When we understand things in that way, it means that in our mind we have various objects. And it means that we are discrim- [partial word]-it is sa- [partial word]-as soon as you have some substantial idea of many things, you start to discriminate, and you start to have some feeling of good or bad. So in that way, we cannot actually obtain big mind which is empty, which is called emptiness. No big mind actually exist as long as they understand things in that way, objective world in that way. I mean substantial way and attached to something specially. That is the nature of, you know, the teaching: five skandhas are not empty, five skandhas are existent. Five sense dhatus is existence, or eighteen dhatus is existent. [2]

So Prajñāparamita-sutra deny this thought. In Prajñā- [partial word]- according to Mahayana, everything [is] empty, not only self but also everything is empty. There is nothing which is not empty. It means that in big mind we should include everything as our own children, as our own family. In our family, you know, they are all a part-they are all part of our parents. And parents treat them as they treat their own hands and feet. Actually, there are-childrens are part of parents. So in that sense when they treat-love children, they have no idea of loving children. But actually he is-they are loving. They have no idea of parents, you know. But actu- [partial word]-that is parents. When they have no idea of children, they are actually really parents. You know, if parents has some idea of parent [laughs], they are not parents. Parents, you know-for children, you know, if they think, you know, "I am good boy, good children of my father or mother," he is not yet so good, you know. When he thinks, "I am very bad boy, I am not his-not-I don't worth as a children of my parents." Then he may be a good children. So when parents has no idea of parents, when children has no idea of children, they are, you know, good parents and good children.

The same thing is true with dhamma, with our everyday life. When you think, "I am doing-I am practicing zazen," you know, you are not actually practicing zazen [laughs]. Maybe very painful zazen, or maybe very sleepy zazen-"Oh! It's terrible." [Laughs.] When you, you know, want to know what time it is, "ten more minutes [laughs], five more minutes." That is not zazen, you know. When you don't know what you are doing, that is true zazen.

The big mind is same thing, you know. When there is no idea of anything, that is big mind, that is emptiness itself. Now, "form is emptiness" is all right. Form-forget all about form and color. The form was not observed as some certain form. That is emptiness.

Then "emptiness is form" is maybe next problem, how we understand the "emptiness is form." Maybe I already explained it, you know, right now. Emptiness-when-from emptiness, you know, when everything are in state of emptiness, everything, you know, start to appears in its true sense. Do you understand? You know, when parents forget himself, he is true parents. So when emptiness take place, the form appears in its true sense. That is "emptiness is form-emptiness is form."

If I explain it by our actual experience-if I explain it more maybe psychologically or biologically-emptiness, the word emptiness is directed, actually directed to our mind. It looks like-against Theravadan canon, Prajñāparamita-sutra put emphasis on no eyes, no ears, no nose, no mouth, no body, or no mind, like this. They put emphasis on emptiness of things, but actually Mahayana teaching is directed-is actually-denies the teaching of-put more strength on emptiness of self. To realize or to experience-how to experience emptiness of self is to practice zazen. And actual-in actual everyday life we-to experience oneness of objective and subjective world, you know. When you attain enlightenment it is like this [taps stick twice], you know. It-we call-we, figuratively speaking, you know, it is like-our zazen is like a chicken in its shell. When we are ready to come out, you know, the mother-not

"mother chicken" [laughs]-hen?-or what do you call?-hen will peck it and help the chicken comes out from the shell. That is, you know, enlightenment experience.

So in your zazen, if your zazen is-if your practice is full practice, you know, it means that you are ready to break the shell and jump out as a small chick, you know [laughs]. So, you know, at that time there is no self, you know. It looks like he is in a shell, but he is ready to break the shell, and at that time, you know, mother hen will peck, peck. That is oneness of your practice and enlightenment. Fffft! At that time there is no hen or no chicken-chick. They are one. They-he is one with everything.

So in emptiness everything exist-obtain same world. If ten people are practicing zazen, this world is each one of ten student. So actually, the world of emptiness is one. But-it is one, but at the same time that world of emptiness could be thousands of people's world, past and present and future. That is "emptiness is form." Emptiness is one big world which belongs to everyone. When you forget yourself, you know, you own whole world as a small chicken [chick]. He is not anymore a small chicken-no, chicken, chick?-or what?-I don't know how you say. Each one of them, if they are ten, you know-each one of the ten chick has obtained the same world but, you know, they are enjoying their own world. But the world they enjoy is one big world. That is what we mean [by] "emptiness is form." Mmm. Does it make some sense?

So, you see, when you-your zazen is very good, you know, if a bird come and, you know, sing, you will-the world of bird appear, endless world. Now we say-in autumn we say, in early autumn, if one sick leaves-what do you say?-not so strong leaves in September, maybe. Right now almost all the leaves are coming down, but in September or end of August when all the leaves are sick green, one or two leaves may fall. We say to see one sick falling leaves-seeing one sick falling leaves, we know autumn is all over. One sick small leaves are our big world. Autumn is all over. Or when a bird sing, you know, one bird sing in the mountain, we know that how the calmness of the mountain all the more. You know, calmness of-it is not matter of sound, you know, if the bird sings it should be noisy [laughs], you know, but because of the one bird we feel the complete calmness of the whole mountain. When the one bird enjoy whole world, that is complete calmness, that is real calmness, that is real emptiness. And that is real form of form. When you think, you know, "This is bird. I am here," or "This is sick-just sick falling leaf," that is not real falling leaves. That is the silt[3] of your thinking mind.

Oh, yeah, each year at this time of the year, you know, many leaves comes down, fall down. "Oh, it is troublesome to see it" [laughs]. If you feel in that way, that is more Hinayana way. Or you attach to the idea of falling leaves because that falling leaves are silt of your experience, not fresh vivid experience. That is, you know, "emptiness is form." By form-when form appears from emptiness, there is true form. The form we know or we acknowledge as a result of thinking or silt of experience, that is not true experience or that is not true form. So first of all, we deny the silt of experience, subject or object-objective world or subjective world. First of all, we deny this kind of idea. And we come back to the more original, vivid experience. And there we experience the emptiness and form too. At that time we cannot say, you know, form or emptiness. Everything is both form and emptiness. So that is why we say "emptiness is form."

Okay? [Laughs.] Emptiness is form. Not-it is very logical discernment, but it is not just logical. It is more based on our actual experience of everyday life. Not special teaching but, you know, something-some teaching which could be approved, which could be experienced by practice and through everyday life.

Hmm. [Laughs.] Okay? Did you figure out what I want to say? [Laughs.]

Student A: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student A: When you say "big mind"-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: -you seem to say big mind in the same way that the Theravada says dhammas.

Suzuki-roshi: No. Theravada-when Theravada says dhammas, it is, you know, based on idea of existent. That is why Nagarjuna, you know, rejected that kind of thinking. Whatever statement it may be, there is four statements. But if there is no more than four statements, but whatever the statement may be or understanding may be, if it-it is based on idea of being or idea of nonbeing-this is pair of opposite (being or nonbeing)-it is not right understanding.

They say, you know-as long as they acknowledge some substantial dhamma it means that they don't acknowledge the big world of emptiness. They say our-those-self-nature is empty, but actually they acknowledge, they accept objective substantial dhammas. When they accept objective, substantial dhamma, they are already accept it, the objective, projected self, self out of self. It is not true self, you know. Self you reflect on in some experience. Actually, I attained enlightenment [laughs] on this point. My first enlightenment was-did I tell you? [Laughs, laughter.] I shouldn't say so, because I am Soto priest [laughs]. You know-

Student A: Tell us anyway.

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm? You know, I had very difficult time, you know- bodhis- [partial word]-oh, no-doshin-doshin-way-seeking mind. What is way-seeking mind? To practice something without any gaining idea. We should not practice our way for sake of ourselves. For sake of others, no [t] sake of Buddhism even. For sake of practice, we should practice. That is famous statement-very impressive statement, isn't it [laughs]? Very encouraging, you know. You should practice true way, not even for sake of Buddha. Not sake of for others. You should practice our way for sake of the ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

So I wanted to practice our way for sake of practice. I started the practice, you know. That practice was to get up thirty minutes earlier than other student. I was in dormitory at that time. And before they get up to clean, you know, restroom so that they may not notice me cleaning restroom. But as I was cleaning, you know, many things happens actually. I had many times some people coming to restroom. I saw many room lit up, you know. "Oh, he may come," you know. "Because he [laughs]-he get up, he will come pretty soon." So at first I escaped, you know. I hide myself somewhere so that they may not notice me. But even so, you know, while I'm hiding myself, funny feeling [laughs]. I didn't know what kind of practice I am practicing [laughs], you know, hiding myself from people [laughs, laughter], so that they may not notice me, you know. Very strange feeling, you know. If I'm doing something good, there will not be no need to be afraid of anything. But I was very afraid of people at that time. I couldn't solve this problem, you know. And I didn't know whether I am practicing, you know, my prac- [partial word]-our practice for sake of practice. The conclusion was, anyway, this kind of practice cannot be a real practice. But at the same time, I couldn't give up, you know. I was rather obstinate. So once I determined to do it, I must do it.

But the practice I am practicing is very awkward. I didn't know what I was doing. At that time, when I was-we have to study-we have to take some unit of psychology. And Professor Iriya[4] once told me-told us that if you-it is impossible to actualize your past experience again. If you think about it, it is already-it is not already actual experience you experienced. And it is not psychological state which you had. That word struck me:

"Oh. I shouldn't think about my practice anymore. I shouldn't think about my," you know, "state of mind or my experience. I shouldn't criticize my experience. Maybe whatever happened it doesn't matter, so if I do it because I have to do it, that's all, you know. You shouldn't say- I shouldn't say my practice is pure or impure, or for sake of others or for [laughs] sake of Buddha or sake of practice."

That is useless thing to think about, so I gave up to think about my practice.

Since then I didn't mind [laughs]. Whoever come, I clean. "Just a moment, I'm cleaning this," you know, "this place. So you should go that way. You should go the other restroom." So when you, you know, when you think about-when you feel as if you are doing something, you know, at the same time you are accept[ing] it. You projected "you" outside of yourself, and you are criticizing "you" which is outside of yourself. It is not true you. True you is on your side always, which cannot be criticized [laughs]. It is foolish, you know, to criticize yourself. I had that kind of, you know, enlightenment at that time. [Claps hands together.] "Okay!" [Laughs.]

That is what-exactly what Mahayana Buddhist started to think about. To name various elements, you know, eighteen<sup>[5]</sup> or seventy-five,<sup>[6]</sup> it is maybe very foolish thing. Whether that is empty or not empty [laughs] is very far away from our actual life. And when you think in that way, you are involved in that kind of thinking, far away from the buddha-mind. Some more question?

Student B: Then what is small mind used for?

Suzuki-roshi: Small mind-in this case I mean, you know, small mind is mind which attach to many things, you know. Why you attach to things is you have a kind of idea of substantial-you acknowledge substantial element in things. Because you think, "Here is a cup," you know, you attach to it. But actually, the cup is not some independent-something which has its own self-nature. Because you see the cup, you know, cup exist. If you don't see it, there is no cup. Because cup exist, I exist here, you know. That is teaching of interdependence. Because I exist, cup exist. Because cup exist, I exist. If I don't exist, cup doesn't exist.

Student B: If you see the cup, but you don't say to yourself, "I see a cup"-

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: -if you see the cup, but you don't attach any particular thing to it, like saying it's a cup.

Suzuki-roshi: No. It means that when I say, "I see a cup," means I-this cup is mine [pats self], a part of me, a part of big self. Not something which exist outside of me. And that, you know, that "me" which actually observing a cup is not the self which is projected to somewhere, you know, and "I have a cup." This self is picture of true self or picture of big mind which include everything. So we are always talking about projected self as if that kind of self exist. But it doesn't!

You know, if I say whether I am doing right practice or not, that is projected self which can be criticized, you know. But even though you criticize it, that is not myself anymore. "I am here always [pats self], true self is always with me, and moment after moment with me. And we are-I am completely involved in something which I am doing right now."

Our life is continuity of this kind of life. I am here, here, here. And on each moment we are including many things. That is true "I." But projected self or self which is the object of thinking mind is not true self.

What was your question, by the way [laughs]?

Student B: I asked you what was the use of the small mind.

Suzuki-roshi: Small mind-use of?

Student B: Yeah, what is its-it's there, but you, of course, say it doesn't exist.

Suzuki-roshi: Small mind doesn't exist actually. It is the silt of thinking mind. Small mind doesn't. You think as if, you know, it is quite natural for us to think in that way. But actually, if you think more, and if you, you know, want to do something, you know, as Buddha told you, you know, with that kind of mind you cannot do anything. Projected mind doesn't work at all. It will create always many trouble [laughs] because it is dead one, you know, it is not active one. And moreover, it changes, you know, like a ghost. True self, when it changes there is-must be some reason. But without any reason, you know, if someone criticize this [taps on something like a water pitcher] projected self, you think as if you did very bad thing. If you think, you know, "I did very nasty thing," you know. "Why you get up so early and clean the restroom? You nasty fellow [laughs]," you may say. You yourself will criticize you, you know. That "you" is not here, not me, but there-self which you think there was two, three days ago [laughs]. That's-it doesn't mean anything. That is why we have to live in each moment. It means that don't criticize your projected self. Self it might be in future; self it was in past. But that is-that kind of self doesn't exist. At least useless, you know. No end in treating that kind of self.

Student B: Roshi, is it possible to criticize yourself in the present?

Suzuki-roshi: No.

Student B: It doesn't seem like it wouldn't [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: It doesn't seem like it wouldn't [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Criticize yourself? Criticize yours- [partial word]-whether you are fully, you know, fully occupied or involved in what you are doing or not would be the point. When Dogen says you shouldn't talk about the teaching which is lofty or which is not so lofty. You shouldn't say so. But you should know whether your practice is true practice or not.

Student C: So if our practice is lazy practice, then we should just let it be lazy. I was thinking that it is lazy, so we shouldn't try to practice hard because that's then projecting something. That's wrong understanding to be practicing hard.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] But you can say so, you know, by words [laughs]. But if you-if your practice is-why, you know, you have lazy practice is, you know, [because] just half of yourself is working or something, and half of it is-belongs to past or somewhere else, you know. You are not here, and-you are not actually here, and you are not actually doing thing lazy. When you are lazy, you know, when you, you know, feel very sleepy, you know, at the same moment, "I must stay in bed. Why I was so sleepy," you know, "I am so sleepy?" In this way, you will have-your s- [partial word]-the self will be projected in various ways. That is why we become lazy. So the best way is to get up as soon as you hear the bell [laughs], before you think anything. That is, you know, the practice. We are always involved in thinking mind and, you know-

Student C: But supposed we just don't get up to the bell. Should we say to ourselves, "I should get up for the bell" or should we just-or just not do anything at all but just stay in bed [laughter]?

Suzuki-roshi: You see, there is interesting argument [laughs, laughter]. You know, this, you know-when you hear the bell, that moment include your past and future, you know. And next moment include its own past and future. So, you know, when-the moment you get up, you know, it has the-has its own future. Zendo is in your-zendo belongs to that moment. And to wash your face also included at that moment has its own past and future. There is no-noth- [partial word]-no experience or no activity which has no past or future. It belongs to each moment. Maybe you can call it intuition because there is no time even to think about. It appears in that way. Because I, you know, explain it by words I have to say its own past or future. But intuitively, you appears in empty world in that way. That is your own emptiness.

So what is bad? That which we cannot do is bad. What is good? Something which you want to do, it is good, you know. That is why Dogen said so. At that moment intuitively we know that. If you think there is many things to say, but before you think-the world you have before you think is actual world on which you should strive for. Hai.

Student D: Did you say that the cup is a projection of self?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student D: Is that a projection of the small mind?

Suzuki-roshi: Project-not real projection, you know. It is something which arise in relation to the objective being. The more you think, you may lose the point, you know. [Laughs.]

Student E: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student E: Suppose I-

Suzuki-roshi: In-in-in-just a moment-in one word, you know, your thinking is involved in, based on, you know, the idea of being. That is the trouble [?]. You are caught by illusion or shadow of the being. That is a trouble [?]. Because you think, you know, something exist here in this way, that is, you know, idea of being. The opposite background of thinking is non-being. Just to think whether lamp exist here or not exist here. When we say "nothingness," you know, you may think the opposite of being, you know. There is no such thing like lamp exist. That is, you know, the opposite of thinking of being. Being or non-being. Complete-there is no complete idea of being or complete idea of non-being. Nothing arise from nothingness. Nothing vanish into non-being. But, you know, I don't know why, but-

Student B: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: -when we think, we think in that way. Hai.

Student B: When the breath goes out, and we count "one," and then "two," are we attaching to breathing?

Suzuki-roshi: No. No. No. Watching.

Student B: Oh by-yeah, by watching it, creating an object, thinking mind seeing something happening-

Suzuki-roshi: No.

Student B: -breathing happening.

Suzuki-roshi: No. Moment after moment, you-that is, you know, the subtle distinction from real breathing, counting-breathing practice, and not true one, you know. You don't count just to know how many, you know [laughs, laughter].

Student B: Couldn't handle it [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Huh?

Student B: We stopped at ten and go back to one.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student B: But what is it that perceives a breath going out to call it "number one, number two," and so forth.

Suzuki-roshi: Number two. The-we choose the most simplest activity on which we don't-about which we don't think. It is another practice of following-breathing practice. The point is not to count but to-not to one [?] with your practice.

Student B: If-if you don't make-can you get mechanical that way, like just "one" [2-3 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Not mechanical, you know. My understanding of mechanic is just to do, you know, just to work, just to count [to] ten, you know. And something which produce ten something, you know, ten breathing, that is more mechanical way. And without using not much body or mind, you can produce something. That is mechanism.

Student B: Yeah

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. But when you count your breathing it is very simple to count from one to ten, but each breathing should be, you know-on each breathing all of your mind and body should participate. With whole body and mind you take one breathing. And instead of saying something else you say, "one, two." See? That is practice.

Student B: Thank you, Roshi.

Student F: Roshi, when you're sitting counting your breathing like that, and you're involved in saying "one" and following your breath out, it seems like there's a kind of split of one part of you or you being involved in the following of the breathing-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Yeah. Yeah. Yeah.

Student F: -and another part on another side was something being aware of the whole action taking place, of being aware of your concentration on following, and another that seems to be aware that's not even involved in it but aware of it taking place.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Aware of-I don't know what do you mean by "aware of," but-

Student F: Well, count like-you're following your breath, and are you counting as you're breathing, and you're-say you're very carefully trying to follow your breathing, and yet at the same time you're aware of all of it taking place. All-you're aware of your action, aware of your counting your "one," your "two." Seems like there's a split.

Suzuki-roshi: S- [partial word]? No.

Student G: One part is observes the other.

Student F: One part is observing. You're doing this action-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student F: -or is not just observing but just aware that it's taking place-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, I see.

Student F: -even-even if-

Suzuki-roshi: You are watching, you know, yourself. Oh, that is-that is not the way. Why you count is-some element, you know, of watch-to watch yourself [is] involved. Because you go-if you go "twenty" or "thirty," "Oh my!" [Laughs.] That much, you know, observation is involved. But I don't mean on each breathing you should be very careful, you know. Instead of being careful about what you are doing, you should take your breathing with your whole body and mind. Then you have no time to watch.

It is same thing as you make calligraphy, you know, your-or penmanship. Maybe you're watching, you know, so that you may not-your penmanship doesn't go outside of your line [laughs]. But not to go outside of your line, you know, you are making best effort. And that is not you observing it, because-why you think in that way is maybe, I think-the zazen practice is-looks like too easy, you know, so you have time to think about it [laughs]. But even when you are doing very simple easy thing, you should be able to do it as if you are doing very difficult thing. And at the same time, so that you can do difficult thing as if you are doing very easy thing, you sh- [partial word]-we should practice zazen. Do you-do you understand the point?

A cats, for an-a tiger, or an instance, use whole attention and whole strength even when he catch small fish. Ffft! [Laughs.] His attitude is same as to catch a big, you know, animal. The tiger has no fear, you know, even though he catches big animal, he can do it as if he catches small fish. Even when he is catching small fish, his way is same way as he catches big animal. How he could do so is the point.

Usually, you know, human being, we-if it is easy, you know, that is quite easy: "Maybe I can do it tomorrow" [laughs]. That is our way mostly. "Oh, this is quite easy." And you don't make-your attitude is quite different from when you do something difficult. That kind of person has big difficulty when he confront with something great-great difficulty. Someone who looks like very bold and very strong is not actually so strong when he face, confront with some big enemy or big difficulty. He will be the first one who may run away [laughs].

When-if someone who is doing-who will do small things with-not "care"-but with-we say, suki no nai.[7] Suki no nai means-I don't know what.

If, you know, this cup has some leakage, it is suki aru.[8] Suki no nai is "no-no-no gap," or "no chance to take advantage of." If a lady-if a young beautiful lady want to protect himself [herself] from wolf with black hair, long and short [laughs], you know, the way is not to shout or to run away, but we say suki no nai taido.[9] Suki no nai taido. No-she behave quite natural and beautifully, maybe sometime charming [laughs], but no-he-she doesn't give any chance to be taken advantage of. That is suki no nai.

You know, that kind-zazen practice is something like that. [Laughs.] Even though you are always making face, you know [laughs], it doesn't protect yourself from cats and dogs [laughs]. Even though you are quite natural and charming enough, but-"Oh my!" [laughs], they will run away, you know, if they have some ambition.

That is what is told in Lotus Sutra. Even though you met with big snake, snake cannot bite you. If you are going to be cut by big sword by bandit-what do you call [it]?-hmm?-

Student G: [1 words unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: -by black-masked [bandit], you-the sword will be broken piece by piece. That is, you know, suki no nai.

So, you know, zazen practice is always, you know, figuratively ...

[End of original tape.]

---

Source: City Center original tape transcribed verbatim by Diana Bartle and checked against tape by Bill Redican (5/4/01).

[1] Suzuki-roshi pronounced it "dhamma" throughout, so the Pali spelling is used in this transcript, rather than the more common Sanskrit "dharma."

[2] dhatu (San., Pali): region, realm, element. The 18 dhatus are the physical and/or mental elements that determine all mental processes (e.g., organ of sight, mind-consciousness, etc.). The five dhatus Suzuki-roshi referred to may be the five skandhas.

[3] Suzuki-roshi pronounced "silt" very clearly here and later in the lecture. If he had looked up the word in a dictionary before the lecture, as he often did, he would have found a definition like: "a sediment consisting of very fine particles."

[4] Professor Yoshitaka Iriya, an authority in Tang colloquial language.

One of the authors (with Sasaki and Fraser) of A Man of Zen: The Recorded Sayings of Layman P'ang. (1971); author of Rinzairoku (1989) Gensha koroku (Comprehensive Record of Xuansha) (1987-1989), Zengo jiten (1991), and other works. He was director of research for the First Zen Institute of America in Japan, and he contributed significantly to the research for Zen Dust (p. xxi).

[5] The 18 dhatus.

[6] Possibly the 75 Sarvastavadan dharmas, which constitute the final, indivisible, real units of existence.

[7] suki no nai (Jap.): suki = opening; unguarded moment, flaw, space, or room; no = of; nai = no. Hence, to be always on alert; to be thoroughly guarded. See also SR-71-03-02 for a similar term.

[8] aru (Jap.): some, certain.

[9] taido (Jap.): attitude.

4 - Not Priest, Not Lay

Sunday, November 16, 1969

Not Priest, Not Lay
Shunryu Suzuki-roshi

This morning, I want to talk about our practice.

And here in America, something special is happening: that is our group. Our students cannot be categorized in the same way we define Zen student-Zen Buddhist in Japan, because you are not-you are not priest and you are not complete-completely layman. I understand it this way.

That, you know, you are not priest is easy to understand, but that you are not completely layman is-I think you are special, you know, people in our society. [Laughs.] Not hippie. [Laughs.] But something like that. [Laughs, laughter.] So I don't know what to say.

So-that is, I think you want some special practice, you know: not exactly priest practice, not exactly layman's practice. And-but we are on the way to have special, you know-to have some different way of life for us. That is our Zen community, I think-not community, but our group. And-and so we have to have some-some appropriate practice for-for us.

Before I talk about our special way of practice, I think it is better to understand-better to understand what is original-what is Dogen's practice. He says, "Some may," you know, "attain enlightenment. Some may not," he says. This is, you know, the point I am very much interested in. "Some may attain enlightenment and some may not," what mean-which means although we practice same way, same fundamental practice, but some may attain enlightenment and some may not. It means that even though we do not have enlightenment experience, you know-experience, as long as we sit in proper way, proper right understanding of practice, that is Zen. The main point is to have right understanding of practice and practice our way seriously. And what is important point in understanding of our practice is-we say "big mind," or "small mind," or "buddha-mind," but that kind of, you know, words means something-something we cannot-something we should not try to understand in term of experience.

"Enlightenment experience," we say, but it is not, you know, some experience which we will have good-in term of good or bad. It is special experience which is beyond those feeling or a kind of consciousness. So we should not, you know, ask what is, you know, enlightenment experience. Even though you ask someone-that you asks that kind of under- [partial word]-ans- [partial word]-question means you don't know what is Zen experience-enlightenment experience. Enlightenment experience is difficult, or impossible, or something you should not try to ask in your ordinal [ordinary] way of thinking. When you give up this kind of-when you are not involved in this kind of understa- [partial word]-this kind of way of thinking, you have chance to understand what is Zen experience. I want to, this morning-I want to make this point clear as much as possible.

We say "big mind," you know. "Big mind." Big mind is not something which you can experience [in] some objective way. Big mind is something which is always with you, you know, which [is] always on your side, not, you know, objective side-always subjective side, here [pats something]. So you-you see, you cannot see your eyes, you know. Eyes cannot see themselves. The eyes only perceive things outside: objective beings, not eyes itself.

So, you know, we cannot see the big mind, because it is always with us-here-right here. [Laughs.] If you, you know, reflect on yourself, that self, you know, is not your true self anymore. You project-when you think about yourself, you project "you" as some objective thing, you know. Do you understand? Your mind is there. And your true mind is watching the mind outside. So mind outside of itself.

When I discussed this point at Tassajara, after lecture, Peter [Schneider?] said, "mind out of itself." This is very han- [partial word]-very good, you know, interpretation of big mind/small mind: mind outside of itself. You know, mind is here, you know, and you project your mind there, and you say this is my mind, and that is self-so-called-it "self" or "small mind," a limited mind. When you understand your mind something like this or like that, you know, it is-you are limiting-you put limitation to the true mind, or you object- [partial word]-objectify your mind, your subjective mind which is always with you.

Why I say so is, you know-this mind is-which is always on your side, is not just your mind. This mind is universal mind, which is-which is always same, and which is not difference [different] from other's mind. It is big, big mind. And interesting thing for this mind is, whatever you see, you know, your true mind is always with it, you know. When you see something like this, you know, although you don't know your own mind, but when-at the moment you see something, your mind is here. [Sounds like he is tapping on the nyoï stick. Laughs.] This is very interesting. [Laughs.] Always, you know, your mind is always with things you observe-you see. So this mind is at the same time everything.

We Buddhist, you know, traditionally talk about this kind of mind and this kind of being which is always one with mind, you know. Usually you may think, "My mind is watching this cup," you know. Usually you say so. You understand: my mind is here, and cup is here, and I am watching it. As I [laughing] tentatively explained, you know, [laughing], my-my mind is always with it. But this is rather opposite, you know.

Real being is something which is, which-which has two side. You may think this is mind, or this is cup-it is rather confusing. [Laughs.] But did you understand what I mean?

When we understand mind in this way, that is big mind, which is always with things. And subjectively speaking, it is mind which is always on this side, not there. We Buddhist-from Buddha's time, we Buddhist do not have any idea of material only, or mind only, or we do not say our mind produce things, or mind is a kind of attribute of materialistic being.

We always-in Buddhism, mind and body, or mind and material is always one, and we are talking ab- [partial word]-always talking about this, even though sometime we say "dharma." That dharma means, you know, mind and body being-or mind and material-spiritual and material being. We are always talking about it. But, you know, if you carelessly, you know, carelessly listen to it or hear it, we are-as if we are talking about some material and some spiritual being.

So when we say "material," or when we say "big mind," that will be version of it, maybe. Mind which is always with being, with objective being, or mind which is always with-on this side [pats something three times], that is true mind. So enlightenment experience is, you know, to figure out, or to understand this mind which is always with us, which we cannot see it.

So that is why Dogen-zenji says, "Don't think," you know, "we will have-don't expect all of us who practice zazen will attain enlightenment about," you know, "this mind, which is always with us." It-it mean that if you think, you know, big mind is somewhere outside of yourself, then that is mistake. If you practice zazen ex- [partial word]-expecting something outside of yourself, that is mistake. Did you understand this point? Because the big mind is always with us.

If you try to, you know-when you try to attain enlightenment as if you see the bright star in the sky, "Oh! That's beautiful," you know. "This is enlightenment." [Laughs.] But that is not true enlightenment. That is more-for us that is heresy, you know. You, you know-you found out [laughs] something there which-which was-which is-object of yourself, you know.

So when you understand the enlightenment experience in that way, that is more-strictly speaking, that is heresy. You, you know, have idea of material only. Even though you don't feel in that way, but version of your enlightenment experience is exactly like that. There is something material only, or object of your mind exists there, and because of good practice of yourself, you could found out that bright star. So in this statement, there is the idea of, you know, self. And idea of the objects. That is not, you know, how to seek for enlightenment.

When-the morning I left Tassajara, students has-had discussion. And someone said, being and doing, you know-we are discussing about our practice of, you know, eating and sleeping. [Laughs.] And we started to discuss about sex, but that discussion about sex doesn't work so well. [Laughs, laughter.] I thought it is impossible to, you know, discuss about sex. Even though you try, it is very difficult-very difficult discussion. You will be involved in very, you know, endless, you know, discussion, because sex problem, or sex is-if you say "sex," whatever we do [laughing] is sexual activity. So to talk about sex means to talk about our life, to talk about whole Buddhism. [Laughs, laughter.] So I thought it doesn't mean, you know, to talk about only sex. [Laughs.]

If we want to talk about sex, we have to, you know, talk about-we have to discuss about what is Buddhism from the beginning. That is almost impossible to discuss. Too big problem. Actually, if you understand sex in that way there's no more sex problem. [Laughs.] No more sex because there is no-nothing to-problem-problem of sex is not any special problem. That is, you know, that is our-to-that is actually our life.

You say, "Oh, how beautiful this flower is!" When you say so, that is already sex. [Laughs.] We understand in that way. Our version of, "Don't be immoral," you know, means, "Don't say this is wonderful," you know. That is-our unders- [partial word]-our version of the fourth precept. I shouldn't be involved in this kind of discussion right now, so [laughs] I have to skip this [laughing, laughter]. Ex- [partial word]-I don't want to explain it right now-what I was going to say, by the way [laughing].

Doing and being. When we discuss about being, you know-being-we are already involved in something material only or something spiritual only. When we, you know, try to understand doing-doing is practice, you know, then our discussion is Buddhist discussion. When we discuss doing, doing include two sides of be- [partial word]-two sides of-include two side anyway: being and non-being, right and wrong, good and bad.

When you think, you know-you see whether I want to stay in bed, you know, one minutes more. On the other hand you say, "I must get up," you know, "right now, to practice zazen." That is more idea [laughs] of being, you know, being in bed. You are thinking about being, you know, your being in Zen meditation hall, and you cannot be two beings at the same time. So there is conflict.

When you understand yourself-who is ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... then you think you understand yourself by doing, by getting up when you try to lays your head, or support your body by your, you know, arm, there there is true practice. You are right there. When you are thinking about your being in bed or your being in zendo, naturally your-your mind will be divided in two-split in two, and it will create problem. So someone said this is, in short, the problem of doing and being. I think this is very-he, you know, he had-when he said so, he had key point of our zendo life.

Why I started to talk about this point-about this kind of thing is-priest-as a priest, you know, I think we-at least we have to have deeper understanding-more accurate understanding about our practice. And we should have some enlightenment experience, at least. We should be, you know, not only able to-being able to talk about-about practice, we should experience, you know-we must have full experience-better experience of our practice. And for-for someone, you know, it is necessary to have-to put confidence in your big mind which is always with you. And you should be able to appreciate things, you know, as a expression of the big mind. In short, you must have some faith in big mind, which I explained.

It is-actually, if you understand what I said now, it is actually more than faith, you know. It is ultimate truth which you cannot reject. Whether it is, you know, difficult to practice in that-whether it is easier or difficult to understand or to practice it literally, you-this is the absolute truth which you must accept. And you must have anyway strong confidence in your big mind which is always with you, which you will find wherever you go. I think this is-if you, you know, have strong confidence, at-I think you are already, in its true sense, Buddhist even though you don't attain enlightenment. Your, you know, your practice will develop, and you have not much danger [of] being sick or being in confusion.

Mostly, you know, physically and mentally when we become sick, you know, it is lack of confidence in your self which is always with you, and [you] seek for something, or try to be something else. You know, when you are sick, you should be sick [laughs] because there is true you. You will find true mind at that time in your sickness. So, you know, supported by everything, being supported by everything, you just lie on your bed like this, you know. The bed will be very comfortable, you know, warm, nice bed. When you have this kind of feeling, I think your sickness is already maybe 80, 90% over. You are recovered already. But most people struggle, you know, in the cold bed. "Oh! I should-I [laughs]-I must recover," you know. "Tomorrow we have party, so I cannot stay in bed." So he may struggle. "I have a baby, so I must get well."

In this way, if you struggle in your bed, that is very serious illness. Because of lack of understanding of yourself, and because you don't understand what is "you," you become sick. I am sure-I am quite sure, most people is ill, not healthy at all. But when you do not think you are sick, you are healthy. When you think you are sick, you are sick. [Laughs.] That's all. You may have some opposition to this kind of statement, but this is very true.

So how-I want to help people, you know, sick people, mentally or physically. I wish I could give my, you know, my understanding to him or to her. But it looks like-quite-very difficult for them to understand, to put faith in themselves, to understand big mind. I think best way is to practice our way before you are involved in this kind of, you know, sickness caused by yourself, caused by lack of understanding of yourself. Especially, you know, people whose parents or grandparents had some special illness. They are always in fear of getting same illness which their mother or father or grandmother or grandfather had. This is terrible thing, you know. Even though you are healthy, mentally you are ill, seriously ill. You are always confronting with the fear of being sick. Whether or not it's-their parents are, you know, mentally and physically healthy or not, he will be sick if he has-if they have that kind of fear always.

So how to get out of this kind of fear is to practice zazen. And to get out of-or to get rid of the mind outside of yourself. And to resume to your practice, to your actual being and practice, to find out yourself as doing-someone who is doing something, who is always with everything-with Buddha-and who is supported fully by everything. Then you are quite safe. When you are safe this moment, it means that you are-in future you are safe. When this moment of yourself is not safe, next moment of you will be sa- [partial word]-will be in danger.

For us, you know, today-tomorrow is future of this moment [tapping stick], you know, nothing but future of this moment. So when you think you are in danger right now, you know, tomorrow also you will be in danger-for you, I mean, for you right now. So when you continue this kind of confidence in yourself: today will be all right, tomorrow will be all right, and always with-you are on the-on the track. When you lose this point, you know, that is-you will be lost, and you will continue this kind of dangerous life, and you will be in fear always.

So it is necessary for you to be able to be-get out of it in this moment, right now. You may say "It is not possible," but it is possible. Even in one moment you can do that. That means it is possible. That you can do it in this moment means you can do it always. So if you see this kind of flash of lightning in dark, fearful, you know, sky, "Oh!" that is it. That is your enlightenment experience. You have great confidence in yourself.

This is, you know, how to be a Buddhist in its true-true sense. The difference between layman or Buddhist is not big problem. Whether we attain-whether we have, you know, enlightenment experience or not is minor problem. So someone may attain enlightenment, someone may not. But they are all Buddhist.

I have been thinking about future, you know, [of] Buddhism in America pretty long time. And if we concentrated on this point, naturally this kind of problem will be solved. Anyway, you know, it is good thing. I feel in America the young generation has a great opportunity to find out the true way of life for human being, because in Japan or in undeveloped countries, they have to have-be-they have to be involved still [in] materialistic problem. Here in America you haven't, you know, this kind of problem any more. Maybe you have, because you reject it. [Laughs.] The people in [laughs] Japan, they have this problem-want of material, so they-always to gain it, that is problem. But you are rejecting it, rather. "No, I don't want any car. I don't want bankbook [laughs]. I don't care." "I don't care" is very good, I think. But there is no need for you to reject it. That is too much.

Anyway, I think you started Zen practice in best condition, and with very pure mind. So you will understand Buddha's teaching in it-as he meant, exactly. Something will happen to us anyway, I think. In-in maybe-I don't know when [laughs]-tomorrow or next year, I don't know-maybe after I-maybe I will see you from the-I will see you from the ground, like this. [Laughs, laughter.] I don't know when, but something must happen. It is very clear.

I didn't join the-you know, yesterday's peace walk, but I heard of it, and I was very-very much encouraged by it.

I think it is the time to start our practice in its true sense, forgetting all about robed person or hippy-style person [laughs].

Let's-Gya te, gya te-recite Gya te, gya te, ha ra gya te,[1] and join the procession, join our practice. Thank you.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Judith Randall and Bill Redican (11/6/00).

[1] The start of the Prajñāparamita mantra in Japanese version of Sanskrit, recited at the end of the Heart Sutra: "Gone, gone to the other shore ...."

5 - American Precepts

Saturday, November 22, 1969

Opening Lecture at Page Street Zendo: American Precepts
City Center, San Francisco

I am so grateful with you to have chance to practice zazen in this, maybe, magnificent [laughs] building. I think we must be very grateful for Buddha and our successive patriarchs.

Can you hear me? Can you hear me?

I don't think I have much time to speak, but first of all, I want to express my gratitude and-and my confidence or my-I want to express my confidence in practicing with you. Whether we will be successful or not is, for me, out of question. I-if we [are] bothered by that kind of idea, we cannot do anything because our practice is always concentrated on present moment. If our practice in this moment is good, then next moment we will have good practice. And in this way, if we continue our practice, naturally we will have good practice forever. That is, as you know, our confidence in our practice.

Our group is now pretty many. We have many students now. When Hyakujo-zenji[1]-Hyakujo-established monastic life in China, many people came to monastery and wanted to practice with him. So Hyakujo-zenjiset up Hyakujo Shingi. Hyakujo Shingi means-I-because Hyakujo established the rules of monastery, we call it-shingi is monastic-"pure rules." And because he established, for the first time for the Zen monk, the "pure precepts" or "pure rules." We call it Hyakujo Shingi.

Since then, in China, Buddhist or Zen Buddhist started to practice zazen according to-mostly according to the Hyakujo Shingi. In India they have precepts, but in China, before Hyakujo, they-Zen Buddhist did not have special precepts for themselves.

Precepts is, you know, two sides. One is, you know, prohibitory, negative pa- [partial word]-side, and the other side of it is to-how to generate our spirit-how to do something good. It is more positive side of the precepts. So the positive side is called sazenmon[2]-to do something good. And the negative side is shi-akumon.[3] Shi-akumon means to, you know-prohibitory side. There are two side.

I think we will have-we will naturally need some way of life as a group. It may be difficult to set up all at once, but if we try hard, we will find out our precepts which include both side-will be established. This is very important point for our practice and for our practice to help others and to help themselves-to help ourselves.

That we have our own way of life means that you encourage people to have a more spiritual and more adequate way of life for human being-not only for ourselves, but also for people we must study our way. It is something which we must create or something which we must establish as it is-as our rules are actually for ourselves, for human being.

As a Chinese, Hyakujo-zenji established Hyakujo Shingi. I think we must establish, maybe, American shingi. I'm not [laughs]-I'm not saying this jokingly. I am pretty serious. But I don't want to be too serious [laughs]. If you become too serious, you will lose your way. If you are playing game of [with] it, we will lose our way. So little by little, with patient [patience] and endurance, we must find out our way for ourselves.

On this occasion, I want-I want to introduce you one [of] Hyakujo's word.[4] A monk asked, you know-a monk asked Hyakujo, "What is the special practice?" "What is the special practice?"

And he said, "To sit on the summit of Daiyuhō." [5] Daiyuhō is the name of his mountain. "To sit on the top of mountain Daiyuhō."

After all, various way of practice is just to sit on the top of mountain Daiyuhō, you know. If you want to sit well, you must organize your life. So Hyakujo tried to help his people to organize their life so that they can sit on the top of mountain Daiyuhō with him. Tokusan[6]-Daiyuhō: to sit on top of the mountain Daiyuhō.

Let's practice hard. And let's concentrate our life on zazen practice and organize our life so that we can sit well.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican 9/26/00. Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Hyakujo Ekai (Baizhang Huaihai): 720-814. Ch'an master of T'ang period. Dharma successor of Baso Doitsu.

[2] sa (make); zen (good); mon (gate or entrance).

[3] shi (impulse); aku (evil); mon (gate or entrance). Cf. shi-akushu (four evil worlds).

[4] The Blue Cliff Record (Pi Yen Lu, Hekiganroku), Case 26.

[5] "Sublime Peak": Daioho, Mount Baizhang, Ta Hsiung Mountain, or Hyakujo-san Mountain.

[6] Possibly a Japanese form of Ta Hsuing, or the name of the monk Tokusan Senkan (780-865).

6 - Evening Lecture

Tuesday, November 25, 1969

Evening Lecture
City Center, San Francisco

[Katagiri-roshi spoke before Suzuki-roshi.]

Suzuki-roshi: I am very happy to be with you. I am rather tired, and pinch hitter[1] hit a home run [laughs, laughter]. So maybe at the end of the ninth inning. So game was [1-2 words unclear], and we won. So [laughs, laughter] I am sorry I have no chance to, you know, to play for this evening.

I think it is almost one year since I caught Hong Kong or Asian flu. Right now, in spite of heavy work, I feel very good. So I think I am almost all right if I have a cup of water when I give you lecture [laughter]. I think I'm quite all right.

But, as I said, we won the game, so [laughs] only thing we should do is go home and go to your bed and have a nice sleep [laughs, laughter].

Thank you very much. [Laughter.]

---

Source: Original City Center tape transcribed by Diana Bartle (10/23/00) and checked by Bill Redican (10/23/00).

[1] Earlier, Katagiri-roshi referred to himself as a "pinch hitter" for Suzuki-roshi until the latter arrived.

7 - Way-Seeking Mind, Part I

Saturday, November 29, 1969

Winter Sesshin Lecture #1
Way-Seeking Mind, Part I

Tassajara

... mind.[1] Without this way-seeking mind, our practice does not work. We say "just to sit," or shikantaza. Only when we have a strong way-seeking mind, just to sit make sense. Without this mind, just to sit means maybe-will mean just to sit mechanically and formally. The way-seeking mind-when way-seeking mind vitalize the form you have in zazen may be actualized and make sense.

People say "form" or "spirit"-but to-actually, you know, maybe if you do something without intellectual understanding, without knowing why you do it, you know, that is, you know, formal practice. We-usually we understand in this way without knowing what it is, you know-just to imitate, or just to do something as others do, or in the way you are told to do is the formal practice.

And knowing what is the actual reason, maybe, and practice something is more spiritual way. But actually, you know, Zen is not something which you can understand it. Intellectual understanding cannot reach the true understanding of Zen. So only way is by actual practice to find out the meaning of it is our way because intellectual understanding does not make much sense. If you have no way-seeking mind, your, you know-even though the only way to-only approach to the enlightenment is practice, but practice without way-seeking mind is dead practice.

That is why we put emphasis on way-seeking mind, because intellectual understanding does not work. If, you know, intellectual understanding is proper approach to the enlightenment, then there will not be-no need to put emphasis on way-seeking mind. But intellectual understanding-we do not, you know, take intellectual approach, but actual-by actual practice, we find the true approach to the enlightenment. But without way-seeking mind, you know, the practice cannot be actual practice because of the lack of the spirit.

When I was-when I was studying at Komazawa [University], I was-at that time I was studying, you know, [with] Takada. Professor Takada taught us education-what is formal education and what is real education. And his, you know, understanding of formal education is opposite, you know, to-for an instance, to read scripture without anything-without knowing what it is, like you recite Prajñāparamita Sutra. That is real, you know, approach-real education. And to, you know, to explain what is the meaning of the sutra and let them understand what it is-is according to him, that is formal-or that formal education he says. [Laughs].

At that time, you know, we had to, you know-we have to note whatever he says [laughs]. When I was, you know, taking note, I thought it is funny. Maybe my, you know, misunderstanding that it looks like opposite [laughs], I thought. But anyway, I came home and checked up my note again, but in my note and my friend's note was same: "Formal education is to explain, you know, what it is-what it means. And more actual education is to, you know, to let them read whatever it is [laughs] without explaining it." "That is," he said, "that is more actual, you know, education." [Laughs.] I couldn't understand, but because I couldn't understand I remember it still [laughs]. What I could understand [laughs] I forgot, but only what I couldn't understand I remember. And now I think after I started zazen, I could understand what he meant [laughs].

But if you have no, you know, way-seeking mind, the only way, maybe-first of all you should understand it by here, you know [probably pointing to his head]. And if it is-if you think it is good, you will start your practice. Actually, in that way, you can-I don't say you cannot, but it takes long, long time because you-your study will go round and round and round same area, you know, until you are-you get tired of [laughs] trying to understand what it is.

The best way-it looks like foolish-it looks like silly to-to do as what-only-only because what is-because-only because you are told [laughs] to do so by Shakyamuni Buddha. Looks very silly, but even though it looks like silly, best way is to do it actually without thinking what it means so much. This is very important point. The purpose of our practice is, of course, to get rid of small idea of-idea of small self.

When you say, "If it is good," you know, "I will do it." [Laughs.] That-that is-that is, you know, big small self [laughs]-very big small self-maybe this much. [Laughs.] "If I," you know-"if you convince me," you know, "to do so, I will do it. I will do it. If I could agree with you, I will do it." [Laughs.] Big self, you know.

So your practice is based on big small self [laughs]. That doesn't work [laughs, laughter]. When you forget, you know, small self or big self and just do it and feel it, that is the actual approach to the reality. That is a direct experience, we say. And thinking mind will be a barrier of direct experience

Whatever it is, for an instance, if you eat it, you know, you will have actual taste of it. And you will-you can eat it, but, you know, if it is-if you think nibble a little bit and [see?] whether it is good or bad [laughs]. Most food, you know, will not be so good for you. "Ah, this is too sweet. This is too fishy [laughs]. This smell is funny smell; I don't know what it is [laughs]." You can never appreciate its taste properly as it is. If you-anyway-I think only way to taste-to taste a real taste of the food is to eat it [laughs] and chew it without thinking, and without thinking what it is. Then it may be you can eat it and you can appreciate the food even though afterwards you are told that what you eat was head of the snake [laughs] or smashed [laughs] head of the snake with shoyu sauce [laughs, laughter]. "But it was very good!" you may say.

That is, you know, how to taste the real taste of the thing. You know, if you think what it-if you ask me-ask [laughs]-if you-if you ask what it is, and if you are told this is smashed snake with shoyu sauce [laughs, laughter], you will never eat it. But it is-I think it is foolish, you know, not to eat it when it is so good. You know, whatever it is, it doesn't matter. It is not poisonous, and it-so best way is to practice in our way, and to have direct experience of it.

You may think-you may understand if I say in this way, how much difficulties we have just because of thinking mind-just because of, you know, your understand- [partial word]-intellectual understanding. Zazen practice is to bet- [partial word]-to be ready for eating everything, experiencing everything, and to have true understanding-actual, real understanding of things.

The way-seeking mind arise when we understand how silly we are, you know, even though you, you know-we look like very wise-even though you look like very sophisticated-but how silly we are [laughs]. Then you will have real way-seeking mind. We should not be so silly. That is way-seeking mind.

I promised with my jisha[2] not to talk so long time [laughs]. So I don't know what time it is. Maybe better not to appeal to my thinking mind. My lecture is finished.

Thank you very much. [Laughs, laughter.]

---

—

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Katharine Shields (7/18/00) and Bill Redican (7/20/00).

[1] First words missing on tape.

[2] Traditionally, a monk who attends the head monk.

8 - Way-Seeking Mind, Part II

Sunday, November 30, 1969

Winter Sesshin Lecture #2
Way-Seeking Mind, Part II

Tassajara

I think nowadays way-seeking mind is understood like something to do good in its-with a pure motivation-not for sake of success or not for sake of fame, but to purify our mind and to be a good Buddhist. That is way-seeking mind.

So, accordingly, to do something good is, in its wide sense, the way-seeking mind: for an instance, to do something which people do not like to do: the cleaning restrooms, or pick up garbages, or to save small animals, or to help sick people. Those are things which a man of way-seeking mind will do. And with this spirit, we practice zazen. Zazen practice is just for ourselves-just for oneself. And when we do it completely, for himself-for ourselves, the practice will be, at the same time, the practice of saving others in its true sense.

To "establish ourselves on ourselves" is to encourage people to establish themselves on themselves without asking some other's help. That is something what a man of way-seeking mind will do. So when you have way-seeking mind in your practice, you can practice your way in its true sense.

Even though you do something which people may say [is] good, if you do not do it with pure spirit, you don't feel so good, you know. You-you will create something disagreeable for yourselves. Only when you do it with pure mind, you will be satis- [partial word]-you will fi- [partial word]-you will have joy of practice, and you will appreciate the great mind, and you will be-your practice will be the practice of kindness, too.

So when you have pure way-seeking mind, you have buddha-mind. According to Dogen-zenji, buddha-mind could be interpreted in three ways: the big mind or joyful mind, and kind mind, and magnanimous mind. The buddha-mind or way-seeking mind is not something which you will gain by your practice. It is the mind you originally have. So if your practice involved in wrong practice, you [laughs] will not feel so good, you know, because you have originally way-seeking mind or buddha-mind.

So when you, you know, when you do something good you feel good. And when you feel good, when you find yourself kind enough and magnanimous enough and when you have joy of doing something-pure joy of doing something, there, there is the way-seeking mind. So it is not something which you will attain by practice, but from which our practice originated. The source of pure practice is the way-seeking mind. With-if I say so, you may think there is some way-seeking mind, you know [laughs], but as I explained already before, the mind you think you have is out-the mind out of itself, you know. It is, you know, the mind you reflect on.

"I have-I had-at that time, I had this kind of mind," you may say, but that mind is not actual mind you have. The actual mind is always on your side, and doing something, practicing something, and observing something. That is, you know, mind. True mind you have in this moment, the mind you have, you know, you-you had before. The mind you will have in the future is not the true mind. It is picture of mind [laughs], you know. "My mind in the future will be like this," you know, "and in past-in past my mind was like this." But that is picture of mind, the mind outside of yourself. Do you understand?

So mind is right here [S.R. tapping repeatedly as he says previous sentence]. When you do something, that activity is mind itself. When you see something, that-to see is the mind itself. So when you do something, when your big-I shouldn't say "big" or "small" so m- [partial word]-too much-when you do something, you will-if you do it, you know, just for sake of something, then you will have joy of doing. You will enjoy your doing something, and at that time you have great mind, magnanimous mind. And you will be very kind to your machine [?] or to things you work on. At that time, actual mind realize itself. The realization of true mind is there. That is so-called-it "way-seeking mind."

So when you practice zazen with the utmost care, limiting your food and having good sleep, and taking appropriate food. By taking great care of yourself and practice zazen with great care, there, there is real practice of way-seeking mind. It is operation of, you know, way-seeking mind.

So way-seeking mind-when you practice just-only when you practice way-seeking mind there is actual way-seeking mind. The way-seeking mind is not something you have like a stone, you know [laughs], within yourself. Just when you do it, the realization of way-seeking mind will be there. So moment after moment, whatever you do, that is the realization of the true way-seeking mind.

Why we cannot practice good zazen, you know, is because we are almost all the time caught by upside-down [laughs] mind, topsy-turvy idea. You know, we think whatever we see, you know, we will be easily caught by-we will be enslaved by it. And if-when we practice zazen or when we think about way-seeking mind or buddha-mind, you think as if there is something like buddha-mind in term[s] of good or bad. But buddha-mind is not such a mind which you can compare with some other mind. Actually, especially for beginners, after having practiced zazen one or two days, and your mind become very calm, and you feel as if you are sink into the bottom of the ocean where you cannot see anything, you feel as if you are sinking into the bottomless-bottom of the sea of the death [laughs]. You feel in that way. Why you feel in that way is just because your experience in-of complete calmness is something you haven't dreamed of it, you know. Even in your imagination you didn't have that kind of experience. That is why you become afraid of it.

But, you know, which is more real [laughs]-to be dead or to be alive? Which is more real? Most people think to be alive is more real [laughs] than to be dead. Which is real? Dogen-zenji says, "People like which is not real and does not like which is real." [Laughs.] Which is more real? Think. Which is more real?

Our life will be a matter of one hundred years [laughs], you know. You cannot live more than one hundred years. And it might be very difficult to have human life or animate life rather than to have inanimate life like stone and water. So, especially human being is most [laughs]-most unreal being. Stone and water is more real.

And if you die [laughing], that is the most real thing. Without exception, we will die, you know. There is nothing more clear than that. That all of us will die is very, you know, clear. There is no doubt in it. But people do not like death [laughing] and like to be alive, and we-so the doctor will come, you will take various medicine, and Oriental medicine, and Western medicine [laughs]. You will try everything, but, you know, those help is something which will be given up: "Oh, no. I cannot help anymore. He will die in two or three years-two hours-I am sorry." [Laughs.] Doctor will go, and if you have a lot of medicine, it doesn't help. If you take care of me so well-even though you take care of me so well, but if the time come, you know, you must give up [laughing]: "Oh, anyway, he will die." That is our destiny. Very real, you know, but you don't like something real, and you like something unreal [laughs].

I always say if newspaper reporter write up something in most realistic way, true report will not be appreciated by people. People will not be interested in it. If there is some fiction in it, they will read it, you know [laughs, laughter]. So magazine you read, the newspaper you read is not real at all. But it is interesting for you. That is why you read it. But even though you are interested in it, it is not real.

So, you know, our tendency is very, very funny. I don't understand [laughs]. Perhaps you may not understand. So, maybe it-it may be better not to think about it so much. If you think it out, you will find out something very uninteresting [interesting?]. That is our nature. Knowing this, you know-when you know that, your effort of-your orientation of effort will change. We say, "accept things as it is." To accept things as it is means-"things as it is" means underlying thought is dao-dao, or true way, or truth.

So to accept truth means, you know, to give up topsy-turvy idea, upside-down thinking. That is why in zazen you do not think. It means that you give up this kind of topsy-turvy idea, this kind of-to change our effort to opposite direction.

So when you want to accept things as it is, you must have king-size mind [laughing, laughter]. This is not big enough. Not big enough. Great king-size mind. That is, you know, how you practice zazen. It is so big that you cannot have it wholly in your m- [partial word]-body. So may be better to give up every mind and sit. That is "big mind" in its true sense.

Don't compare. Don't say: "This is small mind, this is comparatively big mind. Today's practice was," you know, "by this much big mind, but tomorrow my practice will be practice with this [probably gestures] size mind." This kind of practice doesn't work at all.

So, you know, we say-what will be the right words for it-word for it?-we say to enter into-to enter into tathagata's mind in one jump [laughs]-whht! Not like this, you know. Not like that. But like this! [Probably gestures or imitates a jump.] [Laughs.] That is, you know, how you practice zazen. Not matter of two day, or three day, or four day, or one week. One week or one day doesn't count, you know, when you jump into the ocean of the buddha-mind. Whht!

That is how you do it. There you have true spirit of practice. Doesn't matter whatever happen to you, you just practice zazen without thinking anything. This is the way-seeking mind.

It is just one hour [laughs].

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (12/26/00).

1969 december (6)

1 - Way-Seeking Mind, Part III

Wednesday, December 31, 1969

Winter Sesshin #3

Way-Seeking Mind, Part III

Tassajara

Our way-seeking mind is buddha-mind. And our practice is-makes sense when you practice with buddha-mind, or way-seeking mind. But usually, when we say the way-seeking mind or doshin-doshin-do is dao, and shin is mind-it also means bodhi- [partial word]-bodhisattva-mind-bodhisattva-mind: to-not only to help ourselves but also to save or to help others. Strong nuance of this kind is always there when we say doshin.

Right now we recited: "This perfect and penetrating dharma is rarely met with even [in a] hundred thousand kalpas of time." The moment we have right now doesn't come back again. I don't know how old are you, but if this day pass, you will not have the same day. So not only dharma you listen [to], but also your life you have right now doesn't come back. Even [in a] hundred thousand kalpas of time, you cannot repeat your life again. And it is so. So it is foolish to stick to something and ignore our life which does not come again. We should not be regretful after many years.

[Whispering off-mike.] No. You cannot hear? Excuse me.

That is why we make our effort, day by day, moment after moment.

This is the third day of sesshin. One-week sesshin is not so long. If you pass three days, the rest of days will be easier. But at the same time, you will miss the day of the difficulties you have had. I think that is the actual feeling you have now when you pass already three days.

When I am sitting with you like this, I feel as if I were only maybe 30 or 35 years old, but [laughs] I am already 55 [laughs, laughter]. It's-it is amazing. But I think I feel, you know, as you feel right now. If you feel you are quite young, that will be the mistake [laughs, laughter]. You know, 30 years or 60 years doesn't make any difference. So I think you should feel as I feel, and I should feel as you feel. And we should practice zazen. This is, you know, bodhisattva-mind: to help others and to help themselves.

Especially-you do not make much progress after 30 or 35, so while you are young, you must make best effort and try to have various experience as much as possible. And after 40 years-after the age of 40, you will develop your work on the foundation you built up before you were 30. In this way, if it is so, your time is very valuable. You should make best effort so that you will not be regret the days you passed without making enough effort.

This kind of spirit is a spirit which you do not have. Not much people-not much American people understand this kind of spirit. You seek for something good always, and you choose easy way, and you depend on some teaching, and you are asking always which way you should take. But that is, you know, I think that is mistake. In that way, if you, you know-to choose something easy means you follow the preconceived idea. You follow-you choose something you can understand-something-you follow the experience [of] something you have had, without seeking for something new to you. If you, you know, always choose easy way, your way will be, you know-the-your life will be the life you will be regret. If you make every effort on each moment in various way as much as possible, you will not regret when you become old-when you become old.

So bodhisattva spirit is the spirit to seek for difficulties and-and to confront with difficulties. With firm conviction you should venture your life. When you-you have this kind of spirit, you will be quite different person. Your eyes will change. Your behavior will change. And there are many bodhisattvas-not only [in] Buddha time but also in China and in Japanese-in Japan too-many and many bodhisattvas who practiced bodhisattva's way.

Those who went to India, and seek for the scriptures, and translated it into China [from the Chinese], and those who [sailed] across the China Sea and studied Buddhism in China, or Chinese priest who came to Japan without being afraid of the stormy weather of Japan-China Sea. The most famous one will be Ganjin-Chinese priest Ganjin.[1] He tried seven-seven times to cross the ocean. And he lost his sight with his difficulties. And at last he came-he could come to visit Japan and built a temple. That is, you know, a bodhisattva-mind. With this kind of effort, our way was supported by many people because of the spirit, because of the feat of those great teachers.

Buddhist, you know, respect tradition, you may say, but there is some reason why we respect tradition. The ancient bodhisattva's way was always beyond our reach-almost, you know, beyond our reach. And they are always encouraging us, not only because they have done great things, but also they did not afraid of anything. They did not afraid of poverty, they did not afraid of death, or they did not afraid of failure. They found a joy in failure, in poverty, and [in] doing some small things with, you know-famous words in Lotus Sutra is "to shine the one corner of the world." Just, you know, it is enough if you shine the one corner of the world-one corner of the room. That is enough [laughs].

That kind of spirit may be, you know, difficult to understand. But to, you know, if you sweep, you know, square room, you know, maybe you may sweep the, you know [laughs]-only, you know-you will not sweep the corner of the room [laughs]. If you wipe the floor or scrub the floor, you-you always leave the corners [laughs, laughter]. It is easy, and it may be fast. You may think it is better to scrub the corner of the room-it-you may think it is better to clean two rooms trying to, you know, clean the-each corner of the rooms and clean just one room.[2] But [laughs] we rather, you know, try to, you know, clean the one room completely with great difficulty [laughs]-with great effort. It looks like foolish, but someone must be foolish enough [laughing] to spend all life in cleaning each corner of the rooms. That is bodhisattva-mind. Do you understand, you know?

My teacher, Kishizawa-roshi, always after clean-after we clean the room, he come and [Suzuki-roshi gestures as if looking for dust[3]-hmm![4]-laughter]. You know, the shoji screen has many, you know, frame, you know, and it is rather difficult to clean up each of the-each of the frame. So sometime we miss it. So he come [laughs]. He doesn't say anything [laughs]. Ichigu wo terasu,[5] you know: "to shine the one corner of the room." In Lotus Sutra also, there is a famous bodhisattva who used to bow to everyone he met- [laughs] everyone. He bowed to everyone.

You may think that is very foolish [laughs], but that is bodhisattva-mind.

In Japan, there are some rascal. He-he-he himself was not so bad, but his wife was very bad person. She asked her husband always to do something bad. He married with her when she was the wife of-his master's wife, you know [laughs]. But he, for some reason, you know, he married with her. And after he got married with her, he felt so bad. And he went to a temple and asked that monk what to do. And he said it-it-it may be easier to commit hara-kiri, you know [laughs]. It is easier, actually, but if you die you cannot, you know, repay your sinful karma. You cannot change your karma, so it is better to live long enough to pay the bad karma.

So they started on trip. And wherever they go, his wife always asking [him] to do something bad. And at last, again, he killed someone to rob a traveler's money. And he made up his mind to give up, you know, to dismiss her. And he started to work on cave. Do you know the story?

In Kyushu Island[6] there is famous cave or tunnel for people. Each year some people was killed that pass because the road was so bad, and cliff was so steep. So he made up his mind to make a tunnel. But no one helped him, you know [laughs], because it looks like so silly, you know. It looks like almost impossible to make a tunnel for that mountain. But he made up his mind and completed the tunnel. That is the famous tunnel which was built by that monk.[7] That is also, you know, bodhisattva-mind. Very foolish [laughs]-very crazy idea, you may say, but that is bodhisattva-mind.

They followed the good example of Shakyamuni Buddha: the many examples of bodhisattva way told by Buddha,[8] sacrificing himself as a food of hungry tiger and just to know the one verse of the truth. This kind of spirit is bodhisattva-mind.

I think if you want to accomplish something in this land, you must have unusual mind to go beyond the usual way of life. And there you will have, you know, great mind, joyful mind, and true kind mind which is buddha-mind. So if you don't do anything, you don't have any mind. When you do it, then there you will have joy, and strength, and kindness.

