an example a poem entitled "Self-Consolation" by the poet Li Po (701-62). The poem is four lines long, each line composed of five characters. This is the poem in literal translation:

facing wine not distinguish twilight
In a free translation, we may read:

Lost in wine, I did not notice dusk descending Petals dropped and piled up on my robe
Drunk, I rise and walk the moonlit valley
The birds have gone, and people too are few.

TANKA AND HAIKU

Because most Japanese words end in one of five vowels, rhymed poetry would be very bland. Japanese poems are not in fact rhymed, but another device, the alternation of five- and seven-syllable lines, creates a rhythm peculiar to Japanese poetry.

Most tanka contain two poetic images. The first is taken from nature; the second, which may precede, follow, or be woven into the first, is a kind of meditative complement to the nature image. Tanka produce a certain dreamlike effect, presenting images of reality without that definite quality of "realness" often possessed by photographs or drawings, as if the image proceeded directly from the mind of the dreamer. The tanka poet may be likened to a person holding two mirrors in his hands, one reflecting a scene from nature, the other reflecting himself as he holds the first mirror. The tanka thus provides a look at nature, but it regards the observer of nature as well. The haiku is not merely a compact tanka: the fourteen syllables dropped from the tanka, so to speak, in order to produce a haiku, are in effect the mirror that reflects the poet. Haiku shattered the self-reflecting mirror, leaving in the hands of the poet only the mirror that reflects nature.

To demonstrate the difference between the forms, let us look at a tanka written by Ki-no-Tsurayuki (870-945), a court noble, poet, and one of the scholars who compiled the Kokinshu:

Winds passing through the shaded grove
Hana no ka ni
Koromo wa fukaku
At first sight, the poem seems to present no more than a poetic image drawn from nature, but in fact it dwells upon that image more than would be the case in haiku. As it stands the poem refers to the location of the speaker, "the shaded grove," and to the manner in which the scent of blossoms seeps into his gown (lit., whenever the wind blows). The interweaving of these elements creates a rather complex statement which cannot be grasped without some meditative effort. Were a haiku poet of seven hundred years later asked to distill this tanka into a haiku, he would probably choose the surprising image of flower scent adding to the weight of his robe, and restrict the poem to this seasonal image of spring:

My robe grows heavy with the scent of blossoms.

We can apply the same principle to the following tanka by Fujiwara-no-Yoshitsune (1169-1206). He prefaced his poem with the title "An Animal, Emblem of Love."

These days
 my inmost thoughts recall an autumn sunset when the deer's call echoes over fields.

A haiku poet might have suppressed the contemplative beginning and contented himself with the second part (the last two lines of the original):

Autumn sunset:
 a deer's call
 echoes over fields.
We conclude this demonstration with a poem by an emperor's wife, Eifuku Mon'in (1271-1342), who became a nun at the age of forty-five and dedicated her time to poetry:

Thus night fell.
Yesterday as well
the sun went down behind the mountain peaks and bells rang.

Kakushite zo
kinō mo kureshi yama-no-ha no irihi no ato ni
kane no koegoe

If we drop the philosophical opening (the first two lines of the original), we obtain the same poetic image in haiku form:

The sun goes down
behind the mountain peaks and bells ring.

THE HAIKU

The haiku is probably the shortest verse form found in either the East or the West. Most words in Japanese consist of more than one syllable, so the number of words in a haiku is remarkably small—from five to eight or nine altogether. Haiku are not rhymed; the only formal rule (which is sometimes violated) is the fixed number of syllables. Words are not usually divided between the end of one line and the beginning of the next, so each of the lines may contain from one to three words. Though a good haiku may contain more than one sentence, it always evokes only one poetic image. This image is essentially descriptive, and great clarity of vision is required of the poet in order to create it, so to speak, with only a few strokes of the brush. Since about the sixteenth century, three conventions have become universally accepted: (1) the haiku describes a single state or event; (2) the time of the haiku is the present; and (3) the haiku refers to images connected to one of the four seasons.

Let us take as an example a haiku written by Mizuta Masahide (1657-1723) after his storehouse had burned down:

Ku     ra     ya     ke     te
In the translation here, I have preserved the 5-7-5 syllable form (compare an alternate translation on p. 240):

My storehouse burned down—now nothing stands between me and the moon above.

Haiku are sometimes meticulously translated into English with exactly seventeen syllables, often at the expense of accuracy. But even when such a translation remains as true to the original as a free rendering, the poetic achievement is slight, for the reader who has not been raised in a haiku-saturated culture is unlikely to appreciate the poem's peculiar 5-7-5 beat rhythm as keenly as one who has. Other translators forgo the convention of counting syllables and replace it with another convention, rhyme. A successfully rhymed haiku may indeed contribute to the beauty of the translation, but because of the extreme brevity of haiku style, rhyming more often than not makes a jingle of the poem. The translations in this book are nearly all in free verse. The one structural precept adhered to throughout is that each haiku is translated in three lines—usually a short, a long, and a short one again. While free style lessens the number of formal constraints on the translator, it demands greater attention to the choice and arrangement of words.

Formal considerations aside, how can we account for the peculiar quality of the haiku poem? Basho, foremost among haiku poets, said, "About the pine, learn from the pine; about the reed, learn from the reed." He suggests perhaps that the poet must become unconscious of himself.
so as to see the object of his poem with absolute clarity, as it is in and of itself. A similar approach is suggested by a modern scholar, Kenneth Yasuda:

When one happens to see a beautiful sunset or lovely flower, for instance, one is often so delighted that one merely stands still. This state of mind might be called "ah-ness," for the beholder can only give one breath-long exclamation of delight: "Ah!" The object has seized him and he is aware only of the shapes, the colors, the shadows. There is here no time or place explicitly for reflection for judgments, or for the observer's feelings. . . . To render such a moment is the intent of all haiku, and the discipline of the form.¹

In haiku, then, there is an attempt to "say something without saying it." That which remains unsaid tells more than the words and yet is unclear without them. Words are used like the few lines of ink in Japanese and Chinese landscapes that emphasize the vastness of the scene. Whatever the seasonal image of a haiku, there is something in it of a wintry landscape: we cannot discern its features if an occasional point does not stand out against the snow, a point of color that puts the white view in relief. It is at this point that the haiku stands, though its significance, like that of the point in the drawing, lies in the grandeur of the surrounding scene.

Much has been said and written about the "haiku moment"—that it blurs the distinction between "subject" and "object," "self" and "other"; that in it the perception of the essential and the accidental, of the beautiful and the ugly, disappears; that it reflects things as they are in themselves. It has further been asserted that in haiku, place and time are always here and now, and yet all places and all times, no place and no time. There is without doubt something of the truth in such observations, but the point of stating them is questionable, and the harm certain. Haiku poetry resounds with endless meanings just because it so often attains that perfect simplicity sought for in philosophy, religion, literature, and art.

Darkening sea:
Umi kurete

a mallard's call kamo no koe

sounds dimly white.
honoka ni shiroshi
It is mid-winter, at twilight, and Basho stands on the seashore. Patches of light on the waves still reflect the setting sun, and wild ducks call: for Basho, sound and light merge.

The following poem, also by Basho, brings out the mystery in another seasonal image, this one related to spring. The contour is blurred, and even the little that appears is wrapped in haze:

Spring has come—a nameless mountain wrapped in mist.

Haru nare ya na mo naki yama no usugasumi

The following poem by Yosa Buson (1716-83), a painter as well as a poet, is more colorful. His is a spring image, too:

The springtime sun sets, treading on a mountain pheasant's tail.

Yamadori no
o o fumu haru no irihi kana

Kobayashi Issa (1763-1827), of whose poetry the Japanese are very fond, paints an autumn scene in which the fixed and the changing alternate:

Autumn wind:
the mountain's shadow quivering.

Akikaze ya hyorohyoro yama no kagebōshi

The next haiku, by Oshima Ryota (1718-87), contains an autumnal image ("moon," unless otherwise qualified, signifies the moon of autumn). For a fraction of a second, the gap between reality and illusion, the eternal and the momentary, closes:

Moon in the water
somersaults and streams away.

Mizu no tsuki
mondori utte nagarekeri
The haiku poet observes what others scarcely see. How many of us would have noticed what Shiba Fukio (1903-30) describes in the next poem—the split-second gap between the horse's first step and the movement of the carriage?

A barley wagon lags—then leaps behind the horse.

Finally, there are those who maintain that a poem as short as the haiku cannot convey the depth and complexity of our feelings. But hasn't Ochi Etsujin (b. 1656) captured, in the following poem, an entire "scene from a marriage"?

Autumn evening:
"Isn't it time," she comes and asks,
"to light the lantern?"
DEATH AND ITS POETRY IN THE CULTURAL HISTORY OF JAPAN

In Japan, as elsewhere in the world, it has become customary to write a will in preparation for one's death. But Japanese culture is probably the only one in the world in which, in addition to leaving a will, a tradition of writing a "farewell poem to life" (jisei) took root and became widespread. If we examine the wills left by the Japanese throughout their history, we occasionally find instructions and appeals to survivors concerning their moral or social conduct; usually, however, wills deal only with the division of property. It has been suggested, then, that the death poem is perhaps a kind of salutation. The Japanese learn hundreds of polite forms of address so as to be prepared for every possible social situation, and status and prestige are measured, to a great extent, by one's ability to find the greeting most appropriate to the circumstances. Should we then regard death poems as a final salute to those who remain alive, the last act of politeness? In fact, death poems reveal that before death, the Japanese tend rather to break the restraints of politeness that hold them back during their lifetime; we must comb through hundreds of death poems in order to find one or two written in the style customary for polite greetings. Neither material nor social concerns come to the fore. Death poems seem to reflect, more than anything else, the spiritual legacy of the Japanese.

DEATH: BELIEFS AND PRACTICES

We might well ask ourselves, first, how the Japanese think about death and dying. When one studies the history of Japan, one cannot help but notice the great extent to which the events and changes of each historical period contribute something of lasting value to the variegated whole which we call culture. Moreover, different traditions which take root first in only one class or rank of society eventually influence all other social levels as well.

As an illustration of this point I cannot resist mentioning the elderly landlady of the house in Kyoto where I stayed for several years. She had laid the foundations of her house in a ceremony conducted by a Shinto priest. The ritual fixed the orientation of the house in accordance with the dictates of Shinto gods, and a heap of stones erected in her yard is a symbol of their presence. Though the woman herself had been married in a Shinto ceremony, her daughter was married in a Christian church, and her close relatives were buried in the cemetery of a Buddhist temple. On the wall of her room a Buddhist family altar (butsudan) is fixed, bearing the names of her dead ancestors. She brings rice and other offerings to them in small dishes, a custom with roots in Shinto. Once a month a Buddhist priest comes to her house to offer prayers to her ancestors in the belief that if their spirits remain at peace, they will influence her life to the good (also from Shinto). As one who respects her forebears both living and dead, and who thus fulfills the first precept of a moral life (a Confucian concept), she hopes to be reborn after death in the Pure Land in the West, the Buddhist paradise. Every Sunday she goes to a nearby Christian church and offers a prayer to Jesus. And thus one elderly woman pays deep respect to each and every one of the many guests and residents that have made their way throughout history into the "open house" of Japanese culture-Shinto deities, various avatars of Buddha, Confucian ancestors, and the God of Christianity. It is precisely this generous spirit of the Japanese, who without qualms embrace one idea and its opposite at once, that reveals a deeper understanding, an understanding that life and death cannot be formulated in a single idea, because reality is more complex than any logic, and at the same time so much more simple.

In the Japanese language, use of the stark term "death" (shi) in reference to individuals is rare. The Japanese refer, rather, to the particular kind of death: shinju, lover's suicide; junshi, a warrior's martyrdom for his lord; senshi, death in war; roshi, death from old age; etc. These expressions link the death to the kind of life led by the person and to the circumstances of his death. It is common to refer to the deceased as a Buddha (hotoke), a reminder of the belief that death purifies a person from the ignorance and lust that sully mankind.

Many Japanese prepare for death as soon as they feel their time is near. A will is written to settle the distribution of property and keepsakes among relatives and friends. For the most part, these arrangements take place in an atmosphere of serenity, with almost pleasurable expectation of the voyage to the next world. These preparations do not merely reflect a realistic attitude toward circumstances; they also inspire calmness in the dying, allowing them to settle spiritual accounts and to ask pardon for past misdeeds. Orthodox Buddhists about to die sometimes copy sacred scriptures, usually the Hannya-Shin-gyo, a collection of late Buddhist writings expounding the doctrine that the essence of all things is emptiness, or void. Many people, and principally those who have cared for poetry, then write their death poems, sometimes in their very last moments.

Much importance is attached to funeral ceremonies. The dead person whose funeral has not been properly performed is liable, the Japanese believe, to have difficulty crossing over to the world beyond and may therefore plague the living. If a person has been killed, the murderer must be seized and punished, lest the victim's vengeance-seeking spirit haunt the scene of its death or the house of its relatives. Today, burial in the ground is practiced mainly in rural areas where land is relatively abundant; in most regions of the country, however, cremation is the rule. Whether the corpse is burned or buried, the location of the grave is of great importance: land on which one's family has lived for generations is preferred.

According to Japanese tradition, the deceased does not pass over immediately to a world from which no return is possible. One belief is that the spirit of the dead person remains near the world of the living for forty-nine days; another is that the spirit hovers on the borders of the world of the living for some decades and only then, if all goes well, does it merge into the greater order of the cosmos. This accounts for the popular belief that contact can be made between the living and the dead. Up to recent times, the Japanese have believed in the power of female mediums (miko) who call the dead on behalf of the living. Most Japanese address their dead, either at the gravesite or at the family altar in the home, and simply talk to them. They tell them of marriages, births, and deaths in the family, include them in joyful occasions, complain to them about other members of the family and even—who knows?—heed their advice.

The Bon Festival, which is celebrated in midsummer, is essentially a Buddhist holiday. However, it includes some elements of Shinto, and is imbued with the Confucian spirit of reverence for one's ancestors. During the holiday, people return to their place of birth, visit family graves, and pray for the peace of the souls of their ancestors. At the time of the Bon Festival, as during the celebration of New Year's Day and the equinoxes, it is said that the spirits of the dead return to their ancestral homes to see how their relatives are faring. In preparation for this, an effigy of a horse is made from eggplants, cucumbers, and reeds and is put on the family altar. The dead arrive on the back of the horse, and when the holiday is over, they return to their world in small wood and paper boats bearing a lighted candle, which are set to sail on bodies of water.

Students of Japanese culture cannot fail to discover that for the Japanese, the group often takes precedence over the individual. The group is usually the family, those tied by blood relationships, but the concept of the group widened in the course of time to include the clan, and later, the entire nation as represented by the emperor or the shogun. As the group is most important in life, it is the group that grants the Japanese his existence in the afterlife as well. The notion of an individual salvation has relatively little place in the Japanese view of death. (Religions in Japan do not present the picture, so familiar in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, of the deity as a force superior to nature, observing the individual and judging him after death for his most private thoughts.) In Western societies, the idea that dying is a purely personal matter may be the cause of the near taboo on the very subject of death, much like the taboo on the subject of sex. The Japanese belief that even death is a group-related event reduces, perhaps, the fear of dying, for the dead remain, as it were, within the boundaries of this world and continue to share in the daily lives of their relatives.

So far only a few of the many Japanese customs and beliefs concerning death have been mentioned. What are some of the historical and cultural sources of these views? We can still find in Japan today the remains of huge mausoleums built for rulers and nobles in the first centuries A.D. No written records exist from this early period, but archeological findings indicate that the ancient inhabitants of the Japanese islands viewed death as various forms of voyage, whether underground, into the mountains, beyond the horizon of the sea, or into the sky. The magnificent tombs were built, apparently, to house the deceased upon their return from the "voyage of death."

The earliest written source of knowledge about the Japanese perception of death is the Kojiki. Life is portrayed in this work as teeming activity, a scene of violent clashes among intensely strong forces of fertility and creation. It is the story of godlike men and women who receive their vitality from nature spirits. Death is the gray side of the picture—a dark, polluted, and fearful plane. We find in the Kojiki an account of a visit to the realm of the dead—a story which mirrors in many ways that of Orpheus. Izanagi and Izanami are brother and sister who marry one another by command of the gods. Themselves deities, they create, so says the ancient myth, the islands of Japan. Izanami gives birth from various parts of her body to many gods, including those of rivers and seas and those of trees and hills. After delivering the god of fire, she dies. The grief-stricken Izanagi journeys to Yomi, the land of the dead, where he finds her and entreats her to come back with him. She replies that she cannot, for she has "eaten of the furnace" of Yomi. Nevertheless, she promises to speak with the gods of Yomi about her wish to return with Izanagi, imploring him not to look upon her in the meanwhile. He breaks this taboo and sees her body, in which "maggots were squirm-ing." Izanagi returns alone to the land of the living and performs a rite of purification.

This myth acquaints us with beliefs about death in the centuries preceding the compilation of the Kojiki. Scholars disagree as to whether Yomi represents merely the burial place of the dead in underground rock-chambers, or a separate subterranean land. The dead seem to wander freely from place to place as do the living, but one is forbidden to look at them. Corpses arouse feelings of pollution, of uncleanness. This attitude of death as "unclean" reflected in the Kojiki remains alive even today in, for example, the practice of sprinkling salt over oneself after one returns home from a funeral. Shinto priests rarely conduct funeral services, and when, occasionally, a Shinto burial does take place, the officiating priest is considered unclean for three days thereafter.

Reflecting an altogether different approach to death, another hero of the Kojiki, a semi-legendary figure named Yamato Takeru-no-Mikoto (second cent. A.D.?) turns into a great white bird when he dies. His wife and children chase after the bird over sea and shore, cutting their feet on bamboo stumps and singing songs of mourning all the while. Other heroes dive into lakes like water birds and disappear.

It would seem that at this stage of their culture, the Japanese had not yet formulated clear-cut ideas about death and the life beyond it. In both the Kojiki and the Man'yoshu different depictions of the afterlife occur side by side: as a descent into Yomi, as an ascent into the skies, as a voyage by sail on the ocean, or as a journey into the mountains. In the latter work, the dead are also represented by clouds and mist, reflecting, perhaps, the newly introduced custom of cremation. The conception of the land of the dead as a subterranean realm most certainly arises from the practice of burying corpses in the ground. The inhabitants of one area of Japan, present-day Shimane Prefecture, even believed that a certain large boulder found there covered the entrance into Yomi. Remains of human skeletons and other bones used in rites of augury have been found together near this rock, suggesting that it was the site of ceremonies to conciliate spirits or the dead. Elsewhere, in prehistoric graves of southern Asia, boats were drawn either in the shape of birds or with birdlike prows; sometimes the oarsmen themselves were pictured in bird costumes. Bird bones have been found resting on the chests of ancient human skeletons, and the Kojiki alludes to a custom whereby mourners dress up as birds. The evidence suggests, then, that the ancient Japanese believed that the dead turned into birds, or perhaps that birds carried them to another world. To this day it is thought that ravens embody the souls of the dead, and that the cuckoo is a harbinger of death. Many death poems reflect these beliefs.

Where did the ancient Japanese, a largely maritime people, send their dead? The "birds of death" sailed sometimes from the eastern shore, sometimes from the western one, out toward the horizon where sea and sky meet. Did the prehistoric Japanese, who were sun-worshipers, believe that the huge fiery ball which rose from the sea every morning or sank beneath it at night (depending on the position of the region, either on the Pacific Ocean or on the Sea of Japan) was the destination of their dead? Traces of a belief that the land of the dead lies over the sea can still be found in the ceremonies of the Bon Festival, during which, as previously mentioned, the dead who have come to visit their relatives return in small paper boats that the living set sail upon bodies of water.

Of all the beliefs concerning death in ancient Japan, however, the most persistent is that which connects it to mountains. From the very beginning mountains were considered the dwelling-places of gods, and were held sacred as such. The summits of mountains were sites for Shinto shrines and, later, for Buddhist temples. Might the ancient Japanese have seen in mountain peaks the points of contact between the gods, who originate in the sun, and men, who dwell on the ground? The Japanese word for Shinto gods is kami, which signifies "the top" as well—a hint, perhaps, that the gods look out from mountain peaks below to the narrow plains inhabited by people.
Not death, however, but life is the province of Shinto gods. In parts of northern Japan, mountain deities are worshiped also as gods of birth, and in Aomori Prefecture, also in the north, maturation ceremonies for youths are held in the mountains. There is evidence in classical literature that mountain sites were chosen for betrothal ceremonies as well. It is believed in many areas in Japan that in spring, mountain gods become gods of the field and descend to the plains to protect crops, returning to their mountain homes only in autumn after the harvest. Mountains are thus both the source of life and the place to which life returns. No wonder then that the Japanese, wishing to draw near to this source even in death, preferred to bury their dead some distance from their villages, high up in the mountains. There, where the gods dwell, the dead dwell also, overseeing the habitations of the living. This accounts for the belief, still strong among the Japanese today, that at least the first part of the death journey leads through mountains. Until recently, the dead were even dressed in straw sandals in anticipation of the walk over "Death Mountain" (shide no yama). And like other such beliefs, the one representing death as a mountain journey is reflected in many death poems.

The outlook of the ancient Japanese, then, was basically optimistic. The Buddhist message that the world is a fleeting illusion had not yet reached their ears: this life is a substantial reality, drawing its vitality from gods who reside in nature. The unbridgeable abyss between life and death had not yet opened up, and the dying apparently believed that they would return, by one means or another, to the land of the living.

At the end of the seventh century, Buddhism spread to Japanese soil. The Japanese began to cremate their dead, the smoke rising from their bodies symbolizing the birth of a new perspective on death. This world was no longer the best of all possible worlds, but a polluted one from which the dead soar to another place, the Pure Land (jodo) in the West, ruled by Amida, the Buddha of Everlasting Light. Early Buddhist writings contain blood-chilling descriptions of the many and cruel torments awaiting the wicked after death—but the Japanese, in the innocent and optimistic manner so characteristic of them, soon found the means of salvation: it would be sufficient to call Buddha's name before dying in order to be saved from hell. Moreover, dying itself was seen as a process of purification and atonement; at death, everyone became a Buddha.
In the early part of the ninth century, Buddhist philosophy strengthened its hold on Japanese culture. Some Japanese, braving great hardships, sailed to China and studied for years at the feet of Chinese sages for the sole purpose of understanding sacred teachings. Chinese religious teachers and scholars were received like royalty in Japan, and monks founded sects in monasteries built atop high mountain peaks. Buddhism soon found its way into the nobility. Emperors abdicated their thrones to retire within monastery walls; noblewomen shaved their heads and became Buddhist nuns. Writers of the Nara (710-94) and Heian (794-1185) periods never wearied of likening man's life to that of a flower which scarcely blossoms before withering, to dewdrops that evaporate at sunrise, or to a fading illusion or dream. Fleetingness characterized not only the outward forms of nature, but also inward nature; nothing is fixed, nothing is stable. The great literary works of the Heian period, most notably the Genji Monogatari (The tale of Genji) by Murasaki Shikibu (c. 978-c. 1014) and the diaries of court ladies, all describe the world of men and nature alike as a dream or a phantasm.

The Japanese love for nature, however, precluded any escape into abstraction; that which is formless and colorless has no solace for the heart. The idea of transience, expressed in the Buddhist literature of India by the sight of putrefying corpses and rotten food, is conveyed by the Japanese through images of the changing seasons. Though there be no metaphysical salvation in the spectacles of nature, these afford at least a kind of aesthetic salvation. Sights of winter and autumn fill one with melancholy; sights of spring with sorrow for the dying blossoms. And though we may find mention here and there of the eternal peace that lies beyond the world of the senses, the Japanese docs not believe, in the depths of his heart, in a world with no spring and no autumn. Grief for the ephemeral gives way to resignation and even to full acceptance of the transient nature of things. It is therefore understandable that the Japanese should pursue, during the Heian period, the Tendai branch of Buddhism, which holds the entire world to be Buddha, with Buddha's nature dwelling everywhere—in mountains, rivers, grass, and trees. Scholars avidly studied Chinese Taoist philosophy, which sees the source of man's being in nature with its changing seasons. Furthermore, the Japanese managed to temper Buddhism's fundamental pessimism with elements from Shinto. In the Buddhist literature of Japan even the Pure Land in the West is often described as a land of beautiful natural scenery.
Some Western scholars, perhaps with a trace of Christian condescension, have called Japanese mysticism "natural," distinguishing it from "spiritual" mysticism. And yet how wise and humane is the culture that docs not contrive an otherworldly supreme being to rule this world, the only one we know. One might ask what there is to be gained from a "spiritual" sovereign who disturbs the peace of man with commands to act one way or another, promising in exchange an eternal world where scent, shape, and color never enter. Indeed, even today the Japanese share a deep identification with nature. This is not nature as understood by Western religions, the work of a creator who stands apart from his work, but nature bursting with vitality, appearing and disappearing in cycles of life and death, of summer and winter, spring and fall. The Japanese aspire to clarity of awareness, as of a mirror reflecting natural phenomena in its many forms. And anyone who has seen a Japanese stand silently for a good hour to view the blossoming cherries in spring and the reddening maples in fall, or to gaze at the full moon in the autumn sky, knows that this is no mere gesture of aesthetic appreciation, but an act of worship.

During the Kamakura period (1185-1392), the government of Japan passed from the nobles to the class of the warriors, or samurai, and the world view of the latter gradually came to dominate Japanese culture. Alongside the lyrical images of flower, dew, and dream so favored by the nobility, there appeared a somewhat contradictory idea of life as the scene of heroic deeds and unswerving loyalty to one's lord. The mosaic of samurai-class attitudes prevalent from the twelfth to the nineteenth centuries abounds with seemingly incongruous notions: that the world is like a dream; that the Pure Land in the West awaits believers; that the highest virtue is faithfulness to the clan and its ruler.

The sources of some of these beliefs can be found, in part, in the several schools of Buddhist thought which flourished during the Kamakura period. Among the samurai class, the Jodo, or Pure Land, sects of Buddhism were the most followed, but the elite of the samurai developed a taste for Zen Buddhism as well. This was due not only to the exotic attractions or zen, but also to its more "masculine" approach to life. Zen recognizes, in contrast to other Buddhist sects, no higher external power. The solution to life's enigma is to be found not outside oneself, but within, in one's mind. One must purify one's consciousness and see reality as it is, in its "suchness." And pure reality, as seen through an enlightened mind, docs not admit of such polarites as "life" and "death."

The well-known method of suicide of the samurai, seppuku, or harakiri (lit., splitting the stomach), often followed from a commitment to certain elements of Zen philosophy. Judaism, Christianity, and Islam all forbid their followers to kill themselves, suicide being looked upon as rebellion against divine will. Instead of divine will, Buddhism conceived of karma—fate as determined by a man's own character and past actions. If one's karma has brought one to the verge of death, what is more natural than to seal one's present existence—which is no more than a single scene in a many-act play of metamorphoses—with a courageous deed that will insure better karma in the next incarnation? In the eyes of a Zen Buddhist, suicide of this sort may even indicate enlightenment, since one who sets no store by either life or death is likely to be liberated from the karmic cycle of births and deaths.

That many samurai leaders in the Kamakura period leaned toward Zen is reflected clearly in their death poems, some of which are translated below. However, sacrificing one's life for one's lord or for the clan is also a Confucian ideal. The individual who dies "appropriately," according to all the rites and ceremonies, sanctifies the name of the entire group. Thus, even a person who has been a "black sheep" during life is taken back, at death, into the bosom of the "family." The tendency to surround self-imposed death with a halo of beauty is seen not only with the suicide of samurai, but that of lovers as well. Death by suicide was condoned for those caught in dilemmas from which they could not otherwise extricate themselves. Through death, one could cleanse oneself of misdeeds committed and vindicate the social order that had been violated.

There is in suicide, it is true, an element of outright rebellion against the society that has caused the individual's failure. Lovers' suicide protests class inequality or the conservatism of the marriage institution which prevents the consummation of the couple's love. A student who fails protests, with suicide, against teachers, family, or friends; a corrupt employee, against employers; and parents who kill themselves along with their children, against the society that has not enabled them to live honorably. But though the act of suicide is by nature a protest, the Japanese tend to look upon it with a forgiving eye. Perhaps because suicide victims turn their anger not upon society, but upon themselves, they end up sanctioning, when all is said and done, the status quo.

To return to the discussion of the samurai's attitude toward death, especially as this attitude had developed by and during the Edo period (1600-1867), a work known as Hagakure (Hidden by leaves, c. 1716) is mentioned. This is a collection of heroic adventures and sayings gathered over many years by the scholar and poet Yamamoto Tsunetomo (1659-1719). In the author's view—perhaps the most extreme expression of this attitude—the key feature in the way of the samurai is his ability to die. The samurai, says Yamamoto, ought to "die like a madman": if once he lets even the shadow of common sense enter his consciousness, he will choose to live and will be unable to sacrifice his life for his lord "with a pure spirit." The doctrine of dying like a madman deviates even from the most extreme teaching of Confucianism, whose motivation for devotion to the family or the clan is the wish to base the social order, however conservative it may be, on foundations of reason. Hagakure seemed too radical even for Japan's feudal rulers, who banned it several times.

The same spirit of uncompromising fanaticism that appears in the life histories and death poems of samurai near the end of the Edo period can be felt among the monarchists and nationalists of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Indeed, during the decades prior to World War II, such extremists held the words of Hagakure to be the purest expression of loyalty to the emperor. The fanatic acts of suicide committed by the best of Japan's young men—crashing planes loaded with bombs into Allied warships—in a sense merely continued the samurai tradition of dying for one's ruler. Many of the youths undoubtedly believed they would win eternal life in Buddhist or Shinto fashion, but it was not this that motivated them so much as doing their duty to their fatherland and their emperor. They saw no point in living on in a world where their godlike ruler had been defeated.

Much of the responsibility for their deaths (the authorities knew even before the missions set out that Japan's fate in the war was sealed) must go to the Japanese government's propaganda machine, which produced books, including children's books and textbooks, containing stories about warriors dying a martyr's death and quoting death poems of bravery and resignation to fate. (The youths who died in suicide units often left death poems, as did most of the officers of the Japanese army.) I shall quote only one example from the many pieces of propaganda of the day. Toward the end of the war, a government publishing house issued a book entitled Nihon-jin no Shiseikan (The view of the Japanese of life and death). The author, a professor in a government university and previously a member of the Foreign Office, presents accounts of warriors' deaths from the history and literature of Japan, some of which exceed the bounds of good taste. For example, in the chapter on "Life and Death as Perceived by Japanese Parents," the author quotes a ballad from the eighteenth century that tells of a young warrior who falls in battle for his lord. The youth's father turns to the weeping mother and says, "Be happy, woman! Your son has died for a good cause." "Thus," continues the author, "should a Japanese father behave when his beloved son dies for the emperor."

It is perhaps no great wonder that the attitude of the samurai (and the suicide pilot) has received more attention than other views of death found in Japan. It should be remembered, however, that this attitude has been only one influence in the "typical" Japanese view of dying.

EARLY DEATH POEMS

Historically, most death poems have been in tanka form, those composed by the court nobility refined and delicate, and those by warriors more "masculine," often reflecting feelings of intense loyalty to the feudal lord or the nation. Later, Chinese death poems were written by Buddhist monks and priests, by scholars of Chinese literature, and to a fair extent by samurai. Death poems in haiku form, appearing first in the sixteenth century, have been written by Japanese from all levels of society. The writing of death poems as a widespread practice, however, began during the Meiji period (1868-1912).

Poems written just before death appear in the most ancient Japanese sources, including the Kojiki, the Man'yoshu, and the Kokinshu. The earliest example of a death poem seems to be that of Yamato Takeru-no-Mikoto, the hero of the Kojiki who turned into a white bird upon his death. Fatigued by adventures of conquest against various gods, he falls to his deathbed; realizing the malady is fatal, he sings:

```
The sabre-sword Otome no
```
which I placed at the maiden's bed-side,

alas!

that sword!

"As soon as he had finished singing," says the text, "he died."\(^4\) Previous chapters tell how the sword had been found inside the tail of a dragon, and how Yamato Takeru-no-Mikoto had left it in the house of Miyazuhime-no-Mikoto, who later became his wife. The exact meaning of the song is unclear. Is the hero lamenting the loss of the sword, a sacred symbol of Japan's imperial house? Or does his grief stem from having to part with his loved one?

Some of the tanka in the Man'yoshu, several of which are translated below, are more distinctly death poems. One is that of Kakinomoto-no-Hitomaro, who lived near the end of the seventh century or the beginning of the eighth. Though Hitomaro is considered the best of the poets whose works appear in the Man'yoshu, and though the Japanese style him "the father of Japanese poetry," little is known about his life. A nobleman, he served two emperors in various posts, but his principal role seems to have been that of court poet. He accompanied the emperor on journeys of state and composed laudatory poems in his honor. In addition to those dedicated to the emperor and his retinue, he wrote poems about parting, grief, journeys, love, and the like. The tanka known as his death poem bears the title "In Iwami Province, About to Die." The woman of the poem is perhaps one of his wives, Yosami-no-Otome, herself a poet.

Not knowing that my body lies upon Mount Kamo's rocks,

my love

awaits me.

The power struggles of the time often brought men of the imperial family to a tragic end. Prince Arima (640-58), for instance, was sentenced to death for alleged treason. On the way to Iwashiro (Wakayama Prefecture), where he was executed, Arima ties two pine boughs together and sings, as recorded in the Man'yoshu:

\[ \text{Not knowing} \quad \text{Kamo-yama no} \]
\[ \text{that my body lies} \quad \text{iwane shi makeru} \]
\[ \text{upon Mount Kamo's rocks,} \quad \text{ware o kamo} \]
\[ \text{my love} \quad \text{shirani to imo ga} \]
\[ \text{awaits me.} \quad \text{machitsutsu aruramu} \]
If fate agrees Iwashiro no
I shall return hamamatsu ga e o to Iwashiro's coast hikimusubi and see the pine boughs masakiku araba
I united. mata kaerimimu

A similar fate overtook Prince Otsu (663-86), the third son of Emperor Temmu (d. 686) and second in line to the throne. When his father died, Otsu was accused, apparently unjustly, of conspiring to the throne, and was sentenced to death. Otsu had a reputation for nobility of character, and his execution caused great sorrow among his contemporaries. More than anything he did while alive, however, it was the poem he said before his death that won him his place in history:

This is the last day Momozutau
I shall see the mallards Iware-no-ike ni crying over Lake Iware. naku kamo o
Then shall I disappear kyō nomi mite ya into the clouds. kumogakurinamu

In the early part of the Heian period, as new Buddhist sects arose in Japan with the return from China of students of Buddhism, life began to be depicted in poetry as an ephemeral illusion. Here is a poem of Minamoto-no-Shitago (911-83), a nobleman, a scholar, and one of his age's foremost poets:

This world— Yononaka o to what may I liken it? nani ni tatoemu To autumn fields aki no ta o lit dimly in the dusk honoka ni terasu by lightning flashes. yoi no inazuma

It was the flower, however, that came to be the principal symbol of the fleetingness of man's existence. Death was not referred to by means of a corpse, but was likened to wilting flower petals. The short-lived blossom represents the powerlessness of life before death and the delusion in our aspiration to live forever. Yet the flower also symbolizes beauty. Japanese poetry regards the world through the change of seasons with longing and sorrow—longing for the renewal of spring after fall and winter, and sorrow that the blossoming cherries should last so short a time. It is natural, then, that the death poems of the Heian period are strewn with images of flowers.

The following story appears in the Heike Monogatari (The talc of the Heike), a collection of stories about heroic warriors written in the latter half of the twelfth century. Taira-no-Tadanori (1144-84) was in command of the western flank of the army of the Heike (Taira) clan when Okabe Tadazumi, a warrior of the Genji (Minamoto) clan, overtook him on the battlefield. Tadazumi galloped alongside Tadanori and grappled with him. Tadanori, however, overpowered Tadazumi and was about to cut off his head when one of Tadazumi's retainers drew his sword and cut off Tadanori's right arm. Tadanori pushed Tadazumi aside and said, "Stay away from me! I wish to say the death prayer!" He turned toward the west and chanted a Buddhist prayer. Then Tadazumi approached him from behind and beheaded him. Tadanori's death poem, which he carried with him into battle as was the way among warriors, was found fasted to his quiver. The poem is entitled "A Flower at a Traveler's Inn":

Overtaken by darkness
I will lodge under the boughs of a tree.
Flowers alone
host me tonight.

Yukikurete
ko-no-shita kage o yado toseba hana ya koyoi no
aruji naramashi

The same epic tells the story of Minamoto-no-Yorimasa (1104-80), a nobleman and general who served eight emperors. He is famous as the soldier-hero who defeated a monstrous bird that threatened the imperial palace; he is also considered one of the best poets of his time. The army of the Genji clan, which Yorimasa led, was defeated in a great battle, and Yorimasa, wounded by an arrow in his knee, decided to kill himself. He summoned his retainer Tonau and ordered him to strike off his head, but Tonau wept bitterly and refused to do so. Yorimasa turned to the west, chanted, "I put my trust in Amida Buddha," and spoke these words:
Like a rotten log half-buried in the ground—
my life, which has not flowered, comes to this sad end.