So that is why it is necessary for us to have vow-bodhisattva's vow. And I think you must, you know, each one of you must have his own-your own vow-vow for only for yourself. My vow is, you know-[laughs] do you th- [partial word]-what do you think [laughs] my vow is? My vow is to scrape off the, you know, maybe [laughs]-the smoky pan [laughs]. You know, in the kitchen there are many black smoky pan. When I was young [laughs], there were-we did not use gas. We, you know, boiled things by wood. So bottom-pan is always-the bottom of the pan is always black and full of, you know, smuts. So it was very h- [partial word]-it is very difficult to boil something by it. So unless you take off those black smuts, you cannot boil anything.

So Buddhism has a lot of smuts outside [laughs] of the pan, so it is difficult to boil anything. So first of all is necessary to, you know, take off those black smuts. That is my vow: to take off, you know, black smuts of the pan so that you can boil something by it. If you take turn, you know, and cook, you know, some lazy person will left the pan, you know, with smuts. And next morning [laughs], someone-someone must clean it, you know, or else the pan will have more smuts until [laughs] someone clean it up. Someone must do it. I think, you know, when they feel very bad-when someone feel very bad with boiling by-receiving the black pan for-for someone who-who was in turn yesterday. But I think-I feel some joy of cleaning it, and I-I have some joy of, you know, boiling it by cleaned up pan.

So each one of you must have some vow. Then you will find joyful mind, and big mind, and kind mind. You will be every kind to, you know-if you-only when you vow-when you clean it because of your vow, you will find you will be kind to everyone, instead of, you know, [being] angry at people. That is bodhisattva-mind.

Thank you very much.

Ao-no-domon

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (3/19/01).

[1] Ganjin: Japanese name for Chien-Chen (688-733), a Chinese Vinaya master who came to Japan at the invitation of the Japanese emperor. He founded the Ritsu school.

[2] Possibly: "You may think it is better to clean two rooms than to clean just one room and its corners."

[3] Note from original transcript.

[4] As in "Aha!" [Kishizawa-roshi exclaiming when he found evidence of dust.]

[5] Ichigu wo terasu: "Light up (your) corner (of the world)." The fourth day of each month is observed by the Tendai school as Ichigu wo terasu day, during which cleaning, copying sutras, giving alms, and other altruistic efforts are practiced.

[6] One of the five principal islands of Japan.

[7] The tunnel is called Ao-no-domon (Cave-gate of Ao, or Blue Cave Mouth), hewn with a hammer and chisel by the Zen monk Ryokai (d. 1774) and others from 1735 to 1750. The tunnel was popularized in Japan by the novel written by Kikuchi Kan, Onshu no kanata ni (The Serene Realm beyond Love and Hate). It was first published in 1921, so Suzuki-roshi was probably familiar with it. It was republished in English as Beyond the Pale of Vengeance (Mt. Shasta, CA: Shasta Abbey Press, 1998).

[8] Probably referring to the Jataka tales.

2 - Winter Sesshin Lecture #4

Tuesday, December 02, 1969

Winter Sesshin Lecture #4

Practice Should Not Be Perfect So Descendants Have Something to Do

To accomplish something is difficult. And, you know, the difficulty you have moment after moment, which you have to work on, will continue forever [laughs, laughter]. I thought if I say so, if I say so, I thought you know, you may laugh [laughter]. And you are, you know, entrapped [laughs].

We say-we have saying: to-to attain enlightenment may not be so difficult, but to continue our practice is difficult. So after all, you know, why we practice zazen is to continue our practice. Or else, I think, our practice doesn't make much sense. We say we have to live on each moment, and we have to make our best in each moment. And moment after moment, if, you know, our practice continue with pain, with difficulties, it doesn't make much sense. Even though you have wonderful practice moment after moment [laughs], what will become of it? What is the purpose of life, then?

The purpose of life is not, actually, to accomplish something, but to continue our buddha way. So to continue our buddha way forever is to accomplish our way. "To accomplish" does not mean to reach some stage where we don't need to work anymore. So the most important point and most difficult thing is to continue our way and to have good successor for us who may, you know, succeed our way. That is the meaning of the transmission.

Transmission-we say "transmission," but there is nothing to transmit. But if we say there is something, that is the spirit of practice, to find someone who may, you know, continue our way. You know, my teacher, [1] when he mend the one of the building, he didn't mend the main building, but he just mend kitchen and zendo. [2] And he-at that time he said: "If I try I can do it, but I must leave something for my disciples to do" [laughs].

I couldn't understand what he meant exactly. You know, to-it-the purpose of mending building or building something is not just to have some facility for us. The most important thing is to continue that kind of practice and to have successor who may take our responsibility, who may share our responsibility.

The point is, you know [laughs], somewhere, you know, which you don't expect. If you understand this point, you know, you will understand what kind of life you should have and what kind of rules you have to observe. To have rules is not just for yourself, it-but, you know, for your friends and for your disciples who may succeed our spirit. You know, as a bodhisattva it is a pleasure to have something to work on, to have-we bodhisattvas should welcome difficulties, and if there is-so if you are very kind to your followers-successors, you should leave something for themselves [laughs]-some difficulties [laughs] for your descendant. Then, as a bodhisattva, he may be very glad to have something to work on. So not only, you know, your lifetime, but also forever for our descendant we should welcome the difficulties.

Do you know a bodhisattva's four vow? I explain many times, I think: If desires are inexhaustible, you know-inexhaustible-why we should, you know [laughs]-it doesn't make sense to have a vow to get rid of-it doesn't make sense, you know. But for a bodhisattva, you know, bodhisattva may like [laughs] endless, you know, desires which you should work on [laughs, laughter]. We understand in that way.

You had, you know, you have dead angle on this point. You don't notice this point, so you don't, you know, have much sense in your practice [laughs]. Why you are-you are discouraged, you know, with your practice is-the point is wrong. You are just working for yourselves [laughs]. You are very, you know, short-sighted-near-sighted. You don't see anything. And [you] practice zazen, so you are-you will be easily discouraged when you sit everyday with pain, with many difficulties.

The human life is interesting because there is good thing and bad things, half and half-well, you know, very well mixed up [laughs], you know. So if there is only good things, the-our life will not be so interesting [laughs, laughter], because we have something, you know, some difficulties, sometime some joy. So joy makes sense, difficulties make sense.

And the world we live is called Nan-enbudai,[3] and there is the world called Hokkuro-shu[4] in Buddhist, you know, parable, where there is only joy. So Dogen-zenji says we should be very glad to be born in this world [Nan-enbudai], where there is many difficulties. If we were to be born in Hokkuro-shu, we will not have Buddhist teaching.[5] We cannot listen to Buddha because there is no need [laughs] for Buddha to exist because they have no trouble there. But I don't think we are very happy if we-if human being were to be born in Hokkuro-shu.

I don't want to talk about this point so much. It is too valuable to talk about, unless you pay million dollars. I-I [laughs, laughter] don't want to talk about it. I feel in that way. But, you know, because tonight I have nothing to talk about [laughs, laughter], so, you know [laughs], I have to say something [laughs, laughter]. So I am giving you, you know, my secret treasure. But, you know, I hope you will not understand it [laughs, laughter]. You should understand it after ten, fifteen years, you know, not-not now, because you may understand it just by hear, you know. "Oh," you may say, "that makes sense." That's all. Maybe, you know, this kind of thing is something you should find out.

My master [So-on] just said, you know, "This is-this main building[6] is for you to mend it-for your disciples to mend it." That is what he said. I didn't take it so seriously. "What does he mean?" [Laughs.] Because of it I couldn't come to America, you know, until my age of 54. When I made up my mind to go to America, it was the year I accomplished-I made up my mind to come to America in October, and I finished my work of main building April.

So when I-when I made up my mind to go to America, I said to my members-one of my members, if I could go to America ten years, you know, before-ten years ago, I had-I could have many things. I had-I think I can many things-I think I could [have done] many things, but maybe it is too late. I cannot-I forgot almost all the English. Even though I have some spirit, it will not work properly [laughs]. I-I regret.

But on the other hand, I thought, if I-if I had gone to America ten years before, I wouldn't have, you know, this much understanding of Buddhism. So maybe it was good thing for me to stay in Japan, doing something which was told by-by my master.

So point of practice is something beyond accomplishment or success. Successful or unsuccessful is not the point. What kind of accomplish you have-accomplishment you have in not point. It doesn't matter. But the point is if your practice is-the quality of practice is good or bad, good or not-so-good. That is why Buddhism, you know, lasted for so long time. As Buddha pointed out, in maybe 1000 and-1500 years Buddhism will die out-not die out but almost, you know, dead teaching.

It is true, you know. If Buddhist seek for the accomplishment, when we, you know, continue our practice if you are not, you know-if you continue your practice, if you-if you are not so good, your disciple may be good, you know. In three or four generation after you, there must be some good disciple if your practice is pure enough and your practice is good quality. Some of your descendant will do something, even though you cannot do it. That is very important point for us.

Our practice is not just for ourselves. It is for everyone. And so, you know, it doesn't matter whether you are successful or not. It doesn't matter. If you-if you have, you know, good disciples and if you have good practice, that is the most important point.

And everyone can have good practice, you know. This kind of spirit is the spirit everyone has. This kind of spirit is not just for selected people. It is every-for everyone. The important thing is to continue it, you know, to continue the good practice. Then someone will do it. Do you understand [laughs] this point?

So that is why we say our practice should not be selfish practice. Even though you accomplish something great, if it is selfish practice, we will despise it. [Laughs.] Do you understand? If you don't do anything-if you are not able to do anything, if your practice is with people and for your friend and for your descendant, even though he-he cannot do anything, he may be a good Buddhist. Okay? Don't say okay [laughs] too-too soon. Think about it, you know.

Dogen-zenji said, you know-when he wrote Shobogenzo, he said, you know, "Although they may not understand me," you know, "it is all right. Anyway I will write it down [laughs]. Someday someone will understand it. So for my descendant I am writing this Shobogenzo, giving up various chance to accomplish something [that] seems to be great." His point was there. That is why, you know, there is Soto school. Even though we understand Shobogenzo, you know, one character-even though I-we understand Shobogenzo intellectually, if we lose this point, it doesn't make any sense.

Even though all American people converted to [laughs] Buddhism, it doesn't make sense. If we-if there is ten or twenty good students, that is enough. Our way is for everyone-not for some e- [partial word]-some particular person, for everyone who may participate [in] our way. Don't say, you know, there is nothing to do for me as a Buddhists. There are many things to do for you. And this is the foundation of, I think, foundation of Buddhism and foundation of practice.

As this practice is for everyone, or-how it works, this teaching works as everyone's teaching is because it is enough if each one of us do something which he can: great or small, doesn't matter. We say if it is some equipment in the kitchen, you know, there is pan and cups and bowls and many things, spoons and everything. We need everything. Whether it is big or small doesn't matter. Small thing is necessary as well as big ones. But we must, you know-small things should work when small thing is necessary. Big one should work when big one is necessary. If small pan want to be a big one [laughs], it will be big trouble. And something which you should put higher place, you know, should be put-should be higher-high place, and something which should be low place, should be low place. That is, you know, famous Dogen's words: Kojo kohe. Teijo tehei.

That is rules, you know. Rule is not something which was made by some particular person. The moment we are here, there is rules already. And each one have its own place, and each one has its own place-and each one of us has its own position. According to the position we should work. That is how we practice our way in everyday life. In this way, if we work together, that is, you know, our monastery. That is monastic life. And which will last forever. And its gate should be open to everyone. And everyone must have some position, something to do there, with the same spirit. And our life-our monastic life should be continued forever, and that is, you know, how our monastery works. And that is, you know, why we practice zazen with painful [laughs] legs.

Mm-mm-mm. Excuse me [laughs, laughter]. Oh my! I thought it was too short, but it was too long [laughs, laughter]. Okay, excuse me.

Let's work hard with joy, you know, and participate [in] the big practice, you know. This is our joy, actually, you know. Don't say, "What am I doing here?" [Laughs.] You know, don't say so anymore if you understand this. And how valuable thing it is to have something to work on, to kee- [partial word]-to have something to keep you busy [laughs, laughter]. I am not fooling you at all [laughs, laughter].

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Meg Levie and Bill Redican (11/14/00).

[1] Gyokujun So-on.

[2] Of the Rinso-in temple in Japan.

[3] Nan-enbudai (or Nan-enbushu) (Jap.) (Skt. Jambudvipa): The southern of the four continents surrounding Mount Sumeru (or Meru) that comprise one world or planet in traditional Buddhist cosmology. It is the human world.

[4] Hokkuru-shu (Jap.) (Skt. Uttarakuru): The northern of the four continents surrounding Mount Sumeru (or Meru) that comprise one world or planet in traditional Buddhist cosmology.

[5] The inhabitants of Hokkuru-shu are so happy that they feel no need for Buddhist practice.

[6] Of the temple Rinso-in in Japan.

3 - Winter Sesshin Lecture #5

Wednesday, December 03, 1969

Winter Sesshin Lecture #5
Tassajara

I explained briefly about bodhisattva mind. And we have also bodhisattva practice-bodhisattva practice-we count six and sometime four [bodhisattva practices].

Of course, [1] most important one is zazen practice. That is the most important one, maybe. And [2] to keep precepts and [3] to-to practice almsgiving-almsgiving, to offer something or to Buddha or to people to help, and to keep precepts, and [4] to vigorously practice all those practice, and [5] endeavorance to be patient, and [6] wisdom-to have wisdom. Those are six practice of bodhisattva.

And Dogen-zenji might [?] count four practices: [1] and one is dana-prajñāparamita, which is to give something; and [2] to give kind words; and [3] to benefit others; and [4] last one is to be friendly with others. Those are four bodhisattva's practice. I want to explain it according to Shobogenzo.

The "to give something" does not mean just to give something-some words or some dharma. Those are, you know-so, it may be divided, classified into: one is material, the other is spiritual giving. But when we practice this, we must not have any idea of selfish-self. So it means that something-according to the nature of something, you know, if rice or food is something to eat, you know, let them eat the food. Let the food go to something hungry-someone who is hungry [laughs]. That is-according to him, that is almsgiving.

So, you know, without any idea of "me" or "you," you know, to give-let the things goes where the things want to go [laughs]. That is almsgiving. That is bodhisattva spirit. In this way, we treat things, we practice bodhisattva way.

So where a bridge is needed, to cross the bridge is also dana-prajñāparamita. Or to provide a ferry where we should-where people need, you know, is also dana-prajñāparamita. Or to cultivate the farm or garden is also dana-prajñāparamita. So even one word, if you know something about it, as soon as you hear something good, you should, you know, talk-tell people about it. When you-when you think, "that is wonderful," then you-immediately you should tell people about it.

So-and even [if] you have nothing to give or nothing to know [laughs], you know, you don't know anything and you don't have anything, you can practice dana-prajñāparamita. How you do it is to enjoy someone giving something to someone else [laughs, laughter]: "Oh! You did very good thing." [Laughter.] Then, you know, his practice will be as good as someone who give something to others. So, you know, it is not matter of you know something or you don't-you have something. Even though you have nothing, you can practicedana-prajñāparamita, he says. I think this is very true.

But usually, if you see someone [laughs] doing something good [laughs], someone may not feel so good [laughs, laughter]: "Oh, he has a lot of money, so it is all right" [laughs, laughter]. "He knows many things, so that's-that is why he is-he talks about many things, but we don't know so much [laughs]. That's just words-nothing to do with me." That is usual, quite usual. But if we have bodhisattva mind we can practice bodhisattva way. That is dana-prajñāparamita.

The next one [is] to give kind words is like a mother, you know, speak to her baby, you know. We should give-always give kind words to people. And this kind-kind words, he says-if you give kind words in front of people, directly, he will be very grateful, of course. And if you give kind word indirectly, you know, not to direct to someone but to-to talk about someones kindly with someone, you know, and he eventually he may hear it. That kind of kind words will, you know, penetrate into his heart, right to his heart. And that kind word sometime will, you know, he says, will turn over the heaven [laughs]. Kind words-one kind words will turn over all the heaven and earth [laughs, gestures], like this. That is kind words. And, in Japanese, he describe very beautifully, so almost everyone knows that words. I cannot, you know, ex- [partial word]-translate it so well, but-

And third one is to do something good, or to benefit people. That is the third one. And he says foolish people may say, "If you work for others," you know, "you will not have no time to work [for?] yourself." If you always helping others, you will not be helped. You have no time to help yourself. But actually it is not so. To-to help others is to help yourself, because there is no-if you think [it] over-there is no difference between you and others. Others is you and you are others. And you are part of all society.

So to-even [if] you think you help yourself, it means that you are helping others [laughs]. Do you understand? It is others, not you. Where is you? [Laughs.] There is-there is no "you," actually. But foolishly we think, "This is me and that is you" [laughs]. But no one knows who is you, you know, as I explained the other day. Eyes cannot see themselves, you know. You-you think this is eyes [probably pointing to his eyes], but eyes doesn't know themselves. So when you say "eyes," eyes is not you any more. That is some object about what you are thinking. And you say, "This is me and this is-that is him," but that is not right.

So [laughing] anyway, we are helping others. So you shouldn't say: "Now I am helping myself, and someday I will," you know, "after I help myself, I will help others." That is very poor understanding.

And the last one is rather difficult: to be friendly with others. To be friendly [laughs] with others, you know. If I-if I, you know, say "There is no me or no you," that's all [laughs]. But he explained more carefully about it. To be friendly with others means to-to accomplish oneness of everything: in bodhisattva practice, oneness of all things. That is to be friendly with others. And how, you know, this practice could be done is when you say "I," you know-"I" include everything. When I say "you," at that time, "you" include everything. Actually we are practicing always this way. We say, "I am here and bowing to Buddha." We say so.

But when you say "Buddha," there is no you; when you say "I," there is no Buddha. You know, I am-when-when we put our hand together and bow to Buddha [bows] carefully, you know, that is you or that is me, not Buddha. Buddha is me. When you open your eyes and see the Buddha, there is no you [laughs]. You are forgotten at that time, if that is real practice. When you feel, "I am here and I am practicing-I am-I am bowing to Buddha," that is very superficial bow. There is no sincerity in it. So it is all right when you bow to Buddha with utmost care to bow to Buddha [bows], then Buddha is here, right here. And when we bow to Buddha and when you lift your hand, and when you feel Buddha, you know, then Buddha is right here and there is no me. We-we cannot, you know, say, "This is me or this is Buddha," because in-in one second, in each moment, "Buddha/me. Buddha/me." And we don't know which is which [laughs]. It is foolish to say, "This is me, or "This is Buddha."

When you see Buddha in your eyes, there is no you. When you feel Buddha, there is no you. So mostly, when you bow to Buddha, the world is world of Buddha only. When you bow to Buddha with utmost care, that is you, you know. Buddha is not here-there. So when you practice bow you are Buddha, and, at the same time, you are practicing bodhisattva way in the realm of Buddha, the world of Buddha only. This is, you know, complete oneness: when you don't know which is which.

After you bow, you know, "Oh, I bowed to Buddha this morning nine times." You may say so, but when [laughs] you are doing [so], we don't know which is which. That is complete oneness. When we talk with each other, you know, we don't know which is which. When we have complete communication, you know [laughs], there is no differ- [partial word]-we cannot say which is which. As long as you feel, "I am here, and he is there," that is not complete communication. And this is the experience you actually have always, but you ignore this actual experience and say, "This is me, and that is others."

That is, you know, silt of your practice [laughs]. After some hours, you know, even in the stream you will have silt, and when the silt is mixed with water, that is real water. But, you know, when silt is divided from the water, that is already something which will happen later. So we shouldn't, you know-actually water has something in it, you know. That is actual water. We-you call [it] "mineral water"? What do you call it-the water you buy from the store in the bottle? Hmm?

Student: Distilled water?

Still water?

Students: Spring water?

Spring water? [Laughs.] No, that is not spring water [laughs]. But-do you call it spring water? [Laughter.] The-you mix, you know-wine, you know, and-Student: Soda water?

No, no! [Laughs, laughter.] You know, when you drink some-not sake, but wine-

Student: Coca Cola?

[Laughs.] No, no, not Coca Cola. [Laughs, laughter.] I think you call it "mineral water"-

Students: Yeah. Mm-hmm.

-to-to make the wine weaker.

Student: Why do that? [Laughs, loud laughter.]

That will be the pure water, maybe, but I don't think that kind of water doesn't exist, you know, in the stream. I think we have to, you know, more organic [laughs]. You say you like the word "organic" [laughs, laughter]-organic water [laughs, laughter]. In other word, muddy water. You are very much discouraged when you see the muddy water for several days. But actually, water is not so pure.

If water stays for a long, long time, you will have silt, and it will-may be divided in two. But something else will appear from it [laughs]: bugs and flies [laughs], because it is dead water. If it is running, you know, there must be something in it. That is actual, you know, world.

So we should live always in actual world. We should not live in something-some imagination. When we live in actual world, there is no problem. When you-we become very sophisticated and very wise, something will happen, you know. We should be able to see things as it is. Then there is true friendship.

We say-so Dogen-zenji said-we say Buddha and sentient-people. But when Buddha is Buddha, people are also Buddha. When we bow to Buddha, everyone who bow to Buddha is Buddha. That is very true. When we really bow to Buddha, we are Buddha because we forget ourselves when you really bow to Buddha. When you don't forget yourself and bow to Buddha, that is formal practice [laughs], very formal one, you know. Even though you know, you know, who is Buddha, who is Dharmakaya Buddha, and Sambhogakaya Buddha [laughs], and Nirmanakaya Buddha, you know. And "I am bowing now, may be Nirmanakaya Buddha." [Bows. Laughs, laughter.] This is very formal practice [laughs].

So, anyway, you know, as children bow to Buddha [bows]. That is, you know, informal practice. But people say that is very formal practice [laughs], and to bow to Buddha knowing which Buddha we are bowing-"Is this Avalokiteshvara [laughs, laughter] or Shakyamuni Buddha?" Or "This Buddha is-how old this Buddha is?" [Laughs.]

This kind of, you know, practice is not our practice at all. Our practice is more natural and maybe primitive-not so civilized practice [laughs]. This is how to be friendly with each others. So this kind of interpretation is-what he is talking about is, you know, based on actual practice, not based on thinking or canon of Buddhism or understanding of Buddhism-but based on actual practice we do, and there there is, you know, real Buddha.

So this kind of understanding will be something which you should understand. Someth- [partial word]-it is not something which you can understand but something you will be familiar with, you know. When something-you can feel something which you will be, you know, more intimate by your practice. This is bodhisattva practice.

Excuse me. Tomorrow we will have, you know, practice of [for] shosan ceremony for the seventh days of sesshin. And the day after tomorrow we will have Buddha's Enlightenment Day ceremony. So-hai.

Student: Tomorrow is Thursday-

Hmm?

Student: Is that Thursday?

No. Not-so-[tomorrow is] preparation. And the day after tomorrow we will have shosan.

Student: And the day after that?

The day after that we will have-did I made some mistake? Okay? Excuse me. The eighth day, you know-seventh day we will have [laughs, laughter]-huh?

Student: Seven days [2-3 words unclear].

Yes. Confusing. The eighth day-

Student: When we're going to have it, Roshi, we will tell you.

Okay. [Loud laughter.] [2 words unclear.] Okay. So. He-he will tell you. Maybe. [Laughs.] Okay. [Laughter.] You know, it will be, you know, something-it may be something [laughs, laughter]. So, you know, practice hard [laughs] tomorrow. Okay?

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Judith Randall and Bill Redican (2/12/01).

4 - Winter Sesshin Lecture #6

Thursday, December 04, 1969

Winter Sesshin Lecture #6

Tassajara

Our sesshin is already nearing to the end. As I said before, this sesshin will not come back again. So we must make best effort in our practice. And when you want to [make] best effort in our practice, of course we have to practice zazen seriously.

But at the same time, tomorrow we will have shosan<sup>[1]</sup> ceremony. And the day after tomorrow morning we will have jodo-e.<sup>[2]</sup> Those ceremonies should be observed as if you practice zazen. And when you [are] in zendo, when you do something, there is some-there is rules. Rules we have in zendo is called "pure rules." Pure means oneness-oneness of the rules and who observe rules. And the students and rules should be always one. That one student-where one student is, there should be rules. And rules should be taken care of by all of us as if you take care of your zazen. That is why we call it pure precepts-pure rules. So rules we have in zendo is not some rules which is set up by someone for some purpose.

So the difference between the usual rules and our rules is [that] our rules has freedom in it. The rules which has no freedom in it is not pure rules. The restricted side and freedom side in our pure rules is one. And how we take care of rules is how we take care of our practice-zazen practice.

Buddha said it is-those who take care of our mind, which means zazen practice, should be [like?] a man who take care of reservoir for irrigation. The bank-we should take care of bank. Bank is rules. As if, you know, a farmer take care of the reservoir, we should take care of our everyday life and organize our everyday life so that we can practice zazen. So where we have good practice, naturally good rules or pure rules is observed, or else we cannot continue our zazen practice. So whatever you do, it should be well taken care of.

Sometime most people, maybe, thinks zazen practice is something special practice, and everyday life is something quite different from our practice, and attitude of everyday-attitude in everyday life and way we observe zazen changes. That is not the monastic life. Especially during sesshin, whatever you do, that is the extended practice of zazen practice. And I want you to observe shosan ceremony and jodo-e for Buddha's enlightenment day-would be observed like we practice zazen.

I think you made a great progress in your practice. I am rather amazed at your progress. So I think we must make our bank of reservoir higher, higher, and higher so that wisdom water does not leak. So-so we must take care of leakage of the high bank. The-if the bank is high, you know, small leakage will become a big one. So it is necessary for us to make our bank higher, and at the same time we must pay a great care for the leakage.

Small leakage cannot be ignored now. Some mistake for beginner may be all right anyway. The wisdom water is not so deep, so damage will not be [laughs] so big anyway. But when we have big amount of wisdom water, I think we must have-will have pretty very hard time to take care of the reservoir we have, like we have upstream.

Especially I am very grateful for the-for your old students who is taking care of the leakage of the bank. Our practice, bodhisattva practice, is not-through and through-is not just personal practice. And the-all the people who flow into the reservoir will be a one big wisdom lake, and there we must have good practice.

If-but if you come in the deep water, you will be drowned because it is pretty deep, you know. You know, something good for foolish one is-will give him a big damage. For a plant it is necessary to have rain. But for weak, you know, small-small shoot of or seed of, for an instance daikon [3] [laughs]-do you know daikon? It is very small seed. If it rain hard, the seed will be, you know, lost. Even though rain is good for plants, but it is not always good. So each one of us should take care of ourselves so that we should-we wouldn't be lost in high water.

And we should not [track] dirt in zendo, you know, with dirty shoes. Zendo is always cleaned up and taken care of by us. But someone carelessly will [track] dirt in zendo with dirty shoes. That kind of things always happen. So Dogen-zenji, in his rules of monastery, [says] if you come-if you dirt in-if you come to monastery by mistake-by mistake-you should go out. This is very important. In zendo we don't sit so much. Although we have various unwritten wo- [partial word]-rules, we do not talk about it so much, and it looks like a big freedom in zendo. So someone, you know, may feel very good to play with dirty shoes in zendo. But, you know, we should be-he should be ashamed of it if he found out what kind of place zendo is.

The-some poem says, "Don't you see the red flower? It is autumn,"[4] you know. In autumn we have-in Japan, we have, you know, hyakujiko, [5] you know. It means red flower which last one hundred days-hyakujiko-and its skin is very slippery and smooth. And the-not much bulk on it, and the bark is brown. And small leaves and-and red-pink-thick pink color. "Don't you see the flower of hyakujiko or saru-suberi?"[6] We say saru-suberi-saru-suberi-monkey slips. Monkey-it-the bark is so slippery, so even the monkey will slip [laughs]. "Don't you see the flower of hyakujiko?" Those are nothing but the blood of former teachers.

So we, you know, just-when we see the hyakujiko, we just say, "Oh, beautiful flower!" [Laughs.] Maybe that's all, you know. If you have no experience of real freedom of life, what kind of freedom is really-real freedom? You know, "Oh, beautiful flower!" Maybe that's all. But that is nothing but the blood of-blood of ancient teachers. You say "just Tassajara zendo" [laughs]. You may say, "Oh, wonderful place!" You may say it has hot springs and a calm nice place, you may say. But it is the result of the effort of ancient teachers.

The ceremony we have-we had-we-today looks like, you know, simple but those ceremony is observed-originated, maybe, in China-Hyakujo [7]-and observed in China and introduced to Japan by Dogen and many Zen masters, and has been observed for maybe one thousand years. To you it is something unfamiliar ceremony. But those are the blood of our ancient teachers.

It is rather difficult for me to observe those ceremony with the same spirit I observe it in old zendo. It is rather difficult. And so I'm sorry, you know, I lose the spirit of observing or taking it. But I hope by your help, by your respect to the ancient teachers, those ceremonies will be observed with some respect and with some spirit. Even one word, when it is said with true spirit, it will give you a great, deep feeling.

Perhaps I may be too friendly with you, you know. Maybe I was Americanized quite a lot [laughs, laughter]. I think that is maybe good, and sometime it is not so good. And as you want me to be more strict and to be more like Zen master, you know [laughs, laughter], I'm happy to be strict. But, you know, I cannot be strict when you don't understand, you know. It is rather difficult.

I feel as if I am playing game with you [laughs]. Maybe I am playing game with you. But it should not be like this. We should not waste this valuable time, especially when we have-with a great effort when we have build up some spirit so far.

I am very grateful for your effort. And with mutual trust I think we will have good concluding ceremony for this training period.

Thank you very much.

Saru-suberi tree (Lagerstroemia indica L.)

---

Source: Original City Center tape transcribed by Diana Bartle (10/20/00) and checked by Bill Redican (3/26/01).

[1] The head monk (shuso) answers questions in a formal ceremony.

[2] jodo-e: Ceremony performed on the anniversary of Shakyamuni Buddha's enlightenment. In Japan it is observed on December 8.

[3] daikon: Large white winter radish.

[4] A seven-day period around the autumn equinox (September 23 or 24), when many red flowers are in bloom, is traditionally observed in Japan. The Buddhist term for this period is higan. The poem or line cited by Suzuki-roshi may be from Manyoushu, an anthology of 4500 poems from 5th-century Japan.

[5] From hyaku, "hundred," + jiko, "----."

[6] saru-suberi (Jap.): Lagerstroemia indica L., the crêpe (crape) myrtle tree (Eng.) or monkey-slip tree (Jap.); from Jap. saru, "monkey," + suberi, "slip."

[7] Baizhang Huaihai (Jap. Hyakujo Ekai): 720-814. Disciple of Baso Doitsu.

5 - True Happiness and Renewal of Practice at Year's End

Sunday, December 21, 1969 [vergelijk dec. 1968]

True Happiness and Renewal of Practice at Year's End

Everyone seeks for true happiness, but happiness cannot be true happiness if the happiness is not followed by perfect composure. The- usually happiness does not stay long. Happiness is mostly just very short time and it will be lost in ext moment when you have it. So, sometimes we will think rather not to have it because after happiness usually followed by sorrow and this is, I think, everyone experiences it in our everyday life. Buddha, when he escaped-can you hear me?-when he escaped from his castle, he felt this kind of-he had this kind of happiness in his luxurious life in the castle, he at last forsake all of those, this kind of life, so we say he started his religious trip because of evanescence, because he felt evanescence of life. That is why he started study of Buddhism. I think we have to think about this point more. I think everyone seeks for happiness, that is alright, but the point is what kind of-how to seek for happiness is the point. But whether our way, whether the happiness we seek for is something which we can...it is something which is possible to have it...Surely there is-we have to seek his teaching more carefully. He taught us the Four Noble Truths and first of all he taught us this world is world of suffering. When we seek for suffering-happiness-to say this world is world of suffering is very, you know...you may be very much disappointed with your teacher. World of suffering. This world anyway is world of suffering, he says. And he continues. Why we suffer is this world is world of fantasy, everything changes. When everything changes we seek for some permanent thing, we want everything to be permanent. Especially when we have something good or when we see something beautiful or we want it to be always in that way. But actually everything changes. So that is why we suffer. So if we seek for happiness even though we seek for happiness it is not possible to have it because we are expecting something to be always constant when everything changes. So naturally we must have suffering. So far, according to this teaching, we are-there is no other way for us to live in the world of suffering-that is the only way to exist in this world.

Then it is not possible to obtain eternal happiness, or eternal composure of life. Though we have some way to have eternal composure of life or happiness of life, but first of all if we want to composure of life, we have to change our view, our way of observing things. To observe things as it is, we say, but to observe things as it is for usual sense and to observe things as it is in our way is not the same. This point is not truly realized by even Buddhists. Things as it is, way as it is. What is way as it is. Usually things as it is means to observe things as if something exists in that way, constantly, forever. We say-here in incense bowl. But this is already mistake. There is no such thing exists. This is always changing. This is bronze, but even so this is changing, and you sense in it always changing. In ten minutes there will be no more incense, but if it is very good incense you will think as if something exists, not forever, you may not think in that way, but at least you think this incense exists and fire exists in that way, but the fire is not exactly the same fire as you observe this fire. This is actually, you know, instead of combustion, it is not red-red fire as you, as you see it. It is constant repetition of combustion-like this-there is electricity, but that light is always-current back and forth, this way, and doesn't exist in that way, but we see there constantly electric light, like so. But that is not true. So we Buddhists call this kind of naive way of looking-observing things is aspect of being because we think everything exists in this way. Aspect of being. And when you understand everything changes and everything is changing, like electric light or fire, we call this kind of view, is view of non-being. No such thing exists, so non-being. And for Buddhists, for you maybe if you seek for happiness, if someone who has view of seeking for happiness, it means that he is seeking for something which is impossible and if you have the view of non-being you will not care for anything. If you accept things in that way, you will be very, your way of life is very empty. And you will not find out any meaning of life at all. And our way of observing things is based on view of being and non-being, both. And we know that view of being is too naive, and view of non-being is too...logical. Or too critical. Or view of-true view of life should be both. View of being and view of non-being. This is our way.

But view of being and view of non-being is not...is not possible to accept. We can accept one of the tow, but we cannot accept two of those viewpoints. And here there is another problem for us. But when you face-when you face this second problem, you will be said to be Buddhist. And you will give up to rely on your intellectual understanding of teaching and you will start our practice. To accept this kind of paradox.

Recently I ask you and I want you to reflect on why you seek for-why you study Buddhism. Because I think this point is-if this point is not fully understood, it may be difficult...to put whole physical and spiritual power in our practice. Usually maybe in your practice without thinking about our life more deeply and you try to if you have problem you will try to solve it by means of practice or teaching, but if you really think about whether your view of life is right or wrong, whether you are trying to obtain something which is possible to obtain or you are doing-you are trying to accomplish something which is not possible to accomplish. Then you will not be sincere enough to practice our way because you are always fascinated by some teaching or chanting. We don't know-what we study in intellectual way is very shallow, but what we actually experience is very deep. When-after-when I came to America, I found very, you know...I found...special, some special food for me and I enjoyed it, I enjoyed it very much-that was potato. Potato was delicious to me, but I don't know if it is so for you or not. I don't know what kind of nourishment potato has, I haven't studied anything about potato, but I like it very much. The reason why I like it is-I don't know why-when I was in Japan of course I liked it, but I didn't think I liked potatoes so much! But after I came to America, having very-various foods and I haven't not much chance to eat potatoes, maybe once a month or so when I was invited for Thanksgiving, I had mashed potatoes-that was delicious. But usually I haven't mashed potatoes, or even baked potato. At Tassajara I told Ed I like potato (laughs). Sometimes, as we have various food, various kinds of food, so Ed cannot give me always potato. So only once in a while I had potato. As soon as I come back from Tassajara I go to the grocery store and buy three or four potatoes and as it takes pretty long time to cook it, I cut it and fry it. My boy doesn't like it, but I like it. My wife doesn't like it much. So I cook it just for myself. Do you know why? Potato was-when I was young I-my hometown produced a lot of potatoes, so I was eating potatoes always when I was a boy. So that is why I like it. When I was eating I didn't like it so much because I had it almost not everyday, but four times or more a week. This kind of experience characterized our character. I think you may not like zazen so much, but you think this is good, so you may practice it. But you may not realize how much progress you made in your zazen practice. So may do, but most of you don't, I am afraid. But that is alright. This kind of experience which is not just reading or listening to lecture and something which you experience, both physically and spiritually, without thinking about it. Without trying to find out the meaning of it, beyond our intellectual understanding, to practice our way without any gaining idea. To practice our way is valuable and you will have real power of digesting things.

In Lotus Sutra, as you know, Chapter Three, Buddha told Shariputra, you may not know what you have done before you will not remember what you did in your former life or even in this life, you may not remember all of it, but he said, you have been practicing our way for so long time that is why now you have been practicing our way for so long time that is why now you have attained enlightenment. I know that, but you may not know it-why you have attained enlightenment. I ask you why you came here so many times. I thin you don't know why you came here, but there is some reason why you came here. You didn't come here just by curiosity. Why you came here is, I don't think possible to figure out. But there must be some reason. This kind of reason-you practice your way is so-called it, there is no other way to say so we say-your Buddha nature seeks for Buddha. Buddha seek for Buddha. This is very mystic way of putting it, but there is no other way to say it so we say Buddha nature seeks Buddha nature.

We have various Buddhist philosophy and we have a lot of teaching to study, but Buddhism is not actually philosophy or teaching. Buddhism is always within ourselves and always helping us. But we do not-when we are not-when we don't realize it, then that is so called it suffering. Or when we live in the realm of good or bad, right or wrong, we lose our meaning of life. Only when we do something we practice, with right understanding, whatever you do that is our practice. Because we are so intellectual being, it is necessary to-to be free from our reasoning or our intellect. That is necessary. And instead of being caught by intellectual mind, we should seek for something more or we have to rely on way things goes and the way we live without-without every reason...why we are practicing...Indian way or Chinese way or Japanese way-you may feel in that way but actually there is no special way, our way is not just for Japanese, or Chinese or Indian people. This is for everyone. We sit in cross-legged position, but if you think just cross-legged position is juts Zen, that is a big mistake. If you want to practice our way, we should free our mind from intellectual or conscious activity in term of right or wrong, or good or bad. Whatever it is we should try it and we should have taste of it through direct experience. Not just feeling or thinking, but direct experience. That is zazen practice.

So many people here practicing our way. I feel a great responsibility as a teacher. If I am not here maybe you will not come here. If I am here you come here and spend all day in our practice. But if you misunderstand-if you have misunderstanding in our practice it will not work at all. It is quite natural for us to think some result or effect as long as you do something, but our practice is something different from that kind of activity. Just-we practice our way juts to have...(tape turned)...

...Next Tuesday we will have no lecture, so this may be-will be the last one for this...at the end of the year we clean up our house and we...throw old things which we do not use anymore, and we renew our equipment, even things in the...furniture we renew it. And after cleaning our room we...we put new, new _____and which is distributed from temple-like this. We take off old mats and put new ones, like this. This is- when in temple we have prayer for the-to control fire, this is what you call it _____taking care of fire it says in Japanese. And this is-in temple at end of the year we have ceremony to read Prajna Paramita Sutra-600 volumes of Prajna Paramita Sutra, but actually we cannot read 600 pages of sutra, so the priest conducting the ceremony read one, one volume of the 600 sutras. The we have one volume, one of 600...(tape inaudible)...just to turn it instead of reading and so the most important volume will be recited by the priest who is conducting...and we...and you receive this kind of prayer card from the temple. That is what we do...and end of the year is the most busy days. We have to clean up our rooms and if you have some debts you should pay. For someone to collect the money...he lent and for the most people it is time to pay the debt and then we-after cleaning up everything, spiritual and physical, we decorate New Year's decoration so old times (?) those should be done before twelve o'clock and after twelve o'clock there is no need for you to pay, payback the money you owned, so the man who, who wants to collect his money_____even after twelve o'clock, if he had chosen (inaudible)...So usually it is pretty exciting week. This kind of custom still in Japan and each one of us, rather we enjoy this kind of activity. We understand each other-we fool ourselves in some way and enjoy the last day of the year. This idea is based on Buddhist way of understanding life. Moment after moment we should renew our life, we should not stick old idea of life, or way of life, we should renew it, our life day by day, especially at the end of the year. Especially at the end of the year we should completely renew our feeling and completely renew our car. If we stick to old ideas always, or if you have no chance to renew it, it is rather difficult to renew your way of life. Some encouragement is necessary if you always repeating same thing over and over again, then even though you have no feeling of sticking to old way of life, actually you are confined in old way of life. Some excitement or some occasion is necessary. For instance, we use this kind of stick. This is to renew your practice, if you become drowsy, if you don't receive a stick you will have chance to renew your _____and in this way, you can live moment after moment. Actually...faithful-you will be faithful to your own life.

So, as it is we say, but actually when most people say 'way as it is' is not at all way as it is. Without clearing up your mind and body, physically, you will not have chance to live on each moment. So the (end) for us is laziness. If you are always lazy and drowsy, spiritually and physically lazy, you actually have no chance to live truthfully to yourself. That is why we practice various practices. But if you-if we stick to old way of practice it is not so good also. So it is necessary maybe to change our way of practice sometimes. For instance, at some monastery they start to bathe in cold water from January, December 1 until December 15. All the monks getting up about 4 o'clock and going to the lake and bathe_____. This is not_____ -just to get out of drowsy mind. And you will not catch cold. recently flu is all over, but if you make up your mind to bathe every morning and evening in cold water, your mind do not accept_____because you are so physically and mentally very active. So we monks rather_____ourselves when we catch cold. Lazy monk! _____Especially-it is rather difficult to take cold water-bath, and more difficult-after working so hard and to take cold bath in evening very difficult. Maybe I don't know why but anyway when you get up you need some situation, natural, but in evening usually we are not prepared for that kind of situation. That is- it is so difficult to take cold bath in evening. This kind of practice is not orthodox practice, but according to the situation of the monastery we apply various ways of life and to keep chance to renew our mind and body. Especially people who live in San Francisco where climate is always same, it may be necessary to, to have some pool for Zen monks to take cold baths. Maybe exciting practice for us, and it will give pretty good stimulation for San Francisco people. I am busy now, everyday activity, but if you want I think you can do it, and you are young enough to do it. It doesn't mean to be involved in ascetic practice, it is the purpose of those practices _____physically and spiritually. We say Zen-if we, if we are caught by even the idea of Zen we call-sticking the_____he is not fresh enough-old stinky Zen student! But if we do not have some chance to renew our practice we will soon, soon we will be stinky student. As if you wear same underwear one week or two weeks. What will happen to us_____...and so my teacher or my master always told us-"you stinky boys, wash your underwear!" Not just underwear and so my teacher. my master, his way of training his students was-disciples was pretty different from usual master. He did not allow me to stay at Eiheiji so long time. "two years is enough! You will become stinky Eiheiji student!" "That's enough, you should go to Sojiji." And when I stayed at Sojiji more than one year, one day he appeared and after talking with me ten minutes-"maybe it is time for you to leave Sojiji." And he always put emphasis on Dogen Zenji's beginner's mind. You should always be alright-it means you should not stick to old style of practice, or any kind of practice and you should be always new student. When you go to Rinzaï temple, you should be new Rinzaï student. And if you go to Japan, you should be new student. You should forget all about what you have studied in America. You will know...the fundamental practice is the same, but we should practice the essential practice with renewed feeling. This is important. To practice always with new fresh-freshness of the feeling is rather difficult. Necessary for us to change some part of our practice.

My master didn't give me-didn't give us any idea of what we will do next day or next week. He didn't talk about tomorrow and it was-he was very unpredictable type of monk and monks and priests were very much afraid of him. They couldn't get what he had in his mind. Maybe he didn't have any idea, but he was always concentrated on what he was doing. That is, I think, too much, but it is necessary for us to practice our way moment after moment, with our best effort and _____mind. As we are pretty new students, so it is rather difficult to practice our way without much rules, but each one of you should make your best effort to study without, without instruction in detail, detailed instruction. You should feel as if you are study...with few people, you shouldn't think that we have so many students. You study our way as if you are studying with your teacher only. I think that help you to ignore other's practice. But we should not be involved in group study only. This is not school-not school system. I want you...to understand this point more, whether you are you have only one teacher. We have each one of you are only disciple, disciple for teacher, for a teacher. With this spirit we should practice our way. If this point is missing, we cannot practice Zen_____.Originally Zen master do not have so many students. When Dogen left China, receiving transmission from Tendo Nyoho. Tendo Nyoho Zenji said to him: "After you go back to Japan, you should practice your way in remote country with few students and keep always our practice fresh and new, and take good care of your students." That is what he said when Dogen leave China_____and he secluded himself in remote country, norther part of country and built his small temple in_____Prefecture where there is Eiheiji now. Tassajara may be...at Tassajara they may have small, but Eiheiji they...at this time of year the...all the buildings is dark because of the snow. We have to cover all building by _____to protect building from heavy snow. Such a remote country he practiced his way, with candle light, when winter come-that was his way.

That kind of practice is very important. Even though we are many people now, we should not forget this spirit.

Thank you very much.

6 - To Adjust Ourselves to Our Surroundings

Sunday, December 21, 1969

Fundamental Buddhist Point: To Adjust Ourselves to Our Surroundings
San Francisco

Since I moved in this building, [1] people ask me how do you feel [laughs]. But I haven't find myself in this building. I don't know what I am doing here [laughs, laughter]. Everything is so unusual to me. So actually I haven't [laughs]-not much feeling. But I am thinking about now how to adjust myself to this building. And first of all, what I felt seeing people, you know-seeing our students bowing in this way or cleaning our building, I found special meaning of putting-our putting hands together like this.

Wherever we are, this, you know, putting hands together is very suitable posture. [2] You know, this is pretty universal way of expressing our sincerity, I think. So wherever we are, if our behavior is based on this putting hand together, we will be beautiful wherever we are. And our-we will suit to the surrounding.

As a Buddhist, I think fundamental Buddhist way is, I think, how to, you know, adjust myself-ourselves to the surrounding rather than changing our surrounding. So when, I think, Buddhists moved in, you know-when Buddhist which was developed in Eastern culture moved in Western culture, if possible-as much as possible, without changing the furniture or building-how to adjust ourselves to the building or the culture will be the most important work for us, you know. I think in that way now.

This is, maybe, basic difference between Western culture and Eastern culture. For an instance, you use, you know, very convenient chair, like this, you know. But we sitting on floor [laughs] without using convenient things. Maybe this is more convenient, but if-we can live in our idea maybe, you know-I realize this point. When we-instead of making surrounding convenient for us, we make effort to find some way to live in the surround-on the floor or on the earth-by effort to live on the earth. So it is rather difficult.

Maybe it is rather difficult to stand up from the floor. This is rather difficult. And it may be easier to eat with table rather than take everything up to, you know, to your mouth, maybe. But this is-but even though it is difficult, we Eastern people trying to find our way without changing our surrounding, without using some special tools.

When I was sitting here reciting sutra, seeing those chairs in front of me, I thought, "Oh [laughs, laughter], very convenient thing, to us here." But, you know, if we can live without, you know, chair, our life will be more simple. And even though we use our physical power-physical strength in standing up, but we will have eventually more and more physical strength and physical power to suit our surrounding.

But-we must-but when-if we use something, we must limit things in smallest amount. That will be the next thing to think. And if we have several tools or equipment we must know how to use it. And we must know how to-best use of them. Dogen-zenji said, "Some thing which you put higher place, you should put higher place. Some thing you should put lower place, you should put lower place or on the floor." So some thing should be on the shelf and some thing should be on the floor. This is, maybe, next thing we should think and we should take care of.

We should put things in most-in the most natural way. And next thing will be to clean, you know, our surrounding. This is very important effort to fit ourselves to our surrounding. At Eihei-ji they say zazen-they do not say zazen first-they say "cleaning first and then zazen." Clean our surrounding, making, you know, suitable surrounding for us. Then we should sit. So cleaning first and zazen next.

I think it makes sense. You know, I didn't know the meaning so well, but, for an instance, it is rather difficult to sit before you clean your floor and altar. It is not so easy because you will have various dust, you know, in your mind too. So in Zen students, most important thing is to arrange things in proper way or in the most natural way, so that we can make best of our effort and best of-best use of them, and to clean it-to clean them so that we can have good practice. Then, I think, without changing, you know, our way of life so much, we will have quite Buddhistic feeling in our life, I think.

So fundamental point will be to make effort to suit ourselves to the surrounding-to adjust ourselves to the surrounding, instead of adjusting surrounding to our convenience. This kind of effort is, right now, very important, I think. And if we start to making effort on this point, we will have here wonderful, you know, life, and this building will be-without changing so much-I think we will have quite good Buddhistic feeling.

I want, you know, [to make] best effort to adjust myself [laughs] to your culture, instead of, you know, changing my way of bowing, you know-instead of bow to shake hand or something like [laughs] that-instead of doing that kind. But by some fundamental, you know, way, you know, will have something wonderful, I think.

I haven't-I di- [partial word]-I haven't study, you know, Dogen's work on this point yet in its true sense. Of course, what we are doing at Eihei-ji is based on Dogen's instruction about our life. But if we study it in America, I think we will have something new meaning to it, as he was very careful about our life and view of life and way of life. I will ask someone to study it from-with some new viewpoint.

Thank you very much.

---

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Katharine Shields (7/23/00) and Bill Redican (7/26/00).

[1] 300 Page Street.

[2] S.R. probably puts his hands together in gassho.

1970 (65)

1970 januari (5)

1 - What is Our Practice?

Sunday, January 04, 1970

What is Our Practice?
San Francisco

In our zazen practice, we stop our thinking and we must be free from our emotional activity too. We don't say there is no emotional activity, but we should be free from it. We don't say we have no thinking mind, but we should not be-our activity, our life activity should not be limited by our thinking mind. In short, I think we can say [we trust ourselves completely, without thinking,][1] without feeling anything, we-without discriminating good and bad, without saying right or wrong, we should trust our life activity. Because we respect ourselves, because we trust completely, put faith in our life, we do not think, we do not discriminate, and we sit. That is, you know, our practice.

Tentatively, this morning, my version of our practice is like this because I want to extend this kind of understanding to our everyday life. Between -human relationship, for an instance, should be based on this kind of understanding. If our love between us is not based on this kind of understanding, respect, and complete trust, we will not have completely peaceful life.

And relationship between ourselves and nature should be like this. We should respect everything, especially something which we are related directly. This morning when we were bowing, you know, in zendo, we heard big noise here, you know, because everyone fling chair [makes noise by moving a chair along the floor] like this, you know [laughs]. I thought this isn't-may not be the way how we should treat chairs [laughs]-not only because it may cause disturbance to the people who are bowing in the zendo, but also fundamentally this will not be the way to-how we should treat things.

This has a wheel [castors?] here [moves chair again], you know. Wheels, you know, it has. This is very convenient. So I, you know-sometime I don't like something too convenient, you know. It gives us some-some lazy, you know, feeling which does not accord with our spirit of practice. And this kind of laziness, you know-I think our culture is started this kind of lazy idea. And, you know, eventually we-because of this, we should eventually fight with each other. And we have our cultural background, East or West, nowadays, is something, you know. This kind of lazy idea. Instead of respecting things, we want to use it for ourselves. And if it is difficult to use it, we have idea of conquering something. I think this is not-this kind of idea does not accord with our spirit of practice.

We are thinking about rituals and how to decorate our buddha hall-having some beautiful buddha and offering some beautiful flowers, you know. But Zen Buddhists says with a leaf of-with a blade of leaf we should create buddha-joroku-konjin-golden body of buddha which is sixteen inches-feet high. With, you know, blade of leaf, we should create big buddha. That is our spirit.

But here, you know, to create sixteen-feet-high buddha with a blade of, you know, leaf need a great effort [laughs]. I don't mean to accumulate many leaves, and [laughs] grain [?] it, and make a clay and big buddha. I don't mean that. But anyway, to see-until we see the big buddha in a small leaf, we need a great amount of-I don't say how-how much effort we need. I don't know. For someone it maybe quite easy, but for someone like me it [laughs]-it needs a great effort.

It is much easier to just to see a great golden buddha. It is much easier. But when you see a great buddha in a small leaf, that joy may be something special, I think. But we need a great effort.

My teacher, Kishizawa Ian,[2] you know, did not allow us to shut amado-to draw amado more than one [at a time]. We should, you know, draw it one by one. Do you know? Perhaps you don't know amado, the door outside of shoji screen. There is-outside of shoji screen there is wooden wood [shutter] to protect shoji from storm or rainstorm. It is, you know-the end of the building there is a big box for the amado, and one by one we put it in the box, you know. It is sliding doors, so one by one we, you know, put it in that box.

So one priest is there, and another priest is there, and if you pull-if you push [laughs] five or six doors, you know, like this [probably gesturing]- another one can be wait there and put it in the box. But he didn't like it. He told us to do it one by one [laughs], so if you-so one by one-so one person can do it, you know, and push it-put it in, and next one. That is how he told us to do it. And it is more-I think, anyway, it may be in that way we will not make much noise, of course, but the feeling is quite different when you do like this, you know [probably gesturing]. The feeling we receive from it is something, you know-lack of respect. But when you do it one by one carefully, without making much noise, then we will have there the feeling of practice there.

So there we have feeling of zazen practice. So even you carry, you know, even you arrange your chair-[drags chair back and forth]-if you do like this, you know, there is no feeling of practice. If you do it one by one [moves chair in one motion], then you have complete feeling in dining room. I don't feel good to practice zazen in the first floor where we eat-no, under-under the dining room.

When we practice zazen we are Buddha himself. And Monjushiri[3] is there. When we recite, maybe, sutra, you know, we are reciting sutra underneath kitchen. I don't feel so good [laughs], but if we have this kind of feeling in each corner of the building, I think that is much better because we-our practice is beyond the idea of the first floor or the second floor. But that is pretty difficult.

But we should know that, you know, even though we have this kind of beautiful building, there is difficulties in our practice. If it is easy when we have complete building with nice buddha hall and zendo we can practice zazen, that may be mistake, I think. But, at the same time, I know how [laughs] difficult it is to practice with this spirit in this kind of building because building is so good that there is-on the other hand, there is difficulties.

Because I know, you know-I know that anyway to practice our way is not [laughs] easy. It is anyway-it is difficult. And what kind of difficulty we will have is-I know what kind of difficulty we will have-which way we may take. As this is, as you know, city zendo-city zendo where everyone come and practice our way, not only old student but also those who don't know anything about Zen, there is double difficulties, you know, for new student and for old student too. I think old students have double duty, you know, and new students will have difficulties which they do not ever dream of-dreamed of.

So we must-old students must make their practice easier, you know. How to make them easier is, without telling them this way or that way, you should do this or you shouldn't do that, you should lead them so that they can practice our way easier. There may be various way, but I think our traditional way-we say "traditional way"-is set up with this idea: how to help people to practice right practice.

We say in our practice is "ornament of buddha-land." Our practice itself is ornament of buddha-land-bukkokudo[4] shogon.[5] You know, even though they don't know what is Buddhism, if they come to some beautiful, you know, buddha hall then they will-naturally they will have some feeling. That is, you know, the ornament of buddha-land. But essentially for Zen Buddhist, ornament of buddha hall is the people who are practicing there.

Each one of us is-should be beautiful flowers, and each one of us should be Buddha himself who lead people in our practice. So whatever we do, there must be some way of doing it. And we should always think-consider about this point. Of course there is no special rules for, you know, to treat things, to be friendly with others-there is no special rules. But how we find out the way we should do at that time is to think about what will be the way to help people to practice religious way. If you think-if you don't forget this point, you will find out how to treat people, how to treat things, how to behave yourself. And that is, at the same time, so-called-it "bodhisattva way." You know, our practice is to help people. And how to help people is how to practice our way on each moment, and how to live in this world, and how to practice zazen.

To stop thinking, to be free from emotional activity when we sit is not just to have concentration in our mind. It is not just for concentration, but there we have complete reliance for-to ourselves, to find absolute, you know, refuge in our practice. That is why we do not have emotional activity or thinking activity in our practice. We are just like a baby who is on the lap of mother, you know. That is zazen practice, and that is how we should extend our practice to our everyday life.

I think we have very good spirit here in this zendo and Tassajara. I was rather amazed at the spirit you have. But how you should extend this spirit to our everyday life is-will be the next, you know, question. And how you do it is to respect things, to respect with each other. When we respect things, we will find the true life in it. When we, you know, respect plants, we find-there we find the real life of, you know, life power of flower and real beauty of flower. So love is important, but more important element will be respect. And sincerity and big mind. With big mind and with pure sincerity and respect, the love could be real love. Just love separated from those factors will not work.

Let's try hard how to take big buddha [laughs] with, you know, with our effort.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997.
Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican
8/3/00.

[1] Text within brackets is from the original transcript. The original tape was apparently erased during that passage.

[2] Kishizawa Ian-roshi (1865-1955): a leading interpreter of Dogen's Shobogenzo. He received dharma transmission from Nishiari Bokusan. Suzuki-roshi attended him at Eihei-ji monastery when Kishizawa was seido (distinguished visiting priest in residence). Suzuki-roshi continued to study with Kishizawa-roshi from 1932 until Kishizawa's death in 1955.

[3] Japanese name for Mañjushri Bodhisattva.

[4] bukkokudo (also bokkoku): by extension, a realm of countless worlds influenced by a buddha's teaching (see Kazuaki Tanahashi, Moon in a Dewdrop, New York: North Point Press, 1985, pp. 266, 344).

[5] shogon: decoration. Close to soshoku: ornament.

2 - Ordination Ceremony: Bill Kwong and Silas Hoadley

Sunday, January 11, 1970

Ordination Ceremony: Bill Kwong and Silas Hoadley
San Francisco

We have ordination ceremony for Bill Kwong and Silas Hoadley after this lecture-immediately after this lecture. I wanted to talk about ordination ceremony, but I think it is pretty difficult to explain it, you know, because even-because you have no idea of, you know, Buddhist priesthood. And what you have in your mind is priest in America, you know, so [laughs] I have no word to communicate.

[Hum on tape for several minutes. Then Suzuki-roshi resumes.]

... inanimate and animate beings. So everything has its own position in Buddha's-in Budd- [partial word]-as a Buddhist. That is fundamental teaching of Buddhism, and that is the structure of the teaching.

So we cannot say "priest is highest." Or "animal is lowest." Tentatively, as we are, you know, human being, or as we are teacher or disciples, but we are all friends of-of Buddhist. We are all Buddhist. Tentatively, we take some responsibility to express Buddha's teaching. But each one of us-because each one of us has one's own position and responsibility. So the value of each one is the same. That is fundamental, you know, structure of sangha.

With this understanding, we observe ordination ceremony. Some of them will become priest, and some of them will remain, you know, laymen. And we will fulfill our responsibility to realize-for the realization of the teaching-for the practice of our teaching. This is, you know, why we have ordination ceremony, because we need, you know, priest. But it does not mean priest is highest, or something like that.

But when we, you know, have some ceremony, or when we have some activity, according to the situation, someone will take more responsibility and that is quite natural thing which will happen to us. And with this spirit, I want you to join our ordination ceremony, as someday you will be a priest or a nun. And no one knows [laughs], you know, what will happen to us.

But whatever happen to us, if you want to join our order and express Buddha's spirit, I want you to join our ceremony, and I shall be very grateful for you if you appreciate our effort.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center tape transcribed by Bill Redican, March 31, 2000.

3 - Rules

Sunday, January 18, 1970

Rules

San Francisco

In Japan now it is a season of typhoon. And recently, on the 16th, a typhoon arrived at San Francisco from Japan [laughs, laughter]. And now typhoon has left San Francisco to Tassajara [laughs, laughter]. Now it is the time when we have clear, blue sky again. Typhoon was so strong that I stayed in bed for two, three days [laughs, laughter]. I think you are also stayed in bed [laughs, laughter].

Each time some-at first, I came to America alone. And two years after, my wife came. And I had to share some difficulty we had-I had when I arrived San Francisco and culturally where I experienced cultural shock, you know [laughs]. And I had to share the same experience with my wife again, two years after. Whenever someone come from Japan, I have to share, you know, the excitement and difficulties they have, you know. That is not so easy [laughs]-always to have same experience and renew the difficulties and excitement again.

When Dogen-zenji went to China as a Japanese priest-when you read Hokyō-ki,[1] I think you will have some different understanding [that] I have now-which we have now-I have now. When he went Tendo monastery, which was a famous big monastery, he was given a seat in monastery. Maybe, as he was a Japanese, he-his seat was last seat of the zendo. And he immediately, you know, express the complaint [laughs] to the monastery, you know: "I am a quite old Zen Buddhist."

And in Japan and in China and everywhere, the rule is to decide the seat by the age-by the age as a Buddhist-as he joined our order. "So I cannot be the last one. I am a quite old Buddhist. I was ordained when I was thirteen year old. So I cannot be the last one."

And he also, you know, wrote a letter to the emperor [laughs, laughter]: "I understand Tendo monastery, you know, is the-one of the largest monastery in your country. So I understand the rules, you know, in that monastery should be universal or should be international. And I understand our-one of our rules to decide our seat in zendo by the seniority as a Buddhist, not by age or difference of the countries. But in Tendo monastery, when I arrived at this monastery, I was put the last seat. I cannot understand why." [Laughs.] "If you have some suggestion about it, please give me some suggestion or give the monastery," you know [laughs, laughter]. He was quite stubborn, I think. So they changed his seat to the proper one.

And in our-I am studying now a little bit about the rules of monasteries, which I didn't in- [partial word]-I was not interested in so much. But there must be some rules if we want to study our way or so that we can eliminate egoistic, you know, practice. Without rules, our practice tend to be egoistic, you know. The rules-by "rules" I don't mean some, you know, rules to give some advantage to the people who are responsible for the-in the position to manage zendo, but to give advantage to the student who practice in that zendo. And actually, even though you want to find out some rules in-some rules of monasteries in the written-up rules, you know, of Eihei-ji or Soji-ji or many Japanese and Chinese temple, it is difficult to find out the rules-some particular rules. But we will-we find out that the activity they do-the way they put-the way they decorate or set up altar or seat. There is underlying, unstated rules, which is not written up. That kind of rules is something which we must understand or else it is difficult to understand why we have-why we observe our rituals, why we set up our altar in some certain way. It is very difficult. And underlying rules-and there must be some underlying rules.

I want to explain little by little this kind of, you know, un- [partial word]-rules-not rules but idea or feeling Buddhists have in our practice: like what do we mean right legs or left legs, left hand/right hand, or left side and right side. Usually, you know, left side-left hand or left side is more important than, you know, right side. That is obviously Chinese and Japanese, you know, way of thinking or understanding.

Left-for an instance, here is Shakyamuni Buddha. And the left side there is Monjushiri.[2] And right side there is Fugen-bosatsu.[3] And Monju-bosatsu symbolize wisdom, and Fugen-bosatsu symbolize activity-action. So action-so wisdom is more important. Without, you know-maybe wisdom is eyes to see things. Without eyes, we cannot do anything, you know, even Fugen-bosatsu cannot do anything without eyes of Monjushiri. So left side is, you know-the rules is, you know, the way they decorate-put Monjushiri and Fugen-bosatsu is to-we just know Monju-bosatsu should be left-hand side of Buddha, you know. So Monjushiri should be this side. Fugen-bosatsu should be on this side.

When you cross your legs, it is same. This legs supposed to be-left side supposed to be wisdom, and right side should be-supposed to be practice and, you know, activity. So when we cross our legs, as I always says, there is, you know-we cannot-we don't know which is which, you know, because left one is already on the right side and [laughs] right side is already on the left side. So you don't know. "Oh. Which is left and which is right?" That is our zazen practice, you know. When we practice zazen there is no, you know-we should not have any idea of-particular idea of wisdom or practice, because beyond our practice is beyond our wisdom or need of practice-because when you practice zazen, there there is wisdom and practice. In this way, our zazen posture is a kind of symbolism, you know, like Tantric Buddhism put emphasis on it.

And in zendo, you know, left-hand side of-of Monjushiri is, you know-jokan-we say jokan is upper side,[4] and right-hand side is lower seat. So if there is altar, right-hand side of Buddha is-right hand side of the Buddha [is] someone who is-who has deep responsibility will sit. And on the left-hand side of the Buddha trainee or, you know, [someone] who is practicing zazen will sit-mostly students and trainees or head of the training who is shuso will sit or will stand [on the] right-hand side of Monjushiri in zendo.

So this side is for the shuso and students, and the other side is the seat for the someone one who has responsibility of actual, you know, some-not business, but-what do you call?-everyday-who are taking care of finance or kitchen or building or farming will sit [on] the left-hand side of Buddha.

But-so-for an instance, we put candle on the left-hand side of the Buddha, and flower on the right-hand side of Buddha when we have just a flower and candle. And the candle, you know, is more important offering to the Buddha than flowers. So candle should be left-hand side of the Buddha. Not left-hand side of you [laughs], but left-hand side of Buddha. This is rather confusing, but I'm talking about when I said "left-hand side," it mean left-hand side of Buddha. Don't mix up.

That is how we put-offer the candle and flowers in China and in Japan. I don't know Indian way, but so far as Chinese and Japanese, you know, rules goes, it is always so.

And this is, I think, very important for self-for the practice of selflessness. If you don't, you know-you may think you ha- [partial word]-you are quite free from idea of self, you know. But if there is no rules, for an instance, the way you hit mokugyo, you know, will be different according to the people [laughs]-to the person. It-it goes in that way. Someone will hit very slowly. Someone will hit very fast, you know. Those who hit mokugyo fast always hit fast. Someone, you know, who hit slowly always hit slowly. It goes in that way, and it means that without, you know, knowing or being aware of it, you know, his practice is involved in, you know, some-some idea of self already. And that, you know, a feeling will give big influence to the student who recite, you know. This is actual [laughs] fact, you know.

If there is some rules, and if every one of us, you know, practice our way-very well-set-up rules, very considerate setting of the rules-then we have no chance to be involved in selfish practice. All of us will, you know-can practice our way being quite free from the idea of self.

I think that Dogen, you know, express his complaint is not just, you know, for-for himself. If there is some rules, you know, which should be observed by Japanese, you know, and Chinese, something universal rules, you know, there is no confusion. And everyone will be treated in the same way. And when you practice our way, you will have good feeling. But if our monastery is involved in some, you know, selfish practice, then you will not feel so good.

I am not-I don't want to put emphasis on our rules, but our rules should be the rules which will help the unselfish practice. Because of the practice-because of the rules, we should get rid of our selfish idea. So fundamental idea of practice is to do things with people. The ru- [partial word]-when they get up, we should get up, you know. Or when they go to sleep, we should go to sleep. That is, you know, our fundamental idea of rules. In that way, we will get rid of-we will be free from selfish practice. So if you want to actualize the idea of non-self, you know, the way to be free from it is to do things with people. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

There must be, you know, many questions about this point, so I want to discuss this point with you some other time, not right now. Especially why I talk about this point this morning is, you know, because Japanese typhoon came [laughs], and I felt something, you know.

If we have some rules, you know, in this zendo how to treat people, you know, regardless he is Japanese or American, you know, it might be a great help. I was quite busy, you know. In my room I had Japanese guests [laughing]. And here we have, you know, zendo students. I didn't know what to do [laughs]. You know, this is very silly to be involved in this kind of confusion. Mmm-no-so I thought it is necessary anyway to have some, you know, rules, you know, which-how we treat people, you know.

Of course, where there is rules there must be some exception, but we must work hard on this point so that we will have more international, you know, practice here in this zendo.

Thank you very much.

-----
Source: City Center tape transcribed by Sara Hunsaker (2/07/00).
Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican (2/12/01).

[1] The journal kept by Eihei Dogen during his stay in Sung China. A collection of instructions by his Chan master Tiantong Rujing (T'ien-t'ung Ju-ching, Tendo Nyojo, 1163-1228). It was recopied by Dogen's student Ejo in 1253.

[2] Japanese for the bodhisattva Mañjushri.

[3] Japanese for Samantabhadra, a Mahayana bodhisattva.

[4] Of a meditation hall.

4 - Mahayana and Hinayana Buddhism

Sunday, January 25, 1970

Mahayana and Hinayana Buddhism
San Francisco

The difference between so-called-it Theravada Buddhism and Sarvastivadian or Hinayana and Mahayana is very important and directly, you know, concerned with our present problem. We are supposed [laughing] to be Mahayana Buddhist, but I think most of us are Hinayana, actually. There is not much Mahayana students. Almost all of us may be Hinayana or sectarian Buddhists because we study Buddhism as something which is already given to us, like Hinayana Buddhist thought Buddha already gave us-have given us-the wonderful teaching. So what we should do is to preserve his teaching as you like-as you put food in refrigerator [laughs]. That is Hinayana way. And to study, you know, Buddhism is to take out food from refrigerator. So wherever you want it, it is already there. That is Hinayana way of understanding.

But Mahayana students rather interested in how to produce food from the field-from the garden. So naturally Mahayana Buddhist, you know, put the emphasis on ground or garden which has nothing in it, you know, which you don't see anything in it. You know, if you see the garden, you don't see anything. But if you take care of seed, it will come out.

So we-Mahayana Buddhist make our effort to, you know, to see something come out from ground. And joy of the Mahayana Buddhist is joy of take care of the garden. That is Mahayana Buddhist. So we-Mahayana Buddhist-that is why Mahayana Buddhist, you know, put emphasis on emptiness. Emptiness is-is a garden where you cannot see anything. But it is, actually, mother of everything from which, you know, everything will come out.

Teaching eventually will be almost same, but our attitude towards teaching is different. So actually, Mahayana teaching and Hinayana teaching does not differ so much. And so we say, "We should practice Hinayana teaching with Mahayana spirit, with the gratitude of raising things or taking care of teaching or to appreciate teaching. How to appreciate teaching from nothing is, actually, our practice.

All of us has buddha-nature, so the teaching which will grow from the buddha-nature will be the same. But attitude is different. When you, you know-when you think teaching is already given to you, then your effort-naturally, you know, how to apply the teaching in this common, you know, world-ordinary world so that, you know, they make a great effort to apply the teaching to the-our mundane world. So that is a difficulty they had.

And the more and more the teaching is flavor or real sense. I think you-Yoshimura-sensei told you about something-a teaching of 20-12 links, you know. Did you or-? I think most of them listened to his lecture. And their-Hinayana understanding of the 12 links and Mahayana understanding of it is quite different. One is, you know-Hinayana Buddhist apply that teaching of 12 links, you know, for our actual life, you know, how we born and how we die.

But the original purpose of the teaching-when Buddha told us the teaching, he used it to explain the interdependency of the-of various being. So there is a big difference between the interpretation of the same teaching.

The more and more Buddha's teaching became very common and meaningless. Buddhas, you know, Buddhas-why Buddha told us, you know-how Buddha-and how Buddha tried to save us is to destroy our common sense.

You know, we are not usually, you know, as a human being, we are not interested in nothingness, you know, nothingness of the ground [laughs]. If you-you have something on-in the garden, you will be interested in something which is on the-in the garden. That is our tendency. But we are not so much interested in-usual person, at least, is not interested in the bare, you know, soil. But if you, actually, if you want to have good harvest, the most important thing, of course, is to make rich soil and to cultivate the soil and to weed the soil. That is the most important thing.

The Buddha-Buddha's teaching is about not what is there, but how it grows and how to take care of things. So he is not interested in, you know, various idea of deity, you know. But he rather interested in the deity, you know, which will grow [laughs] from the ground. So for him everything may be some holy being-not special, you know, given deity. So he looks like atheist, you know. He doesn't-he was not interested in some special deity, which we find out as something which is already there. He is not interested in them. But he was interested in the ground from which various gods will appear.

And this difference, you know, or lack of understanding of Buddhism result many non-Buddhist practice. For an instance, you know, in this zendo, in our group, we have, you know, officers, you know [laughs]. But, you know, officers are, you know, someone who appeared from the group, you know. So sometime, you know, officers are not someone who is, you know, the most respectable-which our-we must know from where he appeared [laughs]. You know, from our group he appeared, tentatively, to take care of our group. That is officer. But when we understand officers or respect officers as someone who is-who is selected people from your group, and who is the most respectable people because he is officer, that-that is very non- [partial word]-un-Buddhistic understanding. As we are living as a Buddhist in this Zen center, there must be someone who should take care of-someone should take care of our group. That is officer.

As a officer he is not, you know-he should be grateful [1 word] as a officer, as a-to take-he should be interested in to take care of our group rather that someone who is respectable, who is capable, you know. There is big difference, you know, in understanding themselves and in understanding officers, you know, his-their own understanding as a officer and people's understanding of officer.

When-I am not blaming [laughs], you know, anyone who is in the position of officer, but I am a, you know-as an example, I'm talking about this matter, but don't misunderstand me. When you become officer, you know, when you become officer you think you are some special person. [Laughs.] That is also very un-Buddhist-Buddhistic idea. We-each one of us comes out of the ground of Zen Center, you know. The ground [laughs] is the most important thing from which everyone of us comes out. So it is the ground, you know, which should be taken care of-not the plant, you know. If the ground is good, naturally good officers will appear. So we should respect all of the members of the group. Take care of Zen Center and you yourself, as a member of Zen Center.

When you think officer is some special person, that is, you know, that understanding is to understand things, you know, as some-to unders- [partial word]-to have more understanding of substantiality, a concrete idea, as a officer-officer as some special, you know, being, that is already concrete idea. Officers is something appeared from the members, you know, not special person. Cannot be any special person, because any one of you can be a officer. If members are very good, any one of you cannot-can be a officer. But because the soil is not so good [laughs], you know, so only capable one should be officer. The fault is each one of you-the reason why you should choose a special person. And special person should feel so bad, you know, to be appointed always same position [laughs]. "Oh, it's awful! [Laughs.] I wish someone can take my place," you know. If they-we are all good spirit, you know, anyone can be a officer. But that I should be always be officer is very regretful thing. The officer should understand themselves in that way. Then that is very Buddhistic, you know, understanding of their position.

So Buddha says: "If people are good, good buddha will appear." Because if people in some country, at some-in some time are not good, they will not have good buddha. That is very interesting, you know, remark. Buddha did not think himself to be some special person. He tried to be the most common people wearing ragged robe, you know, making trip with a, you know, begging bowl, without having any special novel teaching. He just tried to be a good friend of people. That was, you know, why Buddha appear in this world, and that was what he did at his time in India.

You know, because he had that kind of spirit or understanding of world, he could be a buddha. And he thought that I am-I have many students is because students are very good-not Buddha himself. That is most-the most Buddhistic understanding of teaching. But after Buddha, you know, the people respect his teaching or respect Buddha because of his-his teaching and his character. Maybe his teaching was very good, but why his teaching was very good is his understanding of life was good. His understanding of emptiness or his understanding of people was good. And because his understanding of people was good, he loved people, and he-he enjoy helping people. And that was why Buddha was great. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

... enjoy himself as a-as-because he is some special person or special sage, you know [laughs]. He enjoy himself as a friend of people. And he amazed at, you know, people's buddha-na- [partial word]-buddha-nature, which is in each person. So it-when he attained enlightenment, he said, "It is wonderful to see the buddha-nature in everyone of us." That was what he said when he attained enlightenment.

And buddha-nature is not some special nature which only human being has. In Buddhism, when we say "sentient beings," it include, you know, plants and stones and mountains and stars and the sun and everything. That is sentient being. So, in short, it is emptiness, you know. The ground from which everything comes out: stars and moon and everything comes out-that is, you know, emptiness. That is why we call-we put emphasis on emptiness. So emptiness could be sometime, tentatively Zen Center or America or Japan or this world or this cosmos, from which everything comes out. So purpose of our practice is how to take care of Zen Center, how to take care of America, how to take care of this world or this cosmos, and enjoy things from which appears.

I said we are mostly Hinayana Buddhists [laughs], you know, although we call ourselves-we think ourselves Mahayana Buddhist, maybe because we don't mind [laughs] so much about precepts, or we eat feed-meat and fish. That is why we, you may think-because we don't mind as a Mahayana Buddhist to eat meat and to eat fish, Mahayana Buddhist is not so lazy, you know.

So we are Mahayana Buddhist. But that is not [laughing] real Mahayana Buddhist, you know. Of course, you know, Mahayana Buddhist doesn't mind so much about any special given teaching.

But we should be, you know, we should not be caught by the idea of substantiality. To be caught by idea of substantiality means, you know, to become dualistic. When we put emphasis on emptiness, you know, in emptiness there is no dualistic idea. If you, you know, start to have dualistic idea of emptiness that is not emptiness. A dualistic understanding, you know, appears when you have some idea of substantiality. When you have id- [partial word]-some idea of duality-priest and officer, you know-officers-officers and students-that kind of idea is already very substantial-substantial.

Because there is students, there is officer who take care of students. Without students [laughs] there is no officer. But you may think, "I was once a officer of Zen Center." [Laughing.] He thinks, you know, he is always officer [laughs]. Very substantial, you know, idea. That kind of idea is not our idea.

In Soto school, you know, there is ridiculous things, you know, in giving some title to a person, you know [laughs]. I think only when I was in Zen Center, I am a teacher of Zen Center. I am a teacher, you know. If I go back to Japan, I don't think I can be a teacher any more because I am already too Americanized [laughs, laughter]. I don't know, you know, what is going on in America. So I cannot be a teacher, you know, if I go back to Japan. That is right, you know. I should be like that, you know.

If I think I am always teacher wherever I go, even though I join monkey teachers [laughing]-ridiculous idea, you know. I cannot be a teacher of a monkey or monkey group or teacher of fish. That is not possible, you know. So I should not have any special title, you know. But here, today, I shall be a teacher of you, you know. I think that is real teacher.

But people, you know, very Hinayanistic people think, "I'm always teacher. I am entitled as a teacher by Soto headquarters" [laughs, laughter]. That is very, I think, Hinayanistic teach- [partial word]-idea. And that is, I think-that is why I don't like sectarianism. But most people, you know, involved in this kind of misunderstanding. That is why it is-there is some difficulty in managing-in the management of the group. If we-we really become interested in Mahayana Buddhism, there is no problem of this kind.

Even though we are teacher and disciple, teacher and student, we are, you know, eternally friend of Buddhism. That is very important statement, I think. We are eternally, you know, friends. Tentatively, even though we have position, but we are eternally friends. This point should not be forgotten.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center tape transcribed by Sara Hunsaker (2/27/00).
Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican (5/22/00).

5 - Effort

Saturday, January 31, 1970

Effort
San Francisco

Our-our effort in our practice is quite different effort you make in our usual life. This point should be very clear for you, or else, you know, you-your practice doesn't work.

And spiritual effort is, at the same time, is very poisonous for us. Spiritual attainment is very, you know-sometime like a-like-will result ecstasy or sometime will result arrogance. And in this kind of, you know, spiritual arrogance or ecstasy is worse than materialistic arrogance, you know. You can easily [be] fooled by people by talking about something spiritual-so-called-it "spiritual," you know. If you-"This is very spiritual thing." If you say so, that is already very powerful, you know. And there is no need for you to give any evidence to it, you know. "This is spiritual thing." If you practice zazen you will understand it, or else you cannot understand it. I practiced zazen for many years, so I understand it. But you may not understand it. "But this is true!" [Laughs, laughter.]

You know, this kind of, you know, danger is always with us. So in Buddhism-Buddhist is very strict with this point. That is why-maybe why we practice something difficult.

The usual materialistic world in our usual life-materialistic world, we have enough difficulties [laughs]. So sp- [partial word]-in spiritual world, there should be, you know, more difficulties because we have to-not only we have to make effort to make progress in our practice, but also we have to keep ourself from various pitfall [laughs]-various desire-danger. So we have maybe much more difficulties in our spiritual effort.

But if you, you know, do it step by step, step little by little, then there is not much danger, you know. The effort is-effort we make in spiritual life, if you do it step by step, little by little as if you save, you know, money: 5 cent, 10 cent [laughs]-as if you walk from here to downtown step by step, then there is not much danger. When you want to achieve something all at once, you have various danger. We-we say "spiritual effort" or "materialistic effort," but it is not different thing. Especially in Buddhism, we deny, you know, materialistic world. We deny it. Why we deny it is to find out new meaning in materialistic world.

So Buddhism started by Buddha. He started his practice when he saw our human world which is very restless, which is very evanescent, where you cannot rely on anything. So he, you know, he deny it. It looks like very good, but actually it is not so good. This world is not so good. I think most of us, most of our students here realize this point and came to Zen Center and started our practice. The main interest comes-for you is because you cannot-because-the main reason for you to come is because you, you know, gave up or you resigned, you know, to make effort in this world. It doesn't make much sense, you felt. So you wanted to, you know, find out some meaningful-some meaning in our life. That is why you came here. And this is, you know-you-you came here denying this world-usual world.

But to deny this world does not mean, you know, to escape from this world. That is not, you know, possible for you, you know. As-as long as you are human being, as long as you are physical body, that is not possible. Even though you do to, you know, make a space trip, that [laughs] is not possible. You cannot escape from this world.

But still you deny it, you know. You don't satisfied with it. This kind of dissatisfaction bring you to find out new-new meaning of life. So materialistic understanding of life-when you, you know, took-we say you "resigned," but actually it is not possible to resign from materialistic world. And to-to find out some world means to find out another new meaning to materialistic world. So actually what you will do is the same, but meaning of it different. To find new meaning in our life, we practice zazen. And that is the Buddhist thought.

Every-teaching of "everything changes," you know, means because everything changes, and you cannot rely on it. And realizing that, we still make same effort and still live in the same world. But difference is before you attach to materialistic world and why you strive for in materialistic world was, you know, just to acquire or just to attain materialistic success in life. Before, that was your effort.

But after you realize-after realizing, you know, everything-the teaching everything changes, and you cannot rely on materialistic result, what you will do will be the same because you have to eat [laughs], you have to sleep. So, nearly the same. But difference is you don't any more attach to the success in materialistic world. And reali- [partial word]-enjoying materialistic world, you know, moment after moment when it was given to you, you know, to enjoy your life will be your purpose, your effort. Effort-point of effort will change. Before you sacrificed this, you know, moment of life for the next, for the future result-materialistic result, because you, you know, rely on it. But after you-after you deny that kind of result-after you don't attach to it, you will never sacrifice your present life for a future result. That is more Buddhistic way of life.

So Buddhists say "eternal present," you know, "eternal present." Moment after moment, our life is, you know, continuity of present-eternal present-present, present, present-without sacrificing anything. And that is more Buddhistic effort: how to enjoy our present life without, you know, sacrificing present is why we practice zazen. Ahh. It is rather-[laughs]. Do you understand? Does it make sense?

Here we are practicing, you know, zazen. But why we practice zazen is, of course, you may say, to attain enlightenment [laughs]. What is enlightenment? Usually you may say enlightenment-you practice zazen to attain enlightenment. So even though it is painful, you know, "I must sit because someday [laughs, laughter] I will attain enlightenment. So I must, you know, sit with painful legs." If that is, you know, your practice, I don't think that is Buddhist practice. I think you are fooled by [laughs] future success of your practice. It is like if I become a millionaire, you know: "I will buy you," you know, "whatever you want [laughs] when you-after, you know-after I become a millionaire." [Laughs.] "When you-you become a millionaire?" If someone ask, "I don't know when." That kind of practice is not our practice.

Here, I must continue something not so interesting story [laughs] to make clear our practice. Why we, you know, do not real practice, you know-why we cannot practice real practice is because we are so deeply, you know, deluded by our materialistic way of effort. Whatever we do, you know, even though you make spiritual effort, the effort you make actually is materialistic way. This is our very unfortunate destiny, maybe. Even when we practice Zen, you know, we are practicing our way with-by wrong ide- [partial word]-wrong idea.

Before I explain this point clearly I want you, you know-I want to make-I want you to make your confidence sure, you know. That is maybe the more appropriate. I tell you, you know, most of you will not have enlightenment experience. You may have, you know, but I don't know-one out of ten or out of hundred will attain enlightenment-enlight-[partial word]-will have so-called-it enlightenment experience. But if you continue our practice, even though you don't know, you make a big progress in your practice, and your character will change. That is, you know, one thing I can assure you.

So anyway, I want you to continue zazen practice. Don't give up zazen practice. You know, zazen practice is not-cannot be materialistic practice, you know. So when you, you know, want to give up, you know, your practice, it means that your practice became already very materialistic [laughs], you know. You are involved in materialistic idea of practice. So because you cannot see any progress by your five senses, because you ca- [partial word]-are not conscious of your progress, you know, you think it's better to give up. It means that your p- [partial word]-danger is there.

So when you-that is a big warning for you. So when you think: "Oh, maybe better to give up," then, you know, you should know that "I-my practice is-is involved in very materialistic practice," which you denied and started a spiritual practice.

And another thing is try to, you know, do everything in this zendo without waiting for someone's instruction. You should find out, you know, what you should do here. That is our way of practice. We do not give you instruction so much. And by yourself you should find out what you should do. This is very, you know, maybe difficult for you to understand, but there is reason why you should not depend on some one's-other's instruction. You should know, or you should find out your way by yourself, or else you will be involved in wrong practice. Maybe, without knowing what to do, to come to Zen Center [laughs] five months, six months looks like waste of time, you may say. But actually it is not so. And try hard what-how you should practice zazen.

My master, [1] you know, for an instance, had-didn't have so many students. But he did not give me any suggestion [laughs], and he didn't give us any, you know, lecture. What he did was-when he become impatient he scolded us, that's all [laughs, laughter]-only when he become impatient. So we, you know, we liked his scolding voice very much because we-we, you know, we know immediately what I should-we should do.

It is very embarrassing, you know, to-to be with him without [laughs] knowing what to do, especially when we visit someone's home, you know. For an instance, when we have-when we visit to observe memorial service for someone, you know, and when many visitors are there following him without knowing what to do [laughing]: where to sit, how to recite sutra, or how to hit bell, you know. Anyway in front of us there-there is-there were bell or mokugyo, you know, although we don't know what to do with it [laughs, laughter]. And, you know, if we don't know, you know, how to start, how to say, "Maka-hannya-haramita-shin-gyo," [2] he himself will start it [laughs]: "Maka-hannya-haramita-shin-gyo," he says, you know, he started, and look at us [laughs, laughter]. "What are you doing?!" We don't know how to, you know, manage bell or mokugyo. And if I don't he [probably gestures] [laughs, laughter]-very impulsive, you know. If no one watching us, it-it is-if it is only, you know, my teacher-our teacher and us, it is all right. Between us, that is usual routine, so it was all right. But if many people are watching us, you know, it is very embarrassing. But he didn't mind at all [laughs, laughter]. If I can-if we cannot do it: "Give me bell and mokugyo!" He hit by [probably gesturing [laughing]-just sitting behind him.

And we n- [partial word]-we didn't know what kind of sutra, you know, he may recite. So immediately after-before-when we start, you know, he-he said: "Take this sutra." So at that time we know, "Oh. This is the sutra we will recite today," you know. But we don't. [Laughs, laughter.] So he, you know, recalls, you know, almost by himself. We, you know, first one or two page we followed-we could follow and-and three, four page, we don't know what to say. So, you know, as much as possible we followed, you know, without voice. [Laughs, laughter.] But that is not possible at all, you know, so we [laughs]-eventually we will give up. We would give up [laughs, laughter].

But when we, you know, go home they may give us, you know, envelope. It is very, you know, bashful to receive envelope without [laughing] reciting sutra, you know, without doing anything. They may say dozo [laughs] very formal, you know, but [laughs] it was very difficult to receive it. But we have to receive it, so we did. That's all. That kind of thing was-were what I did when I was, you know, small-not so small, but when I was a novice.

I think this kind of experience, you know, was very valuable and helped me a lot. So it may not be so good habit, but I don't prepare so much, you know, for something I will do, you know, for-to-in-tomorrow or next year, you know. And I-I can find out what to do. I have some confidence, you know, to find out what I should do there when the day come.

For an instance, when I come to America, you know, I didn't collect any information about Soko-ji or America or San Francisco. I just came to San Francisco without any-knowing anything. And I was-I didn't afraid of anything [laughs]. I was-I felt very good making airplane trip, you know, and seeing San Francisco [laughs].

And when I arrived at San Fran- [partial word]-airport, many people were there, you know, to see me. And I went to Soko-ji Temple. Because I didn't expect anything, you know, because I did not have any picture of Soko-ji in my mind, so what-I felt very good anyway. "Oh, this is Soko-ji. Oh, this is Japanese restaurant" [laughs], you know. The first floor is parking place, and, you know, stepping up the high stair, we went to restaurant. "Oh, this is American restaurant." [Laughs.] Usually, in Japan, first floor is, you know, dining room. But here, you know, the first floor is parking [laughs, laughter] place. And an old, old lady appeared, you know, and said-half English and half Japanese-said something to me: "Oh, this is Japanese people in America." Everything was interesting [laughs]. And I could easily find out, you know, how to become friendly with-with those people. So because I have not much, you know, preconceived idea of America, so I didn't care Japanese people or, you know, Caucasian, you know-I didn't mind at all because I didn't have any idea of what we will do here.

This kind of, you know, attitude is very important. That is how you, you know, live in each moment, you know, to accept things as it is. So naturally, in your practice some day-sometime your practice will be very good [laughs]. Sometimes very drowsy, and sometimes very, you know, stiff, you know. But that is zazen, you know. There is no other zazen for you [laughs, laughter].

If you say enlight- [partial word]-"Someone had enlightenment experience. That is his zazen, not mine [laughs]. My zazen is," you know, "painful zazen," you know. "That is my own zazen. It is," you know, "rather foolish to compare my own zazen to someone's zazen."

When you, you know, detached-when you free from the ordinal [ordinary?] materialistic way of life, you will find out your own way of life, which will be materialistic pretty-maybe so. But that is-when that is your own practice, you know, that is not any more materialistic or spiritual practice. It is both spiritual and materialistic. Only when you say, you know-when-only when you analyze your practice it maybe materialistic or spiritualistic, or when you analyze-criticize someone's practice, you may say, "His practice is materialistic or very spiritual." That is only when you talk about someone's practice, you know, doesn't-which doesn't make much sense to you. We do not emphasize nothingness or emptiness. To-we do not deny, you know, or-yeah, deny someone's practice, you know, because we have some-some good practice instead. We deny someone's practice or our own practice. We are not-we cannot be satisfied with our practice, you know, or someone's practice, and we will be critical with our practice. But that is not because we want to-we have some good practice instead.

It is easy to criticize someone-someone-someone's practice, and most people do it. But, you know, if he ask you, "Then what is your practice?" you have nothing. What you have is painful practice, or drowsy practice [laughs], or stiff, you know, practice.

So we-sometime we-we should deny our practice to make some progress. That is all right to make some progress. But just to, you know, be critical with our practice and to give up, you know, our practice-to become very critical with our practice is very foolish [laughs]. Don't you think so? To criticize someone's practice when you have no power of advi- [partial word]-giving advice, or when you are ready to help him, when you are n- ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over]

... in everything, you know, new meaning in everything.

So anyway, the most important point is to live on each moment in the area-in some given area-in the area you live in. You should live with things you have right now and to find new meaning in it. That is our actual practice. The good example is our two-day sesshin [laughs]. In that way, you know, we continue our everyday life. Buddhist, you know, when we started-when Buddha started our practice, to not concerned things which we cannot see, you know. We are doing everything within the-within our reach, you know. That is world for us. There is no other world for us. You may say, you know, "this world or the other world-future world or this world," but there is no such world. Because you say, you know, "this world or that world," Mahayana Buddhist started to talk about that is the result of, you know, delusive substantial idea.

You-you think as if there are something else-where something else which you cannot see, you know. But we do not talk about-we do not put any consideration [in] something like that. When we say "whole world," whole world may be, you know, this room or zendo. That is whole world-sometime, maybe, this country or this earth or this universe. So according to the situation, "whole world" will be different, but when we say "whole world," the world we live is the whole world.

We are not philosopher, you know; Buddhist is not a philosopher. We are, you know, just, our practice, our life, is concentrated on this world which we see or which we hear. And within our reach we do everything.

So when you practice zazen, black cushion is your world, and no more world or nowhere to go [laughs]. With that, you know, understanding we should practice zazen. Then your practice will work. That is, you know, to say "to live in each moment or eternal present." This kind of world will continue eternally. Big world, small world, painful world, you know, happy world-one after another our world continues. And there is no connection between this world and the other world. Because there is no connection, we should [shouldn't?], you know, sacrifice our life for future life, and we should make our best effort in each world. That is our, you know, way of life.

So there is no me or no you, you know. Right now, black cushion is very colorful [laughs]. But when you go back to zendo, you know, your cushion is black [laughs]. And that is-this is one whole cushion in which you are sitting. For you, you know, this is cushion. For me, this is cushion. But you may say this is, you know-this cushion is, you know, common property [laughs]. But it is not so, you know. This is-this, you know, cushion-big cushion is for each-only for you, each one of you-not, you know, common property. That is each one of you, if you really understand what we are doing here. That is how you extend zazen in everyday life.

What time do you start next zazen?

Student: 3:40.

3:40.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997.
Checked against tape by Dana Velden (3/8/00) and Bill Redican (3/22/00).

[1] Gyokujun So-on.

[2] "Great Wisdom beyond Wisdom Heart Sutra."

1970 februari (7)

1 - Morning Sesshin Lecture

Sunday, February 01, 1970

Morning Sesshin Lecture
City Center

How do you-how do you like zazen? [Laughs, laughter.] And maybe-maybe better to ask you how do you like brown rice? [Laughs, laughter.] I think this is better question, you know. Zazen is too much.
[Laughs, laughter.] Brown rice, I think, just right. [Laughter.] But actually not much difference. [Laughter.] Zazen has strong f- [partial word]-zazen is strong food like brown rice. And I was very much interested in the way you eat brown rice. [Laughs.] I'm-I'm very much impressed, you know, the way you eat brown rice.

Can you hear me?

I think you, you know, naturally, when you eat brown rice, you have to chew it. Unless you chew it, it is difficult to swallow, so you chew it very well. Your mouth, you know, looks like a part of a kitchen [laughs]. You are cooking, you know [laughter, laughing], brown rice in your mouth and to be a very good food-tasty food. While you are, you know, chewing, actually brown rice become more and more tasty. So I think brown-your mouth-when you eat brown rice your mouth is kitchen. But usually, you know, I realize that usually our mouth is not kitchen when we eat. You know, we-no-when, for an instance, when we eat white rice, you know, we don't chew so much. We just, you know, put-put it in our mouth and without chewing so much. And feeling is so good, so it naturally goes to our throat. So we don't chew it.

I think Japanese people, you know-at first I understand our ancestors who are eating brown rice. But because white rice is easier to eat or taste good, so they become more interested in white rice instead of brown rice. But actually when you, you know, accustomed to brown rice, the white rice is not, you know, so tasty. We, you know-when you put it in your mouth, we think it is good, but that's all. No more, you know, variety or no more depth of taste. But brown rice-at first it is not so good, and it is difficult to eat-swallow. So while you are chewing, it become more tasty. And when it become tasty, you know, you-you hesitate to s- [partial word]-even to swallow because it is so good [laughs, laughter]. Brown rice has that much, I think, taste in it.

That kind of, you know-I think the brown rice is more-much more natural to our body-or digest-stomach, because our mouth originally is a, you know, a kind of, you know, not just-not just a part of organ to digest or to eat s- [partial word]-to chew something or to taste something, but also it is a part of organ to digest things. This kind of, you know, process of digestion should start from here, from our mouths, and naturally should be carried on, you know, to our tummy. And you know, we must think more about this. When we, you know, digest completely the food, what will become of it? It will [be] carried over, changing its chemical quality. It will, you know, circulate all of our body. And what will become of our body [laughs], is, you know, sooner or later we will die. [Laughs, laughter.] And from, you know, to eat brown rice is, you know, best, you know-you know, the most natural to our-to us who is, you know, changing one thing to the-to another.

Now when you eat white rice, you know, that kind of natural process will be disturbed by-by your mouth, you know, because your mouth stop chewing it, and stop cooking it, and stop changing it to-into something. Without changing it, your mouth will, you know, push the rice in your tummy. So there is some gap [laughs] in our organic process of activity.

This organic process is called-in one word, we call it emptiness, you know. It is, you know, we call it-our activity is-rice is-or brown rice empty because it will eventually die [laughs] with our body. But it, you know, it changes. And while it-it is changing, it carried on-it carries on our life energy. And this maybe called also emptiness.

Why we call it emptiness is-it has no, you know, form-no special form. It has some form, but that form is never-is never permanent. And there is no end in-in changing of its form [?]. So, you know, there is no other word than to call emptiness, you know.

We know we are empty, and we started to know now this earth is empty [laughs]. It is not permanent. We started feeling that way, you know, already. And then you may wonder, "What is this universe?" But this universe has no limit. If there is a limit to this earth, there should be something outside of it, you know.

So in one word, there is no other word, you know, emptiness-than emptiness. So emptiness is ultimate, you know, reality. And emptiness, you know, is not something which could be understand when you, you know, make a space trip, you know. Emptiness could be understood when you are chewing rice, you know, and when you are perfectly involved in chewing brown rice. And your world is, you know, with-with brown rice. That is, you know, actual emptiness.

But you may say that is not empty, you know. We are doing something. When you say so, we say that is illusive. You think in that way because of your illusive tendency. We have that kind of illusion. That brown rice has no form is, you know, right understanding [laughs], you know. And brown rice is always changing with us is right understanding. And, "Here is brown rice, and here is I who is chewing it," is elusive-illusion, which was caused by our illusive tendency of thinking.

But we-we have to completely-but or because, I don't know [laughs] which to say [laughs]-we must be, you know, completely involved in, you know, chewing rice when we chew rice. When you are chewing, you know, rice, if you think of white rice, you know, which you ate at some restaurant [laughs], that is-that is wrong practice caused by illusion-illusive tendency of making everything substantial being. White rice doesn't exist, you know [laughs]. What-that which exist for you right now is brown rice and you yourself. Nothing else exist. You may say, "This floor exist," you know. "This zazen room exist." But that is also actually illusion.

So we have to get rid of-we have to get rid of this kind of illusive practice, or else we cannot practice right practice. And at the same time, we should accept this illusive practice too [laughs], you know. We should accept it, knowing that it is illusion, you know. To know that is illusive practice-when you know that is illusive practice, that is not illusive practice. That is true practice. For the right practice it is illusive practice, but right practice exist because of your illusive practice. So our, you know, imperfect bad zazen is very important-very, very important.

If you seek for-if you try to perfect practice-if you try to practice perfect zazen only, ignoring your illusive practice, that practice is not true practice because even though you say "pure right practice," but that is illusion for you because that which you have is illusive [laughs]: brown rice, which doesn't taste so good. So even though-even brown rice, if you think-if you chew it so that we can get some delicious, you know, taste of it, that is for us also illusive practice.

So when you put brown rice in your mouth, [the fact] that you don't feel so good is, you know, there, you know, there is right practice. When you feel pain in your leg, that is the practice you have now. That is a practice you should strive for without, you know, thinking about some, you know, wonderful feeling of practice. That is illusion. So if you [are] caught by it [laughs], you know, you will lose your practice and you will hate your practice. So you lose-you-your practice will be completely [laughs] lost. Even though you continue that kind of practice for a thousand years, you will [not] gain anything. But even though you do not practice zazen, if you chew brown rice, if you accept brown rice and started to chew, you know, over and over, and you-and you-if you find true meaning of emptiness in each chew, then, you know, that is real practice. That is real zazen.

We say "Accept things as it is." Or we say "eternal present" or "emptiness" or "buddha-nature." The words-meaning of those words is, you know, quite simple. Understanding our life-positive way and negative way-and appreciating our life moment after moment, and completely satisfied with the surrounding, completely. And continue our life in this way is, you know, our practice. And Buddhism-Buddhism is there when we have that kind of practice.

Dogen-zenji says, you know, we like something which is not true, and we don't like something which is true [laughs]. I think that is very true [laughs, laughter]. We don't like something which is true. Something which we like is-mostly is not true because mostly it is just idea created by yourself, you know, and which will create some difficulty for you [laughing]-some trouble for you. And that is something by which you will be sacrificed.

So forever we are, you know-we cannot escape from our suffering, and there is no chance for us to attain enlightenment. But if you like it, that is another matter [laughs]. If you like it, it is okay. But you should know this is not true, you know. And if you know that is not true, you know, it means you accept-you have there reality. When you say, "That is not true," that is reality. Or when you say, "This is true," and "This is complete," you know, then that is not reality any more. There no such thing exist in this world. You-if you say, "This is permanent," that is also not true.

Something which exist is bound to change or bound to be-to vanish, you know. If there is something which does not, you know-which exist forever, that is not a true-true being. That is something-something wrong with it or with you, you know. Maybe mo- ... [Word and sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

To-to make further, you know, effort to understand things, that is to deny, you know, like scientist, you know, you deny the truth you found out-you have now, and, you know, deeper understanding of the truth is true denial. In, you know, Zen-Zen training is famous for its, you know [laughs], for its difficult-for its strictness. We are raised up, you know, under the scolding voice and slap.

But it does not mean you are no-you are, you know, useless or you should, you know, you shouldn't be here-you should go out. It means that, in other word, help-help you, you know, to find yourself more-to study yourself more. So we try to give you chance to find yourself more-to study more. If you go out, you know-if you run away [laughs], that's all, you know.

You are, you know-you know, also-you think if you go somewhere else, you know, you will find some good teacher [laughs]. But, you know, as long as you have that kind of attitude, you know, choosing or discriminate-discrimination, you will not have a good teacher. It is you which is wrong [laughs], not teacher. If you met with good teacher, you know, because you cannot accept good teacher because of your discrimination, because of your lack of effort to be yourself. Actually you are escaping from yourself, but that is not possible. If that is possible, you may find out some good teacher [laughs, laughter]. But that is not possible.

So the most important point is, you know, to deny yourself and to establish yourself in its true sense without establishing yourself on your delusion. So we say, "Establish yourself on yourself, not on your delusion." And without-but without delusion we cannot live, we cannot practice. So delusion is necessary. But delusion is not something on which you can establish yourself. It is like a, you know, stepladder, you know. You can use it, but you shouldn't stay on stepladder [laughs, laughter]. But without it you cannot, you know, climb up.

So with this, you know, confidence you must study our way. So that is why I said, "Don't run away! Stick to me!" But it does not mean [laughs], you know, stick to me [laughs, laughter]. It means stick [to] yourself, you know, not to delusion. Sometime I may be a delusion [laughs]. You may, you know, you may overestimate [laughs]: "He is a good teacher." That is already delusion-a kind of delusion [laughs, laughter], you know. I am, you know, your friend, you know. I am just practicing with you as your friend who has many stepladders [laughs, laughter].

So anyway, you know, we must-we cannot be-we shouldn't be disappointed with bad teacher [laughing], with bad students. Bad student and bad teacher, you know-if we-bad teacher and bad student strive for, you know, truth will establish something real, you know. That is our zazen, you know. We must continue to practice zazen and continue to chew brown rice. Eventually, we will accomplish something.

-----

Source: City Center transcript by Barry Eisenberg. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Jazmin Hicks (02/21/00) and Bill Redican (03/21/00).

2 - Afternoon Sesshin Tea Lecture

Sunday, February 01, 1970

Afternoon Sesshin Tea Lecture

Sunday, February 1, 1970

Sesshin is almost-sesshin has almost completed. In this sesshin, we have learned many things. I want to-can you hear me?-I want to, you know, say something about what I noticed.

Here we are-each one of us is a cook. In turn we work in the kitchen, and here, you know, in zendo we take care of this zendo by ourselves mostly. Right now, we carrying our stick in turn, and I want-I explained, you know, how to eat brown rice, you know. The more you chew it, you will have the taste of the brown rice. And in zendo, you are food [laughs]. You are rice and vegetables from various states, and we must cook ourselves [laughs], you know, some way. That is what actually we are doing.

I haven't realized how important the-to carry the stick is. I think that is actually not only carrying the stick, but carrying the stick is, you know, how to, you know, cook ourselves. It is actually to chew ourselves. But effect is more strong-stronger than just to chew. And as a, you know, at the moment you get slap, you know, you, you know, you-you die, you know, in past life and appears in new world.

We say, you know, "form is emptiness and emptiness is form." And Yoshimura-sensei,[1] the other day, explaining about soku ze-form-soku ze ku.[2] Soku ze means, he explain, that is "conversion"-the conversion, you know, without changing anything to convert one to the other.

Another thing is soku ze: when you get slap, at that moment big, you know, conversion take place in your practice. You will be-your experience of practice-your practice will change at that moment. You have-anyway, you that kind of feeling, you know, when-before-when you get stick, when you sleepy [laughs] you will wake up. That is, you know, conversion.

By repeating this kind of, you know, conversion many and many times, we can practice our way. That is to realize, you know, our teaching of "form of emptiness and emptiness is form." Form is emptiness is, you know, when you get slap and awaken in nothing-nothingness, where there is no you or no zendo or no black cushion. Rhha! [Laughs.] That is emptiness.

And from that emptiness, you know, you will have-you will start new practice. Your practice will be renewed by that. Our life should be like this. Whatever happen to us, on that occasion you must turn a new leaf for the quite refreshed life.

Even though, you know, cook is good, firewood cannot be a good dish, you know [laughs]. If you stick to too much idea of yourself, that is firewood-a log or pencil or stone in miso soup [laughs, laughter]. So when you, you know, forget about yourself or when you are ready to be, you know, cooked, then our practice will-real practice will take place.

So the moment you enter zendo, you should forget everything, you know, everything you have, and ready start or ready to start new life. That is, you know, how-this is how various teachers in China or in Japan explain what is "emptiness is form and form is emptiness." You are you, you know, even though you, you know [laughs], wake up. Without changing yourself, to have new meaning of life and to-to be involved in a new life is-new life completely is, you know, how form become emptiness.

And when we become very grateful for the emptiness, you know, we don't know what-what it is, you know. Emptiness is something which happen to us [laughs], not because of someone who carry stick, not because of you sincerity. I don't-we don't know why. But any-anyway, something that kind of great experience, great thing happen to us.

If you say this is because of this or that, that understanding is already dead understanding of vivid real understanding of emptiness. That kind of, you know-in this way, you know, the old teachers explained emptiness. Emptiness is something like-and that-from that emptiness, you know, like a flash everything quite new will appear. The flash of, you know, emptiness is, you know, you or I, or grain, or vegetables from [laughs] various state. That is just a flash of emptiness.

This kind of clear vivid understanding will happen, and as a slap. Shht! [Laughs.] It is, you know, something which, you know, happens to you. Even though you don't expect it, it happens. When you put your hand together, you know, you [laughs] you are like this! [Gestures; laughs, laughter.] And when you get it right, all of a sudden you become refreshed and you become new person [laughs]. Maybe in that way, I think, in turn it-it will be a very good idea if we carry stick in turn and, you know, give ourselves chance to, you know, to make conversion. Conversion-I-by conversion I don't mean from Christian to Buddhism [laughs, laughter]-from Buddhism or Christian-to Christianity, you know.

And that is, you know-especially this period when, you know, I listen to the slap, and I saw you, you know, quite refreshed. "Oh, this is," you know, "form is emptiness," and at the same time, "emptiness is form." And new, you know, form appears and as a slap. So we are doing very good job, you know, job. Kitchen is extended, you know, to zendo [laughs], and we eat brown rice by our own kitchen. And zendo practice is extended to kitchen, and I think our practice, you know, is almost complete. I am so happy to find out this point in our practice. I hope you will continue our practice without-without being caught by some elusive idea of practice.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center tape transcribed by Dana Velden (3/10/00) and checked by Bill Redican (9/28/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Ryogen Yoshimura-sensei was a Soto priest who came from Japan to San Francisco in 1969 (see Wind Bell, 1970, Vol. IX, No. 1, p. 30). He died at a young age after returning to Japan.

[2] Shiki suku ze ku. Ku soku ze shiki. "Form is emptiness. Emptiness is form"-from the Heart Sutra. shiki (form, matter); soku (immediately); ze (is); ku (emptiness).

3 - Relationship

Sunday, February 08, 1970

Relationship

Each time we-we start lecture, we recite "an unsurpassed, penetrating Buddha," and so on. This is the essential-pointing at essential teaching of Buddha. And it is not just opening of the [laughs] lecture. It is-this gyata[1] itself is perfect dharma.

When we start-before we start lecture, or when you-when someone start lecture, and when you listen to it, and when we speak and listener start to study Buddhism, we-we must have this understanding-perfect understanding. Only when we, you know, we give up the idea of "we," you know, and when we have converted in-"we" in its true sense, this dharma, whatever it is, something which take place in this classroom will be the perfect dharma-will be understood as a perfect dharma.

Usually most people, you know, although you may understand the teaching of selflessness [laughs], but actually, you know, all what we do is deeply or firmly based on the idea of self. You may think, "I am listening to-I have to study. I have to understand what he says" [laughs]. That is already-the idea-strong idea of self and strong activity based on idea of self.

When we give up this kind of self and go beyond the idea of "you" or "speaker," and understand you and speaker in only tentative being related with each other. That is, you know, real classroom for us. We are-relationship between I and you is not permanent one. That is just tentative one. Tomorrow, I don't know [laughs]. Maybe if one of you speak, you know, I-I must be a listener, you know, or student. So it is just tentative relationship. And we are also tentative being. So we cannot meet with-we cannot meet in this classroom in-with this relationship even one hundred thousand kalpas of time. Never we can meet, you know, in this relationship together. So we should not miss this moment. That is actually what this sutra means. And this is very important point.

When you discuss something, you know, usually, your discussion is always involved in strong idea of self. Discussion-your discussion to me is, you know, a kind of conflict of idea of self [laughs]. Why that kind of things happens is your understanding of discussion or group is not perfect. That is why we have-discussion does not, you know, is not so successful.

On the blackboard I see many, you know, circles. When we, you know, realize-realize each one of us or observer of the circles is, you know, empty-we are actually empty. I don't exist act- [partial word]-in its-actually, we don't-I don't exist. You may say, "When you see," you know, "I am here," that is something, you know-some idea of you. But actual-is not actual you. Actual you is, you know, you which, you know, says, you know, "I [laughs]-this is me." That is real you [laughs, laughter]. And "me" is object, you know, object of "I." So "I" is not something like that-something you understand "I." Something you understand "I" as "I" is already someone else [laughs, laughter]! So you don't exist, you know [laughs, laughter]. This is not, you know, tricky words. True words, you know. No one can deny this fact.

So there are many circles, you know. And when I don't exist, you know, I understand the circles. I or, you know, "true I," you know, will understand the relationship between those many circles, you know. If we understand-if we discuss something in that way, there is no problem, you know.

That relationship between those circles are same for everyone, you know. You see, you know, the circ- [partial word]-relationship between the circles, and relationship for you, and relationship between circles for us is always-is safe, you know. Why it is so is big self is observing it, you know. When you involved in, you know-but mostly when we start something about this organization or future plan of Tassajara, immediately you have big idea of self, you know. And you insist [on] your own idea without, you know, seeing the actual, you know, problem we have right now as we see those circles. This is so-called-it, in Buddhism, selflessness.

So when we practice something here, first of all what we should forget is idea of self. To forget idea of self is, as Dogen-zenji says, to be proved by everything. Here "everything" means Buddha. Everything. Buddha, which include everything, which unify everything as one. That is Buddha. And that is the one, you know, which see the relationship between those circles, you know, correctly. That is someone who is unify-unifies everyone's understanding of everyone. And everyone's understanding of circle.

So the individual reason doesn't work, you know, before you understand "you" in its true sense: who is-what is individual. And how we understand individual is putting ourselves, you know, understanding ourselves one of those circles, you know [laughs]. It is true, you know. When we say "I," you know, it is already object of-of observation. Observation of some unified one. So we should be one of those circles. And in this way if we observe ourselves and relationship between our- each one of us to this zendo, then we will have [laughs], you know, perfect discussion. When we discuss something, you discuss something- you are some special person [laughs], without knowing that you are one of the circle, you know. That is the teaching of interdependency.

Interdependency does not mean to observe things with our naked eye, you know, and see the relationship between things. Because you see your own naked eye, you are, you know, excluded. And you are completely- you are already mistaken as a big self- big unified self. You are committing big, you know, mistake. Or you are violating the teaching- fundamental teaching of Buddha, which is selflessness. If we can- but we can understand ourselves. There is no need to ignore ourselves. We can acknowledge ourselves on the blackboard. And we should be, you know- each one of us should be discuss, you know, at the same time, what kind of, you know, difficulty each one of causing, you know, for this group or this community. If we underst- [partial word]-- if we discuss this kind of humble attitude, then there is no problem. And then actual, you know, "I" is discussing the problem. Do you understand?

So first of all, we should recite, you know [laughs]- before lecture we should recite. And we should be unified by the absolute unified one. And put our hand together, and we should, you know, really- we should be really unified with- by the absolute one. Then we have no self, and we can discuss something without any idea of self. And we will realize- we will understand the true meaning of the teaching of Buddha.

So as a Buddhist, the most important thing is to realize the evanescence of life. And things changes, always, incessantly. And we must realize that nothing is permanent. Nothing exist in the form we see or color we see. To understand things like this is called "emptiness." So with emptiness of mind, we should start, you know, realize the tentative form and color of things, and how things are going. Then we will have actual reality.

So first of all, we should understand, maybe, you know, we should destroy our idea of substantiality of us or you, subject or object. And then we should, you know, put our hand together for the one- unified one which is Buddha. And then we should open our eyes, you know, and see things as you see circles in the black- [partial word]- on the blackboard. And if it is necessary we have to discuss about it.

So with this understanding, if we discuss things, you know, you- you may not attach to anyone's particular idea. And all of you easily, you know, agree with some conclusion. But one discussion, one conclusion is not enough. So, if possible, day after day [laughs] we must have discussion, actually. But if that is-if you feel that is not necessary, once a week or once a month we should discuss things. If we discuss things in this way, I think that is real individualism because we will find out ourselves in its, you know, own position. So there is order in understanding or Buddhist life.

First of all, we should give up small idea of self, and we should be humble enough to put our hand together and, you know, bow to the absolute one. And then we should depend on the true teaching of interdependency, and we should observe-or we should understand ourselves related with each other. That is interdependency.

Sometime, you know, you mixed up this order, and if you, you know, talk about-just talk about the teaching of interdependence without knowing the teaching of interdependency is based on the teaching which everything changes and the teaching of emptiness [laughs], you know, and discuss things, then it means that you are already started to-started to repeat same, you know [laughs], same trouble over and over again. So even though you make a great effort, it doesn't result anything. The more you discuss things, the more you get into confusion, and you will-you have to fight, you know, with each other-with, you know, a self-centered idea.

Naturally, you know, you have to reject many people from Zen Center [laughs]. All of you [?], you know-that is terrible thing-terrible thing will happen. Interdependency means we should not ignore anything. And we should understand the relationship between each one of us, including, you know, you yourself.

So with the most humble attitude we should discuss things. You should not [thumps mike three times] do so. Terrible thing. Big, big self, you know. [Laughs.] You should listen to, you know, everyone's opinion-way of observing things. "Okay." [Laughs, laughter.] Maybe if you don't do this, you know, maybe some time you cannot express yourself, you know, if you are like this. [Laughs.] "That is okay." If you want to say something like this, that is okay. And if you want to say like this "I think this is right" [mockingly using tense, constricted voice], but-but, you know, it should be-this should be also another form of practice of putting hand together [laughs]. If it is so, it is okay whatever you do.

You know, that is-to talk in this way is very easy, you know [laughs, laughter]. Actually it is not so easy. I think we are, you know, doing pretty well, I think. Because-I think that is because you practice zazen. When you practice zazen, even though you don't know what you are doing [laughs, laughter], but actually, you know, you are practicing this practice.

Even a, you know, flash of idea, you know, should be excluded, you know, in your practice. But if it comes, you know, already [laughs] it is too late, you know, to exclude it. So let it stay and, you know, wait until it goes [laughs], and resume your, you know, true practice. In this way, because you practice zazen, you are, you know-even though you seems, you know, are fighting, you know, actually you are not. And we should trust people first of all. Emptiness does not mean to ignore everything, you know. It doesn't mean vacuity.

So in this way, if you understand our life in this way you will find out how important it is to practice zazen-how important it is to be humble in its real sense.

-----
Source: City Center tape transcribed by Dana Velden (03/13/00).
Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican (3/22/00).

[1] Possibly Japanese for gatha (Sanskrit): four-line verse.

4 - The Background of Shikantaza

Sunday, February 22, 1970

The Background of Shikantaza
San Francisco

I think most of you participate one-week sesshin from tomorrow.[1] So far, we have been practicing counting breathing or following breathing. But maybe tomorrow-from tomorrow, in one-week sesshin, we will, you know, practice shikantaza.

I want to explain, you know, what is shikantaza. Shikantaza is, as you know-excuse me-just to sit, you know. We say "shikantaza." Just to sit. But there is-if you, you know, it is not proper or it is not enough to say "just to sit." For an instance, you know, everything is just there, you know. Things are just where they are. But that is not enough. If we say just things are just where they are, the relationship between things is ignored. When we think about the relationship between things, we will reach the idea of one whole being, you know.

We say "things," but actually things are already some divided materialistic and idealistic being. So before we have-when we have idea of things, you know, we actually have the idea of one whole being. And one whole being exist in the state of divided being. That is actually how things exist.

And things are incessantly, you know, changing. So, you know, time span-things is not just things as they are. It is changing as a one whole being. This point is-should be understood when we practice zazen. So Dogen-zenji says, "If your practice does not include everything, that is not right practice." That is why we, you know, bow to Buddha and why we, you know, call our practice-practice of Buddha's-Buddha's practice, not your practice.

But usually in counting breathing or following breathing, you feel as if you are doing something, you know-you are following breathing, and you are counting breathing. This is, you know, why counting breathing or following breathing practice is, you know, for us it is some preparation-preparatory practice for shikantaza because for most people it is rather difficult to sit, you know, just to sit. When we haven't good, you know, breathing it is rather difficult to just to sit. Of course, even though you have pain in your legs, that is just to sit [laughs], you know. Pain should be just pain. Not-much extra fancy [laughing] interpretation of pain. "My legs"-if you say "my legs," that is extra. "Legs" is enough [laughs, laughter]. Then pain is just pain, you know. Pain-if you pain, if you say "pain," the pain include everything. And if pain exist-pain exist just like pain as a whole being, that is not pain anymore. If there is nothing but pain, what is it? That is Buddha.

Actually, you know-but it is rather difficult to accept actual pain in that way. And as soon as you have pain you want to, you know, escape from it. Immediately you are involved in idea of self already, so that is not just to sit.

So Dogen-zenji's Fukuan Zazen-gi, you know, it-he says, "Originally we are enlightened. Why is it necessary to sit?" [Laughs.] There is not necessary to sit. Even though we don't sit, we are practicing zazen originally. But he says, "If there is slightest"-and this is not literal interpretation, but translation-but "if there is slightest idea of self," you know, "the true practice," you know, "will change into," you know, "quite different practice." Shikantaza cannot be anymore shikantaza if slightest idea appears in our zazen. Even though your-our practice is not perfect, if we haven't, you know, any idea of self, in other word, if we completely-completely devote ourself-selves to the practice, to the Buddha's practice, then without having any idea of self, that is shikantaza. And that is how we devote ourselves to the-to our practice. And to have this kind of spirit is to have way-seeking mind.

So if we want to practice shikantaza, first of all we should devote ourselves completely to the practice-to the practice of Buddha. So for us it is necessary, by all means, to give up the idea of self and devote ourselves completely to the Buddha's practice. That is why we wear, you know, robes. That is why we bow to Buddha.

The-on the other hand, we know, you know, how much idea of self [laughs] we have. When you do something, immediately we are involved in idea of self. The other day, you know, I think you have-most of you listen to Chou Kung[2]-[on] sadhana dhamma siddhi,[3] you know, in his [2-3 words unclear] of him [laughs]-he was explaining very well about shikantaza. But because he has not much time, so he-or, you know, he belongs to-he doesn't belong to our tradition, so he didn't explain what is-how we complete shikantaza. Instead of how-putting emphasis on practice, you know, without any-excuse me-giving up the idea of self and devote ourselves completely to the Buddha, he explained stage of, you know, attainment. That is, you know, if we, you know, acknowledge the stages that is still-it means that there is idea of self, you know-this stage, that stage-who attained this stage [laughs], you know, it-you attain, or I attain first stage, second stage, third stage. But when we give up idea of self there is no stage [laughs]. Whatever-there is no complete practice or incomplete practice, because whatever we do if there is no idea of self that is it. And he explained it very carefully about this point. I think you-you could understand what he meant: how idea of self arise in our everyday life and how we should understand our thinking mind which we have in the first stage of-stage of practice, you know.

And Buddha suppose to talk about dharma in his, you know, first stage, where he has still, you know, thinking mind-pure thinking mind. Pure thinking mind is, you know, without idea of self, you know. Mind moves, you know, like a wave-like waves, one after another. But there is no idea of self at that stage. In that stage, you know, we have pure thinking.

Why we say "pure thinking" is because there is no idea of self. That is to say, the images you have in practice, you know, in zazen, various image will, you know, come up from the subconsciousness, you know [laughs, laughter]. That is how, you know, you have images in your mind in zazen. But if images is just images and no idea of self is involved in it. "Oh! I have terrible images [laughing, laughter]. I must get rid of it!" That is already, you know, idea of self.

So we say when some images come, let it come-come up and let it vanish, or let-let it sink down. That is how, you know, we practice shikantaza. When you hear sound, you know, just hear the sound. Don't be bothered by it [laughs]. It may come from this ear and go out from the other ear-shhh [laughs]. That is shikantaza. And you shouldn't try to be so, even. Just sit. That is so important practice. To obtain clear mind and to be free from various difficulties we have, or to live without, you know, creating problems for us. We are always, you know, creating problem. I say "home-made problem" [laughs, laughter]-special, you know, problems. Very tasty problems! It is not just food, you know-very tasty [laughs] problems.

So if possible, you know, we should not create so tasty food. Putting too much sugar [laughs]-something like that. Something too fancy is, you know, same as something ugly [laughs]. We say-in Japanese we say, sugitaru wa oyobazaru ga gotoshi: [4] "too much is same as too little." [Laughs.] Same as not too much-not much. If it is too much that is-maybe that is worse than not enough.

This kind of, you know, practice is called middle way-middle way: not too much or not enough-just right. That is middle way. Or in Tendai [?], we say "tentative," or-what should we call it-ka-kai-kai means "tentative." Tentativity [laughs]. The thing we don't, you know, acknowledge things, you know, something-some with any substantial idea; it is something tentative, you know, because they are changing. When-even though we observe things objectively, you know, when we observe things-objective world we immediately seek for the relationship between things, you know: how A is related to B or C, and how the things related to ourselves-to ea- [partial word]-to ourselves. At that moment, the self is one of the objective being. You are observing you, you know, objectively. So that is already projected self, and you, you know, relate objective self to, you know, A or B or C and many beings and seek for relationship. That is how pure thinking works, you know. So self is there, not here. And self is always this side, not the other side. And self is not something different from objective world.

So there is no objective world or subjective world. That which exists is one whole being which is moving constantly. That is Dharmakaya Buddha. And if we observe more objectively, that is Sambhogakaya Buddha or Nirmanakaya Buddha, maybe, but those three bodies are one. Not different. So in this way we practice zazen. With this kind of idea, giving up all the idea of self, we practice zazen.

That is background of shikantaza. So intellectually you should clear understanding of things, and subjectively we should try to have best posture with best breathing, you know. When we devote ourselves in this way, that is shikantaza.

Do we have some more time? If you have some question-practical question [laughs, laughter], please ask me. Hai.

Student A: Yeah. I can't attend sesshin all week because I have to work. I was wondering if I was just able to come and sit in the mornings, very early?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, I think so. Have you applied?

Student A: For the sesshin?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student A: No.

Suzuki-roshi: No.

Student A: I should sign up?

Suzuki-roshi: As we have, you know, maybe 130-not enough seat, you know, so I don't know what to do.

[Silas Hoadley explains procedure (several sentences) for occasional sitting.]

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student B: Sesshin means "to gather one's mind." Can you talk about that for a minute?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah. I am-I don't know exactly, you know, sessh- [partial word]-what sesshin is, yeah, "to gather," but that is not so appropriate name. I think, you know, it is something to control mind. But actually, as I told you right now, it is different. The effort we make is not, you know, something to do something or to govern our mind or control our mind. To do it, you know, just do it without any idea of self is, you know, more like, you know-more appropriate interpretation of sitting. Of course, you know, to have goodshikantaza, we have preparatory zazen. You know, from old, old time, you know, we have that wo- [partial word]-that technical term, konpunjo. Konpunjo means "to enter," you know. That is started from Theravada practice, you know. To prepare for the first stage or second stage or third stage, they practice some special practice. Those practice is not the practice of the first stage or second stage or third stage, but to prepare for those stages.