Umoregi no hana saku koto mo nakarishi ni mi no naru hate zo kanashikarikeru

Then he pierced his sword deep into his abdomen and died. Weeping, Tonau cut off his master's head and, lest it fall into the hands of the victorious enemy, sank it in the river.

A flower image appears as well in the death poem of Saigyo (1118-90), one of Japan's most famous tanka poets. A warrior and a nobleman, Saigyo became a Buddhist monk at the age of twenty-nine. He was a leading figure in the poetic circles of his time, and his style greatly influenced Basho, who lived five centuries later. Saigyo's death poem presents a scene during the second lunar month, when cherry trees blossom and memorial services for the Buddha's death are held:

I wish to die in spring, beneath the cherry blossoms, while the springtime moon is full.

Negawaku wa hana no shita nite haru shinamu sono kisaragi no mochizuki no koro

DEATH POEMS OF SAMURAI

While early warriors expressed their view of the ephemeral world in terms of flowers, the death poems of the samurai of the Kamakura period and later employ a rather different vocabulary, influenced to a great extent by Zen Buddhism. Most samurai of the time lived and died by the sword, differing in this respect from Zen monks. But many of their death poems are Chinese poems, similar in form and content to those written by Zen monks. To illustrate, there follow four stories from the Taiheiki (Chronicle of grand pacification), an anthology of heroic adventure stories with historical references, probably compiled in the middle of the fourteenth century.
Toshimoto took out of his robe a scroll of paper and, after wiping his neck with it, spread it out and wrote his death poem:

> From ancient times the saying comes, "There is no death; there is no lure."
> Indeed, the skies are cloudless
> And the river waters clear.*

Toshimoto then laid down his brush and smoothed his hair with his hand. At that very moment, the blade of the sword flashed behind him; his head fell forward and his body followed, covering the head.

*   *   *   *

Suketomo sat upright on an animal pelt and wrote a farewell poem in praise of Buddhist truth:

> All five manners* of my fleeting form
> And its four elements† return to naught—
> I put my neck to the unsheathed sword.
> Its cut is but a breath of wind.

He wrote the date, signed his name, and laid the brush beside him. Then the executioner approached from behind, and Suketomo's head fell forward onto the animal pelt, his body still holding itself upright.

*   *   *   *

Minamoto-no-Tomoyuki sat upright on an animal pelt, took out his inkstone, and calmly wrote his death poem:

> For two and forty years
> I wavered between life and death.
> Now hills and rivers overturn.
> The earth and sky return to nothingness.

Beneath the poem he wrote, "The nineteenth of the tenth month," and signed his name; then he put his brush aside, crossed his arms, and straightened his back. The executioner came around behind him and in an instant his severed head fell forward.

*   *   *   *
Shiaku Sho'on was a monk at the time of his death, though he was, by origin, a samurai. After the defeat of his lord's army, he preferred to die as a warrior rather than retire, as a monk would have done, from "the vanity of this world." His eldest son having already committed suicide, the younger son, Shiro, requests to do likewise. Shiaku stops him and says:

"Wait a while. It is not proper that a son should die before his father. When I am dead, you, too, may die." Shiro sheathed his dagger and knelt before his father, who looked down on him and laughed approvingly. Then Shiaku ordered that a monk's stool be put near the middle gate and sat upon it cross-legged. He took out his ink-stone and wrote his death poem:

\[
\text{The sharp-edged sword, unsheathed,} \\ \text{Cuts through the void—} \\ \text{Within the raging fire} \\
\text{A cool wind blows.}
\]

He then folded his arms, bent his head forward, and ordered: "Strike!" Shiro, stripped to the waist, struck off his father's head; then setting his sword upright, he thrust it to the hilt into his own stomach and fell forward on his face, dead. Three retainers who had been watching ran forward and threw themselves on the same blade, falling with their heads together like fish on a skewer.

Such are the stories of seppuku as they appear in one account, although we must not forget, of course, the alterations made when the event is described in folklore and literature.

In addition to poems in the Chinese tradition, warriors also wrote tanka death poems. Many of these poems, too, are tinged with the spirit of Buddhism.

Ota Dokan (1432-86), a scholar of military arts and a poet, was stabbed as he was bathing. Clutching the dagger that pierced his body, he uttered the following tanka and died:

\[
\text{Had I not known} \quad \text{Kakaru toki} \\
\text{that I was dead} \quad \text{sa koso inochi no}
\]
Chikamasa was a pupil of the well-known master Ikkyu Sojun (1394-1481). According to folklore, Chikamasa was greeted at the hour of his death by the three Buddhas of the past, the present, and the future, riding on purple clouds with twenty-five escorts. Chikamasa first ordered his son to bring him his weapons, then shot an arrow at the Buddha in the center. The warrior thus showed his contempt for the celestial retinue and his unconcern for the world to come. Before his death, Chikamasa said this poem:

One day you are born you die the next—today, at twilight,
autumn breezes blow.

Ouchi Yoshitaka (1507-51) was a samurai general and ruler of most of the island of Kyushu. He was a man of good character who developed commercial relations with China and Korea, and his domain became a center of liberal culture in which warriors and noblemen from other regions sought refuge. It is said that he met twice with the leader of the first Jesuit missionaries to Japan, St. Francis Xavier, and even allowed him to preach in his province. In 1551 one of his generals rebelled and overpowered his army. Before committing suicide, Yoshitaka composed a death poem, the last lines of which are taken from a Chinese translation of the Buddhist scripture Kongo-gyo (Diamond sutra), which teaches that the essence of all is void:

Both the victor and the vanquished are but drops of dew, but bolts of lightning—
thus should we view the world.
But not all death poems of this war-torn period, from the middle of the fifteenth to the end of the sixteenth centuries, were written in a Buddhist mood. Many warriors left to the world hearts burning with fanatic loyalty to their clan, and this fanaticism often overshadowed any religious spirit.

A warrior called Akaboshi was a vassal to Ryuzoji Takanobu (1529-84). The latter suspected Akaboshi of wishing to rebel against him and so took two of his children, a girl of eight years and a boy whose age is not given, as hostages. Takanobu eventually crucified them. The soldier in charge of the execution turned the children westward (toward paradise), his eyes brimming with tears. Before dying, the boy, Shinroku, asked, "Where is my homeland?" "Toward the east," answered the soldier, whereupon the child replied with this poem:

Please don't face me toward the west lest I should turn my back upon my father, Akaboshi.

Waga omote nishi ni na mukeso Akaboshi no oya ni ushiro o miseji to omoeba

Another warrior by the name of Takemata Hideshige lost a battle to his rival, Shibata Katsuie (1522-83). Before dying, he said:

Shall Ashura* subdue a man like me? I shall be born again and then I'll cut the head off Katsuie . . .

Ashura-ō ni ware o torameya yagate mata umarete toramu Katsuie ga kubi

Yoshida Shoin (1830-59) was a nationalist thinker and educator. Born into a samurai family, he was later adopted by his uncle, a teacher in the art of warfare. It is said of Yoshida that at the age of nine he was already lecturing to the ruler of his province on military arts. While in his twenties, he came under the influence of dissidents to the rule of the shogun, whose government consequently stripped him of the rank of samurai and ceased paying him the concomitant stipend. After some time he was pardoned, but in 1854 he was caught attempting to escape from Japan in a ship from the American fleet, apparently with the intention of studying Western warfare. He was sentenced to confinement on the grounds of his house and spent the remaining five years of his life writing and teaching. He demanded that foreigners be banned from the country and that the emperor be reinstated; his followers later played an important role in the Meiji Restoration of 1868. Motivated by his hatred for the shogun's regime and his nationalistic zeal, he formed a plan to assassinate a high government official. The conspiracy, however, was discovered by the government, and Yoshida was executed in 1859 at the age of only twenty-nine. When his sentence was announced about a week before his execution, he wrote a poem to his parents expressing his deepest respect for them in the best tradition of Confucianism. His death poem, however, he dedicated to the emperor:

Though my corpse rot beneath the ground of Musashi,* my soul remains forever Japanese.

Mi wa tatoi Musashi no nobe ni kuchinu tomo todome okamashi yamato-damashii

The poet Nomura Boto (1806-67) wrote a death poem in a similar vein. She too was born into a samurai family and was a supporter of the emperor. After the death of her husband she had shaved her head and become a Buddhist nun. In spite of this she cast her lot with the monarchists and was exiled by the shogunal government.

Though moss will overgrow my useless corpse, the seeds of patriotism shall ne'er decay.

Kazu naranu kono mi wa koke ni umarete mo yamato-gokoro no tane wa kuchisezu

The life story of Nogi Maresuke (1849-1912) reflects, more than any other, the spirit of the Japanese warrior. Born into the nobility, Nogi became a high-ranking army official. In 1877, while he was leading a battalion, his unit's insignia were captured by forces hostile to the government, and Nogi prepared for suicide. Those around him prevented him from killing himself, but shame for the defeat never left him as long as he lived. In 1894, during the Sino-Japanese War, he was in charge of the division that captured Port Arthur in a single day; later he became the governor of Taiwan. During the Russo-Japanese War of 1904, he fought many a bloody battle as a general. This war, in which he himself lost two sons, left him with a deep sense of guilt at the loss of so many soldiers. After the war he was awarded with a high title of nobility and was appointed as a military adviser to the government. Emperor Meiji himself thought highly of him and entrusted him with the education of the sons of court nobility. Nogi was much admired for his firm moral principles, and to many he epitomized the Japanese warrior. When the emperor died in 1912, Nogi felt that life had lost its meaning, and he committed suicide, together with his wife, on the day of the emperor's funeral. Thus, as he states in his death poem, Nogi fulfilled the ancient obligation of the warrior not to remain in the world after his lord has left it:

The Master of the World has passed away—
and after him, eager to serve my lord,
go I.

Utsushiyo o kami sarishi mama ökimi no miato shitaite
ware wa yuku nari

I will close this section with the death poem of Fujita Koshiro (1842-65), a samurai who supported the emperor in the Meiji Restoration. He fought against the shogun's forces, but his army was defeated and he was condemned to death. Though his death poem reveals his fanaticism, its stringency is softened by an image from nature in the traditional style of love poetry:

Plum petals falling in the wind leave aromatic odors on the sleeve of the imperial robe.

Saku ume wa
kaze ni hakanaku chiru totemo nioi wa kimi ga
sode ni utsushite

DEATH POEMS OF LOVERS
We learn from Japanese history and literature that loyalty to death was not confined only to warriors. The intensity of emotion displayed by samurai toward their lords was matched by the loyalty of Japanese women for the men they loved; indeed, the idea of "love consummated in death is present in the earliest written sources. One of the stories in the Kojiki concerns the heir-apparent to the throne, Karu-no-Mikoto, and his sister Karu-no-Iratsume. Just before his succession, the crown prince seduces his sister, singing a stormy and sensual song. Their forbidden love must have incurred the anger of the entire nation, for the text says that "all the officials and likewise the people of the Empire turned against the Heir Apparent Karu." Karu-no-Mikoto is banished; he goes into exile singing love songs. His sister, unable to restrain her love, sets out after him, singing a love song of her own. The lovers meet, exchange more songs, and commit suicide.

These two are the first in a long line of lovers' suicides in Japanese history and folklore. In the Harima Fudoki (Topographical record of Harima,* c. 713), we find the story of the goddess Awami who pursues her lover, the god Hanami, to the edge of a marsh. When she does not find him there, her distress overwhelms her and she "takes a dagger, pierces her stomach, and falls into the marsh." The story is told, apparently, as an explanation of the place name-Harasaki-numa, "marsh of the split stomach." This is also the first mention in Japanese literature of suicide by seppuku.

The Kojiki contains the first death poem sung by a woman. The poem is that of Oto-Tachibana, who dies for her lover, Yamato Takeru-no-Mikoto, whose own death poem is quoted above. Yamato Takeru-no-Mikoto is nearly burned to death in a field fire lit by his enemy, the ruler of Sagamu (or Sagami, part of present-day Kanagawa Prefecture). He escapes, however, and continues his adventures. Just as he and his retinue are about to cross the sea, "the deity of that crossing" stirs up the waves. Oto-Tachibana offers to sacrifice her life to appease the god. The men on the boat take many sedge mats, skin rugs, and silk carpets and set them upon the waves. Oto-Tachibana seats herself on top of them, whereupon the waves subside. The ship then sets sail, and the abandoned woman sings:

Ah! thou [whom I] enquired of, Sanesashi standing in the midst of the flames of the fire burning on the little moor of Sagamu, where the true peak pierces!\textsuperscript{6} Sagamu no ono ni moyuru hi no honoka ni tachite toishi kimi wa mo

Seven days later Oto-Tachibana's comb drifts ashore. A mausoleum is erected and the comb is placed in it.

The literature of the Heian period, written largely by ladies of the court, contains not only light stories of romance, but tragic tales of love ending in death. One of the literary creations of the period is the \textit{Ise Monogatari} (Tales of Ise), a chain of stories interwoven with more than two hundred tanka, most of them about love among the court nobility of the tenth century. One story tells of a man who lives in the provinces but goes to the capital to join the service of a nobleman, parting from his wife with great emotion. Three years pass during which the wife hears nothing from her husband. Unable to wait for him any longer, she at last gives in to a persistent suitor, but on the first night they spend together, her husband turns up without warning and knocks on the portals of the house. The woman, without opening the gate, passes a poem to her husband in a note, confessing that, "grown weary of waiting for three long years," she is sharing her bed for the first time with another man. Her husband sends back a poem of his own, hoping that "she will love her new man as much as she loved him." Before he goes, he receives another note from his wife declaring that "although others have sought her love, her heart belongs to him alone." The husband, however, turns his back on her and leaves. She pursues him but fails to overtake him, giving up the chase beside a dear-running stream. Before dying, she writes her last poem on a rock beside the brook with blood drawn from her finger:

The man I loved refused to hear my pleadings—
he abandoned me and now my life fades away.

Aiomowade karenuru hito o todomekane wagami wa ima zo kiehatenumeru

Among the many fascinating stories in the \textit{Genji Monogatari}, there appears the tale of the girl Ukifune. It is not clear whom she loves, but at least two young men are enamored of her. In a way characteristic of the Japanese, Ukifune decides to do away with herself in order to solve her dilemma. Just before throwing herself into the Uji River, she writes a number of poems. She sends the following, her last, to Prince Niou, the more insistent of her suitors:

If I leave no trace behind in this fleeting world what then could you reproach?

\[\text{Kara o dani}\]
\[\text{ukiyo no naka ni}\]
\[\text{todomezuba}\] \[\text{izuku o haka to}\]
\[\text{kimi mo uramin}\]

Ukifune is pulled from the river and saved, but she shaves her head and abandons the world for the monastery.

Another woman who left such a poem, and who did succeed in drowning herself, was the mistress of the nobleman Fujiwara-no-Moronaga (1138-92). Moronaga, who lived with his mistress only while in his home province, was about to return to the city of Kyoto, where the provincial nobility spent the greater part of every year. Before returning he gave her a \textit{biwa}, a stringed instrument similar to the mandolin, as a present. Unable to bear the sorrow of parting from her lover, she threw herself into a river after composing the following poem:

Thus say unto him,
"She whose life hung on the biwa melody has sunk beneath the waters of the Mitsuse."*

\[\text{Yotsu-no-o no}\]
\[\text{shirabe ni kakete}\]
\[\text{Mitsuse-gawa}\] \[\text{shizumi hateshi to}\]
\[\text{kimi ni tsutaeyo}\]

During the civil wars of the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries, the fate of many warriors' wives was no brighter than that of their husbands when the latter suffered defeat in battle. In the \textit{Taiheiki}, we find the story of Sakai Sadatoshi and his wife. Sadatoshi is exiled from his home, and while wandering dispiritedly throughout the country, he is eventually apprehended by enemies and condemned to die. He does not shrink from death, but before his execution, he is grieved not to know what has become of his wife and children. He asks the guard to return the dagger he had always kept on his person and entrusts it to a monk, who agrees to deliver the dagger to Sadatoshi's loved ones. At this, Sadatoshi is content; he sits straight up on the animal skin and recites this poem:

When luck held out and others thrived
I counted not at all—but when disaster falls
we share one fate.

Mina hito no
yo ni aru toki wa
kazu narade
uki ni wa morenu
wagami narikeri

He then calls Buddha's name ten times and submits calmly to the executioner's blow. The monk takes up the dagger and the robe in which Sadatoshi died and goes to Kamakura, where he finds Sadatoshi's wife and gives her the articles. She falls weeping to the floor, unable to bear her grief; she then brings out her inkstone and writes this poem on the hem of her husband's robe:

For whose eyes did he send these things?
How could I live and bear so great a grief?

Tare miyo to katami o hito no
todomeken
taete aru beki
inochi naranu ni

Covering her head with the gown, she thrusts the dagger into her breast and dies.

The following war story is found in the chronicles of a samurai family of the fifteenth or sixteenth century. The general of a certain fortress escapes from his enemy into the confines of a Buddhist temple. One of the general's relatives rebels against him and attacks the temple. The general commits suicide by seppuku. His retainer, a warrior named Hyogo, strikes off his head with a "mercy blow" and kills himself as well. Hyogo's son dies in the same battle. Hyogo's wife, upon hearing of her son's and husband's deaths, broke into bitter tears and died within two days. She left this poem:

They who are no more

Aru wa naku increase from day to day—naki wa kazusō in such a world yononaka mo how could I think wagami no ue to that when it came to me . . .
omowazarishi o

The wars of the samurai in the sixteenth century, in which many thousands of women lost their husbands and sons, sometimes caused strange and tragic complications. Nara Yayoi, the sister of Nara Sakon, a samurai, was loved and courted for a number of years by another samurai, Sadamitsu. Sakon, however, disliked Sadamitsu and refused to allow the two to marry. In the course of time Sakon and Sadamitsu found themselves in opposing camps, and Sakon was killed with an arrow shot by Sadamitsu. Yayoi was captured and married to Sadamitsu. She pretended to resign herself to the marriage, but secretly wrote a last letter, with her death poem, to her mother. After sending the letter, she stole Sadamitsu's sword and killed first him, then herself. In refusing to share a bed with her brother's killer she proved her loyalty to her family—but is the reader mistaken to hear a note of love for Sadamitsu in her death poem?

My heart is a bottomless river, a raging torrent—
how can I throw my name into the tempting waters?
Omoigawa
fukaki fuchise wa hayakeredo sasou mizu ni wa
na o nagasameya

During the Edo period, the Japanese witnessed another way of life developing alongside that of the effeminate nobility and severely masculine samurai—that of merchants and artisans in Edo (present-day Tokyo), Osaka, and Kyoto. Historians sometimes call this era "the roaring Edo period," for the inhabitants of Edo, the capital, were known for carefree living. Theaters in the city staged romantic plays featuring "love as strong as death," and occasional incidents of lovers' suicide would become the talk of the day. The account of one such incident follows:

Not long ago [perhaps in the middle of the eighteenth century], in a geisha house named Kariganeya in Edo's red-light district, the Yoshiwara, there lived a geisha named Uneme. A Buddhist monk fell in love with her and used to visit her frequently. The proprietress of the house did not look kindly on their affair and employed various ruses to keep the two from meeting. The monk, unable to bear their separation, killed himself. When Uneme heard the news of his death, she escaped from her house and threw herself into Kagami-ga-ike [lit., mirror lake]. Her death poem alludes to another Uneme* who, about a thousand years before, had drowned herself in Sarusawa-no-ike [lit., monkey-brook lake, in Nara]:

If you know not who I am, hear:
Like the one who cast herself into the Lake of Monkeys
I drown myself in Mirror Lake.

In many of the death poems written by Japanese women, the reader may sense a longing for a place of refuge from the many hardships the women encounter. The following death poem belongs to a woman named Oroku and dates from the first part of the seventeenth century. Oroku marries a certain Sakon, the retainer of a provincial ruler, and bears him a male child. She is treated cruelly by her mother-in-law, however, and finally kills herself. This poem appears in her will:

And had my days been longer still the darkness would not leave this world— along death"s path, among the hills I shall behold the moon.

The moon symbolizes salvation in the world beyond from the sufferings of the present life.

DEATH POEMS AND ZEN BUDDHISM
At the moment of death, say followers of the Jodo sects of Buddhism, the dying person is greeted either by Amida, the Buddha of Everlasting Light, or by Kannon, the Bodhisattva of Compassion and Love. Anyone who calls the name of Buddha before dying is reborn in the Pure Land in the West. We find in religious literature the description of terrible afflictions that befall the wicked after death, but most accounts depict such hells as temporary states in which even saints may be found, saving others from torture. All such beliefs are defined as tariki, "[salvation through] power from without," as opposed to jiriki, "[salvation through] power from within." Although most Japanese Buddhists belong to the Jodo sects, the belief that salvation comes through inner enlightenment, a tenet of Zen Buddhism, has always been strong among the well educated.

There is a trend in the "inner enlightenment" sects toward voluntary death. Kukai (774-835), known posthumously as Kobo Daishi, was a learned Buddhist monk who sailed to China to study the mysteries of the Shingon sect. On his return to Japan, he founded a large Buddhist temple on Mount Koya (Wakayama Prefecture) and spread the esoteric doctrine of Buddhism among noblemen and peasants alike. It is said that Kukai died by fasting till the skin stuck to his bones.

Buddhist literature reports that Eisai (1141-1215), one of the founders of Japanese Zen, knew just when his death was approaching. He journeyed to Kyoto in order to "show people how to die." Upon his arrival, he first preached to the crowd, then sat completely still in the upright Zen position, and died. However, when his followers complained that his death had been too sudden, he revived. He died for good in the same manner five days later. His pupil Eicho (d.1247) anticipated his own death and met it sitting upright; other famous monks died in the same way.10

Stories about dying at will are not told exclusively about monks. A nineteenth-century samurai scholar relates, for instance, the story of the death of a poet named Hasegawa Shume (c. 1700). Shume wrote before dying:

> Throughout the frosty night
> I lay awake. When morning bells rang out, my heart grew clear—> upon this fleeting dream-world

Okia Kasu
shimo yo no kane ni kokoro sumu ukiyo no yume no
"When he had spoken these words," says the text, his breathing grew shallow. Those pressing around him urged, 'Call Buddha's name.' But Shume, rather than praying, merely repeated aloud, 'Thanks, thanks.' Then he covered himself and told them not to take away the blanket until a certain hour. At the specified time, they drew back the cover and found him dead."

It is, however, the dying person's state of mind, rather than the ability to control the manner of dying, to which importance is attached among followers of the "inner enlightenment" sects. One who dies lusting for life in this world or for salvation in the next is not enlightened. This is why many death poems express not only resignation to death, but even indifference to the prospects of a world beyond. Indeed, such attitudes gave rise to a rejection of the very act of writing death poems, a subject discussed below. Enlightenment as understood by Zen Buddhists does not confer understanding beyond that possessed by ordinary people but is rather a state in which consciousness is free from any theoretical thinking. "When a simple man gains knowledge," says Zen scripture, "he is wise. When a wise man gains understanding, he is simple."

The identification of enlightenment with a state of natural simplicity—which extends even until one's dying moments—originates in ancient Taoist philosophy, which reached Japan during the eighth century and which influenced Japanese Zen Buddhism no less than Indian Buddhism did. Alongside the gloomy vision of the world as a fleeting illusion, traces can be felt of the Taoist philosophy of the forgetfulness of self being the essence of wholeness and purity. The writings of the philosophers Lao-tzu (sixth cent. B.C) and Chuang-tzu (third cent. B.C) do not so much teach how to think as how to be. When the world behaves according to its nature, say the Taoist sages, everything finds its place of its own accord. It is when one forces principles on the world that one interferes with its natural workings. Sunflowers manage to grow without the farmer pulling on their stalks every morning, and so it is with man. He need not ask himself about every step he takes, wondering by what principles he ought to conduct himself. Taoists define correct behavior as "nonaction" (Ch., wu wei; J., mui), which does not mean "sit still and do nothing." Rather, it refers to action in which natural processes are not interfered with—actions as natural as the growth of sunflowers. "The wise man," says Chuang-tzu, "walks by the light of chaos, the light of darkness. He does not impose distinctions, but leaves everything in its place. This is clarity of mind."

In one of Chuang-tzu's stories, he describes the death of sages who knew the secret of the Tao, the Way:

The four sages Szu, Yü, Li, and Lai were talking with each other. They said, "Who can see Nothing as his head, Life as his back, and Death as his rear? Whoever knows Life and Death, Being and Nothing, as One, shall be one of us." The four looked at one another and smiled. There was no barrier in their hearts to separate them.

Not long after that, Yü fell ill. Szu went to see him and asked how he fared. Yü said, Wonderful. The way of the master is deforming me! My back is as crooked as a hunchback's and my organs are all topsy-turvy. My chin sticks in my navel, my shoulders rise up above my head and my pigtail points to the sky. The elements of nature must be all confused." His heart was calm and his manner carefree. He limped to the well, looked at his reflection in the water and said, "My, my! How the Maker of Things is deforming me!" Szu asked, "Does this upset you?" "Why should it?" said Yü. "If my left arm becomes a rooster, I will herald the dawn. If my right arm becomes a crossbow, I'll shoot down a bird and roast it. If my buttocks turn into wheels and my spirit into a horse, I'll go for a ride. What need will I have for a carriage? I was born when it was time to be born, and I shall die when it is time to die. If we are in peace with time and follow the order of things, neither sorrow nor joy will move us. The ancients called this 'freedom from bondage.' Those who are entangled with the appearance of things cannot free themselves. But nothing can overcome the order of nature. Why should I be upset?"

Shortly afterward, Lai fell ill. He lay gasping on the verge of death. His wife and children were gathered around him, weeping. Li, who had come to see him, said, "Shh! Be off with you! Do not disturb the change!" Then he leaned back on the door and said to Lai, "Great is the Maker of Things! What will become of you now? Where will he send you? Will you be the liver of a rat or the leg of an insect?" Lai said, "A child who obeys his father and mother will go wherever they tell him to go—east, west, south, or north. Yin and yang, the elements of nature, are they not to a man like father and mother? If I were not to obey them now that they have brought me to the point of death, how wayward I should be! They are not to be blamed. The great earth burdens me with a body, forces upon me the toil of life, eases me in old age, and calms me in death. If life is good, death is good also. If an ironsmith were casting metal and the metal were to jump up and say, 'Make me into the best of all swords!' the ironsmith would regard it as a bad omen. Now that my human form is decomposing, were I to say, 'I want to be a man! Nothing but a man!'
the Maker of Things would think me most unworthy. Heaven and earth are a great forge and the Maker of Things is a master ironsmith. Can the place he is sending me to be the wrong place?"

When Chuang-tzu himself was about to die, his disciples wished to prepare for him a lavish funeral. But Chuang-tzu said that all the furnishings for his burial were already there: heaven and earth for his coffin, the sun, the moon, and the stars for ornaments, and the world of "ten thousand things" for a parting gift. Still, his disciples insisted and argued that unless he was properly buried, the fowl of the air would eat his flesh. To this Chuang-tzu replied, "Above ground, vultures and crows will eat me. Below ground, crickets and ants will eat me. It does not seem fair to deprive the former just to feed the latter."

In addition to Taoist philosophy, Zen Buddhism has another important source in the Madhyamika, "middle path," school of Buddhism, founded by the Indian philosopher Nagarjuna, who lived in the second and third centuries A.D. It is unlikely that Nagarjuna had heard of the Chinese philosophers. By contrast with the colorful style of the latter, Nagarjuna writes in a concise, methodical manner, in a way that is typical of Indian thinkers. However, his doctrine of the "void" closely resembles Taoist philosophy.

Nagarjuna submits the idea of the mutual dependence of all things, a central principle of early Buddhist philosophy, to logical analysis and finds that because a "thing" can be defined only in relation to something else, no "thing" is absolutely identical to itself and therefore cannot exist as such. With this argument Nagarjuna refutes all possible descriptions of "reality." He does not deny its existence, but maintains only that we cannot think this reality, as our thoughts are confused and self-contradictory. Nagarjuna does not hesitate to attack even the Buddhist doctrine of doctrines—that of salvation from the "world of senses" in the absolute peace of nirvana. Salvation from the world of sorrow and pain is not to be attained by passing from a state of inferior being to a more exalted state, but by ceasing to think. Like the Taoists, Nagarjuna rejects the philosophical viewpoint entirely, seeing in it the origin of ignorance and suffering. With this attitude he solves the problem of death as well. When one understands that the distinction between life and death is as arbitrary and as illusory as all other distinctions, one finds the solution in the disappearance of the problem.

Both Taoist philosophers and Buddhists of the Madhyamika school, then, saw speculative thought about reality as the root of all evil. Likewise, from the very beginnings of Zen in the sixth century, no importance has been attached to rituals, to sacred writings, or to philosophical discussion. Such an anti-speculative attitude is apparent in thousands of Zen anecdotes from China and Japan, as the following sayings of Joshu (Chao-chou; 778-897), a Zen master from China, demonstrate:

Someone asked, "When one is confronted with disaster, how can one avoid it?"

Joshu said, "That's it!"
(The disaster lies only in the consciousness of "disaster." When you are in a given situation but do not define it, it is not "good" or "bad"; you simply react according to the circumstances.)

Someone asked, "What is my true nature?"

Joshu said, "If that is what you say, what is it that you dislike?"
(If you search for your "true" nature, you grant the existence of a "false" one. If you make no attempt to define your nature, you will find nothing in it that is not true.)

Passing by the main hall, Joshu saw a monk worshiping. Joshu hit him once with his stick.

The monk said, "After all, worshiping is a good thing."

Joshu said, "A good thing isn't as good as nothing."12

Zen literature eventually came to serve as a means to enlightenment in Zen monasteries. Several times a week, every monk would meet alone with the master. The latter would tell an anecdote or present a koan, a sort of problem or riddle from Zen literature. The monk's response would not necessarily be verbal, and it is often difficult to see the connection between the answer and the anecdote. Here is a dialogue between a Japanese master and monk from the end of the eighteenth or the beginning of the nineteenth century:

MASTER: Where will you go after death?
MONK: Excuse me for a minute. I have to go to the toilet.

As in Zen anecdotes from China, the problem of death is treated as a pseudo-problem. The Zen master asks a trap question to see if the monk will display any metaphysical leanings. The monk, however, evading this aspect of the question and indicating thereby that he knows nothing of what will happen "after death, reacts only to "going" and demonstrates with the only kind of "going" known to him—moving from one concrete place to another.

In 1828, the Japanese poet Yamamoto Ryokan (1758-1831), himself a Zen monk, wrote to his friend a letter in the same vein as the sayings of Joshu, following an earthquake that killed thousands of people. He said, "When you suffer a calamity—then be it so; now is the time of calamity. When you die—then be it so; now is the time to die. Thus you save yourself from calamity and death.

It is not then to be wondered at, that in spite of the famous self-discipline of Zen monks, tradition often ascribes to them the simplest and most natural conduct just before their death. Such is the case with two of the central figures in Japanese Zen Buddhism, Ikkyu Sojun and Sengai Gibon (1750-1837), both of whose death poems appear in this anthology. There is, however, no evidence that they wrote the poems immediately before dying. Ikkyu, just before his death, protested, "I don't want to die!" Sengai was asked by one of his pupils if he had anything to say before passing away. He replied, "I don't want to die." His pupils, astounded to hear this, asked, "What was that you said?" "I really don't want to die," repeated Sengai. Both he and Ikkyu died at the age of eighty-eight. It is also reported of Sengai that a man once came to him and declared that he was disgusted with life. Sengai answered with a kyoka, a satirical tanka:

If your time to die has come Shini ni kite
I was once told that a certain master of recent times exclaimed on his deathbed, "I don't want to die!" and burst out crying. When his pupils gathered around to wipe his tears, they saw that his eyes were completely dry. This man greeted death with a "natural" reaction, but perhaps wished to suggest that he was not bound even by "naturalness."

We find mention of the custom of writing death poems in a fifteenth-century book whose anonymous author states, "I don't know about China, but in our country Zen monks write death poetry. Most of them compose the poem while they are still healthy and pretend, when they die, to compose it on the spot. Some of these poems are nonsense; others are praiseworthy. But doesn't such a practice contradict the monks' withdrawal from society?" An eighteenth-century scholar of literature makes the same point, adding an anecdote to sharpen it:

Zen monks . . . usually write death poems. I know myself of two or three monks who composed theirs at the moment of death—a very difficult feat. They thought, perhaps, that they were doing it for their pupils, but if the way of nature is to be respected, such a practice is not at all becoming. I recently heard a story about a Zen priest from the town of Kizu who wanted to "die properly." He changed his clothes, wrote a death poem, and died sitting upright. The priest who took over his position in the temple was lying inside his mosquito net one summer day when all at once he saw the figure of a man. He looked more closely and discerned a tall priest. When he asked, "Who are you?" the figure replied, "I am the priest who lived here before you. At the hour of my death I paid so much attention to my appearance I am now having difficulty in crossing to the next world." The living priest prayed for the peace of his predecessor's spirit, and the figure hasn't come back since. . . . The motive for striving so hard to write a death poem is the desire to impress others.

Nishiyama Soin (1605-82), who was by all accounts a good poet, did not write a death poem at all. The probable reason has been recorded as follows:

The poet Soin decided a long time before his death not to write a death poem. One day I heard him tell the story about a dying Buddhist priest. One of the priest's pupils came to his bed and said, "A man as famous for his learning and as gifted as you—surely you will write a death poem." The priest simply replied, "At an awesome time like this. . ." Then he closed his eyes and died. "How wonderful!" said Soin excitedly, repeating several times, "How wonderful!" For this reason I am sure that Soin, when he died, was taken up solely by the awesome meaning of his last moment.16

While some Zen monks were against the practice of writing death poems, we do find numerous examples of such poems in the literature. The fact that in Zen there was criticism of this custom is not surprising due to the abhorrence on the part of many Zen masters of anything that smacks of mere formalism. But it seems that most Japanese Zen masters simply followed Japanese (and Chinese) traditions and wrote farewell poems, although some of them suggest their objection to this custom in their own death poem.

DEATH POEMS: BETWEEN SOLEMNITY AND LAUGHTER

But for the deeply rooted conservatism of the Japanese people, their culture would not have preserved itself so well through so many centuries. Such conservatism, however, sometimes borders on blind worship of tradition and customs, with results that are often somewhat ridiculous. We have, for example, the ironic story of "a man who asked his poetry teacher to compose a death poem for his wife."17 There is also the story of one Narushima Chuhachiro, a man who, "fearing that he might die without warning and be unable to write a farewell poem," began writing death poems at the age of fifty-odd years, sending them for criticism to his poetry master Reizei Tameyasu (eighteenth cent.). At the age of eighty, he wrote:

For eighty years and more, Yoso amari by the grace of my sovereign kimi to oya to no and my parents, I have lived megumi mote with a tranquil heart  yo o tsuki hana ni between the flowers and the moon. yasuku sugitaru

As usual, he sent the poem to Reizei, who replied in this wise: "When you reach age ninety, correct the first line."¹⁸

The hesitation between desire to write a death poem and aversion to an "unnatural" act is noticeable in the death poems of more than a few poets, as these examples from the present volume will show:

Whether or not a paradise  Koshiraete awaits in the far reaches aru to mo shirazu of the west . . . nishi no oku
—SOA (1677-1742)

Death poems  Jisei to wa are mere delusion— sunawachi mayoi death is death. tada shinan
—TOKO (1710-95)

Since I was born  Umarete wa
I have to die, shinuru hazu nari and so . . . sore naraba
—KISEI (1688-1764)

A warrior named Fuse Yajiro grew ill in the spring, and by autumn he was dying. He wrote this poem:

Before long  Naki tama no
I shall be a ghost kazu ni hairite but just now naku naka ni how they bite my flesh! uki akikaze no the winds of autumn. mi ni zo shiminuru

After writing this poem so full of nostalgia for life, Fuse Yajiro recovered somewhat and lived on for another month. Something must have changed his mind about death, for in a mood of greater detachment, he wrote another death poem:

```
Seen from Kenkon no outside creation soto yori kore o earth and sky uchi mireba aren't worth hiuchibako ni mo a box of matches. taranu ametsuchi
```

However strange it may seem, many poets chose to end their lives with a satirical poem, and some even mock this mockery itself. One kyoka poet wrote down, before dying, the well-known death poem of another poet, prefacing it with the words "I borrowed this poem from someone," and adding after it, "This is the last act of plagiarism I shall commit in this world." Morikawa Kyoriku (1656-1715), a pupil of Basho's, also wrote a kyoka death poem. The poem and its background have been left for us:

Kyoriku . . . came from an ancient samurai family and was a talented painter. When he became Basho's pupil, Basho said to him, "For painting, you shall be my master; for haiku, I shall be yours."

Kyoriku was extremely proud of his talents and considered other poets no better than dogs. . . . He would boast of himself, "I alone have gone straight to the heart of Basho's poetry."