So in-in one-week sesshin, maybe, you know, you may have, you know, some practice to prepare for, you know, good shikantaza. I think that is very good point, you know. We should not mixed up pure zazen and konpunjo, preparatory zazen. Kon is, you know, "kin"-"near," you know. Pun is "divided." So to-it is not the pure practice itself. It is different-it is divided practice from the pure practice, but it is very near to the [laughs, laughter] real practice. So, kon-pun-jo. But if you have complete understanding of zazen, konpunjo can be pure practice [laughs, laughter]. Some other questions?

Student C: I wanted to ask where does effort come in? That is to say, suppose we become part of [3-4 words unclear], but making an effort in that direction is shikantaza possible?

Suzuki-roshi: Good question. The effort, you know-I had-for a long, long time I had that problem. And-but I didn't ask anyone about it, you know. But the effort, you know, to continue, you know, the practice is allowable [laughs]. To make our practice pure is-effort to make our practice pure is allowable. If something comes out, you know, let it come out-come up. Without some effort, you cannot do that [laughs]. If you, you know-this, you know, stuff [probably gesturing] is, you know, standing like this, but if it-if it stand just like this, it is not our practice. When it is supported by, you know, invisible, you know, relationship, then this is completely supported.

So how we keep, you know, those invisible relationship is maybe belief or prayer [laughs]. "Let me have pure practice." [Laughs.] "Even though we don't know what it is." [Laughs, laughter.] "It is too much to know," you know, "the relationship, but let me be like this." [Laughs.] That kind of effort is necessary. If it doesn't, you know, go this way or that way, you know, it doesn't be like this. It is not-it cannot be like this, and so when your zazen, you know-there must be that kind of feeling. Why-that is why we stretch our neck, you know, as if your head is going upwards [laughs] to the heaven. And your back should be straight, as if your back is deeply rooted to the center of the earth. Shhww. [Laughs.] That kind of feeling should be in ourshikantaza. That kind of feeling is not the feeling, you know, when we intensify our practice, but, you know, some spirit-spiritual feeling.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Checked against tape and made verbatim by Dana Velden and Bill Redican (2/15/01). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] The sesshin started the next day.

[2] Probably a guest teacher at Tassajara.

[3] sadhana (Sanskrit): In Vajrayana Buddhism, a text describing meditative techniques of visualization and contemplation of shunyata (emptiness). dhamma (Pali) = dharma (Sanskrit). siddhi (Sanskrit): especially in the Vajrayana tradition, perfect mastery over the powers or abilities of the body and of nature.

[4] sugitaru (too much); wa (is); oyobazaru (too short or too little); ga (is); gotoshi (alike).

5 - Sesshin Lecture #1

Monday, February 23, 1970

Sesshin Lecture #1

Selflessness, Being and Non-Being: The Background of Shikantaza

San Francisco

In this sesshin I suggested to practice shikantaza. For-anyway for beginner, you know, it doesn't make much difference [laughs]. I am sorry to say so, but shikantaza or counting breathing-it doesn't make much sense. But anyway, you know, to have strong determination to sit, you know, for seven-six days is enough, you know. If you have that much conviction in your practice I think that is pretty good.

So anyway, those who just started practice zazen, don't give up, and [laughs] stay six days. And it is also good to practice counting breathing, you know, whether you are counting, you know, like you count something, you know-1, 2, 3, 4-that is also good. But I want to give you some fundamental understanding of teaching of Buddhism.

Zazen practice, our zazen practice is based on-can you hear me?-based on the teaching of shunyata or emptiness. If you do not have a thorough understanding of emptiness, even emptiness intellectually, I don't think you can practice our way in its true sense.

Last time, before sesshin-last Sunday[1] I explained about the background of our practice-to have strong belief in relationship between each one of us to various things. I said-if you do not have this kind of understanding, your practice, even [though] it is, you know, very good, may be some casual [laughing] accidental good practice. When your practice is, you know, understood by you completely, and when you appreciate your good practice, you know: "Oh, this is," you know,"shikantaza." If you understand in this way, that practice is-means, you know, something, but even though you have, you know-you experience good experience, if that is, you know, some- [partial word]-something just happen to you by accident [laughs], that is not true practice. Why we, you know-why we have gratitude in our practice is because we feel, you know-this is my-this is Buddha's practice and this-this is-this has been the practice-all our teachers' practice, and I could have same experience, you know. If you feel in that way, you know, the meaning of the attainment is quite different. You may say whatever we do, if we have buddha-nature [laughs]-if we have buddha-nature, you know, all [of] what we do is expression-should be expression of our buddha-nature. But when you say so, you know, your understanding of buddha-nature-your understanding of your experience is not the understanding which Buddha had. So I think I must explain about this point more, and explain why our practice-background of our practice should be the teaching of emptiness.

Before Mahayana Buddhism arise, you know, of course, as a Buddhist no one supposed-no one is supposed to have idea of self, you know, because Buddha's teaching was the teaching of selflessness. So no one could say, you know, anything about teaching of-based on idea of being or self. But before Mahayana practice arise or understood, their practice tend to be the practice of annihilation or practice of attainment. In other word, to-by annihilating our desires-evil desires, and we attain some stage, you know, that is more Theravada-like practice and understanding. But although they did not believe in self-small self, but actually their practice [was] involved in the practice based on the idea of self. Why it is so is-as long as you, you know, recognize evil-good or evil desires, you know, like something which exist actually within yourself, that means, you know, you recognize self with- [partial word]-small self within yourself because you have-you have small self instead of big self, you know. You acknowledge good nature or bad nature or good desire or bad desire-to say "good" or "bad" is already small self, you know. So even though they do not say selflessness-they do not say-they say selflessness, actually they are accepting small self, and their practice is-was based on small self.

So the more you-you attain some stage-annihilating-not annihilating, but overcoming evil desires and attain some higher stage, you know, your small self [laughing] will become bigger. That kind of practice is not, you know, [in] accord with Buddha's practice of-Buddha's practice which is based on the idea of non-self.

Why we, you know-small self arise is because you, you know, understand things as if things exist, you know. When-why you are disturbed by the sound from outside, you know, that is because you recognize motor car outside. "There is motor car," and some, you know-some hot [-rod?] driver [laughs, laughter] is making that kind of sound, you know. So why you are disturbed by the sound is because you have some substantial idea about things-objective thi- [partial word]-being, which is not actually exist, you know. This is the difference, you know, between so-called-it Hinayana Buddhism and Mahayana Buddhism. The Mahayana Buddhist do not, you know, accept the idea of being. Being is at the same time non-being. It is being, you know-in a smallest particle of time it is being, but it-as it doesn't exist in that way always, so it is non-being. So common people is not always common people because he may at- [partial word]-he may be a Buddha. Buddha is not always Buddha, you know. Even Buddha, he is a human being [laughs], you know.

We understand things in that way. When we understand things in that way, that understanding can be understanding of non-being and non-self-no self. So how we practice zazen without being disturbed by anything is to know things in its-to understand things even intellectually. Both way-being and non-being, because, you know, sound is-actually you hear, so that is being, but at the same time it is non-being. So there is no reason why we should be disturbed by it. If you-if your practice ready to hear sound as being and non-being, you will not be disturbed by it. If you are disturbed by it, you know, you should know your practice is not, you know, good enough. And-but there is no reason why you should, you know, reject the sound you hear or the confusion you have in your practice.

So you sh- [partial word]-can accept your confused practice disturbing by outward objects. That is, you know, real practice. When you have that kind of understanding which is understood by our ancestors, and patriarchs, and teachers-if you have this kind of experience of detachment you will, you know, say-"Oh, this is it. This is Buddha's practice. This is Buddhist practice." Like a fish, you know, in-in aquarium [laughs]-Golden State Park there is a big fish and they-they looks very clever. If they eat something wrong [Off-mike: "Pardon me

Roshi, you have to hold the microphone that way." [laughing]-not working?-[Off-mike: "It's working if you don't point it at them."] [Laughs, laughter.] We are-I am not so wise as fish, you know [laughs, laughter]. A fish-when they do something wrong, you know, they, you know, swim the other direction [laughs, laughter], you know. As long as they are doing something good they go on and on [laughs], and just before he hit his head against window they caught [laughs, laughter]. That is, I think, enlightenment. And they are always, you know, happy, you know, to have that kind of way or practice.

So, you know, if our zazen could be like their practice, that is, I think, good practice. But I think our practice is very, you know, casual and frivolous: sometime good, sometimes it is not so good. And when it is not so good, we will be very much discouraged, you know. So there is no constancy, or there is no relationship between today's practice and tomorrow's practice and their practice. Fish's practice-there is always, you know, continuity [laughs]. They are doing exactly what they should do, and they enjoy very much to, you know, to avoid problem. In avoiding problem, maybe they are doing intuitively. In avoiding problem, they-looks like some joy and continuing some-their own way, they also have joy. That is, you know, the difference between so-called-it freedom and freedom in its-in its true sense, or buddha-nature in its true sense and buddha-nature in some hasty understanding of buddha-nature.

We say whatever we do, that is expression of buddha-nature. It is so, but there must be, you know, a oneness of various practice. Good and bad is one. Successful or unsuccessful practice should be one. Figuring out why today's practice was not so good, you can try, you know, to have good practice. Then there, there is practice in its true sense.

So how you make this kind of effort is to have right understanding of practice, and checking up your practice and to continue good practice. Without knowing, you know, what is right practice and what is not, it is difficult to make your effort. When you have-when you understand-when you have some understanding of practice, you can make effort in its true sense in your practice. I think this point is very important. Then, you know, whether your posture is perfect or imperfect, there is some feeling, you know, in your posture. When your practice is continuous practice of Buddha, then there is some power or feeling in your practice. If you don't have it, you know-even though your posture is right, you know, your practice is dead. There is no feeling in it. It is just like a beautiful artificial flower [laughs]. Even though flower is not so beautiful, if it is natural flower, you know, you have some-you will have some encouragement from when you see the flower.

So before you understand what is non-self or selflessness, it is necessary to understand, maybe, teaching of non-being. Nothing exist, although it exists, but on the other hand, it is not permanent. It is tentative being, including ourselves. We say "self"-if we-when we say "self," it is already self projected outside of yourself. It is objective self, not true self.

So that kind of objective being is-is not constant, not substantial. It is projected figure of something, or you may say it is just tentative form and color of something great. Or you may say it is like a wave in the ocean. Wave doesn't exist-it exist, you know [laughs], but actually if someone ask you what is wave, it is difficult to answer. So you will give up to seek for what is true self, you know. True self is always [laughs] on your side. It cannot be object of anything. It is always subject. It is always independent, and it is universal to every phenomenal being.

So to seek for self, you know-selflessness, what is selflessness, is vain effort. It is much better not to do it [laughs]. When you start to seek for what is selflessness, you-it means that you are seeking for, you know, small self, and that is big mistake. So in your practice, you know, that is why we say don't be involved in gaining idea, you know. There is-when you try to annihilate small self, you know, it means that you are-you recognize small self which is outside of your self and trying to, you know, make it your own [laughs]. That is vain effort. That is why we say, you know, don't try to attain enlightenment. [Sentence probably finished. Incomplete lecture: The rest of the lecture was not recorded.]

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Checked against tape by Dana Velden and Bill Redican, August 17, 2000.

[1] SR may have been referring to lecture SR-70-02-22, which was given on the Sunday before the sesshin began.

6 - Sesshin Lecture #3

Wednesday, February 25, 1970

Sesshin Lecture #3
Non-Dualistic Practice

San Francisco

Yesterday I talked about how to, maybe-two ways of practice: one is zazen practice under the guidance of the right teacher, and the other is how to extend our practice in our everyday life. And the-it-our teaching mostly-especially Mahayana Buddhist teachings-mostly directed how to extend our practice to our everyday practice.

The teaching of emptiness or teaching of interdependency-those teaching are to explain how, you know, from our practice which is non-dualistic-to be extended dualistic everyday life. And that was what I told you last-yesterday.

So in our practice, you know, our practice is not the practice to attain something, you know, but to start our practice from the beginning, jump-jumping into the non-dualistic pure practice. That is our practice. [Sounds like tape was stopped here and then started again.] Without, you know, realizing there is nothing to depend on and even ourselves-our physical body is transient, so we cannot depend upon ourselves physically and mentally.

And things exist looks like permanent, but it is not so. It looks like existent, but it is nonexistent, and that is true. With this understanding, we devote ourselves completely in our practice. That is our practice. Then your question may be what kind of effort, you know, you should make to practice that kind of practice of non-attainment [laughs]. That will be, you know, your, you know, question.

I told about it a little bit, you know. Our effort is not like some effort to achieve something, or to carry something or to run a race, you know [laughs]. It is not, you know, that kind of effort. The effort-mostly, you know, directed-excuse me-[adjusts microphone]-it [the mike] should be directed this way, you know-our effort [laughs, laughter]-not that way. Usually, you know [loud laughter: mike probably swung around toward students again]. Your effort is directed that way [laughing, laughter]. From inside to outside. But our effort should be directed this way, you know [laughs]-inward-inwardly, you know. To-to direct our effort inwardly means, you know, to have big mind, you know. If you have big mind, which is no outside [laughs] of it, there is no way to direct it this way [sounds like he is aiming mike away from himself]. It is not possible, because there is no outside of it. Whatever happen-things which happens is always happens within ourselves. That is why we say our practice is non-dualistic practice.

If, you know, when you direct your effort, you know, outward it means that your effort is dualistic. How to practice non-dualistic practice is let things happen, you know, within ourselves and without disturbing by it. Because things happen within our big mind, so our big mind couldn't be disturbed. Things which is going on-which are going on is, you know, always inside ourselves. That is so-called-it perfect acceptance. That we don't say good or bad means, you know, things happens within ourselves as a movement of big self. Then whatever the movement is, that is movement of the big self, so we cannot say good or bad. The-fundamentally, with this understanding, we practice zazen.

I already explained the idea of self or idea of being is not perfect understanding. So when we have right understanding of things, you have this kind of perfect understanding of non-duality too. But here is, as you see in Fukan Zazen-gi, [1] if there is slight, you know, mistake or misunderstanding arise, then our practice-the difference between our practice and true practice will be like heaven and earth. Completely different. We will be involved in-involved in a quite different practice.

This, you know, slightest mistake does not mean-no, when to hear some sound from outside, you know, or to be caught all of a sudden drowsiness, or to have difficulty in painful legs. But, you know, the difference between wrong practice and right practice, when you have, for an instance, painful legs, it is maybe rather hard [laughs]. Let painful legs, you know, be painful [laughs]. That is, you know, how you practice zazen.

In Meiji Period there were famous Zen Master called Nishiari Bokusan. [2] When he was-he was-what was the name?-anyway, epidemic, you know, and he-he was hospitalized, but he was still, you know, hanging some book from the ceiling [laughs]. Lying in his bed, he was reading koan [laughs, laughter], and doctor said you must not read, you know. And he didn't mind, you know. "My mind is reading. Let it read [laughs]. My body is suffering. Let it suffer [laughs]. It's okay," he said.

There is-I think there is some suggestion, you know, how you control or how you practice zazen. Let it completely go as it goes [laughs]. Of course there is some technique, you know, which is very difficult to explain. Some technique, you know.

There is-in his time there was another great Zen master called Morita Goyu,[3] who was very gentle. And the other Zen master was very short-tempered [laughs] Zen master. It was very good contrast. And he was, you know, a kind of person always calm and always practicing his way. Once his, you know-once he was crossing the narrow[s] between Honshu Island and Hokkaido Island, and they met a big typhoon. And, you know, their ship almost wrecked and, you know, by wave. And almost all the people, you know, including crew, you know, get sick [laughing]. But he was practicing zazen. He-he didn't mind at all. He didn't get sick when, you know, all the crew were sick. And the captain came to him [laughing] and [was] amazed, you know, seeing a person who is sitting zazen in, you know, in a ship like a leaf in the, you know, ocean.

To have-to have this kind of practice, it is necessary to switch, you know, to switch your way of life completely to another channel, you know. Shht! [Laughs, laughter.] Because you don't do that, you know, you suffer a lot, and you-you will suffer from sticky mind [laughs, laughter]. You get into confliction. If you put it aside, you know, and see what will happening [laughs], nothing happen! [Laughs, laughter.] Because you do not, you know, switch your channel of life to the other, you have difficulty. That is one. Secondary, you know. After you could, you know, switch over the channel to the other, you should have-you shouldn't go back. That is-to switch one channel from the other is difficult. But more difficult thing is to continue that, you know, practice after switching over to the right practice-to the non-dualistic practice.

Mostly when we talk about difficulties of practice, we talk about the difficulty of continuing the practice-how to continue that practice. That is why we, you know, put emphasis on perseverance or endurance. Especially, you know, most part of our practice is directed to-to continue this kind of practice, but even though it is difficult to switch the channel, you know, but [laughs] if you sit, you know, so long time as six days, you have chance, you know, you have chance if you try hard. So if you realize, if you have-if you find out this is the way, you should find out the way how to continue it-how to extend in our everyday life. And the way to extend non-dualistic practice to dualistic everyday life was-is what I explained previous two lectures.

We-to switch, you know, over the channel is so-called-it, is, according to Dogen-zenji, is jikige shoto[4]-to say "Hai!" [Laughs.] That is the secret. When you are ca- [partial word]-when someone call you by name, "Hai!" [Laughs.] That is how to switch over the channel. If you think when you are called, you know-if you think, if you hesitate to say "Hai," you will lose the chance to switch over, you know. If you do it quickly [laughs], you can do it like you catch fish, you know [laughs]. [Sounds like he makes a quick grabbing gesture.] If you do like this [laughing]-escape, you know. Shht!

So you shouldn't give yourself to escape from, you know, the chance to switch over. Jikige shoto. Even though you are not called by your name, you know, to observe things like a flash, you know, that is non-duality. If you hesitate, you know, more and more you will be caught by sticky ideas, and you cannot move about. And if you lose the chance, the more you will suffer from the sticky things [laughing]. And the more you suffer, the more the things can be sticky. So to do something in a flash of light is the secret. And if that is just casual, you know, success it doesn't make much sense. Knowing that what is dualistic practice and what is non-dualistic practice-and to-to say "this is it," you know, to feel confidence in your experience is necessary.

So even though you have, you know, because of some reason you haven't good practice, you know, if you know that is-if you know the-what is real non-dualistic practice, still your dualistic not-so-good practice is working.

To explain in this way is, you know, maybe not so difficult, you know-if you have little-a little understanding of non-dualistic practice it is not so difficult. But to continue it until you can do it without much effort is difficult, and you should be very patient, and you should continue same way of life for many years. This is also the difference between usual practice and our practice. We put emphasis on the habit we do something, you know. If you can do it without thinking, like a kind of habit, then we say-he is pretty good. When you reach that stage or that-that much training, then even though you say something-something mean, or even though you are very angry, you know, there is some flavor [laughs] of non-dualistic practice.

That is so-called-it "way downward." The way upwards, after attaining-after having some experience of non-dualistic practice, and to continue it until you get accustomed to it and until you can do it without making effort. That is way upward. And way downward-to help others is sometime, you know, you should be angry, you know. But actually that anger is different from usual anger. The meanness you behave is not same as usual meanness.

So, in short, Zen is not knowledge, you know-something to study intellectually by reading or listening lecture, or to have some special experience. But important thing is to be able to continue it without making much effort. More natural ... [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

... the way upwards and the way downwards is to go further to the ground. To go back to our dualistic life and live with dualistic-live in the world of duality with some flavor of non-duality. And that is the practice after you get accustomed to our way. So [laughing] actually takes time [laughter].

I am saying-I don't say so to keep you in big building [laughs], you know, but if you are involved in hasty idea of practice-way of practice, you know, or if you discouraged and give up, or if you stop practicing our way when you have some understanding of it, then you will not accomplish our Soto way. I said Soto way, but because this kind of practice is called by people Soto way [laughs]. Actually for Dogen-zenji, there is no Soto school or no Rinzai. He points-point at many Rinzai teachers as a good teacher. Even though he belongs to Soto lineage, if he-his practice is immature he didn't accept [laughs].

There is koan[5]-by-by-Tozan-zenji,[6] you know, Tozan-zenji and-Tozan-zenji is supposed to be founder of Chinese Soto Zen. And he and his brother disciple were taking a walk, and they met-when they were walking a hare, you know, cross the road. And Mishihaku,[7] his brother disciple, they studied their way under the same teacher, Ugan Donjo. [8] He is Sixth Patriarch-[counting patriarchs' names to himself]-Daikan Eno, Seigen Gyoshi, Sekito Kisen, Yakusan Igen, Ugan Donjo-fifth generation from the Sixth Patriarch, so Eleven[th] Patriarch. Ugan. They were good friend, and the were walking. And hare crossed the road, and Mishihaku, his brother, said, "Oh, how swift it is," you know, "swift or alert it is!" And Tozan started, you know, question and answer: "How swift is it?" [Laughs, laughter.] Tozan asked him, you know, how swift is it. And Mishihaku said, "It is as swift as a commoner," you know, "became a minister" [laughs]. Common city people became a minister so swift it may take many, many years, you know, or many more lives [laughs]. But hare, you know, became a minister in a minute. Shht! [Laughs.] So-it is so swift. So alert. He is so alert, he said. It means that, you know, evil desire is good desire; Buddha and, you know, common people not difference-not different.

We are, you know, originally Buddha. There is no difference in between original-originally there is no difference between Buddha and we ordinary people. So without, you know-it doesn't take time, you know, for us to become a buddha because we are originally Buddha [laughs]. That is non-dualistic practice. Swift, you know. There is no need to make effort because we are originally buddha. When we think so, it is so.

And Tozan said, you know, to him: "Oh, you are-you look like a great Zen master, but what you said was very slow [laughs], very dull. I thought you are a greater Zen Master," he said. So his brother asked back, "Then how swift is it, you think?" you know, he said. And Tozan said, "Old, old hairpin," you know, "given by mother"-he didn't say so elaborately-"old hairpin and comb-beautiful old hairpin and comb was broken" [laughs]. "Was broken," he said. Do you understand? [Laughs, laughter.]

According to Tozan-zenji, you know, that was much swifter than a commoner to be a minister in a minute. That is the way downward [laughs]. To be a, you know, beautiful-to be a minister is way upward, and to-to be a, you know-to be a broken treasure which no one pay attention to it is, you know, much swifter way. To, you know-it is for him-if that is possible, you know, to go up and to come down is very slow. So from the beginning, you know, to go directly to the common, you know, world is swifter [laughing]-shortcut, without going up and down. Shht!

Anyway, you know, even though they are beautiful comb and hairpin, anyway it will be broken down by children, by grandchildren. So it may be much better to be broken hairpin from the beginning, so you don't care-you don't care what they treat it. There is no need to say "Be careful!" [Laughs, laughter.] "Keep them out of the children," you know. There is no need to say so. So that is much better [laughs]. Tozan said "old hairpin and comb."

I want you to, you know, understand our way in this way. We have now many new students who is involved in hasty [laughs] way of practice. Many people, you know, I think may ask me "how to practice zazen." [Laughs.] "I have too many ideas. My mind [is] confused. How," you know, "to get out of it in our practice?" But that is not, you know, so easy. It is difficult to tell you how, and-but if you continue your practice, you will have time to know what it is.

There were one-one more things-one more thing which I wanted to tell you, but I forgot. [Laughs, laughter.] Maybe better to forget. [Laughs, laughter.] And this will be-tomorrow perhaps Katagiri-sensei will continue this lecture. [Laughs, laughter.] So he may tell you, you know, what it was. I thought it was something which is very, you know, difficult, you know, to tell you. Or which is something which-it was something which I don't want to tell you. [Laughs, laughter.]

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Checked against tape and made verbatim by Dana Velden and Bill Redican (9/28/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Broad Recommendation of Zen, by Eihei Dogen. His earliest exposition on Zen, written in 1233, shortly after his return from China.

[2] Nishiari Bokusan [also Bokuzan] (1821-1910): the most prominent Meiji scholar of the Shobogenzo. He taught Oka Sotan-zenji and Ian Kishizawa-zenji, eventually becoming abbot of Soji-ji and head of the Soto-shu.

[3] Juko Morita Goyu was the 64th abbot of Eihei-ji. He is known as the "Double Founder" because of his work in restoring Eihei-ji.

[4] jikige (Jap.): immediately; shoto: to agree, to admit.

[5] Book of Serenity, Case 56: "Spiritual Uncle Mi and the Rabbit."

[6] Tozan Ryokai (Dongshan Liangjie): 807-869.

[7] Referred to in the Book of Serenity, Case 56, as Ch'an Master Sengmi of Shenshen in Tan Province.

[8] Ungan Donjo (Yunyan Tansheng): 780-841.

7 - Last Lecture of Sesshin

Saturday, February 28, 1970

Last Lecture of Sesshin
Practice to be Like a Stone

San Francisco

Before we sit, six-day sesshin was too long. But after we completed, it was too short [laughs, laughter]. I think you feel, you know, quite different feeling. For an instance, when you walk, you know, you have quite different feeling. You feel as if you-your legs have become shorter [laughs, laughter], and your legs stick to floor, you know, and you feel very heavy [laughs] in your walking. It should be, you know, great joy for you, you know, when you completed such a long torch,[1] you know. But, you know, it is strange, you know, not to have so much joy, you know. I think that is because you have more composure in your feeling. And this is, I think, important.

Zen student is not, you know, so expressive, you know. Mostly they keep silent. They do not walk so fast. They don't act so actively, you know. You know, they have some-something, you know-something different, anyway. Especially when you sit for so long time, you yourself feel you changed a lot. You feel, you know, it is difficult even to smile [laughs]-even to say something, you know. That will be the feeling you have. And if you continue your practice, you will be more and more so. And even though you will not change into a strong buddha [laughs, laughter], a great change will happen to you, you know, and you will be someone which you didn't like at all. "I don't want to be like this." [Laughs.] But although this kind of experience is not the experience you wanted to have, but this is the experience anyway you will have through [laughs, laughter] zazen.

But there is-there is no need for you to worry, you know, because this is the way, you know, upwards, and soon you will find out the way downwards, and you will find yourself in the city again as a normal person. So there is nothing to worry, but in zendo it is necessary for us to have this kind of experience through practice.

And I think one or two years we must devote ourselves this kind of practice. If you go to Tassajara, you know, even more so. And Tassajara itself will have a kind of feeling of practice center more and more. When you see this kind of practice, you may say-or people may say, "Zen practice is not for us" [laughs]." You know, you may not like it. But by the time you have a Caucasian, you know, old Zen master, you will have found out exactly what is Zen.

So I want you to be patient enough to continue this kind of practice. And it is important for you to take care of this kind of feeling and gradually extend this kind of unperturbability [imperturbability] of mind to our everyday life. When you start to work on this point, to establish, you know, to extend our practice to everyday life, you will understand-you will understand the teaching-our teaching. Or you will understand what is meant.

Oh-my voice is not-I am relying on this [the microphone] now [laughs]. Can you hear me? Oh. I am sorry [laughs, laughter]. Excuse me. Is it working?

Yvonne Rand: The part of it that makes your voice louder [the amplifier] isn't working.

Mm-hmm.

Yvonne Rand: So you have to do it yourself.

So I want you to keep, you know, this kind of practice for more than two years, at least, you know. Be-practice to be like a stone [laughs]. Actually, you know, in this training period-in this sesshin, I found several student who almost changed into a stone [laughs]-almost, not quite. But I think that is good, you know, attainment-good progress, I think. But we do not practice our way to be a stone. That is what will happen to some students, not all of you. The way we practice zazen is different according to the, you know, personality of the person. But what will-what we will attain is the same.

As a Zen teacher, there is no special, you know, image. We have various kinds of, you know, teachers, but they have some quality as a Zen teacher. The quality-in this point, they are quite-they are almost same, but they have-they do not lose their character. So it is not, you know, possible to understand Zen just by, you know, hasty way of observation. It takes-I think it may take a pretty long time before people in this land understand what is Zen. But Zen has long, long history and we have many and many good teachers which could be our good example. Being encouraged [by] those teachers, we are practicing our way, and we are helping ourselves. As we are practice-as you are practicing hard here, and Tassajara, and some other Zen centers, more and more, you know, good teacher will appear. I'm quite sure about it. I want you, anyway, to practice our way as you do right now-as you are doing right now.

Today we will have another memorial service for Trudy Dixon. I feel, you know-whenver we sit, I feel her present in zendo always, you know. Those who knows Trudy maybe difficult to forget her in zendo. He was sitting, you know, he passed away July 6-I think 6[2]-and he was at Tassajara, you know, forth-fifth-fifth. And he-she left, you know, Tassajara one night before she passed away at Children Hospital. So he-she went back just to die in the hospital. And I think she knew she was in critical condition, judging from what she said and what she did. But she-she was, you know-she didn't mind so much about her life. She was always happy to sit with-with-with us. So it is difficult for us to forget her. So we want to have another memorial-another service for her.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Dana Velden and Bill Redican (8/17/00).

[1] Suzuki-roshi may have meant "torture."

[2] July 9, 1969 (from WIND BELL, 1970, IX (1), p. 3).

1970 maart (5)

1 - Lecture to Professor Lewis R. Lancaster's Visiting Class

Sunday, March 01, 1970

Lecture to Professor Lewis R. Lancaster's Visiting Class

Tassajara

Actually, because of my bad throat, I don't speak for people outside, you know. I o- [partial word]-I hardly manage to keep my lecture in Zen Center. But this time, because of Dr. Lancaster, whom I met at dinner, I was very much encouraged by him. And hearing hard [hardship?] of-name of Senzaki,[1] you know, who is, I think, pioneer of Zen in America [and] who did not have also any temple whatsoever. He did not like to spend his time managing-management or a business-like thing, you know, which will follow by our church or organization activity. So he just had a small room available for maybe ten or twenty people. And he spent his life in that way in Los Angeles. [Gap in tape of 27 seconds.] ... worldly things, but he wanted to make more effort to establishing the foundation of Zen in America. I think that is why he end up as a wandering monk in America. I did-before I come to America, I didn't know anything about him. But after I came to America, I met many students who studied Zen by him, and I read a book written by him,[2] and I was very much impressed by his profound understanding of Zen. Since then, I was very much encouraged to be here and to study with you.

I came this morning without preparing anything to speak. But I wanted to share the feeling we have right here, right now. Sharing the feeling right here, right now is the fundamental or basic thing for Zen practice. Zen is, in one word, to share, you know, our feeling with people or with trees and with mountains wherever we are [laughs]. That is Zen practice.

But usually, you know, our mind is always filled with something, you know: something like ice cream [laughs, laughter] or lemonade [laughs, laughter] or banana or, you know, soap-how much the soap cost in one, you know, store, how much will it cost in other store. And looking out the newspaper [laughs] and seeing ad, you know, where there is some sale, you know. That kind of thing-filled with that kind of thing. So it is almost impossible to share the actual feeling, you know, where they are right now.

That is how our life is going on-on and on and on endlessly, with some rubbishes, you know, which you had-which you used before. If even rubbish, you know, it was not rubbish when you were using it, you know. It was some important things for you. But after you use it, it is not necessary to keep it. It is same thing with our everyday life. It is useless thing-or we have too many useless rubbishes in our mind, so we cannot share the feeling with people, with things, with trees, and with mountains. Even though we are right in the wood, still we cannot feel- we cannot appreciate the feeling of the wood. That is, I think, why we practice zazen.

And originally Buddha, you know, attained enlightenment after he gave up everything, after he studied under many teachers. And rather tired of, you know, human suffering, studying many things, and being occupied some certain, you know, thought or religion, and making great effort to study-to be-to study it just to be caught by it [laughs], you know. That is most people and religious people are doing. He tired of that kind of, you know, effort. So he, you know, gave up everything. He lost interest-his interest in such things.

So finally he went to the bodhi tree where he attained enlightenment and-we say "he attained enlightenment," but it may be better to say "he forgot completely [laughs] everything!" He had nothing in his mind at that moment. And then he saw a morning star, you know, rising up from the east. That is, I think, his enlightenment. But when he saw, you know, morning star, I think that was the first thing he saw coming out of his empty mind. That-that was-that is why he was so, you know-he had such a joyful-joy in the sight of the morning star. I think that is, you know-in other word, he shared, you know, the feeling-some feeling [laughs]-Buddha's feeling or morning star's feeling. We don't know, you know. It is difficult to analyze [laughs] that is Buddha's feeling or morning star's feeling.

That is not possible. Anyway, you know, he shared the feeling with the morning star.

I think that was the first experience-pure experience which a human being had, you know. That is why I think he is called Buddha. So to be a buddha means to be he himself, to be with everyone, with everything. But to be Buddha it is necessary to give up various rubbishes in our mind.

So all the teaching-mmm [laughs]-I-I shouldn't say so [such] big words [laughs], but not all-I cannot say all teaching. But Buddha's-Buddhist-Buddhist teaching is the teaching which is arise-which should-should arise or which should come out from emptiness, from emptiness of mind. In other word, from pure mind, you may say. Or you may say a "holy mind." If your word comes from pure emptiness, that is, whatever it is, that is, I think, Buddha's word. And if you do things with purity of your mind, that is Buddha's activity, I think. And it-it is possible for us to do that. Why we meditate, or why we recite Buddha's name, [or] why we read scriptures is in one way to empty our mind, and on the other hand to appreciate Buddha's words by empty mind.

So when you read scripture, you know, you can empty your mind by reading it. And when you-your mind become clearer and clearer, then your reading will become more and more deeper. In this way, back and forth, while you are reciting sutra, you-you will, you know, extend your life in its true sense. So it is necessary for you to read scripture back and forth. Or, you know, to-if scripture is too long or too difficult-to read scripture is too difficult, you can rec- [partial word]-you know, repeat the name of Buddha even. Maybe that is the way for most of the people.

Or we-you can sit, you know, in zazen posture to empty-with empty mind. Try to be empty. But there is some, you know, some technique or some explanation needed on this point. So I hope I have some more time to explain this point more. But purpose of our practice is to open up our mind from-from-maybe you must open like you open a tin [can], you know. You must cut [laughs] hard, you know, tin, and open the tin so that you can eat it. That is, you know, our pract- [partial word]-purpose of practice.

And it is-another point is just to open is not, you know, enough. To, you know, to repeat it, or to do it back and forth, or to continue our practice is also necessary. If you haven't-if you do not have this kind of spirit, or if your everyday life is not based on this kind of spirit, to repeat it forever, you cannot, you know, cope with the problem you will have day after day, you know. As long as you live, you must eat, you know, something. As soon as you eat, you will have a, you know, big [rubbish] pile of can and papers.

So constantly, we should work on it. We should clear our table every day. Even though you clear up-you have feeling of clearing up of everything from your table, if that, you know, activity is not based on the spirit of continuing to do it, you know, forever, that feeling is just some feeling, you know, [like] when you have, you know-after you taking LSD [laughs], or after you take some alcohol [laughs].

No-maybe there is difference, but [laughs] not much difference, you know. The big difference between, you know, psychedelic experience and [laughs] enlightenment experience-we should not compare both, but the-the difference, you know, is-one is, you know, based on so-to say the Bodhisattva's vow. The other is just casual, you know, experience which happened to you sometime by aid of something. That is the difference. And one is, you know, the experience which you can have always, one after another, continuously. The other is, you know, the experience which you will have when you have something, some aid. That is the difference. I'm not comparing, you know, our experience with some other experience, but to make, you know, clear what is our practice, I said something like this, you know. I easily become critical [laughs] with things. After that I don't feel so good [laughs, laughter] after criticizing things. So I shouldn't go too far [laughs, laughter].

But anyway, we should, you know, clear up our table every day. And even though, you know, it is clear, you know, we should try to clear it. That is another, you know, important point. Because, you know, if-if you clear-if you are clearing up, you know, your table because it is dirty, you know, that mind is still dirty [laughs] because that mind, you know, acknowledged something dirty [laughs, laughter]. That you think something is dirty means your mind is dirty. So, you know, we should forget, you know, about this kind of mind-discriminating mind: "dirty or clean" or "right or wrong." Anyway, you know, to forget all about things is the point, not because it is dirty, but because this is something we should do as long as we are alive. That's all, you know.

So there is no reason why we should practice zazen, you know. When I came here, you know, I was very much interested in why, you know, so many people want to practice zazen [laughs]: crossing, you know, their legs and rigid-rigid-rigidly. And keeping their back straight. I couldn't understand why. And I used to ask them, "Why did you come? Why did you come?" And they said, "Oh! I don't know." [Laughs, laughter.] Most people say, "I don't know." Some people, you know, feel he should give me some reason, so he-he would speak some-some-he may give me some reason, but it doesn't make much sense, you know, so I wondered-just wondered why. But "I don't know" is right, I think. And even though you don't know what it is or why, but if you understand this point and if you start to practice religious activity, not only Zen but also various activity, then that is Buddhist practice, I think. This is the fundamental, you know, attitude of Buddhist practice.

So I want to compare our practice to the practice which is going on now-which will continue to go on in the future, or the practice we have had practice before. Then you will understand more clearly what is our practice. So this is another effort to keep our practice clear and to keep our practice go on. On this point, I think we must make our effort not to get lost in, you know, in-in-how should I say-maybe worldly practice [laughs].

It is not different thing to keep, you know-in keeping this practice pure. It is not difficult thing if you understand actually what it is. So, in this sense, it is necessary for you to have some understanding-to have understanding of Buddhist practice: what it is.

And I think we should be very grateful for Buddha and for many people who transmitted this kind of practice for many thousand years. And also I think we should be very grateful for the people who is making the effort to satisfy their mind even though-even though they did not know what was the real pure practice, because eventually they will find out what is real practice-like Buddha, you know, after making a great effort to establish himself on himself, who wanted to be independent from everything, and who wanted to save all being, having some respons-[partial word]-feeling some responsibility as a future king of his own country. So sooner or later this kind of feeling is a feeling which-which everyone will have. So we must be grateful for the people who are striving for the final goal we arrive at.

What is the time now? [Brief exchange off-mike.]

Now I think I-I want someone would give them some instruction how you sit. Let's sit, you know, for a while, because we have many cushions.

[Zazen instruction starts. Tape stopped and restarted, presumably after zazen.]

If you have a question, please ask me. I think this is best way. Please ask some questions. Whatever question it may be, it's quite all right. Please ask question. Uh-huh.

Student: I understand from some students they meditate a long time-long time. And nothing happens. What-what do you think [SR laughs; 5-6 words unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Nothing happens, yeah. [Laughs, laughter.] Nothing happens [laughs, laughter]. That is okay. [Laughs, laughter.]

Student: Is it better to meditate outside?

Suzuki-roshi: Outside?

Student: Yes.

Silas Hoadly: Can-can you ask your questions loud-loudly enough so that everybody could hear your questions?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm?

Student: Is it better to meditate outside?

Suzuki-roshi: Outside. Yeah. Inside is better, you know.

Student: Inside is better? Why?

Suzuki-roshi: Why? For beginner it is-especially it is so, because outside maybe wind will come and-here in California, I think it is-it is very good to sit outside, but still you there-you will have some, you know, disturbance. Light may be too strong. The, you know, the light we have here is just right. But if it is too strong, you know, it is difficult to keep your eyes open, so you have to shut your eyes. And if wind come, you know, it bothers your eyes always. And, you know, you have to always [laughs] to be like this [probably gestures]. So I think inside is better.

And it is necessary to have right temperature too. If it is too hot, it is difficult. And if it is cold-yeah, cold weather is better, but hot one is very difficult, you know, to sit. So I think outside-actually, you know, when you go outside you may feel you want to sit there. But if you start to sit [laughs], you will find out various things which will dis- [partial word]- which disturb you. So I think it is better to sit inside. If you try, you will find out, you know [laughs.] Ah. Hai.

Student: Do you always count to keep track of the mind? Or do you stop at some point?

Suzuki-roshi: You know, it-because it is difficult to just to sit, you know. Just to sit is best, you know, but that is not so easy [laughs]. So we count our breathing. But it is not just to count our breathing, you know, like you count sheeps, you know [laughing], crossing fence. One, two, three. This is rather busy, you know. When you want to sleep, it maybe-it will work, but for zazen it doesn't work so well.

So "to count" means to do something with your body and mind. To devote yourself on practice with your mind and body. So-but it is easy-easier to say, "count your breathing," you know, rather than "to practice it with your body and mind." [Laughs.] You may wonder what it is, you know. So we just say, "count your breathing."

And how you count is, you know, not just counting. Even though you lose your counting sometime, it is all right. But how you count is to-to count with, you know, with every part of your body: with your mudra, with your breathing, with your mind and everything is-not concentrated but-concentration, you know, means to, you know, to-to be like this [gesturing?]. But actually we do not try to concentrate on anything, you know. We just try to be like this and-or organize our body and mind.

So it is-maybe it better to have, you know, some feeling of counting or following breathing. At that time, your mind is everywhere, you know: here, here, and every part of your body. That is how you count your breathing.

Student: How can you still thoughts that come up in meditation?

Suzuki-roshi: Still?

Student: Still thoughts. You know, you have-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. I see. The best way, may be, you know, if you-if you haven't not much, you know, mind in your head, you know, you start to think because your mind is, you know, resting. Your mind is not participating [in] the practice. So your mind start to wandering about. "What shall I do?" he may say [laughs, laughter]. So your mind should alw- [partial word]-also join our practice. How to do it is, you know, physically you sh- [partial word]-pull your chin and stretch your neck. It's-our chin and neck should be always so, but, you know, if you sit ten, fifteen minutes you will be like this [probably gestures].

So mind ask, you know, "What shall I do?" [laughs] and there-he will start to taking a walk [laughs, laughter]. That is, you know, why you think. So, if you are always like this, it is difficult to think, you know, all your mind. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

Suzuki-roshi: Ah. I'm sorry. [Sounds like he is asking a student to repeat a question]

Student: Is it better to leave the eyes half-open, or do you ever close the eyes?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, half open. You know, some teachers say-oh-Fujimoto-roshi said in Way of Zen, [3] watch, you know, some point-your eye level, and turn the focus five-four-five feet ahead. Change the focus from, you know, there to here. Then you will have half-opened eyes. Not-but focus. You shouldn't gaze at some point on the wall, you know. Some mark on the wall [laughs, laughter] or some point on the floor, you know. Just, you know-focus is around there. So your eyes is not gazing at anything. This kind of eyes, you know [probably gestures]. So if you have this kind of eyes, you know, you can catch everything, you know, in your, you know, eyesight angle. Focus is maybe around here. I don't feel any focus. That is how you do it. But if it is difficult as you-like as you count your breathing, you can gaze at something, you know, in front of you.

Some, you know, old student, when she started practice, she always prepare for something [laughing] here. Put it in front of her. She was gazing at it. I think that is not-maybe not proper way. No Zen master, you know, told us to do so [laughs], so may not be proper way, but for her, you know, it was very good. It worked very well, I think. Soon he-she didn't need that kind of material or that kind of thing in front of her. Some q- [partial word: questions]-?

Student: For what reason do you keep the eye open rather than close it?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Because you-if you keep-if you-if your eyes are open, you know, naturally-wide open, you know, you will see many things. And if you close your eyes, you know, you will think more, and you will have various images on-on your eyelid ["eyelid" said tentatively]. Yeah. Many things will appear here [laughs, laughter]. So better to be like this, you know.

Student: Do you get anywhere farther if you just keep sitting every day for twenty minutes-do your counting? Will there be progress? Or can you just get stuck sitting? [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] Yeah. Yesterday I said, you know, because so-pretty many people changed into a stone-into stones, you know [laughs, laughter], after sitting six days. I think that was good, I think. But why we practice zazen is-is not to change into a stone [laughs, laughter]. That is something which will happen in our practice, you know. I don't say that is bad, you know. That may be good. But that is not why we practice zazen, you know.

You will have various experience in your zazen, and then more and more you will have less, you know, experience in-in some sense of duality, good or bad, you know: good experience or bad experience. Or you may not have here or there, you know, and you will feel always a sort of composure or a sort of-I-you know, same feeling, you know, wherever you go. But with that same foundation of same feeling, you know-composure, you will see things, you know, as it is.

So that same feeling will be called it like "emptiness" or "buddha-eyes," or "buddha-mind," or we call it by various name, but a kind of-not feeling, but fundamental, you know, openness of your mind. So you will not be-you will not, you know, feel you are here or you are there. "Here" or "there" is just dualistic, you know, mental understanding of things. Before we have that kind of dualistic understanding of things, we have more pure-we have more pure, you know, experience of things. Just, you know-just like that. So if you are more-if you are able to stay in-more in such state of mind, or in state of yourself, then you will not be, you know, bothered by idea of "here" or "there." You don't seek for anything, because you have-you have contented feeling.

Student: And it happens by simply sitting there and doing that for a long time-over a period of time?

Suzuki-roshi: It-you know, first of all what you should do is to-to get accustomed to, you know, right posture and right-good breathing, natural good breathing. Then you will have this kind of feeling-I should say "feeling"? Yeah. So, you know, for-for us it takes time-quite a long time to-to have this kind of feeling. So anyway, you know, at home or with group, it is good to sit because it will help your, you know, posture and breathing. Breathing is important thing. If your mind is disturbed, breathing will be disturbed too. And this is-breathing is both mental and physical activity. So to-to take care of breathing is how you take care of yourself. Hai.

Student: If you can only sit for five minutes, is it better to sit or is it better not to sit at all?

Suzuki-roshi: Five minutes?

Student: Or ten minutes.

Suzuki-roshi: Ten minutes. Yeah. Ten minutes. If you-even though you sit ten minutes, your mind will not be calm enough, usually, you know. For an instance, you know, if you walk-kinhin-kinhin is, you know, walking meditation. After, you know, standing up from meditation we, you know, walk slowly and practice zazen. Not zazen [laughs]. Zazen is, you know-za is "sitting," zen is "Zen." Sitting zazen is zazen [laughs]-sitting Zen is zazen. Kinhin is not zazen, but kinhin is walking, you know, straight is kinhin: walking on straight line.

When you walk slowly, first, you know, six feet or so is-or three feet will be-you will notice your breathing is not deep enough-good enough. And after, you know, after that, your breathing will be very deep, and you will have good feeling-feeling of zazen. And it takes, maybe, I don't know how long, but may-may take at least more than five minutes. So to sit ten minutes, you know, [is] to quit zazen when [laughs] you just entered meditation. So may be better to sit twenty minutes, I think. Twenty minutes. Some more question? Oh. You has. Yeah.

Student: I was wondering at what point in meditation does one reach satori, and how can it be recognized?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] You know, Buddha said, "Oh, it's wonderful to see buddha-nature in all being," you know. He found out buddha, you know, in all being: buddha-nature in all being, you know. But when he said so, it was too late, I think [laughs]. You know, when he said so, that was not enlightenment, you know. That was-that was the first step to the ordinal [ordinary] world [laughs], you know. I think so.

People may say, you know, when or after he saw the morning star he attained enlightenment. By seeing it, he attained enlightenment, you know. And as if a morning star helped him to attain enlightenment [laughs, laughter]: if there were not morning star, you know, he wouldn't have [laughs] attained enlightenment. But that is not so. So that is why we say, you know-we, you know, do not say so much about enlightenment. But enlightenment-because enlightenment is something which is before something happens to us.

So what is enlightened mind, you know, you may ask. But when we say "enlightened mind," that is already, you know, object of enlightened mind [laughs]. "Here there is enlightened mind. I will explain about it," you know. "This is enlighten-enlightened mind." But that is something which is outside of enlightened mind. You see?

So that is-it does not mean much, you know, to say about something which is just an object of enlightened mind. It makes some sense, of course, you know [laughs], and it is projected mind of enlightened mind. So it make sense, but if you think, "This is enlightened mind. I attained enlightenment!" [Said in mocking voice.] [Laughs, laughter] That is, you know-I feel very funny. [Laughs, laughter.] Do you understand?

So try not to say anything about enlightenment. Just practice zazen. You know, before you say something there is real enlightenment within yourself-on the side of yourself, not there.

Student: It seems from what you were saying that Buddhism-the dharmas and the sutras and all the temples that don't have any necessary relationship to zazen-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student: Can you explain why a-why Buddhism and not only zazen?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. It is, you know-first of all, you know, in-in China-in India, I don't know, you know. I haven't studied Indian philosophy so much. But scholar says in India they would sit mostly outside of the building in, you know, on the stone or under the tree. At that time they must have had a very good place to sit, and for Indian people that kind of place was best place for sitting, maybe.

But in China, they started to sit in-some other sit in building. And "then" we say, but at that time, maybe most Buddhists were in some sense Zen student because they sit. And after more people interested in Zen pract- [partial word]-this kind of practice, to sit, they started to have some-own their own building, you know, where they sit. And more and more, they had Buddha hall, lecture hall, you know, as they had more people to sit-who sit. In this way, you know, Zen-present Zen, you know, school was developed. There was some necessity, you know, so they-we had various, you know, buildings and meditation room.

But it does not mean without Buddha hall we cannot sit, you know. [Sentence finished. Gap in tape of 23 sec.] ... like having big zendo, Buddha hall, beautiful gate, you know. But I think that is not always necessary, and always necessary be in that way, you know. So I think we must think [about] this point more. Is that okay? [Laughs.] Did I-

Student: Specifically about the philosophy and the sutras and the chanting-the religion of Buddhism. Wondering-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, chanting-

Student: -why that seemed to be necessary. What was the-the whole-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Chanting is, you know-I explain it, you know, this way, I think. Chanting will make your practice deeper, you know. And the feeling [of] chanting or scripture makes your practice purer. In this way, you know, back and forth, we will have a deeper practice. So in this sense, chanting is necessary. So in China, they would chant, you know-some great Zen master would write some beautiful poem, you know, about their state of mind or understanding of teaching. And they would chant it, you know, while they're working. So we-we have a style, you know, chanting sutra in walking [?]. In Japan, still we do it, you know, in Buddha hall with scripture in our hand we, you know, chant sutra, in walking [?]. That is, I think, very helpful too.

Student: Are there any differences between the way you practice Zen in the United States and the way you practice in Japan?

Suzuki-roshi: Zazen practice is same, you know. I don't feel, you know, not much difference, you know. Wherever I go, I feel as if I am in Japan [laughs, laughter]. Yeah. So it rather difficult to answer your question. You know, "American people, Japanese people," we say. But if we start to practice zazen, nearly the same. We have same problem [laughs, laughter].

Student: Is satori the same thing as attaining nirvana?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Some scholar, you know, wrote pretty big essay about it. But, you know, satori is more-nirvana-satori is more positive way of, you know, expressing nirvana. Nirvana is more negative way of expressing satori. Actually same thing, you know [laughs, laughter].

Student: Are there-are there numerous satoris that you can have on the way to having what I guess would be the final one?

Suzuki-roshi: Nirvana? Excuse me. I have to say, you know, nirvana or satori is not something which we, you know, strive for or attain. It is something which will come to you, or you may say which you have [hits chest five times], you know, within yourself-I cannot say "within" or "without," but which is originally there. You feel as if you found out something because before you-your mind was not able to see it or experience it because of the rubbishes we have in our mind.

So when you-your mind is clear, and when your mind is-when we say "clear," it means that to get rid of many things or, you know, anger or ignorance. Ignorance is some disturbance, you know, for the mind to see things as it is. Or anger, you know. Or greed, you know. Expect too much of something-which will end up in discouragement [laughs], you know, because you cannot, you know-your desire is too much, so accordingly you find yourself in discouragement.

When you have it, you know, when you feel you have it, "Oh. This is not what I want [laughs, laughter]-not what I wanted." This kind of thing is greed, you know. Not-it doesn't mean our instinct, but something more than homemade, you know, desire. Not actual desire: actual desire plus something-that something which is added on pure desire, you know, or our instinct will be change into, you know, constant, you know, desire to improve ourself. Here is reality. And here is something added, you know. This is a kind of impulse to drive this one, you know. And if this driver is not good, you know, drive you-drive this one to wrong direction, you know. This one will be lost. So driver should be a good driver who knows where this one is going. So if driver is good, you know, our instinct will be developed into right direction. And if he is not good, you know, he will be lost. That driver is the desire, we say, when he is foolish-he-when he is not good one.

Ah, what am I talking about [laughs, laughter]? Yeah.

So nirvana, you know, is-if we understand in this way, you know, that is more like enlightenment. When we have good driver, that is, you know, enlightenment. But when we say you are not so good driver, you know, then that is more like nirvana after, you know, getting rid of, you know, bad driver. That, you know-to get right driver we should dismiss the wrong one. So to dismiss various evil-not "evil," but various wrong activity or desire is after getting rid of those things and make this one goes in right direction is maybe, in this sense, we call it nirvana.

Oh. Oh, thank you very much [laughs].

a

[Recording was stopped for an unknown period of time. It resumed as Suzuki-roshi is giving instructions for chanting. He is heard in the background, apparently talking to the class.]

Suzuki-roshi: So let me have one of your-

Student: Here. We've got a sutra card, Roshi.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student: Do you want a sutra card? It's easier for you to hold.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Hall is this way. This is just-Student: Just a second, Roshi, because they're just all standing up now, and-Suzuki-roshi: Okay. May-may I stand up here? [Laughter. May have stood on top of a table or chair.] This way, please.

Two fingers-yes. And support your books by-Student: Excuse me [said to quiet the group].

Suzuki-roshi: -like this. Anyway. Have your feeling or strength here, in your tummy, and stand up like this. And chant sutra. Not like this. With your strength in your tummy we will chant sutra. Okay?

[S.R. gives individual instruction to one or more students. Then all chant Heart Sutra until end of tape.]

---

Source: City Center original tape transcribed by Dana Velden 4/10/00.

Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican 8/15/00.

[1] Nyogen Senzaki (1876-1958). One of the first Zen teachers to establish residence in America. He came to San Francisco in 1905, creating a "floating zendo" there in 1922. He moved to Los Angeles in 1931, where he led the Mentorgarten Meditation Hall in his apartment at the Miyako Hotel.

[2] Possibilities include Buddhism and Zen (1953), Ten Bulls of Zen (n.d., but no later than 1956), The Iron Flute (1961), or Zen Flesh, Zen Bones (with Paul Reps, 1957).

[3] Rindo Fujimoto, The Way of Zen. Cambridge, Mass.: Cambridge Buddhist Association, Inc., 1972. First published in Japan in 1961.

2 - Letters from Emptiness

Sunday, March 08, 1970

"Letters from Emptiness"

How to Understand the Idea of Emptiness

San Francisco

[Recently my thought is concentrated on the idea of emptiness.][1] Whatever I say, I am actually talking about what is emptiness, because this emptiness is something which we must understand literally and completely through experience. But if it is difficult to experience it through experience, you can tentatively understand it as a kind of idea in comparison to your way of thinking or in comparison to the idea you have, [the] various idea you have.

And we classify our idea in two: one is idea of emptiness, another is idea of being. And when we say, usually, idea it is idea of being. And the idea of-your way of thinking belongs to the idea of being, and idea of emptiness makes a pair of opposite with your idea you-ideas you have. So whatever the idea may be, you can say those idea is idea of being. So we should know that.

Besides the ideas about things you have, there is another-another ideas which is not same as-same-which is not same idea you have and which is not brought about in your concept. Actually that is why we practice zazen, you know. You cannot reach the idea of emptiness with your thinking mind or with your feeling as an conception. And to practice-to actualize the emptiness is shikantaza.

This morning I want to point-I want to point out some points in our usual understanding what kind of mistake there is and how different idea Buddhists have. We say emptiness is-in Japanese or Chinese is ku.

[2] Ku is, of course, a noun, and it is-sometime we use it as a verb, kuzuru. Kuzuru means-is verb and maybe-so you can say "empty"-you can use words "empty" in two ways. One is noun and the other is verb. "To empty." To empty is-to empty a cup is to empty, you know, maybe.

But when we say "empty a cup" or "empty water" does not mean to drink it up [laughs]. It means that keeping the water in it, and still we do not think there is water. That is to empty the water. When we have no idea of water, even though we see it, that is to empty a cup.

So to empty everything means to have no idea of anything, or to go back to the situation where no idea of anything arise. We may, you know, think of some koans-to hear a bird before bird sing, or-this is also difficult word: shosoku.[3] Shosoku means some [laughs]-it is also still difficult-I don't know how to express it. Shosoku, you know-when you receive a letter from your, you know, from your home, that is shosoku, you know. Receive a letter, receiving a letter, and to know something about your home is shosoku: what are they doing [laughs] now, or what kind of flower they have now, what kind of things they are involved in. That is shosoku, you know, to-without any actual, you know, actual picture of it, to know something about it is shosoku. So, you know, we have no letter from the world of emptiness [laughs, laughter]. We have no letter, but to know, you know, what is going on in the world of emptiness [laughs], that is shosoku.

To communicate with the world of emptiness is to, you know-that is maybe enlightenment, you know. When you see the plum flower, or when you hear the sound of bamboo which hit by a small stone, and, you know, that is a letter from the world of emptiness. And to know [laughs], you know, the world of emptiness through this sign is, you know, shosoku. So it is not actual written communication, but it is something, you know, some hint or some suggestion. Through this kind of suggestion to know what is going on in the world of emptiness is maybe so-called-it enlightenment.

There is this kind of world, you know, besides the world which we can describe. Originally, all the description of reality is limited-should be limited expression of the world of emptiness, but we are so attached to the description, you know, and we think this is the reality. There there is some mistake, because what is described is not the actual reality. And when you think this is reality, there is your own idea involved in it. There, you know, there is some idea of self. Idea of self is involved in it when you say "this is it"-that this is a description and this-some description is it when you say so, already your idea is involved in it.

When Buddhist study was not completed, many Buddhists, you know, made this kind of mistake. That is why they attach to the written scriptures or Buddha's words. And they thought this is the most valuable thing and the way to preserve the teaching is to remember what Buddha said.

But actually what Buddha said was the letter, you know, from the world of emptiness. So letter is just suggestion, you know, or some, you know, help to think of his home. But if you read-if someone else read it-some other person read it, it doesn't make any sense, you know. That is-that is the nature of Buddha's words. How to read-or if you want to read a letter from the Buddha's world, it is necessary to be ready for understanding what is Buddha's world. So to understand Buddha's-what is Buddha's world, it is necessary not to rely on usual thinking mind.

And I have to go back to the verb "to empty." "To empty" means without relying on the form or color of being, to have direct, pure experience of it is kuzuru or to empty. To-what should be empty is our preconceived idea, or our idea of being, or our idea of big or small, round or square. This kind of, you know, round or square, or big or small is not reality, you know. It doesn't belong to the reality. Round or square or long or short is some idea.

The idea is when we analyze our experience. When we analyze our experience, you know, this kind of time or space or big and short or heavy and light-this kind of, you know, scale is necessary. And with those scale in your mind, you actually, you know, experience things. But thing itself is-has no scale or no weight. It is something, you know, we add to the things-reality. So the idea is analyzed-when you analyze your experience, there is, you know, idea of time and space. And because we use this kind of a scale always, you know, and we depend on the scale so much that we think this kind of scale is, you know, exist, but [laughs] it doesn't exist. It is, you know-if it exist, it should exist with things, with being. Things itself is mother of the scale in itself. Actually it is so. Or you may say, you know, scale is mother of being, you know. Both is true. If both is true, then scale and being is one being. It is actually one thing, you know, one reality. One reality could be analyzed as some entity, some substance, and the idea we have-the sense of big or small.

So this kind of-when we have idealize something, when we conceptualize something, it is already, you can-it is already dead experience. It is not actual experience. And why we, you know, why we empty things-being-what we empty is not actual reality, but the idea of big or small, or good or bad. This part should be empty because it is some measurement we have. And that measurement [is] usually based on-usually used in a selfish way. When we say "good" or "bad," you know, scale is in yourself. That scale is not always same. According to the person, the scale is different.

So there is-I don't say that is always wrong, but mostly we are liable to use our selfish scale when we analyze-when we idealize something, when we have idea of something. That part should be emptied. We must empty this part. How we empty this part is to practice zazen, and we-we should be more got accustomed to accept things as it is without any idea of big or small, good or bad.

If some artist or some writer to, you know, actualize something or to actualize his, you know, experience, it isn't-they may use-they may write something, they may paint, but if his, you know, experience is very strong and pure, you know, he will give up [laughs] description. "Oh." [Laughs.] "Oh my." That's all. [Laughs.] He-he will give up, because his, you know, experience is so pure and so realistic that-realistic I don't know [laughs] this words is correct or not-so actual that he sh- [partial word]-he have to give up: "Oh no-no-no-no." [Laughs.]

You know, I like to make some, you know, miniature garden, you know, in-around my house, but if-if I go, you know, to the stream and seeing wonderful rocks and water running, I give up [laughs, laughter]. "Oh no!" [Laughs, laughter.] "I shall never try to," you know, "make rockgarden." When my friend who was a gardener, you know-he is very much proud of his, you know, art. And when he came to Tassajara, he said: "I shall never [laughs] work on rock garden" he said. "It is much better to clean Tassajara stream, you know, picking up if there is some paper-picking up paper and cigarette. That is much better. I shall never work on ..." [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

[Japanese garden." That is very true.][4] We copy nature, you know, in the small area. That is maybe Japanese garden, but in nature there is, you know, actual beauty which is beyond beauty. If you-because you see a part of it, you may think this rock should be, you know, moved this way [laughs], and this rock should be moved that way. Then it will be a complete garden, you may say. But if you see from the distance, you know, and if you see more wider area, you know, without moving anything, that is complete garden.

Because you, you know, limit the actual reality with small self, there is "good garden" or "bad garden," and you should change some stones. But if you see the things itself as it is with wider mind, with wider view, there is no need to do anything.

So things itself is emptiness, actually. But because you add some, you know, something to it, it-it doesn't-actually you spoil the actual reality. So if we don't spoil anything, that is to empty things. So if you sit-when you sit in shikantaza, we say don't [be] disturbed by sound, don't operate your thinking mind. It means that don't rely on any sense organs or thinking mind and just, you know, receive the letter from the world of emptiness. That is shikantaza.

So to empty-usually when we deny something, we, at the same time, we-we replace some-something else, you know. That I deny, you know, a blue cup means I want-that I want white cup. That is [laughs] usually what is happening. When you discuss something, when you argue, you know, that you deny someone's opinion means [laughs] to force your opinion to others. That is usually what we are doing, but in-our way is not like that, you know. We just correct the, you know, some added, you know, element in your observation of things, and-and we purify this kind of selfish idea. To see, to accept things as it is is our way. So we d- [partial word]-there is no need to replace, you know, something.

So to deny is to make it clear and to make it more actual. That is what we mean by empty things. If we empty things and let things be as it is, then things will work. Originally things are related, and things are originally one. So as one being, it will extend itself. So how let things extend itself is, you know, why we empty things.

This kind of practice is missing in our religious practice. So religion naturally will become like a sometime opium, you know, because of lack of this kind of practice. If we have this kind of practice without any idea of religion we have religion. So to purify our experience and to observe things as it is, is to have-to understand the world of emptiness and to understand why Buddha left so many teaching for us.