Before his death, Kyoriku wrote:

```
Till now I thought Ima made wa that death befell heta ga shinu zo to the untalented alone. omoishi ni
If those with talent, too, must die jōzu mo shineba surely they make a better manure? kuso jōzu kana
```

Another writer puts Kyoriku's apparent boastfulness in a light that is probably more in keeping with the spirit of his death poem. When asked by a man to teach him the art of poetry, Kyoriku refused, saying that he was "not talented enough." Surprised at this answer, the man reminded Kyoriku of his extravagant praise of himself. To this Kyoriku answered, "All that is only a joke. Don't take it seriously."²²

No less famous than Kyoriku is Yamazaki Sokan (died c. 1540), of samurai birth, a renga poet, and one of the first composers of haiku. The following death poem is attributed to him:

Should someone ask where Sokan went, just say, "He had some business in the other world."

Sōkan wa doko e to hito no tōtareba chito yōji ari ano yo e to ie

And an author named Hanabusa Ikkei (d. 1843) wrote:

I thought to live two centuries, or three— yet here comes death to me, a child just eighty-five years old. Ni- sambyaku ikiyō to koso omoishi ni hachijūgo nite fūji no wakajini

A man named Kita Takekiyo (d. 1856) apparently prepared his own tombstone in the Nihon'enoki district of Edo. Two haiku poets—Takarai Kikaku (1661-1707) and Hanabusa Itcho (1652-1724)—had been laid to rest in an old temple there. Kita Takekiyo wrote before his death:

I come to my grave in Nihon'enoki and here, to my delight, I find beside me Kikaku and Itcho friends I can talk to. Kite mireba Nihon'enoki mo omoshiroshi hanashi no tomo wa Kikaku Itchō Conversing about poetry with Kikaku and Itcho is indeed a rosy picture of life beyond death.

Another poet who expected an entertaining afterlife was Moriya Sen'an (d. 1838):
Bury me when I die beneath a wine barrel in a tavern.
With luck
the cask will leak.

Ware shinaba sakaya no kame no shita ni ikeyo moshi ya shizuku no moriyasennan

The last line or the poem, "perhaps will leak," is similar to the pronunciation of the poet's name.

The merchants and artisans of the Edo period, like earlier monks and poets, spoke of this life in terms of a transient "floating world" (ukiyo), or of a dream that vanishes, but rather than lift their eyes to the monasteries high in the mountains, they let their legs carry them to the geisha houses in the Yoshiwara quarter of Edo. "From all directions, the compass needle points to Yoshiwara," quips one senryu poet. In so hedonistic an atmosphere, a spirit of satire thrived, especially near the end of the period. Anything at all might fall victim to the senryu poets' sharp tongues, and it is no wonder that they do not spare the custom of writing death poems. How can a man know when he will die? And what happens to the poem should he get well again?

After recovery, he polishes the style of his death poem.

Shinisokonōte
jisei shinaosu

The mouth that has uttered a death poem now devours porridge.

Jisei no kuchi de kayu ni kuitsuku

And when a man dies, so what if he has left a death poem?

The doctors praise his death poem and depart.

Isshū wa jisei o homete tatarekeri

The poem pokes fun no less at the doctors than at the dying poet.

There were those among senryu poets who did not hesitate even to parody well-known death poems. Here is Basho's last poem:
On a journey, ill:
my dream goes wandering
over withered fields.

A senryu poet writes:

Locked in my room:
my dream goes wandering
over brothels.

The following senryu even takes an ironic view of another man's death scene:

The dying priest looks as if he knew it all.

Though the next poem, too, looks humorously at death, there is a trace of pathos as well:

The last of human desire: he grasps at the air.

A death poem is liable to sound strained if its author racks his brain for an "appropriate" farewell, and not all death poems succeed in conveying the impact of this final experience. Sometimes, poems which are not specifically defined as "death poems" are more forceful. A well-known tanka poet, Shimaki Akahiko (1876-1926), wrote this poem not long before his death:

Where did that dog that used to be here go? I thought about him once again tonight before I went to bed.
How is a person's poetry linked to his life? What can it tell of his death? One poet may search in vain for a poem as long as he lives; another repeats one poem again and again; yet another lives and dies in every poem he creates. The experience of the renga poet Satomura Joha (1524-1602) was of the first type. Before his death, Joha said that if someone writing a poem prior to his at a renge-composition gathering had only suggested the phrase "a little of the sea" (umi suko-shi), he would have followed it with a phrase containing "Mount Osaka."* "I wished," he wrote, "for the phrase long ago, but no one ever started out like that, and now I must leave this life without having composed my verse." Even if we were to analyze at length the images Joha wanted to combine, we would never understand the particular note he strove for all his life, a note only he could comprehend.

By contrast, Kashiku, a little-known poet from the late seventeenth or early eighteenth century, heard the same sound all his life, and this was the sound he repeated at his death:

A certain man left his native province to wander from place to place. He was an artist and a haiku poet; he could dance, sing, and play stringed instruments; and he used to gladden the hearts of all who came near him. For a number of years he was part of the company around the table of Ozawa Sahichi, an innkeeper in the Tokaido region. One day Sahichi said to him, "I've been watching you for a long time. I can see that you're not a petty man: you're even-tempered, you avoid arguments, and you're free of vices. In fact, you've got all the makings of a monk. Why not shave your head and lead a monk's life, free of ties?" The man grew very happy when he heard this. On the spot he shaved his hair, laughing, and said, "Ah! What a relief! I've been rid of the grease' [a metaphor—the expression refers to a plait of greased hair and here signifies relief from this life as well]." The innkeeper laughed with him and replied, "Since I'm the one who persuaded you, I'll give you the name you'll go by as a monk. He called him "Kashiku" [a formula similar to yours sincerely, used by women at the close of letters]. Kashiku stayed on for several months more in Sahichi's inn, then decided to set out as a wandering monk. He went to Naniwa [Osaka], singing kyoka on his way, plucking stringed instruments, and begging rice from door to door. . . . Whenever he returned to Sahichi's inn, he need not have begged, as his many friends were willing to support him. But Kashiku, who hated flattery and false praise, refused all invitations to dine. When invited to a meal, he would answer, "I desire nothing but the view of Mount Fuji," and would turn his back and go. One day his corpse was found in the snow outside a temple gate. . . . He was dressed in beggar's clothing and wrapped in a straw gown. Beside his head lay a scrap of paper which read:

Mount Fuji's melting snow is the ink with which I sign my life's scroll,
"Yours sincerely."

The last poem left by Basho is generally considered his death poem, but Basho himself did not intend to write such a poem. When he was on his deathbed, his pupils hinted that he ought to leave one, but he replied that any of his poems could be his death poem. And indeed, in all of Basho's best poems, a resonance can be heard that seems to come from and return to the void.

A certain Japanese professor has defined Japanese culture as "a culture of death." In a long essay he argues that the "collective unconsciousness" of the Japanese is governed by a strong attraction toward death. His theory somehow explains even the peculiar five- and seven-beat rhythm that characterizes Japanese poetry. "If Freud was correct," his thesis concludes, "and the death wish is a basic desire in all human culture, then it can be admitted that one culture in particular may represent that desire."25 Another professor claims, to the contrary, that the outstanding feature of Japanese culture is the love of the Japanese people for all phenomena. The Japanese, he says, are unwilling to believe in a reality separate from this world; they understand the abstract in terms of the world's concrete features—its mountains, rivers, trees, and insects.26

It is true that the millions of people living on the isles of Japan are a single nation, and a nation, so they say, has its own particular culture. Every student of that culture who explains it one way or another is probably correct from his point of view. Contradictory ideas may be found within a single person; how much more so, then, in an entire nation? Poems written before death no doubt reflect the attitudes of the dying, and what hundreds and thousands of Japanese say before death must certainly partake of the "Japanese spirit." Let us not forget, however, that when someone dies, it is not a nation but an individual that is dying. A person can bequeath his property and even his opinions to his survivors, but he buries his own name with him. And what stands behind that name, which belongs to the man alone, will never be understood by another. This is perhaps what a certain little-known poet named Tomoda Kimpei meant when he composed his death poem:

In life I never was among the well-known flowers and yet, in withering
I am most certainly Tomoda Kimpei.

Aru toki wa hana no kazu ni wa taranu domo
chiru ni wa morenu
Tomoda Kimpei

*
NOTE ON THE POEMS

The names heading the poems in Part Two are generally the monastic names of the Zen monks; such a name is received when a monk enters an order. In Japan, well-known monks especially are known by their monastic names rather than their real ones. Written sources, however, may not always be consistent in listing a given person, sometimes using the real name, monastic name, pen name, and/or posthumous name. Where a single name appears in Part Three, it is the haiku poet's pen name, which is usually the name by which the poet is most well known. Occasionally, in cases in which a poet is a figure known in history and references by his real name, this name is given in the commentary. Where more than one name appears in the heading, these names are in most cases the poet's real name; apparently, these individuals did not use a pen name.

The poems in Parts Two and Three have been arranged in alphabetical order by the name of the poet for easy reference. Terms and concepts in the poems that require explanation are generally treated most fully the first time they appear. A full listing of such words is found in the Index of Poetic Terms (p. 349).

The traditional Japanese calendar, taken from the Chinese, is fundamentally a lunar one. The months have twenty-nine or thirty days, the first day of the month falling on the day of the new moon. A year consists of twelve months, 354 or 355 days; in order to adjust the calendar to the revolution of the earth around the sun, seven intercalary months are added in the course of nineteen-year cycles. The new year starts on the first new moon after the sun enters Aquarius, that is, between January 21 and February 19 (February 20 in the Orient).

In 1873 the Japanese adopted the Gregorian calendar used by the nations of the West. The months of death given in this book (when known) refer to those of the traditional calendar for poets who died before this change. For those who died in or after 1873, the date is given in terms of the Gregorian calendar, except when original sources give the date in terms of the old system.

In Japanese poetry, especially haiku, the use of images from nature and seasonal terms is very important. In death poems in particular, an image from the season in which the poet died is often included in the poem. Although the system was more complicated, the seasons correspond to the months in approximately the following manner: the first three months (about early February to early May) are spring; the fourth, fifth, and sixth months (early May to early August) are summer; the seventh, eighth, and ninth months (early August to early November) are autumn; and the last three months (early November to early February) are winter.
Footnotes

* Two styles complementary to the tanka and haiku later grew up beside these forms. The kyoka, "mad poem," is a satirical tanka not usually based on an image from nature at all; this form was especially popular in the latter half of the eighteenth century. The senryu, named after the genre's creator, Karai Senryu (1718-90), is a haiku that satirizes human foibles. The senryu is usually written in haiku form, but may be even shorter, in two lines of seven syllables each.

* Because Chinese poems are written series of Chinese characters, many characters homophonous with each other, to render the poems in romanized form would provide little clue to the content of the original. These poems, therefore, are given in translation only.

* five manners: bodily form, feelings, senses, impulses, and consciousness.

† four elements: earth, water, air, and fire.

* Ashura: in Brahmanism and Hinduism, a mythological demon who thirsts for battle and fights for the gods. In Buddhist folklore, he becomes a kind of war god.

* Musashi: the province comprising present-day Saitama and Tokyo prefectures.

* Harima: the southern part of present-day Hyogo Prefecture.

* Mitsuse (River): a name for the counterpart in Japanese folklore of the River Styx.

* The story of the earlier Uneme (a common name for courtesans) appears in the Man'yoshu.

* Mount Osaka: in Shiga Prefecture, overlooking Lake Biwa. Umi and osaka also signify "birth" and "conjugal vows" respectively.
PART TWO

DEATH POEMS

by

ZEN MONKS
BASSUI TOKUSHO

抜隊得勝

Died on the twentieth day of the second month, 1387
at the age of sixty-one

Look straight ahead. What's there?
If you see it as it is
You will never err.

When Bassui was about thirty-one years of age, he heard the running of water in a brook and was enlightened. Thereafter, he spent most of his days in a hut in the mountains. When people heard of the solitary monk and gathered to hear "the word, he would flee. In spite of his longing for solitude, Bassui did not turn his back on the simple people, but taught them Zen in words they could understand. He often warned his followers against the dangers of drinking, and forbade them to taste "even a single drop." On the margin of his portrait he wrote, I teach with the voice of silence."

Just before his death Bassui turned to the crowd that had gathered around and said the words above. Repeating them in a loud voice, he died.

DAIDO ICHI'I

大道－以
A tune of non-being Filling the void:
Spring sun
Snow whiteness Bright clouds Clear wind.

DAIGU SOCHIKU

大愚宗築

Daigu was raised in a Zen monastery. While he was still a young monk, a woman asked him to hold a funeral service for her son. After the burial she asked, "Where has my child gone?" Daigu had no answer for her, and the incident shook him profoundly. He abandoned the monastery and went to be alone in the mountains.

Daigu was fond of drinking; it is said that he was usually half-drunk. He did not restrain his speech and used to insult people while conversing with them. In spite of his eccentricity, or perhaps because of it, people from all ranks of society were drawn to him, and they would come to him on the mountain to hear his words.

Daigu later moved to Edo, where he gave sanctuary in his temple to two women, mistresses of a daimyo from whom they had escaped. This act added to already existing rumors about Daigu's relationships with women, but Daigu gave them no heed. Because of the bad name such behavior gave him, his rise in the religious hierarchy was delayed, but Daigu himself did not care for power and authority. When an honorable post was at last offered him, he refused it on the grounds that he would be dismissed anyway because of his peculiar character.

The name Daigu, which the monk chose for himself, means "great fool." To his self-portrait he added these words: "This monk is bound in chains of ignorance and lust. He is not able to follow the way of the Buddha. As his name is, so is he—a great fool."

Lying on his deathbed, Daigu wrote the following:

Needles pierce my ailing body, and my pain grows greater. This life of mine, which has been like a disease—what is its meaning? In all the world I haven't a single friend to whom I can unburden my soul. Truly all that appears to the eye is only a flower that blooms in a day.

Three days before his death Daigu wrote a short poem praising himself as "unique in his generation." At the end of the poem he put the words "three days before." Did he regret having boasted and wish to write a different poem? The following day he requested that his attendant bring him writing paper, and as the latter was about to hand it to his master, Daigu hit him. A day later Daigu died.

* * *

DAIRIN SOTO

大林宗套

Died on the twenty-seventh day of the first month, 1568 at the age of eighty-nine

My whole life long I've sharpened my sword
And now, face to face with death
I unsheathe it, and lo—
The blade is broken—
   Alas!

DOKYO ETAN

道鏡慧端

_Died on the sixth day of the tenth month, 1721_
_at the age of eighty_

Here in the shadow of death it is hard
   To utter the final word.
   I'll only say, then,
    "Without saying."
    Nothing more,
    Nothing more.

Dokyo, also known as Shoju Ronin, lived most of his life in a hut and refused to join the large monasteries. He saw in _zazen_, Zen meditation, the essence of the Zen way and used to deal harshly with believers who sought him out to hear so-called Zen doctrine. He would occasionally even draw his sword on them and drive them away, in keeping perhaps with his samurai origin. He is said to have once pushed the Zen master Hakuin from the pulpit when the latter rose to speak, whereupon Hakuin fainted from the force of the blow. For as long as Hakuin dwelt with him, Dokyo showed him no preference, and made him beg from door to door for his portion of rice like the other monks.

Dokyo wrote his last words while seated in the upright Zen position. Then he put down his brush, hummed "an ancient song" to himself, suddenly laughed out loud, and died.
DOYU
道祐

Died on the fifth day of the second month, 1256
at the age of fifty-six

In all my six and fifty years
No miracles occurred.
For the Buddhas and the Great Ones of the Faith,
I have questions in my heart.
And if I say,
"Today, this hour
I leave the world,"
There's nothing in it. Day after day,
Does not the sun rise in the east?

ENNİ BEN’EN
円爾弁円

Died on the seventeenth day of the tenth month, 1280
at the age of seventy-nine

All my life I taught Zen to the people—
Nine and seventy years.
He who sees not things as they are
Will never know Zen.
The sources say that Enni became ill at the beginning of the summer. On the fifteenth day of the tenth month he announced to his followers that he was about to die. They did not believe him. On the day of his death he ordered that the drum be beaten and his imminent death proclaimed. He sat down in his chair and wrote his last words. After adding the date and his signature, he wrote "Farewell" and died.

Enni was also known as Shoichi Kasho and, after his death, was called Shoichi Kokushi. Kokushi, "teacher of the nation, was a title given to a very revered priest. Enni was the first person to receive this title.

In the writings of the Taoist philosopher Lieh-tzu (fourth cent. B.C.), we find mention of two master archers whose arrows hit each other in midair. In the poem by Gesshu, the arrows do not fall back to the ground, but continue in a directionless flight through empty space. This image indicates a state of consciousness in which the concepts of the ordinary mind forming one's outlook on the world have vanished, and polarities (good-bad, life-death, etc.) are embraced in enlightened being.

✧

GIUN
義雲

*Died on the twelfth day of the tenth month, 1333
at the age of eighty-one*

All doctrines split asunder
Zen teaching cast away—
Fourscore years and one.
The sky now cracks and falls
The earth cleaves open—
In the heart of the fire
Lies a hidden spring.

✧

GIZAN ZENRAI
儀山善来

Died on the twenty-eighth day of March, 1878 at the age of seventy-seven

I was born into this world
I leave it at my death.
Into a thousand towns
My legs have carried me,
And countless homes—
What are all these?
A moon reflected in the water
A flower floating in the sky Ho!

"Ho!" is a translation of the word totsu, a kind of challenging cry uttered at the moment of enlightenment.

✦

GOKU KYONEN

悟空敬念

_Died on the eighth day of the tenth month, 1272
at the age of fifty-six_

The truth embodied in the Buddhas
Of the future, present, past;
The teaching we received from the Fathers of our faith
Can all be found at the tip of my stick.

When Goku felt his death was near, he ordered all his monk-disciples to gather around him. He sat at the pulpit, raised his stick, gave the floor a single tap with it, and said the poem above. When he finished he raised the stick again, tapped the floor once more and cried, "See! See!" Then, sitting upright, he died.

✦
Gudo was raised in a Zen monastery from the age of eight. When he was nineteen, he left to wander up and down Japan in search of the truth. Thus he later wrote, "I laugh at myself. After ten years of journeys and pilgrimages, here I am knocking on the gates of Zen, my walking stick cracked and my umbrella torn. The Buddha's teaching is basically a simple matter: if you are hungry, eat rice; if you are thirsty, drink tea; when it is cold, wrap yourself in a gown.

Gudo became a central figure in the Zen world of his time. He was honored with the most illustrious title possible coming from secular authorities—Kokushi, "teacher of the nation," a distinction generally reserved for the emperor's Zen teacher. When past the age of eighty, he was still wandering throughout Japan, seeing to the upkeep of temples and speaking to believers.

It is said that at the age of eighty-two, Gudo was invited by the emperor's father to speak before him. Midway through his talk Gudo became sleepy; he stretched out on the floor and began snoring loudly away. The father of the emperor sat calmly by, looking at Gudo's aged face and waiting for him to reawaken.

On the day of his death Gudo wrote, "I have finished my task. It is now up to my followers to work for mankind." He then put down his brush, yawned loudly, and died.
Coming, all is clear, no doubt about it.
Going, all is clear, without a doubt.
What, then, is it all?

Hosshin, also called Hosshimbo and Shosai, was a Japanese monk who sailed to China in the thirteenth century to study Zen. Since he could neither read nor write, his Chinese teacher drew a circle around the symbol \( 	ext{丁} \) and ordered the monk to meditate on that. Hosshin sat and reflected until "his rear became rotten and maggots bred there. This did not deter him from meditating, and he would see in everything the symbol. Only when the sign disappeared from his consciousness did he gain enlightenment.

A week before his death he declared, "I will die in seven days." No one heeded him, but on the seventh day following he spoke his last words as given above. When one of the monks requested that he add another phrase, Hosshin rebuked him with a sharp cry of "Katsu!" (a word signifying the attainment of enlightenment) and died.

\[\star\]

IKKYU SOJUN

一休宗純

Died on the twenty-first day of the eleventh month, 1481
at the age of eighty-eight

In all the kingdom southward
From the center of the earth
Where is he who understands my Zen?
Should the master Kido himself appear
He wouldn't be worth a worn-out cent.

Few children in Japan grow up ignorant of Ikkyu and the stories told about him. He was a monk, an author, and a poet, and his paintings, many of birds, are quite moving. Near the end of Ikkyu's life, the emperor put him in charge of Daitokuji in Kyoto, the chief temple of Rinzai Zen. More than either his literary and artistic talents or his religious message, however, his eccentric character was what made him the most famous of Japan's Zen masters. Ikkyu treated high and low, aristocrats and peasants, alike, and children loved him. He detested intellectual Zen, and it is said that he once burned all the manuscripts in his possession. He avoided neither taverns nor brothels, and he never held his tongue.

The kingdom described in Ikkyu's poem is the continent southward from Mount Shumi (Skt., Sumeru), a mythical peak which, according to ancient Indian tradition, stands at the center of the world. The four kingdoms extending from the mountain's four sides are supposed to contain all of humanity. The southern continent includes India, China, and Japan, the countries where Buddha's doctrine had been spread. The question "Where is he who understands my Zen?" is not to be taken as a boast. Where Zen ceases to be a doctrine and becomes reality, each individual stands alone, and no one can take his place. This being so, even the Chinese Zen master Kido Chigu (Hsü-tang Chih-yü, 1185-1269), whom Ikkyu considered his spiritual father, could neither add to nor detract from what Ikkyu was at that moment—an old man of eighty-eight years about to die.

Many of Ikkyu's writings deal with death. One of them ends with the following words: "And now, at the hour of my death, my bowels move—an offering raised to the Lord of Worlds." The frankness of the statement is characteristic of his style, but it ought not to be taken as profane. The image of a dying man who can no longer control his body and who defecates in his bed is no less "sacred" than that of a believer who brings flowers as an offering to his god; all is accepted with equanimity by the Lord of Worlds, the god Bonten (Skt., Brahmadeva).

INGO

院豪

Died on the twenty-first day of the eighth month, 1281
at the age of seventy-two

Three and seventy years
I've drawn pure water from the fire—
Now I become a tiny bug.
With a touch of my body
I shatter all worlds.

KAISEN SHOKI

快川紹喜

Died on the third day of the fourth month, 1582

In 1582 the samurai leader Oda Nobunaga (1534-82) captured a company of over one hundred Buddhist monks who were allies of his enemy. He ordered his men to pile dry branches around the prisoners and set fire to them all. Among the monks thus burned alive was Kaisen Shoki. According to one of the versions relating the last moments of this Zen master, one of his students asked him, "We cannot escape the passing away of all things in this world. Where now shall we turn in our search for the everlasting?" Kaisen replied, "Here it is before your eyes, in this very place. The monk pressed further, "What place is this before my eyes? With flames licking upward at his body, Kaisen responded, "If you have vanquished your selfhood, coolness will rise even from the

KASO SODON

華叟宗曇

Died on the twenty-seventh day of the sixth month, 1428
at the age of seventy-seven

A drop of water freezes instantly—
My seven years and seventy.
All changes at a blow
Springs of water welling from the fire.

Kaso was the teacher of Ikkyu (p. 102) and Yoso (p. 127). His comparison of his seventy-seven-year-long life to "a drop of water [that] freezes instantly" symbolizes transience, the essence of this world of senses according to Buddhist doctrine. The "blow" that changes all refers to enlightenment: a thing no longer contradicts its opposite, and time and space are no longer perceived through the concepts of the ordinary mind. Life may seem to flee in a moment, but when the mind is freed of the veil of ignorance and illusion that comes between the mind and the truth, life and death are only opposite sides of the same coin—"water welling from the fire."
KOGAKUSOKO

古岳宗旦

Died on the twenty-fourth day of the sixth month, 1548 at the age of eighty-four

My final words are these:
As I fall I throw all on a high mountain peak—Lo! All creation shatters; thus it is That I destroy Zen doctrine.

✦

KOGETSU SOGAN

江月宗玩

Died on the first day of the tenth month, 1643 at the age of seventy

Katsu!
Katsu!
Katsu!
Katsu!
Katsu!

The word katsu cannot really be translated conceptually. It is a sharp cry used by the Zen teacher and pupil at the moment of enlightenment. The cry appears in many Chinese and Japanese Zen writings and can be heard even today within monastery walls.
KOHO KENNICHI

高峯顯日

_Died on the twentieth day of the tenth month, 1316_ _at the age of seventy-six_

To depart while seated or standing is all one.
All I shall leave behind me
Is a heap of bones.
In empty space I twist and soar
And come down with the roar of thunder
To the sea.

Death in a Zen sitting position or death standing up was considered worthy of an enlightened person.

❖

KOKEI SOCHIN

古渓宗陳

_Died on the seventeenth day of the first month, 1597_
_at the age of sixty-six_

For over sixty years
I often cried _Katsu!_ to no avail.
And now, while dying,
Once more to cry _Katsu!_
Won't change a thing.

On the second day of the eighth month, 1596, the sixty-five-year-old Kokei took ill. Certain he would die soon, he composed his death poem. When he had finished reciting it, he "died." After six hours, however, he revived and began preaching to the monks who had gathered around his bed. Kokei abandoned the world for good about five months later.

KOZAN ICHIKYO

固山一筆

_Died on the twelfth day of the second month, 1360 at the age of seventy-seven_

Empty-handed I entered the world Barefoot I leave it.
My coming, my going—
Two simple happenings
That got entangled.

A few days before his death, Kozan called his pupils together, ordered them to bury him without ceremony, and forbade them to hold services in his memory. He wrote this poem on the morning of his death, laid down his brush, and died sitting upright.

MUMON GENSEN

無文元選

_Died on the twenty-second day of the third month, 1390 at the age of sixty-eight_ Lire is an ever-rolling wheel
And every day is the right one.
He who recites poems at his death
Adds frost to snow.

* * * *

Life is like a cloud of mist Emerging from a mountain cave
And death
A floating moon
In its celestial course.
If you think too much.
About the meaning they may have You'll be bound forever
Like an ass to a stake.

These are two separate poems. They were spoken, apparently one after the other, just before Mumon's death.

* *

MUSHO JOSHO

無象静照

*Died on the fifteenth day of the fifth month, 1306
at the age of seventy-three*

When it comes—just so!
When it goes—just so!
Both coming and going occur each day.
The words I am speaking now—just so!
The sources tell us that on the day of his death, Musho summoned the other monks, arranged for his burial service, said his last words, and died sitting upright.

"Just so!" or "Thus!" (nyoze) is a cry used by the Zen master to direct his pupil's attention to "things as they are or to indicate that the student sees things clearly.

MUSO SOSEKI

夢窓疎石

*Died on the thirtieth day of the ninth month, 1351
at the age of seventy-seven*

Thus have I rolled my life throughout Inside and out, reclined, upright.
What is all this?
A beating drum
A trumpet's blare
No more.

NAMPO JOMYO

南浦紹明

Died on the twenty-ninth day of the twelfth month, 1308 at the age of seventy-four

In 1301, exactly a year before his death, Nampo wrote:
This year, the twenty-ninth of the twelfth
No longer has a place to come to.
The twenty-ninth of the twelfth next year
Already has no place to go.

These words were taken, after his death, as proof that Nampo knew he would die in a year. And so it was: on the twenty-ninth day of the twelfth month, 1308, Nampo took up his brush, wrote the following poem, and died.

To hell with the wind!
Confound the rain!
I recognize no Buddha.
A blow like the stroke of lightning—
A world turns on its hinge.

◆

RANKEI DORYU

蘭渓道隆

Died in 1278
at the age of sixty-six

Thirty years and more
I worked to nullify myself.
Now I leap the leap of death.
The ground churns up
The skies spin round.
SEIGAN SOI

清岩宗渭

_Died on the twenty-first day of the eleventh month, 1661_
_at the age of seventy-four_

Joy of living,
Living joy... . .
Zen doctrine is null.
Before I die,
Here is the secret of my teaching—
My staff nods in agreement.

_Katsu!

To these words Seigan added the date of his death, pressed his seal, and ended with "Farewell."

◆

SEISETSU SHUCHO

誠拙周樗

_Died on the twenty-eighth day of the sixth month, 1820_
_at the age of seventy-six_

My hour draws near and I am still alive.
Drawn by the chains of death
I take my leave.
The King of Hades has decreed
Tomorrow I shall be his slave.

According to ancient tradition in India, the King of Hades," Emma-o (Skt., Yamaraja), is the underground ruler of the dead.
Sengai Gibon

仙厓義梵

Died on the seventh day of the tenth month, 1837
at the age of eighty-eight

He who comes knows only his coming
He who goes knows only his end.
To be saved from the chasm
Why cling to the cliff?
Clouds floating low
Never know where the breezes will blow them.

Sengai is one of the most colorful figures in Japanese history—a Zen monk, a painter, and a poet. His drawings and writings, both done with a flourish, vibrate with Zen insight and humor.

Sengai gives one to understand, in many of his poems and sketches, that a "lifeless" life is not worth living. He once presented to a newlywed a marriage present, a senryu written in her honor and urging her thus:

Young bride
Be alive till they say to you Die! Die!

In one of his sketches, a bent and bald old man is trying to outwit death. Above the picture Sengai wrote:

If you say, "Come back later,"
He will speedily come to snatch you away.
Say rather, "I shall not be in till I'm ninety-nine."
My sword leans against the sky.
With its polished blade I'll behead
The Buddha and all of his saints.
Let the lightning strike where it will.

It is said that after reciting this poem, Shumpo gave a single "laugh of derision" and died. To "behead / The Buddha" suggests spiritual independence and an awareness freed from the manner of thought dictated by religious tradition. According to Buddhist belief, a man who sins against religion and morality is liable to die by a stroke of lightning.

Several years before his death, as the disease which caused it worsened, Shumpo took leave of his disciples and followers with the following words:

At times I supported the sky, at times the earth; at times I turned into a dragon, at times to a snake. I wandered at will through the cycles of life and of death. All the fathers of our faith I took into my mouth. I give as I will and I take as I will. I slash the leopard with my teeth; my spirit smashes mountains.

After saying these words he let out a sharp cry of "Katsu!" Shumpo directed his disciples to burn his corpse and bury the ashes in the ground, forbidding them to erect a burial stone in his memory. He ended his will with the following poem:
No single bone in my body is holy—
It is but an ash heap of stinking bones.
Dig a deep hole and there bury these remains Thus, not a grain of dust will stain
The green mountains.

✦

SHUN'OKU SOEN
春屋宗園

_Died on the ninth day of the second month, 1611 at the age of eighty-three_

Adrift between the earth and sky
I call to the east and change it to west.
I flourish my staff and return once again
To my source.
   _Katsu!_

It is written that on the day of his death Shun'oku sensed that his end was near. He requested his attendant to hold his brush and dictated his death poem to him. Then he himself took the brush, wrote the date, signed his name and wrote "Farewell. He breathed his last a short while afterward.

✦

SUZUKI SHOSAN
鈴木正三
Shosan was born into a samurai family, and he fought in his master's service until his forty-second year. While still a warrior, he visited Zen masters to ask about "the matter of life and death." In 1620 he abandoned the way of the warrior and became a monk. He hated sectarianism and felt repulsed by an institutional framework. He thus never joined any one monastery, but chose instead to wander from one monastery to another, speaking to people and writing on Buddhist doctrine in a simple style that was understood by all. He often criticized organized religion and warned believers against the pursuit of honor and riches. Buddhism, he wrote, is not an abstract doctrine, but a way of life: for the warrior, the warrior's way; for the peasant, the peasant's way; for the artisan, the artisan's way; and for the merchant, the merchant's way. A person may choose whatever sect and manner of praying that suits him, provided he stays in the way with all his heart. As befit a man of samurai status, Shosan emphasized that the most important thing is to "look straight at death. To know death—that is the entire doctrine.

In the spring of 1655 Shosan became ill. When told that his illness was a grave one, he stated that it meant nothing, since he had already died more than thirty years before (when he became a monk?). As his condition became critical his followers gathered around his deathbed. One of them asked him to say "his final words." Shosan looked sharply at the monk and scolded him: "What are you saying? You only show that you don't understand what I've been saying for more than thirty years. Like this, I simply die."

TAIGEN SOFU
太陽崇孚 Died on the tenth day of the intercalary month, 1555
at the age of sixty

I raise the mirror of my life
Up to my face: sixty years.
With a swing I smash the reflection—
The world as usual
All in its place.

†

TAKUANSOHO

沢庵宗彭

Died on the eleventh day of the twelfth month, 1645 at the age of seventy-three

夢

Takuan's personality was extraordinary. He was a scholar, a painter, and a poet, close to the court, and admired by rulers and common people alike, although he refused to regard anyone as his disciple, for he did not consider himself a teacher. At the age of thirty-seven he was appointed head monk of Daitokuji temple in Kyoto. Takuan, who hated having power and authority, abandoned the temple after three days. He turned down honorary titles, and when he was invited by the shogun to serve under him, he refused. He once disobeyed the shogun and was exiled to the distant hills. When his banishment was lifted and he was ordered to return to the city, Takuan replied that he preferred the mountains and had no desire to return to the "filthy and crowded Edo."
Lying on his deathbed, Takuan at first refused to write a death poem. At last he gave in to the entreaties of those surrounding him, took up his brush, and drew the character for "dream," shown above. When he finished, he threw the brush down and died. Takuan had requested beforehand that his body be burned on a mountain, that no burial service be held, and that no tombstone be put up for him.

TETSUGEN DOKO

鉄眼道光

_Died on the twenty-second day of the third month, 1682 at the age of fifty-three_

Full of great changes
My three and fifty years have been.
I commented on the holy writ—a heavy sin
That echoes to the skies.
Now I will sail on the lake of lotus blooms
And break into the skies within the water.

Tetsugen is known as a scholar who edited, wrote commentaries on, and published many Zen writings. Such an undertaking might be considered praiseworthy in some religions, but many Zen Buddhists believe that Zen must be taught "not by means of the written word, but by a pointed finger. Tetsugen did not, however, let words stand between him and life.

In 1682 there was a famine in Japan. Tetsugen used his entire fortune, which had been dedicated to the printing of Buddhist texts, to distribute food to the hungry. "To feed the poor we must sell the temples and holy writings, he said. It is said that in giving aid to the starving he knew no fatigue, and that through contact with them
"fleas stuck to his gown. His efforts saved about ten thousand people.

In the same year, Tetsugen's strength gave out, and he became ill and died. His funeral was attended by approximately one hundred thousand people, many of whom he had saved from famine, and "the sound of the mourners' weeping shook the fields and the forests.

Buddhist tradition envisions paradise as a lake covered with lotus plants.

TETTO GIKO
徹翁義亨

Died on the fifteenth day of the fifth month, 1369
at the age of seventy-five

I look now at the very moment
Even the Buddha is dumbfounded.
All turns with a swing.
I land on the plain of nothingness.

Tetto wrote his death poem on the last day of his life. Several days before his death, he had given a sealed message to his followers, forbidding them to read it while he was alive. After he died they read the following words:

The truth is never taken From another.
One carries it always
By oneself.

Katsu!
TOSUI UNKEI 桃水雲渓

Died on the nineteenth day of the ninth month, 1683
past the age of seventy

Seventy years and more
I have tasted life to its utmost.
The stench of urine sticks to my bones.
What matter all these?
Ho! Where is the place I return to?
Above the peak the moonlight whitens
A clear wind blows.

Tosui, who was called by all "the holy beggar, entered a monastery at the age of seven. As an adolescent he often fasted and secluded himself. He refused to join any one sect and never stayed long in one place. In one of the monasteries where he spent several years, he found himself—against his will—teaching Zen. At the height of the teaching season he wrote the following words on the monastery gate before abandoning the place:

Today is the end of religion's work—
Go back, all of you, to your homes.
I leave before you,
Eastward or westward,
Wherever the wind might carry me.

After wandering throughout Japan, Tosui joined the beggars of Kyoto and lived among them. One day one of his former pupils found him there. Tosui was dressed in rags, his hair growing wildly, and he carried a straw mat on his back. The pupil asked to join him, but Tosui rebuked him and tried to send him away. In spite of this the young monk put on begging clothes and followed his master. Tosui spoke not a word to him. In the town of Katata near Lake Biwa the two of them found the corpse of a beggar and buried it. When the pupil exclaimed, "Poor man," Tosui turned to him and scolded him: "Why pity the man? The most honored of men and the most wretched of beggars share a single fate—death." Tosui then sat to eat the rice porridge that the beggar had left, murmuring as he ate it, "Mm, good." Suddenly he turned to his pupil and ordered him, "Eat this!" As he had no choice but to obey, the pupil placed a small portion of the porridge in his mouth, but he was unable to swallow it and gagged it up again. "I warned you not to follow me," Tosui reproached him, and sent him away.

Thus it was that Tosui wandered from place to place, supporting himself by weaving straw boots to cover the legs of horses in winter and by carrying people on his back. For a while he lived in the city of Otsu (Shiga Prefecture) under a straw roof stretched over the space between two storehouses. At the same time, a certain stable hand, who considered Tosui a holy man, brought him a portrait of the Buddha Amida. On the picture Tosui wrote the following verse:

Though my dwelling be small
I take you in, Lord Amida—
But don't think for a minute
I need you for life after death.

Tosui spent the last years of his life in Kyoto, living at first under a bridge and later in a half-demolished shack in the outskirts of the city. He died sitting upright in a Zen position, his death poem lying beside his body.