So naturally in our practice, in our shikantaza, we do not seek for anything because when we seek for something there, there is, you know, our idea of self. Our idea of self is involved in our practice. So that practice is-will not work to purify our experience, to purify our life. So how, you know, we get rid of this kind of tendency is the point we make effort.

When we say "to make our effort," you know, means to push, you know, the idea of self to achieve something. That is [laughs], you know, actually what you are doing when you make some effort, but we make our effort to get rid of this kind of self-centered effort or self-centered activity.

You know, for an instance, you know, if you are writing-reading something, someone may say-your wife or husband [laughs] may say-may say something to you: "Why don't you have a cup of tea?" [Laughs.] You may say, "Oh, I am busy! [Laughing.] Be quiet!" That is not-when you are, you know, reading in that way, I think you should be careful [laughs, laughter]. You should be ready to say, "Yes, that may be wonderful. Give me a cup of tea." And having a cup of tea or stop reading, and after having a cup of tea you should continue your reading.

That kind of attitude is more like our attitude. "Now I am very busy!" [Laughs.] I shouldn't say so, you know, but I always say, "I am busy now. Right now I am busy." [Laughs.] That is not so good, because my mind is not actually in full function. A part of my mind is working hard, but the other part is-may not be working so hard. Anyway, I may be losing balance in my activity.

If it is reading, it is o- [partial word]-it may be okay, but if you are, you know, making calligraphy, you know [laughs]-calligraphy, you know, express yourself, you know, completely. If your mind is not in a state of emptiness, you know, your work tell you, "I am [laughs] not in state of emptiness." So you should stop. If you are a Zen student, you should be ashamed of making [laughs] such calligraphy. As a Zen student, you know, calligraphy-to make calligraphy is to practice zazen actually [laughs]. Your practice should be there. So when you are working on calligraphy, if someone say, "Please have a cup of tea." "No, I am making calligraphy!" [Laughs, laughter.] Then your calligraphy will say, "No! No! No!" [Laughs, laughter.] You cannot, you know, fool yourself [laughs]. That is our practice, you know.

I think you must understand-you may-you might understand what we are trying here in Zen Center. Sometime it may be all right to practice zazen as-as a kind of exercise [laughs] or training, you know, to make your practice stronger or to make your breathing smooth-smooth and natural. That is, maybe, a part of practice, but when we say shikantaza, you know, our practice is not that kind of practice. So we put more-we put more emphasis on this point. Only when you have this point, various practice will work.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Checked against tape and made verbatim by Dana Velden and Bill Redican (10/2/00).

[1] The text in brackets is not on tape. It was apparently added by the original transcriber.

[2] Sanskrit shunyata.

[3] shosoku (Jap.): (1) state of affairs; (2) news, correspondence, letters.

[4] The text in brackets is not on tape. It was apparently added by the original transcriber.

3 - Our Everyday Life is Like a Movie

Sunday, March 15, 1970

Our Everyday Life is Like a Movie
San Francisco

I think most of you are rather curious about what is Zen. But Zen is actually our way of life, and zazen practice is actually as-like as you set your watch-alarm, maybe. Unless you set your alarm, alarm clock will not serve the purpose.

So it is necessary for us to start our activity from some standpoint-to some ground or we must have-every day we must have starting point. Where to start is most important thing. The sun arise at certain time and setting at certain time. And the sun, you know, always repeats same thing. And we do too [laughs, laughter]. But we do not feel in that way, you know. We-our life is not so organized, and we don't know even how important it is to-where to know where to start our life. Zen student start our life from zazen practice. We come back to zero and start from zero. We have various activity, and how our activity arise from zero is most important thing to know, to feel, or to realize.

Usually, I think, most people practice zazen to attain something, to achieve something. But more important thing is to start, you know, to start our everyday activity-to know where to start to everyday activity and to know how to practice zazen. When we-before actually you practice zazen, you know, or at the moment you decided to sit, it means that you, you know, already started to set your alarm. And when you have that kind of confidence or you have made that kind of decision and start to zazen, that is zero.

And during zazen, sometime, you will hear the bird singing. That is something arise in your practice. In the same way, in our everyday life, many things will arise. But if you know where, you know-if you know where things-from where those things happens, you will not be disturbed by it. Because [laughs] you don't know, you know, how it happen, you lose your confidence in your life. You know, if you-if you know how things happens to you-"Oh!"-you know. And the moment something happens you will be ready for that: "Oh, something arising"- [laughs]-and as if your-like you watch-watch the sunrise: "Oh, the sun is just coming up."

You know, anger, for an instance-sometime you will be angry. But anger actually doesn't come all of a sudden. It comes, you know, very slowly [laughs] actually, but when you feel it comes all of sudden. That is real anger. But when you know [laughing] how it comes-"Oh! Anger is coming-anger is arising in my mind"-that is not anger. May be anger. People may say he is angry, but actually he is not angry. If you know, you know, you are almost started to crying-"Oh, I am crying next minute, two minutes, three minutes" [laughs]-"Oh, I started crying"- that is not crying.

If you know what is zazen, you know, what is the practice, you will accept things as you accept various images in your sitting zazen. So in our zazen the most important thing is to have big mind and to accept things in your practice. And even try not to, you know, observe things how it happens to your mind.

If you practice zazen to attain some stage or enlightenment, that zazen-like-the man who practice that kind of zazen is-will be the same as a man who is, you know, using alarm without setting it. It will go anyway [laughs], you know, go and go and go, until you-until it comes to-to some, you know, its end. It will go anyway [laughs], but, you know, it doesn't make much sense.

When you sit every morning it makes sense. You know what time it is. To know what time it is is the most important thing for us in our everyday life. To know what you are doing is the most important thing. What kind of effort you are doing and what kind of situation you are now-that is the most important thing.

Our everyday life is like a movie, you know, which is going on wide screen, you know [laughs]. But most people may be interested in screen-picture on the screen without realizing there is a screen [laughs, laughter]. So, you know, when, you know, you don't see anymore, you don't-when the movie stops, you will be, you know- when the movie stops, before it come to end maybe [you may say], "I must come again tomorrow evening" [laughs]. "I will come and see it." And in that way, what you see is, you know, just, you know-what you are interested in is the movie on the screen. And because you think it, it stops. You have, you know, some-sometime you expect something for tomorrow or if-or you will be discouraged because you don't know the screen. But if you realize-if there is a screen, because there is screen in the movie theater- anyway-someone come and show you some more picture. So, you know, the most-most important thing is to have screen in your mind [taps on something repeatedly], and that screen should be white.

The scr- [partial word]-if the screen is colorful [laughs], you know, colorful enough to attract people [laughs, laughter], screen will not, you know, serve for the purpose. But most important thing is to have screen and to have-not colorful-to have plain screen, white-pure white screen. That is the most important thing. But most people are not interested in pure white screen [laughs, laughter]. It is, I think, good thing to be excited by seeing movie. It is good, you know. But why you can enjoy the movie is, you know, to some extent you know that is movie. That is not actual, you know-actually that kind of thing is not going.

So you have, you know-even though you have no idea of screen, but you have-your interest is based on, you know, some understanding of screen or machine. And you know that is something artificial. So you can enjoy it. You can enjoy something which you should enjoy, not more than that. That is how we enjoy our life. If you have no idea of screen or machine, you know, perhaps you cannot see the movie. You will do-always do like this [laughs, laughter] [gestures: probably hiding face]. "Oh no, no, no!"

So zazen practice is, you know, necessary to know what is-what kind of screen you have and to-to enjoy our life as if you enjoy the movie in theater. How can you do it [is] because you have screen here [taps three times]. And you are not afraid of screen [laughs], or you don't, you know, or you do not have any particular feeling for the screen-just-that is just a white, you know, screen, that's all. So you are not afraid of your life at all, but, you know, you enjoy something to be afraid of [laughs]. You enjoy something, you know, which makes you angry, which-or which makes you cry. And you enjoy cry and anger too.

But if you have no idea of screen, you know, even you will be afraid of even enlightenment. "What is it? Oh, my!" [Laughs, laughter.] If someone attained enlightenment, you know, you may ask him what kind of experience you had when you had enlightenment. "Enlightenment is this kind of experience." "Oh, no! [Laughs.] That is not for me," you may say.

But that is just movie, you know, something which you should enjoy. But if you want to enjoy the movie, you should know that is the combination of, you know, film and light and white screen. And most important thing is to have plain white screen. That is actually not something which you should attain, but which you have always. But why you don't have it-you don't feel you don't have it is your mind is too busy, too busy to see, to realize it.

So once in a while, you know, you should stop all of your activity and you should make your white screen-you make yourself sure that you have white screen. That is, you know, zazen. So that is not something to attain, but something [laughs] you must find out by practice. That is, you know, foundation of all our everyday life and foundation of all our meditation practice. Without this kind of foundation, you know, your practice will not work. All the instructions you will-you have in our practice is to have a clean white screen as much as you can. Always, you know, it is not pure white because of various attachment to it, because of some stain previous made-previously made for it.

We say to practice zazen is just to-just-when we practice zazen we are like a baby in her mother's bosom [laughs]. That is, you know, our zazen. You have no idea of anything. You are quite relaxed, but, you know, is difficult to have complete relaxation in your usual posture. That is why we take some certain posture.

This kind of instruction is necessary, and this kind of instruction is the result of various experiences of many and many people in past. And they, you know, found out this is much better than the other posture, than standing up or lying down. So according to some-under some instruction with this kind of understanding, if you practice zazen, it will work. Whatever practice it may be, it will work. But if you do not have, or if you do not trust your own pure white paper, you cannot, you know, practice. Your practice will not work.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997.

Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (12/29/99).

4 - March Sesshin: Way-Seeking Mind

Saturday, March 28, 1970

March Sesshin: Way-Seeking Mind
San Francisco

[First 1-2 sentences of lecture may be missing.] Way-seeking mind is the most important. This kind of chance is-usually in some difficult situation-when you have some difficulty in your everyday life, I think you will have, you know-there you will have chance to arise way-seeking mind. Once you arise the way-seeking mind, your practice is on the track.

Watanabe-Watanabe Genshu-zenji,[1] who passed away several years ago, arise way-seeking mind when famous Arai-zenji "\_ftnref2" title="">[2] came to his temple. He [Watanabe] was-he was a chest-maker or what do you call?-he was making, you know-he is-he is not a carpenter-was not a carpenter, but he was-hmm?-[comments from students]-oh, cabinetmaker. He was cabinetmaker. And he-when he went to his temple, you know, to hear Arai-zenji's lecture or to-to see him, maybe [laughs], to see the zenji-famous zenji, he arosed way-seeking mind. And he made up his mind to follow him, and asked his family to let him go. And he joined Arai-zenji's order.

He [Watanabe] had-when he was young, he had a very difficult time at his home always. But he didn't complain about it. He rather enjoy his-to make cabinets. But Arai-zenji was so great Zen master that he, you know, made up his mind to follow him. And so, you know, he doesn't forget his-his life in his-when he was young.

When he became archbishop of Soji-ji temple, he still had a big saw, you know, and tools on tokonoma.[3] And he-he didn't forget, you know, his difficult time when he was young. And he was very grateful for, you know, having difficulties in his early days. Because, you know-because of that he could join the order, and study our way, and practice zazen until he become archbishop of Soji-ji temple. He was unique archbishop.

Of course, when he became Arai-zenji's disciple he went-he has some more schooling. He graduate a college called Toyo Daigaku,[4] but that was maybe-I don't know exactly when, but maybe when he was pretty old.

The most Zen masters, you know-great Zen masters are the monks who had difficult time in his early life. In Meiji period, or, yeah, late Meiji period, our most famous zenji-Zen master is-are Nishiari-zenji[5] and Morita-Morita-zenji, Morita Goyu.[6] Nishiari-zenji became a archbishop of Soji-ji Temple. Morita-zenji became a-became archbishop of Eihei-ji temple. They were the monks who had very difficult time when they were young.

Morita-zenji joined-or went to Eihei-ji Monastery to practice when he was very young. And his-when he was leaving his temple, his father was very ill, but knowing that his boy-he cannot take care of his boy, he persuaded his boy to go to Eihei-ji monastery. As you know, Eihei-ji-life in Eihei-ji Monastery is not so easy, especially for a little boy maybe thirteen or fourteen. His father must be a very good-must have been very good teacher to know how important it is to continue his practice. But he had not much money for the boy, so only way is to send him to Eihei-ji Monastery. When he was going, he said:

The first duty you will have at Eihei-ji Monastery will be to, you know, collect rubbishes or garbage, and to-or to hit, you know, big bell. You-you should know to collect garbage is the most important duty in the monastery. The older students will sweep the garden and collect the leaves and garbages at certain time-certain place. So young priest or monks should, you know, collect it.

We are told, you know, that even though you sweep the garden, if you don't, you know, collect the garbage in-or take it to the garbage can, you know-in Japan we had no garbage can but we had some place to burn the papers and-or leaves. If we don't take it to the place-to some certain place, you did, you know, half job, not complete job. Fifty percent [laughs]. Another fifty percent is to take it to the place where they burn it. So his father told them-told him to-"If you take the garbage to some certain place, you-that means you-you are doing half of the work, even though you are just one or three people. If you do it, you are doing half of the work, and many-rest of the monks with many heads [laughs] and hands will do half of it. So you must be proud of your duty," he said to him.

"And to hit a bell means to hit-to, you know-to give a birth to Buddha. So each time you hit the bell, you know, Buddha will appear. So when you, you know, at Eihei-ji-if you go to Eihei-ji you should-monks bow each time they hit big bell. So with that spirit you should hit the bell."

And he give him-give the boy various instructions like that. And knowing-without knowing his father was almost dying, he went to Eihei-ji monastery and he started monastic life. The first morning, he hit the great bell, Ekido-zenji,[7] who was at that time the abbot of-or archbishop of Eihei-ji monastery, asked his jisha find out who hit the bell this morning.

I don't know how old Ekido-zenji was at that time. Maybe he was more than 80.[8] Maybe almost 90. And he was sitting in his room and hearing the b- [partial word]-unusual bell, he asked his jisha to find out who it was. And there came the small boy. Ekido-zenji rather amazed to see such a small boy. He thought some good well-trained monk will appear [laughs], but small boy appear.

So he wondered how he could hit such a-hit a nice good sound, so he asked him, you know, the boy-how did you hit it, and with what kind of, you know, feeling did he hit the bell? And he told him, "To hit one bell means to give a birth to a buddha. That was what my father told me when I was leaving my home for Eihei-ji monastery." Of course, Eikido-zenji was very much impressed by the boy, and he took care of-he took good care of the boy until he become a famous Zen master.

Nishiari-zenji is famous for his study of Shobogenzo, and Morita-zenji is very famous for his zazen practice. There are many stories about his zazen practice. For an instance, when he was crossing the narrow[s] between Hokkaido and Honshu Island, they met a big tornado or typhoon. The ship was almost wrecked. All the seamen, all the passengers, and even seamen including the, you know, captain of the boat was-became seasick, but Morita-zenji in the corner of the room was sitting zazen [laughs, laughter]. He didn't become seasick, and the captain was very much amazed, you know, to see him. And he could eat, you know, and after eating he went to his cabin-and practicing zazen [laughs]. Since then, captain became a very good, you know, student of Morita-zenji [laughs]. But all those-wonderful practice is a result of his difficult practice in his early age at Eihei-ji Monastery.

Our life in monastery, you know, is very simple and monotonous, you know. We are repeating same thing [laughing] every day, over and over. There is nothing to enjoy. So sometime we do something very foolish, you know, to enjoy-how foolish we are! If we find ourselves very foolish, you know, we, you know, we enjoy [laughs] our foolishness, to, you know-to eat radish, you know, without cooking [laughs, laughter]. Just, you know, when we are carrying radish, you know, without washing, without even washing. Bring out the radish and scratch the dirt out [laughs, laughter]. Sometime that is not interesting enough for us [laughs, laughter], so late at night when there are, you know, when they are fast asleep, you know, we, you know, cook it by bucket or something [laughing] outside of the monastery. But once you cook radish, smell is awful! Whole monastery will, you know, [be] filled with the smell of the radish.

Of course, we know, you know, we will be easily found out, but, you know, to do it is most important part. And if we are scolded that is another, you know [laughing]-something, you know-we have something more. They may scold us. "Okay, let's do it!" [Said in a mock conspiratorial voice.] [Laughs.]

Our life in the monastery is so simple and so monotonous, we cannot work fast, you know. We should always work slowly without making noise. We cannot talk loudly. If you enter someone's room, the head of the room will see your-you from your feet to your-up to your head [laughs]. He will check you, you know. If you have some reason it is very difficult to stay. Maybe recently, you know, their masters want-want them to be a priest-good priest. So even though they don't want-they themselves don't want to stay at Eihei-ji, because their teacher, you know, or their master want them to stay at Eihei-ji, so that is maybe why they stay there for one year or so. But no more-not more than that [laughs]. Most people feel in that way.

So I think we have so many students here, but I don't know how many of you will stay with-with us. I don't know how many. If you have good reason to stay here, you will stay. But if you haven't not much reason, I don't know. What I am saying right now is when you have-when you want to be a Buddhist, it is necessary for you to see your-our everyday life more carefully. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

This-this is something-we say ordinary life but it is not ordinary life. It is very, you know, very dangerous and precarious life. We cannot trust people in city so much. Nothing is permanent or reliable in our society. If so, you know, someone should be-should become reliable person, you know-trustworthy person. Or else, you know, whole society will be lost. If it is-if it is hot, when it is hot we need big tree under which we have cool wind. When it rain, we need someone who has umbrella. When you see our human life carefully, you will find out how important it is to become trustworthy person. It is not necessary to be a great man, but we should be good enough to help our neighbors.

So purpose of Buddhism, we say, [is] to help themselves and to help others. Why it is so is-it is actually our neighbor wants some help in some way. I said to carry-to collect the garbage to the garbage can is half of the job, whole job, you know, but we are liable to, you know, ignore to carry the garbage to the garbage can. We are liable to ignore something which is some duty which is dirty, which is not pleasant. We are liable to ignore cleaning the corner of the room. If everyone ignore to clean the corners of the room, the room will be filthy pretty soon. Because someone do it, our room is always clean, and we feel very good in a clean room. There is many, you know, liable to [laughs] tend to in our human life, you know, we are liable to do this, to be like this, to be like that. Many liable to [laughs]. Many apt to. Someone must work hard so that we-all of us can enjoy our life.

Maybe our zazen practice is the practice which most people do not like so much [laughs]. We shouldn't try to attain even enlightenment. You should be there on the black cushion for two days [laughing] without any reason why. There is no "liable to." Just to be there, that is why you practice zazen. When you can do this kind of practice-if you can do shikantaza without expecting anything, I think you can do almost everything which is necessary.

With this spirit-when you have this spirit, you will attain enlightenment, but without this spirit the enlightenment you will have is one of the "liable to." [Laughs.] You will expose your weakness, that's all. There is no true, you know, human nature appear. What you will have is just, you know, false-superficial attainment which is not true.

So final strength will be attained by just sitting. After experiencing-started-starting from various difficulties, the difficulties we have is not actually difficult enough. Just to sit on the cushion is the most difficult thing, as you experience [laughs]. I think you know how difficult it is just to sit on the black cushion. Without true spirit you cannot do that.

So if you, you know, have a chance to arise real way-seeking mind, we should start shikantaza. So for people who has no way-seeking mind, who want some encouragement, who want some candy, we have to give some candy [laughs]. But it is, you know-we should be ashamed of being fooled by candy, you know. Our world is not so easy, you know, and we are foolish enough to be fooled by candy. We are critical with others, and mostly with ourselves very critical. We cannot accept ourselves so easily. That is why we practice zazen.

This time I started some-I started dokusan, but maybe, you know, better to be concentrated on just practice of zazen. Anyway I don't think I can finish dokusan for all the students in two days, so I almost gave up! [Laughs.] I think it's much better to-to just sit with you.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (10/19/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Watanabe Genshu-zenji (1869-1963): 17th dokuju (successive) abbot of Soji-ji.

[2] Arai Sekizen-zenji (1864-1927): 5th dokuju (successive) abbot of Soji-ji.

[3] tokonoma (Jap.): alcove.

[4] Toyo University, Tokyo.

[5] Nishiari Bokusan (1821-1910): the most prominent Meiji scholar of the Shobogenzo. He was a teacher of Oka Sotan-zenji and Ian Kishizawa-zenji, eventually becoming abbot of Soji-ji Temple and head of the Soto-shu.

[6] Juko Morita Goyu (1834-1915): 64th abbot of Eihei-ji. Called the "Double Founder" because of his work in restoring Eihei-ji.

[7] Morotake (Sengai) Ekido-zenji (1805-1879): 1st dokuju (successive) abbot of Soji-ji. According to Zengaki Daijiten (The Great Dictionary of Zen Studies), Ekido was abbot of Ryukai-in, not Eihei-ji, when Morita Goyu would have been a novice. But Ekido and Goyu may also have studied at Eihei-ji for some period of time.

[8] Ekido died at age 74.

5 - Zazen is Like Going to the Restroom

Sunday, March 29, 1970

Zazen is Like Going to the Restroom
San Francisco

How do you feel now? [Laughs.] Excuse me. I thought of funny thing right now [laughs]. I feel as if, you know-I don't know how you feel, but I feel as if I-I have finished, you know, things in restroom [laughs]. As I am pretty old, you know, I go to restroom so often. Even when I was young, I went [to] restroom more than, you know [laughs], usual person. I had, I think, some advantage, you know [laughs, laughter], because of that. When I went to tan- [partial word]-Eihei-ji and sit in tangaryo,[1] for seven days [laughs], I could go to restroom without any guilty conscience because I had to [laughs, laughter]. I was so happy [laughs, laughter] to go to restroom. I think someth- [partial word]-to go to restroom is something to do, you know [laughs, laughter], with our practice.

Ummon[2] may be the first one to make some connection between our practice and restroom. "What is our practice?" Or "What is buddha?"- someone asked him.[3] He said, you know, "toilet paper"-no, not toilet paper. Nowadays it is toilet paper, but he says [laughing, laughter], "something to scratch your-scratch yourself after you-after finishing restroom." That is what he said. And since then, you know, many Zen masters [are] thinking about or practicing on that koan: What is toilet paper? [Laughs.] What he meant by it?

Anyway, our practice is closely related to our everyday life. Physiologically it may be-our-to go to-we go-we have to go to restroom, but psychologically I think we have to practice zazen. In our everyday life, we, you know, eat many things, good and bad: something fancy or something simple, something tasty or something tasteless like water.

But after having this kind of food in our everyday life, in term of study, but actually if you eat, you know, if you study too much without practicing zazen, our thought eventually will become very unhealthy. I think that is, at least, one reason why we practice zazen. It is necessary for us to make our mind blank before we study something. It is like a, you know, to draw something on white paper. If you-if you don't use clean white paper, you cannot, you know, draw something which you want. Sometime you may use some colored paper, but colored paper, you know, is also originally white paper. So it is necessary for us to go back to our original state where we have no-nothing to see, or nothing to think about. Then you will understand what you are doing, you know.

The more you practice zazen, I think, the more you will be interested in your everyday life. At the same time, you know, you will find out, you know, what is something necessary and what is not necessary-what part should be corrected or what part should be emphasized more. So by practice you will-you can organize your life more-more, and at the same time you will know how to organize your life. For some purpose we organize our life, but more important thing is to observe our situation clearly. And to observe our situation clearly we should blank our mind and to start from original starting point. That is, you know, to go to restroom [laughs]. You know, if you go to restroom and get rid of old-squeeze out [laughs, laughter] all the polluted water, then, you know, you will feel good, you know, and you will be encouraged to drink more [laughs, laughter] and to eat more.

But after you eat it, you know [laughs], you should go to restroom. The all-what you eat will be get rid of by going to restroom or exhalation and-inhaling and exhaling. In this way, you know, actually we keep alive. Because I feel, you know, I must say something right now, I make it, you know-I make my idea, you know, I put some water in my idea so that I can talk [laughing] twenty minutes or thirty minutes or more [laughs, laughter].

But actually, I want you, you know, to feel how you feel after zazen. And, you know, in comparison to your everyday life-how usual person enjoy their life-the way to enjoy our life is completely-may be very different-not completely, but-.

Usually, you know, our culture is based on some gaining idea, you know: to accumulate something. Science, for an instance, is accumulation of our knowledge, you know. Modern science-scientist-I-I don't think is greater than the scientist in the 16th century. But we have-the difference is we accumulated our scientific knowledge. And we human being knows how to accumulate it. That is good point and at the same time eventually there is-we have some danger to bury it, you know-to be buried underneath the accumulated knowledge [laughs, laughter]. And we have some danger, also, you know. Trying to survive without going to restroom. Actually, you know, we almost underneath [laughs, pauses, laughter]-we are hardly swimming in the pond of polluted water and air. We are talking about air pollution, but that is just a picture of human being. Actually we are hardly, you know, survive in polluted knowledge.

So maybe that is okay, you know, if we know-if each one of us know [how] to go to restroom without, you know, attaching to something you have in your body. If you have it in your body, you will become attached to it until you get rid of it. Because we think things are yours, you know, ours, we become attached to it. If we think we have everything, we will not be attached to it.

Actually, we have everything. Without going to the moon, you know, we have it. To go to-try to go to moon means, you know, we are-we think the moon is not ours. Our mind, as Buddha told us, is with-with everything, or everything is our mind. Within our mind, everything exist. If we understand things in that way, then we will understand our activity. When we understand ourselves, we will try to, you know, exchange our property with something else.

To study something is to appreciate something. To appreciate something is to be detached from things. When we become detached from things, everything will be ours. Our practice is, you know, to obtain this kind of big mind-in other word, to-to go beyond our-each being-each being including ourselves, and let ourselves work as it work. That is zazen practice. And when we practice zazen, we actually clean up various attachment we have.

We are very much afraid of, you know, death. But, you know, death is something which should happen to us when we are mature enough, you know. When you are young, maybe, you will be very much afraid of death. And if you die, that is terrible thing [laughs]. Yeah, it is so, you know. But if I die, it is not so terrible thing to me and to you too, because I am matured enough, you know, to die.

So I understand our life-my life pretty well, and I understood what is human life, you know-what is to live one day, and what is to live one year, and what is to live, you know, sixty years or one hundred years. So you-anyway, when you become mature, experienced things-or when you eat, you know, many things in this life, I think you-you will be happy to die as if you go to restroom [laughs, laughter]. Yeah, actually it happens in that way, you know.

Old man of eighty or ninety, you know, haven't not much, you know, problem-difficulties. Physically, they may suffer, but that suffering is not so big as you see, you know. You know, it is our habit, you know, when we feel uneasy, and from, you know-when they are young, they have been, you know, thinking about death [as] something terrible [laughs], you know, so when they are dying, you know, they think it is terrible. But actually it-it isn't.

And there is some limit in our capacity to endure suffering-physical suffering. And mentally we-we have, you know, limit of capacity, but we think it is limitless. That is, you know, why we under- [partial word]-we have limitless suffering is because we have limitless desire, you know. So that kind of desire, as Buddha said, create our problem. If you understand our life clearly, actually there is not much problem in our life. Because we do not sit, you know, and we are creating problem, one after another, we are accumulating our problems one after another with limitless desire, so we have fathomless [bottomless?] fear.

So if we only know how to clear up our mind, we will not have so much problem as usual person would have. But as-as you go to restroom every day, you know, we have to practice zazen every day.

If, you know, zazen practice is just for-just to have good feeling in restroom it is all right if you go once [laughs], you know. But, you know, our actual practice or need of practice is much more than that-not to at-[partial word]-not just to attain some freedom from things, but to continue cleaning our mind. That is absolutely necessary.

And in monastic life, the most important thing will be-or the most good practice-the best practice will be to clean restroom. So wherever you go, whatever monastery you may go, you will find out someone-some special person who is cleaning restroom always. We do not, you know, clean our restroom just because it is dirty. Whether it is clean or not, you know, we should clean, you know, restroom until you can continue it-you can do it without any idea of, you know, clean or dirty. If so, that is actually, you know, our zazen practice.

To extend our practice to everyday life is maybe difficult, but actually it is quite simple. It cannot be so difficult, but, you know, as we are lazy, you know, as we don't continue it [laughs], that laziness makes it difficult, that's all. That is why we put emphasis on endurance, or to continue it. We say there should not be any cessation of practice. Practice should go, one after another.

Some student who practice very hard, you know, zazen practice, liable to ignore our everyday life. If someone, you know, attain enlightenment, you know, someone may, you know, ignore our life: "I had attained enlightenment under some great Zen master, so whatever I do, that is okay. [Laughs.] I have complete freedom from good and bad. The only, you know-those who do not have enlightenment experience stick to the idea of good and bad." [Laughs.]

Saying in that way, they ignore their everyday life. They do not take care of their life. They do not how to-they don't know how to organize their life and what kind of rhythms they should have in their own life. Old man has-an old man has, you know, old man's rhythm of life-way of life. Young man has, you know, young ones has their own, you know, way of life. How to know the rhythm of their own life is, you know, to-to understand what they are doing. And if you want to understand what we are doing, it is necessary to see our activity, our life, with clear mind-not m- [partial word]-yeah, mind-or through zazen experience.

Why I came to America was, you know, I was almost, you know, disgusted [laughs] with Buddhist life in Japan. You know, I have too many problems [laughs]. That is maybe why, you know, I came to America. I didn't know that, but I think perhaps [laughs] that will be the reason-would be the reason why I came to America. But when I was, you know, in Japan, I didn't practice zazen [laughs] as I do here, as a matter of fact [laughs, laughter]. Since I came to America, you know, I have-I don't have same problem, you know, as I had in Japan. But I had very different problem [laughs] which I had in Japan. Hmm. I have no time to explain it [laughs, laughter].

Anyway, you know, my mind is like a garbage can [laughs]. So, you know, even I am in America, which is called free country, you know [laughs], my mind is garbage can-even though I am, you know, I am practicing-practicing zazen with you. I am a Japanese, and I have many Japanese friends there. So I have enough problem which Japanese-most Japanese people have [laughing]. In addition to, I have some other problem.

So sometime I-I, you know, I wonder, you know, what am I doing here, you know. But when I know what I am doing, you know, clearly, without any overestimation or underestimation, very honestly [laughs], truly, I have not much, you know, burden in our mind-especially zazen practice has been [sighs]-I think will be-the great help, you know. If I haven't had practicing zazen, you know, I wouldn't have survive in this way, you know.

Last year I was pretty weak, you know, but I am recovering even little by little. I think that is merit of zazen or because of zazen I think I can survive anyway. And, you know, I have no joy of accumulating anything, you know. But I have joy of getting rid of, you know, something dirty [laughs]. That is, you know, how-why I can survive in this way.

I started my practice when I was pretty young, actually. But the more-actually I think I started my practice in its true sense after I came to San Francisco. I think you have pretty difficult time with me [laughs]. I know that, you know, and I am doing, you know, something-I am making you, you know-making your practice difficult. But this kind of effort to understand things from another angle without communicating [with] the people who-who is brought up [in a] quite different cultural background, I think you will understand things more clearly.

To understand things just, you know, [from] some certain egoistic personal or national viewpoint is our weak point. So we cannot develop our culture in its true sense. When our culture came to this point, only way to-to make our culture healthy is to participate [in the] various cultural activity-cultural activity of various human being. Then you will understand yourself better, as I understood myself better, you know-zazen better since I came to San Francisco.

If you understand yourself better and others better, you know, there is not much to study-just to be yourself. And just to be good American is just to be good Japanese. And just to be good Japanese is just to be, you know, to be good American. Because we stick to [laughs], you know, Japanese way or American way [laughs], our mind become wastepaper basket.

I think that is-if you notice this point, I think how important-you will understand how important it is to practice zazen. Maybe I am forcing you Japanese practice [laughs]. I know, you know, what I am doing [laughs, laughter]. But there is some reason, you know, why I do this. If you are ready, you know ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... to get rid of various dirty things, then there is no need. But fortunately or unfortunately, even though you don't like it, we should go to restroom [laughing]-stinky restroom. I am so sorry [laughs, laughter], but I think we have to go to restroom anyway [laughs] as long as we live.

If I am young, you know, I like to sing a Japanese folk song right now [laughs] about restroom [laughs, laughter].

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (4/4/00).

[1] tangaryo: a period of continuous sitting for several days in the monastery quarters bearing the same name; initial sitting required of a novice to enter a Zen monastery. From tanga, itinerant monk; ryo, quarters.

[2] Yunmen Wenyan (Ummon Bun'en): 864-949. Dharma successor of Xuefeng Yicun (Seppo Gison).

[3] Mumonkan (The Gateless Gate), Case 21.

1970 april (3)

1 - Buddha's Birthday Lecture

Sunday, April 12, 1970

Buddha's Birthday Lecture
San Francisco

The April-April the eighth is the day we celebrate Buddha's birthday in China and Japan. As you know, Buddha was born as a prince of Shakya tribe-a king of Shakya tribe. And when he was born in the Lumbini Garden,[1] nagas[2] poured sweet tea. That is why we pour the sweet tea. But actually we don't know the historical origin about this because we have not much record about the sweet tea.

But-but we have record about the festival we have-we had right now. Maybe in Japan they started to mix this kind of tea for the infant Buddha. And in China and in Japan, the infant Buddha statue is very lovely and very tiny. The largest one in Japan is maybe fifteen inches high, which is in Todai-ji Temple, where the big Buddha is.[3] As the Vairochana Buddha in Todai-ji is big, the infant Buddha is also big. But usually infant Buddha for this ceremony is as small as this [gestures?].

In Japan, right n- [partial word]-nowadays we celebrate around eighty-around eighth of April on Sunday. Here in America, Japanese people celebrate his birthday mostly also around eighth on Sunday. The other day when we have meeting, we had, you know, beautiful cake for the birthday, and then some of them celebrated Buddha's birthday right here, singing "Happy Birthday" [laughs, laughter]. I think that is the first, you know, happy birthday song for the Buddha [laughs, laughter]. Many things is happening here! [Laughter.]

Zen group in America, including Zen Center, [are] developing-developing so rapidly. And after, you know, painting the hall and decorating flower shrine, and cleaning up various rooms and hallway, we have this ceremony. This is, I think, very meaningful thing. The flower shrine and altar we have right now is very tentative one-not permanent one. I think this is very meaningful.

The Soto practice is something like this always-something had been-has been something like this. We are trying to improve the way we celebrate Buddha, the way we decorate altar. But if we lose the spirit this is-maybe in this way could be very, you know, awful thing, you know, to just decorate without taking care of things. Like ambulatory [traveling?] actor, you know, goes around various place without not much, you know, artistic sense. But if we practice-continue to practice-like we have been practicing our way in America, something which is very meaningful and beautiful will result.

Celebrating our Zen Center effort, headquarter of Soto School in Japan promised us to give us another maybe $3000, and they allowed me to wear yellow robe. That is the robe I weared for the first Buddha's birthday in Zen Center. I don't know why, but I-I do not like that kind of, you know, beautiful [laughs]. Some things too beautiful.

But today I felt something quite different feeling. I appreciate their appreciation of our effort to develop Buddha's way, which was-which has been transmitted more than 2500 years. This is the most meaningful thing. In this way, if we make our effort, something will result in this country. And as the Buddhist-bodhisattva vow is to continue our way forever. If so, Buddha's teaching, something which was told by Buddha, will be developed forever. With this spirit we should celebrate Buddha's birthday, even [though] the way we celebrate is not perfect.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican (12/30/99).

[1] The Lumbini Garden or Grove is located near the capital of the Shakya kingdom in present-day Nepal.

[2] naga (San.): literally, serpent or dragon; a benevolent half-divine creature.

[3] One of the Seven Large Temples of the Southern Capital. The Great Buddha, cast in bronze and dedicated in 752, is housed in the Daibutsuden.

2 - Officially Opening Beginner's Mind Temple

Saturday, April 25, 1970

Remarks at the Ceremony Officially Opening Beginner's Mind Temple
San Francisco

Suzuki-roshi (speaking formally): On this day of the opening of Mahabodhisattva Zendo and main office of Zen Center, we arranged this altar, making offering of fruits and vegetables which were produced in this land of Mahabodhisattva, reciting sutra of Daihi-shin Darani, the Sutra of the Great Compassionate One.

With this merit, we want to express our way-seeking mind with our deceased friend Trudy Dixon, Baiho Sesshin [1 word],[2] and ZenkeiDosakuKoji, Soto Sanjo,[3] and Sister F. Carlson, and all those who helped our activity by the spirit of Buddha or by various kinds of offering.

Hereby, we want to practice bodhisattva way step by step, so that our practice of step by step was paying back the mercy of Buddha and great bodhisattvas in India, China, and Japan.

Hereby, now, I have one statement which has been in my mind for more than ten years: Even on top of the mountain of great merit, we should try not ... [Tape recorder stopped!]

-----
Source: City Center tape first transcribed verbatim by Katharine Shields (6/19/00). Checked against tape by Bill Redican (9/28/00).

[1] The tape on which this transcript was made was a compilation tape numbered SR-70-08-09. The original tapes appear to be SR-70-04-25A and -B. The original tapes may contain the complete lectures, but they are afflicted with sound problems that must first be remedied.

[2] Two Buddhist names were given to her at her lay ordination in 1967: Baiho Sesshin ("Fragrant Plum, Pure Mind").

[3] Sanjo may mean "delegate" or "visitor": e.g., delegate from the Soto-shu (school) headquarters.

3 - How to Have Sincere Practice

Tuesday, April 28, 1970

How to Have Sincere Practice
San Francisco

Since Tatsugami-roshi[1] came, you must have heard Dogen-zenji's name so many times. But Dogen-zenji may not like to hear his name so many times [laughs]. But unfortunately he had a name like Dogen, so [laughs] there is no other way to address him. So we call him Dogen-zenji or Dogen.

As you know, he didn't like to say "Zen" even, or Zen-in China they called monks who sit in zazen, called [them] "Zen monks," but he didn't like to call "Zen" even. And he said if necessary you should call us "Buddha's disciple." Shamon, you know, he called himself Shamon Dogen-"A Monk Dogen."

In China, there were many various schools like Rinzai, Soto, Ummon, Hogen, Igyo. But Nyojo-zenji's-Nyojo-zenji,[2] who was Dogen's teacher then, was not, according to Dogen, [from] one of the five schools of Zen or seven[3] schools of Zen. His Zen is just to practice zazen, to realize-to actually realize by his body Buddha's mind, Buddha's spirit. That was his Zen. That was why Dogen accepted him as his teacher.

Before he-Dogen went to China, he studied Hieizan [Onjo-ji?]-Tendai-main temple of Tendai school. And after Tendai, he went to Eisei-Eisai-zenji[4]-Yoshin-ji [Kennin-ji?], and then he went to China because Eisai-zenji passed away when he was very young. So he went to China to continue his practice with good teacher.

He may have-according to Kenzei-ki,[5] he already attained enlightenment under Eisai, but he wanted to continue his practice with right teacher. So he went to China with Myozen, who was also one of the-Eisai's outstanding teacher-no, disciple. But he couldn't accept-although he visited many temples and saw many Zen teachers, but he couldn't accept them as his teacher until he met with Nyojo-zenji. And when he saw Nyojo-zenji, without studying under him, when he saw for the first time, he accepted him, Nyojo-zenji, as his teacher. And Nyojo-zenji also thought, "This is my disciple. This is my disciple who will carry my practice."

And when he was practicing with Nyojo-zenji he attained-he-someone-Nyojo-zenji was scolded someone who was sleeping in his practice. And at that time-the feeling or experience he had at that time was submitted by Dogen to his teacher. And he became a completely-he transmitted-he received the transmission from Nyojo-zenji and came back to Japan.

The first thing we should notice here is Dogen was a monk who wanted to be sincere-one of the sincere good monks of Buddha or disciple-disciple of Buddha. That's all. And he has nothing in his mind when he went to-he saw Nyojo-Eisai-zenji, he already gave up scholarly study of Buddhism which he was-he had been involved in for long long time.

But his problem is how to be a good disciple from the bottom of his heart and mind. So for him to have this spirit it was the most important point. He was so sincere student that he couldn't accept teachers who is not so sincere as he was. Already he gave up scholarly study, so he couldn't accept someone who is talking about Buddhism. Already he experienced what is Zen, so he couldn't accept someone who is just talking about what is Zen. But what he wanted to see is a man who [is] really practicing Zen in its true sense. So when he saw Nyojo-zenji, who is practicing his way, he accepted him as his teacher. And when Nyojo-zenji saw him, he could acknowledge his sincerity-his sincere practice. And-the next question will be what is sincere practice? What is the way-seeking mind?

Perhaps, you know, you want to know what is sincerity in your practice. First of all, when you become very sincere you cannot accept which is superficial. But bef- [partial word]-when you are not so sincere, it is difficult to know what is sincerity, who is sincere student. It is difficult and almost impossible. Only when you become very sincere, you can-you will know what is sincerity.

It is like to know-to appreciate art. You know, when you see-first of all, if you want to appreciate good art, the most important thing is to see the good work. If you, you know, if your eye-if you see a good work always, if you-in case you see something which is not good enough, you will immediately know this is not so good because your eyes is already sharp enough to know what is bad, you know, what is good work. And when you know what is good work, you will know what is bad, you know-what is not-so-good work.

That is why Dogen-zenji always put emphasis on the teacher. If you want to know what is sincerity, you should have good teacher. Only when you have good teacher you will know-by him you will know-by seeing him you will know who is good teacher-what is good teacher. When you see sincere person, you will know what is sincerity. That is not something which I can describe. That is something you will feel by your intuition. That kind of intuition will be gained by seeing good teachers always.

And next thing which is important is to give up or to be ready to give up everything, including your understanding of teaching or your knowledge about, you know, Buddhism. Most of you may think, you know-may accept some teacher who say-whose knowledge-whose knowledge is understandable-acceptable for you. You will say he is good teacher [laughs], you know.

But the standard is-you cannot judge your teacher by your low, you know, standard. Only when you have well-polished-ups, you know, eyes or standard of judgment, you will understand-you will see-you can tell which is good and which is bad. To have-but as long as you have some standard, that standard may be your own, you know, standard which cannot be perfect.

So best thing is, you know, to give up everything. Many teachers, you know, give up-burned all the sutra they study and practiced zazen only. In that case, he had-he did not rely on anything, but he just practiced zazen to purify his mind. To accept true teaching-teaching can be-any teaching can be your good teaching for you, but because of your foolish judgment, you know, teaching does not make much sense. You-you are spoiling good teaching by your own judgment. But when you have no judgment, and when you see or accept teaching as it is, that is, in other word, good teaching.

What he-what Dogen transmitted from his teacher is this acceptance-giving up everything. Great spirit-to-to be ready to give up everything. Especially when he is practiced zazen, he has nothing in his mind. He was just practicing zazen. That, you know, purity of practice struck [struck?] him.

When you are, you know, trying to give up everything, you don't-you haven't give up everything yet. When you become tired of foolish, you know, discussion or foolish study of, you know, foolish mind-to seek for something which is called truth or true teaching, you will be completely involved in pure practice, giving up everything.

My teacher, Kishizawa Ian, he was a-actually a great scholar. But his study was started after when he give up everything [laughs]. He didn't care for position or fame or, you know, reputation. Whatever people may say about him he doesn't care. And he continued his study and his practice just to meet some ancient teachers who devoted themselves to the-to our teaching. When we, you know, realize this point, there is no Soto or no Rinzai, you know. Before you give up everything, you have Soto or Rinzai. When you give up everything, there is no Soto or Rinzai.

In Dogen-zenji describing various teachers' ways of practice, among them there are Rinzai teachers, Soto teachers, and some other schools-teachers of many schools. He just, you know, wanted to see him through books. That was also true with my teacher. Whenever he meets some student or some scholar, what he ask is-give me some record you have. Whatever record it may be, he was very much interested in to see it, to read it. He was seeking for his friend always, his teacher always. Whether he is famous or not, it doesn't matter for him. Only when you give up everything, you can see true teacher.

Even name of Buddhism is already dirty spot on our practice. It is not teaching but the stu- [partial word]-but their character or their effort. When you seek for even enlightenment, his mind is not big enough. He is not sincere enough because he, you know-he has some purpose in his study. To, you know-for us I think everyone want to see a great man. That is not, you know-that is not a selfish desire. It is the desire which everyone has. But desire to accomplish something or even to propagate Buddhism is not pure enough. Just to-just to see someone who is holy and great and pure is our purpose of studying Zen or Buddhism. [Gap in tape: Recorder stopped for unknown period and restarted on same side.]

... on what point your teacher could be strict. First of all, when you are lazy [laughs] he will be very angry. If, you know, good, intelligent student, you know, always involved in something which is not pure enough, he may be angry. He is wasting his time.

As much as possible, we should follow our inner voice, rejecting useless things and how-sometime, you know, we will think something is necessary to support yourself. But Dogen says if you study hard-pure-if your practice is pure enough, you will be anyway supported by Buddha. You should[n't] worry who will support you or what will happen to you. You shouldn't worry about this kind of thing. Moment after moment, you should completely devote yourself which you-listening to your inner voice. That is to see someone who is great in its true sense. To see someone who can accept-who you can accept-that is the most important point for Zen student.

So if you cannot accept a teacher as your teacher, you should seek for someone-someone else as your teacher. Without this kind of spirit, it is almost impossible to study our way.

With this spirit, or to polish up our way-seeking mind, we practice zazen, you know. How you practice zazen is, you know, to have right posture. He s- [partial word]-Tatsugami-roshi said [laughs] very interesting remark, you know, "How about your mudra?" "Hai." [Laughs.] That was very good!

"How about your eyes?" "Hai." [Laughs, laughter.] In short, zazen is, you know, "Hai." That is a [laughter]- "How about your," you know, "spine?" "Hai." [Laughs.] "How about your chin?" "Hai." [Laughs.]

It is, you know-actually you are not checking your posture. You are, you know, just, you know, accepting your posture: "Hai." [Laughs.] That is zazen. There is no more activity in your practice, and that spirit is the greatest of all the spirit you may have [laughs]. Even though, you know, you are like this, you know [probably gesturing], "How is the posture?" [Laughs, laughter.] "How is your breathing?" "Okay" [said in a humorous, laboring voice] [laughs, laughter].

There is no other secret in our practice. If you have something more than that, that is heresy [laughs, laughter]. You have some extra. When you have some extra fancy practice, you know, your practice will not reach to the point. I think everything is-may be the same.

Today I was mending someone's broken cup, you know. If I fix it-Chht- [laughs], that is okay, you know. If I-after fixing it, if I do like this [probably gesturing] [laughing], you will, you know, break it. So the work you do will not be so good. If you-if you just do it [laughs], that is zazen. But usually, you know, you do like this [probably gesturing] [laughs, laughter]. That is extra, you know, and waste of time, and you are spoiling yourself by doing this. "Hai." [Laughs.]

"Don't kill," you know. It is same thing with precepts. "Don't kill," you know. You may s- [partial word]-you may think, "No, I cannot survive [laughs] if I don't kill anything. No, that is not possible." That is you are doing this way [probably gestures]. "Don't kill." "Hai." Whether it is possible, or not is it is out of the question. "Don't kill"-we don't want to kill. So someone-if someone said, "Don't kill," "Mmm. [As in "yes.]" That's right." [Laughs.] "I will not kill." Then you have perfect buddha-nature at that time.

Because you say, you know, "that is not possible," or "impossible," "right" or "wrong," and because you compare Buddhist precepts to, you know, Christian commandment, so you lose the point. When you say "okay," whether it is commandment or our precepts, it doesn't matter. There we have buddha-mind or perfect mercy of God-of the god.

So if we notice this point, there is no other secret. Rejecting everything, giving up everything. When you listen to your inner voice directly, without even trying to listen to it, whenever you chance-you have chance to hear it, there there is the way. There there is a voice of Buddha.[6] [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

So when-when you see or when you listen to your teacher, you will not think about his nationality or his sex or whether he is old or young-it doesn't matter. That is what Dogen says. Even a-a-a girl of seven years old may be your teacher. If you know this point-secret of practice-that is pure practice which you can apply to your everyday life.

Our instruction of practice-pull in your chin, or keep your spine straight, or mudra-about mudras-are concentrated on this point. This is the front door to the various religion. There is no other doors. As Dogen-zenji said, "Don't hang around"-hang around [laughs, laughter]-"hang around the gate. You should directly enter the gate." Hai. Okay. Then you are inside of the gate, you know. If you sit [probably gestures] [laughs, laughter]-and if you peek in the inside of the gate, wondering what-what is going [on] there, you have no chance to, you know, practice pure practice. It is quite easy if you have-if you say "Hai!" That's all. No other secret.

My teacher[7] had many disciples [laughs]. Not so many, but pretty many. And he was always angry with us-always [laughs]-because we are lazy. We are always pretending, you know-we were always pretending to study, you know, Dogen's way. But actually, we were not. So he was very angry with us.

But he cannot be always angry with us, so he start to speak something to the audience, you know-many people in lecture hall. He [laughs]-instead of angry with us, he was angry with people-all the audience. Rrrr! [Laughs, laughter.] Ohh.

So I was-we were listening to him, you know-we feel as if we are scolded. And, you know, when he was not, you know, scolding us, we realized, you know, what we are doing, and we become-became very sorry.

"The first precept-'Don't kill.'"

This is a precept transmitted from Buddha to us.

"Can you keep it or not?"

And he said, "Yes! I will keep it!"

This is the way you keep precepts, you know. He was almost screaming [laughs]:

Dai-ichi husessho-kai, nanji yoku tamotsuya inaya?

Yoku tamotsu![8] [Laughs.]

"This is the way you keep precepts!" you know.

We have-we don't have that kind of spirit. When you say, "Yes I will!" there there is Buddha's voice. When you hesitate, you are always, you know [laughs], you are always saying nothing happened to you. Only when you say, "Yes I will!" and feel how you feel it when you said "Yes I will!"-when you fix your mind to do so, whatever happen. Without spirit-without this spirit, you cannot, you know, extend our way, especially in America, I think.

I may be difficult to accept Tatsugami-roshi's way, you know. I know that [laughs]. I know very well. But, you know, you should try, and you should say, "I will do it!"-not because it, you know, Buddha's teaching or Japanese way or American way or appropriate to our society or not. You should say it-you should do it-and feel what it was.

[Laughs.] Did you see the movie 2000? [Laughs, laughter.] That is what you are doing. 2001-or what it?-2001-square, I am. All the monkeys, you know, hanging around [laughs, laughter]. [Probably gestures like a hominid.] That is, you know [laughs], what we are doing. If you feel it-if you, you know, seize it, nothing happen. It is yours. Maybe that is the key point of practice and way to save all sentient beings.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Sara Hunsaker and Bill Redican 9/26/00. Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Tatsugami Sotan Ryosen-roshi: Soto Zen master and ino-roshi at Eihei-ji monastery in Japan for many years. A teacher or master of Jean Ross, Grahame Petchey, and Philip Wilson (all students of Suzuki-roshi) while they attended Eihei-ji. He visited Tassajara to help establish monastic forms and practices. He was head of training at Tassajara for the Spring and Fall 1970 practice periods.

[2] Ch'an master Tiantong Rujing (Tendo Nyojo): 1163-1228.

[3] The five schools Suzuki-roshi mentioned plus the two schools into which Rinzai split: Yogi and Oryo.

[4] Also Yosai-zenji.

[5] Biography of Dogen written in Japanese by Kenzei, 14th abbot of Eihei-ji.

[6] The rest of the lecture was not in the original transcript. It was entered here from Side B of the original tape.

[7] Kishizawa Ian-roshi.

[8] Suzuki-roshi is speaking in a loud, ironic, and formal voice-probably imitating his teacher Kishizawa Ian-zenji-presenting a short dialog of two voices. Dai (great); -ichi (number one); hu (not); sessho (kill); -kai (precept); nanji (thee [older form of Japanese]); yoku (well); tamo (keep); -tsuya inaya (or not [makes the sentence a question]). Yoku tamotsu! (I must keep it well!)

1970 mei (9)

1 - Sesshin Lecture #1: on breathing

Saturday, May 02, 1970

Sesshin Lecture #1
On Breathing

San Francisco

Right now you-your feeling has changed from the feeling you had in your sitting. This is important. When you start a two-day sesshin you think, "I must sit two days continuously." But that is not the way you should practice [laughs]. If you, you know, think in that way, you may feel-you may be very much discouraged: "Oh my! I have to sit two days or seven days."

It is actually better to sit one period after one period: "Okay, I will sit one period." Then, after kinhin, you must say to yourself, "I must sit one more period." [Laughs, laughter.] And then, you know, you start kinhin. And after kinhin you think "one more period." In that way, if you practice zazen, you don't feel so bad. [Laughs, laughter.] I think-if I say so, you may say, "You are fooling me" [laughs]. But actually, it is not so. That is, you know, how things is going-how things are going always. And so, you know, according to our teaching, time is like, you know, like a circle of fire, you know. This is, you know-here there is burning fire. This is actually-time is going, you know. It looks like one red circle, but-it is not so-actually it is continuation of, you know, each fire. It looks like so. This is famous, you know, parable: senkarin.[1]

Usually you understand time something continual from past to future. But actually it is the successive, continuous-continuation of events-each events. One after another, events take place. So it-one after another, it takes place-things take place. You naturally think, you know, there is something-there is some-something like time which is always continuing-continuously exist. Or you have idea of some line which, you know, [extends] from past to future, you know. But this is just abstract idea from each event.

So actually what is taking place is each event. Now, you know, you are sitting. Moment after moment you are sitting. One period after one period-another period you are sitting. So if you indulge into this kind of continuity of time, you become lazy and you cannot practice-you cannot put your effort fully on each moment.

We say this kind of practice-zengo-saidan [2]-saidan is "to cut." Zen is "before," and go is "after": "before and after" should be cut-should be separated. If this is wine, you know [laughs-takes drink of water, so was probably referring to his cup of water]-if you take wine always before each meal, you will be always drunk [laughs, laughter]. That is not our practice, you know. Our practice should be practice piece by piece, you know, not always like-we say in Japanese, we say [laughs]-do you know a horse, you know, sometime-horse is, you know-horse pee [laughing]-horse, you know-horse piss, or what do you say? Horse is-once horse is, you know, start to-I don't know what you say [laughing, laughter]. It comes out-it doesn't stop-ssssss-for pretty long time. We say, "Don't do it like a horse." That is not good practice. If you practice two-day sesshin like a horse, maybe that is worse than horse.

So, you know, each period you should renew your practice. So sometime you may drink, but sometime you should be able to stop it. If you cannot stop it, you know, that is bad practice. In Japan we keep wine in a uden[3]-I cannot pronounce that word-barrel?

Various students: [Various inaudible.] Keg. Keg.

[Laughs.] That ["barrel"] is very difficult word for me to pronounce. If you, you know, take continuously wine, that is-we say "wet barrel," you know. Wet barrel is not our practice. Sometime our body, you know, should be very dry, you know, from wine. If you, you know-even though you take maybe a lot of wine, if you take it once in a while, we say that is the medicine-the medicine of all medicines, we say [laughs, laughter]. Medicine of a hundred medicines, we say. It-it is medicine if you take once in a while.

So our practice should be, you know-although we practice zazen every day, we should renew our practice day by day, one after another. So even, you know, in one practice it is good to check your practice. As [Sotan Ryosen] Tatsugami-roshi[4] said, you know, "How about your mouth?" "Hai." "How about your ears and shoulders?" "Hai." "How about your neck?" "Hai." In that way, you can renew your practice.

Before your practice-when your practice is not so good, it is better to check your practice maybe several time in one period. But when your practice make-is pretty good, there will not be not necessary to check so often. Breathing, you know-breathing is very important for you, but if you want to have good breathing, you have to have good posture. And when you have good posture, you should understand how you take good breathing.

Tonight I want to explain how we take good breathing. Why your posture is important for your right breathing or good breathing is you need, you know-good structure of muscles around your, you know, waist. And those muscles, you know-usually, you know, your breathing is going, you know, like this [demonstrates]. And it doesn't reach here [possibly pointing to hara], and you haven't-you haven't a feeling of muscles here around your waist. And the good breathing-when you-good breathing means deeper breathing-deeper breathing is, you know, when you-this is just natural breathing-usual breathing. And deeper one is-must go, you know, from here, you know, deeper to your tummy. It should reach here. And from here, you know, to here, actually you have nothing to exhale anymore. Your lung is empty, but your muscles is, you know-will work-start to work with some feeling. And actually your diaphragm is pressing everything down a little bit, just to make space for your inhaling.

So, you know, although you have nothing to exhale, you are making, you know, you are preparing for your next inhaling. I-I don't know, you know, my explanation is physically, you know, physiologically right or wrong. This is my feeling.

When you do so, you know, you will have deep calm feeling, but if you take inhaling and exhaling like this-just like this-you have no chance to, you know, to have deep, calm, empty feeling. So one after another, you know, your feeling will be replaced by holding your breathing. You stop-actually you stop your exhaling and hold a little while and inhale.

And when you start this-as someone-I think that was Sekida.[5] Do you know Sekida? Some Japanese priest who is teaching at Hawai'i. He, you know, he is in Diamond S- [partial word]-what was-what was-

Various students: Diamond Sangha?

Oh, Diamond Sangha. But what was the-Student: [1 word unclear.]

No. I mean the mag- [magazine?]

Student: Publication?

-publication.

Student: Oh. Also Diamond Sangha [1 word].

Diamond Sangha. Yeah. He explained exhaling this way. [Gestures, laughs.] This is interesting, you know. [Exhales with a barely audible "mmm" sound.] So he-sometime, especially for beginner, it is difficult to exhale smoothly, you know, from the beginning to end. So if you, you know, do this way [exhales again with audible overtones to breathing, laughs]-this is easy, actually. I think that is interesting. I think you can- you may try that one, but if possible, you know, do it smoothly, you know. Like this-not like this, but this is great help, you know. He suggested-he was suggesting exhaling this way. Anyway, inhaling is-if your exhaling is complete, inhaling is not so difficult. Just do it naturally [takes breath] and exhale.

Some Zen Master said your breathing could be three times a minute, you know. It is pretty long. But how you do it is to have deep exhaling. And because your mind is calm and your physical activity is not so, you know, fast, so that kind of slow breathing will be sufficient.

The pain, you know, in your legs is, you know, almost [laughs] continuously, you know, come. But if you have this kind of practice, or this kind of, you know, technique or-not technique, but practice, by this kind of practice you can endure the pain. The only way you can, you know, endure your pain is, you know, to forget it, you know [laughs]. Let it-let it be painful. That is the only way. If you are painful, that is not-even though you are painful, that is not my problem [laughs, laughter]. So be painful if you like [laughs, laughter].

How you have this kind of feeling is to have good breathing. To have calm-calmness of your mind. So when-if you are completely concentrated in your perfect breathing, you will not be bothered by anything. But it may take time, you know, before you, you know-before you can apply this kind of technique when you are painful. So at first, maybe, when you become painful, you know, it is-how you endure it is to build up, you know, right practice. But usually when you become painful you [laughs] start to move, you know, to-start to move your legs. That will not help. So to, you know, fix your posture, and pain does not go this way. It goes up and down and up and down [laughs, laughter], so there is nothing-there is no need to worry about it. It will naturally come down [laughs], although it may go up again [laughs, laughter]. So it will not hurt your legs.

This is the problem everyone has. Even Japanese people have this problem of pain. I think we Japanese people has more, maybe, pain because our legs are short, you know, so it-this is like this, so [probably points to own legs, laughs]. Yours is long, so, you know, on your ankle, you know, it is not so-the angle is better, you know. Our legs are short, so angle is sharp, you know, so pain we have here is worse, I think.

No problem, you know-in zazen, no problem to, you know-this way no problem. But problem we have is this way [probably gestures], you know. That is why it is so painful. And here [probably gestures], you know, we have pain. So if legs are short, you know, the pressure we have here is more-more pressure we have here. And here [probably gestures], we twist-we have to twist [laughs] our legs more like this because of short leg [laughs, laughter].

And someone may think it will, you know, stop your circulation. I don't think that is true [laughs]. If you have-if your friend is a doctor, please ask him, you know, why it is it doesn't prevent circulation so much, you know, by crossing our legs this way. I don't know why, but it doesn't stop our circulation so much.

This is also true in our everyday life. But, you know, this kind of, maybe, theory is also true, but we Zen student does not try to understand our everyday life psychologically or applying this kind of, you know, theory in our everyday life-on our everyday life. But we, you know, we rather extend this kind of feeling which we have in our practice.

So without thinking or without trying to extend our experience to everyday life, naturally we should be able to organize our everyday life. And we have to acquire some-a kind of character so that you can always act properly, think properly, observe properly. Why we cannot observe things properly is because we have a kind of, you know, pattern of life, you know. We are always-each person is always repeating same habitual, you know, way over and over. It is very hard for each-for him to change his way. Even though you know what you are doing [laughs], it is difficult to change it.

So best thing is, you know, without working on your worst point, you know-instead of working on the painful difficult point, to, you know, to adjust your way, you know, by practice of Zen. So if you adjust your way of life in zendo, in your everyday life, you know, there is no need--not much need to try to correct your way or try to adjust your way, because you can do it without thinking, without being concerned so much about it.

No Zen master, you know-almost all the, maybe, famous Zen master is-are the people [laughs] who had very bad habit when he was young. It is-I-it is amazing to find out, you know. If you the picture of a good Zen master when he was young, you know, you will be amazed [laughs, laughter]. You can see, you know, by the picture, you know, how, you know, short-tempered he was [laughter] or how stubborn he was [laughs]. You can see, you know, just by glance of him-"Oh!" [Laughs, laughter.]

But, you know, you-it is almost, you know, impossible to believe that he was his picture when he was young. Of course, you know, it took many, many years it be a Zen master [laughs], but that is possible, you know. I think that is a great encouragement for us [laughs, laughter].

I was very short-tempered, very short-tempered when I was young. I know how impatient I was when I was young, but people said, "He is the most patient." [Laughing, laughter.] I feel very funny when he said, "He is the most patient person." I immediately want to say, "No!" But-but it was-on the other hand, it is good feeling, you know [laughs], when they admire my, you know, patience. "Oh, he is very patient."

[Said in an ironic voice.] So I just listen to them. "Okay." [Laughs, laughter.]

Zazen practice is, you know, may be difficult-very difficult, but I think it is easiest way to correct your, you know, short point-shortcoming. It is almost impossible to correct your shortcoming. [Sentence probably finished. Tape turned over. Little or nothing seems lost.] But by practice we can do it.