TOYO EICHO
東陽英朝

Died on the twenty-fourth day of the eighth month, 1504
at the age of seventy-seven

All four pillars of enlightenment
Crumble at once—
See! See!
Moonlight wreathing coral branches—
What does it mean?
Now all grows as dark
As the palace of hell in The grasp of Satan

Katsu!

Toyo wrote these words while sitting upright; he then put down his brush and died.

The "four pillars of enlightenment" are four qualities ascribed to nirvana by Buddhist scriptures: everlastingness, contentment, truth (liberation from the illusions of self), and purity. Nirvana is described as a state beyond life and death, but while dying Toyo looks straight at death and sees in it the naked truth of absolute destruction. For a moment he considers the image of perfection and harmony (the moon lighting the corals in the water), but this vision gives way to a darker one of death. The final "Katsu!" wipes out the several images and brings the poem back to the here and now at the moment of death.

TSUGEN JAKUREI

通幻寂霊
From the day of my coming hither
Full seventy years have passed.
Now, setting out on my final path
My two legs trample the sky.

UNGO KIYO

I came into the world after Buddha.
I leave the world before Miroku.
Between the Buddha of the beginning and the Buddha of the end
I am not born, I do not die.

On the first day of the eighth month, 1659, Ungo shut himself up in his room and prepared for the end. On the eighth day he emerged and gave a sealed envelope to the monk who attended him. He then called his pupils together and preached to them one final time. In the middle of his sermon, exactly at noon, he died. When his pupils opened the envelope they found his last words.

The historical Buddha is Gautama Siddhartha (sixth to fifth cents. B.C.), also called Shakyamuni, "the sage from the Shakya clan," the founder of Buddhism. Miroku (Skt., Maitreya) is the name of a mythical Buddha who is seated in the heavens and who will in the last days (5 billion 670 million years after Shakyamuni's death) inherit the place now occupied by the historical Buddha. These two personages mark the beginning and end of historical time. Ungo does not deny his own existence in time as a person who was born, who lived in a certain period, and who died. By "I am not born, I do not die, he indicates the level at which his consciousness dwells. On this level, life and death are nothing but illusions of the imagination.

YAKUO TOKUKEN

約翁徳儉

_Died on the nineteenth day of the fifth month, 1320_
_at the age of seventy-six_

My six and seventy years are through.
I was not born, I am not dead.
Clouds floating on the high wide skies
The moon curves through its million-mile course.

Two days before his death, Yakuo called his fellow monks together and said, "The words of a man before he dies are no small matter. This is a barrier that all must pass through. Tell me each of you what you think about that. The monks answered in various ways, and Yakuo neither approved nor disapproved. The next day he ordered his pupils to burn his body and forbade them to hold an elaborate burial ceremony. "Tomorrow morning," he said, "I shall eat the rice porridge with you for breakfast, and at noon I shall go. The following day at noon he wrote his final words, threw the brush from his hand, and died sitting upright.
YOSO SOI

養叟宗頤

_Died on the twenty-seventh day of the sixth month, 1458_
_at the age of eighty-three_

Katsu!

On the death bed—Katsu!
Let he who has eyes see!
Katsu! Katsu! Katsu!
And once again, Katsu!

Katsu!

Yoso was a pupil of Kaso's (p. 105). When Kaso died, Yoso, then fifty-three years old, pledged to himself that he would leave the world on the same day of the same month as his master. And so it was that thirty years to the day after Kaso's death, this vow was fulfilled.

Yoso asked his attendant to hold his brush and to write his death poem during his very last moments. Whatever the meaning hidden in Yoso's "Katsu!" may be, there is certainly an appeal to look straight at an eighty-three-year-old man about to die.

❖

ZOSAN JUNKU

蔵山順空

_Died on the fifth day of the fifth month, 1308_
_at the age of seventy-six_

You must play
The tune of non-being yourself—
Nine summits collapse
Eight oceans go dry.

The "tune of non-being" does not refer to death, but to a state wherein the enlightened awareness is no longer bound by such polarities as life and death. "Nine summits" separated by eight oceans" represent the world as pictured in Indian myth. The tallest mountain, Mount Shumi, stands in the center, surrounded by the eight other peaks. Death is here described as a cosmic event, together with the consciousness that the world and all within it disappears.

ZOSO ROYO

蔵叟朗誉

Died on the fifth day of the sixth month, 1276
at the age of eighty-four

I pondered Buddha's teaching
A full four and eighty years.
The gates are all now locked about me.
No one was ever here—
Who then is he about to die,
And why lament for nothing?
Farewell!
The night is clear,
The moon shines calmly,
The wind in the pines
Is like a lyre's song.
With no I and no other
Who hears the sound?
PART THREE

DEATH POEMS

by

HAIKU POETS
AKI-NO-BO

秋之坊

Died on the fourth day of the first month, 1718

The fourth day of the new year: what better day to leave the world?

Shōgatsu yokka yorozu kono yo o saru ni yoshi

In the traditional Japanese calendar, there are "good days" and "bad days." The custom, which is followed to a certain extent even today, is to have ceremonies and other events take place on days of good fortune, and to avoid performing important activities on days of bad fortune. The first three days of the new year are good days. New Year's celebrations cease by the fourth day, and with them ends good fortune.

One account of Aki-no-Bo's death is as follows:

Aki-no-Bo died on the fourth day of the first month. On the very day he was visited by his friend, the poet Rito. As was his custom, Aki-no-Bo stretched out on his stomach and chatted with Rito. Among other things, he said, "I made a calendar [a collection of poems, one for each day of the year]. Listen to this: 'The fourth day / of the new year: what better day / to leave the world? Aki-no-Bo had no sooner finished reciting the verse than he nodded his head and died. Filled with wonder, Rito thought about how Aki-no-Bo had always lived forgetful of himself, now dying in the same way. With tears of sorrow and admiration streaming from his eyes, Rito composed on the spot the following poem: "He made as if to be asleep / and slipped away / Aki-no-Bo [Inetsumu to / misete usekeri / Aki-no-Bo]." Rito buried his friend, who had lived as a monk with no family, with due pomp and ceremony."

The authenticity of this version has been doubted, because the death poem above appears seven years before Aki-no-Bo's death, written by the poet Ryoto (p. 269). However, as the source of the story is generally quite trustworthy, it can be granted that the poet died as described, and that he merely borrowed his last poem from his contemporary Ryoto.

It is known that Aki-no-Bo was of the samurai class and that he became a monk. He lived in a hut which he built on temple grounds in the city of Kanazawa. His shack was called Shujitsu-an, "hut of the autumn sun." (The name Aki-no-Bo means "autumn monk.") He lived a life of poverty and on winter days would borrow charcoal to keep himself warm.

Aki-no-Bo met the poet Basho twice, once in 1689 and once in 1690. At their first meeting the two of them are said to have sat together without exchanging a single word. The second time, Basho dedicated a poem to the monk:

No sign in the cicada's song that it will soon be gone

Yagate shinu keshiki wa miezu semi no koe

♦

AMANO HACHIRO
天野八郎

Died on the fifth, day of the eleventh month, 1868
at the age of thirty-eight

Lightning flickers only in the north:
the moon is overcast.

Kita ni nomi inazuma arite tsuki kurashi

In 1868 a new political and social order began in Japan with the Meiji Restoration. The armies of several fiefs (han) rebelled against the Tokugawa shogun, forced him to surrender, and took over Edo, the capital. This put an end to the long rule of the Tokugawa, and governmental authority was restored, in appearance at least, to the emperor. The greater part of the army of the shogunate surrendered, but its fleet retreated to the island of Hokkaido and continued in its resistance to the new rule until May 1869. Hachiro, who supported the old regime, tried to join the shogun's forces in Hokkaido, but he was captured and thrown into prison, where he died.

The reference to lightning in the north is not only a summer image, but an allusion to the last bulwark of the old regime's supporters in the north of Japan.

❖

ARIMARU

蟻丸

Died in the twelfth month, 1703

Running shallow with a year's end sound: river rapids.
Kawa no se ni shiwasu no oto no nagarekeri

❖

ASEI

蛙井

Died in 1752

Flowers of the grass: scarcely shown, and withered name and all.
Nora ni saku na wa kore made zo kusa no hana

The blossoming of cherries in the spring evokes in haiku poets a feeling of wonder at nature's beauty. But facing the blossoming of grasses and nameless field and garden flowers at the beginning of autumn, Asei grieves for that which comes and goes, yet leaves no lasting impression.

✿

ATSUJIN

日人

_Died on the thirtieth day of the fourth month, 1836_
_at the age of seventy-nine_

Earth and metal... although my breathing ceases time and tide go on.

_Tsuchi kane ya_
_iki wa taete mo_
tsukihi ari

_Tsuchi_ means "earth" and _kane_ is "metal". There is no particular significance in the combination _tsuchi kane_, and the poet's intention is not clear.

✿

BAIKA

梅價

_Died on the third day of the third month, 1843_
_at the age of seventy_

People, when you see the smoke, do not think it is fields they're burning.

_No o yaku to_ _hito na omoi so_ hito-kemuri

On clear days without wind at the beginning of spring, village people gather to bum off the withered fields of winter. The burning fertilizes the ground and rids it of harmful insects. Here, however, the poet refers to the smoke rising from the cremation of his body.

✦

BAIKO

梅幸

Died in February, 1903
at the age of sixty

Plum petals falling
I look up—the sky,
a clear crisp moon.

Chiru ume ni miaguru sora no tsuki kiyoshi

The ume is a variety of plum found in the Far East. This tree holds an important place in the literature of China and Japan. In ancient Japanese literature the word hana, "flower," meant "plum blossom," and only later did the cherry replace the plum as the symbol for blooming in general.
Ancient tradition even treats the plum as a holy tree. The plum blossoms earlier than other trees, sometimes at the end of winter or the first of spring, even before it has budded leaves. The commonest variety has white flowers which give off a strong scent.

✦

BAINEN

梅年

Died on the twelfth day of January, 1905
at the age of eighty

Now spring has come

Itomagoi into my world: wagavo-no-haru no farewell! kitarikeri

                                                                                    ✦

BAIRYU
梅笠

Died on the eleventh day of the sixth month, 1863 at the age of fifty-nine

O hydrangea— Ajisai ya you change and change kawari kawarite back to your primal color. moto no iro

The hydrangea (ajisai) is a bush from one to two meters high. Its thick leaves are saw-toothed and armed with sharp edges. In the summer its flowers bloom in clusters. The common name for the flower is nanabake, "seven changes," as it changes color seven times, from shades of green to yellow, blue, purple, pink, and finally back to green. This flower was introduced to the West by the German doctor Philipp Franz van Siebold (1796-1866), one of the first Western men to teach the Japanese medicine, languages, and sciences, and one of the first to investigate the history, geography, and folklore of Japan.

                                                                                    ✦

BAISEI
梅星

Died on the first day of the first month, 1745

Island of Eternity: Hōrai ya

Hōrai ya
The word horai initially meant one of the three mountains in "the islands of paradise," where, according to a Chinese fable, the secret of immortality is found. In Japan the word came to be used for various New Year's foods and decorations, all of which are associated, in one way or another, with longevity. The turtle (kame), itself a symbol of long life, is pictured in Chinese and Japanese paintings as floating on the surface of water and carrying Mount Horai on its back. For this reason, the turtle appears among New Year's decorations in Japan.

The first rays of the sun on New Year's Day are called hatsu-hi; many Japanese stay up all night to be sure to see these. Hatsu-hinata, "first sun-basking," seems to be a word made up by Baisei. Did he watch the sun lighting up the turtle decoration in his house, or did he see a vision of that mythical turtle floating on the sunlit ocean, carrying on its back the "Island of Eternity"?

\[\text{BAISEKI}\]

\[\text{梅石}\]

\[\text{Died on the sixteenth day of the ninth month, 1716 at the age of sixty-seven}\]

The journey west, Daremo negau a way that all would travel: \(\text{hanano o nishi e}\) flower field. \(\text{angya kana}\)

In the Jodo, or Pure Land, sects of Buddhism, it is believed that the dead are born anew in the Pure Land in the West ruled by Amida, the Buddha of Everlasting Light. Death is often pictured as a journey westward.
BAKO

馬光

Died on the first day of the fifth month, 1751 at the age of sixty-five

Looking back at the valley:
no more dwellings, only the cuckoo cries.

The hototogisu, a species of cuckoo, winters in southern Asia and migrates to Japan in the middle of May, where it stays until autumn, its voice echoing across the plains and hills. The female lays her eggs in the nest of the nightingale, shoving the nightingale eggs out of the nest to make room for her own. One written form of hototogisu consists of the Chinese characters for "time" and "bird." This "bird of time" often appears in poetry as a messenger of death.

* ✿ *

BANKOKU

盤谷

Died on the third day of the eleventh month, 1748 at the age of seventy

The longest winter night:
plum petals fall and finally the western moon.

Toji, the winter solstice, is the shortest day of the year, falling north of the equator on December twenty-first or twenty-second. The "western moon" (nishi no tsuki) alludes to the Pure Land in the West.
BANZAN

晩山

Died on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, 1730
at the age of sixty-nine

Farewell—
I pass as all things do dew on the grass.

Mame de iyo mi wa narawashi no kusa no tsuyu

Dew (tsuyu), covering the grass and trees of autumn, evaporates as the sun rises. Dew is one of the images signifying transience in Japanese poetry, and Buddhist literature often refers to the world as "a world of dew."

BASHO

芭蕉

Died on the twelfth day of the tenth month, 1694
at the age of fifty-one

On a journey, ill:
my dream goes wandering
over withered fields.

Tabi ni yande yume wa kareno o kakemeguru

This is the last poem of one of the greatest haiku poets. Basho had fallen seriously ill on one of his travels. When his pupils hinted that he ought to leave a farewell poem, he replied that any of his poems could be his death poem. Nevertheless, on the eighth day of the tenth month, after gathering his pupils around his bed, he wrote this poem. He died four days later.

❖

BENSEKI

鞭石

Died on the fifteenth day of the second month, 1728
at the age of eighty

Child of the way,
I leave at last—a willow on the other shore.

Tsui ni yuku
kishi no yanagi ya nori no chigo

Nori no chigo, "child of the way," expresses not only the dream of an eighty-year-old man to renew his youth, but contains a play on words as well. In his last years Benseki abandoned the world and became a monk, changing his name to Honi, the Chinese-derived pronunciation of the characters used to write nori no [chi]go. "Honi" can mean both "child of the way" and "child of the doctrine."

The willow (yanagi), common throughout Japan, is a tall tree that grows on the banks of rivers and lakes, its slender branches stretching down as thin as strings. A willow tree is often mentioned in haiku as a picture of spring, its branches covered with green and drifting in the wind.

The image of a journey from one bank of a river to the other appears often in Buddhist literature as a symbol of the transition from the state of ignorance and illusion to that of enlightenment.

❖

BOKUKEI
Bokukei (Nakajima Saburosuke) fell in battle against the emperor's army in the Meiji Restoration. He was a friend of Hogyoku's (p. 188) and died five days after him, together with his own two sons.

The cuckoo has a red mouth, and because of this, or perhaps because of the bird's sharp call, a popular saying has arisen that "when the cuckoo sings, its blood flows."

---

BOKUSUI

墨水

* Died on the twenty-ninth day of November, 1914 at the age of forty

A parting word? Jisei nado

The melting snow is odorless. Zansetsu ni ka mo nakarikeri

---

BUFU

蕪風
Died on the twenty-fourth day of the seventh month, 1792

Oh, I don't care where autumn clouds are drifting to.

Ä mama yo izuku e chiro to aki no kumo

✦

BUNZAN

蚊 山

Died on the fourteenth day of the first month, 1787

I crossed from last year to the new—today's the limit.

Shōgatsu no toshi koe kyō o kagiri nari

✦

BUSON

蕪村

Died on the twenty-fifth day of the twelfth month, 1783
at the age of sixty-eight

Of late the nights are dawning plum-blossom white.

Shiraume ni akaru yo bakari to narinikeri

Buson was one of Japan's greatest poets. His poetry influenced modern haiku even more, perhaps, than that of Basho. The poetry of Buson, who was also a talented painter, is full of color and fine details.
About a month before his death, Buson is said to have gone picking mushrooms in the hills, and on his return he fell ill. On the twenty-fourth day of the twelfth month, on the evening of his death, he called his disciple Gekkei, gave him a brush, and asked him to write down three poems. The image of a nightingale appears in the first two poems, and in the third that of a plum. Both images are associated with the late winter and early spring season.

✦

CHIBOKU

知木

_Died on the twenty-eighth day of the fifth month, 1740 at the age of forty-four_

The running stream is cool—the pebbles underfoot.

_Yuku mizu to tomo ni suzushiku ishi kawa ya_

✦

CHIKURO

竹露

_Died on the twenty-third day of March, 1895 at the age of seventy-one_ Butterflies in flight: the journey's end—Suma Akashi.

_Chō tobu ya miateshi tabi wa Suma Akashi_ Suma is a region of Kobe along the coast of Osaka Bay; Akashi is a nearby city and the name of a strait opening into the bay. The area is noted for its beautiful scenery.

CHINE

千子

* Died on the fifteenth day of the fifth month, 1688 at the age of about twenty-eight

It lights up Moeyasuku as lightly as it fades: mata kieyasuki
a firefly. hotaru kana

Chine was the sister of Mukai Kyorai (1651-1704), a disciple and friend of Basho's. After Chine's death Kyorai wrote:

Sadly I see Te no ue ni
the light fade on my palm: kanashiku kiyuru
a firefly. hotaru kana

The Kyoraisho (Writings of Kyorai, 1775) tells us that shortly after Chine's death, Kyorai aired out her summer wardrobe. Just at that time he received a poem that was written in his sister's memory by Basho:

Airing out the robe Naki hito no of one who is no more: kosode mo imaya autumn cleaning. doyōboshi

CHIRI

千里 Died on the eighteenth day of the seventh month, 1716
at the age of sixty-nine

First crops: Shimmai ya
   my pillow fluffed up high, chagayu kuratte
I gulp down rice and tea. takamakura

Chiri died in the autumn, during the rice harvest. Shimmai, "new rice," is considered tastier than rice stored from the previous harvest. In the past the Japanese would bring the firstfruits of the harvest to the temples.

Chagayu is a gruel made from rice, green tea, and salt. Takamakura, "high pillow," refers metaphorically to peaceful sleep, free from the worries of this world.

♦

CHIRI
千里

Died on the seventeenth day of September, 1917 at the age of sixteen

Feast of the Dead— Bon wa itsu made how long can it go on? tsuzuku koto yara lanterns hung up high. takatōro

It would seem that by "lanterns hung up high" (takatōro) the poet had in mind the lights which are hung in the doorway during the Bon Festival, which would have taken place some months before her death.

♦

CHIRIN
智輪

Died on the twenty-fourth day of the twelfth month, 1794
at the age of sixty

In earth and sky no grain of dust—
snow on the foothills.

Ametsuchi ni
chiri naki yuki no fumoto kana

Chin naki means "without dust." The poem is evidently a play on words using the poet's name: Chirin naki would mean "without Chirin."

♦

CHIYOJO

千代女

Died on the nineteenth day of the first month, 1746 past the age of twenty

A fawn frolics
in the field—I put on my new spring robe.

No ni asobu kanoko mo ureshi kisohajime

Kisohajime refers to fresh clothes worn on New Year's Day, which fell around the beginning of spring when the lunar calendar was used. The Japanese, principally women and children, wear new kimonos made especially for the occasion. Chiyojo makes a pun on the word kanoko, which signifies literally a fawn but also refers to a particular white-spotted tie-dyed pattern on a kimono, perhaps on the one she was wearing that year.
CHIYONI

千代尼

Died on the eighth day of the ninth month, 1775
at the age of seventy-three

I saw the moon as well and now, world,
"truly yours . . ."

Tsuki mo mite ware wa kono yo o kashiku kana

Chiyoni, one of the best-known women haiku poets, became a Buddhist nun at the age of fifty-two. In her death poem she creates a metaphor of life as a letter. Kashiku is a phrase used by women to end their letters.

✦

CHOGO

朝伍

Died on the third day of the ninth month, 1806
at the age of forty-five

I long for people—
then again I loathe them:
end of autumn.

Hito koishi hito mutsukashishi aki no kure

✦

CHOHA

超波
Died in 1740
at the age of thirty-six

A raging sea thrown from the deck—
a block of ice.

Araumi e fune kara nageru kōri kana

CHOKO
暢好

 Died on the second day of the tenth month, 1731
at the age of forty-six

This final scene I'll not see to the end—my dream is fraying.

Sue ikki mi hatenu yume no
hotsure kana

Choko lived through the spring, summer, and autumn of his last year, dying on the second day of winter. One can also understand "this final scene" in the light of one belief, according to which man is given fifty years to live. Choko missed achieving his allotted life-span by four years.

CHORA
蝶羅

 Died on the sixth day of the fifth month, 1776
at the age of fifty-four

"Paradise," Gokuraku to I murmur, sleeping in my netted tent.

After his death, Chora's wife, Motojo, answered with a poem of mourning:

The drone of the mosquitoes round the netting, too, is sad.

Chora died in summer, when netting is hung down from the ceiling to form a kind of chamber, as protection from mosquitoes and flies.

*+

CHORI

登里

* Died on the nineteenth day of the tenth month, 1778
  at the age of thirty-nine

Leaves never fall in vain—from all around bells tolling.

*+

CHOSHI

蝶之

* Died on the twenty-fifth day of the eighth month, 1768
  at the age of fifty-one

On its way west to paradise—michi o nishi e to migrating bird.
wataridori

CHOSUI

鳥酔

*Died on the fourth day of the fourth month, 1769
at the age of sixty-nine*

I wait, white clouds Koki usuki and dark clouds passing—kumo o machiete
a cuckoo cries.
hototogisu

CHOWA

調和

*Died on the seventeenth day of the tenth month, 1715
at the age of seventy-eight*

This is one poem
Kono ikku people won't dispute—shūghihan nashi
the winds of winter.
kogarashi no

DAIBAI
大梅

Died on the twenty-ninth day of the fifth month, 1841 at the age of seventy

My seventy years—a withered pampas tail and all around it iris blooming.

Nanajū ya ayame no naka no kareobana

The ayame is a species of iris which grows on the hillsides and in the fields of Japan, to a height of from thirty to fifty centimeters. Its leaves are long and narrow, its flowers purple, the base of its petals yellow.

Obana, "tail plant" (from kareobana) is the name of the Japanese pampas grass, which is also called susuki. This plant, the head of which resembles the bushy tail of an animal, grows all over the hills and fields of Japan and is used for making straw roofs, sacks, brooms, and mats. It provides food for farm animals, and a fever-abating medicine is made from it.

Daibai died in summer, when the ayame blossoms. He likens his old age to a withered pampas plant (kareobana), though the pampas itself dies in winter.

Daibai was originally a scholar of Chinese literature. When he began to devote himself to haiku, his colleagues complained to him, Among those of us who studied together, one has become a writer of kyoka and one a writer of popular romances. And now you, Daibai, want to be a haiku poet?" Daibai answered his critics with a verse:

You cannot tell its taste to him who never tasted blowfish.

Fugu kuwanu hito ni wa iwaji fugu no aji

The blowfish (fugu) is considered a delicacy, but preparing it requires considerable skill. If the poison in the fish's body is not successfully removed, it can cause death.
DOHAKU
道伯
Died in 1675

Cargoless, bound heavenward, ship of the moon.

There is a play on words in the original. Tsumi can mean "sin" as well as "loading." The first phrase could thus be rendered "sinless."

Tsuki no fune means, as translated, "ship of the moon," but the phrase can also be understood as "ship beneath the moon."

+

DONSUI
呑水
Died on the fourth day of the tenth month, 1729

Lotus seeds in ten directions jumping playfully.

The lotus (hasu) is a perennial broad-leaved water plant found in ponds and marshes. In summer it blossoms white and scarlet and gives off a strong scent. For three days the lotus flower opens at sunrise and closes in the afternoon, withering on the fourth day. The lotus is one of the symbols of Buddhism, and tradition pictures the Pure Land in the West as a lotus-covered lake. The journey to the world of the dead is sometimes pictured as a boat trip across such a lake.
ENRYO

燕凌

Died on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, 1855 at the age of fifty-five

Autumn waters of this world wake me from my drunkenness.

Yoizame no kore ya konoyo no aki no mizu

One Japanese custom is to give water known as shinimizu, "death water," to the dying. The practice is not only a means of relieving the parched lips of the dying person: he is always given the water by a close relative or a good friend, and the waters often come from a particular source. This ancient custom may have had its beginnings in the belief that water binds the soul of the dying to the world it is trying to leave.

In Enryo's poem, the last waters of this world are "autumn waters" (aki no mizu), for the poet died early in this season. The waters waken the dying person from the intoxications of his life and sober him from the illusions of existence.

ENSEI

延清

Died on the sixteenth day of the fifth month, 1725 at the age of sixty-nine

A parting gift to my body: just when it wishes, I'll breathe my last.

Itsu totemo iki hikitoru ga mi no seibo
In the last days of the old year the Japanese customarily send gifts known as seibo to their friends and relatives, thanking them for kindnesses bestowed throughout the year. Ensei thanks his body for services rendered during his life, and as a "parting gift," he is ready to rid it of the soul whenever it wishes.

---

ENSETSU

燕説

Died on the nineteenth day of the ninth month, 1743
at the age of seventy-three

Autumn gust:
Kono kai ni
I have no further business ni-do to yō nashi
in this world.
aki no kaze

Ensetsu grew up in a Zen Buddhist temple and in his later years served as a priest. To the haiku written before his death he attached, as was the custom among Zen monks, a death poem in Chinese as well:

Many things befell me as I followed Buddha
Three and seventy years.
What is death?
Freely, from my own true self,
Ho! Ho!

"Ho!" is a translation of totsu, a cry of enlightenment.

Ensetsu was very much attached to his haiku master, Rosen (p. 266), with whom he roamed all over Japan. When Ensetsu heard of his master's having fallen ill, he hastened to his side, though he himself was suffering from severe stomach pains. From the day Rosen died, Ensetsu's disease worsened, and he survived his master less than a month.
ENSHI
燕枝

_Died on the twelfth day of February, 1900 at the age of sixty-three_

All moving things come to an end:
_a knotty willow._

_Kobu_ means "swelling" and can refer to a knot in the wood of the tree. The same word applies, however, to the tumors of diseases afflicting man.

FUFU
浮風

_Died on the seventeenth day of the fifth month, 1162 at the age of sixty-one_

My companion in the skies of death, _a cuckoo._

_FUJO_
風状

Died on the twenty-seventh day of the eighth month, 1764 at the age

Rise, let us go—along the path lies the clear dew.

Okiagari
yukamuzu michi no tsuyu kiyoshi

◆

FUKAKU
不角

Died on the twenty-first day of the sixth month, 1753
at the age of ninety-two Empty cicada shell:  Utsu semi wa as we come  moto no hadaka ni we go back naked.  modorikeri

The larva of the cicada (semi) stays underground a number of years. In summer it emerges from the ground, sheds its armored skin, and unfolds its wings. The hard cicada shells cling to tree trunks or lie on the ground. The shell is not actually the cicada's corpse, but the cicada that emerges from it, flutters here and there, and utters shrill cries is destined to die within a few days.

◆

FUKYU
普求
Died on the twenty-first day of the seventh month, 1771
at the age of seventy-nine

A bright and pleasant autumn day to make death's journey.

Kokochiyoshi

Died on the twenty-ninth day of the eleventh month, 1777
at the age of fifty-seven

Today, then, is the day the melting snowman is a real man.

Kyō to iu kyō zo makoto no yukibotoke

Fusen died in the depth of winter, and the image of a man melting like a snowman is a seasonal one.

Yukibotoke (yuki, snow; botoke, from hotoke, Buddha) is one term for "snowman" in Japanese; however, the word yukidaruma, "Daruma of snow," is more popular. Snowmen are built to represent the Indian monk Daruma (Skt., Bodhidharma), who, according to tradition, wandered to China in 520 A.D. and founded there the Zen Buddhist sect. The expression yukibotoke has an additional meaning, for hotoke is a term used by the Japanese for any person who has died. The image is not only seasonal, but one of transience.

Fuso
不争

Died on the eleventh day of the fourth month, 1886
at the age of forty-seven

Upon the lotus flower morning dew is thinning out.

Asatsuyu no usura kiekeri hasu no hana

✿

FUWA

風和

Died in the second month, 1712

The earth is fragrant with plum petals falling on my way home.

Ume chirishi nioi no tsuchi o kokyō e zo

Fuwa, a resident of Yamagata, in northern Japan, died away from home in Kyoto in the plum-blossom season. In the cold northern regions of Japan, the plum blossoms later than elsewhere in the country.

Kokyo, which refers to one's birthplace, also suggests the "place" from which man comes and to which he returns.

✿

GAKI

我鬼

Died on the twenty-fourth day of July, 1927
at the age of thirty-six
One spot, alone, left glowing in the dark:
my snotty nose.

Mizubana ya hana no saki dake
kure nokoru

Gaki, better known by his real name, Akutagawa Ryunosuke, prefaced his poem with the words "laughing at myself." He gave the poem to his aunt on the night of July twenty-third and asked her to deliver it the next morning to the family doctor, who was himself a haiku poet. The same night Akutagawa killed himself by drinking poison.

Akutagawa was one of Japan's greatest modern authors. A short time after his birth his mother became insane, which cast a heavy shadow on his life. One of his first stories, entitled Hana (Nose), won much praise from the writer Natsume Soseki (1867-1916) and put Akutagawa well into the literary scene of his age.

❖

GANSAN

Died in 1895
at the age of eighty-one

Blow if you will, fall wind-the flowers have all faded.

Fukaba fuke hana wa suna zo
aki no kaze

❖

GAZEN

瓦全
Died on the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month, 1825
at the age of eighty-two

I lean against the stove and lo!
eternity.

Motaretaru
kotatsu sunawachi jakkōdo

A kotatsu is a low table under which a heating device is placed and over which a large padded tablecloth is spread. People sit on cushions and stretch their legs beneath the table, gathering the edge of the cloth around the lower part of their bodies.

Jakkodo means "peaceful land of eternal light." It is another of the many names given by Buddhists to the next life or to the state of enlightenment.

Gazen died in the middle of winter. Are we to picture death coming instantly to a man, as if one moment he may be leaning on the kotatsu warming his bones, and the next he finds himself in "eternity"? It is perhaps preferable to read the poem as an image of one place and time. Gazen's eighty-two years must have taught him that this world of the senses and the realm of the absolute are found wherever one sees them.

*+

GENGEN'ICHI

Died on the twenty-fifth day of the eighth month, 1804
at the age of sixty-three

Morning glory
even though you wither dawn will break anew.

Asagao ya
shibomeba mata no asaborake

Gengan'ichi lost his sight in childhood; his wife and children later helped him to read and write. Might the blind poet have touched the flower with his hands and sensed the tragedy of its fleeting life, consoling it with the "dawn" of another flower?

The morning glory (asagao) is a climbing plant that blooms around August in various colors. The flower opens at dawn and wilts in the afternoon of the same day; hence its name in Japanese—"morning face." Because of its short blooming time, the morning glory is considered a symbol of transience. Its blossoming season comes to an end at the beginning of autumn, the season in which Gengen'ichi died.

Gensho

原松

Died on the fifth day of the first month, 1742
at the age of fifty-eight

A graveyard: Hakahara ya autumn fireflies aki no hotaru no two or three. futatsu mitsu

One source gives the following background to this poem:

A Zen monk from Myoshinji temple in Kyoto came to Gensho with a picture of a skull that he had painted and asked the monk to compose a poem for it.

On the fifth day of the first month, 1742, Gensho wrote [the poem above]. When he finished, he put down his brush and died. . . . His followers took this to be his death poem.²

Summer is the season for fireflies (hotaru) but even during autumn nights the light of a few late fireflies can be seen flickering here and there.
GETSUREI

月嶺

Died on the twenty-ninth day of January, 1919 at the age of forty

Stumble, fall,
slide down the snow slope.

Shirayuki ni suberi-ochikeri masshigura

✦

GIMEI

祇名

*Died on the fourth day of the tenth month, 1748
at the age of fifty-one*

Illness lingers on and on till over Basho's withered field, the moon.

Yami yamishi hate ya okina no kareno-zuki

This death poem borrows the metaphor found in the poem by Basho (p. 143), whom Gimei calls okina, "the old one." It may be that Gimei secretly expected to leave the world on the anniversary of Basho's death (the twelfth day of the tenth month), but death overtook him eight days early.

"Withered field" (kareno) is an image of winter, the season in which both poets died.
GINKA

吟霞

Died on the first day of the eighth month, 1784
at the age of sixty-one

I leap from depths of debt into the skies:
autumn of the dragon.

Shakusen no fuchi kara tenjō tatsu no aki

The year 1784, in the autumn of which Ginka died, was the year of the dragon, one of the twelve signs of the Oriental zodiac. There is a popular belief that the dragon, living in the depths of the sea, rises on a column of clouds and rain to the sky at the end of its life. We may understand from this poem that its author had many debts, and that he regarded his death, with a touch of humor, as a perfect solution to his financial worries.

◈

GINKO

銀甲

Died on the nineteenth day of the first month, 1790
at the age of seventy-three

See—
see how the spring slush melts away and I still here . . .

Okuretari awayuki kienu korewa korewa

If the day of Ginko's death is computed by the solar calendar, it appears that he died in the beginning of March. By that time the snow is melting in the southern parts of Japan.

◈
GITOKU
祇徳

Died on the twenty-fourth day of the eleventh month, 1754 at the age of fifty-three

Clear sky—
the way I came by once
I now go back by.

Sora saete moto kishi michi o kaeru nari

GOCHU
吾仲

Died on the thirtieth day of the ninth month, 1733

This is what I think:
the sky has ended—
end of the ninth month.

Omou koto sora no shimai ya kugatsujin

By the old calendar, the thirtieth day (the last day) of the ninth month was the last day of autumn.

GODO
梧堂

Died in 1801

Chrysanthemums were yellow

Shiragiku mo or were white until the frost.

The chrysanthemum (kiku; in this poem in the forms shiragiku, white chrysanthemum, and kigiku, yellow chrysanthemum) is common throughout Japan, and the Japanese consider it a symbol of their culture. By an ancient Oriental tradition, powder made from the petals of this flower is both a remedy for illness and a talisman for long life. There are many kinds of chrysanthemums in Japan, both domesticated and wild, with very large and very small blossoms of various colors. People make a practice of visiting gardens to enjoy the sight of the blooming flowers. In haiku, "chrysanthemum" usually figures as a season word for autumn.

†

GOFU

梧風

*Died on the eighteenth day of the eighth month, 1771
at the age of thirty-eight*

I have not yet grown weary of this world—where do fall breezes blow?

There is a play on words in this poem. Aki is a form of the verb aku, "to grow weary." Aki also means "autumn." Kaze means "wind," so akikaze may mean "autumn wind" or "weary winds."

†

GOHEI

五瓶
Died on the second day of the second month, 1808 at the age of sixty-two or sixty-three

The second month:
plum blossoms filling out—
I fade away.

Ume wa saku ware wa chiriyuku kisaragi ya

GOHEI

五瓶

Died on the seventh day of the seventh month, 1819

A lone paulownia leaf falls through pure autumn air.

Aki ya ima kiyoshi to kiri no
hito-ha chiru

The paulownia (kiri) is a tree with large purple flowers, a member of the figwort family. A "lone paulownia leaf" appears in ancient Chinese poetry as a seasonal image for the first part of autumn. Even without the aid of autumn winds, the large leaves of the paulownia tree fall one by one. This sight suggests the beginning of autumn and the oncoming end of life.

GOKEI

吾桂

Died on the twenty-seventh day of the eighth month, 1769
at the age of fifty-three

Fields dying off:

Kiete yuku
the underside of grasses frozen hour of my death.

no mo uragare no
hotoke kana

In this poem the image of man's death is interwoven into a scene from nature at the end of autumn. Urageare, a season word for autumn, describes field grass frozen on the side not exposed to the sun.

GOSEN

後川

Died in winter, 1799

Spring will meet this year before it's out but as for me . . .

Toshi no uchi no
haru ni mo aenu
inochi kana

Although by the old calendar spring usually began on New Year's Day or shortly thereafter, there were years in which it began before the new year, and this was evidently the case in the year Gosen died. Though fate cut him off before the end of the year, he might have remained alive till the first day of spring within the old year. According to old sources, however, he died during winter.

GOSHI

五始

Died on the thirteenth day of the ninth month, 1775
at the age of sixty-six
Returning thanks for life, I turn back and bow eastward.

To thank the living for kindnesses received during life, the dying poet turns toward the east before starting westward, the direction of paradise.

***

GOSHU

五株

Died on the twenty-eighth day of the sixth month, 1788 at the age of sixty-six

Disgusted with the world, I withdraw into the net.

Goshu died in summer, when the Japanese hang netting over their bedding as protection from flies and mosquitoes.

***

GOSHUKU

互夙

Died in 1888(?)

A cuckoo cries the end—clouds on a summer morn.