After so many times of repeating our human life, we say he attained that kind of-he obtained that kind of character. When we talk about a great Zen master, maybe so. But I think when they say so, I think they have some reason. That reason-they have some experience of it. To know their former lives is a kind of, you know, magical power which only a buddha has.

But if you know how, you know, how our practice change your character, you know, I think you can understand what they actually mean. Maybe, you know, if you try to change your character in-only in this life, it is almost impossible. Actually it is not possible, but zazen practice will change your character completely. This is a kind of magic, you know, even though I don't know my past life. But I knowed-[laughs]-I know this life and how I change, you know, from my childhood life to my life we-I have now.

Whether your practice is good or bad, if you sit, I am sure you will change. The old students, you know, who have been sitting for many years, you know, I think, know this fact and see the change our-which our student made.

So day by day, you know, without having big ambition, you know, just to sit is enough. Don't be involved in hasty, you know, idea [laughs]: "I have been sitting for three years, but nothing happen," you may say.
But a great thing happened already. That he sit for three years is big [loud laugh, loud laughter] change. That is also-already big change, you know, and he-he doesn't give up [laughs] the sitting. But he complains, that's all. It is good sometime to complain.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997.
Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Sara Hunsaker and Bill Redican 9/6/00.

[1] senkarin (Jap.) or hsüan-hua-lun(WG Chin.): Spinning a burning piece of rope or stick in a circle gives the single burning ember the appearance of a ring of fire. Used in the Yuanjue jing (PY Chin.) or Engaku-kyo (Jap.)-The Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment, an early 8th century Chinese Mayayana sutra-as a metaphor for the illusory nature of existence.

[2] zengo-saidan: cutting before and after; severing the past and the future; transcending the sequence of time.

[3] Spelling uncertain.

[4] See also SR-70-04-28.

[5] Katsuki Sekida (1893-19??): author of Zen Training (1975) and Two Zen Classics (1977). He taught in Hawai'i from 1963 to 1970.

2 - Sesshin Lecture #2: helping others

Saturday, May 02, 1970

Sesshin Lecture #2
Helping Others

San Francisco

First of all, a sincere-our practice-sincere practice-our sincere practice is not, you know, practice just for himself. This is not so difficult to understand. Bodhisattva practice is not just to help himself, but to help others. We put more stress to help others. That is bodhisattva practice.

I think because you are not so considerate in your everyday life, you have that question: you know, why we have to practice zazen, or what is sincere practice? If you find out how difficult it is to help others, with bodhisattva mind, with mind of selflessness, you may, you know, imagine how difficult it is to practice to help others. And actually, all the problems we human being has [are] caused by our carelessness, careless activity, or selfish activity. That is, you know-those small careless activity one by one accumulated will cause a big trouble for our society. If we realize this point, you know, we find out the reason why we must practice zazen.

I think you have-you must have read-some of you must have read Zuimonki.[1] You know, in Zuimonki, Dogen-zenji is discussing about this everyday problems we have, and he, you know, explain what is bodhisattva mind.

Last night, Yoshimura-sensei,[2] you know, was asked to help someone's schedule of trip [laughs], and he had to sit up until half past twelve [laughs]. [Laughter.] He knows, you know, of course, we have sesshin, you know. Even though he may sleep, you know, today-today's sesshin, knowing that he has to help someone who [is] making trip-this is, you know, already a big problem to discuss, you know: whether he should help others, sacrificing his sesshin, or whether he should refuse-refuse it because practice of zazen is more important than making a trip.

Now, what will you do [laughs] when you are asked, you know, "please help me," you know? Without knowing how important it is to practice zazen, what will you do? Ahh, this is, you know, very-may be very difficult problem. We cannot say, you know, you should refuse it or you shouldn't refuse it. The point is, if you refuse it because you have strong confidence, you know, in our practice-just because you have strong confidence in our practice, then you should refuse it. But [if] even a slightest, you know-not doubt, but slightest selfish idea is involved in his word, maybe he shouldn't. Sometime we refuse things because of some reason, because of making some excuse. But that is-mostly those excuse is just for himself, you know, based on his selfish idea.

So you say to practice-if you come and sit here that is our practice. If you think so, that is, you know, too easy understanding of our practice. To practice zazen, refusing everything, without doing anything, asking someone else what he should do, and making time for himself, and practice here, is, you know-when you practice here you have a big responsibility. If you feel very good, you know [laughs], asking everything for your wife or some-for your friend, and feel good to practice here, that is too selfish practice. That is not our practice. Here, you see, you may find out how-what is sincere practice.

Because he couldn't, you know, refuse it, he sit up until half past twelve. So accordingly, he may be sleeping [laughs] on cushion today [laughs, laughter]. Do you think that is, you know, bad practice? It is very difficult to say whether our practice is good or bad. If you think [about?], [3] you know, the real meaning of practice, you cannot easily criticize someone's practice. Of course, if he sleep, you know, he will get a big slap [laughs] from student-even student.

But a kyosaku, [4] you know, is not-symbolize Buddha's mercy, which is not involved in right or wrong, good or bad. Just to help, you know, someone's practice, there we have Buddha's kyosaku. But most people mix up ordinary criticism with Buddha's kyosaku. Buddha's kyosaku should be very strict. It should be like a sword. But our mind-or Buddha's mind should be actually the most generous and merciful, ready to help everyone, as much as possible.

Originally, we cannot rely on moral code, or idea of right or wrong. Because we cannot rely on any rules or moral, we must practice zazen so that we can be both very strict and very generous, always ready to help others. So our zazen is not just matter of a form. The spirit we practice is the most important.

In Zuimonki, Dogen-zenji is talking about when we are asked to do something-or for an instance when we-when you [are] are asked to write a letter for your friend about something-when he need some help, about money-you should ask someone about some legal, you know, thing-you should ask some- [partial word] someone else. And at that time, you know, if you asked-if he doesn't-if he cannot write a letter, you should write a letter of introduction-you should introduce him to-or your friend or to lawyer or some businessman.

But you may say, "I am a monk," you know, "I have no time [laughs] to be involved in worldly things like that." You may easily say so. But think-reflect on your feeling at that time. It is good reason, but, Dogen-zenji says, you-there must be-there cannot be-you cannot say there is not a slightest idea of selfishness is involved in my when I said-in me when I say so. You can-you may not be able to say so so easily. So perhaps you should write a letter for him-letters for him.

Then his disciple, Ejo-zenji,[5] asked Dogen-zenji again: "As you may be all right," you know, "if you write a letter for him, but it will create a big trouble for the lawyer or for the businessman," you know [laughing]. "He may have a big trouble, I think," he said. "Still you should write a letter or not?" What-"Still he should write a letter for him or not?"

Dogen-zenji says, "Yes, even so you should." [Laughs.] "But whether businessman will help him or not is," you know, "his problem. So you should-if you think that will create some problem for them, you should write," you know [laughs, laughter]. "It may create some problem for you, but whether you should help or not is-should be decided by you. I am helping him, and I am just writing intr- [partial word]-letter of-introducing letter. So think [about?] this point clearly, and if possible please help him."

So if you think, you know, if you are very careful in your everyday life, it is not so simple [laughs], you know, to help others. But usually, making various, you know, excuse for himself and try not to help others. That is what is going on in this society.

If we become very careful, in one hand, we will have more trouble. But on the other hand, this society will be for every one of us. Actually, this society is for someone who has various ability. So this society is not actually for the disable people. So that is why we must have set up-or we must some welfare system. We say "welfare." That is, welfare is excuse [laughs]. That's mere excuse-very cold or very careless excuse created by human lazy cold nature.

If we become more careful about each one's situation, instead of having strong welfare system, we can, you know, enjoy our life with each other. The joy of someone who has ability will be appreciated when he help others. And when he see someone who is helped by him actually, really, sincerely, he will appreciate his life and he will appreciate his talent.

But nowadays, you know, we are just-someone who has ability is busy in working on machine and paper [laughs], you know. He has not much, you know, joy in his life, even though he has great ability: even though he can write a good poem, or even though he can produce beautiful art. They are working for, you know, for the publisher, for the businessman, and he cannot produce what he want to-actually what he want to do. That is what is going [on] in this world. Even though he want to paint in some way-if he is an architect, if he want to design in his own way, you know, because of manager's order, you know, you-his design should be straight, you know, simple line as much as possible, and building should be always square [laughs, laughter], so that the building doesn't cost so much money.

So all the talent and ability of human being is sacrificed because of this kind of careless, cold excuse. In Zen word, a man of immense, immense ability, immense power, should not be fooled by clever words [laughs]. A man of great ability should not be fooled by clever words. So that we can [be] free from those clever excuse, we should practice zazen. There is no other way to acquire-to be free from this kind of superficial understanding of world-understanding of this-our human life. Newspaper, magazine, television, you know-all those publication, if you think [about] this point, easily fool you, you know. It is quite easy for them to fool us. Sometime various-even sociology, psychology, or various cultural study ... [Sentence not finished. Probably something like "may fool us." Tape turned over.]

When we are not fooled by it, when we can use it, you know, to help others, it is the-those studies will give us a great advantage for human life. But because we have spirit of, you may say, Zen, we are enslaved by those studies. If you think [about] those point[s] carefully, things which is happening near at hand, you will realize what is way-seeking mind in its true sense, and what is sincerity, what is the spirit of Zen. Our spirit of Zen, especially Dogen's spirit of practice, is based on everyday life-problem we have in everyday life. If you think [about] this point, just to spend-just to share-just to spare our valuable time for zazen is not zazen.

If you practice zazen, you should pay full respect to the people who is not sitting, who is busy in his work-in their work. When you think about what they are doing, you know, you cannot goof off [laughs, laughter]. This is my favorite word [laughs, laughter]. On your cushion, you cannot waste your time, you know. When you have this kind of respect, you can practice real zazen.

Thank you very much.

---

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Sara Hunsaker and Bill Redican 9/8/00.

[1] Eihei Dogen, Shobogenzo Zuimonki (The Treasury of the True Dharma Eye: Record of Things Heard).

[2] Ryogen Yoshimura was a Soto priest who came from Japan to San Francisco in 1969 (see Wind Bell, 1970, Vol. IX, No. 1, p. 30).

[3] The word "[about]" was added by one of the transcribers (WKR) because of Suzuki-roshi's practice, throughout this talk but not in most other talks, of dropping "about" after "think." Suzuki-roshi did not say: "If you think you know the real meaning of practice ...."

[4] kyosaku (Jap.): warning stick used to alert sleepy and/or idle monks.

[5] Koun Ejo-zenji (1198-1280): Dogen-zenji's senior student and dharma heir. He recorded or edited Zuimonki and served as second abbot of Eihei-ji.

3 - Sesshin Lecture #3: sincere practice

Sunday, May 03, 1970

Sesshin Lecture #3

Sincere Practice and Way-Seeking Mind

San Francisco

To have-to have sincere practice means to have sincere concern with people. So our practice is actually based on our humanity. So Dogen-zenji says to accomplish humanity is to raise-to hold up Buddhism and help people.

So what is the way to establish humanity? That is the way to establish humanity is tao or practice, he says. By practice we can establish humanity, and our practice is based on humanity, so human being practice true human nature is our zazen. And he says the way is not something which was established by Buddha or some particular patriarch.

We must have spirit to attribute various good things to others, and accept various evil or mistake as your own. That is the spirit. With this spirit, we should establish our human way. And how to establish our human way is how to practice zazen. So you may understand zazen practice is not some special practice for special person. And this is the only way to accomplish or to establish our human way in this actual world. If you want to seek for the way for human being-if you try to seek for the way for human being some other way, it is almost impossible.

And so Dogen-zenji was very strict, you know, with our human way. That is why his way is called it menmitsu no kafu,[1] you know. He doesn't, you know, ignore even a drop of water, like a well-made rice paper. And-and he, you know, is always asking us, you know, "Your way is like this, and-do you-can you accept that kind of way as your own way?" [Laughs.] And he criticize, you know, our weakness and our darkness or carelessness in our everyday activity-treating things, treating your friend, receiving teaching from your teacher. And after all, what he will say is, "practice zazen." That is only way [laughs] to polish up your everyday life, and to do it without making so much effort. That is the only way.

And the Fifth-Fifth Patriarch Gunin-zenji,[2] referring to this point, he says, you know, "The way who-which was established-established by Buddha['s] time, it cannot be our way because time is different from our time, and people are different, and society is different from our time-society and people in our time." So the way we mean-tao we mean-is not something established already by someone-some special person. The way is not something which was established already, but which could be find out according to the circumstances in-in each moment. That is the real way. How we, you know, find out our way is to practice zazen. From our practice, real way-realization of our true way, will reveal itself. You will naturally find out the real way. That is the real way. If so-if so, to practice zazen is to establish human way.

If we say "zazen practice," you may think this is some special, you know, practice, but it is-actually it is not so. Because you think zazen practice is some special way, you become-you goof off on [laughs]-on black cushion, making some excuse, you know: "I am something-I am doing something good. I am-I am inv- [partial word]-trying to find out something-some truth [laughs, laughter] on a black cushion." Or "I am following Buddha's way." Or you may say, as maybe you-you may not know what is zazen, but "Zazen is," you know, "the way which Buddha established, so if we follow his way [laughs], that is zazen." But according to Dogen-zenji, that is not zazen at all.

If you understand zazen in that way-if you understand your zazen is-understand zazen is nothing, you know, but our human activity, the way everyone must do-if you understand in that way, you will not be involved in any idea of schools of Buddhism [laughs]-Rinzai Zen or Soto Zen [laughs], Buddhism or Christianity, you know. Because you don't have actual understanding of zazen, and your way of practice-your spirit of practice is not real, you know-is not-does not comes-come from-from your innate-inner voice, because you ignore things you are doing in your everyday daily life, [you may say] this is-"Zazen is important [laughs], but those things are not so important, so if we practice zazen, even though [I] ignore my fault-two, three of my fault-it may be okay."

[Laughs.] If you practice zazen with this-in this way, your zazen is not true zazen. That is heresy [laughs].

We-as you know, we respect transmission, you know. Transmission is-although we have nothing to transmit, you know, we have no [laughs, laughter]-nothing to-to transmit because what we should transmit is, you know, our human way [laughs]. So human way is something everyone has, you know. Everyone has same feeling. If we drop off various superficial understanding of things and superficial feeling, the-our feeling is same. Our inmost nature is the same. There is no Japanese feeling or American feeling. It is the same, exactly the same. If you see Japanese people, you know, you-you will have American feeling [laughs], but if you forget all about Japanese or American way, there-we have no special feeling. For an instance, you know, when you practice zazen there is no American [laughing] zazen or Japanese zazen. Zazen is the same. If we stop thinking, when we are free from our emotional activity, there is no two zazen. And only when we have, you know, both Japanese people and American people have this kind of feeling, you know, which is not American or Japanese. Then we can, you know-we will have good relationship.

Once in a while, you know, you may want to be an American or a Japanese even [laughing]. Once in a while-not always. And you will feel to-to behave like Japanese, you will feel good. And I feel good when I say something like you say in slang someday [laughing]. I feel very good, but not always.

But the feeling you have when you behave like Japanese, and the feeling I have when I behave like American is the same [laughs]. No difference. So if we don't stick to something, there is no Japanese or American. There is no good or bad.

So that is why the Fifth Patriarch of Japan said because time is different, people is different, and society is different, there is-there cannot be no set-up rules for us. The rules should be found out in each moment, and how we find out is to practice zazen. From nothing-when we resume nothingness, we will find out our way according to the situation. To see various event is to see the way we act. To see people-to see someone is how to-how to be friendly with him, you know. There is no special way to become friendly with someone.

In this way, although true way was-was kept in its perfect understanding, and true practice was kept-has been kept from Buddha to us, but the true way always mixed up some secondary way: so-called-it tao or way. When we say "way," it cannot be true way already. When I say "way," you may think this way or that way, Japanese way or American way [laughs]. So it is-true way is something which you can substitute for something else. That is true way.

If I say so, you may think the way is only one [laughs], but approach-although approach is different, the way is one. But, you know, even though you say so [laughs]-I don't know, you know, whether you understand. That only one way. Even though if I say so, you know, way is-true way is one. But the approach is different.

But what I mean is not like that. Those who talk about non-sectarianism [laughs], you know-every religion has one goal. The top is the one. But the way to it will be different. So there is no way-there is no need to discriminate, because the conclusion is the same. So whichever way you take, you will reach the same point.

But when you say so-even though you say so, the point you mean is not the point we mean. Even though, you know, we put emphasis on practice of zazen, it does not mean we have some special point. We have, you know-we rather resume to our human nature, which is universal, without seeking for some point. So before we start zazen practice, or before we [get] involved in various kind of religion, real, you know, way is there. So to forget all about religion, including Zen, is our way-and to find our way moment after moment, according to the circumstances, and to respect people, to respect things without ignoring anything.

And if you make mistake, you should be faithfully make repentance. Without doing so, you know-"everyone make mistake, so it-it is okay." If you say so, that is not your inner voice. That you say so already means, you know, you have, you know, some pain in your heart. "Everyone is-is doing so. It is okay." If it is okay, there is no need to say "okay." [Laughs.] It is not okay, so you say it is okay [laughs, laughter].

So whatever you do, if you think more, if you are, you know-if you start from nothingness, you will see many things going on in your, you know, mind and to which you should be regret-regretful. We should be more conscientious about what we are doing because [when?] we see it. Sometime we don't see it. When we are not practicing zazen, our mind is mixed up [with] something else, we don't see. This is, you know, why we practice zazen.

And reason we practice zazen is very strict. We don't feel so good, you know-very strict. But being encouraged by strictness of the human nature, we will continue our practice forever, as long as we have human nature. So human nature encourage our practice, and our practice will help our full expression of human nature. So, you know, helping with each other, encouraging with each other, our practice will go on and on. [Sentence probably finished. Tape turned over.]

... how our practice is going. And so dreaming of some attainment, aiming at some selfish goal to practice zazen is, you know, not at all our practice. It is far from our practice.

Buddhism was established by Buddha when he saw, you know, every creatures fighting with each other, killing with each other. That is why he started Buddhism. Our way is not the way to get out of this kind of problem, but to see actually what we are doing moment after moment, from which we cannot escape. You know, each moment we are doing this kind of things. That you eat something, already you are killing something. So you cannot escape from what you are doing actually. That is why we practice zazen. And by practice we can resume to-resume our fundamental being-so-called-it buddha-nature, where we should start our real activity. This is actually Buddha's teaching, and to have full realization of this experience is our practice.

So you may say our everyday life start from practice, and our practice will be encouraged by our everyday life. So everyday life and practice are really two side of one coin. That is why we say, you know, everyday life is our koan. Koan in its usual sense-it is official document [laughs], you know-koan-you know, public announcement is koan. Public announcement-it is public announcement because you cannot change it [laughs]. That is koan. But koan in its true sense is something which appeared from our innate human nature. You cannot, you know, substitute for something else. Once it, you know, [is] issued you cannot change it [laughs]. Very strict. So with this strictness to yourself, we should practice zazen. This is the secret of solving all the problem-problems we have.

When Dogen-zenji talked about our way, someone asked:

"You say you should be," you know, "strict with yourself, and you should not be concerned about what people may say about you, or whether it is good thing or bad thing to do something. But if you act in that way, there is big danger-there may be big danger for you. It may be better to follow some rules." [Laughs.]

But he said:

"It-it is very much so, but our way is not," you know, "so easy. [Laughs.] Our human way cannot be so easy."

Because our mind is very touchy and very subtle, we do not allow any mistake for us. So it is not-cannot be so easy. The only way for us is, if you make mistake, then you should be, you know, regretful and you should make confession of it and pray for [to] Buddha. Without doing this, you-if you say, "I am following Buddha's way," you are fooling yourself.

If you get many offerings, you know, following Buddha's way [laughs], you are, you know-that is not Buddhist way. That is a kind of heresy, you know. To receive something which you should not receive, that is heresy, he said. When you are, you know, push[ed] into such a strict, you know, small corner of our everyday life, you will find out you have to sit. This is, you know, how you arise the way-seeking mind, and this is what he means by sincere practice.

Thank you very much.

---

---

Sources: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997.
Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican 4/10/00.

[1] menmitsu no kafu (Jap.): "a very careful and considerate style." See also SR-70-05-27, Suzuki-roshi's first lecture on the Sandokai.

[2] Chinese: Daman Hongren or Ta-men Hung-jen; Japanese: Daiman Gunin or Daiman Konin. 601-674. Chan patriarch and teacher of Huineng.

4 - Negative View, Positive Practice

Tuesday, May 05, 1970

Negative View, Positive Practice
City Center, San Francisco

Once a time of one thousand or two thousand is not so long time in comparison to our idea of time. It is just, you know, one thousand or hundred years of time, maybe, one month or less than one month.

We came to the point where we must study Buddhism from various direction, and here we are started to study Buddhist way from various angle. And this is not so easy task. I think that is why we must have Buddha or Dogen-zenji, because each one of our effort-by each one of our effort cannot be satisfy.

Our purpose of studying Buddhism-in Japan this kind of study started, maybe, from Meiji period-early part of Meiji period. Of course there were some exceptionally great teachers before Meiji period. But after Meiji period, we started to study Buddhism, applying Western way of study. Very strong: more scientific way of study, like you study anthropology or sociology. So Buddhism culture [was] analyzed from various angle and criticized from various angle: whether Buddhism is-has been helping human being or not. Now in this way, after Meiji period, we started to study Buddhism very sincerely and very objectively and very critically.

So right now we haven't, you know-even [though] we belong to same school of Buddhism-the each one has his own opinion or his own, you know, understanding of Buddhism. So I think it is a time when we get together and study Buddhism from various angle. And we should not be discouraged by knowing various teachers' way is not the same. It cannot be same. And one teacher-even one teacher-changing his way, always, because he find some reason why he should change his way. If there is some, you know, decisive reason why he should change his way, he should, you know. If he is a Buddhist, he should change because we should-we don't stick to our previous understanding, moment after moment.

We continue our practice and our understa- [partial word]-our study. I heard-I hear various informations from Japan, you know-what kind of practice is going at Eihei-ji or some other monasteries. The more I hear various different information from various source, we feel, you know, the need of discussing-a need of real, you know, sincere study-a need of-you know, affirming, you know, our belief.

Something which we have been doing in Japan may be difficult for you to accept. Tonight I want to concentrate-I want to be concentrated on some point which, maybe, which you may find it difficult to accept [laughs]. Something-you know, this is the point I want to talk tonight is the charac- [partial word]-one of the characteristic of Buddhist thought and one of the-and which, you know, you do not have in your culture. If I am right-you know I haven't study Western culture so much-so I can't say definitely, but I find some difficulties for Western students to-when you want to accept our Buddhist teaching. For an instance, you know, freedom, you mean is not the freedom we Buddhist mean.

Buddha, you know, rejected asceticism. But still, you know, Buddhist way is-there is ascetic element in it. The love, you mean is not the same as when we say "love." Desire, you know, we mean, is not the same when you say "desire." The we, know-almost all the time we say-we do not say "good desire" [laughs]. We say-we Buddhist say "evil desires." Evil is, you know, always follow to desire.

For an instance, you-you choose-you like some bright colors, you know, but Buddhist use subdued color [laughs]. This is very-this is one of the characteristic of Buddhism. Blue, or, you know, yellow, red, or white, black: those are, you know, those are not subdued color. The subdued color is the mixed color. The Bu- [partial word]-the material we use for robe is not the material people may like. We shave our head, you know, wear okesa. Those, you know-this is-why we shave our head is to be free from the desire to put some ornament, you know, on our head-on our head, you know.

This kind of negative and opposite-negative tendency or element in our teaching will be very difficult point. But on the other hand, you know, when you start zazen practice, or when you start some particular-some practice-you become more-you tend to be more ascetic than are [?] people. You want to observe-you want to be strict vegetarian, you know. And e- [partial word]-when you start something, you go on and on and on, but the way you push your-you carry on your practice is more positive-not negative way-positive way. I think this is the difference between the-there is-some slight, you know, flavor is different. Nuance is different.

The negative attitude we have is after realizing what we are doing in our everyday life-what kind of nature we human being has. And to avoid this kind of fault, Buddhist, you know, try to-try to make our human tendency-bad tendency weaker, because we know this kind of tendency will create many problem in our society.

So we try to control or restrict, even, our activity. Instead of working fast, we try to work slowly, step-by-step, moderating our tendency. This kind of thing-tendency or element-may be very hard for you to understand.

The-why old people or people in old tradition [are] interested in Buddhism is people who live in the countries where there is old tradition, they understand good side of the culture and bad side of the culture. So they, you know, are not so interested in a kind of achievement. They achieved in their history. So they reflect [on?] their culture more, and after reflecting on their culture-or after getting tired of their own culture, they start to became-become interested in Buddhism which is negative. Here there is some reason, you know, why Western, you know, young people become interested in Buddhism or Zen.

So young generation, you know, in America became tired of, you know, materialistic culture, and they start to realize what will become of America if we, you know, push this kind of effort. So maybe this is wrong. We started to realize something-something missing in our culture. So that is why Buddhism is now developing in this country.

But still there is, I feel, slight, you know, difference, and we Buddhists are not so interested in success in life or achievement of some special thing or propagating our way. Before we try to propagate our way, we try to accept the teaching completely. Unless-until we have strong confidence in our teaching, we do not try to, you know, push our teaching to someone else. And we understand that to have good understanding or to accept teaching as his own is already the best way to propagate our way.

To study Buddhism is to teach Buddhism. And to know ourselves is to know others. This is, you know, our way. So instead of working towards outside, we work towards inside. And this is rather hard, you know. I think you are trying very hard to work towards inside. But still, there is slight difference, you know. It must be so, you know. It is quite natural for you to be so but-but when we, you know, make one step further from this stage in our study of Buddhism, we will-we must have-and it is natural to have this kind of difficulties. If we are not patient enough, you know, to get through this kind of difficulty-unless we make more effort on this point, our effort will not make much sense in its true sense.

So now what we want is-what we should do here is to develop our study from your bottom of your heart. That is the most important point. You must be very faithful to yourself. And even though you cannot accept a teaching of Buddhism, you should try best effort to understand it and accept it. That does not mean, you know, I'm forcing Buddhism to you. But from your side, you should make more effort and-to accept or to think over and over what Buddha is suggesting for us.

And next point, maybe, we should not, you know, try to be successful, you know. We should be concentrated in our effort rather than work, you know, towards people. Of course, we should-we should not reject people, but we should not invite many people unnecessarily. So once someone come, we should try best effort to show our way, if possible, not by mouth, but by our actual practice.

And we should, I think, as already we started, we must start a kind of study-mutual kind of study, or more wider study from various viewpoint. For an instance, inviting Japanese priest here and-or study-go to Japan and study Japanese Buddhism, whether it is good or bad. If it is bad, we should know why it is so bad. Bad thing may be some medicine for us.

I don't think, you know, Buddhism in Japan is so healthy now. I must acknowledge [laughs] this point. I am sorry, but [laughs]-I am sorry for Japanese Buddhism, but I have to acknowledge it-accept it. But it does not mean there is no need to study Japanese Buddhism. Japanese Buddhism is still alive in some way. And some people started very sincere study, and we see the result of their study in magazine or in various books they publish. They found out many things which was not came to our knowledge yet. So the study is going, anyway. But even though they make best effort in their study that will not be-that will not-never be perfect. So I think American people also start this kind of sincere study. And from various angle, if we study Buddhism, will come to the good understanding of Buddhism.

The negative attitude in Buddhism arised [arose] from deep insight-insight of our human nature. Why we study Buddhism is because we find some weak point in our human-human nature. Without-if you accept various desires you have, you know, or instinct you have, there is not much reason why you have to practice, for an instance, Zen. Because you, you know, you know the good point and bad point of thinking mind or emotional activity. We practice zazen because that is the only way to go beyond thinking mind-emotional activity.

Since I have been explaining negative, you know, negative practice in positive way [laughs], so it is difficult for me now to explain it negative way [laughs]. But actually, what is written in the scripture is negative side of Buddhism almost all the time, you know. Their description is concentrated on negative side of Buddhism. But when you realize why they take negative viewpoint, then we can take a positive practice to make best use of our desires.

Visitor: Excuse me. Excuse me. May I ask a question? Did anyone park a station wagon at the corner of Laguna and Rose? [4-6 words unclear.]

Zazen practice is become attracting people, you know, because of its positive side of attaining enlightenment, you know, or improving your state of mind: to have some, you know, power-physical or spiritual power to do things as you may want to do-or to solve your everyday problem, or to improve your mental activity, or to make your-make yourself physically strong. But actually in-especially in shikantaka Soto practice, is very negative.

[Laughing.] You may be very much discouraged to practice Soto shikantaza. But it is so, you know. We try not [to] think in our practice. We try not [to] see things, you know. Or we try not [to] hear things. But sound-if sound come, we-naturally we will hear it. But we shouldn't be disturbed by it. We shouldn't be curious about the sound-what it is. How we do it, you know, is to have right posture. To have-"right posture" means, you know, if-I-if we want-I want to explain what is right posture, you know, it should not be like this, or it should not be like that. Or it you are not like this or like that [probably gesturing, laughs]. If you are not like this or like that, this is right posture, we say, you know [laughs].

So from the beginning to end, our practice is negative [laughs]. There is no other way to explain it, you know, well-so well in positive way. Don't, you know, be bothered by it-don't be bothered by it. Don't see it, or don't-[interrupted by coughing]. So how you don't think is, you know, just to be like this [laughs]. That-just to be like mountain, according to Dogen-zenji, gotsugochi.[1] When you are like this [probably gestures], you know, this posture which is not, you know, this way or that way will-practice-various practice-that posture will work on various problems you will have.

So if the sound-even [if] the sound come-if you are not disturbed by it, there is real practice. And we say this is not something you can attain by practice. It is something which you have originally when you are just you-when you are not something more than that.

So we have, you know, very difficult time to convince or to explain our shikantaza. If-we want to explain it, so we rather concentrated on practice. Actually, to practice our way is the only way to understand what is, you know-what Buddha meant by not being so and not being that: just to be like that or to see things as it is.

So even though we sh- [partial word]-we must study Buddhism from various angle, but we should [not?] neglect [?] our practice, you know, which is only way to-to understand what he meant, you know-what Buddha meant by his sermon. The purpose of our practice is not to attain anything or to-to make you a Zen student. Purpose of practice is just to be yourself, you know, nothing more than that. And by experience, various teachers and patriarchs found out this is the best way, you know, to see-to encounter Buddha, you know. Only when we practice zazen and when we have complete practice, we could-we can understand which is difficult to understand in-by our study, through scriptures or through sermon.

And when you understand what Buddha meant through practice, you will not be attached to Buddha's sermon or Rinzai way or Soto way. There is no Rinzai way or Soto way in shikantaza. Maybe to say "shikantaza" is already wrong. Although we have this kind of zeal in our practice, but it does not mean to stick to something. To get free from attachment, or to get free from teaching, we practice zazen. So negative way of expression or positive way of expression doesn't matter. Whichever it is, we can understand what he meant. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

... be always negative. We do not deny that we exist here, eating something, doing something, thinking something, feeling something. Just to feel-just to think properly, we actually practice zazen. So if one thing happen, that is the whole picture of Buddhism. If some-another thing happen, that is whole picture of the Buddhism. So there is, you know, no need to stick to some particular thing. Positive or a negative is on your side, not Buddhist side.

So the practice we have is not just negative practice. It is the way to jump into the reality, or jump into the actual reality we are [in] right now, without any hesitation of thinking about it, or choosing the way, without concerning negative or positive. Just do it, you know.

Maybe that will be the most positive way. And at the same time, it is the most negative way because you stop everything. That is very negative. But at the same time [laughs], that is the most positive way, you know. From this viewpoint, we put stress on our practice so that we can study our way from various directions without any confusion.

So before you discuss, you know, about our way of putting our teaching in word, maybe better to have actual practice and think what it is, actually, and see what it is-what does it mean.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original City Center tape transcribed by Katharine Shields (May 22, 2000) and checked by Bill Redican (9/11/00).

[1] Suzuki-roshi pronounced it "gotsugochi," which may be related to gotsugotsu (Jap.): high and dignified; upright; immovable; steadfastly, intently; used to describe single-minded practice, especially zazen. Possibly found in Shobogenzo "Gyobutsu-yuigi."

5 - Zen Center and City Practice

Sunday, May 10, 1970

Zen Center and City Practice
City Center, San Francisco

This morning I want to reflect on our long, long practice, which we started maybe more than ten years ago. The purpose of Zen Center is, as you know, to provide a Zen meditation hall or whatever it is, you know: some place to practice zazen, and practice with some teacher, was the original intention of Zen Center. And with this purpose we organized non-profit organization. And now, here, when we, you know, acquired this building, we named this building Mahabodhisattva Zendo. It is-reflecting on our practice that was, you know, nothing but the bodhisattva way: to help others and to help ourselves.

In the meantime we had Tassajara zendo because we needed some place where we can practice our way, putting everything aside and being completely involved in our practice-not-maybe not completely, but [laughs] more completely [laughs]-almost completely. For a human being this "almost" is always necessary [laughs], or else we cannot survive. "Almost" is, you know, actually the secret of practice.

But anyway, we can practice our way almost completely putting everything aside. That was the purpose of Tassajara zendo, and that we have that-this special zendo means at the same time to-we can understand actually what is Zen-Zen practice in more traditional way, or else, you know, or else we do not know what we are doing here-unless we know some background of our practice. In here, it is difficult to, you know, have-to have full understanding of our practice here and with-what we are doing here.

It is something like to know your family, you know. When we know your friend's family, you will know your friend, you know, much better. Even though your-you know your friend-you think you know your friend, if you do not know the background of your friend, you-sometime it is difficult to understand your friend.

If you want to know who is Buddha, it is, you know, necessary for us to know-to have some understanding of his culture background. This is always true. And for most of us, because of various reasons, it is difficult to study our way in Japan because of language difficulties and some peculiar, you know, development of Zen in Japan. So as much as possible we want to practice Zen in the most original, you know, more original, you know, form of Zen. So it may be quite natural for us to go back to Dogen and to know his way-and forgetting, you know, everything developed after him-and to go back to Dogen, or to go back to Bodhidharma or Buddha, will be the most important point for us.

It is not so easy to, you know, to establish Dogen-zenji's way or Bodhidharma's way or Buddha's way, but we-at least we should try. It is much better, even though it is not perfect, it is much better than trying to, you know, introduce something else [laughs], you know, we-that is also up to our effort.

But most important thing will be how we practice so-called-it bodhisattva way-to help ourselves and to help others. This point is missing in Japan. Original bodhisattva way is to help ourselves is simultaneously to help others. In Japan, when we help, you know, others, we forget [laughs], you know, to help ourselves. We, you know-it is-sometime it is good-it should be like that, but if, you know, our zazen practice-when zazen practice does not follow, you know, we lose our way. We will be-easily become a-will be-we will be easily enslaved by people [laughs]. That is not bodhisattva way.

Without losing, you know, ourselves in city life, you know, to help others-how to help others is the point. We should be-whatever we do we should be Buddhist. To be Buddhist should not be just to practice zazen in calm nice building like a hermit [laughs]. That is not our way. Mahayana bodhisattva way is to-whenever we are, without losing our practice and help others is our way.

To realize-for actual realization of our practice, we should keep our way, you know, as simple as possible, so that many people can follow our way easily. Here I must say "as much as possible" [laughs], because our human life is already complicated and difficult [laughs]. So when I say "simple way," you may think-if you go to Zen Center, they are observing very simple way-much simpler [laughs], you will, you know, say "much simpler way than our mundane practice." But that is not permissible [laughs].

We-I think we must have, you know, almost-almost-almost same difficulties as, you know, city people have here too. Or else, you know, as we are human being which-whose life is always-whose mentality is-as, you know, very complicated, anyway. Wherever we are it doesn't make much difference because our mentality, you know, is-because of our mentality we have very complicated life.

So even though you come here, your life cannot be simpler than city life. The difference is, you know, we have-we are not inst- [partial word]-we are enjoying the complicated, you know, life, when people in the city is involved-being involved in various things and being confused in the activities which is going with them. Anyway, even though you come here, you know, so that you can help others as much as possible- so that we can give our seat [?] more people as much as possible, you know, we must have some rules-which is-which should be very practical.

To set up practical, you know, practice, you know, so that we can practice our way more quickly without spending much time-and giving to share our facility with more people, we must make best effort to fulfill our bodhisattva spirit. As our, you know, purpose of Zen Center is like this, naturally we open this place, you know, for everyone. And because we open-because we open our facility to neighbors-our neighbors, we will have constantly new students.

To share this building with new students, we should, you know, give them some guidance, or show them some example of our practice, so that they can feel better in this building. So that we can help them, we must have some skill, you know. That is why we, you know, must have Tassajara. So new student, when they come, if they want, they can stay here longer, and they can go to Tassajara, and coming back from Tassajara, acquiring some, you know, way to help people-coming back here and help people here. In this way, I think we can continue our-we can fulfill the purpose of Zen Center.

This is the main, you know, structure or spiritual structure of Zen Center and Tassajara. No one did not try to be so [laughs]-no one had this kind of idea from the beginning [laughs], but for-while we are, you know, practicing zazen, naturally this kind of, you know, framework was resulted or set up by all of us. And I think this is very meaningful thing. Something, you know, so-called-it bodhisattva way appeared in this country, without knowing what it was [laughs].

As we already, you know-as you call this building "Page Street"-maybe "300 Page" or "Page Street Center" [laughs] or-. Pretty soon you will-all of us will decide "Page Street Zen Center" or "300 Page," or I don't know [laughs], and Bodhisattva Zendo, you know. Maha [1] is-maha is-something, you know-when we say-when we write "Mahabodhisattva" it sound, you know, something great [laughs]. Maybe "Bodhisattva Zendo" will be enough [laughs, laughter]. But if we say "Mahabodhisattva Zendo," then more people will come [laughs, laughter]. That is a purpose of inviting, you know, more people here-Mahabodhisattva Zendo [laughs, laughter]. That is also, you know, a part of bodhisattva practice. But if I say so, Zen Center should reserve for the name maha-not small one [laughs]. The Bodhisattva Zendo will be-each one of your home will be the Bodhisattva Zendo. This is Mahabodhisattva Zendo [laughs], where there is-there is many small zendo in, you know, residence-residential part of Page Street Zendo.

To come here, I think, each one of you must have struggled pretty hard, I think, you know. But anyway, we are very fortunate to be here and to practice here in its pure, original sense.

As, you know, Buddhism is very, very old, and Buddhist spirit penetrated every corner of our culture in Japan, China, and India, Buddhism is like a great river, extending its branch stream in various kinds of mountains and fields, but the water, you know, which is running is the same: sometime muddy, sometime pure, but water is water. Muddy water can be a pure water, and pure water could be sometime muddy water. We should not reject the branch of the river because the water is not so clear. We should accept whatever the river could be. But we should not forget all the water is the same-originally the same. So only by zazen practice, you will find out pure water in muddy water, without being attached to pureness-clearness of water.

Dogen-zenji says Zen practice is for everyone, whether they are clever or they are dull, man or woman, or old and young. Zen is for everyone, because he could see the pure-pureness of the water in muddy water. So when we, you know-why we practice zazen here is to find out the pure spiritual practice, even though they do not-they are not aware of it. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

[To find the spiritual pure practice in][2] city life, this is the reason why we practice zazen. But this is, you know, not something-this practice is not something you can compare with some, you know, ordinal [ordinary], you know, activity or practice. Only when you, you know, understand what is practice, you can, you know, start this kind of pure practice. So if you want to-to help people in its true sense, I think you should at least to go to Tassajara-you should go to Tassajara and practice longer.

I am afraid that Tassajara, you know, will be-will become a very important practice-Tassajara practice will become very important for-for Zen or for Buddhism because of various reason. I wish you can practice your zazen in various places, you know, but more and more I feel some burden, you know, on our shoulders. This is not so, you know [laughs], agreeable feeling because it is too much for us.

I want to share this kind of burden with many people, as much as possible. But actually, you know, we need your help. With your help, I think we can share the great burden which was given by, you know, our successive teachers.

Physically, you know, I feel much better this year [laughs]. So, you know, I may survive [laughs]. I don't know how long [laughs], but, you know, let's try hard, and I want you help us, you know.

Thank you very much.

---

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape by Katharine Shields (May 4, 2000) and Bill Redican (May 15, 2000).

[1] maha (Sanskrit): great.

[2] The text in brackets was supplied by the tape operator, who recorded on tape: "The words that are missed here by turning over the cassette are: 'To find the spiritual pure practice in city life.'"

6 - How to Observe Precepts

Sunday, May 17, 1970

How to Observe Precepts
San Francisco

This morning I want to talk about Zen-Zen precepts. As you know, precepts is not-real meaning of precepts is not just rules. It is rather our way of our life. When we, you know, organize our life, there you see something like rules, you know. Even though you are not intending to observe some particular rule, but there you see some rules.

As soon as you get up, you know, to wake you completely up, you wash your face, you know. That is our precepts-one of the precepts. And at a certain time you eat breakfast, when you become hungry. That is, you know-it looks like you are observing some rules to eat breakfast at some certain time. But it is actually the way of life you follow or you are doing, you know, naturally in that way. So if you practice zazen, you know, there is some rules in your practice. So zazen practice is, at the same time, precepts-one of the precepts. So zazen and precept, if you really understand how we-how Buddhist get the idea of precepts, you will understand the relationship between Zen and precept. The precept is just the way of life.

As a Zen students, we rather, you know, put emphasis on our everyday practice, including zazen practice. But when you think about how to, you know, cope with the problem you have in your everyday life, you will realize how important it is to practice zazen. The only power of practice will help you in its true sense.

For an instance, you know, when you hit mokugyo [laughs], if you try to, you know, control chanting, you know [laughs], by here: "Please face this way," you know. "Oh, that is too fast. So I must make them-make them-make their chanting slower." Or, "That is too slow. I must make their chanting little bit faster." That is-but actually, how you do it is not by here.

If you try to do it by your hand [laughs] or your mind, it doesn't work. Only when you do it by your hara, you know, the feeling-by the feeling you have in zazen practice, then [laughs], you know, you can do it. Just by your mind or by your hand, you cannot do anything. It doesn't work. Student will not follow your mokugyo. Only when you do it, you know, with your zazen, you know, power, then you can control it.

When you can control yourself very well, you know, without having any idea of controlling anything, you know, when you do in right pace, then you can control yourself. And when you can control yourself like you sit in zazen posture-zazen, then you can control the chanting perfectly. This is true with your everyday practice, you know.

When you do something, just, you know, by your skill or just by your mind, you know, you cannot-you will not be supported by people, and you-so you cannot help others. Only when you do it with zazen mind you can help others. And you will be naturally supported by people. This is also-so, if-if the precepts, you know, is some moral code which you have in your mind, that precepts doesn't work at all [laughs]. When you forget all the precepts and, without realizing-without trying to observe it as you eat when you are hungry, you know, then there is-naturally there is precepts. So when you forget all about precepts, and when you can observe it quite naturally, there is precepts, and that is how you keep our precepts

In your zazen practice, you know, you have-you just sit. You have no idea of attaining anything. You just sit. And what do we mean by "just sit" is-when we, you know, just sit, we already include everything, and we are not even a part of this cosmic being. We are one with everything. When we are one with everything, you know, we include, you know-this is just explanation, but-the feeling is you include everything, and actually this is not just-it is not true just for zazen.

When you, you know, drink a cup of tea, you know, that activity include everything. Actually it is so. Because you say "this is tea" and "this is me" [laughing], it doesn't include anything. You are here and tea is there, you know. This is just tea, which doesn't include anything. But when you, you know, drink it without thinking what it is, and being with-completely with the-one with the tea, because you have no idea of "tea" or no idea of "you," this activity, you know, include everything.

So, as Dogen-zenji said, if your activity-everyday activity doesn't include everything, that is not Buddhist activity. It looks like almost [laughs] impossible, you know, to feel in that way, but actually if you realize, you know, or if you experience what is zazen practice, you know, then, you know, you will understand what is your everyday life and how everyday life should be for yourself and for others. And each activity-you will realize that each activity should be zazen.

The famous Zen master Ummon[1]-his words-koan-koans are very famous for-for its subtlety-very subtle. Now he explained this point in various way. But this point is, you know, difficult to explain unless-the only way to understand is through practice. By words it is almost impossible, but in Zen mondo-question and answer, the-he tried to express this point in various way.

So later, the Zen masters, you know-referring to his point and said, "His word is like a," you know, "like a cup and its lid," you know, "which fit very well" [laughs]-a cup and its lid-cover-which fit, you know, perfectly. Or, "Follow the wave and drive the wave." Follow the waves and drive waves. Following waves and driving waves. Do you understand? Follow-waves come. The boat follow the wave and drive the wave like mokugyo, you know, follow [laughs]-follow the chanting and drive the chanting [laughs]. Do you understand? Follow the chanting and drive the chanting.

If you follow, you know-if you just follow the chanting, your mokugyo will get slower and slower and slower [laughs]. So-but unless you listen to them, you know, you cannot control. So you have to listen to them, and at the same time you should lead-you should drive their chanting. So it is not just follow the chanting, but it is-you should drive the chanting too. Follow-following the chanting and driving the chanting-the way-how you do it, you know? If you ask him how you do it, he maybe-he will say [knocks on wood twice quickly, laughs], "What are you thinking about?" [Laughter.] "Just sit," he may say so.

How can I make, you know, the perfect cover for this cup [probably referring to his water cup]? If you-the only way is, you know, to-just to make a lid and cover it. That is the way. But if you think too much about it, and if you work on it too much, the lid will become smaller and smaller [laughs]-a little bit more [laughs]. Then it will get smaller and smaller and it will not fit. If you do not, you know, observe the cup, you know, it may be too big. So observing the cup and making it, and [probably gestures]-that's the way [laughs]. That is, you know, how you practice zazen. That is power of practice.

So to know the center of things, you know-or to have whole picture of things or events is the point of our practice. And how you do it is to find, you know, to know the center of yourself. When you know where is your center in zazen, you know, that is the center of yourself and everything. When-if you do not lose your center wherever you are, it means that you are boss [laughs, laughter]. If you lose your center, you know, you are not. You are, you know, already mixed up even though you, you know, you insist yourself you are not in the center.

So how you keep our precepts is how you organize your life. And how you organize your life is how you practice zazen. This point is explained in various way. When we practice zazen, you know, there is nothing outside of us. Everything is-all-whole being is included in our practice. So the merit of practice is just for yourself. Because there is only one whole being, there is no "you," you know, or no objective world. Objective world and subjective world is same in our practice-is one in our practice.

We, you know, explained in this way, but it is explanation of our zazen practice. It is so when you just sit without involved in thinking mind or emotional activity. When you just, you know, remain on your black cushion, then that is the practice we mean-which is explained in various way.

So, you know, what Bodhidharma said, "No merit." [Laughs.] "No merit." What will be the merit of practice? No merit [laughs], because there is nothing but practice. So there is no merit to give to anyone or to have-to own it for yourself. No merit. Merit itself is zazen. Zazen itself is merit. So no merit-zazen-just zazen.

If you say "merit," there is no zazen. If you say zazen, there is no merit. So, he said, "No merit." Whatever you do there is no merit. If there is merit, that is, you know, dualistic practice. If you observe precepts in that way, that is, you know, heresy [laughs]. If you have-if you think, "I have to," you know, "observe this precept and this precept and ten precepts, one by one," that is wrong practice.

For a long, long time, many Buddhists tried to observe our precepts with great effort, you know. So-but that kind of practice is, for us, a violence [violation?] of the precepts [laughs] because, you know, you-your precepts became-fall into dualistic precepts. "Here is precept. I have to observe it." That is not the way we practice zazen.

The Mahayana Buddhists said, you know, dualistic practice is the violence [violation?] of practice for Mahayana students. Why is it? Because when we observe rigidly, you know, or when we are caught by precepts, that is violence [violation?] of precepts. Then, if we have no idea of precepts what will happen? [Laughs.] That may be also a violence [violation?] of the precepts too.

There is precept, but, you know, the precept should be observed without any idea of observing it. That is how you practice-how you observe precepts. In short, when you observe precepts in the same way as you practice zazen-and that is perfect precepts transmitted from Buddha to us.

So as a Buddhist, whether you know the each of the sixteen precepts or two hundred fifty precepts or not, you know, we should be able to practice-observe precepts. And when we practice zazen we should not just, you know-we should not practice our way just "this is zazen." This zazen include, you know, various study of Buddhism. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

This morning when I join you, you know, I felt a deep feeling. I think that is because you were sitting just before you coming. This kind of feeling is important. This is the real sangha, you know. With this feeling

I think you should carry on our practice and our life in this building.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape by Katharine Shields (May 16, 2000) and Bill Redican (May 16, 2000).

[1] Ummon Bun'en (Jap.) or Yunmen Wenyan (Chin.): 864-949. Chan master.

7 - Money and Labor

Sunday, May 24, 1970

Money and Labor
City Center, San Francisco

Good morning. Actually this morning I asked Yoshida-roshi[1] to give some talk to you, but as he-as she has just arrived from Japan, and she said she is not ready to speak yet, so I am going to speak [say] something.

I introduced her already to you, but some of you here may not know her, so I think I have to introduce Yoshida-roshi first. [Aside of 1-2 sentences in Japanese.] Yoshida-roshi. [She answers briefly in Japanese. Suzuki-roshi then whispers Domo arigato.]

She is one of the important disciples of Hashimoto-roshi who passed away-[Susuki-roshi asks Yoshida-roshi a question in Japanese about Hashimoto-roshi. She answered briefly in Japanese.] Ah.

-who passed away four years ago.[2] Hashimoto-roshi is famous teacher who studied various old rituals and form of especially okesa and robes and-besides study of Shobogenzo. By Hashimoto-roshi our rituals improved a lot, so we are so fortunate to have her here.

Joyce-Zenkosan-has been studying with-under her at Kaizen-ji[3] near Nagoya Temple, and we expect her always to come and give more fundamental understanding of our rituals and way of observing things-not only just rituals, but also how we should behave according to Dogen-zenji's way.

As Dogen-zenji, you know-since Dogen-zenji, it is seven hundred- more than seven hundred and fifty years [since he was born], so everything is not so clear. And meantime, you know, our way [was] mixed up with some other things which was not so good. So still we are studying his way, what was his way. And because we have many things which we cannot accept completely, so that is why we study Dogen-zenji's way. We think Dogen-zenji's way cannot be like that [laughs]. That is why we study. Maybe that is wrong-wrong, but anyway we want to accept teaching sincerely with our heart or true mind. That is why we have to study. And we think he is the most sincere student or teacher among the teachers we had-we have had.

This morning I want to speak on relationship between our everyday life, especially relationship between material and our-we Buddhists: what kind of, you know, attitude we have about material. When we say "spiritual life," you know, people [are] liable to ignore material. That [laughs] is big mistake, according to Dogen-zenji. Material and, you know, mind or spirit is same, according to Buddhism. We-we-we know that all-all of us has buddha-nature, but, if so, we are very careful how to-the relationship between-between us. But we tend to ignore the relationship between we human being and other being, like plants or river-especially, you know, food.

You know-you-you think food is very important, so you study food. But the way you study food is not always right because you put emphasis on yourself, you know, ignoring the value of food, you know. We have very selfish discrimination about food [laughs]. I think that is a kind of selfish attitude of human being. According to Buddha, everything has buddha-buddha-nature. If so, we should respect everything as you respect yourself. That is, you know, main point. So how you, you know, appreciate food is the most important point-before you have discrimination about food.

Buddhists from all the time-all-always noticed this point very strictly. You may say that is too much. But, you know, for an instance, my father[4] was a priest, you know. When he was going home, he, you know, if he find some, you know, vegetables on the roadside, he picked up [laughs] and he brought the old vegetables the farmers and people-which farmers and people throw away. And he cooked it [laughing] for us, and so I had to eat it.

There was small river in front of the temple. The many rotten old, you know, vegetables would [come] floating down from upper river [laughs, laughter]. So as soon as he find some vegetable-like thing, you know, not exactly [laughing, laughter]-to me, you know, that was not exactly vegetables. It-it might be good for compost [laughs], but not for eat. But he cooked it, and he said, "Everything has buddha-nature. [Laughs, laughter.] You should not throw away." And wherever he goes, you know, he talked about how valuable the food is, you know. You should not throw it-throw them away.

So my teacher, you know, my master[5] was my father's disciple, so he was also very strict with, you know, food. Here you say, you know, you study what food is good for you, you know, what kind of food you should take. But to me, you know-and they are very much proud of their knowledge of, you know, food: how much, you know, nourishment some certain food has, and this is acid, and this is [laughs]-this food contain a lot of-what do you say-alkali?-yeah-opposite of acid. But, you know, to me it is-yeah, I understand. I think that is good [laughs]. But before you say so, you know, you forget something [laughs]. You are-you make-you make-I wonder if you don't make big mistake, you know.

To appreciate the value of food is first. And what kind of food you choose is next, I think. Dogen-zenji, you know, left instruction about our cook, what kind of, you know, spirit we must have when you become a cook in the monastery. He says the duty of cook in a monastery is completely different from usual, you know, cook in city. Completely different. So you should know what is the duty of a cook. And he left, you know, Tenzo Kyokun-instruction for the cook in the monastery.[6]

And in the-in his instruct- [partial word]-one of his instructions was, "Don't say kome." Kome is "[uncooked] rice," you know. You should say okome. O is honorific, you know, prefix to kome. Kome is rice; okome means, you know, we-if-when we say okome we respect, you know, expression of-as a[n] expression of respect we say, without saying kome. Dogen-zenji says, "You shouldn't say kome. You should say okome."

So Japanese-most Japanese people, you know, put honorific prefix to everything. Instead of saying chawan,[7] we say ochawan. Instead of saying kesa, we say okesa. That is, you know-this kind of understanding is the understanding we Buddhists have had. Dogen-zenji put emphasis on this point. He didn't throw away even leftover water. He respectfully returned the water to the river. All the confusion we have right now in our society comes from the lack of understanding of what is, you know, about what is material.

You know, in our society we respect labor, you know. Labor is [laughs], you know, the most important element when you value things. But before you, you know, count, you know, value [of] the labor, there must be something you should think, you know-something which was given to us. There is something here, and if you work on it, you know, it will serve your purpose.

But labor is not-is not only thing which you should count. Most you-you pay only for labor. That is, I think, a kind of arrogance of human being. You should-you ignore the buddha-nature which everything has. If we notice this point, our system of life will change a lot. Of course, you know, labor is important. Labor is-why labor is important is labor is-will be-make sense when you work on, with respect, work on things with respect. That is the-should be the true nature of labor, you know. Labor is-without, you know, understanding or without having deep respect to the things which was given, and to only to count labor is big mistake. So labor doesn't make any sense. Labor is, you know, when we work on things with respect, that is our human life in its true sense.

We, you know, we pay, you know, mostly you think you pay for the labor, but, you know, I don't think that is right understanding. You pay for the labor and for the things which was given to us by God, according to your understanding, or by Buddha. Only when we have this kind of understanding of things, our system or economic-our economic system will change. I am not, you know, economist [laughs, laughter], but I feel in that way.

So money is also, you know-should be treated in that way. You pay-you work on things with respect. Money is, you know, to exchange the value of things and labor, you know. So money include, you know-behind money there is respect for the-for the material or for the things, you know, which was given to us from Buddha, and our respect to the labor, the effort someone else made.

And to exchange means to purify, you know. You-when you exchange things, you know, it means to purify things. If you pay some money, you know, you don't w- [partial word]-you have no-you don't owe anything for anyone, you know. But that is also, you know-something is missing in that idea. Even though you pay for the labor, you know, there is something which you cannot pay [laughs]: that is, you know, the value of things which was given to you by Buddha.

But only when you pay, with respect, you know, for the things which was given to us for the labor which was worked by someone else, with respect, then, you know, in this sense, if you pay some money when you get something with this-only when you do it with this kind of understanding, you can purify your life, your activity of changing things. Without this, you know, idea, if you-even though you pay for the things you get, you owe a lot of [laughs]-you owe a lot.

So that is why, you know, we must have always deep respect for things, for money, for labor. This is, you know, Dogen-zenji's, you know, idea of everyday life.

So the money is not yours. It belongs to our society. Because you think the money is yours, you know [laughing], you will even, you know, you sometime you think to-"money is dirty." You think in that way-maybe some people may think, or some people may, you know, attach to the money too much. That is, you know, the-that kind of, you know, idea is dirty idea [laughs]-not pure idea. When you say "money is dirty," your understanding is dirty [laughs, laughter]. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

... won't be dirty, if material which was given to us is, you know, pure or the effort we make is pure.

Here, you know-so to accumulate money can be allowable. Only you accumulate to be ready to, you know, go to hospital [laughs, laughter], to be ready to die, you know-funeral parlor [laughing, laughter]. It costs a lot of money. I have $1000-$2000-a lot of money [laughs]-so, you know, we must have maybe $500 or $1000.

But to rely on the power of the money is wrong. That is the-that is the way Buddha did not like at all. At that time, the money system was not so strong, so he said, "Don't accumulate things. You should eat," you know, "you should live on the food you-food which was offered just before you eat. And you should not beg [for] more than the food which will suffice next meal," you know.

This is, I think, big-I think Buddha was big scholar of economy [laughs]. That is, you know, the most important, you know, point of economy, I think, you know. Why we have money is to exchange things. We should not, you know, stop the current of the money. So in this sense, you know, we say everything changes. That is Buddha's, you know, first principle. Everything changes, including, you know-money is the-not symbol, but, you know-money express the value of or-value of things, which change. If the value, you know, if things is valuable because we can eat, you know, or we can live on it, then money also should-should not stop. If money stops, it-that is business depression [laughs]. If money is going smoothly all over our-in our society, our society is healthy.

So money is-money purifies our, you know, world. It is not something dirty. It is very pure. It is very important thing for us, when we take good care of it, when we respect it. Because you don't respect-you don't pay enough respect to the money, money become dirty. Dirty. Doesn't matter how much money you have, you know. Even [if] the money is sm- [partial word]-amount of money you have [is] little, you should pay respect to it, and you should make best use of it. How you make best use of it is to make it, you know, work-to make it help our society.

The other day, you know, we officers discussed how we should run this Zen Center, you know. We don't like to say you should pay [laughs]: "If you want to come and study with us, you should pay some money," you know. We don't like, but for us, you know, that is a part of practice, you know. Just sit in black cushion is not only practice, you know [laughs]. The all-how you treat money is, you know, very important practice for us.

Most people forget all about how you survive here, you know [laughs]. You think you can survive alone in the remoted mountain [laughs], but even though you are in remoted mountain, or that you can go to the big mountain, is because of the money [laughs]. You cannot work to the Sierra or Rocky Mountain. It is very foolish idea, you know, to ignore-to-not to understand how we survive here. If you, you know, miss this point, whatever you say, that is payback [?]. It is much better to-to read white paper [laughs].

Before we study Buddhism, we should know what we are doing and how we survive here. So we think this is a part of practice, but we do not, you know-we do not reject people just because of money. We-we are ready to help with each other, but each one of us should purify our zendo with money [laughs], first of all [laughs, laughter]. That is why I say: "You should pay! Give me some money!" [Laughs, laughter.] If you give me some money, someone will take-will take good care of it, you know. We should not accumulate money for Buddha [laughs], because Buddha didn't-didn't like to accumulate anything.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican (10/19/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Yoshida Eshun-roshi: Teacher of okesa sewing in the lineage of Hashimoto Eko-roshi. Hashimoto-roshi (teacher of Katagiri-roshi) learned the Nyoho-e pattern of the okesa from Kodo Sawaki-roshi. Sawaki-roshi in turn had studied, at Koki-ji temple, the style of okesa sewn by the 18th-century Shingon and Ritsu master Jiyun Sonja, who had reconstructed the traditional pattern for the okesa from the Mahavagga and other Vinaya-pitaka texts. [Source: "Notes on Okesa Lineage at Zen Center," an interview with Shohaku Okumura-roshi, 23 February 1996, recorded by Shosan Victoria Austin.] See also SR-71-06-20.

[2] In SR-69-09-00A, Suzuki-roshi gave 1967.

[3] Not found in Zengaku Daijiten.

[4] Suzuki Butsumon Sogaku (c. 1858-1933).

[5] Gyokujun So-on (c. 1877-1934).

[6] Tenzo Kyokun ("Instructions for the Tenzo") is a fascicle of Dogen's Shobogenzo.

[7] chawan (Jap.): teacup, rice bowl.

8 - Sandokai Lecture #1

Wednesday, May 27, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #1
Tassajara

[This is the first in a series of lectures on the Sandokai (Chin. Cantong qi or Tisan-tiung-chii), a poem by Sekito Kisen.

Historical details of the series are appended to the end of this lecture. Japanese transliteration in all lectures is by Kazuaki Tanahashi (1999). English translation in all lectures is by Suzuki-roshi.]

[The following line of the Sandokai is discussed in this lecture:

Line 1 Chikudo daisen no shin

Line 1 The mind of the great sage of India]

I am so grateful to have chance to discuss about or to talk about Sandokai. This is one of the most important teaching for us. And meaning is so deep, and the expression is so smooth, that it is, you know, pretty difficult to have some feeling, you know, when you read it.

Sekito Musai-daishi[1] (his posthumous name is Musai-daishi), and he is [dharma] grandson of the Sixth Patriarch[2] [Eno] and son of Seigen,[3] the Seventh Patriarch. As you know, under the Sixth Patriarch there were many disciples, but the most important disciples are Nangaku[4] and Seigen-Seigen and Nangaku. And later, under Seigen, Tozan[5] appeared, and under Nangaku, Rinzai [6] appeared. And Rinzai and Soto is the most powerful schools under the Sixth Patriarch.

Sekito's, you know, way-Seigen's way is more gentle in comparison to Nangaku's way. And Sekito's [Seigen's] way may be, you know, elder brother's way, you know, who is mostly gentle [laughs], you know. Nangaku's way is, you know, maybe like second boy or third boy's way, who is rather naughty [laughs]. You know, in Japan, mostly, if someone is very gentle, you may be the first son [laughs], we say, you know. And sometime the first boy is not so able [laughs]. We say "Soryo no jin roku." [7] You know, Soryo no-the first one, first boy is mostly very gentle. And we, you know, understand in that way when we talk about Soto and Rinzai. Tatsugami-roshi[8] put emphasis on memmitsu no kafu.[9] That is more Soto way. Memmitsu is "very careful" and "very considerate" and "very," anyway, "very careful" in doing things. That is more Seigen's way.

Anyway, Sekito, who wrote this poem, was is the [dharma] grandson of the Sixth Patriarch. His way, in one word, to find everything in his mind. So in other word, to have the Great Mind which include everything is his way of practice. So if you read this Sandokai, you will understand this point clearly.

Usually, you know, our understanding is, you know, to-we-even though we say "to observe things-as-it-is," you know, actually we are not observing things-as-it-is when we think, you know, "Here is my friend," you know, "There is a mountain," "There is the moon," you know. When we say so, the friend or mountain or the moon is not, you know, the moon itself, or the mountain itself, or your friend himself. It is, you know-friend- You, you know, think [laughs] your friend is your friend. The friend you think, you know, the mountain. The moon, you think, the moon. It is not actually the moon itself, or friend himself, or mountain itself.

You think, you know, "Here is I. And there is mountain," you know. In this case, when you observe things in that way, that is dualistic way of observing things. "Here is a- There is a mountain," you know. "I must climb up that mountain when I go to San Francisco. San Francisco is there [laughs], and I am here. So after climbing up that mountain, I have to go to San Francisco, which is," you know, "Bay Area." That is how we understand things.

That is not actually Buddhist way of observing things. We find, you know, the mountain, or San Francisco, or the moon within ourselves right here. That is, you know, our understanding. That is the mind, so-called-it "big mind," you know. Within the big mind everything exist. To see things is not like, you know, to find out things which is on the-in the shelf, you know, one, two, three, four [laughs]. That is, you know- Most people understand things in that way. But in that case, you know, "I am here, my mind is here, and there are many things on the shelf. And one, two, three, four."

The Sandokai, you know, Sandokai: San is "things," you know, san is "three." San-do-kai. San is "three"; do is "sameness." Do means "same," you know. To identify something with something else is do. And san is "three." Do is actually "oneness" or "one whole being," which means "Great Mind." The san is "many beings." San.

Kai means, you know, the- Actually, we think there is one big whole being which include everything, and there is many things which we find in one whole big being-great being. So san-do. Even though we say "many things," or actually it is many parts of one whole big being, including all of us. So if you say "many," that is many. If you say "one," that is one. "Many" or "one" is, you know, different way of describing one whole being.

To have complete understanding of this relationship between one big whole being and many things which exist in one big whole being is kai, you know. The, you know- Kai means, "to shake hand." "Hi," [laughs], "how are you?" [laughs]. When you shake hands, you know, you feel, you know, really one. You feel- You have real feeling of friendship, you know. So "many things" and "one whole being which include many things" is a good friend, you know, or more than friend, because it is originally one. If you say "many," that is many; if you say "one," that is one. So two names of same thing [laughs] should be very good friend, you know. It is originally more than "good friend." So we say, kai. "Hi, how are you?" That is kai. This is the name of the, you know, this sutra: Sandokai.

Originally this title, Sandokai, is the title of Daoist book, you know. But in the same title, you know, he [Sekito] described Buddha's teaching in almost same way, and under the same title. That is what he tried [to do].

And what is the difference between Daoism and, you know, Buddhism is- Do you know-someone knows what is the difference? Very similar, you know. If you read it, you know, as a book it is maybe same. But way we read is different, you know. When Buddhist read it, that is Buddhist book; when Daoist, you know, read it, that is Daoism. It is rather, you know- It is actually same, you know, vegetable [laughs], but if Buddhist eat it, you know, that is, you know, Buddhist food; and if, you know, vegetarian people eat it [laughs], that is vegetarian food. There us it is just food [laughs]. There is that kind of difference.

Now we, you know- The way we eat food, you know, is not just because the vegetable-some-a kind of vegetable has some particular nourishment, you know-you know, yang, or acid, or alkaline. We, you know- To eat food is part of our practice [laughs]. That is the difference. We, you know- For sake of practice we eat food. Not just to take nourishment-to help our way, to practice Buddha's way, we eat food-not just to support ourselves as a, you know, human being or as a kind of animal like, you know, like this [laughs].

That is, you know, to treat-to eat food or to understand food or things as they-as something which exist with or without not much, you know, relationship or not much contact with our practice is Daoist way. And Buddhist way is to practice our way, we eat food. So it include always our mind, our practice: not small mind, big mind-which include things. And if we, you know, think, "This is just vegetable," you know, that is not our way. We must treat things as a part of ourselves, which exist in our practice or in our big mind. Do you understand this point?

Why we, you know- In other word, in another word, small mind means mind which is under limitation of desires, or some particular emotional, you know, understanding of, or some discrimination of good or bad, you know. "this is good," and "this is bad." So actually, even though you think you are observing things-as-it-is, but actually you are not. Why? Because of our discrimination, because of our desires, we are not observing things-as-it-is.

So Buddhist way is, after trying very hard to eliminate, you know, this kind of emotional discrimination or prejudice of good or bad, you know-to see things-as-it-is. After doing so, it is possible to see things-as-it-is.

So, you know, when we say "thing-as-it-is," means to practice hard to get rid of our, you know, desires-not to get rid of, or [but rather] to know, to count our desires-to calculate [laughs], you know. If there is computer [laughs], you must put, you know, the data, as a-one of the data will be our desire, you know. This much desire [laughs]. And this much nourishment. And this kind of color. And how heavy is it, you know. So one of- We should count our desires in it. Then you will see the thing-as-it-is.

So usually we don't count our desires, you know. Without reflecting on our selfish judgment we say, "He is good" or "bad." Someone who is bad, you know, to me is not always bad, you know. To someone else he may be a good person, you know. In this way, we see things-as-it-is. So when we have, when we understand the mind transmitted from Buddha to us, we can see things-as-it-is.

This is buddha mind. Chikudo daisen no shin, you know. Chikudo is "India," you know, Chikudo. Daisen [means] "great sage." No shin: Shin is "mind," big mind which include everything. Chikudo daisen no shin. Shin of the great sage, daisen, of-in India. Chikudo. So Chikudo is "in India." Daisen is "great sage." No is "of." And shin is mind. "Mind of," you know, "great sage in India" [laughs]. It [the order of characters] goes opposite way, you know. Chikudo daisen no shin, you know. "In India, great sage of mind." "Mind of great sage in India."

That is the buddha's mind which include everything. In other word, the mind we have when we practice zazen is the great mind in which we don't try to see anything, you know. We stop thinking. We stop emotional activity, you know. We just sit. Whatever happen to us, we just sit. If something happen, you know, we are not bothered by it. It, you know, it is like something happen in the great sky [laughs]. Sky doesn't care [laughs] whatever happen to the sky. What kind of bird fly, the sky doesn't care. The great sky doesn't care. Even the atomic bomb [laughs]. It doesn't care, you know. That is the mind transmitted from Buddha to us.

When we sit, you know, maybe many things will happen. You may hear the sound from the stream. You may think of something, but your mind does not care. Your great mind is there, just sitting. Even though you don't see things or you don't hear, you don't think you are hearing anything, you don't think you are thinking something, maybe, you know, something is going on in the big mind. And that is the way, you know, how we observe things, you know. We don't say "good" or "bad," you know. We just sit. And we say, "Oh, good morning," that's all, you know. And we enjoy, you know, things. But we have no special, you know, attachment to it. At that time, we have full appreciation of it, but that's all. One after another, things will happen to us in that way-with full appreciation. That is the mind which is transmitted from Buddha.

That is, you know, at the same time how we practice zazen.

So if you do not practice zazen, you know, even though you enjoy some event or something, later it will cause some trouble to you [laughs], you know. Do you understand this point [laughs]? I think you have various experience of this kind. You know, because you think, you know, "This is it! It should be like this." [Laughs.] If someone makes some opposition to you, you will be angry. "No! It should be like this!" "Zen Center should be like this!" [laughs], you know. Maybe so, but it is not always so. If time changes, you know, if, you know, we-Zen Center student lose Tassajara [laughs] and move to some other mountain [laughs], the way we have here cannot be the way we will have some other place, you know.

So we shouldn't stick to some particular way, and we should be always open our mind, you know, to observe things-as-it-is, and to accept things-as-it-is. Without this preparation, if you say, you know, "This is the mountain," "This is your friend," "This is the moon," the moon will not be the moon itself. That is, you know, difference between so-called-it "naturalism" and Buddhist way.

So Buddha's teaching is the teaching of or study of human nature, you know [laughs]-how we should study, how foolish we are, you know, what kind of desire we have, or what kind of discrepancy we have. Or what kind of tendency we have. So my motto is, you know [laughs]-I don't know how to explain it [laughs]-my motto is-I am always, you know, careful-I always remember in your word, you know, "to be liable to," you know, liable to. We are liable to live like this. We are liable to say in this way. When, you know, we should be, you know- We should remember this word: "liable to" or "tendency." You know, this is- "Tendency," you may say, "The tendency is also the thing itself," but if you say so, it means that you ignore yourself.

Mmm. Just before I- When I was preparing for this lecture, someone came and asked me about self-respect, you know. "What is self-respect? How we obtain the self-respect?" Self-respect is not something which you can, you know, feel you have [laughs]. Do you understand? When you feel, "I have self-respect," that is not self-respect anymore. When you are just like this, you know, without thinking anything, without trying to saying something special, just to talk what, you know, I have in our mind and how I feel, you know, then there is naturally self-respect.

So when we are, you know, closely related to you all and to everything, then, you know, I am a part of one big whole being, you know. When I feel something, you know, we-I am not exactly, you know-maybe almost a part of it [laughs], but not quite. When I don't feel anything, and when I do something without any feeling of doing something, then that is you yourself. When you are completely with everyone, you don't feel you are who you are. That is self-respect.

So when you feel you are someone, you know, you have to practice hard-you have to practice zazen harder. Actually, it is, as you know, it is very difficult, you know, to sit without thinking, without feeling. When you don't think, you're very [laughs]-you will sleep, you know [said quietly, almost as aside]. [Laughs.] Without sleeping, to be you yourself without thinking, that is our practice. When you are able to do that, you will be able to say things without thinking too much, without having any purpose. Just to express yourself you speak, you do something. That is self-respect. That is complete self-respect.

So how you obtain this kind of self-respect is maybe to practice zazen, to [be] strict with yourself, especially to be strict with your tendency. Everyone has, you know, their own way which is peculiar to himself and which is not universal to everyone. So we must know that. But if you try to get rid of it, it is just try to not to think in your practice. Try to not to hear the sound of the stream. That is impossible [laughs, laughter]. It is not possible. So let your ear hear it, let your mind think about something, but without trying to think, without trying to hear, without trying to stop it, you know. That is practice.

So more and more you will have this kind of habit, or strength, or whatever you say. Or power of practice. If you practice hard, you will be like a boy or a girl again, or children, you know. When we are talking about self-respect, you know, some bird [laughs] was singing outside. "Peep-peep-peep-peep." [Laughs, laughter.] That is self-respect. "Peep-peep-peep-peep." It doesn't mean anything [laughs]. Maybe, you know, it is-he was just, you know, singing, or even without trying to sing, it goes some, you know, "peep-peep-peep-peep" in various way [laughs]. If you hear it we couldn't stop laughing, you know, smiling. It has- We cannot say it is just a bird [laughs]. It controls whole world-whole mountain. That is, you know, self-respect.

So that we can have this kind of everyday life, this kind of practice, we, you know, study hard. When we come to this point, there is no need to say "one whole big being" or ... [tape changed] big being, you know. There is no need to say "bird" or "one big whole being" or "many things which is included in one big whole being." It may be just a bird. It may be just a mountain ... [tape changed again!] -Sandokai, you know [laughs]. Very, you know- If you understand really this point, there will be no need to recite Sandokai [laughs]. Chikudo daisen no shin ... [laughs]. This is Chinese. Or it is Chinese or Japanese [laughs]. There is no need- It is not matter of Chinese or Japanese. It is just a bird. But, you know-

This is just my talk [laughs]. It does not mean much, but- So we say Zen is not something to talk about. It is something which you experience in its true sense and which will be very difficult. Anyway, this world is difficult, so don't worry [laughs]. Anyway, this world is not so easy. Wherever you go, you will have problems you should confront with. So it may be- It is much better to have this kind of problem rather than you know, mixed-up various kinds of problems.

Hmm. Excuse me. What time is it?

Student: 9:25.

Oh. Just right time.

Student: 9:45.

Too late? Okay.

Student: Too early.

Too early [laughs, laughter].

Student: What's the next feature?

"Next feature" [laughs, laughter].

Student A [David Chadwick]: Can I ask you a question?

Mm-hmm. "What will be the next part"? Hai.

David Chadwick: You did not say, I don't think- I didn't hear you say what "Sandokai" means together. You said what each word means, but I didn't-Suzuki-roshi: San is "three," you know.

David Chadwick: No, no. You said what each word means. But together, what does "Sandokai" mean?

Suzuki-roshi: Sandokai means, you know- It is difficult, you know, to say in one word [laughs]. You know- To express, you know, one big mind, you know, he [Sekito] picked out this three words: San-do-kai. And the teaching is, "What is many? What is one? And what is oneness of one and many?" That is kai, you know. So that is- The title is- It is the title of Buddhist big mind or transmitted mind. There is no other way to say it. Okay? Hai.

Student B [Mel Weitsman]: The other day when I was doing the mokugyo,[10] there was this small spider that crawled across the top of the mokugyo. And there was nothing I could do [laughs, laughter]. I went a little bit off to the side, you know, but he went right into it. It was too powerful for him to escape, you know. And the next-

Suzuki-roshi: You didn't kill it.

Mel Weitsman: Something did [laughs, laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: By mistake. Happened in that way.

Mel Weitsman: Yeah, but I couldn't stop.

Suzuki-roshi: But you hit some other place.

Mel Weitsman: Some other place, but he still went right into it.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. You know, it can't be helped. Buddha killed him [laughs, laughter]. He may be very happy. Mokugyo [as an aside to someone]. Yeah, you know, to live in this world is not so easy.

Mel Weitsman: No.

Suzuki-roshi: Not at all easy, you know. When you see children playing, you know, by the stream or, you know, on the bridge, you will be really scared, you know. And I think- I always thought, "Oh, how can I survive," you know, "in this way? How could I survive without, you know, "making any accident? On the freeway, many cars is going zoom, zoom, zoom." Something happens, that's all. You know, it is very- It is- If you think, you know, about it, if you stop and see and think, you know, you will be terrified [laughs].

You know, in Kashmir-oh no, not Kashmir- Do you know someone who is 165 years old who has more than two hundred, you know, boys and girls, son and grandson, and great-grandson [laughs]. He may think, you know, sometime, you know- He may, if he think about each one of them, he may be scared of- He may lose, you know, easily one of them in this busy life.

So if you, you know, think about our practice, it can be a very strict practice. It can be, you know. You should be ready to kill something even you are Buddhist. Whether it is good or bad [laughs], you should do that sometime. It is inevitable, you know, to survive without killing anything. So, you know, what kind- We cannot survive by some feeling, you know. We must have deeper- We must be involved in deeper practice than emotional practice. That is the strict side of our practice. And if it is absolutely necessary, you know, you should stop hitting mokugyo even though, you know, all of us get into confusion. Yeah. Sometime. Not so easy. Hai.

Student C: Would you explain more what you mean by "strict practice"?

Suzuki-roshi: "Strict practice"? Things is, you know, going in very strict way. There is no exception, you know. If you read this, you know, you will see he refers to this point. Where there is something, there is some rule behind it, or truth behind it, which is always-which is going strictly, you know, controlling things without any exception. We think we care for freedom, you know [laughs], but the other side of the freedom is strict rule. Within the strict rule there is complete freedom. The freedom and, you know, strict rule is not two separate thing. Or it does not mean to put someone in strict rule. Originally we are supported by strict rules or truths, you know. That is the other side of the absolute freedom.

Student C: Could you give us more examples in our individual lives?

Suzuki-roshi: When you get up you should get up [laughs]. When everyone sleep you should sleep. That is example [laughs]. Hai.

Student D: Sometimes we think there is some special situation at Tassajara. How do we know if we should, at that time, follow the strict way or if we should perhaps make an exception?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. That is, you know, that is why we divide our responsibility, you know. With your responsibility, you know, you should decide. Almost all the time, we have no time to discuss things with someone else. If you discuss something with someone else, you will be too late [laughs, laughter]. So you have to take your [own] responsibility by name of Craig [?] [laughs]. That is inevitable. If you make mistake, that is your mistake. So if you decide things in that way, you know, the things will go more smoothly without being involved in idea of good or bad, you know. Hai.

Student E [Reb Anderson?]: My responsibility is such that it's very easy for me to follow the strict way, because that is part of my responsibility. Other people have somewhat different situations, and sometimes, because my responsibility is to follow strictly, we have some discussion, and I sometimes think that maybe they should do different than me. Is that right?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Sometime you should shut your eyes [laughs, laughter]. You are unfortunate to see something, you know. If you see it, you should say something, so maybe it help to practice your way, you know, without, you know, without looking around. And that is the best way, you know, actually. If you look around, you know, if you see this side of the people [in the zendo], the other side of the people will [laughs] will sleep, you know. If you watch this side, the other side will sleep [laughs, laughter]. Oh, it's better not to see anything [laughs, laughter]. They don't know what he is doing, you know. "He may not be sleeping," [laughs], "so all of us will," you know, "stay awake." That is the advantage of zazen practice. You know, if you see something, you know, that's all. The rest of the things will be ignored. If you don't see anything [laughs], you cannot ignore anything. So that is the big mind which include everything.

If someone moves, you know, you will notice [laughs]. Even though you don't try to see it, if some sound come you will catch it. But if you stick to someone, you know, the rest of people will be very happy [laughs, laughter]. If you don't catch anyone, you know, no one can move.

Okay?

---

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby; City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican 6/1/00.

Sandokai Lecture Series by Suzuki-roshi

Lecture 1: Wednesday, May 27, 1970-SR-70-05-27

Transcripts: "I am so grateful ...."

Branching Streams: [11] "I am very grateful ...."

Lecture 2: Saturday, May 30, 1970-SR-70-05-30

Transcripts: "I explained in last lecture ...."

Branching Streams: "In my first lecture I explained ...."

Lecture 3: Monday, June 1, 1970-SR-70-06-01

Transcripts: "After all, it's better to follow ...."

Branching Streams: "'The spiritual source shines ....'"

Lecture 4: Wednesday, June 3, 1970-SR-70-06-03

Transcripts: "Last night I explained ri and ji."

Branching Streams: "In the last lecture I explained how people stick to ji ...."

Lecture 5: Saturday, June 6, 1970-SR-70-06-06 (Visiting class)

Transcripts: "Purpose of study of Buddhism is to have perfect ...."

Branching Streams (Lecture 13): "The purpose of the study of ...."

Lecture 6: Wednesday, June 10, 1970-SR-70-06-10

Transcripts: "In my last lecture, although I did not literally ...."

Branching Streams (Lecture 5): "Everything has its own nature and form ...."

Lecture 7: Saturday, June 13, 1970-SR-70-06-13

Transcripts: "As we have big blackboard, I want to explain ...."

Branching Streams (Lecture 6): "According to Buddhist thought ...."

Lecture 8: Wednesday, June 17, 1970-SR-70-06-17

Transcripts: "In last lecture I explained the independency ...."

Branching Streams (Lecture 7): "In my last lecture I explained ...."

Lecture 9: Saturday, June 20, 1970-SR-70-06-20

Transcripts: "... I must talk about mei and an ....

Branching Streams (Lecture 8): "First I will talk about the two terms ...."

Lecture 10: Thursday, June 25, 1970-SR-70-06-25

Transcripts: "Now we are still talking about the reality ....

Branching Streams (Lecture 9): "We are still talking about reality ...."

Lecture 11: Saturday, June 27, 1970-SR-70-06-27

Transcripts: "Today's lecture will be about how we observe ...."

Branching Streams (Lecture 10): "Now I would like to talk about ...."

Short Zazen Talk: Sunday, June 28, 1970-(No tape)

Transcripts: "You should sit zazen with your whole body ...."

Branching Streams (Short Lecture): "You should sit zazen ...."

Lecture 12: Saturday, July 4, 1970-SR-70-07-04

Transcripts: "Tonight and tonight lecture and one more lecture ...."

Branching Streams: (Lecture 11): "Koto means 'words' ...."

Lecture 13: Monday, July 6, 1970-SR-70-07-06

Transcripts: "Here it says: 'Ayumi o susumureba ...'."

Branching Streams: (Lecture 12): "'Progress is not a matter of far ....'

[1] Sekito Kisen or Sekito Musai (Chin. Shitou Xiqian or Shih-t'ou Hsi-ch'ien, 700-790): Eighth Chan Patriarch.

[2] Daikan Eno (Chin. Dajian Huineng or Wei-lang, 638-713): Sixth Chan Patriarch.

[3] Seigen Gyoshi, Gusai-zenji, or Kosai-zenji (Chin. Qingyuan Xingsi or Ch'ing-yuan Hsing-ssu, 660-740): Seventh Chan Patriarch.

[4] Nangaku Ejo (Chin. Nanyue Huairang or Nan-yueh Hai-jang, 677-744): student of Daikan Eno and master of Baso Doitsu.

[5] Tozan Ryokai (Chin. Dongshan Liangjie or Tung-shan Liang-chieh, 807-869): student of Ungan Donjo and one of the founders of the Soto school of Zen.

[6] Rinzai Gigen (Chin. Linji Yixuan or Lin-chi I-hsuan, d. 866): founding master of the Rinzai school of Zen.

[7] soryo = first son [?]; + no = of; + jin = [?]; + roku = not so bright.

[8] Sotan Ryosen Tatsugami-roshi: Head of training at Tassajara for three practice periods. Former ino-roshi at Eihei-ji monastery in Japan.

[9] Memmitsu [or menmitsu] no kafu (Jap.): "a very careful and deliberate style."

[10] Mokugyo: A wooden drum struck to provide a rhythm for chanting.

[11] Shunryu Suzuki, Branching Streams Flow in the Darkness: Zen Talks on the Sandokai. Berkeley, UC Press, 1999. ISBN 0-520-21982-1.

9 - Sandokai Lecture #2

Saturday, May 30, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #2
Tassajara

[The following lines of the Sandokai are discussed in this lecture:

Line 2 tozai mitsuni aifusu.

Line 3 Ninkon ni ridon ari,

Line 4 do ni namboku no so nashi.

Line 2 was handed down closely from west to east.

Line 3 People may discriminate the dull from the keen,

Line 4 but in the true way there is no Patriarch of North or South.]

I explained in last lecture about the title of this scripture, Sandokai-what does it mean by San-do-kai and Chikudo daisen no shin. Tonight, maybe, it is necessary to explain about the background of this poem-why Sekito-zenji-Sekito Kisen-daiosho, wrote this poem.

As you know, under the Fifth Patriarch[1] there were outstanding teacher who is called Jinshu,[2] and when the Fifth Patriarch announced that he will give transmission to someone, and everyone thought that, of course, Jinshu will receive the transmission. But actually Eno,[3] the Sixth Patriarch-Eno who became the Sixth Patriarch-Eno who was pounding rice in the corner of the temple received the transmission.

But Jinshu was a great scholar. So later Jinshu became-went to the northern country and became a great teacher. And Jinshu's school was called Northern-Hoku Zen-Northern School of Zen, Hoku Zen, Hoku Zen. [4] And the Sixth Patriarch, who went to south, spread his teaching in southern countries, and his school was called Nan Zen, Southern-South Zen.[5]

Later, as you know, Jinshu's school became-after Jinshu, his school became weaker and weaker. But in north, the Sixth Patriarch's school became, after the Sixth Patriarch, stronger and stronger. But at Sekito's time, you know-Sekito is the Eighth Patriarch, Eno is the Sixth Patriarch, and Seventh Patriarch is Seigen.[6] And Seigen's disciple is Sekito. Sekito is the author of this poem. In Sekito's time, Hoko-shu or Northern Zen was still powerful. But there were another disciple. Of course, Sixth Patriarch had many, many disciples. Maybe more than fifty. We can count fifty, but there must be more disciples under the Sixth Patriarch.

And one of-there were a disciple whose name is Katak Jinne.[7] Katak Jinne denounced the Northern Zen, which is, you know, Jinshu's Zen, pretty strictly, and he was a very active person. And what he said was not exactly-we cannot accept his teaching, you know, as a disciple of the Sixth Patriarch. Not exactly so, but he was very alert and active person. And he denounced, or his disciple, denounced the Northern Zen a lot.

So [in] Sekito's time there was, you know, some conflict between Southern Zen, which is Eno (Eno's, the Sixth Patriarch's) Zen, and Jinshu's Zen. So Sekito Kisen, the author of this poem, wanted to solve this, you know-wanted to make this dispute clear from his own viewpoint. This is, you know, why he wrote this poem.

So he-first of all, he started by Buddha's teaching, you know, Buddha's teaching, which is the teaching "a Great Mind of Sage in India," you know. That is the first thing he started to say. And it says:

[Line 1] The mind of the Great Sage of India

[Line 2] Flowed unseen from west to east.

[Translation by Reiho Masunaga.]

"Flowed unseen from west to east." Tozai mitsuni aifusu. In Chinese, tozai mitsuni aifusu. To means, you know, "China." And zai-"east" [west] means India. "In India and China, Buddha's great mind [was] transmitted all over, unseen-flowed unseen from west to east."

And next, you know, you don't have translation. And next sentence is not like this, you know. I have here someone's translation, but next, if you follow the order of the sentences, next one will be: "People discriminate the dull from the wit." This is-it means, you know, dispute between-which is better, you know, Northern School or, you know, Southern School? People, you know, say "Northern School is better," or "Southern School is better." People may-people say so, you know. It is actually, you know, it means, it means the dispute between Southern School and Northern School. And a strong criticism of [by] Katakū Jinne, Katakū Jinne. Katakū Jinne. Katakū Jinne is-was born 668 and died 670 [760]. Katakū Jinne. He is-he was-at that time, you know, maybe you must have studied the Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch. That sutra was compiled, maybe, compiled by someone who is under the strong influence of Katakū Jinne. So in that sutra, you know, Jinshu's teaching is pretty badly denounced, you know. Jinshu was not so good, you know. Only the Sixth Patriarch [laughs] was great teacher. It seems in that way because, maybe, the sutra was compiled by someone under the influence of Katakū Jinne. Anyway, this kind of dispute was very strong at that time.

So:

[Line 1] The mind of the Great Sage of India

[Line 2] Flowed unseen from west to east.

[Translation by Reiho Masunaga.]

It means that, you know, Sekito knows, you know, the true teaching of the great sage of Shakyamuni Buddha, which will include both Southern School and Northern School without any, you know, contradiction. From his viewpoint, you know, there is no need to, you know, to fight [laughs]. Because they don't understand real teaching of Buddha, they get into dispute. That is what he mean [laughs].

[Line 1] The mind of the Great Sage of India

[Line 2] Flowed unseen from west to east.

[Translation by Reiho Masunaga.]

You know, although they may not understand, you know, the teaching of the great sage, Shakyamuni Buddha, but his teaching flowed all over. If you have the eyes to see or have the mind to understand his teaching, you will understand it. And if you understand it, there is no-it is not necessary to be involved in this kind of dispute. Actually, it meant this kind of thing. "Flowed unseen from west to east."

And next sentence is-I translate it in this way: "People discriminate the dull from the wit." "The dull from the wit." It does-[laughs] does it make sense [laughs]?

Student [David Chadwick]: "The dull from the sharp."

Mm-hmm. "Dull from sharp" or-

[Conversation in background between students: "Dull from sharp" vs. "Dull from wit."]

"Dull," you know, it means that-it is, you know, difficult to translate. Jokon gekon, we say. Jokon means "better-those who has," you know, "more appropriate capacity of potentiality to understand Buddha's teaching" is someone who [is] not only alert, you know, or sharp, or clever. The cleverness is sometime barrier of-clever people sometime cannot understand Buddha's teaching. "Some," you know, "appropriate potentiality," you know-that is Jokon. Gekon means, you know-Gekon means "someone who-people who find it difficult to understand, to accept Buddha's teaching." But this is not so important, you know, in this sutra . This is [in] some rhetorical sense he says:

[Line 3] People discriminate the dull from the wit,

[Line 4] but true way has no patriarch of south or north.

[Translation by Suzuki-roshi.]

You know, this is important [laughs]. "True way has no patriarch of south or west [north]." No patriarch, you know, of the Sixth Patriarch or Jinshu. Jinshu is good, and the Sixth Patriarch is good. And Jinshu is good for someone who study things literally, you know. And the Sixth Patriarch's teaching will be good for some, you know, someone who has quick, sharp mind- [partial word]- -minded fellow.

But although, you know, according to the people, you know, teaching someone explained Buddha's teaching in detail, so that he can understand words after words. But for someone it is necessary to, you know, to point at the point without using so many words. So it is up to the people, but not-but for the great teacher, you know, there is no difference. Great teacher can be, you know, even [if] he is really great teacher, there is no difference in his true understanding. But his way of explaining teaching will be different.

"The people discriminate the dull from the wit," or-"but true way has no patriarch of south or north." Tozai mitsuni aifusu. "Flows-flowed unseen." Unseen is this-mitsuni. Mitsuni aifusu. Memmitsu no kafu.[8] This is mitsuni.[9] Mitsuni means, you know, "not secret." Sometime it means "secret," but "unseen" looks like "secret," but this "unseen" may not be so good a translation. Mitsuni means "exactly," you know, "exactly"-without no gap between the two.

Here the main purpose of this Sandokai is to explain reality from both side. The title is Sandokai: San means "many"; do means "one." And what is "many"? And what is "one"? Many is one; one is many. If you really understand reality, even though you say "many," each one of things are not separated from the other, you know. It is closely related. If so, it is one. But even though it is one, it looks like many [laughs]. So "many" is right, and "one" is right. So even though we say "one," we cannot ignore, you know, various being like stars and moons and, you know, animals and fish-the various being.

But although they are many, they do not exist separately; they are not separated from each other; they are closely related. So that is-from this point, we say they are interdependent. So "one" is-when we, you know, discuss about the meaning of each being, we say "many." We have many things to discuss. But if we come to the conclusion, or if we come to the real understanding or reality, you know, in fact it is just one. So all the discussion will be included [in] one real understanding of things. So "one" and "many" is very famous words. One and many.

And the other-another way to explain it, the reality, is differentiation. Differentiation is [laughs] equality. Equality. Equal value-things has equal value because they are different. You know, if man and woman is same [laughs], "man" and "woman" has no value. Because man and woman is different, "man" is valuable and "woman" is also valuable. So to be different is to have value. So in this sense, we have equal value-equal absolute value. Everything has absolute value, which is equal to everyone. But usually, you know, we are involved in the standard of evaluation, exchange value, you know, materialistic value, or spiritual value, or moral value. "Morally he is good," you know. "He is not so good." You know, if you-because you have some standard, you can say, "He is good." Moral standard will define the value of people. But the moral standard changes always [laughs], so, you know, virtuous person is not always so. If you compare [him] with someone who is like Buddha, he is not so good [laughs]. So "good" or "bad" is caused by some evaluation-standard. But the truth, you know-things-because things are different, you know, because of the difference, everything has its own value. That is, you know-that value is absolute value. Mountain is not, you know, valuable because it is high. Or river is not less valuable because it is low. Because mountain is-because mountain is high, on the other hand, you can say, because mountain is high, mountain is mountain. And it has absolute value. The water is-because water runs lower valley, you know, it is valuable. Because, you know, mountain-quality of mountain and quality of the river is completely different. Because it is different it is-it has equal value. "Equal" means absolute value.

So if we say-if we evaluate things from absolute viewpoint, it has equal value. So, you know, equality is, you know, differentiation, according to Buddhism. Differentiation is equality. So in usual sense, you know, differentiation is opposite to equal, but we understand equality and differentiation is same thing. And one and many is same [laughs]. If you think "one" is different from "many," that is wrong-your understanding is too materialistic and too superficial.

Anyway, so it says:

[Line 1] The true mind of the great sage of India

[Line 2] flowed unseen from west to east.

[Translation by Suzuki-roshi-close to Masunaga's.]

This kind of true mind, you know, this kind of understanding of reality started by Buddha, flowed unseen from west to east. Whether you understand or not, what Buddha says is true. So "unseen from west to east." But people easily get into confusion, you know, because of the evaluation of things-discrimination. Dull from wit-the wit. Dullness or sharpness. But from the standpoint of the patriarch, you know, it is same. There is no-for the Patriarch-Patriarchs-all the Patriarchs understand this point. So there is no Northern Patriarch or Southern Patriarch.

Ninkon: nin, "human"; kon[10] is, you know, kon, is kikon-it-ki-kon. And this is, you know, technical term of Buddhism-kikon.[11] And sometime we say rikon.[12] Ri is "sharp," or someone who has advantage in studying or accepting Buddha's teaching. Ri. Don is "dull." But here [in the Sandokai], you know, [we have] ridon: "dull"-someone who is dull has great advantage in studying Buddhism [laughs]. It is not, you know, always dull person bad to study Buddhism. Clever one is not always have advantage in studying Buddhism. But temporarily we divide our human potentiality into rikon and donkon.[13] Dull one is good because he is dull [laughs]; sharp one is good because he is sharp [laughs]. You cannot compare, you know, and you cannot say which is good. Do you understand this point [laughs]?

I'm not so sharp so [laughs] I understand very well [laughs, laughter].

My master always called me, "You crooked cucumber!" [Laughs.] "Crooked cucumber." The first-I was the last disciple of my teacher, you know, but I became the first one [laughs] because good cucumber ran away [laughs, laughter]. All the good ones run away. Maybe they are too smart.

I was not smart enough to run away [laughs, laughter], so I was caught [laughs, laughter]. That is, you know, for studying Buddhism, you know, my, you know, dullness was advantage, you know. If I were a sharp, you know, fellow, I should have run away [laughs] with them [laughs]. When I was left alone, I was very sad, you know: "Oh, no-" But when I left home, you know, I left home by my own choice. I told my parents, "I will go." [Laughs.] And they said, "You are too young, so you have to stay more here." But I must go, and I left my parents, so, you know, I couldn't go back. I could, but I thought I couldn't [laughs]. So, you know, I have nowhere to go. That is one reason. Another reason was I was not smart enough [laughs].

So, you know, smart one is not-haven't-smart one haven't always advantage, you know, and dull one-dull person is good because he is dull. We understand in this way. So actually there is no dull person or no smart person. It is same. Anyway, it is not so easy [laughs]. It is difficult. For the smart person, there is some difficulty for smart person. For dull one, there is some difficulty, you know, for dull person. For an instance, to study, you know, he must study hard, and he must read one book over and over again because he is not smart. But smart one forget [laughs] quite easily, you know. He may learn it very quickly, but, you know, what he learn does not stay so long for smart people's mind. But dull people, you know [laughs], for dull one it takes time to remember something, so over and over we should read it. If you read it over and over and remember it, it will not go so soon. So, you know, maybe same thing.

[Line 3] Ninkon ni ridon ari,

[Line 4] do ni namboku no so nashi.

"In the true way there is no Northern Patriarch or Southern Patriarch." That is very true. That is, you know, Sekito's understanding. By the way, Sekito was the-actually the Sixth's Patriarch's disciple. But after the Sixth Patriarch passed away, he became disciple of Seigen. That kind of things happens, you know, very often. I have some disciples here, maybe, you know, but if I die, those who cannot be-couldn't be my disciple will be disciple of some of, you know, disciple of my disciple, you know. Sekito was one of them like that.

Here, you know, to study Buddhism is not like to study something, you know-it takes time. Until you accept the teaching completely, it takes time.

And the most important point is, you know-you yourself rather than your teacher, you know. You yourself study hard. And what you receive from your teacher is the spirit of study, you know, to spirit to study. That spirit will be, you know, transmitted from warm hand to warm hand, you know. You should do it. That's all [laughs]. There is nothing to transmit to you.

And what you learn is-maybe from books or from the other teachers, so that is why we have teacher-master and teacher. Teacher could be various great teacher. Master is one, and we-master's disciple is-we call deshi, "disciple." And for the-for the students, whether he is his disciple or not, the student like this, like Zen Center. Some of you are-is my, you know, disciple. Some of you are not my disciple. Then, those who are not my disciple is called zuishin. Zuishin is "follower," or-and he may stay, you know, pretty long time under some teacher. Sometime longer than the period he stay with his master.

My, my tea [incomplete word-"teacher"?]-when I was thirty-two, my teacher passed away-my master passed away. So after that I studied, you know, under [Ilan] Kishizawa-roshi. So most of the understanding, you know, I have is Kishizawa-roshi's understanding. But-but my master is-Gyokujun So-on is my master.

So, anyway, in the true way has no patriarch of south or north. True way is one, you know. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over. It resumes with Suzuki-roshi and students laughing.] Our practice is not to put [gather] something in your basket. We don't force it, but it is rather to find something in your sleeve. What do you have?[14] But before you study, you know, hard, you don't know what you have in your sleeve, that's all [laughs, laughter]. Buddha has the same thing, and I have the same thing. "Oh! [Laughs.] It is amazing!" you know.

So we must have-that is the spirit we must have, you know. Anyway, you should study hard, whatever it is, whatever is said. If you don't like what I say, you shouldn't accept it [laughs]. It is okay. Eventually you will accept it [laughs, laughter]. If you say, "No!" I will say, "Okay. Go ahead. [Laughs, laughter.] Try hard!" I think that is the characteristic of Buddhism. Our, you know, approach is very wide, and as a Buddhist you have big freedom to study. And in what you say-whatever you say, it is okay, so there is no [laughs] patriarch of south or north [laughs]. We know this. Like Sekito says here: "Born, we clutch at things and later compound our delusion by following ideals" [Masunaga's translation]. And this is very-maybe very easy to understand, but what he is trying to say here is the relationship or the important teaching of Buddhism, you know. "Clutching at things"-it may be better to say in this way: "Clutching at things" (I just, you know, this is my translation, so you can change it)-"Clutching at things is delusion." This is more literal translation. "Clutching at things is delusion."

[Line 7] Ji wo shusuru mo moto kore mayoi.

[Line 8] Ri ni kano mo mata satori ni ara zu.

So:

[Line 7] Clutching at things is delusion.

[Line 8] And to recognize the truth is not always enlightenment either.

[Translation by Suzuki-roshi.]

It may be, but it is not always. "Clutching at things is delusion, but to recognize truth is not always enlightenment." Or you can say, "Recognize the truth is not enlightenment either."

"Clutching at things" means, you know, to stick to things, to stick [to] many, you know, many things you see. Understanding each being is different, you know, so, you know, this is something special, you know. "He is something special." If you think so, you will stick to him. That is, you know, not-that is illusion. But, on the other hand, even though you recognize the truth, you know, that everything is one, even though you understand in that way, it is not always enlightenment, you know. It is just, you know, understanding by your head, by your thought, by your thinking. Real enlightenment include both. Enlightened person do not ignore things and do not stick [to] things. And he does not even to stick to the truth either. There is no truth which is different from each being. Being each being itself is truth, you know. Truth is something, you know, which is beyond, which is controlling each being. You may think in that way, you know: "There is truth, like a truth of gravitation," you know. The apple is the each things, so behind the apple there is some truth which is working on an apple is the truth of, theory of gravitation. Even though you understand things in that way, that is not enlightenment, it says. This is the backbone of all this-all of this Sandokai.

[Line 1] The true mind of the great sage of India

[Line 2] flowed unseen from west to east.

[Line 3] People discriminate the dull from the wit,

[Line 4] but true way has no patriarch of south or north.

[Translation by Suzuki-roshi-close to Masunaga's.]

So far is, you know, he, you know-this is introduction, maybe. Introduction about what he want to say here at this-under that circumstances where there were various poliminous [polemic], you know, understanding of which teaching-which school is better.

This is, you know-so far is the introduction, and-

[Line 7] Clutching at things is delusion,

[Line 8] and to recognize the truth is not enlightenment.

[Translation by Suzuki-roshi.]

This is the, you know-oh, excuse me. I skipped, you know, to-I changed the order of the sentence. In this translation, you know, something should be, you know, in-the main backbone of the poem is translated in the introduction. So [laughs] I think I have to change the order. No, I am not changing, I [laughs] want to follow the original text.

"Clear source":

[Line 5] Source of the teaching is clear.

[Translation by Suzuki-roshi-close to Masunaga's.]

Source of the teaching is clear. And kept-[Line 6] The streams of the teaching kept pure or unsullied.

[Translation by Suzuki-roshi-close to Masunaga's.]

[S.R. unsure of pronunciation, so he spelled out "unsullied." Students pronounced it.] And then, you know, come to this sentence:

[Line 7] Clutching at things is delusion,

[Line 8] and to recognize the truth is not enlightenment.

[Translation by Suzuki-roshi.]

This is the teaching which was started by Buddha and kept unsullied in various stream. Hmm. Okay? [Laughs.]

I think if you, you know, type this, you know, in three-big-three-

Student A [David Chadwick]: Double-space.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, double-space or more. So that I can change the order and, you know-

Student B [Lew Richmond?]: Roshi, couldn't we just work from the Japanese and forget that translation?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: Couldn't we just work from the Japanese and forget that translation?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student B: Throw away that translation and work from the Japanese- from, like, you know, we had the biggest group [?]-what we're learning is like-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, yeah. Okay.

David Chadwick: You probably know English much better than [Reiho] Masunaga, you know.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Uh-huh, yeah. I am trying [laughs, laughter], you know. I am trying hard to follow the order, you know, so that, you know, it is-if you translate it in fluent English, you know, it will-you may find it difficult to explain it. This is very, you know-the original poem is very, you know, full of technical terms. And you cannot, you know, change it. If you change it, you will lose, you know-it doesn't make, actually, much sense, you know.

So even though it is difficult, I think we should follow the original text. That is because I have to-I want you to understand completely, I feel I have to follow the-even though it is difficult-I want to follow the original text faithfully.

So maybe it is difficulty for me and for you too. So you can forget all about Japanese, you know, but [laughs, laughter]-but as you are reciting, you know, every morning, so I am trying to follow the meaning of those words.

Student B: But when you explain to us, for instance, San-do-kai-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: -San-do-kai-

Suzuki-roshi: Hai. Yeah.

Student B: -it's not so difficult for us to make it into right English.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Oh.

Student B: When we understand what san means and what do means and what kai means, we can make a sentence out of it.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: You follow what I mean?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: But Masunaga, for instance, he says [the title is], "The Union of the Spiritual and the Phenomenal Worlds." Now that is not as meaningful to us. It's good English-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: -but it is not as meaningful to us as translating San-do-kai.

Suzuki-roshi: I see.

Student B: You understand?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe so.

Student B: And then we make it into-then each one of us will make it into a different sentence, ultimately. [Laughs, laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Some, yeah. Maybe, you know, I think that is easier eventually, you know, after all you [will] find it easier to understand if we follow one by one.

Student B: Mm-hmm

Suzuki-roshi: And you are reciting it, you know, in Japanese, so that is why I started to, you know, talk about this one.

Mmm. I think we have no more time. [Bell rings.]

---

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript and notes by Marian Derby. City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican, 6/5/00.

[1] Daiman Konin (Chin. Daman Hongren, 601-674): Fifth Chinese Ancestor.

[2] Daitsu Jinshu (Chin. Datong Shenxiu, c. 605-706): student of Daiman Konin; founder of the Northern School.

[3] Daikan Eno (Chin. Dajian Huineng, 638-713): Sixth Chinese Ancestor.

[4] Hoku-shu Zen (Chin. Pei-tsung ch'an): Northern School of Chan Buddhism.

[5] Nan-shu Zen (Chin. Nan-tsung-ch'an): Southern School of Chan Buddhism.

[6] Seigen Gyoshi (Chin. Qingyuan Xingsi, 660-740): Student of Daikan Eno.

[7] Katakū Jinne (Chin. Heze Shenhi, 670-762): student of Daikan Eno.

[8] Memmitsu (na) (careful, considerate; detailed; meticulous) + no (of) + kafu (...). [See also Lecture SR-70-05-27, where this phrase was introduced.]

[9] That is, memmitsu and mitsuni have the same root (?).

[10] kon: root; character or nature of a human being, as in kikon and rikon. [See Sandokai Lecture 3, SR-70-06-01, p. 8, and earlier discussion in this lecture on jokon vs. gekon.]

[11] kikon: "The capacity of the common people to understand the teachings of Buddhism"-Daito Shuppansha, Japanese-English Bud. Dict. (1971), p. 174.

[12] rikon: "People with keen minds who are capable of understanding the subtle teachings of the Buddha"-ibid., p. 234.

[13] donkon: "A man of inferior spiritual capacity"-Hisao Inagaki, A Glossary of Zen Terms, 1991, p. 52.

[14] From the tape turnover until this footnote number, the gap in the lecture was reconstructed by Marian Derby from her contemporaneous notes.

1970 juni (10)

1 - Sandokai Lecture #3

Monday, June 01, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #3

Tassajara

[The following lines of the Sandokai are discussed in this lecture:

Line 5 Reigen myoni kokettari.

Line 6 Shiha anni ruchusu.

Line 7 Ji wo shusuru mo moto kore mayoi.

Line 8 Ri ni kano mo mata satori ni ara zu.

Line 5 The true source is pure and stainless.

Line 6 The branch streams flow in the dark.

Line 7 Clutching at things is delusion.

Line 8 To recognize the truth is not always enlightenment either.]

[Suzuki-roshi sneezes directly into the mike as it is being set up. He and students laugh.] I want to know the feedback. [Laughs, laughter.] Oh my. [Laughs.]

After all, it's better to follow one character after another like this. [Points to the blackboard where the characters of the text are written.[1]] This part is not so difficult. Reigen-rei is-rei is "something wonderful," you know, "something beyond our description, beyond our words" is rei. Gen is "source-source of the teaching." Reigen-"source of the teaching."

The source of the teaching of Buddha, you know-Buddha-what Buddha talked about is the source of the teaching which is beyond our words in term of right or wrong. And this is important, you know. Rei-gen. Whatever we can think about is not source, you know. It is already something comes-come out from the source. The source is something unknown. Only buddha knows. Or only when you practice zazen you have it. Or even though you don't practice it, or whether you realize it or not, you know, something which exist before our realization is source. The source is not like something, you know, to, you know, to put on lettuce [laughs, laughter]-not that kind of thing, you know. It is something which you cannot taste, you know, in term of tasty or not tasty. That is real source.

And this source can be- Here it says ri. Ri is "truth," we say. But when we-"truth," you know, when we say "truth," you know, in our language, the truth is something which you can see, you can figure out. But that-in Buddhism that is not truth. Truth is something which is beyond our description, which is beyond our thinking, is the truth. Ri. And reigen is, you know, more figuratively speaking, ri can be "the wonderful," you know, "source," wonderful which is beyond our language-description. And this is source-source of all being.

By the way, when we say "being," you know, "being" include our thought too. You see? The being-when we say "being," being can be many things which we can see is being, but which we can think is also being [laughs], you know. So usually, [when] you say "truth," the truth means something underlying theory or something is truth, you know.

That the sun rise from east and set in west is truth, or that the earth is turning, you know, by itself in some certain direction, is the truth. But in Buddhism that is not truth. That is being also--being which is in our big mind, you know. So in our m- [partial word]- Whatever it is, what is in our mind in term of big or small, right or wrong, that is "being." So if you think about something in term of right or wrong, or you may say "This is eternal truth" [laughs], you know, but that is-for us that is "being" too, because that is some eternal truth is something which is in your mind.

So we do not, you know, make much distinction between things which exist outside of ourselves or which exist within ourselves. You say "outside of ourself" [laughs], you know, but it is not true, you know. "Outside of yourself." You feel in that way, you know, but actually, when you say "There is river," river is already within your mind, you know. So, you know, hasty people may say "River is there," but if you think more about it you will find out the river is something which is in your mind is river. So it is a kind of thought we have in our mind.

And if you say "There is river and here is my mind," that is dualistic, you know, understanding. That is hasty, primitive, shallow understanding of things. That is so-called-it u.[2] U, you know. [Laughs.] U. U is, you know-maybe better to remember this words, you know: u or mu. Mu [3]-opposite of mu is u. U-uken[4] is, you know, pre-Buddhistic, you know, understanding of things. When you become Buddhist you have no more idea or [of] u or mu.

Anyway, [reigen means] the "real source," "true source," or "source which is beyond our thinking."

Myoni kokettari: myo is, you know,"clear"; koketsu means-ko is "white," and ketsu is "stainless." It means that-"stainless" means no stain of thought or, you know, thought or words. If you describe it, that is the stain, you know-to put limitation to the truth, you know. So it means you stain the truth. You put some mark on the, you know, truth. So if it is pure, white, and stainless, that is clear. And that is, you know, how [what] the "true source" means, you know. So true source is pure, white, and stainless"-ketsu is-seiketsu[5] means, you know-seiketsu, you know-you should keep your room seiketsu. Seiketsu means "well cleaned up" is seiketsu.

Ko is "white." This [pointing to ko] is "white." And this [pointing to -tari?] is "sound." Give [poetic or spoken?] sound to the character-"the white"- "the pure white"-and "stainless and clear." But this two characters [kokettari?] is very interesting, you know. I will explain later.

Because he said reigen-"source," you know-he-it is to say "branch stream" is some rhetorical way of putting words, you know. When- Because here [pointing to reigen] is source, here [pointing to shiha] is stream, you know. To make this-those two line of the poem beautiful, he says "shiha." "The branch stream is"-an is also. It means "dark."

"Dark." This [pointing to myo] is clear. This [pointing to an] is dark. And ruchu is "flow" or "pour in," you know. "Flow over"-not "over"- "flow in." Ru-chu. This [pointing to ru] is "flow." This [pointing to chu] is "pour."

So the source is, you know, pure and stainless, but this [pointing to reigen] is more noumenal word. This [pointing to shiha] is more phenomenal words. If I say, you know. But phenomenal or noumenal is not right [laughs], but tentatively I have to say so. But- So that is why I said it is better to remember this word-technical term, ri [noumenal]. And another important technical term is ri-ji [corrects ri to ji, phenomenal][writing on blackboard]. Those two technical terms is a term which you [should] remember.

Ji is, you know, something which you can see, which you can hear, or which you can smell or taste, you know, and it include object of thinking, or ideas-is ji. Whatever it is, you know, which can be introduced into your consciousness is ri-ji [corrects ri to ji ]. And this is something which is beyond our conscious world is ri.

So here, you know, this five characters [Reigen myoni kottari] means ri, which is beyond words, something which is stainless. In Prajñaparamita Sutra, [it says] "no taste, no," you know, "no eyes, no," you know, "ears, no nose," you know. That is actually this one [the character ri].

And, Shiha anni ruchusu. Shiha [anni ruchusu] is "branch stream naturally or," you know, "by itself flow or pour in everywhere like water." Now water, even though you don't think there is no water, there is water, you know. Water will be inside of our physical body, or even in plants there is water. So even though we don't know, you know, there is water all over. So the pure source is all over, you know. So each being is itself, you know, pure source. And pure source is nothing but each being. If you want to know what is pure source, each being is the pure source. If you want to know what is each being, you know, pure source is each being. So even though- If, you know- There is no two things. There is no difference between ri and ji-pure source and its stream. Stream itself is pure source, and pure source is stream.

[Line 5] Reigen myoni kokettari.

[Line 6] Shiha anni ruchusu.

Even though you don't know, you know, there is reigen, the pure source. A pure source is flowing all over. Stainless. Pure source is all over. Even though you don't know-that is "dark" [an]. And this "don't know" is very important, and this "clearness" [myoni?] is also important, but I have to explain it later.

And here-so to stick to various idea, various being, or to stick to some idea of something, you know, even though [it is] Buddha's teaching, you know. And if you think you understood it, you know, [saying] "Buddha's teaching is something like this," you know, then it mean you stick to ji. To stick to shu is to-shusuru is-

[Line 7] Ji wo shusuru mo moto kore mayoi

-you say. Ji is "being." This [shu] means "to stick to." To stick to being or thought is originally or of course [moto], is delusion. Ji wo shusuru mo- Ji wo shusuru mo moto kore mayoi. This [mayoi] is "delusion." And kore is "itself is delusion"- "nothing but delusion," you know, "itself is delusion." Or "nothing but delusion." Moto-"of course," you know-"nothing but delusion." To stick to things is delusion, you know. To stick to some idea is delusion.

[Line 8] Ri ni kano mo mata satori ni ara zu.

This [satori] is "enlightenment," and this [ara zu] is "no, not enlightenment." Mo mata is "also." This [character] is ri, the- This is ri. It's better not to say [laughs] anything, you know. It's better not to say in English, you know [laughs, laughter]. Ri ni [laughs]- If you translate- If I translate it [into] English it can be this [pointing to ji [6]], you know [laughs] already. So-

If you, you know, think-recognize, you know. This [pointing to kano] is "recognize," you know, [as in] kai-San-do-kai. Kai. The point- If you, you know, make some point about ri [it] is not enlightenment, you know. Enlightenment is not something you can experience, actually. Enlightenment is beyond our experience. At the same time, you know, if you think enlightenment is beyond our experience, something which you cannot experience-"That is enlightenment." So if someone says, "I attained enlightenment," he is wrong.

If you say so [laughs], it means that you stick to [laughs] the explanation of enlightenment, you know. That is, you know, if you say so you are-you stick to words. That is delusion if you say so.

So you cannot say there is no enlightenment or there is enlightenment. Enlightenment is not something, you know, which you can say "there is" or "there isn't." And at the same time, enlightenment is something, you know, which you can experience is enlightenment too. If you understand really those two sentences-

At Sekito's time, there were big dispute about, you know, sudden enlightenment and gradual practice or enlightenment. Katakū Jinne denounced the Jinshu's[7] way very badly. And Jinshu's way is gradual attainment, while Sixth Patriarch's way is sudden enlightenment. So in the Sutra of Sixth Patriarch, "just to sit" is not true practice. That kind of sentence is, you know, you can see everywhere [in the Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch] denouncing the, you know, Jinshu's way. But maybe that is not Sixth Patriarch's idea [laughs]-that was not Sixth Patriarch idea.

There is not much difference between Jinshu and the Sixth Patriarch's way. Later, maybe fifty years later, there was this kind of words was added by Katakū Jinne. Right after Katakū Jinne passed away, maybe his disciple [added them]. Katakū Jinne was very good. On the other hand, he was very active and he was very critical with Jinshu's zazen. But he is not so, you know, hasty so he wouldn't say something like that.

But right after the Katakū Jinne, which was great, you know, Zen master, disciple of Sixth Patriarch, you know, this kind of , you know, things was added on the Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch, which was written right after the Sixth Patriarch's death. So [in] seven fourteen [714 C.E.] it was compiled.

And, you know, compiling and maybe many of his disciple had it, you know-the Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch. But Katakū Jinne's disciple made some, you know, correction or [laughs] changed some part, or added something, you know, like, you know, poem: "There is no bodhi tree ...." [laughs] or "There is no mirror ...," you know. "There is mirror, or there is no stand for the mirror. There is nothing," you know. "How is it possible to wipe the mirror?" That kind of poem, you know. Many people criticize that kind-that poem because it is not so good, you know [laughs, laughter]. So many people thinks this cannot be the Sixth Patriarch's poem, you know. This kind of, you know, useless, you know, things was added.

And it was the, you know, a kind of pride or honor to own the Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch. So, "Do you have this book," you know? "Yes I have." But the books they have is not same. There are many books-many kinds of the-entitled "The Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch." Many kinds. So the oldest one is, you know, do not include that kind of, you know, denouncing [laughs] critical words to the-for the Jinshu school.

So to, you know- The purpose of Sandokai is to make it clear this kind of wrong understanding of which is right, or which-Jinshu, who stick-who looks like stick to rituals and understanding or scholarly work. All the scholarly works belongs to ji, you know. Scholarly study belongs to ji. The ri is something, you know, which you can experience by practice is ri. You see, this is- Maybe you, you think scholarly work is ri [laughs]-you may think so-but for us it is not so. Scholarly work is ji. To stick to scholarly work is to stick to things. Things include our scholarly study.

To follow, or to realize, or to have complete understanding of ri-to accept ri is our practice. But even though you practice zazen and you think that is ri-attainment of ri, or realization of ri, but that is not always so [laughs]-that is, you know, according to the Sekito it is so. And this is the, you know, the intention of writing this poem. So this is, you know, this is the backbone of the whole Sandokai. So if you understand this much, you understood-you already understood Sandokai-whole Sandokai.

So this is very important part. The first part was introduction:

[Line 1] Chikudo daisen no shin,

[Line 2] tozai mitsuni aifusu.

[Line 3] Ninkon ni ridon ari,

[Line 4] do ni namboku no so nashi.

This is introduction, you know. And then this is the first, or this is the main point of whole sutra. So, maybe, tentatively, I translate it like this:

[Line 1] The true mind of the great sage of India

[Line 2] handed down closely from west to east.

Tozai mitsuni aifusu. Chikudo daisen no shin is already understood, you know. Chikudo- Chikudo is "India." Daisen is "great sage." Sen means "hermit," you know. At that time-at Sekito's time, there were many Taoist and there were many hermits who had some supernatural power, who were proud of various supernatural power and seeking for some medicine to, you know, to live long-to keep long life, you know, maybe, you know, finding out some medicine is also Taoist way.

But they-as I explained, they do not-they were not so much interested in practice-Buddhist practice-and they don't, you know, find out-they couldn't understand why we must practice zazen-why practice is so necessary. That was also true with Dogen-zenji [laughs]: "If," you know, "we have-all of us have buddha nature, why is it necessary to practice?" He, you know, suffered a lot about this point. He- Not only he couldn't understand it intellect- [partial word]-solve this problem, you know, by study-intellectual study-but also he couldn't accept this point.

This is very important, you know-why we should- When you really know yourself, you know, you will realize how important it is to practice zazen. Before you know what you are doing, actually, you know, you don't know why we practice zazen. You know, you think you are quite free-whatever you do, that is your choice [laughs], you say, but actually you are creating karma for yourself and for others [laughing]. And still you don't know what you are doing, so you don't think there is no need to practice zazen. But, you know-

So, we have to, you know, to pay our debt by [laughs] ourselves. No one can pay for your debt, you know. That is why it is necessary to practice, you know. To fulfill our responsibility, we practice zazen. And we have to. If we don't, you know, you will-you don't feel so good, first of all [laughs], and, you know, you will create, you know, some karma for others too. And without knowing, you say "Why is it necessary to practice Zen?" Moreover, when you say, you know, "We have buddha nature," you think buddha nature is something, you know, something, something like diamond which is in your sleeve, you know. The true buddha nature is not something like this [pointing to the character for ji][8]. It is ri-it is not ji. Even diamond, it is ji, not ri. [Sentence completed. Tape changed.] [So we are always involved in this][9] world only without knowing ri.

The other day, when I explained about human potentiality- And I think I will ex- [partial word]- This is very im- [partial word]- For the- In this sutra, this point is not so important. The more important thing is- In this sutra it says:

[Line 3] Ninkon ni ridon ari.

This is just, you know, rhetorical, because-just because [of] rhetorical need, he put [in] this sentence. But we must ha- [partial word]- It is interesting to, you know, to understand what is human potentiality in Buddhism.

Kikon[10]/rikon[11]/donkon[12], you know, we-

[Line 3] Ninkon ni ridon ari.

Nin is "human." Kon is "root." And it [ninkon] means "potentiality-human potentiality." Ridon [rikon?] is someone who has advantage, or [and someone] who has some disadvantage is don. And one is ri [rikon], the [other] one is don [donkon].

And rikon and donkon is, you know- There is, you know- Ki-kikon-ki. Here we have no- Ki-ki means [refers to] kikon. Kikon, you know [is] classified into rikon and donkon. And why I start to-started to talk about this is because I want to explain, you know, what kind of- I want to explain what kind of understanding or practice we have, you know, and why it is necessary to practice zazen. And we- Buddhists classified, you know, various people-human being in various way. So one of the classification is, you know, rikon and donkon.

Ki [13] means "potentiality." Ki. We have potentiality to be Buddha-to be a buddha, you know, in its true sense. So it is like a bow and arrow, you know. Arrow, you know, has potentiality to-potentiality to fly, you know. Because bow and arrow has potentiality, if you use it, you know, the arrow will go. But if someone doesn't use, you know, bow and arrow it wouldn't go. So bow and arrow has potentiality. So does we human being, you know. We are ready to be a buddha, but if you don't practice zazen, or if Buddha doesn't help you, you cannot be a buddha even though you have potentiality.

So ki means potentiality, and rikon is-means people who have good potentiality. And donkon means who have not much, you know, potentiality.

And so far, Buddhists classified, you know, in various way. One class- [partial word]-one interpretation-or you can translate, you know, ki like "potentiality." Potentiality, you know, means- One means two. One is possibility. Possibility. Potentiality, you know, is also possibility. The other is- If you, you know, talk about its nature, it is, you know, possibility-I have possibility to be a buddha. But if you observe me in term of time, you know, when, you know, in future, you know, even though I have, you know, potentiality to be a buddha, you know, if, you know, someone doesn't help me I cannot be a buddha. You see? Or if I have a chance to be a buddha by practice, we cannot be a buddha.

So from the viewpoint of nature, you know, it is possibility, you know-I have possibility. And from viewpoint of time, it is, you know-I don't know what to say in English, you know. Do you- Do you find out some good word? Future possibility [laughs], maybe. Future possibility. Future possibility will be- You know, it include the idea of time. When you don't include idea of time, it is possibility. Potentiality is possibil- [partial word]-equal possibility.

And when you have-you ask me when, it means future possibility: when, you know. Today or tomorrow. So when we think, you know, when we understand the word "potentiality" in term of nature, we should be very kind and very generous to everyone, you know, because everyone has potential-possibility to be a buddha, even though they are not buddha right now. Because right-because he has, you know, possibility to be a buddha.

So we should not, you know-we should respect him, and we should be very generous to people. But when we think about the possibility in term of "when," you know, sometime you should be very strict with someone. Do you understand? If you miss this time, you know, if you do not [make a] good effort in one week or in one year, you, you know, you will not have chance to attain enlightenment. If you say always "tomorrow, tomorrow, tomorrow" [laughs], you know, even though you have possibility [laughing], you cannot attain enlightenment. So when we think when, you know, time, we should be very strict with people.

It is same thing with your practice, you know. When you don't think, you know, about time-when-you know, you can be very generous with everyone, you know. You will be-you can treat people very well. Always. But if we, you know, think-if we have to think about time, you know-"today" or "tomorrow" [laughing]-we cannot be so generous because we will lose time. So "You should finish this" and "I'll finish this" and "You should help him," you know, and "I will help some other person." In this way, you know, we should be very strict with ourselves.

So that is why we, you know, analyze potentiality in various way. One is possibility, and the other is future possibility. So possibility, ki, means-ki, means "possibility" and "future possibility." When we understand potentiality in this way, you can, you know, work-you can practice very well-sometime very generous way and sometime very strict way. We have to have, you know, two side in our practice, or in our understanding of ki-chance, or, you know, possibility. This is the first one [interpretation of ki].