Kagiri naku hototogisu nari asagumori
This poem is inscribed on Goshuku's gravestone, which lies in a temple in Kyoto. The date of his death is uncertain, but it is known that the tombstone was erected in April 1888.

GOZAN

*Died on the second day of the third month, 1733
at the age of thirty-eight*

Blossoms scent the air a carefree birdsong echoes truth.

This haiku is a kaibun poem, a palindrome in which the sequence of syllables is identical whether the poem is read from the beginning or from the end. Such a form was popular in Japanese poetry during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

One source has this to say about Gozan's death:

The evening Gozan died there were still several blossoms left on the plum tree outside his window. From time to time an owl came to rest in the tree, calling, "ho, ho." Said Gozan, "My life is over. . . ." He took up his brush and wrote his death poem.3

The syllable ho is the Chinese-derived pronunciation of the character signifying "law," or "Buddha's doctrine." Gozan uses the same character with its Japanese pronunciation, nori, in his poem.
Died on the seventeenth day of the twelfth month, 1789
at the age of seventy-one

The snow of yesterday that fell like cherry petals is water once again.

Hana to mishi yuki wa kinō zo
moto no mizu

Only hana, "flower," is mentioned in the poem, but in the tradition of haiku this word refers to cherry blossoms. In the earliest Japanese literature, falling cherry blossoms are linked with falling snow. The two images are not only visually similar, but they share the metaphorical meaning of transience as well. The cherry tree blooms for a week only, and spring snows melt almost immediately upon touching the ground.

HAKUEN

Died on the twenty-ninth day of the tenth month, 1806
at the age of sixty-six

I wonder where the winds of winter
drive the rainclouds . . .

Kogarashi ni
ame motsu kumo no yukue kana

HAKUEN

白猿 Died on the twenty-third day of the third month, 1859
at the age of seventy

What is it but a dream?  Ā yume da
The blossoming as well  hana no tomari mo lasts only seven cycles.  nana-meguri

Hakuen died in the spring during the cherry-blossom season. Seven cycles (mana-meguri) refers to the seven-day life of the blossom, and the seven cycles of the poet are, apparently, the seven decades of his life.

✦

HAKUJUBO

白寿坊

Died on the sixteenth day of the sixth month, 1817

My heart serene,  Nishi no sora e
I set out  kokoro suzushiki for the western skies.  kadode kana

✦

HAKUKIN

白芹

Died on the twenty-first day of the tenth month, 1817
at the age of sixty-two

Pampas grass, all dry  Mizu ya sora crumbles apart  hodokete shimau water and sky . . .  karesusuki Susuki is synonymous with obana, both referring to Japanese pampas grass (see p. 157). Karesusuki means "withered pampas grass."

افتراض

HAKUNI

白尼

Died on the ninth day of the eighth month, 1792
at the age of eighty-four

To a melody of prayer HOmyō ni disappears the moon—tsuki mo kietaru
my place of rest.
makura kana

Shomyo is one of the names given to the prayer Namu Amida Butsu (lit. I put my trust in Amida Buddha), which is recited by many Buddhists at the hour of death in the belief that they will be reborn in the Pure Land in the West.

افتراض

HAKURIN

白隣

Died on the third day of October, 1897
at the age of sixty-eight

Well, then, let's follow lza yukan
the peal of bells to the higan no kane no yonder shore.
ato ōte
Hakurin died shortly after the equinox (higan) of autumn. On that day the Japanese hold ceremonies to commemorate the Buddha's death, visit temples, and lay flowers on the graves of their ancestors.

Higan means literally "the other shore" and as such indicates the passage from the world of illusion to that of truth.

HAKURO

白露

Died on the nineteenth day of the twelfth month, 1766

An ailing mallard falls through the chilly night and teeters off.

Yamu kari no
yosamu ni orite obotsukana

In the autumn of 1690, Basho stayed in the town of Katata on Lake Biwa. There he fell ill, and wrote:

An ailing mallard falls through the cold of night—my slumber on a journey.

Yamu kari no
yosamu ni ochite tabine kana

Clearly, Hakuro had Basho's poem in mind when he wrote his death poem.

Kari is a general name for different kinds of wild ducks, which are a common feature of Japanese scenery during autumn and winter. In autumn, wild ducks fly in from northern countries in V-shaped flocks. They winter beside lakes and marshes, and can be seen sleeping on the surface of water at night. The call of wild ducks echoes in the air all winter long until they return north at the beginning of spring.

HAKUSAI

白歳

Died on the second day of the ninth month, 1792 at the age of seventy-four

Farewell—and though there be no budding in the spring, no autumn withering—all is well.

Saraba saraba hana mo momiji mo naki zo yoki

✦

HAKUSEN

伯先

Died on the twenty-third day of the eighth month, 1820 at the age of sixty-five

Oh, morning glory, five and sixty years—I too pass away.

Asagao yo musoji-itsu-tose mi wa owaru

✦

HAKUSETSU

白雪

Died on the seventh day of the sixth month, 1735 at the age of seventy-five

At peace, above my sickness

Anjin wa yamai ga ue no summer smolders. gokusho kana

HAKUTO

伯兎

Died in 1727

Deutzia blossoms: Unohana ya
I, who rebuked the lazy, iken suru mi mo sleep late into the morning. asane-doki

Unohana refers to the deutzia plant, a bush with white flowers. It grows in the mountains, fields, and along garden fences throughout Japan, its blossoms heralding the coming of summer.

HAMEI

巴明

Died on the twenty-sixth day of the twelfth month, 1837 at the age of eighty-three

Man's end, Mi no hate wa a mound of gleaming bones: shari no hikari ya a flowering and a fading. hanagokoro HAMON

巴紋

_Died on the twenty-first day of the second month, 1804_
_at the age of fifty-eight_

In stillness, I, light-bodied, set out for the other world. _Nodokasa ya ware wa migaruki nori no tabi_

✦

HANKAI

半海

_Died on the fourth day of January, 1882_
_at the age of seventy-six_

The year is ending: I have not left my heart behind. _Yuku toshi no kokoro-nokori wa nakarikeri_

The expression _yuku toshi_, "the passing year," refers to the last days of December. The metaphor "I have not left my heart / behind, familiar to Western readers, suggests that there is no regret or sorrow over the past.

✦

HANRI

畔李 Died on the twelfth day of the fifth month, 1835
at the age of seventy-one

My life: Issho no

echoes of a clucking tongue shitauchi hibiku above pure waters. shimizu kana

Shitauchi (clucking of the tongue) refers to the sound a person makes with his tongue signifying regret over failures in the past and resignation to the unavoidable.

Shimizu, "pure water," calls to mind the water of streams breaking out of the ground in summer after the rainy season. But there may be, as well, a suggestion of shinimizu, the water given by Japanese to the dying.

✦

HOGYOKU

豊玉

Died on the eleventh day of the fifth month, 1869 at the age of thirty-five

Quick sounds Tatakarete of chopping echo oto no hibikishi
New Year's herbs. nazuna kana

Hogyoku (Hijikata Saizo) was an officer in the shogunate army that was defeated by the imperial forces during the Meiji Restoration. He retreated with the remnants of his army to the island of Hokkaido in the north. There, mounted on a horse and with sword drawn, he sallied forth ahead of his soldiers into a lost battle against the emperor's forces. He was wounded by an enemy bullet and fell from his horse. Two of his close friends carried him to a shack in a grove of pine trees, and there he died in the arms of his companions. When they took the uniform off his body, they found, pressed against his back, the bloodied scroll of paper on which his death poem was written.
Nazuna is an herb eaten on the seventh day of the new year.

HOKUSAI

北斎

Died on the twelfth day of the fourth month, 1849 at the age of ninety

Now as a spirit
I shall roam
the summer fields.

Hitodama de yuku kisan ja natsu no hara

Hokusai was one of Japan's greatest artists. His colorful paintings of Edo's street life are among the best made in ukiyoe style, and his series of thirty-seven views of Mount Fuji brought him fame falling little short of that of the mountain itself.

Hitodama (lit., man-ball) refers to the ghost or spirit of the dead. Various beliefs about hitodama have been held in Japan—that the spirit leaves the body at the moment of death in the form of a pale blue ball of fire floating in the air, that it stays close to the home of the deceased for forty-nine days after death, and that ghosts hover over cemeteries.

HOKUSHI

北枝

Died on the twelfth day of the eighth month, 1718

I write, erase, rewrite, erase again, and then

Kaite mitari keshitari hate wa
a poppy blooms.

Hokushi's death poem is built around a pun. Keshi means "to erase" as well as "poppy," so the poem may be read, "I write, erase, rewrite, / erase again, and then / a flower erases." However it is read, the poem's intent remains the same—that nature eventually overpowers culture. The poppy blooms in Japan at the beginning of summer, the season in which Hokushi died.

Hokushi, a sword-sharpenener, learned to write haiku from Basho. He would not hesitate to suggest changes in his teacher's poems, and Basho praised him for his helpful criticism.

It is said that Hokushi was extremely poor, but of a cheerful disposition. When his house burned down, he wrote:

Gone up in flames—but look, the flowers droop unknowing.

Hokushi had a weakness for liquor and used to ask for wine from his neighbor, the poet Joryu. Hokushi and his elder brother Bokudo, himself a poet, were famous for their ability to sleep while sitting and were accordingly styled "champion dozers."

‡

HOKUSO

\[Died on the sixth day of the sixth month, 1790\]

O sacred spirit
let us set out for the western skies.
Shoryo alludes, apparently, to the spirit of Buddha. The same Chinese characters with the pronunciation seirei give the name for the Holy Spirit of Christianity.

✦

HOROKU

寶六

_Died on the eleventh day of April, 1878_

Mountain temple: Yamadera ya far as the pillow where I lie makuramoto made the willow sheds its flowers. chiru yanagi

✦

HOU

法雨

_Died on the first day of the first month, 1811 at the age of eighty-six_

Encased by winter: Fuyugomori before long I'll tsui karazake to become dried salmon. narinikeri

_Fuyugomori_ means "winter confinement" or "hibernation." In the northern parts of Japan, where winter snow piles high, people shut themselves up in their houses in the depth of winter.

The image of dried salmon (karazake) is not necessarily a season word indicating winter. It may suggest the wrinkled body of the eighty-six-year-old Hou.
HOYU

方由

Died at the end of the seventeenth century

Praise to the skies: Namu ya sora alone in moonlit early dawn tada ariake no
a cuckoo cries. hototogisu

Namu stands for Namu Amida Butsu, the prayer to the Buddha Amida.

HYAKKA

百花

Died on the twentieth day of the second month, 1779
at the age of sixty-four

Late-blooming cherry: Okufukaki wondrous workings hana no kokoro ya of a flower's mind. osozakura

* * * *

Winter ice Kōri toke melts into clean water— yuku mizu kiyoshi clear is my heart. mune kiyoshi

Two death poems have been ascribed to Hyakka. Both cherry blossoms and melting ice are images of spring, the season in which the poet died.
HYAKURI

百里

Died on the twelfth day of the fifth month, 1727 at the age of sixty-two

When I die what I shall see will be the lustrous moon.

Shinite okite suzushiki tsuki o miru zo kashi

ICHIMU

一夢

Died on the twenty-first day of the ninth month, 1854 at the age of fifty-one

A broken dream—where do they go the butterflies?

Yume hitotsu yaburete chō no
yukue kana

The poet's name is composed of the characters for "one" (ichi) and "dream" (mu) in their Chinese-derived pronunciations. In Ichimu's death poem the same characters appear in Japanese word order and pronunciation (yume, dream; hitotsu, one). The "broken dream" is that illusion whereby we ascribe reality to a transient world. When life ends, the illusion of one's individual being bursts, and with it disappears the symbol of that being-one's name.

The butterfly (cho) appears in haiku of spring, summer, and autumn, but its season is in fact the flowering period of spring and early summer.
The further autumn advances, the fewer butterflies become, and the paler their colors are. Ichimu died late in this season.

Were the butterflies a mere dream? In the writings of the Chinese philosopher Chuang-tzu, we find the following words:

Chuang-tzu once dreamed he was a butterfly soaring on fluttering wings, content with himself and following his own desires. He knew not that he was Chuang-tzu. But suddenly he woke and found that he was most certainly Chuang-tzu. He no longer knew if he was a butterfly in Chuang-tzu's dream, or Chuang-tzu in the dream of a butterfly.

ICHISHI

Die on the fourteenth day of the ninth month, 1746
at the age of thirty-eight

What do you understand?  Nani satoru
One sound, katsu to hitokoe the voice of autumn.  aki no koe

The poet's question, "What do you understand?" (or "Are you enlightened?") is evidently turned toward himself. In the original Japanese, he answers with the exclamation katsu—the sharp cry emitted by Zen masters or pupils at the moment of enlightenment. Ichishi expresses the substance of that enlightenment by means of "one sound" (hitokoe), the voice of a solitary autumn cicada, whose hours are numbered. The poet himself died at the end of autumn.

In haiku, the "voice of autumn" (aki no koe) does not necessarily refer to a particular sound. The blowing wind, the dripping rain, and other sounds of nature that pass through the autumn air grown heavy with sadness may all be voices of autumn. But it seems that the expression... pertains here to the voice of the cicada, whose chorus of chirps dies away toward the end or the season.

✦

INSEKI

因石

Died on the twenty-eighth day of the third month, 1765
at the age of sixty-seven

I give my name back as I step in this Eden of flowers.

Na mo kaesu hana no jūdo e yado hairi

It is a Buddhist custom to change the name of a deceased person.

✦

IPPU

一風

Died on the twenty-fourth day of the fifth month, 1731
at the age of sixty-seven

Falling in the wind
a gust of evergreen leaves.

Chiriyuku ya
kaze ni tokiwa no konoha ame

The setting in Ippo's death poem is in the fall, but it is not taken from nature, as evergreen trees do not shed their leaves. The paradox seems to arise from man's wonder in the face of death. As long as he is alive he sees himself as an "evergreen," and the falling of leaves has no part in his world. However, when the "death wind" blows. . . .

There may be a connection between the poet's pen name (lit., one wind) and the wind in the poem.

* ISAIBO

以哉坊

*Died on the twenty-ninth day of the eighth month, 1780
at the age of sixty-six*

Though I tarry on the road my master took, above us glows one moon.

Shi ni shibashi okurete mo michi no tsuki onaji

Tanaka Gochikubo, Isaibo's haiku master, died a month or two before his pupil. Old sources give accounts of the stormy relationship between the two poets. One of Isaibo's poems, about the beauty of Matsushima Bay (Miyagi Prefecture), reads:

Matsushima:
their knees tear

Matsushima ya
hiza de momikiru

fune no goza

The image of passengers crowding to the side of the ship in order to feast their eyes on the view, their knees scraping the straw mats covering the deck, seemed coarse to Gochikubo, who suggested a less crude rendering:

Matsushima:
at sight of you

Matsushima ya
keshiki ni momeru

fune no goza
Isaibo refused the correction and had to leave Gochikubo's circle. Another person made peace between them. In honor of Isaibo's return to his favor, Gochikubo wrote a poem in which he suggests that the two of them "blunt their edges" and behave more "roundedly" with one another.

Isaibo responded with his own poem, about a plum tree raised in a greenhouse in order to hasten its blossoming. This poem did not please Gochikubo, perhaps because Isaibo may have meant that he was being forced to mature as a poet in an unnatural way. Once again, Isaibo had to quit the company for a time.

In spite of the rivalry between the two, or perhaps because of it, it would seem that Isaibo was fond of Gochikubo. The "road" in Isaibo's death poem is the road from life to death taken by both master and pupil, and the "one moon" is a symbol of the perfect unity which underlies this world of many changes.

* * * *

ISAN

伊珊

Died in 1698

For not honoring my parents while I lived, in my last hour
I feel remorse.

* * * *

The autumn hues of knotweed seem like cups of wine.

Isan, who was apparently one of Basho's pupils, left two death poems. The first deals with the highest commandment of Confucian doctrine—honor for one's parents. It seems that this verse, which lacks the proper form (the original has twenty-four syllables) and poetic content, was uttered more by Isan the son than by Isan the poet.

The connection between the first and the second poems is not clear. One may, perhaps, conjecture as to the personal significance in the second, but it is just as well to see it as an image from nature. The plant referred to is an annual wild grass (Poligonum blumei) which grows to a height of about thirty centimeters and has long sharp-edged leaves. The plant is not used by man, and is not considered exceptionally beautiful (as is indicated by its Japanese name, inutade, lit., dog weed). The plant's sheaf-like, petalless yellow and red flowers start blooming about June and continue to the end of autumn.

Issa is considered one of Japan's greatest haiku poets. Among the common people of Japan he is perhaps loved more than any other poet, because of the many vicissitudes of his life, and because of the human simplicity of his poetry. Accounts of Issa's death do not indicate that he wrote a death poem; these two poems are held to be his death poems by popular tradition.

An ancient Oriental belief features the tortoise as a symbol of long life, ascribing to it a life of ten thousand years. Should man live to be one hundred, his life would be no more than a hundredth part of the life of this shell-covered creature that drags its tail in the mud. Why then should a man ask for another year, a month, or a day?

The word tarai in the second poem means "tub" or "basin." The reference is perhaps to the basins for cleaning newborn babies and cleansing the dead. The life of man is no more than gibberish (chimpunkan means, in colloquial speech, the unintelligible sounds of a foreign language) that begins in the cradle and ends in the grave.

ISSHO

一笑

_Died on the sixth day of the twelfth month, 1688 at the age of thirty-six_

```
From deep in my heart how beautiful the snow couds in the west.
Kokoro kara
yuki utsukushi ya nishi no kumo
```

The death of Issho is described in one source:

Issho, who lived in the city of Kanazawa, loved haiku. When Basho passed through Kanazawa on a journey, Issho wanted very much to lodge him in his home, but that very year Issho had fallen deathly ill and knew his end was near. It was the thirteenth year after his father's death, and Issho decided to compose thirteen _kasen_ [thirty-six-verse _renge_] in memory of his father. His friends tried to prevent this undertaking, saying, "Your breathing is not regular. Who knows what will happen to you after you have finished the thirteen poems?"
But Issho replied, "Even if I die, I will not be sorry." After five poems Issho's breathing became heavy, and he could hardly hold his brush. In spite of this he held on and composed the other eight. When he had finished his task, his eyes shone with joy and he announced, "With these poems close to my body, I have nothing to regret." As his eyelids grew heavier, he closed them and said [the poem above]. He looked like a man who had been freed from the chains of life and whose soul was pure. In the autumn of the year following Issho's death, Basho wrote a poem of lamentation in his memory: "Move, O tomb / the sound of my weeping / is the wind of autumn [Tsuka mo ugoke / waga naku koe wa / aki no kaze].^4

Issho's phrase "from deep in my heart" (kokoro kara) is an expression rarely encountered in haiku. But death poems are, by nature, more personal than ordinary haiku. Issho died in the middle of winter, when snow had covered his province. The "clouds in the west" (nishi no kumo) may be regarded as a seasonal image, but in this poem they probably refer to the messengers of Amida coming to greet the dead on their way to the Pure Land.

ISSO

一草

_Died on the seventeenth day of November, 1899 at the age of fifty-seven_

Cut your price!  _Makete oke_
What if I've gotten fifty-seven?  _gojūshichi de mo_
The year is nearly over!  _toshi no kure_

Issso takes his image from commerce. Fate sells life to man, and at the end of the years allotted to him, man must pay off the debt underwritten by fate at his birth. Issso, aware that he has already delayed payment for two years (as the lifespan of man, according to one tradition, is fifty-five years), asks to defer payment for a little while longer, until the end of the year. He even requests a price cut, perhaps thinking of the practice of Japanese firms to hold clearance sales at the end of the year. But whether he gets such a discount or not, the poet seems to suggest that when he returns his life his situation will not be changed much anyway.

JAKUA

寂阿

_Died on the fifth day of the fifth month, 1801_

Cuckoo, let's go—how bright the western skies!

Hototogisu iza ya akaruki
nishi no sora

The poet's pen name is composed of ideographs possessing religious significance. _Jaku_ means tranquillity, death in a state of enlightenment; _a_ is the first syllable in the name of Buddha Amida. From this we learn that Jakua was a Buddhist monk or priest.

JAKURA

寂羅

_Died on the fifth day of June, 1906 at the age of fifty-nine_

This year I want to see the lotus on the other side.

Mitaki kana kotoshi no hasu wa kano kishi ni
On the evening of Jakura's death, members of his family asked him to recite a death poem. He said the poem above and then tried to grasp a brush and write the words, but his strength did not hold out. He died, leaving a blank sheet of paper beside his bed.

In Buddhist literature, this world of life and death is called "this side" or "this shore," and nirvana, or enlightenment, is called "the other side" or "yonder shore." The passage from the world of illusion to the world of truth is likened to a boat trip from one side of a river to the other (compare the use of higan, p. 183).

* * *

JIKKO

十口

_Died on the twenty-first day of the seventh month, 1791_
_at the age of sixty-nine_

Family whispers _with the doctor—winter showers_ _pass through their sleeves._

_Shinrui ga_
_isha ni sasayaku_
_sode shigure_

When Japanese told secrets, they used to raise the sleeves of their robes to the sides of their faces. The whispering voices passing through the sleeves _ (sode) are likened to the sound of a gusty winter shower _ (shigure).

Jikko expressed his own opinion about death poems thus:

One evening a friend came to visit. We discussed haiku beside the stove and drank two or three cups of saké. We recalled the death poems of the old master poets, and tears streamed down our cheeks. We consoled ourselves, saying that even if the man dies, his death poem remains forever. For this reason there are men who prepare a death poem while still healthy. This may seem like exaggerated readiness, but fate plays tricks on us all, and we never know when it will ordain us to die. If death comes suddenly, we will have no time to say a word. It can therefore be understood why people prefer to write their death poem before their time. Some leave behind a distorted poem and claim there is no harm in that, because haiku poetry does not disdain popular speech. These people become the laughingstock of future generations. Great poets create outstanding death poems, and thus they show the strength of art, which fails not even in the hour of death. And so we continued well into the night. . . .

Jikko then "quotes" a death poem which he claims to have heard (it is likely that he wrote it himself). It is a poem in tanka form, and it reflects his opinion on death poetry:

Rather than leave behind me Waraigusa that which everyone will laugh at, nokosan yori mo
I prepared my words beforehand. tsunezune ni
Now, while dying, kyōji okitsure
I'm at peace. ima wa ku mo nashi

It is interesting that the poem Jikko wrote before his death (the haiku above) does not, in fact, seem to have been prepared in advance. Perhaps because he had already paid due respect to tradition by preparing a poem beforehand, he was able, without difficulty, to compose this descriptive image of his last hours.

 tercer

JOMEI

丈鳴

Died on the seventh day of the ninth month, 1766 at the age of sixty-one

Leaves of words: Koto no ha ya autumn colors  ugokanu yama mo a still mountain.  aki no iro

There is a play on words here in the Japanese. The word kotoba, "language," is composed of koto, "word," and ha, "leaves." The poet, separating these two components into koto no ha creates the image of "leaves of words."

✧

JOSEKI

丈石

Died on the twenty-first day of the seventh month, 1779 at the age of eighty-five

This must be  Gokuraku ni my birthday there  tanjonichi wa in paradise.  kyō nare ya

✧

JOWA

常和

Died on the second day of the second month, 1785
at the age of seventy-one

Second month:  Kisaragi ya
I wear a new bamboo hat  atarashiki kasa and go home.  kite kaeru
This is not a death poem, but Jowa's last poem (zekku), a poem written before a poet's death without his having meant it as a death poem. It sometimes happened that a poet, though intending to write a death poem, died too suddenly to write one and left only a last poem. Some poets felt no need to follow the tradition of writing a death poem. Others wrote a death poem days, months, or even years before their death, so their last poem is not their death poem.

Jowa's case was of the first type. On the first day of the second month he stayed overnight with some relatives in his cottage and composed this poem in conversation there. The next day he died unexpectedly.

There is a play on words in the Japanese. Kisaragi, the old name of the second month, also means "dressed layer upon layer," thus suggesting the cold season. With this and the image of the bamboo hat, the poet evidently had in mind his return trip home from his cottage on a rainy and cold day.

※

KAEN
可焉

_Died on the thirteenth day of the ninth month, 1772
at the age of seventy-five_

A back-yard chrysanthemum _Uragiku ya_ looked at the setting sun _yūhi ni mukai_ and faded. _shibominuru_

※

KAFU 霞-夫
Died on the twenty-ninth day of the ninth month, 1784
at the age of thirty-six

If I must die
then let me die before the winter comes.

Shinaba yo no fuyu no konu ma to iiokeri

Kafu was the son of a very wealthy family that dealt in Chinese medications. He neglected the family business, apparently because of his artistic and literary pursuits. The relatives got together, relieved him of his position in the family concern, and "housed him in a dwelling that they built for him." He seems to have spent the rest of his life as a monk.

Kafu was a friend of the artist and poet Buson, and like him he painted from time to time. Kafu died at the end of autumn, two days before the arrival of winter.

* * *

KAFU

家風

Died on the twenty-fourth day of the sixth month, 1827

Nights grow short:
a dream of fifty years breaks off before it ends.

Mijikayo ya mihatenu yume no
gojū-nen

Kafu was the son of Gazen (p. 167) and died a mere year and a half after his father. Sources do not give his age at the time of his death, but it can be inferred from "a dream of fifty years."

Mijikayo, "short night refers to a night of summer. At such a time a person may sometimes waken from sleep with the feeling that the early dawn has interrupted his dream.
KAGAI

花街

Died on the seventh day of the fourth month, 1778

Barren branches:
the autumn left behind a cicada's hollow cry.

Kare-eda ya
hakanaku nokoru semi no koe

KAIGA

介我

Died on the sixteenth day of the sixth month, 1718
at the age of sixty-seven

Strange—like messengers they fly left, fly right the fireflies.

Omoshiro ya sau no tsukai no tobu hotaru

Fireflies (hotaru), whose lights flicker in the summer nights, seem to the poet like mysterious messengers that have come to carry away the souls of the dead.

KAIKAI

又々 Died in the sixth month, 1868
at the age of seventy-three

Round a flame two tiger moths race to die.

Futatsu kite
shi o arasou ya hitorimushi

The tiger moth (hitorimushi, lit., fire-consuming insect) is a large and hairy moth with stripes. This insect is one of the images of summer, the season in which the poet died.

KAISHO

快笑

Died in 1914
at the age of seventy-two

Evening cherry-blossoms:
I slip the inkstone back into my kimono this one last time.

Futokoro e suzuri shimau ya yūzakura

Suzuri is the inkstone on which an ink stick is rubbed to make the solution for brush painting. An inkstone has a specially made container for when it is not in use. It seems that Kaisho knows that when he finishes this poem he will not write again, and that he will have no use for the inkstone that has served him so many years.

The word futokoro refers to the front of the kimono, where the two folds cross. It was used as a sort of pocket in which personal items could be carried.
KANGA

喚我

Died in 1812

A chill: Suzushiku mo
my soul turns into tama wa gazō ni an icon. utsurikeri

Gazo means "portrait" or "statue," perhaps of the Buddha, but not necessarily so. It is enough to see in the poem an image of the transition from a world of heat and movement to cold immobility.

✦

KANGYU

閑牛

Died in 1861

It is indeed like that— Kakuzo tomo and I had never noticed kokoro no tsukazu dew on grass. kusa no tsuyu

✦

KANNA

冠那

Died on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, 1744

Autumn breeze: Nagaregi no driftwood landing lightly on the bank.

yoru kata yasashi
aki no kaze

KANSHU
竿秋

Died on the eleventh day of the ninth month, 1772
at the age of seventy-eight

Although the autumn moon has set, its light lingers on my chest.

Meigetsu no
ato ni mo mune no hikari kana

Meigetsu is the full moon on the ides of the eighth lunar month (about mid-October by the solar calendar). On that night the Japanese sit out to view the moon in the clear skies of autumn.

Various customs are attached to the appearance of the full autumn moon: offerings of fruit and flowers, preparing food especially for the occasion, burning incense, and writing poetry about the moon's beauty.

KARAI
化来

Died on the twenty-eighth day of the ninth month, 1778
at the age of fifty-seven

Why should I hesitate?
I have a travel permit from Amida Buddha.

Mayoyasenu
tōri kitte no
Namu Amida
Unlike death poems in which allusions to Buddhism express comfort in the next world, this poem juxtaposes "travel permit" (tori kitte) and Amida Buddha, with a trace of irony.

-

KARI

花里

*Died on the twelfth day of the third month, 1770
 at the age of sixty-seven*

How sad: cherry blossoms turn to clouds that come to greet me.

Ushi ya hana ware o mukaeru kumo to nari

Many Japanese poets have likened the splendid sight of cherry blossoms to clouds of flowers. Kari died in the spring during the cherry-blossom season, and it seems that he felt sorrow while viewing them for the last time.

According to Buddhist tradition, clouds appear in the western sky at the hour of one's death to escort one to the other world.

-

KASEI

歌成

*Died on the second day of the second month, 1859
 at the age of sixty-two*

The ash I leave behind is just a moxa treatment

hat ni naru nagori mo kyū no
Moxa treatment (kyu) is an ancient Oriental healing art in which a substance from leaves of the wormwood is burned on certain parts of the body. The burning is said to stimulate the nervous system, cleanse the blood, ease pain, and heal various diseases. Kasei likens the ashes that will remain after his cremation to the small burned spot left by cauterization. Moxa treatment may bring relief from ailments of the body, but the burning of the body after death eliminates the source of all ailments. The poem was written the very day the poet died.

Kasei was a Kabuki artist whose theater name was Otozo.

---

KASENJO

歌川女

Died on the twenty-sixth day of the seventh month, 1776 at the age of sixty-two

Depths of cold unfathomable

Okusoko no shirenu samusa ya ocean roar.

Kasenjo was a geisha in a resort area of mineral springs. At an older age, she shaved her head and became a Buddhist nun. It is noteworthy that the "cold" (samusa) of her poem does not seem to be the "cold" used in haiku poetry to designate the season, but the cold of death.

---

KASENNI

花千尼
Died on the twenty-seventh day of the seventh month, 1729

Cicada of the night
one autumn moon
Sumida River.

Yoru no semi aki hito-tsuki ya
Sumida-gawa

If we compute the date of Kasenni's death by the Gregorian calendar, we find that she died one month after the beginning of autumn.

The Sumida River flows through the eastern part of Tokyo into Tokyo Bay.

✶

KASSAN

葛三

Died on the twelfth day of the sixth month, 1818
at the age of fifty-seven

Summer is upon me:
a lotus leaf.

Mi no ue no natsu ya hasu no ichimai-ba

✶

KATO

可斗

Died on the ninth day of September, 1908
at the age of sixty-one

The moon departs:
frost falls upon the

Asagao ya
tsuki no wakare o morning glory.

hana no hie

*

KEIDO

怪童

Died in about 1750 past the age of thirty

The cuckoo's voice

Shinuru hi wa
nao omoshiroshi kankodori

The cuckoo's voice is all the more intriguing as I die.

Among the little to be found about Keido in old sources, it is perhaps worth mentioning that he was a hermit monk who lived in the mountains.

The kankodori is a kind of cuckoo, similar in appearance and habits to the hototogisu (see p. 142).

*

KEIDO

径童

*Died on the seventh day of the fourth month, 1787
at the age of seventy-three*

Bound homeward under

Kokyo e no hare ya uzuki no
hana torige

Uzuki, the fourth month of the lunar calendar (corresponding approximately to the end of May and the beginning of June), is the first month of summer.

✦

KEIZAN

慶山

_Died on the twenty-fourth day of the eighth month, 1750 at the age of forty-four_

Border of the realm, _Kunizakai_ bound by cane on both sides— _sayū no tsue ya_ moon above the bamboo. _tsuki no take_

The "border" (_kunizakai_), evidently the frontier between the worlds of the living and the dead, refers perhaps to the mountains crossed by the dead to reach the other world. The view of the moon above the bamboo grove may be a glimpse of the no-man's-land on the frontier of the two worlds.

The bamboo (_take_) is a perennial plant, the largest in the grass family. Its stems are large and strong, often resembling tree trunks.

✦

KENJU

乾十

_Died on the twenty-seventh day of the second month, 1759 at the age of eighty_

The melting snows: _Yukidoke ya_ an edifice _hachijū-nen no_ of eighty years. _tsukurimono_
The sources say that Kenju owned and managed a brothel in the red-light district of Edo. The word tsukurimono is used for anything which does not come about naturally, but is produced or shaped by the human mind. My eighty years, Kenju seems to be telling us, are but a contrivance which melts like a snowman when the spring comes.

✦

KIBA

鬼馬

Died in 1868 at the age of ninety

My old body:
Oi no mi ya
a drop of dew grown hazue no omoru
heavy at the leaf tip.
tsuyu no tama

✦

KIBAI

其梅

Died on the twelfth day of the second month, 1788 at the age of seventy

My one wish Negawaku wa is to live in the capital mui no miyako o
of non-action.
sumidokoro

Mui is the Japanese pronunciation of the Chinese wu wei, the Taoist philosophy of "non-action" (See p. 68). The term also appears in certain Buddhist writings as a synonym for nirvana, but in Zen Buddhist writings, the meaning of the word more closely approaches that of the Taoists.

KIFU

起風

Died in autumn, 1898

Cutting a swath through thick-dewed grass,
I set out.

The exact date of Kiru's death is unknown, but he is said to have died in the autumn, the season of dew.

KIGEN

其諺

Died on the twenty-third day of the eighth month, 1736
at the age of seventy-one

Seventy-one!
How did a dewdrop last?

Nanajūichī
Yo wa motsutaru tsuyu no tama
KIKO

其香

Died on the second day of the fifth month, 1823
at the age of fifty-two

That which blossoms falls, the way of all flesh in this world of flowers.

Sakeba chiru mi no yukusue ya hana sekai

KIMPO

芹甫

Died on the third day of September, 1894

Today is the day for one last view of Mount Fuji.

Miosame no kyō to wa narinu
Fuji-no-yama

The volcanic Mount Fuji, whose snow-capped peak is visible from Tokyo on clear days, is one of the world's most beautiful mountains. A holy mountain in Japanese tradition, it has given rise to many legends. Mount Fuji has appeared and reappeared in painting and poetry as a symbol of the sublime beauty for which the soul of man yearns.

KIMPU

琴風 Died on the seventh day of the second month, 1726
at the age of sixty

One gulp, Hito-iki ni
a taste of nectar! kono ajiwai zo
Water in the spring. haru no mizu

With the winter runoff and spring rains, the banks of lakes and rivers overflow. Plants begin to bud, and the water swarms with fish. Water in the [season of] spring (haru no mizu) is a seasonal image in haiku, yet it hints as well at shinimizu, the water given to dying persons.

✿

KIN’EI
金映

Died on the sixteenth day of the eighth month, 1778
at the age of forty-five

The autumn flowers Gokuraku no of my prayer bear tane zo kusabana seeds of paradise. Namu Amida

Kin’ei died in autumn, when grasses blossom. He carries his prayer like he would a flowering plant, and when the petals fall and the seeds are released, he will be, so he hopes, "replanted" in paradise.

✿

KINKO
錦江
Died on the twenty-seventh day of the seventh month, 1860
at the age of sixty

Within the vast and empty autumn night daorn breaks.

Aki no yo mo tada kūjaku to akete yuku

-KIN'U-

琴雨

Died on the second day of the third month, 1817
at the age of sixty-two

How leisurely the cherry blossoms bloom this year, unhurried by their doom.

Yururi saku kotoshi no hana no kakugo kana

Kin'u died in spring, together with the cherry blossoms of the year. Kakugo signifies courageous resignation to fate.

-KISEI-

亀世

Died on the eighteenth day of the ninth month, 1764
at the age of seventy-seven

Ninth-month moon: of late, when I have said my prayer, I've meant it.

Nembutsu mo makoto ni narinu nochi no tsuki
Since I was born
I have to die, and so . . .

Both of these haiku appear as Kisei's death poems in old sources. Kisei died five days after nochi no tsuki (lit., later moon), the second of two holidays celebrating the autumn moon. Nembutsu refers to the prayer Namu Amida Butsu.

KIYU
亀祐

Died in about 1820

Evening:
I, too, the dew of those who bred me, am twilit.

This death poem was inscribed on Kiyu's gravestone. Kiyu was a potter, and it is said that even his tombstone was made of clay.

Dew, a symbol of transience and also a season word signifying autumn, in this poem has further connotations of sexuality and fertility. A poet's reference to himself as the product of his parents' union is rare in haiku.
Ukigumo no haretē jōdo no tsukimi kana

Ukigumo means "floating clouds," an image often used in Japanese literature to represent the life of man. Jodo is the Pure Land in the West.

On the evening of the fifteenth day of the eighth lunar month, the Japanese go outdoors to celebrate the sight of the full autumn moon, a custom known as tsukimi, "moon viewing." Haiku poets take up their brushes to describe the beauty of the moon in verse.

KIZAN

Rusu naredo tou hito mo kana nokorigiku

Nokorigiku, "remaining chrysanthemum," appears here with a twofold meaning: a chrysanthemum still in bloom at the end of autumn, when most of the others have withered, and a chrysanthemum which remains after the owner of the garden has died.
KOHA

香波

Died on the fourteenth day of August, 1897

I cast the brush aside—from here on I'll speak to the moon face to face.

Fude nagete tsuki ni mono iu bakari nari

KOJU

湖十

Died on the twenty-fourth day of the seventh month, 1806

And if I do become a spirit—
the party's over.

Shōryō ni ato no matsuri to narinikeri

Koju died some time after the end of the Bon Festival and thus spoiled his chance to return to his home as a spirit.

Ato no matsuri, literally, "after the festival," is an idiomatic expression meaning to miss one's chance, "to come too late." In this poem, the expression can thus be understood literally—"after the celebration of the Bon Festival"—or in the wider sense that the poet has no more hope to live.

KONKAN
Kunken

*Died on the twenty-eighth day of the ninth month, 1801
at the age of fifty-eight*

When I leave the world on my way back I'll carry just one beggar's bag.
This stone made ready for my tomb is but a passing shower in my heart.

Yo o sareba zuda hitotsu nari modoru tabi
Tsukurioku haka mo kokoro no shigure kana

These two poems are engraved on the poet's tombstone. Zuda is a short form of zudabukuro, a sack strapped on by Zen monks as they go from door to door begging food.

✦

KORAKU

古楽

*Died on the eleventh day of the fifth month, 1837
at the age of fifty-seven*

The joy of dewdrops in the grass as they turn back to vapor.

Moto no mizu ni kaeru zo ureshi kusa no tsuyu

✦

KOSAI

コ斎
Died on the twenty-first day of the seventh month, 1688

Poor Kosai—but one lantern to his name.

Aware nari tōro hitotsu ni nushi Kasai

The taro is a lantern with a candle in it, lit during the Bon Festival in memory of those who have died.

Kosai was apparently a friend of Kikaku's, as the latter wrote the following poem immediately after Kosai's death:

Autumn ends:
he didn't leave behind even a snore.

Sana hito no
ibiki sae nashi
aki no kure

On the third anniversary of Kosai's death, a poet named Kifu composed this poem:

Three years:
even the lantern is no more.

Mitose haya tōro hitotsu mo nakarikeri

KOSEKI

敲石

Died in the seventh month, 1788

Swear to me, pine, for many years
to keep on young and green.

Chigtrioku
matsu ya iku-tose waka midori
KOSON

孤村

Died on the thirty-first day of August, 1920 at the age of thirty-eight

I die
the evening of the day
the hibiscus blooms.

The juyo, a garden plant originating in China and found in the warmer regions of Japan, is a species of hibiscus. At the beginning of autumn it blooms in pink, scarlet, and white; its petals wither in the course of a single day.

This poem contains only fifteen syllables in the original. It is likely that two syllables were left out during printing.

KOYO

紅葉

Died on the thirtieth day of October, 1903 at the age of thirty-seven

If I must die
let it be autumn
ere the dew is dry.

Ozaki Koyo was a major novelist of the Meiji period. Influenced by the writings of Ihara Saikaku (p. 274), KGyo’s works are on romantic themes. Koyo suffered from stomach cancer during the last several years of his life and died in his home.
KOZAN
鼓山

Died on the twenty-sixth day of the ninth month, 1747
at the age of forty-six

How sublime—a boat beneath the moon and from within, a prayer.

Arigata ya
tsuki no funauta
Namu Amida

A funauta, "boat song," is a song sung by sailors or by boat passengers sailing by moonlight. Such a song is not a prayer, of course, but it sounds to the dying poet like the chant Namu Amida Butsu.

KUSAMARU
草丸

Died in 1836
at the age of fifty-two

My morning porridge, and then I'll go to see the willow blossom.

Asagayu no
za kara mi ni iku yanagi kana

KYOHAKU
虚白

*Died on the last day of the tenth month, 1847
at the age of seventy-five*

I am not worthy of this crimson carpet:
autumn maple leaves.

Ōkenaki
toko no nishiki ya chiri-momiji

Momiji is a general term for the sight of leaves in autumn, but it refers principally to the color of maple leaves. The leaves of this tree turn deep red at the end of autumn, making the forests covering the mountains look as if they have caught fire.

Already in ancient Japanese poetry, the sight of maple leaves is likened to a silk carpet (toko no nishiki). Kyohaku died at a time when the autumn leaves were laid out like a red carpet to the other world.

KYOKUSAI

曲斎

*Died on the twenty-ninth day of July, 1874
at the age of fifty-eight*

When you contemplate the waters at day break, you can hear the lotus blossom.

Akatsuki ya
mizu kanzureba hasu no oto

It is widely held in Japan that the lotus makes a noise when it opens, but there is no scientific basis for this belief. It arose as part of the Buddhist tradition that sees in the lotus the flower of paradise.
A last fart: Yume no ha ka are these the leaves chiru sharakusashi of my dream, vainly falling? saigo no he

In the original, the image of a dream is combined with the cruder image of passing wind. The transition from one to the other is made by a play on words: sharakusashi means "boastfulness" or "vanity"; the latter part of the word alone, kusashi, means "stench."
KYOSHU

虚舟

*Died on the sixteenth day of the sixth month, 1769
at the age of eighty*

A journey of no return:
the wanderer's sack is bottomless.

Sokonuke ya kaeranu tabi no zudabukuro

Kyoshu prefaces his death poem with a phrase from Zen Buddhist writings: "I came from nowhere and go nowhere." The image of a bottomless sack, which also fits the spirit of Zen, indicates that the wanderer's consciousness is freed from concepts like "lire" and "death."

KYUTARO

久太郎

*Died on the twentieth day of February, 1928
at the age of thirty-six*

Tender winds above the snow melt many kinds of suffering.

Moromoro no nayami mo kiyuru yuki no kaze

Kyutaro started working as a messenger boy for a commercial firm at the age of twelve. A year later, on Emperor's Day (February 11) he went out to play in the snow. The head clerk considered such behavior an affront to the nation and scolded him. The thirteen-year-old Kyutaro wrote this poem:

In heavy snow

Öyuki de
I clean forgot to raise the nation's flag.

In later years Kyutaro lived among workers and day laborers in Tokyo and became a radical anarchist. In 1923 he fired a gun at a government official and was sentenced to life imprisonment. He committed suicide in his cell, leaving his death poem behind him.

MABUTSU

馬仏

_Died on the twenty-first day of the twelfth month, 1696_

The snowman's eyes are on the level; his nose stands straight.

The snowman in this poem is not only a seasonal image, but also a symbol of transience.

Phrases such as "the eyes lie horizontally, the nose vertically" (given an alternate wording in the translation) and "the threshold is horizontal and vertical the pillar" appear in Zen writings as an expression of an enlightened point of view. Such remarks do not proceed from the understanding of any so-called truth, but from the reflection of the world in the consciousness that, like a clear mirror, has nothing in itself and neither adds to nor takes away from the thing it reflects.

MABUTSU
馬仏

Died on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, 1874
at the age of seventy-nine

Moon in a barrel:
you never know just when the bottom will fall out.

Itsu nukeru
soko tomo shirazu
oke no tsuki

Mabutsu died on the day of the full autumn moon. (The date of his death is evidently given in the old system).

✦

MASAHIDE

正秀

Died on the third day of the eighth month, 1723
at the age of sixty-seven

While I walk on the moon keeps pace beside me:
friend in the water.

Yuku toki wa
tsuki ni narabite
mizu no tomo

Masahide, a doctor by profession, lived most of his life in the town of Zeze on Lake Biwa. He studied haiku under Basho, whom he very much admired. Around 1688 Masa-hide's storehouse burned down, and he wrote the following poem, which was much praised by Basho.

Now that my storehouse has burned down, nothing conceals the moon.

Kura yakete
sawaru mono naki tskimi kana

It seems that Masahide became very poor after his storehouse burned down. His poet friend Jozen, who came to visit him in 1103, reported that Masahide had no blanket for his two children, and had to cover them with mosquito netting.

MASUMI KATO

十寸見河東

_Died on the twentieth day of the seventh month, 1725 at the age of forty-two_

I draw the willow branch down low below my hips.

Hikiyosete
koshi yori shita no
yanagi kana

Masumi Kato was the founder of a family of ballad (_joruri_) writers. He originated his own style of narrative, which came to be called Kato-bushi.

MASUMI KATO

十寸見河東

_Died on the twenty-first day of the first month, 1796
at the age of seventy_

The path to paradise is paved with bright plum petals.

Gokuraku no michi mo akarushi ume sakura

This Masumi Kato was the sixth head of the family of ballad writers founded by the Masumi Kato above. This haiku appears on the poet's gravestone.
The path "paved with bright plum petals" is the way to paradise. If we note, however, that Kato's death did indeed take place during the plum-blossom season, we can understand that this world and the next are not really so far from one another.

MASUMI KATO

十寸見河東

Died on the twenty-fourth day of the second month, 1825 at the age of sixty-four

The surface of the water mirrors many things.
Samazama na kage mo utsurishi mizu no aya

This Masumi Kato represents the seventh generation of the family of Kato-bushi writers. He succeeded the Masumi Kato whose poem appears above.

MEISETSU

鳴雪

Died on the twentieth day of February, 1926 at the age of eighty

My only hope against the cold— one hot-water bottle.
Tada tanomu tōba hitotsu no samusa kana
This is Meisetsu's last poem. A toba is a hot-water bottle used for warming the feet in winter, but there may be a pun on this word in that, when written with different characters, it refers to the long wooden tablet bearing a Buddhist prayer placed at one's grave. Relatives and close friends buy such prayer tablets, so the deceased may have several written for him. A single tablet (as the poem would read if this toba were used) would thus imply loneliness or friendlessness.

Michikaze is described by his contemporaries as a man greedy for wealth and fame, and his name was linked with geisha of Edo, Kyoto, and Osaka. Late in life he repented and wrote a tanka mocking himself for his former way of life and denouncing the vanity in his pursuit of fame.

Koromogae is the change from heavy winter clothing to lighter summer robes, done in the first part of the fourth month by the old calendar (about the middle of May). The use of this term in Michikaze's death poem gives evidence that his date of death, about which various sources are in conflict, is correct as stated here.
Fall, plum petals, fall—and leave behind the memory of scent.

The foam on the last water has dissolved
my mind is clear.

The death of Mitoku, who was a money changer in Edo, is recounted by his son Mitaku:

Mitoku took ill in the first part of the fifth month. On the twenty-ninth day of the following month his breathing ceased, but it began again after water was splashed on his face. When I said to him, "You must be suffering terribly," he did not answer directly, saying only, "Bring me the inkstone" After dipping his brush in ink he wrote his death poem . . . and handed it to me. After this it looked as though he lost consciousness. On the eighteenth day of the seventh month he died, murmuring the name of Buddha.

Matsugo no mizu, "water of the last moments," like shini-mizu, refers to the water used to moisten the lips of the dying.
The poem contains a play on words. Matsu in matsugo no mizu means "the end," but matsu also means "to wait." The phrase kie o matsu can thus be read, "I await my dissolution."

※

MOKUDO

木導

Died on the twenty-second day of the sixth month, 1723
at the age of fifty-eight

I constantly aspire to be the first to pierce my dagger in the eggplant.

Ki ni kakaru ichiban yari no nasubi kana

Mokudo apparently tries, with the strange image of piercing a dagger into an eggplant (nasubi), to blend the fighting spirit (he belonged to the samurai class) with the spirit of haiku. The eggplant is a seasonal image for summer, during which the poet died; with a dagger stuck into it, the eggplant symbolizes the enemy’s head.

We are unfortunately not entitled to hope that the poem was written in jest, for the warrior-poet prefaces it with an explanation:

In times of war the samurai were the first to stab their daggers into their enemies. We are familiar with many stories about these bold warriors. Today peace reigns in the world and warriors no longer go forth into battle. They continue, however, with military exercises, so that in time of need they will be ready to fight zealously, till word of their courage echoes throughout Japan and the entire world.⁹

※

MOMEN
Moritake, a Shinto priest at the large shrine of Ise, was skilled in writing renga. The refined humor of his style influenced haiku poetry by turning it from games of wit to literature in its own right.

There exists another version of Moritake's death poem. The poet Kikaku writes:

Kakei, a pupil of Basho's, edited a collection of poems called Aranoshu and included in it a death poem ostensibly written by Moritake: "Twilight / a eulogy for petals / falling [Chiru hana o / Namu Amida Butsu to / yūbe kana]." I am convinced that this is a mistake, for a Shinto priest is not likely to abandon the world with [a Buddhist prayer]. It is more likely that Moritake merely wrote the poem after seeing flowers wilt.10
NAKAMICHI

仲道

Died on the second day of January, 1893

At the crossroad of my life and death a cuckoo cries.

Ice in a hot world: my life melts.

☆

NAMAGUSAI TAZUKURI

腥斎佃

Died on the sixteenth day of the eighth month, 1858 at the age of seventy-two

In fall the willow tree recalls its bygone glory.

Namagusai Tazukuri, whose name means literally "peasant reeking of fish," was born to a poor fishmonger. His parents died when he was young, and he was adopted by a fisherman. Namagusai Tazukuri was the fifth head of the senryu school.
NANDAI

Died on the twenty-fourth day of the twelfth month, 1817 at the age of thirty-one

Since time began the dead alone know peace. Kanete naki Life is but melting snow. mi koso yasukere

OKANO KIN'EMON KANEHIDE

Died on the fourth day of the second month, 1703
at the age of twenty-four

Over the fields of plum fragrance. Sono nioi last night's snow— yuki no ashita no plum fragrance. noume kana

Okano Kin'emon Kanehide was one of the forty-seven samurai who participated in one of the most exciting incidents in Japanese history. In 1701, a feudal lord named Asano Nagamori was ordered to hold a reception in honor of the emperor's messenger. A high official by the name of Kira Yoshinaka, who was appointed by the shogun to be in charge of ceremony, was to instruct Asano in ceremonial etiquette. Kira treated Asano with contempt. Asano, his pride wounded, drew his sword and struck Kira. Since the incident took place in the castle at Edo, in the grounds of which the drawing of weapons was strictly forbidden, Asano was ordered to take his own life by seppuku on that very day. He did so. Asano's estate was confiscated by the government, and the shogun rejected the petition brought to him by Asano's retainers to hand over the estate to the younger brother of the deceased.

Thus Asano's warriors became ronin, samurai without a lord. Forty-seven of them swore to avenge their master by killing Kira. To keep from attracting attention to themselves, they scattered to different parts of the country and waited for the proper moment. It came two years later, when Kira began to relax the security measures he had taken to protect himself. On a snowy morning of the second month, 1702, the samurai broke into Kira's mansion and killed him. They then turned themselves over to the government.

In taking their revenge, the forty-seven samurai acted in accordance with the moral code that forbade them to "live under the same sky as the enemy of their lord." They gained sympathy in many circles of society, and the shogun himself was inclined to pardon them. In the end, however, those who insisted on enforcing the law prevailed, and a year after the incident took place, all forty-seven warriors were ordered to kill themselves by seppuku. This event excited the imagination of the Japanese, and the forty-seven samurai gained an immortal place in the history and the literature of their country.

OKYO

鶯居

Died on the twenty-fifth day of August, 1890

at the age of eighty-three

This phantasm
Chiru to mishi

of falling petals vanishes into maboroshi kiete

moon and flowers . . .
hana ni tsuki

Hana, referring to cherry blossoms, is a season word for spring, whereas tsuki usually refers to the full moon of autumn. Through his death poem, Okyo transcends the illusions of this world of changing elements and seasons to a world where a never-setting moon lights everlasting flowers.

**

ONITSURA

鬼貫

* Died on the second day of the eighth month, 1738
  * at the age of seventy-eight

Give my dream back, Yume kaese raven! The moon you woke me to karasu no samasu is misted over. kiri no tsuki

Kiri (mist) generally appears in haiku poetry as an autumnal image. What was the dream cut off by the raven’s cry? Did the poet see a vision of the full moon floating in clear skies?

**

OSEN

横船

* Died on the fifteenth day of the ninth month, 1696
  * at the age of forty-four

What a lark! Omoshiro ya Swinging my arms I set off: te futte mairu a winter rainstorm. murashigure

Murashtigure is a sudden winter rainstorm accompanied by wind. It falls for the most part in mountainous areas, stopping as quickly as it starts.
In the Japanese, the word mairu may refer either to the poet's departure, or to the coming rainstorm in the last line. It is preferable, however, to think in terms of the former interpretation—Osen walking off amusing himself with the thought that he, too, came and went through the world with the suddenness of a rainstorm.

❄

OTO

鶯塘

Died on the thirty-first day of May, 1935 at the age of sixty-five

At night my sleep embraces the summer shadows of my life.

OTSUCHI

乙池

Died on the twenty-ninth day of the tenth month, 1872 at the age of sixty-four

O white chrysanthemum—man, too, passes his prime.

Otsuchi died when chrysanthemum flowers succumb to late autumn frost.
OTSUIN

Died on the twenty-fifth day of the fourth month, 1807

Hidden among the roots of grass I hear a cuckoo.

Kusa no ne ni kakurete kikan kankodori

Otsuin died in early June, when cuckoos migrate from southern Asia to Japan, their voices filling the air and evoking nostalgia in those who hear them.

The phrase "hidden among the roots / of grass" may be an allusion to the state after death. Although most Japanese no longer bury their dead, but cremate them, the idea of burial underground persists as a literary image.

OZUI

Died on the tenth day of the first month, 1783, at the age of fifty-two

Still tied to the world, I cool off and lose my form.

Yo no hazuna hiekiru ware mo katachi nashi

The phrase yo no hazuna means "halter of this world" and refers, apparently, to the body that ties one to this life.
RA-IN

羅院

Died on the thirteenth day of the tenth month, 1779
at the age of thirty-six

My body in its autumn: Mi no aki zo a ragbag as rough hechima no kawa no
as gourdskin. dambukuro

Ra-in's father (also called Ra-in) died less than three months before his son, on the twenty-ninth day of the seventh month, at the age of seventy-one. The father's death poem also opens with the words "my body in its autumn." He did indeed die in autumn, but his son, who died in winter, apparently preferred to honor his father rather than preserve haiku tradition.

Hechima is the Japanese word for the loofah, a climbing vine with gourd-like fruit first brought to Japan from China in the seventeenth century. The Japanese use the plant for various purposes: when dried, its fibers become a scrubbing brush; in autumn, the stalk is cut about a half meter from the ground, and the sap which runs out is used by women as skin lotion; the sap is also taken as a cough remedy.

RAIRAI

来々

Died on the seventeenth day of the ninth month, 1780
at the age of fifty-four

I take leave Katabira wa of autumn dressed in a summer shroud.

Katabira means robe of hemp." In Buddhist burial ceremonies, the dead are wrapped in a shroud made of hemp. Since summer robes are also made of this material, the last two lines of the poem can be read, . . . dressed in / summer clothes. Rairai died in late autumn.

RAISHI

来之

Died on the twenty-seventh day of the ninth month, 1795

You've done your duty till today, old scarecrow.

The scarecrow (kakashi) appears in haiku poetry as a season word for autumn, when the rice is harvested.

RAIZAN

来山

Died on the third day of the tenth month, 1716 at the age of sixty-three

Farewell, sire—like snow, from water come to water gone.

Suwa saraba
mizu yori mizu e yuki no michi
Raizan, a contemporary of Basho's, learned to write haiku at the age of eight and was authorized to teach and criticize haiku at the age of eighteen. It was said of Raizan that he never put his wine glass down and that he never stayed sober for so much as a day at a time. Rumor had it that he loved a doll rather than a woman and for that reason did not get married. In fact, he was married twice.

Just before his death, Raizan wrote a humorous death poem in tanka form:

Raizan has died to pay for the mistake of being born:
for this he blames no one,
and bears no grudge.

Raizan wa umareta toga de shinuru nari sore de urami mo nanimo kamo nashi

Randó

Diéd on the thirtieth day of the seventh month, 1686 at the age of twenty-two

Ne wa tokiwa shibashi momijinu matsu no tsuta

For a moment there the ivy dyed the evergreen trunk red.

The tsuta is a clinging vine found throughout Japan, climbing on stones and trees and covering fences and walls. In autumn its leaves turn red before falling. The evergreen mentioned in the poem is the pine (matsu).
RANGAI

嵐外

Died on the twenty-sixth day of the third month, 1845
at the age of seventy-five

I wish to die
Fuji-no-yama
a sudden death with eyes minagara shitaki fixed on Mount Fuji.
tonshi kana

RANSEKI

蘭石

Died on the second day of the seventh month, 1738 at the age of fifty-five

This last night of nights
Hagi no koe
bush clover whispers Mida to kiku yo o
"Buddha, Buddha . . ."
kagiri kana

Mida is short for Amida, the Buddha who rules the Pure Land in the West.

RANSEKI

蘭石

Died on the twelfth day of the first month, 1782
at the age of sixty-nine
Each day the absent grow Naki wa kazu more numerous—tree branches sō hi to natte frozen. eda samushi

This Ranseki is the son of the preceding Ranseki.

✴

RANSETSU

嵐雪

Died on the thirteenth day of the tenth month, 1707
at the age of fifty-four

One leaf lets go, and Hito-ha chiru ten another takes totsu hito-ha chiru the wind. kaze no ue

Ransetsu was a pupil of Basho's. Basho praised Ransetsu's poetry, but the poet Kyoriku said it was "anemic," and compared it to someone "who invites guests to a feast and serves no more than a menu."

Old sources say that Ransetsu's first wife was a bathing-house prostitute. She died after giving birth to a son, whereupon Ransetsu took a geisha as his wife. The couple became converts to Zen Buddhism. It is further stated that during a certain period, Ransetsu lived in the poet Kikaku's house, and that "he had not even a mat to lie on."

The word totsu is a cry of challenge uttered by Zen monks upon enlightenment. Another possible translation is "A leaf falls, ho! / Another leaf falls / high on the wind."

✴

REKISEN
礫川

_Died after 1834_
_ _past the age of eighty-six_

Let them bloom or let them die—it's all the same:
cherry trees on Mount Yoshino.

Mount Yoshino, near the city of Nara, is famed for its beauty during the cherry-blossom season.

rettei

RESEKI

練石

_Died on the fifth day of the seventh month, 1789_
_at the age of eighty-eight_

I cleansed the mirror of my heart-now it reflects the moon.

rettei

RETSUZAN

列山

_Died on the twenty-fifth day of the eighth month, 1826_
_at the age of thirty-seven_

The night I understood

rettei
this is a world of dew,
I woke up from my sleep.

\[ \text{satoru sono yo o nezame kana} \]

✦

RIEI
利栄

Died on the fourteenth day of the eighth month, 1794 at the age of twenty-two

All freezes again—among the pines, winds whispering a prayer.

\[ \text{Uragarete kaeru ya matsu ni hannyagoe} \]

✦

RIFU
梨風

Died on the sixth day of the tenth month, 1762 past the age of fifty

I'm happy through and through upon a throne of frost.

\[ \text{Hito-suji ni ureshiki shimo no utena kana} \]

Shimo no utena means "dais of frost." According to Buddhist belief, a dead soul (which has become, by dying, a Buddha) sits in paradise on a lotus seat (hasu no utena, lit., lotus calyx). Rifu, who died in the cold season, seems to interweave his last view of this world with the first glimpse of the next.
ROBUN

Died in about 1725

A water bird, asleep, floats on the river between life and death.

Ukine suru tori ya shōji no sakaigawa

ROCHU

Died on the sixth day of the tenth month, 1744 at the age of forty-four

Is it only me? Come to think of it, all rests on pillars of frost.

Ware nomi ka amoeba shimo no hashiradate

ROGAN

Died on the second day of the second month, 1693 less than forty years of age
On the ground around the capital, spring snow melts easily.

Kieyasushi miyako no tsuchi zo haru no yuki

Rogan, a pupil of Basho's, was a resident of the Tohoku region in the north of Japan. He died in Kyoto during a springtime journey. In Kyoto, Japan's capital at the time, spring snow melts sooner than in the north.

✦

ROGEN

露言

_Died on the tenth day of the fourth month, 1691 past the age of sixty_

The times are torn asunder—
the half-moon of the past, the moon of summer.

Sanze kire kako no maewa ya natsu no tsuki

Sanze means "three tenses," past, present, and future. Maewa is the term for the saddlebow, the front part of the saddle, which resembles a crescent moon. It is possible that the poet is referring to his past journeys on horseback, but in translating I have assumed he had in mind this resemblance of form.

✦

ROKA

浪化

_Died on the ninth day of the tenth month, 1703 at the age of thirty-three_ Evening shadows steal across and up the folding screen—a passing winter shower.

Tate yoko to byōbu ni kurete shigure kana

ROKUSHI

六之

Died on the sixteenth day of August, 1881 at the age of seventy-five

I wake up from a seventy-five-year dream to millet porridge.

Awa no meshi samete shichijū gonen kana

The poem alludes to a Chinese folktale about a man who dreamed that he rose in importance and became the holder of a wealthy estate. He woke up to discover that the millet porridge he had put on the fire had not yet boiled. The moral of the story is that visions of grandeur are vain, but it is tinged perhaps with a Zen Buddhist flavor as well: the truth we search for is to be found in the simple things before our eyes.

ROSEN

露川

Died on the twenty-third day of the eighth month, 1743
at the age of eighty-three

Sweep away
the pile of ashes

Hito-taki no hai hakinagase into autumn waters.
akī no mizu

Aki no mizu, "autumn waters," referring to clear waters, indicates the season in which Rosen died.

The poem presents the final act of cleaning the site of his cremation. Rosen prefaced his poem with the words "The soul will return to the sky and the body will dwell in the earth." While this might indicate a belief in the afterlife, it is preferable to understand the phrase as a reference to the dissolution of the elements, each of which separates and returns to its origin.

\section*{ROSHU}

路周

\textit{Died on the eighteenth day of May, 1899 at the age of seventy-four}

Time to go . . .
\begin{tabular}{l} Tabidachi ya
tōshi to kiite koromogae \end{tabular}

Koromogae, the change from heavy clothes to light ones, not only fixes the approximate date of Roshu's death between spring and summer, but contains a reference to the white cloth used to wrap the dead in as well. Buddhist monks generally put on a white robe near the hour of their death.

\section*{RYOKAN}

良寛 Died on the sixth day of the first month, 1831
at the age of seventy-four

Now it reveals its hidden side and now the other—thus it falls, an autumn leaf.

Ryokan is one of the most well-known of Japan's poets. At the age of seventeen he left his home and from then until his death lived as a Zen monk. Most of the time he supported himself by begging rice from door to door. He was always content with his lot. At times he would take part in the village children's games, or gather herbs with the women. Near the end of his life he became attached to a young Zen nun named Teishinni, who tended and fed him in his illness. His death poem may have been composed by another poet; it was spoken by Ryokan to Teishinni in his last moments.

✦

RYOSA

了佐

Died on the eleventh day of the seventh month, 1807
at the age of eighty-four

Is man a morning glory that he passes in a day?

✦

RYOTO

涼菟 I understand:
a cuckoo cries
today at dawn.

The last moments of Ryoto, who served as a Shinto priest and was a disciple of Basho's are recounted as follows:

When the hour of Ryoto's death approached, he began to say his will. Those standing near his bed asked apprehensively, "Is it fitting that a man like you die without leaving a death poem? . . ." Ryoto opened his eyes and responded, "I understand: / a cuckoo cries / today at dawn. After a moment he went on, "Perhaps I ought to say, 'The cuckoo cries / today at dawn [akatsuki no sono / hototogisu].'' Ryoto's pupil Otsuyu, standing at the foot of the bed, said, "What on earth are you thinking about at a time like this? A cuckoo cries / today at dawn is fine as it stands." Another pupil, Sohoku, took a brush and wrote the poem. 11

A later source claims that Ryoto died immediately after reciting his poem and denies the exchange between him and Otsuyu. The same source gives a tanka written by Ryoto during his final illness:

Till now
I thought that only others die—that such happiness should fall to me!

* RYOU

涼宇
Died on the fifth day of the eleventh month, 1794

A plover rises from the waves at dawn.

Chidori is a general name for a number of birds resembling the plover. Certain kinds of chidori spend autumn and part of winter in Japan. By day, flocks of these birds fly far out above the sea, returning to spend the night on the beach. The melancholy voice of the plover is mentioned in ancient Japanese literature to evoke the image of winter nights.

+

RYUHO

立圃

Died in the ninth month, 1669
at the age of seventy-five

Now I understand how the third verse of moon and flowers is interwoven.

Ryuho, like many of his generation, participated in writing renga, or linked verse. To write such a poem, two or more poets (sometimes as many as twenty or thirty) would take a part, each poet adding in turn a verse to the preceding one. By the rules of the art, each verse of poetry had to form a unit with the preceding and following verses. Renga poetry is full of wit and spirit, and is spiced with puns and double meanings. Elaborate rules decide just where in the chain certain seasonal images must appear, as well as the number of times words such as "moon or "flower" may be used. By convention, the third verse of the renga must be somewhat detached from the images of the first and second verse. In his death poem, Ryuho seems to be alluding to the detachment of the third verse... from the preceding ones. The art of composition in the world of moon and flower" poetry may be learned from one's master, but only a man's years can teach him the art of detachment and ultimate departure.

्र

RYUSAI

笠斎

_Died on the eleventh day of November, 1895_ _at the age of sixty-five_

Brittle pampas grass—the road is bright.

Karetogete
michi no akaruki obana kana

 Ấ

RYUSHI

隆志

_Died on the sixth day of the ninth month, 1764_
_at the age of seventy_

Man is Buddha—the day and I grow dark as one.

_Mi wa hotoke_ _ware to iu hi wa_ kurenikeri

 Ấ

RYU'U 竜雨

Died on the third day of December, 1934
at the age of sixty-one

The New Year ornaments look hazy—snow is on the way.

Mayudama ya
kasumu to miete yukimoyoi

Mayudama are small red and white rice-cake balls put on willow branches with other colorful ornaments for New Year's decorations. The custom apparently originated in ancient agricultural rites in which an abundant harvest of cocoons (mayu) was prayed for.

SAIBA

西馬

Died on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, 1858
at the age of fifty-one

I shift my pillow closer to the full moon.

Meigetsu no
hō e korobasu
makura kana

Saiba died on the day of the full autumn moon. The poet no doubt refers to the act of moving his bed closer to the window through which the moon is shining.

SAIKAKU
In this delusive world
I viewed the moon
two years too long.

Ukiyo no tsuki misugoshinikeri sue ni-nen

Ihara Saikaku, a central figure in Japanese literature, is remembered mostly as an author of novels of romance. His works became popular with the common people of Japan and are read and dramatized to this day. A merchant of Osaka and also a haiku poet, Saikaku was of the same generation as Basho, but there is no evidence that the two ever met. In an essay, Basho criticized Saikaku for trying to ingratiate himself with the masses by means of "an inferior style." If Basho holds first place among haiku poets, Saikaku takes honors as the most rapid: in a single-day contest for speed, he is said to have written twenty-three thousand five hundred haiku.

An Oriental belief holds the number of years allotted to man's life as fifty. Saikaku introduces his death poem with these words: "Man's life lasts fifty years. Even that is more than enough for me." Ukiyo, "floating world," is the most common epithet given to the world in Japanese. In the traditional Buddhist view, this world is one in which happening gives way to happening, illusion follows illusion, and all of it is nothing but a phantasm void of substance.

SAIKAKU

I borrow moonlight

Tsukikage o
for this journey of a million miles.

The unit of distance (ri) used in this poem is equivalent to about four kilometers. The distance given, a hundred thousand ri, is a hyperbolic expression for the journey to the yonder world.

✧

SAIMARO

才麿

Died on the second day of the first month, 1738 at the age of eighty-three

I'll cross the ridge up to the yonder side:
journey into spring.

The ridge here evidently refers to the mountains over which the dead must cross to reach the next world.

✧

SAIMU

西武

Died in 1679 past the age of seventy

Dawn breaks and blossoms open gates of paradise.

Yo no akete hana ni hiraku ya jōdo mon
In this poem, night, blossoms, and the gates of paradise are all linked by the verb hiraku, "to open," which can refer to the breaking of dawn, the blooming of flowers, and the opening of the gates of paradise.

SAKYOKU

砂旭

*Died on the fifth day of the second month, 1790
at the age of twenty-one*

How sad . . .                        Ara kanashi amidst the flowers of the spring equinox  hana no higan o
a journey deathward.                shide no tahi

Sakyoku died on the day of the equinox (higan) of spring, a day on which the Japanese hold ceremonies in remembrance of their ancestors. Cherry trees begin to bloom at about this time of year.

SARUO

猿男

*Died on the twenty-seventh day of April, 1923
at the age of sixty-three*

Cherry blossoms fall                        Kuikaketa on a half-eaten                           dango ni hana no dumpling.                                wakare kana
A dango is a rice dumpling, sometimes filled with red-bean paste. One occasion for eating dango is during the cherry-blossom season in the spring. Hana no / wakare means literally "flower departure"; the expression can be taken to mean the parting between the onlooker and the blossoms. It is perhaps best, however, not to read the viewer into the poem at all, but to take it as the end of a scene in which only a half-eaten dumpling and falling blossoms are left on the stage.

✧

SEIJU

盛住

Died on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, 1776 at the age of seventy-five

Not even for a moment do things stand still—witness color in the trees.

Shibaraku mo nokoru mono nashi kigi no iro

✧

SEIJU

盛住

Died on the twenty-eighth day of the eighth month, 1779 at the age of eighty-six

Water veins stain rice fields different shades of green.

Mizusuji o ukete kotonaru aota kana
In summer, rice seedlings sprout and spread wet green carpets over the flatlands. Differences in the quality and temperature of water in the irrigation ditches and in the water flowing underground beneath the fields result in different shades of green among the plants.

SEIRA

青蘿

Died on the seventeenth day of the sixth month, 1791
at the age of fifty-two

Boarding the boat
I slip off my shoes:
moon in the water.

Funabata ya
kutsu nugisuteru
mizu no tsuki

Seira prefaced this poem by saying that he had no further expectation of any man and that, having suffered from inflammation of the skin and a boil the size of a pumpkin on his head (out of which, perhaps, "a boat could be made to return to the land of the dead"), he could no longer escape the inevitable.

SEISA

清佐

Died on the nineteenth day of the ninth month, 1722
at the age of forty-seven

My body, useless
as the last persimmon Kimamori to narite eki naki
The persimmon tree (kaki) usually appears in haiku poetry as an autumnal season word, as its fruit ripens in that season. The word kaki is not explicitly mentioned in the poem, but kimamori, "tree-preserving talisman," refers to an ancient custom connected with the persimmon in which, during harvest, a single fruit was left on the tree as a tree-preserving charm.

In another rite related to persimmons, one performed to insure an abundant harvest of the fruit, an ax would be struck into the trunk of the persimmon tree on the fifth day of the first month, and a man would address the tree with these words: "Will you bear fruit, or will you not? If you will not, you shall be cut down." Another man would respond for the tree: "I will bear fruit. I will bear." Following this, chopsticks would be inserted into the cut made by the ax and the tree would be "fed" bean paste.

❄

SEISHU

清秋

Died on the seventeenth day of the fifth month, 1817 at the age of ninety-four

Rain clouds clear away: Ame harete above the lotus shines hasu ni shinnyo no
the perfect moon. tsukiyo kana

The poem creates an atmosphere of transcendence beyond this world: the lotus is the flower of paradise; "the perfect moon" symbolizes the enlightened mind.

Seishu was a daimyo, the governor of a province. It would not be correct to think he was entirely unworldly throughout his ninety-four years. The sources report that one day, as he was taking a walk, he discovered a broken bridge that had sunk into a river. He removed a plank from the water and made from it a table for himself.

昶

SEMPO

沾圃

Died on the fourteenth day of the sixth month, 1730

Deep in the underbrush a cool breeze sweeps the path.

Oitakete
iru oku suzushi michi no kaze

昶

SENCHOJO

仙鳥女

Died on the sixth day of the fourth month, 1802

I cup my ears
among the deutzia lest I fail to hear the cuckoo.

Unohana ni kikisokonawaji
hototogisu

The flowering season of the deutzia, the blossoms of which signal the onset of summer, corresponds to the time when the voice of the cuckoo is most heard. The Japanese word for this flower, unohana, is related to that for the fourth month of the lunar calendar, uzuki, the first month of summer.

Senchojo was a woman.
SENKEI

仙径

Died on the twenty-ninth day of the seventh month, 1775
at the age of seventy-one

Somehow or other even the cactus shows the fall.

Haōju no nantomonashi ni aki kurēnu

Haoju, "king of plants," is the name for the prickly-pear cactus. This plant is not common in Japan, and it is not much mentioned in haiku poetry. The cactus is a robust plant which does not change with the seasons as much as other plants.

SENRYU

川柳

Died on the twenty-third day of the ninth month, 1790
at the age of seventy-three

Bitter winds of winter—but later, river willow, open up your buds.

Kogarashi ya
ato de me o Juke kawayanagi

Senryu was the first to write haiku in the light style named after him. For decades he was esteemed as the foremost haiku critic in Edo. He would rate every haiku presented to him, and those he judged best were published in a series of pamphlets. It is estimated that he criticized about two and a half million poems in his lifetime.
Senryu's name consists of the characters for stream (sen) and willow (ryu). These signs appear in his death poem with their Japanese pronunciations, kawa and yanagi.

✦

SENRYU

川柳

* Died on the seventeenth day of the tenth month, 1818 *

A willow tree in fall:
its leaves will not be missed
as much as cherry blossoms.

Hana hodo ni mi wa oshimarezu chiru yanagi

This Senryu was the eldest son of the previous Senryu and followed him as head of the senryu school of poetry. He died shortly after the season in which the willow loses its leaves.

✦

SENRYU

川柳

* Died on the second day of the sixth month, 1827 *

Like dewdrops
on a lotus leaf
I vanish.

Hasu no ha no
tsuyu to kieyuku wagami kana

This Senryu was the younger brother of the previous Senryu and succeeded him as head of the senryu school.
SENSEKI

Died on the twenty-seventh day of the sixth month, 1742 at the age of thirty

At long last I am leaving:
in rainless skies, a cool moon—
pure is my heart.

Tsui ni yuku
minazuki suzushi mune kiyoshi

Senseki's father was well versed in the secrets of Shinto. Senseki studied Shinto with his father but did not, however, understand it entirely. When his father died, Senseki caught a fatal disease. He felt he could not leave the world without first understanding Shinto thoroughly. He sent for Teisa
(p. 323), a friend of his father's who was also learned in religion. Teisa came to Senseki's deathbed and taught him the secret doctrine. At this Senseki's face lit up, he said his death poem and died.

Minazuki is the name of the sixth month of the lunar calendar, which corresponds roughly to July. In Japanese, the word for "month" and "moon" is the same; thus the image of the moon appears in the poem.

SENTOKU

Died on the thirtieth day of the sixth month, 1726
at the age of sixty-five

Like ice in storage that will not last the year out . . .

Kowa yoku o matanu himuro no
yado narikeri
The Japanese used to bring ice down from the snow-covered mountains, or cut it from frozen ponds. They put it in caves or icehouses (himuro) to keep it through the summer. Blocks of ice were sent from these icehouses to the estates of noblemen and to the emperor's court. Sentoku, a sword-polisher by trade, died in the middle of summer.

SETSUDO

雪堂

Died on the twenty-eighth day of the third month, 1776 at the age of sixty-one

Now then, ima zo kiru for my journey to the yonder world nori no tabiji no I'll wear a gown of flowers. hanagoromo

Hanagoromo, "gown of flowers," is an elegant kimono worn during the cherry-blossom season in the spring. The expression is also used in a wider sense for "fancy dress," but Setsu-do, who died in spring, was no doubt thinking of the cherry blossoms themselves.

SHAGAI

車蓋

Died on the twenty-eighth day of the second month, 1795

Reality is flowerlike: hana ni utsutsu cold clouds sinking through yūbe ni shizumu the dusk. kumo samushi
SHARYU

舎笠

Died on the thirteenth day of the ninth month, sometime in the middle of the nineteenth century

I have gone through this world—a life of moon and snow and flowers.

Yo o heshi mo tsuki yuki hana no inochi kana

SHAYO

車用

Died on the twenty-eighth day of the sixth month, 1776 at the age of fifty-eight

"Hold on!"— and in the pause, "Buddha have mercy!"

Dokkoi to tomatta tokoro de Namu Amida

This poem presents a struggle between death and the dying, perhaps from the world of sumo, Japanese wrestling. Dokkoi, which means something like "Hold on!" or "Not so fast!" is a cry which is used to check the opponent's attack. During the moment gained by crying out, the dying uses his last remaining weapon—prayer.
SHIDOKEN
志道軒

_Died on the seventh day of the third month, 1765_

Returning as it came, a naked summer worm.

_Sono mama ni kaeru zo natsu no hadakamushi_

_Hadakamushi_ (lit., naked worm) is a general term for all hairless worms and crawling insects. The expression is used figuratively for a human or pauper.

SHIEI
子英

_Died on the second day of the sixth month, 1715_

Of such a time as this the proverb speaks: this, too, shall pass.

_Kono toki no sewa o oshie no mujō kana_

_Mujo_ refers to transience and is a central principle in Buddhist teaching: the world of appearances lacks permanent substance, and all that one sees passes away as it comes, disappearing into nothingness.

SHIGAN Farewell to "Blessed be" farewell to the Lotus Sutra—today, the end.

The word kyo in the original gives rise to a play on words, as it may mean "sutra" or "today." Namu means "blessed be, and Myoho-Renge-kyo is the Japanese name of the Lotus Sutra (lit., the splendid teaching of the Lotus Sutra). Leaving out saraba, "farewell," we get the phrase Namu Myoho-Renge-kyo, the opening words of the sutra and a prayer whose recital is a supreme commandment of the Nichiren Buddhist sect. This sutra is a writing of central importance to the Mahayana branch of Buddhism. It was translated from Sanskrit to Chinese in the first centuries A.D.

Shigenobu was an actor in the Kabuki theater.

---

SHIGENOBU

重信

Died on the twenty-eighth day of the eleventh month, 1832
A willow branch that doesn't reach the water in the vase.

Nageire no mizu mo todokazu
yanagi kana

The imagery of this poem is taken from the world of Japanese flower arrangement. In the nageire (lit., throwing in) style, the flowers and branches are set on the lip of a tall vase in an effort to achieve a natural effect. One willow branch, however, may not reach deep enough and is thus cut off from the water in the bottom of the vase, the source of life.

✦

SHIKAKU

紙隔

*Died on the twenty-third day of the ninth month, 1767
*at the age of fifty-three

To grass it comes and turns to grass:
a drop of dew.

Kusa ni kite
kusa ni kaeru ya
tsuyu no tama

✦

SHIKI

子規

*Died on the nineteenth day of September, 1902
*at the age of thirty-six

The loofah blooms and I, full of phlegm,

Hechima saite
tan no tsumarishi
Shiki is considered the founder of the modern school of haiku. He rejected the poetic tradition begun by Basho and discovered in the haiku of Buson the descriptive style, which he attempted to revive.

Shiki was a journalist, editor, and literary critic. In the early 1890s he was sent to China by his newspaper to cover the Sino-Japanese War. There he contracted tuberculosis. He returned to Japan, where he was confined to a sickbed for a number of years until his death. Adhering to the principle of the "descriptive style," he depicted the various stages of his illness in poetry. He requested, perhaps to take revenge on his employers, that the words "Journalist. Salary: thirty-five yen" be inscribed on his tombstone.

The poems given here are the last Shiki wrote. All three contain reference to the loofah (hechima), a climbing vine with various practical uses (see p. 255). Loofah sap (hechima no mizu, lit., loofah water) is taken as a cough remedy, and it was given for this reason to tuberculosis patients. The sap is customarily pressed from the stalk on the fifteenth of the ninth month, so we can tell that the third poem was written two days before the poet's death. Shiki, knowing that medicine will be of no avail, does not bother to take it.

In the second poem, itto means "one to," a unit of volume equivalent to about one hundred eighty liters.
市貢

Died on the fourth day of the first month, 1743
at the age of fifty-three

I vanish—
in the window snows of Eagle Peak remain.

Ware kiete
mado ni nokoru ya
Washi no yuki

Shiko lived in the eastern section of Kyoto, in the foothills of the mountain called Washi-ga-mine (lit., Eagle Peak). He died during the height of the snowy season.

●

SHIKO

市紅

Died on the sixth day of the sixth month, 1845 at the age of fifty-seven or fifty-eight

A cricket, crying, comes with me through autumn mountains.

Naku mushi o waga michizure ya aki no yama

Mushi is a general term for insects, but this is an autumn poem, and the insect whose voice fills all Japan throughout this season is the cricket.

"Autumn mountains" (aki no yama) refers, perhaps, to the mountains which stand, according to Japanese tradition, between the worlds of the living and the dead.

●

SHINGA
Shinga died six days before the beginning of the Bon Festival, also called Urabon.

❄

SHINSEKI

臣石

Died on the thirteenth day of the tenth month, 1764
at the age of fifty-two

Fickle winter shower:
up the road comes an umbrella.

❄

SHISUI

之水

Died on the ninth day of the ninth month, 1769
at the age of forty-four
The following has been written about Shisui’s "death poem":

During his last moments, Shisui’s followers requested that he write a death poem. He grasped his brush, painted a circle, cast the brush aside, and died.¹³

The circle (enso) is one of the most important symbols of Zen Buddhism. It indicates void—the essence of all things—and enlightenment. There is perhaps a connection between the figure of a circle and the shape of the full moon, another symbol of enlightenment.

Shiyo (Otaka Gengo Tadao) is one of the forty-seven samurai who, in the winter of 1703, avenged the death of their master and who were thus ordered to commit seppuku as punishment (see p. 250). In Shiyo's death poem, shide no yama, "mountain of death," is the mountain crossed, according to the belief, in the journey from life to death.

Surely there's a teahouse with a view of plum trees on Death Mountain, too.

Died on the fourth day of the second month, 1703
at the age of thirty-two

Shiyo (Otaka Gengo Tadao) is one of the forty-seven samurai who, in the winter of 1703, avenged the death of their master and who were thus ordered to commit seppuku as punishment (see p. 250). In Shiyo's death poem, shide no yama, "mountain of death," is the mountain crossed, according to the belief, in the journey from life to death.

It is recorded that Shiyo left another death poem in his last letter to his mother:
Snow on the pines thus breaks the power that splits mountains.

A poem similar to Shiyo's was written by Kaiga Yazaemon Tomonobu, another of the forty-seven samurai. The similarity between the poems is less, perhaps, a sign of Kaiga's smaller talent than a testimony to the friendship between him and Shiyo:

And won't there be a teahouse among cherry blossoms along the way of death?

SHIZAN

Died on the tenth day of the third month, 1775 at the age of eighty-four

Willingly I fade away within the heat wave.

Kagerō is the term for a natural phenomenon that is characteristic of spring, the season in which Shizan died. As the ground warms up and the air becomes full of vapor, rays from the sun are bent by the heavy air, and things appear to shimmer as if seen through a flame.
椎風

Died on the fifth day of the twelfth month, 1848
at the age of fifty-seven

One moon—
one me—
snow-covered field path.

Tsuki hitotsu wagami hitotsu ya noji no yuki

◆

SHOGETSU

松月

Died on the second day of September, 1899
at the age of seventy

Autumn ends:
frogs settle down into the earth.

Yuku aki no tsuchi ni osamaru kawazu kana

Frogs usually appear in spring or summer poems. Here, however, the season is the end of autumn, and the time is the time of death. Shogetsu fits his imagery to the season, when frogs burrow into the mud to hibernate. The verb osamaru means "to become silent" as well as "to settle down."

◆

SHOGO

松後
Died on the third day of the fourth month, 1798
at the age of sixty-seven

Today the sky above Mount Hiei, too, takes off its clouds:
a change of robe.

Shogo died at about the time of koromogae, the change from heavier clothes to lighter ones.

Mount Hiei (the short form of whose name is used in the original) is located north of Kyoto, the city in which Shogo died. The mountain is the site of ancient temples.

◊

SHOHAKU

尚白

Died on the nineteenth day of the seventh month, 1722
at the age of seventy-three

A swollen bottle gourd dangles from the vine:
autumn of my old age.

Yesterday, it was hibiscus today, my life is morning glory.

Shohaku, a doctor, was one of Basho's pupils. His own pupils wrote the following about the poems presented here:

Shohaku wrote these poems during his illness. When he was about to die, he said, "I shall soon abandon the world, and while this is no time to rack my brain for a death poem, I leave these two poems as a legacy of my poetry."

Shohaku's illness was a swelling in his throat, to which the poet is probably referring with "a swollen bottle gourd." Shohaku died the day the growth burst open.

The bottle gourd (yugao, lit., evening face) is a climbing vine with pumpkin-like fruit. In summer, toward evening, white flowers blossom; they wither by dawn of the following day. The mukuge, a common bush in hedges and gardens, is the rose of Sharon, a species of hibiscus. The plant sports blossoms of various colors at the end of its branches. These flowers, fading in the space of a day, symbolize the ephemeral, as do those of the morning glory, which bloom for only a few hours. Both my youth and my old age, hints the poet, were but episodes that passed like short-lived flowers.

SHOHI

Died on the fourteenth, day of the eighth month, 1750
at the age of seventy-nine

O morning glory—
I, too, yearn for eternity.

Asagao ya
ware mo meate wa jūman'okudo

Juman'okudo is one of the names for paradise or the eternal; it means literally "the ten trillion land." This might refer to the distance between paradise and this world, but it may also suggest infinite duration.

Although Shohi's poem expresses a desire to abandon this world, it would seem that he was nevertheless quite interested in its phenomena. It is said that while Shohi was visiting the poet Rosen (p. 266) in the city of Nagoya during one of his journeys, he heard that an elephant was being shipped to the shogun in Edo. The fifty-seven-year-old poet became curious. He went forty miles out of his way, lodging overnight in a roadside inn and getting up at three in the morning, just to catch a glimpse of the animal.

\[
\text{being shipped to the shogun in Edo. The fifty-seven-year-old poet became curious. He went forty miles out of his way, lodging overnight in a roadside inn and getting up at three in the morning, just to catch a glimpse of the animal.}
\]

\[
\text{SHOKEI}
\]

松遙

_Died on the thirteenth day of February, 1895 at the age of seventy-two_

My shame in this world will soon be forgotten—springtime journey.

Yo no haji o kakisute ni shite haru no tabi

Bound into this poem is the popular saying _tabi no haji wa kakisute_, "the shame of the journey is soon forgotten." A person who does something unseemly while on a journey is not held responsible for it in the same way that he would be for a deed committed at home. (This saying points out a weakness in Confucian morality, which very strictly defines the duties of an individual toward his permanent environment, but largely neglects the duty owed to strangers away from home.) Shokei quotes the saying almost word for word, but replaces _tabi_, "journey," with _yo_, "this world." His life in this world is thus presented as if he were in a strange land where he feels uprooted from the source of his being; consequently, he need not account for his behavior. The "springtime journey" (_haru no tabi_) is Shokei’s journey toward death; he died in the early part of that season.

\[
\text{SHOKU'U}
\]
織雨

Died on the twenty-first day of the eleventh month, 1772 at the age of forty-five

Chilling cold:

winds blow through bleak timber.

Ura samushi

mujō no kaze ni

teranu ki mo

❄

SHORO

蕉露

Died in April, 1894 at the age of eighty

Pampas grass, now dry,

once bent this way and that.

Samazama ni

soyogitsukushite

kareobana

❄

SHOSHUN

正春

Died on the twenty-fourth day of the fourth month, between 1660 and 1672 less than ninety years of age

Flowers bloomed yesterday, today winds blow—

what but a dream . . .

Yume nare ya

hana wa sakujitsu

kyo no kaze
SHOZAN
松山

Died on the third day of the tenth month, 1873

The fall of leaves has left some autumn on the lower branches.

In 1873 the Japanese lunar calendar was replaced by the Gregorian, but some sources continued to give dates in the old system for a time. If the date of shozan's death is computed by the new calendar, it appears that he died in the middle of November, at the close of autumn.

Trees shed their leaves from top to bottom, and at the end of autumn a few leaves can be found still clinging to lower branches.

SHUHO 舟甫

Died in 1767

Cicada shell:
little did I know it was my life.

Mi no ue to shirazu ni semi no monuke kana
SHUKABO

秋果坊

_Died on the eighth day of the eleventh month, 1775_
_at the age of fifty-eight_

Is it me the raven calls from the world of shades
this frosty morning?

_Ware o yobu ka_
_meido mo shimo no_ _asagarasu_

_Meido_, "dark land," is a term for the land of the dead. The boundary between this world and the next has been blurred in the poem.

SHUKYO

秋挙

_Died on the twenty-fifth day of the seventh month, 1826_

Above the fence
a morning glory stretches still unsatisfied.

_Asagao no_ _matamata taranu_ _kakine kana_

It seems that the morning glory, like man, is never satisfied with its lot, and when it reaches the top of the fence along which it climbs, it keeps shooting upward where there is nothing to support it.

SHUMPAN

春帆 Died in about the second month, 1703 at the age of thirty-four

The winter fowl ends up with feathers plucked.

Kanchō no mi wa mushiraruru yukue kana

Shumpan (Tomimori Suke'emon Masayori) was one of the forty-seven samurai who avenged the death of their master and were thus ordered to commit seppuku (see p. 250). The poet takes leave of the world with a hunting image. In the tradition of seppuku, the victim plunges a dagger into his abdomen; someone else, standing above the victim, strikes off his head with a "mercy blow."

❖

SHUSHIKI

秋色

Died on the fifteenth day of the fourth month, 1725
at the age of fifty-seven

I wake and find the colored iris I saw in my dream.

Mishi yume no sametemo iro no kakitsubata

Shushiki, a well-known haiku poet, was born into a family with a cake-baking business. She married into a family which dealt in antiques and second-hand goods.

Shushiki's poem reflects a viewpoint of the Mahayana branch of Buddhism, of which Sino-Japanese Buddhism is a part, as opposed to that of the older Theravada branch. Theravada doctrine views enlightenment as an awakening from the world of phenomena, called "color" in Buddhist literature, to the world of truth, the void (nirvana). According to the Mahayana school, the void should not be thought of as a state in itself standing opposite the world of phenomena. Rather, the form of everything around us is the void, and the void is the world in all its shapes and colors. In Shushiki’s poem, she awakens from the dream world of colored irises into the world of truth, and there, too, irises are found.

The iris (kakitsubata) grows beside lakes and marshes to a height of fifty to seventy centimeters. The wild iris blooms in May and June with deep purple flowers; the flowers of the domesticated variety may be white as well.

* * *

SHUTEI

秋亭

Died on the twenty-first day of the sixth month, 1858 at the age of forty-eight or forty-nine

Frost on a summer day:
all I leave behind is water that has washed my brush.

Fude sosogu
mizu mo nagori ya
natsu no shimo

The following has been written about Shutei:

Shutei's father was a taikomochi [lit., drum-carrier; a kind of male geisha who entertained guests in teahouses]. From his childhood Shutei loved to draw. He became a pupil of the artist Ueda Kocho and was praised for his mastery of his teacher's style. When his own paintings did not sell, however, he gave up on them and became an entertainer in the southern part of Osaka. His painter friends criticized him harshly for this, and his master even ostracized him from their company, but Shutei paid them no mind and continued to be an entertainer. Shutei's lively paintings were well-liked by his contemporaries.¹⁵

"Frost on a summer day" (natsu no shimo) symbolizes the ephemeral.
SOA

宋阿

Died on the sixth day of the sixth month, 1742
at the age of sixty-six

Whether or not a paradise awaits in the far reaches of the west . . .

Koshiraete
aru to mo shirazu nishi no oku

Soa was also known by the name Hajin.

SODO

素堂

Died on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, 1716
at the age of seventy-five

Full autumn moon:
my shadow takes me with him and returns.

Ware o tsurete waga kage kaeru tsukimi kana

Sodo died on the day of the full autumn moon.
素風

_Died on the twenty-fourth day of May, 1891
at the age of sixty_

Festival of Souls: _Tamamatsuri_ yesterday I hosted them _kinō wa aruji_ today I am a guest... _kyō wa kyaku_

Tamamatsuri, the Festival of Souls, is another name for the Bon Festival.

✦

SOHOKU

曽北

_Died on the fifth day of the second month, 1743
at the age of sixty-four_

Empty are _Kūkū to_ the smells of things... _mono no nioi ya_ moon above plum blossoms. _tsuki no ume_

Sohoku died in the spring during the plum-blossom season. It is said that he was a humble and modest man and did not want to take money for teaching haiku. As he was very poor, his pupils built a house for him. During the last winter of his life, he apparently felt his end was near and wrote:

This winter _Kono fuyu wa_ the willow will freeze _makoto ni karuru_ for good. _yanagi kana_

✦
SOKIN

素琴

Died in 1818

The road I take to paradise is bright with flowers.

Yuku michi wa hana ni akaruki jōdo kana

"Flowers" (hana) usually refers to cherry blossoms in spring. We do not know, however, what season Sokin died in, and it is possible that he meant the lotus, the flower of paradise.

🔹

SOKO

鼠公

Died on the twenty-fifth day of the eighth month, 1770

at the age of forty-four

Like full, plump pear flesh dwindling away . . .

Nashi no mi no marumaru to shite hatenikeri

The nashi is a pear-like fruit that has been cultivated in Japan since ancient times. It appears in haiku as a seasonal image for autumn, when its fruit ripens. This was the season of Soko’s death as well. The "pear" in this poem refers to the ripened fruit: bitten away by the teeth, or pecked at by birds, it eventually disappears. We may even surmise that Soko himself was overweight.

🔹
SOKO

桑古

Died on the third day of April, 1897 at the age of seventy

Shadows from a lingering sun Osoki hi no blur into dusk— kage mo haya nashi falling cherry petals. chiru sakura

"Shadows from a lingering sun" (the time when days grow longer) and "falling cherry petals" are both images that signify the season of spring, when Soko died.

❖

SOMARU

素丸

Died on the twentieth day of the seventh month, 1795 at the age of eighty-three

A green gourd Aohisago swells and swells and finally— fukururu hate ya clear autumn waters. aki no mizu

Somaru's death poem appeared in a collection of poetry entitled Aohisago (The green gourd), published on the seventeenth anniversary of his death. The poem is prefaced with the words "Before his death his entire body grew swollen."
SONOME

園女

Died on the twentieth day of the fourth month, 1726 at the age of seventy-four

Skies at dawn—is this reality?

O God.

Akebono no sora wa utsutsu ka Amida Butsu

Sonome was a friend of Basho's. When she came to learn haiku from him in 1690, he wrote a poem comparing her to plum blossoms. Thirteen days before his death in 1694, Basho dedicated another poem to her, describing her as a "pure white chrysanthemum." Sonome's husband, a doctor, died in 1703; in 1718, eight years before her own death, Sonome withdrew into a monastery. It is said that, out of respect for her family, who worshiped Shinto gods, she did not complete the rite required of Buddhist nuns: rather than shave her head completely, she left ten hairs on it.

SO'OOKU

宋屋

Died on the twelfth day of the third month, 1766 at the age of seventy-nine

Walking westward,

early cherry blossoms are my landmark.

Nishi e yuku higan sakura ya michi-annai

So'oku died near the time of the spring equinox. Higan sakura (or higanzakura), "equinox cherry," is a tall variety of cherry tree with scarlet blossoms that bloom before those of other kinds of cherry, around the time of the equinox.

❄

SORYU
素柳
Died in 1797
past the age of seventy

Autumn winds: Akikaze ya having sworn to save all souls, hiroki chikai no
I am at peace. kokoroyoki

Hiroki chikat, "wide vow," refers to the oath of a bodhisattva, one who strives to enlighten and redeem not only himself, but all men. In the Mahayana tradition, the oath means that the believer unites his aspiration to the world of the absolute with action in this world.

❄

SOSEN
宗専
Died on the twenty-eighth day of the sixth month, 1776
at the age of eighty-two

Lotus seeds Hasu no mi no jump every which-way tobitokoro ari as they wish. shinjizai
SUGETSU

嵩月

Died on the twentieth day of the eleventh month, 1830

The years have piled up Tsumu toshi ni snow on withered fields tabiji e yuki no along my path.
kareno kana

SUIKOKU

水国

*Died on the eighth day of the fifth month, 1734
at the age of fifty-three*

By the fifth month Satsuki kinu
one has had his fill hito mo yanagi ni of seeing willows.
umishi koro

The willow tree usually appears in haiku as an image of spring. Suikoku died during the gloomy rainy season of early summer.

According to old sources, Suikoku loved not only poetry, but women as well. He fell in love with a famous geisha, ransomed her from her geisha house, and married her. The assets of his tool-making firm dwindled, apparently as a result of his frivolity, and he was forced by the managers to transfer his authority to his daughter.
SUNAO

寸七翁

Died in 1926
at the age of thirty-nine

Spitting blood clears up reality and dream alike.

Chi o hakeba utsutsu mo yume mo saekaeru

TADATOMO

忠知

Died on the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month, 1676
at the age of fifty-two

This frosty month nought but the shadow of my corpse remains.

Shimotsuki ya aru wa nakimi no kagebōshi

Tadatomo committed suicide in the traditional Japanese manner. The reason for his suicide is not clear. Just before his death he wrote this death poem and added the words, "the vicissitudes of my life—how sad!"

Shimotsuki, "frost month," is the name for the eleventh month of the lunar calendar (by the solar calendar, approximately the month of January).
太喬

Died in the fourth month, 1770

The deutzia has bloomed—
it's time to start for those clear western skies.

Unohana ya akaruuki nishi e iza ikamu

TAIRYU

大立

*Died on the twenty-sixth day of the fourth month, 1747
at the age of sixty-nine*

Flowers bloom a score of days—
I threescore years and nine,
and now dawn breaks.

Hana wa hatsuka ware wa rokujūkyū yoru no ake

TAKAO

高尾

Died on the twenty-fifth day of the twelfth month, 1660

Brittle autumn leaves that crumble in the north wind . . .

Samukaze ni moroku kuzururu momiji kana

Takao is not only the poet's pen name, but her geisha title as well. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the brothel districts of Japan flourished under government supervision. "Takao" was the highest (and most expensive) rank of geisha. The poet belonged to the famous geisha house Miuraya in the Yoshiwara.

Samukaze means "cold wind." In haiku this is a synonym for the north wind. In Japan, summer winds usually blow from the south and winter winds from the north.

TAKUCHI
卓池

*Died on the twenty-first day of the eighth month, 1846
at the age of seventy-nine*

When summoned, I will say farewell:
my house beneath the moon.

TAKURO
卓良

*Died on the sixteenth day of the fourth month, 1866
at the age of sixty-nine*

Soon I shall hear the cuckoo's voice and liven up.

Takuro, who was also called Kosando, was known for his miserliness. His acquaintances made slight changes in his two names and combined them in the phrase yokasando buttakuro, which means in common speech, "I don't give; I take!"

✦

TAMANARI

玉成

Died in the fifth month past the age of sixty

Cool—a seagull suddenly submerges.

Suzushisa ya pokuri kakururu miyakodori

The year of Tamanari's death is unknown.

✦

TAMASHICHI

玉七

Died in 1910

A lone monk came to call one autumn evening.

Sō hitori
tazunete kitari
aki no kure
種彦
* Died on the thirteenth day of the seventh month, 1842
* at the age of sixty

Such is the world's way:
in fall the willow sheds its leaves.

Chiru mono to sadamaru aki no yangi kana

♦

TANKO

旦藁
* Died in 1735(?)
* at the age of about seventy

Today too, melon-cool, the moon comes up above the fields.

Kyō wa nao
makuwa to suzushi
hata no tsuki

Life-cutting axe:
lured by the hunter's deer call, a doe approaches.

Inochi tatsu
ono zo na ga yoru ojikabue

The moon leaks out from sleeves of cloud and scatters shadows.

Kage nuguu
tsuki ya morederu
kumo no sode

The first snow falls upon the bowels of Tombstone Mountain.

Hatsu-yuki ni
nado fugawari no
Toribe-yama

Tanko, one of Basho's pupils, was a cake-seller and practitioner of acupuncture. Once a sack of grain was brought to Tanko as a present from one of his patients. Tanko was so delighted that he brought out a bottle of rice wine to celebrate the occasion. Just then a messenger came from the sender to inform him that a mistake had been made: the gift that was meant for Tanko was a sack of radishes, not of grain. Tanko was crestfallen. Later, however, when his poet-friend Etsujin came by, the two of them broke out laughing. On another occasion, during an acupuncture treatment, Tanko was unable to extract one of the needles from the body of his patient. Leaving the patient with the needle still in his flesh, he fled from the place.

We do not know when Tanko died. The poems were written a short time before his death, and the seasonal images belong to the time between autumn and winter. The "deer call" in the second poem refers to an instrument blown by hunters which imitates the mating call made by stags in autumn to attract does. Toribe-yama (fourth poem) is the name of a hill in Kyoto that has a cemetery on it.

TANKO

Died on the twenty-seventh day of March, 1884 at the age of fifty-eight

For eight and fifty years I've had my fun with moon and flowers.

Tsuki hana ni gojūhachi-nen asobikeri

TANTAN

Died on the twenty-seventh day of March, 1884 at the age of fifty-eight

For eight and fifty years I've had my fun with moon and flowers.
Died on the second day of the eleventh month, 1761

at the age of eighty-eight

With my cane
I trace Mount Fuji
in the morning frost.

Asashimo ya
tsue de egakishi
Fuji-no-yama

Tantan was considered greedy for wealth and fame by his contemporaries. He lived in Osaka, but it is said he claimed that the water of Osaka was dirty. One of his pupils, the son of a rich family who owned merchant ships, brought Tantan fresh drinking water daily from Kyoto.

❖

TEIKITSU

貞橘

Died on the eighth day of the eighth month, 1760

Open the shutters to the autumn typhoon—herald from beyond.

Mado akeyo nori no tsukai no akitsumuji

❖

TEISA

貞佐

Died on the sixth day of the twelfth month 1747
at the age of sixty-eight

A plover wades through shallows of the last month

Ato wa mizu toshi-no-se o iku without turning back.

Toshi-no-se, "shallows of the year," is a term referring to the end of the year, when Teisa died. Toshi also refers to a person's age.

TEISHI

定之

_Died on the sixth day of the ninth month, 1700 at the age of fifty_

A morning glory—yet how long it stayed alive!
full fifty years.

Asagao wa hisashiki mono yo gojū-nen

TEISHITSU

貞室

_Died on the seventh day of the second month, 1673 at the age of sixty-four_

New year—what binds it to my life is rice gruel.

Kuru toshi no omoyu ni tsunagu
inochi kana

Teishitsu was unlike other people even as a child. He was a connoisseur of various arts, he knew history well, and he was a "general" in the ranks of haiku poets. He would often tell ancient tales of heroism, accompanying himself on the biwa. When flowers opened up at dawn in the spring, on moon-lit nights in autumn, or early in the morning of newly-fallen snow, he would wander to scenic places, plucking the biwa or playing the flute.

In the winter of 1672 the poet became ill, and during the new year, a month before his death, he composed the haiku given above. It is not a death poem, but it is rather better than the actual death poem that Teishitsu left behind. The latter is a tanka in which he greets death and informs him that, since the years of his life have been "eight times eight," he has no cause to complain.

TEMBO

天姥

Died in the eighth month, 1823 at the age of eighty-three

I wish this body might be dew in a field of flowers.
Hana no negai  hanano no tsuyu to  naru mi kana

In the original, the wish is made by the flower, but the intention is to the wish of the poet, whose life is compared to a flower. The sources say that when Tembo was seventy-five years old, a rumor spread that he had died. When he heard of this, he said, "Nothingness is but a change in being, and 'departure' means 'meeting'; that is the way of heaven." To commemorate his "death," he published a book of his poetry, and changed his name to Rio, "old pear."

TESSHII
Tesshi was notorious for his mocking commentaries on contemporary poets, whom he compared to prostitutes. The harshness of his criticism angered even his best friend, the poet Kikaku.

TESHUU

 Died on the sixth day of the sixth month, 1775
 at the age of fifty-two

 When I leave these eyes of flesh, I wish to see the lotus.

 TOGYU

 Died on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, 1749
 at the age of forty-four

 When autumn winds blow not one leaf remains nokoru ha mo nashi

the way it was.
aki no kaze

✦

TOHO

土芳

*Died on the eighteenth day of the first month, 1730
at the age of seventy-four*

Food is steaming Aware naru on the stove—aji atatamaru
ah, misery . . .
hioke kana

A hioke (or hibachi) is a traditional heater made of wood, metal, or pottery in which charcoal is burned. People gather around the hioke in winter to warm themselves and sometimes to heat their food.

Toho was born to a family of rice merchants, but was adopted at an early age by a samurai, an artist in dagger warfare, who taught the art to him. Toho was a native of the same district as Basho, but younger than him by thirteen years. Basho met Toho when the latter was only nine years old; the next time he saw him was twenty years later. On this occasion Basho wrote the following poem "in honor of an old friend after twenty years":

Within your life and mine Inochi futatsu
there lives
naka ni ikitaru
a cherry blossom.
sakura kana

✦

TOJAKU
都雀

Die on the eighth day of the eleventh month, 1799

I go back to the void where frost and snow won't bother me.

Mu ni kaeru

mi zo yuki shimo no

itoi nashi

Tojaku died in winter, the image of which appears by means of the negation of the attributes of that season.

✧

TOJUN

東順

Die on the twenty-ninth day of the eighth month, 1695

at the age of seventy-three

Even dew distilled from a thousand herbs

can't cure this illness.

Shishō ni wa

chikusa no tsuyu no

gen mo nashi

Tojun, the father of the poet Kikaku, was a doctor. He prefaced his death poem with these words: "A seventy-three year-old doctor cooks up many different brews for himself."

✧

TOKO

杜口 Died on the eleventh day of the second month, 1795 at the age of eighty-six

Death poems are mere delusion—death is death.

\[ \text{Jisei to wa} \]
\[ \text{sunawachi mayoi} \]
\[ \text{tada shinan} \]

**

TOKUGEN

徳元

Died on the twenty-eighth day of the eighth month, 1647,
at the age of eighty-nine

My life was lunacy until this moonlit night.

\[ \text{Ima made wa} \]
\[ \text{iki tawagoto o} \]
\[ \text{tsuku yo kana} \]

Tsuku means both "to talk" (when it accompanies a word such as \textit{tawagoto}, gibberish) and "moon" (in classical Japanese).

**

TOMOEMON

友右衛門

Sound of a melody:
thus begins my debut
in the world beyond.

\[ \text{Ongaku no} \]
\[ \text{koe wa anoyo no} \]
\[ \text{hatsu-yagura} \]

Tomoemon belonged to the third generation of a family of actors. He drew from his experience as a Kabuki actor for the imagery of this poem:
hatsu-yagura is the drumbeat that marks the beginning of a play. It is not known when Tomoemon died.

TOYOKUNI

豊国

 Died on the seventh day of the first month, 1825

Is it like a charcoal sketch—a hazy shadow?

Yakifude no mama ka oboro ni kagebōshi

Yakifude, is a stick singed at one end and used as a brush for charcoal drawings. An artist may trace over these faint lines with brush and ink when making an ink drawing, but the charcoal drawing is a medium in its own right.

UKO

羽紅

 Died on the third day of the intercalary month, 1743
 at the age of fifty-seven

Cuckoo,
take me up to where clouds drift.

Yuku kumo ni made tsuredatan hototogisu

Uko died in the intercalary month added after the fourth lunar month of 1743. When this date is calculated by the Gregorian calendar, it appears that he died in summer, the season of the cuckoo.

✨

UKO

宇考

_Died on the seventh day of the third month, 1820
at the age of eighty-two_

The voice of the nightingale makes me forget my years.

_Uguisu no naku ya wasururu waga yowai_

Old sources tell us that Uko became paralyzed in his old age and was confined to his bed. On the last day of the second month, 1820, the lord of his province sent him a gift of wine. Uko held a banquet and, with a shaking hand, took up his brush and wrote the poem above, prefacing it with the words "I received your gift of wine with gratitude." This was his last poem.

The _uguisu_, the Japanese nightingale, or bush warbler, frequents the dwellings of man at the end of winter, announcing the coming of spring.

✨

UNREI

雲鈴

_Died on the second day of the second month, 1717_

The second of the second month:
a change of servants in the other world as well.

_Degawari wa
anoyo mo nigatsu futsuka kana_
In accordance with a centuries-old tradition, servants of rich houses and commercial firms worked on the basis of half-year contracts. The dates for renewal of the contracts were, in most parts of Japan, the second of the second month and the second of the eighth month. At these times many servants would return to their own homes, and others would come to take their places, a practice called degawari (or dekawari). The first of these days, in the second month, is a spring season-word in haiku, and Unrei, who died on the day itself, extends the image of servants leaving their establishments to his own exit from this world to the next.

Unrei’s death is described thus:

Unrei, a samurai by origin, abandoned society and took to wandering up and down Japan. He studied haiku under Shiko. After some time he built a hut in the village of Izumozaki, in the province of Echigo [present-day Niigata Prefecture], where he taught haiku to the people of the place. There he drank wine, learned to observe the vanities of the world, and abstained from eating cereal crops. When he decided that he had lived long enough, he requested his friends to build for him a coffin. On the second day of the second month, Unrei rose up in the morning, shaved his head, bathed, changed his clothing, and said, "Today there is a good reason to prepare a feast for everyone." He ate and drank with his friends, and in the middle of the celebration said, "And now I shall get inside this casket, so as to put in practice all I have learned during my life. When my breathing ceases, you take care of the rest." He read a short will, and on the paper of this document he wrote his death poem. . . . Those who were with him did not believe him. They thought he was drunk, and some of them even joked, "If it is so easy to abandon this world, then let's all go!" However, about noon, Unrei stopped breathing, and he died leaning on a column, his face flushed with wine, in the attitude of sleep. His friends buried him in Izumozaki.17 雨声

*Died on the seventh day of the seventh month, 1764
at the age of sixty-six*

Six and sixty—setting sail in tranquil water, breeze among the lotus.

Rokujūroku
defune wa yasushi
hasu no kaze

In Usei's death poem, the poet's voice becomes that of a pilot steering the ship of life. He announces the time of the voyage—sixty-six (years of life)—the state of the water as the ship leaves harbor, and that of the wind blowing through the lotus leaves in the lake of the afterlife.

蹅

UTSU

右通

Died on the twenty-fourth day of the second month, 1863 at the age of fifty

The owner of the cherry blossoms turns to compost for the trees.

Kino moto no koyashi tomo nare
hana no nushi

Utsu died in spring during the cherry-blossom season.

蹅

WAGIN

和吟 Died on the third day of the first month, 1758
at the age of seventy-three

New Year's dawn:
but I'm already used to bowing westward.

Kuse ni natte nishi ogamikeri
hatsu-ashita

Wagin died two days after the first dawn of the new year. In a ceremony whose origin apparently lies in the Shinto religion, the Japanese bow to the first rays of the sun of every new year. Wagin, a Buddhist used to bowing to the west toward paradise, now turns his back on the rising sun. He thus hints, with a wry smile, that he already belongs more to the next world than to this one.

❖

WAKYU

和及

Died on the sixteenth day of the first month, 1692
at the age of forty-four

My four and forty years bloom in the last verse of a chain poem.

Waga toshi no
yoyoshi no hana no ageku kana

By convention, the last verse (ageku) of a renga contains a spring season-word. Wakyu compares his forty-four yearlong life to a chain of poetry which he ends with an image of spring.

❖

WAKYU
和及

_Died on the tenth day of the eleventh month, 1759_

In the end
I plow through heavy snow:
the way of the brush.

Tsui ni yuku
yuki fumiwakete
fude no michi

Wakyu died in the winter, and here likens his coming journey to tramping through the snow (yuki fumiwakete). This line is also pivotal, in that Wakyu seems to be saying that his life as a haiku poet, a follower of the "way of the brush" (fude no michi), has been as difficult as the journey upon which he will be soon embarking.

YABA

野坡

_Died on the third day of the first month, 1740 at the age if seventy-eight_

A voice calls me—a sudden winter shower in this floating world.

Ware o yobu
koe ya ukiyo no
kata shigure

Before his death, Yaba is said to have written two poems. The poem above is the first of these two. His very last poem is not clear and is not as good a farewell poem as the one given here.

YAITSU
野逸

Died on the fifteenth day of the first month, 1807
at the age of eighty

I pass beneath the New Year’s gates—moon in the skies of paradise.

Paradise—
I see flowers from the cottage where I lie.

Shimekazari is the name for ornaments made of twisted rope hung on the gates of houses during the New Year’s holidays. On the fifteenth day of the first month (the day on which Yaitsu died), the decorations are removed and burned.

Yaitsu prefaced the second poem with the words "The land of life is the land of everlasting light"—that is, there is no difference between this world and that of eternity.

ヤオヒコ

八百彦

Died on the twentieth day of the third month, 1777
at the age of eighty-one

Clouds of flowers fall not knowing east or west.

Hana no kumo, "clouds of flowers," is a common metaphor for falling cherry petals. Yaohiko, who died around the cherry-blossom season, prefers death after the manner of flowers, whose petals are blown by the wind in all directions, to that of man, who tends only westward, the direction of the Buddhist paradise.

* * *

YAYU

也有

Died on the sixteenth day of the sixth month, 1783
at the age of eighty-two

A short night wakes me from a dream that seemed so long.

It is said that Yayu had many pastimes. In addition to writing poetry, he painted, fought with swords, and played the biwa. He was fond of wine, tobacco, and human company. As a poet, he did not confine himself to haiku: he was known as an artist in haibun (prose written using the techniques of haiku), tanka, kyoka, and Chinese poetry. It is no wonder, then, that Yayu did not rest content with a haiku death poem only, but added two others, one tanka and one Chinese poem:

Yesterday? Today?
Thus death revolved within my thoughts and fruitless days wore on—many indeed have been the years I've lived through.

* * * *

My sickness lingers; I part from this world.
For many years I hid myself in my village.
From a dream of eighty years and more
I wake at dawn to peals of temple bells.

ZAISHIKI

在色

_Died on the fifteenth day of the ninth month, 1719_
_at the age of seventy-seven_

Frost on grass: _Kusa no shimo_ a fleeting form _tōza bakari zo_ that is, and is not! _shira ururi_
NOTES

PART ONE

10. Muju, comp., Shasekishu (Collection of sand and stone; narratives illustrating the teachings of Buddhism) (1299).

14. Nomori no Kagami (The field watchman's mirror; a review of poetry) (fifteenth cent.).

18. Matsu'ura, Kasshi Yawa.

22. Natsume Seibi, Zuisai Kaiwa (Talks on haikai by Zuisai [the author's pen name]) (1819).

27. Momoi Tou, Kyuai Zuihitsu (Essays from a dusty pannier; tales and observations) (c. 1789).

PART THREE

1. Takakuwa, Haikai Sesetsu.

3. Ibid.

4. Takarai Kikaku, Zotanshu (Miscellany; prose written using the techniques of haiku [haibun]) (1692).

7. Takarai Kikaku, Hanatsumi (Flower picking; a haikai diary) (1690).

8. Ishida Mitaku, Hitomotogusa (One blade of grass; a haikai anthology) (1669).

14. Saida and Ennyu, comps., Yugao no Uta (Song of the bottle gourd; a haikai anthology) (1722).

To the best of my knowledge, no exhaustive research on the subject of death poems has been written in Japan. The book that comes closest is shi no Nihon Bungakushi (Death in the history of Japanese literature) by Muramatsu Go (Tokyo: Kadokawa Bunko, 1981). This is a detailed study of Japanese attitudes toward death and the reflection of these attitudes in different periods of Japanese literature. However, in the area of poetry the book deals mainly with tanka, scarcely touching upon haiku and poems written by Zen monks.

Most of the death poems by Zen monks that I have included in this collection are translated from Zenso no Yuige (Death poems of Zen priests) and Zenso no Shoji (Life and death of Zen priests) by Furuta Shokin (Tokyo: Shunjusha, 1965 and 1971). Ryokan's haiku also is from the former book.

Haiku death poems as such have not been gathered until now. Most of the poems whose sources are not stated in the Notes were taken from the biographical dictionary shinsen Haikai Nempyo (Chronological chart of a new selection of haikai) edited by Hirabayashi Hoji and Onishi Kazuto (Osaka: Shoga Chimpon Zasshisha, 1923). Others were taken from older sources, indicated in the Notes; some of these are found only among the manuscripts of libraries and museums.

INDEX OF POETIC TERMS

This index lists the words in the original Japanese haiku death-poems (Part III) discussed at least once in the commentaries, as well as many other words found in the poems. Reference is made to the poets' names. English translations of most of the words are cross-referenced to the Japanese words.

A few entries contain references to the poems of the Zen monks in Part II; the names of these poets are followed by "(Z)." Where two or more poets have names pronounced alike, references to them are followed by the date of death.

ageku (last verse of a renga), Wakyu (1692)
ajisai (hydrangea), Bairyu Akashi (place name), Chikuro aki (autumn), Fukyu, Ginka, Gohei (1819), Jomei, Kasenni, Kinko, Koyo, Ra-in, Rairai, Senkei, Shohaku, Shozan, Tanehiko; a. no kaze (a. wind), Ensetsu, Gansan, Kan-na, Togyu; a. no koe (voice of a.), Ichishi; a. no kumo (a. cloud), Bufu; a. no kure (end of a.), Chogo, Tamashichi; a. no mizu (a. waters), Enryo, Rosen, Somaru; a. no yama (a. mountain), Shiko (1945) akikaze (autumn wind), Gofu, Soryu angya (journey), Baiseki asagao (morning glory), Gen-gen'ichi, Hakusen, Kato, Moritake, Ryosa, Shohi, Shukyo, Teishi
asagayu (morning porridge), Kusamaru asashimo (morning frost), Tantan asatsuyu (morning dew), Fusso ato no matsuri (too late; lit., after the festival), Koji autumn. See aki awayuki (slush), Ginko ayame (iris), Daibai bamboo. See take begging sack. See zudabukuro blossom. See hana boat. See fune; tsuki no June Bon (the Bon Festival), Chiri (1917). See also Tamamatsuri; Urabon bottle gourd. See yūgao brush. See fude; yakifade Buddha. See hotoke bush warbler. See uguisu butterfly. See chō cactus. See haōjn calabash. See yūgao calyx. See utena cargo. See tsumimono chagayu (rice gruel), Chiri (1716) cherry blossoms. See hana; higan sakura; osozakura; sakura; yamazakura; yūzakura chidori (plover), Ryo'u, Teisa chimpunkan (gibberish), Issa chiri naki (without dust), Chirin chō (butterfly), Chikuro, Ichimu chrysanthemum. See kigiku; nokorigiku; shiragiku; uragiku cicada. See semi cloud. See aki no kumo; kumo; nishi no kumo; ukigumo cuckoo. See hototogisu; kankodori dais. See utena dango (rice dumpling), Saruo death poem. See jisei death water. See shinimizu degawari (dekawari; change of servants), Unrei departure. See kadode; tabidachi deutzia. See unohana
dew. See asatsuyu; kusa no tsuyu; tsuyu doctrine. See nori dragon. See tatsu dream. See yume duck. See kari dust. See chiri naki earth. See tsuchi east. See higashi egggplant. See nasubi equinox. See higan

fawn. See kanoko festival. See matsuri field. See hanano; hara; harenno; no firefly. See hotaru floating world. See ukiyo flower. See hana; hanano; ku-abana; kusa no hana frost. See asashimo; natsu no shimo; shimo fude (brush), Koha, Shutei, Wakyu (1759) Fuji-no-yama (Mount Fuji), Kimpo, Rangai, Tantan funanta (sailor's song), Kozan fune (boat; ship), Choha. See also tsuki no fune futokoro (the front part of a kimono), Kaisho fuyō (hibiscus), Koson fuyu (winter), Kafu (1784)
fuyugomori (hibernation), Hou

gazō (portrait), Kanga gibberish. See chimpunkan; tawagoto gokuraku (paradise), Chora, Choshi, Joseki, Kin'e, Masumi Kato (1796) grass. See kusa; uragare gruel. See asagayu; chagayu; omoyu ha (leaf), Chori, Gohei (1819), Jomei, Kyo'on, Ransetsu, Togyu. See also hazue; konoha; ochiba hadakamushi (general term for hairless worms), Shidoken halter. See hazuna hana (blossom; cherry blossom; flower), Gansan, Gozan (1789), Hakuen (1859), Hakusai, Hyakka, Inseki, Kari, Kato, Keido (1787), Kiko, Kin'u, Okyo, Ryuho, Saimu, Sakyoka, Saruo, Senryu (1818), Sharyu, Shoshun, Sokin, Tairyu, Tanko (1884), Tembo, Utsu, Wakyu (1692), Yaitsu, Yaohiko hana (nose), Gaki, Mabutsu (1696)

hanagoromo (a certain kimono), Setsudo

hanano (field of flowers), Tembo

haōju (prickly-pear cactus), Senkei

hara (field), Hokusai

haru (spring), Gosen; h. no mizu (water of the s. season), Kimpu; h. no tabi (s. journey), Saimaro, Shokei; h. no yuki (s. snow), Rogan

hasu (lotus), Donsui, Fusō, Jakura, Kassan, Kyokusai, Seishu, Senryu (1827), Sosen, Tesshu, Usei

hatsu-ashita, Wagin

hatsu-hinata (first sun-basking), Baisei

hatsu-yagura (drumbeat at the start of a Kabuki play), Tomoemon hazue (leaf tip), Kiba hazuna (halter), Ozui heart. See kokoro

hechima (loofah), Ra-in, Shiki

hemp robe. See katabira hibernation. See fuyugomori hibiscus. See fuyō; mukuge

Hie (Mount Hiei), Shogo

higan (equinox), Hakurin, Sakyoku

higan sakura (higanzakura; a variety of cherry), So'oku

higashi (east), Goshi, Yaohiko

himuro (ice house), Sentoku

hioke (hibachi; a traditional heater), Toho hiroki chikai (Buddhist vow), Soryu hitodama (lit., man-ball), Hokusai hitokoe (one sound), Ichishi, Takuro hitorimushi (tiger moth), Kaikai ho! See totsu hometown. See kokyō hōrai (mountain in Chinese legend; New Year's decorations), Baisei hotaru (firefly), Gensho, Kaiga hotoke (Buddha; name for the deceased), Ryushi. See also yukibotoke hototogisu (cuckoo), Bako, Bo-kukei, Chosui, Fufu, Goshu-ku, Hoyu, Jakua, Nakamichi, Ryoto, Senchojo, Takuro, Uko (1743) hot-water bottle. See tōba hydrangea. See ajisai

ice. See kōri icehouse. See himuro inazuma (lightning), Amano Hachiro inkstone. See suzuri insect. See mushi inutade (knotweed), Isan iris. See ayame; kakitsubata ivy. See tsuta

jakkōdo (peaceful land of eternal light), Gazen jisei (death poem), Bokusui, Toko jōdo (Pure Land in the West), Dohaku, Inseki, Kizan (1786), Saimu, Sokin, Yaitsu journey. See angya; haru no tabi; shide no tabi; tabi; tabiji jūman'okudo (paradise), Shohi just so! See nyoze kadode (departure), Hakujubo, Kifu kagerō (shimmering summer air), Shizan kakashi (scarecrow), Raishi kaki (persimmon). See kimamori kakitsubata (iris), Shushiki kakugo (resignation to fate), Kin’u kame (turtle), Baisei kane (metal), Atsujin kankodori (cuckoo), Keido (1750), Otsuin kanoko (fawn; a kimono pattern), Chiyojo karazake (dried salmon), Hou kareno (withered field), Basho, Sugetsu kareno-zuki (moon over a withered field), Gimei kareobana (dried pampas grass), Daibai, Shoro karesusuki (dried pampas grass), Hakukin kari (spp. of wild duck), Hakuro kashiku (letter closing), Chiyoni katabira (hemp robe), Rairai katsu (a cry of enlightenment), Ichishi, Kogetsu Sogan (Z), Kokei Sochin (Z), Seigan Soi (Z), Shun'oku Soen (Z), Tet-to Giko (Z), Toyo Eicho (Z), Yoso Soi (Z) kawayanagi (river willow), Senryu (1790) akayu (gruel). See asagayu; chagaya kaze (wind), Ippu, Kyutaro, Ransetsu, Sempo, Shoku’u, Shoshun, Usei. See also aki-kaze; aki no kaze; samukaze keshi (poppy), Hokushi kigiku (yellow chrysanthemum), Godo

ku. See kigiku; nokorigiku; shiragiku; uragiku kimamori (tree-preserving talisman), Seisa kiri (mist), Onitsura kiri (paulownia), Gohei (1819)
kisaragi (second month), Jowa kisohajime (fresh New Year's clothes), Chiyojo kita (north), Amano Hachiro knot (of a tree). See kobu knotweed. See inutade koboreume (falling plum petals), Minteisengan kobu (knot of a tree; swelling), Enshi koe (voice), Ranseki (1738), Ya-ba. See also aki no koe; hitokoe kogarashi (winter wind), Hakuen (1806), Senryu (1790)
kokoro (heart), Hakujubo, Hankai, Hyakka, Issho, Konkan, Renseki

okyō (hometown), Fuwa, Kei-do (1787)

konoha (leaf), Ippu

kōri (ice), Choha, Hyakka, Na-kamichi

koromogae (change of clothes), Michikaze, Roshu, Shogo

kotatsu (a low, heated table), Gazen

kumo (cloud), Chosui, Hakuen (1806), Kari, Momen, Sha-gai, Tanko (1735), Uko (1743), Yaohiko. See also aki no kumo; nishi no kumo; ukigumo kure (nightfall; year-end), Gaki, Kiyu, Ryushi. See also aki no kure; toshi no kure kusa (grass), Banzan, Kifu, Otsu-in, Shikaku, Zaishiki; k. no hana (g. flower), Asei; k. no tsuyu (dew on the g.), Kangyu, Koraku

kusabana (flowering plant), Kin'ei

kyū (moxa), Kasei lantern. See takatōro; tōro

law. See nori leaf. See ha; hazue; konoha; momiji; ochiba

lightning. See inazuma

loofah. See hechima

Lotus sutra. See Namu Myōhō-Renge-kyō

maewa (saddlebow), Rogen

makura (pillow), Horoku, Saiba. See also takamakura mallard. See kari

maple leaves. See momiji

matsu (pine), Koseki, Rando, Riei

matsugo no mizu (water of the last moments), Mitoku

matsuri (festival), Koju

mayudama (rice-cake balls), Ryu'u

meido (land of the dead), Shukabo

meigetsu (full autumn moon), Kanshu, Saiba metal. See kane

mijikayo (short night), Kafu (1827), Yayu minazuki (sixth month), Senseki mist. See kiri mizu (water), Chiboku, Gozan (1789), Hakukin, Hyakka, Koraku, Kyokusai, Masahide, Masumi Kato (1825), Raizan, Seira, Shigenobu, Shutei, Teisa. See also aki no mizu; haru no mizu; matsugo no mizu; shimizu; shinimizu momiji (maple leaves), Hakusai, Isan, Kyohaku, Ryokan, Takao moon. See kareno-zuki; mei-getsu; natsu no tsuki; nishi no tsuki; nochi no tsuki; tsuki; tsukikage; tsukiyo moon viewing. See tsukimi morning glory. See asagao moth. See hitorimushi mountain. See aki no yama; Fuji-no-yama; hōrai; Hie; shide no yama; Toribe-yama; Washi; yama; Yoshino Mount Fuji. See Fuji-no-yama Mount Hiei. See Hie
Mount Yoshino. See Yoshino
moxa. See kyū mui (non-action), Kibai mujō (transcience), Shieï, Sho-ku'u mukuge (rose of Sharon), Shohaku murashigure (winter rainstorm), Osen mushi (insect), Shiko (1845) nageire (a style of flower arrangement), Shigenobu Namu Amida Butsu (Namu; Namu Amida; a Buddhist prayer), Hoyu, Karai, Kin'ei, Kozan, Sonome. See also nembutsu; shōmyō Namu Myōhō-Renge-kyō (Lotus sutra), Shigan nana-meguri (seven cycles), Hakuen (1859) nashi (a pear-like fruit), Soko (1770) nasubi (eggplant), Mokudo natsu (summer), Hokusai, Kassan; no shimo (s. frost), Shutei; no tsuki (s. moon), Rogen nazuna (an herb), Hogyoku nembutsu (a Buddhist prayer), Kisei new rice. See shimmai new year; New Year's Day. See hatsu-ashita; hatsu-hinata; kisohajime; nazuna; shōgatsu; toshi New Year's decorations. See hōrai; mayudama; shimekazari night. See mijikayo nightingale. See uguisu nishi (west), Baiseki, Choshi, Soa, So'oku, Taikyo, Wagin, Yaohiko; n. no kumo (clouds in the w.), Issho; n. no sora (western skies), Hakujubo, Hokusso, Jakua;
 n. no tsuki (western moon), Bankoku nishiki (brocade), Kyohaku no (field), Baika, Chiyojo, Gokei. See also hanano; kareno nochi no tsuki (second autumn moon), Kisei nokorigiku (remaining chrysanthemum), Kizan (1851) nori (doctrine; law), Benseki, Gozan (1733) north. See kita noume (plum), Okano Kin'emon Kanehide nyoze (just so!; a Zen cry), Musho Josho (Z) obana (pampas grass), Ryusai. See also kareobana ochiba (falling leaf), Shozan okina (the old one; Basho), Gimei omoyu (rice gruel), Teishitsu osozakura (late-blooming cherry), Hyakka pampas grass. See kareobana; karesusuki; obana paradise. See gokuraku; hōrai; jakkōdo; jōdo; jūman'okudo paulownia. See kiri persimmon. See kimamori pillow. See makura; takamakura pine. See matsu plover. See chidori plum. See koboreume; noume; shiraume; ume poppy. See keshi portrait. See gazō prickly-pear cactus. See haōju Pure Land in the West. See じお pure water. See 純水

rainstorm. See 窪水; 窪雪 resignation. See 知丑

り (unit of distance), Saikaku (1730) rice. See 新米 rice gruel. See 鳥子粥; 高麗粥; お粥 rose of Sharon. See マクゲ saddlebow. See 馬鉄

sailor's song. See 海唄

桜 (cherry blossom), Masumi Kato (1796), Soko (1897). See also 花; 花間

桜, 奥桜; 山桜; 山桜 salmon. See 鰺

桜風 (cold wind), Takao

三則 (three tenses), Rogen scarecrow. See 親骨

歳物 (year-end gift), Ensei

セミ (cicada), Fukaku, Kagai, Kasenni, Momen, Shuho

さらくすさし (boasting), Kyo'on

仕出の旅 (journey to death), Fukyu

仕出の山 (mountain of death), Shiyo

小雪 (winter rainstorm), Jikko, Konkan, Roka, Shinseki

初詣 (New Year's decorations), Yaitsu

純水 (pure water), Hanri

新米 (new rice) Chiri (1716)

氷 (frost), Godo, Rifu, Ro- chu, Tojaku, Zaishiki. See also 早霜, 夏の氷

十一月 (eleventh month), Tadatomo

新水 (death water), Enryo

船. See 月船; 月の船

白菊 (white chrysanthemum), Godo, Otsuchi

白梅 (white plum blossom), Buson shirayuki (white snow), Getsurei

shitauchi (clucking of the tongue), Hanri

shōgatsu (new year), Aki-no-Bo, Bunzan

shōryō (spirit of Buddha), Ho-kuso

silk carpet. See toko no nishiki

sky. See nishi no sora; sora sleeve. See sode

slush. See awayuki

snow. See haru no yuki; shira-yuki; yuki; yuki-moyoi; zansetsu

snowman. See yukibotoke

sode (sleeve), Jikko, Tanko (1735)

solstice, winter. See tōji

sora (sky), *Fufu, Gitoku, Gochu, Hakukin, Hoyu, Momen, Sonome. See also nishi no sora sound. See hitokoe; koe spring. See haru

Suma (place name), Chikuro

Sumida-gawa (Sumida River), Kasenni

summer. See natsu

susuki (pampas grass). See karesusuki

suzuri (inkstone), Kaisho

swelling. See kobu.

tabi (journey), *Basho, Chikuro, Hamon, Konkan, Kyoshu, Michikaze. See also haru no tabi; shide no tabi tabidachi (departure), Roshu

tabi ji (journey), Setsudo, Sugetsu

takamakura (high pillow), Chiri (1716)

takatōro (*takatōrō; high lantern), Chiri (1917)

take (bamboo), Keizan

talisman. See kimamori

Tamamatsuri (the Bon Festival), Sofu

tarai (tub), Issa

tsatsu (dragon), Ginka
tawagoto (gibberish), Tokugen tiger moth. See hitorimushi to (unit of volume), Shiki tōba (hot-water bottle), Mei-setsu toji (winter solstice), Bankoku toko no nishiki (silk carpet), Kyohaku Toribe-yama (a mountain), Tanko (1735) tōro (tōrō; lantern), Kosai. See also takatōro toshi (year), Bunzan, Gosen, Hankai, Teishitsu, Wakyu (1692); t. no kure (year-end), Isso toshi-no-se (year-end), Teisa totsu (ho!; a cry of enlightenment), Ensetsu, Gisan Zenrai (Z), Ransetsu transcience. See mujō tsuchi (earth), Atsujin tsuki (moon), Amano Hachiro, Baiko, Chiyoni, Hakuni, Hyakuri, Isaibo, Kasenni, Kato, Keizan, Koha, Kozan, Mabutsu (1874), Masahide, Okyo, Onitsura, Renseki, Ryuho, Saikaku (1693), Seira, Sharyu, Shofu, Sohoku, Takuchi, Tanko (1735), Tanko (1884), Yaitsu; t. no fune (ship of the m.), Dohaku. See also karenō-zuki; meigetsu; natsu no tsuki; nishi no tsuki; nochi no tsuki tsukikage (moonlight), Saikaku (1730) tsukimi (moon viewing), Kizan (1786), Sodo tsukiyo (moonlit night), Seishu tsukurimono (man-made product), Kenju tsumimono (cargo), Dohaku tsuta (ivy), Rando tsuyu (dew), Banzan, Fujo, Ki-ba, Kifu, Kigen, Kiyu, Koyo, Retsuzan, Senryu (1827), Shikaku, Tembo, Tojun. See also asatsuyu; kusa no tsuyu
tub. See tarai turtle. See kame

uguisu (bush warbler; nightingale), Uko (1820) ukigumo (drifting cloud), Kizan (1786) ukiyo (floating world), Saikaku (1693) ume (plum), Baiko, Bankoku, Fuwa, Gohei (1808), Masumi Kato (1796), Minteisengan, Okano Kin'emon Kanehide, Shiyo, Sohoku. See also koboreume; noume; shiraume unohana (deutzia), Hakuto, Senchojo, Taikyo Urabon (the Bon Festival), Shinga uragare (frozen field grass), Go-kei uragiku (back-yard chrysanthemum), Kaen utena (calyx; dais), Rifu uznki (fourth month), Keido (1787) voice. See aki no koe; hitokoe; koe

Washi (Washi-ga-mine; a mountain), Shiko (1743) water. See aki no mizu; haru no mizu; matsugo no mizu; mizu; shimizu; shinimizu west. See nishi willow. See kawayanagi; yanagi wind. See akikaze; aki no kaze; kaze; kogarashi; samukaze winter. See fuyu winter rainstorm. See murashigure; shigure winter solstice. See tōji world. See yo worm. See hadakamushi

yakifude (burned stick for charcoal drawing), Toyokuni yama (mountain), Jomei. See also aki no yama; Fuji-no-yama; shide no yama; Toribe-yama
yamazakura (mountain cherry), Rekisen yanagi (willow), Benseki, Enshi, Horoku, Kusamaru, Masumi Kato (1725), Namagusai, Senryu (1818), Shigenobu, Suikoku, Tanchiko. See also kawayanagi year. See toshi year-end. See kure; toshi no kure; toshi-no-se year-end gift. See seibo yo (this world), Ozui, Shokei Yoshino (Mount Yoshino), Re-kisen yūgao (bottle gourd), Shohaku yuki (snow), Chirin, Gozan (1789), Issho, Kyutaro, Nan-dai, Okano Kin'emon Kane-hide, Raizan, Sharyu, Shiko (1743), Shofu, Sugetsu, Tanko (1735), Tojaku, Wakyu (1759). See also awayuki; haru no yuki; shirayuki; zansetsu yukibotoke (snow Buddha; snowman), Fusen, Mabutsu (1696) yukidoke (melting snow), Kenju yukimoyoi (snow on the way), Ryu'u yume (dream), Basho, Choko, Hakuen (1859), Ichimu, Kafu (1827), Kyo'on, Onitsura, Shoshun, Shushiki, Sunao, Yayu yūzakura (evening cherry-blossom), Kaisho zansetsu (remaining snow), Bo-kusui zudabukuro (zuda; begging sack), Konkan, Kyoshu

Because the death poems in this collection (Parts II and III) are presented by alphabetical order of the poets' names, these names are not included in this index, unless the poet is mentioned elsewhere in the text.

Note: Page numbers correspond to the print edition.

Akaboshi, 53
Akutagawa Ryunosuke, 166
Amida Buddha, 36, 66, 123, 141, 182, 193, 203, 204, 215, 259 ancestors, 31
Aohisago, 312
Aomori Prefecture, 35
Arima, Prince, 45
Asano Nagamori, 249-50
Ashura, 54
Awami, 58
Basho, 16, 24, 48, 79, 147, 171, 208, 274, 291, 312-13, 328; death poem of, 82, 85-86, 143; death poem satirized, 82; haiku by, 25, 134, 149, 184, 202; pupils of, 190, 260, 264, 269, 299, 321 birds, 34, 35 biwa, 61
Bodhidharma, 165
Bokudo, 191
Bon Festival, 31, 35, 151, 230, 232
Bonten, 103
Boto, 55
Brahmadeva, 103
Buddha, 126; dead person as (hotoke), 29, 37. See also Amida Buddha Buddhism, 31, 36-37, 46, 49, 52, 159. See also Jodo Buddhism, Madhyamika school of Buddhism, Mahayana Buddhism, Tendai Buddhism, Theravada Buddhism, Zen Buddhism burial, 30, 34
Buson, 25, 147, 291

calendar: Oriental, 88, 125; Gregorian, 88
Chao-chou, 72
Chikamasa, 52
China, 15, 37
Chinese language, 18
Chinese poems and poetry, 16, 18-19; death poems, 43, 49-51, 161, 340
choka, 14
Christianity, 32, 40
Chuang-tzu, 68, 70-71, 195 circle (enso), 295 Confucianism, 40, 42, 55, 301
cremation, 30, 34, 36, 138
cuckoo, 34

Daigo, Emperor, 14
Daruma, 165
death: as group-related event, 31-32; as illusion, 46; Japanese views of, 86-87; as journey or voyage, 29-30, 32, 34, 141; life after, 30-31, 36-37; preparation for, 29-30; samurai attitude toward, 39-40, 41; terms for, 29; as unclean, 33; Zen Buddhist attitude toward, 67-68, 7374. See also suicide death poems (jisei), 18, 27-28, 30, 34; Chinese poems, 43, 49-51, 161, 340; in early literature, 44-48; haiku, 43; of lovers, 57-65; of samurai, 49-57; satirized in senryu, 82-83; tanka, 43, 52-57, 5965; of Zen Buddhists, 67, 75-76

Edo, 64
Edo period, 41, 64, 81
Eicho, 66-67
Eifuku Mon'in, 21
Eisai, 66
Emma-o, 113 enlightenment, 40, 67-68, 73, 205 enso, 295
equinox, 31
Etsujin, 27, 321

flower, 46-47
forty-seven samurai, 249-50, 296, 305
Fuji, Mount, 85
Fujita Koshiro, 57
Fujiwara-no-Moronaga, 61
Fujiwara-no-Yoshitsune, 21 funeral, 30
Fuse Yajiro, 78

Gazen, 210
Genji Monogatari, 37, 60
Gochikubo, 198 gods, Shinto, 35 grave, 30, 31 group, the 31-32
Gautama Siddhartha, 126

Hades. See Yomi
Hagakure, 41-42
haikai, 16
haikai no renga, 16 haiku, 15, 16, 17, 18, 26-27; content of, 22; death poems, 43; structure of, 22; and tanka, 20-22; translation of, 23
Hajin, 308
Hakuin, 95
Hanabusa Ikkei, 80
Hanabusa Itcho, 80
Hanami, 58
Hannya-Shin-gyo, 30
harakiri. See seppuku
Harima Fudoki, 58
Hasegawa Shume, 67
Heian period, 14, 15, 37, 38, 46-47, 59
Heike Monogatari, 47
Hijikata Saizo, 188
Hitomaro, 44-45
Hogyoku, 145
hokku, 16
Honi, 144
Hosshimbo, 101
hotoke, 29
Hsü-tang Chih-yü, 103
Hyogo (a samurai), 63

Ihara Saikaku, 274
Ikkei, 80
Ikkyu Sojun, 52, 74, 105
India, 37
_Ise Monogatari_, 59-60
Islam, 32, 40
Issa, 26
Itcho, 80-81
Izanagi and Izanami, 33

Japanese language, 18, 22 _jisei_, 27. See also death poems _jodo_. See _Pure Land in the West_ Jodo Buddhism, 39, 65-66, 141
Joha, 84
Joshu, 72-73
Jozen, 240
Judaism, 32, 40

_kaibun_, 179
Kaiga Yazaemon Tomonobu, 296
Kakei, 247
Kakinomoto-no-Hitomaro, 44-45
Kamakura Period, 39, 40, 49
_kami_, 35
Kannon, 66
_kanshi_. See Chinese poems and poetry Karai Senryu, 17n karma, 40
Karu-no-Iratsume, 58
Karu-no-Mikoto, 58
Kashiku, 84-85
Kato-bushi, 241
Kido Chigu, 103
Kifu, 232
Kikaku, 80-81, 232, 247, 260, 326, 329
kimono, 152
Ki-no-Tsurayuki, 20
Kira Yoshinaka, 250
Kisei, 78
Kita Takekiyo, 80
koan, 73
Kobayashi Issa, 26
Kobo Daishi, 66
Kojiki, 13, 32-34, 44, 58-59
Kokinshu (Kokinwakashu), 14, 20, 44
Kokushi, 96, 100
Kosando, 319
Kukai, 66
kyoka, 17n, 74, 79
Kyorai, 149
Kyoraisho, 149
Kyoriku, 79-80, 260

Lao-tzu, 68
last poem (zekku), 144, 208, 243
Lieh-tzu, 97
Li Po, 19

Madhyamika school of Buddhism, 71-72
Mahayana Buddhism, 306, 314
Maitreya, 126
Man’yoshu, 13-14, 34, 44-45, 64n
Masahide, 22
Matsuo Basho. See Basho mediums (miko), 31
Meiji, Emperor, 56
Meiji period, 43
Meiji Restoration, 55, 57, 135, 145, 188
miko, 31
Minamoto-no-Shitago, 46
Minamoto-no-Tomoyuki, 50
Minamoto-no-Yorimasa, 47-48
Miroku, 126
Mitaku, 245
Mitsuse River, 61n
Miyazuhime-no-Mikoto, 44
Mizuta Masahide, 22
Morikawa Kyoriku. See Kyoriku
Moriya Sen’an, 81
Motojo, 154 mountains, 34, 35-36
mui, 68
Mukai Kyorai, 149
Murasaki Shikibu, 37

Nagarjuna, 71
Nakajima Saburosuke, 145
Nara period, 37
Nara Sakon, 63
Nara Yayoi, 63
Natsume Soseki, 167 nature, 19-20, 37-38
New Year’s Day, 31
Niou, Prince, 60
nirvana, 124, 205, 222
Nishiyama Soin, 76
Nogi Maresuke, 56-57
Nomura Boto, 55
non-action (mui; wu wei), 68

Ochi Etsujin. See Etsujin
Oda Nobunaga, 104
Okabe Tadazumi, 47
Oshima Ryota, 26
Ota Dokan, 52
Otaka Gengo Tadao, 296
Oto-Tachibana, 58-59
Otozo, 217
Otsu, Prince, 45
Ouchi Yoshitaka, 53
Ozaki Koyo, 234

Pure Land in the West (jodo), 36, 38, 39, 66, 141, 142, 159, 182, 203, 259
Pure Land sect Buddhism. See Jodo Buddhism

raven, 34
Reizei Tameyasu, 77
renga, 15-16, 84, 271, 336
Rio, 326
Rito, 133
Rosen, 161-62, 266, 300
Ryokan, 73
Ryota, 26
Ryoto, 134
Ryuzoji Takanobu, 53

Sadamitsu, 63
Saigyo, 49
Sakai Sadatoshi, 61-62
salt, 33 samurai, 39-40, 41, 43; death poems of, 49-57
Satomura Joha, 84 sea, 35 seasons, 38, 46-47
Sengai Gibon, 74
Senryu, 17n, 283
senryu, 17n, 81-83, 248, 283-84
seppuku, 40, 52, 58, 63, 250
Shakyamuni, 126
Shiaku Sho'on, 51
Shiba Fukio, 26
Shibata Katsuie, 54
Shiko, 333
Shimaki Akahiko, 83
Shimane Prefecture, 34
Shinto, 31, 33, 35, 38, 285, 336
Shoichi Kasho, 96
Shoju Ronin, 95
Shosai, 101
Shume, 67
Shumi, Mount, 102, 129
Siebold, Philipp Franz van, 139-40
Soa, 77
Soin, 76
Sokan, 80 spirits, 30, 31 suicide, 29, 40-41. See also seppuku suicide pilots, 42-43
Suketomo, 50

_Taiheiki_, 49, 61
Taira-no-Tadanori, 47
Takarai Kikaku. See Kikaku
Takemata Hideshige, 54
Tanaka Gochikubo, 198
T'ang dynasty, 15
tanka, 14, 15, 17, 18, 19-22, 43, 83, 206, 257, 340; death poems of samurai, 52-57; death poems of lovers, 59-65
Taoism, 38, 68-71
Teisa, 285
Teishinni, 268
Temmu, Emperor, 45
Tendai Buddhism, 38
Theravada Buddhism, 306
Toko, 78
Tokugawa shogunate, 135
Tomimori Suke’emon Masayori, 305
Tomoda Kimpei, 87
Toshimoto, 49
transcience, 37-38

Ukifune, 60-61
ukiyo, 81
Uneme, 64

_wu wei_, 68

Yamamoto Ryokan, 73
Yamato Takeru-no-Mikoto, 33-34, 44, 58
Yamamoto Tsunetomo, 41
Yamaraja, 113
Yamazaki Sokan, 80
Yasuda, Kenneth, 24
Yomi, 33, 34
Yosa Buson. See Buson
Yosami-no-Otome, 45
Yoshida Shoin, 54-55
Yoshiwara, 64, 81, 318

zazen, 95
zekku. See last poem
Zen Buddhism, 17-18, 39-40, 49, 72, 266; attitude toward death in, 67-68, 73-74; death poems in, 67, 75-76; enlightenment in, 67-68, 73; manner of dying in, 66-67, 107