And second one is interrelation. Ki means "interrelation." It is relationship between, you know, buddha and good people, and buddha who has-who is good nature-and who has bad nature [laughs]. I am sorry to say "bad nature" [laughs] but tentatively I have to say so. So for the people who has good nature, you know, we should give-we should encourage them, giving some, you know, joy-joy of practice. We should enjoy our practice with good person. When we practice with someone, even though tentatively, you know, while [for] a while, who is not so good [laughs], you know, we should, you know, suffer with him. That is another understanding.

So ki means sometime "interrelationship between buddha and someone who helps, and someone who is helped." So in the relationship between good person and you, there is-that relationship will be to encourage, to give joy of practice is ki-actual meaning of ki. And for the person who has-who is suffering, you should suffer with him, you know. That is so-called-it jihi.[14]

When we say "love" in our term, jihi. Jihi is usually translated "love," you know, but love means-love has two sides. One is to give joy, yoraku, and the other is bakku. Bakku is to eliminate [suffering[15]]-to suffer with them. To eliminate [suffering]-to make their-his suffering less, you know, we suffer with him. We share their suffering. That is love. So love has two side: to give joy, to give something, you know. If he is very good, you know, we can enjoy joy of practice with him by giving good cushion, good zendo, you know, and something like this.

But actually, who is suffering? Zendo doesn't mean anything [laughs]. It doesn't mean anything. Whatever you give him, he will not accept it. "No, I don't need. I suffer a lot. I don't know why. Right now, you know, to get out of suffering is most important point. Nothing can help me. You cannot help me," he may say. When you hear that, like Avalokiteshvara Bodhisattva, you should be someone-you should be like someone who is suffering, and you should suffer as he suffers. Actually, you will feel in that way, you know. You-if you see someone who is in suffer[ing], you will suffer too. That is because of your love, you know [tapping chest], your innate love, your instinct of love, you share the suffering. That is love in its true sense. So ki may mean not only "possibility" or "potentiality," but also "relationship." This is second interpretation of ki.

And third one is "good means," or "adequateness," you know. Like, you know, pots and cover [laughs], you know. You cannot put big cover, you know, like in Japan we have bathtub, you know. You may know what is Japanese bathtub. It is wooden barrel, you know, big barrel, which has its cover. After finishing bath we cover the bath with the big wooden cover. But that cover cannot be used for the pan [laughs]. It is too big. So bath must have, you know, cover for itself.

So ki means, you know, "adequateness." So here it says also, if you see person who is suffering because of ignorance, because of what he is- because he doesn't know what he is doing, you must, you know, give tear-you must suffer with him. That is, you know, to-to have good relationship. When you see someone who enjoy his true nature, you should give ji-ji. Ji means, you know, compassion-not compassion-to-to encourage him.

And here, you know, this is what-this is extra [laughs]. And next thing is what I am very much interested in it. You know there is-there is Buddhist understand this way: Buddhism will not last forever, you know. It will perish, you know, after thousand year from Buddha's death. But that thousand year in some other sutra it say some other way, but anyway, we have this kind of understanding.

When Buddha-first five hundred years-this is not exactly-cannot be exactly so-but the first five hundred years, when Buddha's direct disciple or grandson of-grand-disciple-anyway, the first five hundred [years] will have good sages like something like Buddha. And next, you know, hundred years-so it means after-one thousand years after his death-we will have, you know, people who practice zazen and who study, you know, Buddhism. That is the people after the first five hundred to one thousand. The last time [laughs]-this is interesting-last time, which is after one thousand year [laughs], they will not observe precepts [laughs, laughter]. It is exactly so [laughs, laughter]. They will not observe precepts. But they will read sutras [laughing] and they will chant sutras. They will not [be] interested in zazen so much. And those people we had in the first thousand years-people like arhat or people who practice zazen or people who understood his teaching-difficult to find out, or no one can be like that. And the people will be involved in just, you know, idea of emptiness or, you know, somethingness [laughing]-somethingness or emptiness.

You know, we talk about emptiness, you know, and you think you understand emptiness, but if you understand emptiness, you know, even though you explain pretty well what is emptiness, but it is [laughs] this one [pointing to the character for ji ], not that one [pointing to the character for ri ]. Real emptiness will be ex- [partial word]-not experienced, you know-will be realized by good practice.

So here it says after-people after thousand year after Buddha will have, you know, idea of emptiness or idea of somethingness [laughs]. But they will not understand what [is] really meant by emptiness or somethingness. So purpose of Sandokai is, you know, to make this point clear: what is, you know, emptiness, what is somethingness, what is darkness, what is clearness, what is true source of the teaching, what is various being which, you know, is supported by true source of the teaching is the purpose of his-his intention of writing-making this poem of Sandokai.

I borrowed, you know, a book from-from-from Gary [Snyder]'s wife, you know-Mas-Masa-Masa-and about Sangai-kyo, you know, a small Vajra school of Japan: Sangai-kyo. And in that book, you know, it said-it says, the people in the last-in after one thousand year after Buddha's death-they will [laughs]-people will-may be classified in two [laughing]. Very appropriate, you know. You know, it explains what we are doing here and what they are doing here in Japan [laughs]. Good contrast. And, you know, it is explain very well, you know. Anyway, we do not observe precepts [laughs, laughter]. In Japan, you know, we eat fish, we kill animals, and in America too, you know. In its strict sense we don't observe-that is very true.

And, you know, one is very innocent [laughs], because, you know, you don't know about what you are actually doing [when] you violate precepts. But in Japan, even though they know what they are doing, you know, they still do it because they are shameless [laughs, laughter]. They have no idea of shame, you know. I thought "You have no idea of shame," but if I think more, you know, they do not-knowing that what they should do, you know, to do not observe is real shameless, you know. You know, innocent people looks like shameless, but it is not, you know, real shameless [laughs]. So I was very interested in the description of the people in our time. And anyway, we will just-we will be involved in, you know, this idea-ji-only.

So you may ask, you know, "What is real teaching of Buddha?" you know. If you don't, you know, understand it you will keep asking someone, you know, "What is it? What is it? What does it mean?" You are just seeking for something which you can understand. That is mistake, you know.

Dogen-zenji says, "There is no bird who flies after the limit of the sky," you know. "There is no fish who swim after knowing the end of the ocean." [Laughs.] We don't exist in that way. We exist in limitless world. And sentient being is, you know, numberless, and our desire is limitless, but still, you know, we have to, you know, try-we have to continue to make our effort like fish flies [laughs]-swims-like bird swim [flies]. So Dogen-zenji says, "Bird fly like a bird; fish swims like a fish." That is bodhisattva's way, and that is how, you know, we observe our practice. When we understand in this way, according to Dogen, we are not people in the, you know, we are not people in mappo. Mappo is last period.

Shobo/zobo/mappo. Shobo is Buddha's time. Zobo is imitation-dharma imitation-imitation-dharma time. And mappo is last period. But still, you know, in some way, in some way, Buddhism exist [laughs]. But if we understand, really, you know, what he meant, that is-it means that we are in Buddha's time. As Dogen-zenji said, "Buddha is always here." You should not be involved in time or space, you know. Our practice should not be disturbed by some framework of time or space.

Oh! [Sees the lateness of the hour.] Oh, my. I am sorry.

[Tape ends. No Question/Answer session.]

-----

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Verbatim transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican (6/5/00).

[1] The comment in these brackets is from the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby.

[2] u: existence; the opposite of non-existence (mu) or relativity, void, nothingness (ku).

[3] mu: nothing; naught; nil.

[4] uken: heterodox view that dharmas have a real or permanent existence.

[5] seiketsu (na) (Jap.): (adj.) clean.

[6] From the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby.

[7] Daitso Jinshu and Daikan Eno were both disciples of the Fifth Patriarch Daiman Konin. According to one tradition, when the Fifth Ancestor wanted to find his successor, he asked the monks to write a poem to express their understanding. Jinshu, the head monk, wrote the following poem on a wall in the middle of the night:

Our body is the bodhi tree, our mind a mirror bright.

Carefully wipe them hour by hour, and let no dust alight.

When Eno saw this the next day, he asked a monk to write down the following poem for him:

There is no bodhi tree,

nor stand of a mirror bright.

Since all is void,

where can the dust alight?

When Konin saw this, he knew the author had the understanding he was looking for and recognized Eno as his dharma heir and thus the Sixth Ancestor.

[8] From the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby.

[9] From the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby (her notes during tape change).

[10] Kikon: "The capacity of the common people to understand the teachings of Buddhism" -Daito Shuppansha, Japanese-English Buddhist Dictionary (1971), p. 174.

[11] Rikon: "People with keen minds who are capable of understanding the subtle teachings of the Buddha"-ibid., p. 234.

[12] Donkon: "A man of inferior spiritual capacity"-Hisao Inagaki, A Glossary of Zen Terms, 1991, p. 52

[13] Ki: "The mind which is capable of responding to a particular spiritual impulse"-op. cit., p. 173.

[14] Jihi: friendliness and compassion. Ji and hi are two of the four boundless thoughts (shimuryoshin): (1) ji (friendliness, maitri), (2) hi (compassion, karuna), (3) ki (rejoicing over the happiness of others, mudita), and (4) sha (equanimity, upeksha).

[15] One definition of bakku is "to take away suffering"-Daito Shuppansha, Japanese-English Buddhist Dictionary (1971).

2 - Sandokai Lecture #4

Wednesday, June 03, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #4

Tassajara

[Lecture starts 3/4 of the way through Side B of the original tape.]

[The following lines of the Sandokai are discussed in this lecture:

Line 9 Mommon issai no kyo,

Line 10 ego to fuego to.

Line 11 Eshite sarani aiwataru.

Line 12 Shikara zare ba kurai ni yotte jusu.

Line 9 The five sense gates and the five sense objects

Line 10 are interdependent and absolutely independent.

Line 11 Interrelated endlessly,

Line 12 yet each stays in its own position.]

Tape operator: The beginning of the lecture, given on June third.

Suzuki-roshi: Last night [lecture?], I explained ri and ji. And usual person stick to ji. That is quite, you know, usual. And characteristic of Buddhist-Buddha's teaching is, you know, to go beyond things. "Things" means the various being and various idea we have and we think. Even though we say "truth," truth usually means something we figure out, [something] we think. That is truth. But this truth as a-something which we can figure out or think about is also ji in Buddhism. When we go beyond subjective and objective world, which is ji, we come to the understanding-oneness of everything, oneness of subjective-subjectivity and objectivity, oneness of inside and outside.

For an instance, if you sit zazen you are not thinking anything. You are not watching anything. Your focus is, you know, four feet-four, five feet ahead, but actually we are not watching anything. Just focus is there, but we don't watch anything. Even though many ideas come, we do not think, you know. It comes in and goes out, that's all. We do not entertain various idea, you know. We do not serve [laughs] food or anything, you know. If they come in, okay, and if they go out, okay [laughs]. That's all [laughs]. That is zazen, you know. When we, in that condition-in this kind of mind-when we have this kind of mind, our mind actually, you know, include everything. Even though you do not try to include, you know, everything, actually everything is in your mind.

And another thing I must tell you is we do not talk about, you know, things which have no relationship with ourselves, you know. We do not think, you know-we do not [get] concerned about-we-we do not accept-expect something which may exist, you know, beyond our reach. Whatever we talk about, you know, it is, you know-the moment we talk about, it is within our mind.

[Side A of original tape starts here, repeating the following 1-1/2 sentences.[1]]

... we-we do not accept-expect something which may exist, you know, beyond our reach. Whatever we talk about, you know, it is, you know-the moment we talk about, it is within our mind.

So everything, you know, all the thing is in our mind. But usually, you know, you think there is many things, and we are thinking about this and this and this. In cosmic world, there may be many and many stars. But the stars we can, you know, reach is right now only moon. In few years we will reach some other stars. So eventually we will reach to some other constellation [laughs]. But, you know, we do not think in that way.

We think our mind pervade everywhere. So-our mind is, you know, not our mind. Our mind is something greater than the mind which we think is our mind. This is Buddhist thought. So in Buddhism, mind and being are one, not different. So there is no limit in cosmic being, so is our mind, you know. Our mind-there is no limit in our mind. Our mind will reach, you know, everywhere. And our mind and outward being is one. So if you think, "This is mind," you know, "That is mind," if you think, "This is some other being," that is very much so. But actually when we say "this," you know-when Buddhists say "this" or "that" or "I," that "I," or "this" or "that" include everything.

So we must, you know, listen to the sound of it, you know. The other day I explain what is sound [laughs].[2] Sound is different from noise. Sound is, you know, something, you know, which comes out more real, and which comes out from your practice is sound. Noise is more-something more objective [laughs], you know, something, you know, which will bother you, you know. The noise is more objective being. The sound is both objective and subjective. So, you know, if you hit drum, the sound is-you make is, you know, sound of your own subjective practice, and it is also the sound which encourage, you know, all of us. So sound is subjective and objective.

So sound, you know, is-we say hibiki. Hibiki means, you know, "something which goes back and forth." Hibiki. Like echo, you know. If I say something, I will have feedback, you know, back and forth. That is sound.

Buddhists understand everything, every noise, as a sound which we make, you know. You may say, "The bird is singing there-over there." But we think, you know-bird-when we hear the bird, bird is "me," you know, already. I-actually I am not listening to [laughs] bird. Bird is here, you know, in my mind already, and I am singing with the bird. "Peep-peep-peep." [Laughs.] If you think, when you are reading something, if you think, "Bird is there," you know, "bluejay is over my roof" [laughs]-"bluejay is singing, but their voice is not so good," you know [laughs, laughter]. When you think in that way, that is noise, you know. When you are not disturbed by the bluejay, you know, the bluejay will come right into your heart, and you will be a bluejay, and bluejay will [be] reading something [laughs]. Then the bluejay doesn't disturb your reading. Because-because you think, "Bluejay is there.

Bluejay should not be over my roof, "you know. When you think in that way, that is more primitive understanding of being.

Why we understand things in that way is because of our want of practice, you know. When you practice zazen more, you can accept things as your own, whatever it is, you know. That is actually the teaching of, you know, famous teaching of Kegon-jiji-muge.[3] Jiji-muge means "being has no," you know, "no barrier, no disturbance." It-it, you know-interrelated closely. And it is difficult to say, "This is bird, and this is me," because it is interrelated very closely. So it is difficult to separate bluejay from me. That is jiji-muge.

And this jiji-muge or interdependency of being is-here [Line 10] we have ego.

[Line 10 ego to fuego to.]

E-go. And here [Line 10] we have fuego. Fu is, you know- Ego is very special technical term of Buddhism or Zen. Ego. Go is, you know, character, you know, going this way, you know-[draws character for go on the board].[4]

Interrelated, you know [laughs]. Two things, you know-two line, two, you know, figure is interrelated. You see? Like this [continues to draw characters on the board] and like this. This is go.

E means "to go round"-round and round and round. This is e.

This part of the character [points to left part of character for e] is "to go round" or "to meet":

And this part [points to right part of character for e] is "to go"-also "to go round."

So this is e-go.

And fu is "not":

[Therefore fuego means] "not ego." "Not ego."

[The entire Line 10 reads as follows (ego to fuego to):][5]

Although it is, you know-things are interrelated, you know, or because things are closely interrelated, you know, everyone, every being, each being can be a boss, you know [laughs]. Because, you know-each one of us can be a boss because we are so closely related. You know, if you say "Suzuki," you know-"I-I'm very much closely related to you, so I can be president of, you know, Zen Center." [6] So if you s- [partial word-"say"?]-I say "Mel," Mel already is not just Mel [laughs], you know. [7] He is one of the Zen Center students, and to see Mel is to see Zen Center. If you see Mel, people understand what is Zen Center [laughs]. So, you know-but if you think, "Oh, he is Mel" [laughs], then your understanding is not good enough. You don't know who is Mel. So if you have-if you have good understanding of things, that, you know-things will-by things you will understand whole world.

So it is, you know-because each one of us is the boss of whole world, so not-if you understand this way, it is not, you know, interrelated. It is independent. We are independent. Each one of us [is] completely independent, absolutely independent. There is nothing to compare with you. You are you, just you. You see?

We have to understand things from both way. One is, you know, interrelated-to understand things [as] interrelated being. The other way of understanding is to understand ourselves quite independent from everything. You know, when we include everything, you know, we are completely independent because nothing to compare to you [laughs].

Do you understand? If there is only one thing, how can you compare, you know, things to you, because there is nothing to compare to you. This is, you know, "inter-" [partial word]-this is "absolute independency": in Chinese, fuego-not interrelated, but [and?] absolutely independent.

This first sentence-

[Line 9] Mommon issai no kyo,

-this is rhetorical, you know, words. Mommon means "gates." "Gates" means our eyes, or nose, or ears-the-all those sense organs-six-five sense organs are gates, you know. And for the gates, there are sense object, you know. For eyes, something color to see; for the ear something to hear-some voice to hear; some smell to smell for the nose; something to taste, you know, for the-our tongue. In this way, six sense organs has-five sense organs have five sense object. This is, you know, our, you know-Buddhist common sense, you know.

The purpose of, you know, referring to this-to those things is just to say "everything," you know. Instead of saying "everything," we say Mommon issai no kyo. Mommon is "gates." There is many gates, and to the gates there is many sense objects, you know. All those things-things, you know-all those things are interrelated, and at the same time they are independent, you know. Mommon issai no kyo. Flowers and-it is same thing to say flowers and trees and bird and stars, you know, but instead of saying stream and mountain, we say Mommon issai no kyo.

So various being which we see, which we hear, is the things which is interrelated, and, at the same time, they are-each being is absolutely independent and [has] its own value. I said "value" right now. That "value" means ri, you know, ri. Ri is, you know-something which make something, you know, meaningful is ri, you know-which is not theory or anything.

Mmm. This is rather difficult to understand, you know. Ri. It may take time [laughs, laughter] before you understand ri-ri, you know.

When you-even though you don't attain enlightenment, you have attained-you have enlightenment, we say. That enlightenment means ri. That something exist here means something, you know, has already some reason why he-it exist here. And because of that reason, it makes sense-some sense [laughs]. I don't know [laughs] what sense. No one knows, but there must be some reason. And, you know, everything must have some virtue for itself.

And-and it is, you know, very strange that everything has-no things are same, you know [laughs]. One is different from other. So ea- [partial word: each?]-there is nothing to compare, you know, with you. So you have your own value, and that value, you know, is-is not-is not comparative value or exchange value. It is that value something more than that. So just-when you are just on the cushion, you have your own value. And that value-because that value is related to everything, so that value is also absolute value.

Ahh. Maybe better not to say [laughs] too much. Ahh.

[Line 9] Mommon issai no kyo.

Mommon-"sense gates," you know, "sense organs and its objects"-it means everything-"is related-interrelated." And, on the other hand, it is absolute. It-everything has absolute value for itself.

And here again:

[Line 11] Eshite sarani aiwataru.

E means "here" [writing on board], you know: [8]

E is "interrelationship" or "interrelated." So everything is interrelated. And aiwataru is "going on and on"-ai-[9]-to, you know, "to hike," you know, "on and on and on," you know. "Everywhere" means wataru. Or, you know, birds, you know, comes from north in springtime, you know, come to south. And go back to the north, you know, crossing various mountains and rivers and sometime ocean. That is wataru.

This is [pointing to the left part of the character for wataru], you know, "water":

This [pointing to the right part of the character for wataru] is "walk":

So [laughs], to cross many things-water and mountain, by foot or by boat-this [pointing to the entire character for wataru] is wataru:

So things, you know, [are] interrelated endlessly, you know, going everywhere.

And: [Line 12] Shikara zare ba [kurai ni yotte jusu].

"Or else," you know, "or else it stand, it dwell, or it stay in its own position." This [kurai] is "position." "According to the pos- [partial word]-this [yotte] is "rely on" or "according to." "According to the position they stay." So it means if the bird stay at some place, you know, at some lake, for an instance, his home is not only lake, but also whole world is his home. That is how a bird flies and live in the-in their world.

So everythi- [partial word]-things are interrelated. But, on the other hand, or else, or on the other hand, they are stay in their own position. And they are independent.

In Zen story sometime we say, "Nin nin koko heku ryu bankin," you know. "Each one of us is," you know, "steep like a cliff." [Laughs.] No one can climb up on you [laughs]. You are completely independent. So no one can climb up. You are like a steep, you know, rock. No one climb up on you. Absolutely you are-you are absolutely independent, and yet you are interrelated. This is, you know, right understanding.

So you-when we say you are absolutely related, you know. So-but when you hear me say so, you should understand, you know, the other side too. That is hibiki, you know. If you understand [laughs] one side of the truth only, you don't hear the, you know-my voice. Hibiki, you know. We say kotoba no hibiki. Kotoba no hibiki means "the other side of the words." We say, "If you do not understand Zen words"-mmm-there must be some-mmm-yeah, I thought there was-you have some good words for that. "If you do not understand Zen colloquial" [colloquially? colloquy?],[10] you know, "you don't understand Zen." You are not Zen student, you know.

We have-our word is different from usual word. It has double meaning. We say, "double-edged sword" [laughs]. Double edge. Edge is here, this side, and the other side too. It cut both way [laughs], you know. You may say, you know-you may think I am cutting this way [laughs], but, you know, actually, I am cutting [laughing] something that way. You think you are-I am cutting something here, but actually I am cutting here, you know, something here-shhht. [Laughing; sounds like he is imitating the sound of a sword cutting through the air.] Do you understand?

If you-I am, you know-sometime I am scolding my st- [partial word]-my disciple. No! [Laughs.] But the other student may think, "Oh, he is scolded" [laughs]. But it is not actually so. Because I cannot, you know, scold people from outside [laughs], so I have to scold my student who is near me, you know. Raaa! [Loud mockingly threatening sound. Laughing.] But most people think, "Oh, he is-poor guy, he is scolded. Oh." [Laughs, laughter.] If you think in that way, you know, he is not-you are not Zen student. If one is scolded, you should listen to it, you know. You should be alert enough [laughing] to know who is scolded. We have always-we are trained in that way.

When I was a quite young disciple, I went-we went out and came back pretty late. There are many, you know, venomous small snakes like rattlesnake in Japan too. And my-my teacher[11] said, "You are wearing tabi,[12] so you should go ahead, you know. I'm not wearing tabi, so I may bit by-I may be bit by-snake will bite me, so you go ahead," he said [laughing]. And [we said] "Okay!" And we, you know, walked ahead of him. And when we reached-as soon as we reached to the temple, he said to us: "You-all of you must sit here. Sit here." We didn't know what is happening-what has happened-but I-we all sit in front of him [laughing]. "What a silly guys you are," he said. "When I am not wearing tabi, you know, why, you know, you are wearing tabi? It is not fair." [Laughs.] "Moreover, you know, I am your teacher. So it is all right with me to wear tabi when you don't wear tabi"-socks, you know. "So," he said, "I-" "So I said," you know, "I give some warning to you: 'I am not wearing tabi.'" [Laughs.] If I say so, you should notice, 'Oh-I shouldn't'-you shouldn't-you should notice that: 'Oh! We disciples should not wear tabi because my teacher is not wearing tabi.' So if you put off, you know-you should put-put off your tabi. But you [laughs], you know-without any idea of that, you go-you walked ahead of us. What a silly boys you are!" [Laughs, taps on table or lectern.]

[Side A ends here. Lecture resumes at start of Side B, a few minutes from the head of the tape.]

... just what he said, that's all. But we should, you know, realize something more than [what] he said.

When I was at Eihei-ji, I opened, you know, right-hand-right-side door-fusuma-shoji[13]-it-because it is a kind of rule to open this side. But I was scolded, you know: "Don't open that side!" he[14] said. So next morning [laughing] I opened this side. I was scolded again: "Why do you open that way-that side?!" I didn't know what to do. Yesterday when I opened this side, he scolded me, so I opened this side and I was scolded again. I couldn't figure out why. And I-at last I noticed that yesterday guest was [sitting on] this side [laughs], and this morning guest was [sitting on] the other side. So I opened, you know, where there is the side where the guest was. And this morning again I opened [laughs] where-I opened the side where guest was-is, you know. That was-that is why I was scolded. They never tell us why, but just scoldscold us. It is, you know-the words they use is double-edged [laughs].

Those are also double-edged words. This is [pointing to ego?] interdependency. This is [pointing to fuego?] absolute independency. This [side of the?] sentence is interdependency, and this side is absolute interde- [partial word]-absolute depe- [partial word]-in-independency. So every thing which we hear, which we see, is interdependent and absolutely independent. And each things-this interdependency goes on and on to everywhere, and yet things are situated in its own place. Things stays in its own place. That is the main point of Sandokai.

[Line 9] Mommon issai no kyo.

Mommon is "sense gates." Issai no kyo: Issai means "all-each or all." Each-kyo means "objective world." Our sense-our five senses and its objective world is independent-is interdependent and independent. And this interdependency goes everywhere. And each things stays [in] its own place. This is, you know, what it means.

[Line 1] Chikudo daisen no shin.

The great mind of the great sage in India flow unseen from east to west.

There are alert-there are alert fellow and dull fellow in sentient being, but there is no Patriarch of South or North.

[Line 3] Ninkon ni ridon ari.

Ninkon is, you know-nin is "man"; kon is "root." Root means, you know, "sense organs." So sense organs-human being which has sense organs. There is- Someone is alert, someone is not so alert . But there is no Patriarch of South or North. Buddha's teaching is same.

[Line 5] Reigen myoni kokettari.

Reigen is-

Source of the teaching is pure and stainless.

But its stream is unt- [partial word]-the source, you know, pervades everywhere. Ruchu is "to flow." Ruchu is "pour," like water pour into various place. And the reigen-the source of the teaching is not, you know, so clear to every- [partial word]-to us because the source of the teaching is not the teaching of right or wrong or this or that.

To stick to things is delusion, and yet to recognize is not always
-is not enlightenment also.

[Line 7] Ji wo shusuru mo moto kore mayoi.

Ji-ji is "being" or "fact" or "event."

To stick to event or fact or things are delusion.

Mayoi is "delusion." Ri is, you know- Ri is ri [laughs].

To recognize ri is not enlightenment also.

[Line 9] Mommon issai no kyo.

Mommon means various being and its various sense organs and its objects. So it means "everything."

[Line 10] ego to fuego to.

Ego is "interdependency." Fuego is "dependency."

[Line 11] Eshite sarani aiwataru.

This interdependen- [partial word]-dependency goes on and on. And everything stays [in] its own place. This is independency.

Okay. Do you have some question? Hai.

Student A [David Chadwick]: You said that Reigen myoni kokettari-that means, "The source of the teaching is clear."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Chadwick: Now, Shiha anni ruchusu. Does that mean that the branches of the stream-of the source of the teaching [?] flow in the darkness? Or what does that mean-how does it fit in the sentence?

Suzuki-roshi: An-an-okay. An, you know-an means-I must explain an more later. But right now, you can understand in this way: The source, you know, stream of the source or maybe like a spring, you know-pure spring-will, you know, as it flows down, like Tassajara Creek or, you know, it will vanish into somewhere-fade into somewhere.

But it does not mean source [of the] water vanished or anything. Water may be everywhere-moistened all over. An means, you know-an-"darkness." Darkness means opposite of brightness. In bright light like this [laughs], you know, you can count your hair even [laughing]. If it is dark, you know, you cannot see anything. But even though you don't see anything, it does not mean no one is here-no one is here. You know, all of us is here. All of us are here, but it is bec- [partial word]-only because it is dark. So, you know, reigen-the pure source of the teaching is always there, but sometime we can see it, and sometime we don't see it. When we see it, you know, it means that we count everything. It is ji. When we don't see it, it is ri, you know.

Chadwick: Is reigen "ri" and shiha "ji"?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Chadwick: Is reigen "ri" and shiha "ji"?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Shiha is "ji." Hai.

Student B: Is ego mean "the bird is the whole world," and fuego means "the bird is just the bird?"

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Bird is just bird. Shiki, you know, in Prajñāparamita-hridaya [Heart] Sutra we say, Shiki soku ze ku, ku soku ze shiki, you know. [15] That is-Shiki soku ze ku, ku soku ze shiki is ego. And Shiki-ze shiki-ku soku-ku is fuego. [Knocks on table with stick.] This is fuego [laughs]. You cannot say, you know-it is difficult to say what it is. [Knocks again. Laughs.] Hai.

Student C: Is there any particular reason that we strike the bell on the word mon?

Suzuki-roshi: When?

Student C: Mommon issai no kyo? [16]

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: That's when we hit the bell.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Mommon-

Student C: Is there a reason for this?

Suzuki-roshi: To hit bell?

Student C: Mm-hmm.

Suzuki-roshi: To hit bell means to produce, you know, independent buddha one after another. Gong. Buddha. One independent buddha appear. Gong. Next buddha appear. When next buddha appears [laughs], no-the buddha, you know, last buddha disappear. So each, one by one, striking one after another, you produce, you know [laughs], buddha, one after another. That is our practice. Hai.

Student D [Reb Anderson]: You said that it's like a cliff-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Reb: -one side is like a cliff-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Reb: -and the other side is that everything is interdependent.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Reb: Is the reason why each of us is a cliff is because we die, and we never know each other because of this cliff-because as people we just die?

Suzuki-roshi: Cliff? Yeah, it means, you know-it is just parable, you know. It doesn't mean anything, you know, special, you know.

Reb: I mean, why-

Suzuki-roshi: [It means] to cut off, you know, various entanglement, in one word. When you do so, you are actually independent. And at the same time, you are closely related. [Laughs.] This is, you know, very interesting. Usually, you know, when you become independent, you know, you are independent, and you have not much-you are not-usually you are not supported by people. But if you [are] really independent, you know, then people may support you.

So, you know-to be independent from everyone means to be supported by everyone, to be related to everyone-closely related to everyone. When you are closely related to everyone, you are independent. So to be independent [interdependent?]-and to be independent means same thing, you know. So if you really [are] involved in your everyday activity, you are independent. If you really follow our schedule, you are independent [laughs]. Because you think, "Oh, it is too-too much," you know. "Maybe so far as I am here I will observe the rules, but really I don't want to do it. But it can't be helped, " you know. If you feel in that way, you know, you are not independent. And sometime you may think, "I am-I must be-I must have freedom from everything. I must have my own way," you know. But that-your own way is not related. If your own way is not is not related to anyone [laughs], it doesn't mean anything, you know. When your way is related to everyone's way, you know, and when you have confidence in your activity, then you are independent. But, you know, [you are] dependent on various people-you are supported by various people. Do you understand?

Student E: At Tassajara, sometimes we try, as a community, to be independent.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm

Student E: Is this Buddha's way?

Suzuki-roshi: Independent?

Student E: Mm-hmm-not to depend-Suzuki-roshi: How?

Student E: -not to depend on other people for food, or for clothing, or for our needs. Is this Buddha's way?

Suzuki-roshi: Dep- [partial word]-independent from what?

Student E: To try to be independent from the community-the larger community-from [1-2 words unclear].

Suzuki-roshi: No, that is not possible [laughs]. It is dream-daydream [laughs, laughter]. That-that kind of, you know, independency doesn't mean anything. You will be lost, you know, if you stick to that kind of idea, because that is, you know, very primitive, you know, naïve understanding of human being, you know. Nin-this is human being, you know [drawing the character for "human"-two lines leaning on each other[17]]:

-supported, you know, with [by] each other. This is Chinese character. This is "human being." [Laughs.]

Student E: Is that like [1-2 words unclear]?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] We are originally like this, you know. If this is man-"Oh, I am strong enough," you know, "so I don't need my wife" [laughs, laughter]. Your wife may say, you know: "I'm already supporting you! Without me you cannot live. Sometime you should take care of yourself. So for one week I will make trip." [Laughing so hard he is almost unable to speak.] Then one week-[laughs, laughter].

It is not so, you know, it is not so agreeable to be like this always to supporting, you know, your husband always. You may feel in that way, but that is, you know, her nature [laughs]. So if-without this-something to support, you know, wife cannot exist. That is human being. And I think that is very true. But when you are [makes gesture-sounds like putting hands together] like this, both are independent. This is independent and this is independent and this is too.

Student E: Is that why Buddha's practice was to beg [?]? Is that part of Buddha's way?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, that is Buddhist way. We-our practice, you know, is not always one-sided practice, you know. "Middle Way" means, you know-not between two extreme is not Middle Way. To be quite independent and dependent is Middle Way. You know, "Middle Way"-if I say "Middle"-you s- [partial word]-I say "Middle Way," you may understand, "This is Middle Way." It is not so, actually. To be [laughs] like this [gestures] is Middle Way, you know. To be myself is my Middle Way. So that I can be just myself, you know, I must support someone, you know. And at the same time I must be supported by various people. That is why I can be like this, you know, I can be independent.

Student F: Roshi, today someone was saying, or I think he was saying, "No students, no teacher. No teacher, no students." That the two-well, somebody was saying, "Well, what makes the roshi the roshi?" And someone else said, "Because he has students."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. Yeah.

Student F: You see? You can't be the roshi without students.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah.

Student F: Students can't be students without the roshi.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student F: So they are both independent but both-

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student F: -together.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Together. Without student, no teacher. Yeah. So that is very true, you know. And student encourage teacher [laughs]. It is very much so. If-usually, if I have, you know-I know that if I have no student, I may goof off every day [laughs, laughter]. Because I have [laughing] so many students watching me, you know, I must be doing something. I must study so that I can give you some lecture, you know. If there is no lecture, I will not study. But at the same time, you know, I shall be very much ashamed of myself if I, you know, study just to give lecture, you know. That is very, you know, very, you know- To study is just for myself-should be. So usually, when I start to prepare for my lecture, I u- [partial word]- always got to another direction, leaving something to study aside. "Oh, this is interesting." [Laughs, laughter.] And, you know, most of the time I don't study for the lecture, but still, you know, if I don't study I don't feel so good. Because, you know, I feel I have to prepare for the lecture, I start to study. But as soon as I start to study I start my own study [laughs]-not for giving lecture. And in this way, you know, things is going on and on, endlessly, and it is good, you know.

Someday what I study will help students. I don't know when [laughs, laughter]. Just to feel good we study, and just to feel better we practice zazen. No one knows, you know, what will happen to us after sitting, you know, one, two, or ten years. No one knows. No one knows is right. Just to feel good we sit zazen, actually. Eventually that kind of practice, you know-practice of purposeless practice-eventually [will] help you in its true sense.

Again! [Perhaps referring to the lateness of the hour.]

---

—

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby and City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (10/16/00).

[1] This overlap suggests that the end of Side B was dubbed from another tape after the lecture.

[2] At the end of the last zazen period of the day, the large drum at the back of the zendo is hit. The night before this lecture was given, Suzuki-roshi stopped the student hitting the drum and, while everyone continued zazen, explained that hitting the drum should be sound, not noise. [Note from Wind Bell, Summer 1976, p. 46.]

[3] Jiji-muge (also jiji-muge hokkai, Ch. shih-shih wu-ai fa-chieh), is usually translated as "mutual interpenetration"-one of the central concepts of the Kegon, Flower Garland, or Huayen school of Buddhism (Wind Bell, Summer 1976, p. 46). Jiji-muge is also defined as meaning "all forms of phenomenal existence in the world blend with each other without impediment"-Daito Shuppansha, Japanese-English Buddhist Dictionary (1971), p. 135. Ruth Fuller Sasaki defined it as "the realization of the realm of the completely harmonious and unobstructed interpenetration and interconvertability of all things with each other" (Zen: A Religion, New York: The First Zen Institute of America, 1958, p. 14).

[4] For the Chinese characters see: Wind Bell, Summer 1976, p. 42; the unpublished MS by David Chadwick, Sandokai Study, Line 10 explication; Branching Streams Flow in the Darkness, p. 22; or the Sino-Japanese Buddhist canon: Takakusu Junjiro and Watanabe Kaigyoku, eds., Taisho shinshu daizokyo, (Tokyo: Taisho Issaikyo Kankokai, 1924-1932).

[5] Suzuki-roshi did not cite the entire line at this point, although it was probably on the blackboard. It was added here only for reference. The character an in Line 10 (ego to fuego to) is the Japanese word for "and," which is added to the Chinese characters in the line.

[6] According to an early transcript, Suzuki-roshi was probably speaking to Silas Hoadley, the present of Zen Center.

[7] Mel Weitsman was a student, at the time, sitting directly in front of Suzuki-roshi [per Wind Bell, Summer 1976, p. 46.]

[8] The same character for "e" as in the previous line.

[9] The prefix ai means "together or mutually," as in Line 2 (aifusu). When he mentions "hike" here, Suzuki-roshi is referring to wataru.

[10] The Derby transcript shows "words" written in later by hand, but Suzuki-roshi clearly said something like "colloquial"-i.e., spoken language or terms.

[11] Gyokujun So-on.

[12] Tabi are a kind of slipper, usually white, worn on formal occasions. The students were probably returning from performing a Buddhist ceremony, and they had not yet removed their tabi.

[13] fusuma: sliding wood-frame door with an opaque (often patterned) cover over the panes; traditionally used as an interior door or room divider. shoji: sliding wood-frame door or window covered in translucent rice paper. Both terms would not be used together. It is possible that fusuma is correct, and that Suzuki-roshi changed to the more familiar term shoji for his American students.

[14] Kishizawa Ian-zenji (1865-1955), whom Suzuki-roshi attended when Kishizawa was seido (distinguished visiting priest in residence) and Suzuki-roshi a novice at Eihei-ji. This incident probably took place in 1930, when Kishizawa was 65 (Crooked Cucumber, p. 69). See also Wind Bell, Summer 1976, p. 44.

[15] "Form is emptiness. Emptiness is form."

[16] During the chanting of the Sandokai, the keisu or gong is struck at specified places in the text.

[17] See also SR-70-06-06, p. 5.

3 - Sandokai Lecture #5

Saturday, June 06, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #5

Lecture to Professor Weller's Visiting Class

Tassajara

[Note. This lecture was given-as a general introduction-to Prof. Jack Weller's visiting philosophy class following Lecture IV in Suzuki-roshi's series of lectures on the Sandokai.]

Purpose of study of Buddhism is to have perfect understanding of things, and subjectively to understand ourselves, and especially what we are doing in our everyday life-what kind of activity we are involved in, [to] know why we suffer, [and why] we have such a conflict in our society or in our, you know, family, or within ourselves. So to understand with good understanding of subjective world and objective world and what is going on in objective world and in within ourselves.

If we, you know, realize- If we see things-as-it-is, and if we know-[are] aware of what we are doing actually, with good understanding of those things, we will, you know, know what we should do. And this is, you know, intellectual understanding of-study of Buddhism. And this intellectual study include dualistic study and non-dualistic study. There are two ways of studying Buddhism. And then what you should do is to have real experience of Buddhist way. So study and our practice is different, you know. Even though you have good understanding, you know, if you do not follow the way-follow your understanding, it will not help you.

We are now studying a kind of scripture, which was written by Chinese great Zen master, entitled Sandokai. And last night I explained, you know, what do we mean by "darkness" and what do we mean by "brightness," you know. Darkness means, you know, something which we cannot, you know, see or think about, you know. It is something which is beyond our intellectual, you know, understanding. That is darkness. Darkness does not mean, you know, something-some dark, you know [laughs], place which you do not know. Of course, we do not know what is going on at the darkness. But you will [be] afraid of it. You have a kind of fear if you are in dark place. But what we mean by utter darkness means, you know, something which is beyond our understanding, you know. This, you know, room is pretty dark right now, you know, but still you can see, you know, things in this room. If there is no lighting, in utter darkness you cannot see anything. But it does not mean there is nothing. There is many things, but you cannot see, that's all.

So utter darkness means, you know, something which is beyond our understanding. And brightness means something you can understand in term of good and bad, or square or round, or red or white. So brightness means "various things," and darkness means "one whole being" in which many things exist, you know-something which include everything. Even though there are many things, but the thing which include everything-moon and stars and everything, you know-is so big so [laughs] we are, you know, just a tiny speck of big being.

So, you know, when we, you know, we think-we say, "That is darkness," [1] darkness means something which include everything. You cannot get out of it, you know. If there is some place where you can go, that place is also included in darkness. That kind of big, big being is utter darkness where anything can be acknowledged, you know, because everything is so small. But it does not mean there is nothing. Various thing exist in one whole big big great being.

Our study, you know, usually, whatever the study may be, is always, you know, going in realm of brightness. So we discriminate things: "This is good," or "This is bad." "Agreeable or disagreeable." "Right or wrong," you know. "Big or small." "Round or square." In this way, we, you know, study things and we live in this world saying, "This is good," or "This is bad."

Now whatever it is, you know, you-things which is-which you deal with is, you know, things which is in brightness, things which is in duality-dualistic world. So it is-but it is necessary for us to know, you know, utter darkness of the being where there is, you know, nothing to see or nothing to think about. This kind of experience will be experienced only in zazen practice. But in your thinking or listening to lecture, or talking about teaching, we cannot study what is actually darkness. And now I am talking about, of course, not-I cannot talk about darkness [laughs]. But I can talk about something which we can understand and which-by which you will be encouraged to practice zazen, which will lead you [to] the experience of darkness.

Darkness, you know, sometime we call it "nothingness" or "emptiness," you know, in comparison to "somethingness." Sometime we say, "no mind." No mind means utter darkness. No mind. You don't think there.

I feel I went too far [laughs]. I feel I went too far, so I have to [laughs] go back to something, some bright room [laughs]. It is too dark [laughs, laughter] to see your [laughs] face, you know, one by one. It's too dark. But I will try to see each one of you and what kind of problem you have [laughs]. I think I must, you know, go back to everyday problem.

While I was talking with some student, some student said-I was talking about, you know, my relationship to my wife [laughs, laughter]. I have many complaints [laughs, laughter] about her, but I cannot, you know, I don't think I can live without her [laughs, laughter]. That is, you know, to tell the truth [laughs], what I really feel [laughs, laughter]. Since I came to Tassajara I learned many, you know-a kind of proverb [laughs]: "hen-pecked" [laughs, laughter]. It is very interesting word. Hen-pecked husband. Oh, it's- There is no time for him to raise his head. Always pecked by hen [laughs]. Still, you know [laughs], he needs, you know, hen [laughs, laughter]. He feel as if, you know, it is impossible to live with her, you know. "Maybe better to get divorced from her" [laughs]. Sometime he may think in that way. But sometime he may think, "Oh, but I cannot live without her. So I cannot live with her-with it-and but I cannot live without her." [Laughs.] I cannot live with her, and I cannot live without-nor can I live without her. With her? No. Without her? No. [Laughs, laughter.] What should we do? [Laughter.]

That is the actual problem we have [laughs], you know, we have in the relative world of brightness. Where lamp is, you know- When lamp is bright, we can see myself and wife. When there is no lamp, there is no problem [laughs]. But we don't, you know, think about utter darkness of the room. We always, you know, suffer from the life which we can see by our eyes or which we can hear by our ears. That is what we are doing. So in this world of brightness, you know, it is difficult to live, you know, without things. Of course difficult. Impossible. With things it is also difficult [laughs]. That is the problem we have. What shall we do? With things it is too much; without things, you know, we have no means-no purpose of living in this world. In this way, you know, we have many problem. But, you know, if you [have] even [the] slightest idea of utter darkness, which is the other side of the brightness, then you can, you know, you will find out the way how to live in the brightness of the world.

In brightness of the world, you know, you will see something good and something bad, a man and woman, or something right and something wrong. This, you know, world of differentiation-different things exist in different form and color. At the same time, you know, in this world of various forms and color, at the same time, we can find equality, you know, on [of] everything. You know, only chance for us to be equal-to be on equal-on an equality-is to have its-to, you know, to be aware of or to realize its-his own form and color and to respect its own form and color. Only when you respect yourself as a man or as a woman, as a learned or as a[n] ignorant, then, you know, we-each one of us has equal value. This is only way to be on an equality. Equal mean-looks like, you know, to share something, you know, equally [laughs] with everyone. But we don't think that is possible, you know. Actually that is a kind of dream. You cannot share things equally. Even though we share things equally, some-if-for an instance, if we share our food equally, someone may like it. Someone [laughs] may not like it, you know. It is impossible for us to share things equally.

And to have same, you know, right, or responsibility, or duty, or commitment is not possible. But only when we realize our own capacity, our own physical, you know, strength, or nature of man and woman, then, you know, and respect our nature or characteristic, then we will have, you know, each one of us will be in an equality.

This equality [is] a little bit different from usual equality. You know, here is a cup and in which I have some water. Water and cup is not equal, you know. Water is water, and cup is cup. But, you know, if water want to be a cup, that is not possible [tapping on cup]. And it is true with cup. Cup cannot be water, you know. Cup should be a cup, and water should be water. So when water is in a cup, you know, water serve its own purpose, and cup will serve its own purpose. Then, cup without water means nothing [laughs], you see? Water without cup means nothing to us. When water is water and cup is cup, you know, and cup and water, you know, on the other hand, take some activity or relationship with each other, or interdependence-become interdependent-then, you know, water will have its own value and cup will have its own value. In this case, we say cup and water is on an equality.

"Freedom" we say, freedom-there is, you know, no-if you think freedom is just to be-to ignore rules and to act as he want, without thinking anything, that is, maybe, a freedom, you may say. But that kind of freedom does not exist actually. That is, you know, a kind of dream. We say, that kind of, you know, dream is delusion, you know-something which does not actually exist but sometime we care for it. But actually it doesn't exist. So we shouldn't be involved in vain effort to try to catch, you know, cloud, you know. You cannot catch a cloud or a mist.

So how, you know, to be out of, you know, the difficulty-how to get out of the difficulty is, you know, to have good understanding of [laughs]-good understanding of ourselves, you know, and to know what we are doing, and to know what is possible and what is not possible. And we should be very realistic, you know, or else whatever you do, it will not work. If you enjoy your daydream, that is another matter [laughs, laughter]. Sometime it is good to think something, you know, which is impossible [laughs]. You know, dreaming about, you know, something which is wonderful, you know. That is good, because, you know, purpose of daydream is just to enjoy it like you see movie, you know. And you feel as if you became a movie star [laughs]. That is good, but that cannot be our final goal of life, you know [laughs]. So we should know what is delusion and what is reality. And when we [are] sincerely involved in good practice, you know, we should not dream of something which is impossible. We should work on which is-something possible to attain, to realize.

So equality, you know-another side of, you know, differentiation is equality. Because things are different there is equality. Things are on equality. When you understand equality of man and woman in its true sense, you know, we have no more that kind of problem. "I cannot live without her." [Laughs.] When you feel in that way, you know, you are, you know-you don't know who is her and who is you. When we realize that she is, you know, she is important because she is in that way because she is, you know, taking care of me. Sometime it may be too much [laughs]. But, you know, that is her nature.

And nature of man is something different from that, you know. He is thinking about something, you know- He is usually more idealistic, you know [laughs], and thinking about something which looks like almost impossible, not so realistic, and he is trying to go on and on, you know, without thinking about what will happen to him if he do it, you know. So, you know, the wife may say, "Oh, don't do that. It is too soon. Wait. Wait." [Laughs, laughter.] If she say so you think, "Oh, I must do it right now," you know. You will feel in that way. So you say, "I cannot live with her." [Laughs.] That is her nature, you know.

So careless, you know, hasty man wants careful, you know [laughs], more conservative, emotional, you know [laughs], woman. So sometimes she may be very angry with her husband, but that is also her nature, you know. Because of her nature he is important. So, you know, you may say, "I cannot live without her." So that you say, "I cannot live with her" is wrong. Something is missing in your understanding when you think you cannot live with her. "I cannot live without her" is right, you know.

The other day I said the Chinese character of man [is] like this, you know [draws Chinese character of "person" in the air with his finger: two lines leaning on each other]: [2]

Supporting with each other, man and woman may be one, and man and woman-or maybe teacher and disciple [laughs], you know. If there is no disciple, no teacher [laughs]. [Draws the following with his finger in the air.][3]

If there is no teacher, there is no disciple, you know. So teacher and disciple-when they exist, you know, like this (supporting with each other) [draws Chinese character for "person" with his finger in the air]: [4]

-there is, you know, monastery. If, you know- Everything exist in that way. That is, you know, our understanding. So that we cannot exist without her or without it is right. And there is, you know- Many difficulties, you know, will be created when you lack this kind of true understanding of the other side of the meaning of-meaning of the other side of each event or fact or things. The good- Another side of good will be bad. And another side- The other side of the bad will be good. That is, you know, reality.

So dark side of the bright side- The other side of the darkness is brightness, you know. You may say, "This room is dark," you know, but it is brighter than, you know, basement where there is no light. And even basement is brighter than, you know, brighter than hall of a morgue [laughs]. So bright- You cannot say "bright" or "dark" actually. Bright or dark is only in your mind; there is no bright or no dark in reality. But sometime we have to have some standard, or some rules, or some means of communication, so we have-we say good or bad, agreeable or disagreeable, but that is just words. We should not be caught by word. We shouldn't stick to words. That is, you know- But usually we stick to words, you know. When your girlfriend [says], "I don't like you!" you know [laughs], if she say so, you, you know, take that word literally [laughs]. But she didn't mean so, you know. Maybe opposite. Because she likes you so much, you know, sometimes she feels, "I don't like you. I hate you," [laughs], but it is not actually so. If- so if we stick to words, without observing things from both side, you will, you know, [not?] know what to do about things.

Excuse me but, you know, our eyes unfortunately, you know, open towards, you know, outside [laughs] so we cannot see, you know, inside of ourselves. It means that we are liable to be, you know, concerned about some other's, you know, practice or some other's life, and you will be very critical with others. And even though you start to think about what kind of practice we-I should have, which way we should-I-we should take, you know, but still in that way you cannot find out your own way, because still your eyes, you know, and your thinking is directed to outside: "Which way I should take?"-you know, when you say so "way" is there and "I" is here [thumps chest], and "I" is not realized, you know. You don't know what is "I" and what you think about the way you should go-this way or that way. And you are completely ignorant about yourself.

So you criticize yourself as if you criticize others. That is a terrible thing [laughs], you know. So you cannot exist, you know, in this world because of your sharp criticism. It is easy to criticize others, you know, and so is [also] to criticize yourself too-it is easy-quite easy-but it may be a little bit difficult because you don't feel so good [laughs]. But even though you don't feel so good you will criticize yourself anyway. And you will suffer. That is what we are doing, you know, every day. Why we suffer is because, you know, something is missing in your understanding of what you are doing.

So Buddhist, you know, understands things, you know, which look like exist outside is actually exist inside of yourself. When you think, "He is not good," it means that, you know, you-he is, you know, actually [criticizing someone] within yourself. It is picture of yourself. "He is not good." When you say so, you are, you know, criticizing someone within yourself. No one exist- Nothing exist outside of yourself. This understanding is, you know, understanding which include everything: understanding of Big Mind, which include everything. So things happened only within yourself.

So things, you know-it is, you know, activity of your life, you know, within yourself, like your, you know, stomach is, you know, digesting things. But by Thinking Mind, you know, by Thinking Mind, here is, you know [thumps on chest], heart, and here is [pats stomach] tummy, you know. You understand in that way. And there is not much relationship, you know, in your-according to your understanding, there is not much relationship between tummy and heart. So by big surgery or by operation, you can [laughs] take-cut off your tummy, you know. You understand, in that way, our physical activity. But it is not actually so. It is closely related with each other. So if you make your tummy strong, the heart be also stronger. So there is no need-it is not always necessary to, you know, to have big operation on your heart.

When we understand ourselves in that way, you know, things ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.] [are closely related, as our tummy and heart are closely related]. [5] So there is no need to say "tummy" or "heart" any more. So when you don't know what is going [on], you know, in your physical body, you are in complete health. So when you don't talk about, you know, "he" or "she" or "me," you know, then your life is pretty sound and good.

How you obtain this kind of complete harmonious life within yourself is by practice. To talk about things is to, you know, to arrange your food on your dish, you know [laughs]. Every morning, you know, my student arrange food beautifully, you know, on each dish. But, you know, fortunately or unfortunately, if I eat and chew it [laughs], all mixed up, you know, in our mouth, and I just taste-I have just taste of food, and no color, or no beauty, or no goma-sesame seed or no brown rice in our mouth. So even more so, when it reach to my tummy, I don't know even what it is in my tummy.

When things, you know, in full activity, you know, there is no idea of good or bad, you know, this or that. But it is good, you know, to see things in different dishes, you know, and different way and in different color. It is good, but so is to think about, you know, food, your life, or nature of man and woman, is good. But, you know, to-even though you think about it, you know, it doesn't, you know, mean much unless you, you know, really have a taste of it—a taste of our life. Unless you chew it up and mix them together and [laughs] swallow it in your tummy, it doesn't make much sense.

So why I didn't talk about this [laughs, laughter]? I'm sorry [laughs]. But indirectly I was talking about this. Why we study this kind of thing is, you know, to study Buddhist study like this is just to, you know, arrange our food in different dishes and appreciate, you know, the color and form of it. But eventually, you know, we must eat it, you know. If you eat it, there is no such teaching at all. That is darkness of the teaching. No teaching whatsoever. No teacher or no disciple. No Buddha or no Christ, you know, when we eat it, you know, actually eat it.

How to eat it is practice. Actual practice is how to eat things, or how to chew it up, or how to mix it together. And we are fortunate, you know, even though we mixed up together, we know how to, you know, how to analyze things in various way to know what we have been doing, you know. This is important: To analyze your psychology, to analyze your practice. This is important, but this is, you know, actually shadow of your practice, not actual practice.

So our practice will go on and on in this way, arranging carefully, you know, and mixing together, and chewing it up, and analyzing our practice again to see what is going on—what am I doing, you know. In this way, you know, our practice goes on and on. Tomorrow we will arrange things, and mix it, and chew it, and digest it, and again and again our practice will go on and on.

So at end of the Sandokai, Sekito-zenji says: "If you go in this way step by step," you know, "there is not matter of one-thousand-miles trip or a one-miles trip." If you go, when you start to go on and on, you know, in this way, arranging things, mixing things, and analyzing things, you know—analyzing things in bright light, mixing things in dark room, you know—our practice goes on and on endlessly. Then there is no, you know, enlightenment or no fool—no ignorance, because we are going on and on and on, and we are always on the path of the Buddha.

But if you stick to, you know, if you stop working and stick to the idea, you know, of good or bad, then you will have difficulty of big river or high mountain, because you create river for yourself, and you create mountain for yourself. But—which doesn't exist. When you analyze, when you criticize yourself, you know, you think you are like that. It is, you know—you have some special concept or understanding of yourself in term of good or bad, but it is not actually so. But you create some difficulty for yourself. That is what we are doing.

Mmm. I have some more time. Maybe, you know, I have—I think better not to continue this kind of [laughs] talk any more. Do you have some question so far? Could you hear me?

Students: Very well.

Ah. Good. Thank you. Ah. Do you have some question?

Question/Answer Session

Student A [David Chadwick]: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

David Chadwick: When- You said zazen was darkness, but listening to lecture was bright. If one listens to lecture with a good understanding, then that's zazen, right?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. "About zazen"? Or no?

David Chadwick: I- I-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh-"good understanding." You have good understanding, yeah. When, you know, when you understand, you know, as Sandokai says, "Even though you recognize truth, that is not enlightenment," you know? That is not enlightenment, but it will encourage you, you know, your practice, and you will know why you practice zazen. You see? I am- you are arranging things, you know, by my recipe, you know, by Buddhist recipe, and you are cooking something here [laughs, laughter]. Now, you know, here is, you know, some dishes to eat. So we should eat it. How you eat it is to practice zazen. This food-our recipe is, you know, prepared for people who practice zazen. So if you eat it, you know, it will help your practice.

David Chadwick: Roshi, you said that zazen was darkness, and lecture was bright, and things are bright, and maybe also you talked about ri being "this" and ji being "that." But what I wanted to know is can you really separate them?

Suzuki-roshi: No. It is not possible to separate. That is good point. You know, we are separating, you know, tentatively [something] which is not possible to separate. So even though it is like two side of a coin, you know: This side is brightness and the other side is darkness. So I am talking about this [bright] side, you know [holds up a book]. [6] And by your practice you will see the other side. And you will see whole picture of this book. That is reality. So if-even though-if you think, you know, by your practice, you will understand something which is completely different from this [bright] side, that is big mistake, you know.

David Chadwick: Roshi, is the reason that- I was wondering why you talk about one side or the other. Is it impossible to speak about both sides together?

Suzuki-roshi: Both side together is not possible, because, you know, if you talk about it, it is bright side [laughs, laughter]. Only when, you know-what I can say is about the other side of the bright side. This side is not possible to talk about. But, you know, to talk about this side, because I have some experience or understanding of the other side, I can talk about this side. If I have no idea of this side, what I am talking about is just, you know, means nothing. It will be poisoned for you, maybe [laughs]. How beautifully I may describe it, you know, this side-it is poison, actually. It is something which is quite different from the other side and which is not possible to mix, you know, to put together [puts hands together]. So something poisonous is something which you cannot-which does not agree with the other side-is poisonous thing, poisonous teaching, you know. Even though-something poisonous looks like very beautiful, you know [laughs], but if the other side is not-is ignored, you know, that teaching is opium or drug [laughs]. It doesn't accord with the other side of the life [light?].

Okay? Is that what you are asking? Maybe my answer is little bit, you know, doesn't fit exactly.

David Chadwick: Well, we chant, "an unsurpassed penetrating and perfect dharma" before (or after, I forget) the lecture, and I'm just wondering how the lecture enters into darkness. Or what-I'm wondering how is this lecture teaching? How is it something besides brightness?

Suzuki-roshi: "How-"? Excuse me?

David Chadwick: I was wondering how is the lecture zazen?

Suzuki-roshi: "How can I talk about zazen"? [Trying to clarify David's question.]

David Chadwick: No, no.

Suzuki-roshi: "How-"? "What is-"?

David Chadwick: I just wondered what is teisho?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Teisho. Teisho is little bit different from, you know- Teisho is to give encouragement, you know, not just talk about it, but to give some suggestion, you know, and to help people to have good understanding of our practice is teisho. It is- It should not be dead words. The words must come from actual experience of-ohh, I don't want to say it [laughs], but-actual experience of enlightenment. This is big words [laughs].

You know, actual experience of reality is teisho-should be, you know, should not be dead words. Should not be some words, you know, which we study-which we read in some book. That is, you know, the difference between teisho and lecture. Maybe- Strictly speaking, lecture is, you know, to give some knowledge of something is lecture. Teisho- includes, or most part of the teisho is to give, to help people's actual practice and enlightenment.

So, yeah, as you say, there is a little difference between. So actually, we are pushing people towards real practice. That is teisho. To, you know-tei means "here is" [holds up a book],[7] you know, something which you must have, you know, as a Buddhist. "Look" is teisho, you know. So without something, you know, something real, we cannot talk about it, you know.

If you read my book, this book, you know, after memorizing it, that is not teisho. So teisho is something which comes out from inside, from bottom of heart. That is teisho. So actually, you know, it- because I must use words, so I must follow logic, you know, and philosophical special technical terms. But sometime, ignoring those, you know, special terms, we can directly speak about it. That is teisho. Sometime it may not be words. [Knocks on table. Laughs.] This is teisho, you know. Something to talk about which is not possible to talk about is teisho. Excuse me, I cannot explain [laughs] so well. Hai.

Student B [Roovane ben Yumin]: Your lecture on the Sandokai is supposed to give us understanding, you say. Then you say that we can't understand this bright side unless we understand the dark side, unless we have good zazen.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah.

Roovane ben Yumin: Is lecture just skillful means? I mean, just because we talk a lot, we talk-

Suzuki-roshi: Why I say so, you know, you will stick to my words, you know. So I, after giving you some lecture, I [laughs], you know, take it [laughs] from you. That is, you know, just intellectual things. So you should forget what I said, but you should, you know, sense what the real meaning of my words [is], you know.

Roovane ben Yumin: Is this Buddhist skillful means-talking to the students?

Suzuki-roshi: "Skillful-" It should be in that way, you know, whether we are Buddhist or not. But Buddhist knows that if we stick to words, we will not-we will be enslaved by words, and we will understand just a little, you know, part of it. So, you know, it is better, after suggesting something, it is better to, you know, cut off his finger-my finger, you know. After pointing at something, when you are interested in something, it may be better to [laughs] to cut off my finger so that you will not be attached to this finger anymore. And then you will be interested in something which I pointed out. That is words, you know.

You explain, you know, how to cook something, you know, by book, but actually, what you do is to cut vegetables, and to put salt in it, and boil it. That is actually what you do. When you forget all about our cookbook, you know, you will be a good cook [laughs]. As long as you are watching cookbook, if you try to understand, you know, what is written in it, it may take time. It is better to, you know, to study it, you know, by seeing someone who is actually doing it. That is best way. Teisho is something, you know, to give something directly.

But usually, you know, your attitude of listening to it, to, you know, to [laughs], you know, to think about it, and whether it is good or bad [laughs], you know, and wondering, "What is he speaking about?" or wondering whether it is acceptable for you or not, you know. And, "If it is good I will accept it. If it is not good I will not accept it." You know, that is extra. You don't need to be, you know, so careful [laughs]. If you just to listen to it, and you don't need to try to understand it even, you know. If you don't understand it, it's okay. If you understand it, it is better [laughs]. That's all. So there should be no special intention of listening to it-just to listen to it. That is how you listen to teisho. It is different from-to study something. As you are, you know, very logical [laughs], your mind works very logically, I have to follow some logic, that's all [laughs, laughter]. Because you are logical, I have to be logical, that's all [laughs]. If you are not logical, you know, I can say whatever I like. I can sing a song even [laughs, laughter].

Roovane ben Yumin: Could you try that some time? Not singing a song, but being a little bit not logical.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeaah. [Sounding skeptical.] Do you think I'm too logical? [Laughter.]

Student C [Craig]: I'd like to hear you sing a song. [Suzuki-roshi laughs, then students laugh.]

Suzuki-roshi: Okay. [Laughter.] I wish I could do it. [Sounding reluctant.]

David Chadwick: Roshi? I've got a nice song. It goes, "Negawakuwa ... ." [8]

Suzuki-roshi: Okay! [Loud laughter.] Let's do it. Right now. [Bell sounds. Suzuki-roshi laughs. All chant the following Universal Eko.]

Negawakuwa kono kudoku o motte,

Amaneku issai ni oyoboshi,

Warera to shujo to,

Minatomo ni Butsudo o jo sen koto o. [9]

Shujo muhen seigando.

Bonno mujin seigandan.

Homon muryo seigangaku.

Butsudo mujo seiganjo. [10]

Sentient beings are numberless; I vow to save them.

Desires are inexhaustible; I vow to put an end to them.

The dharmas are boundless; I vow to master them.

The Buddha's way is unsurpassable; I vow to attain it.

---

Sources: Contemporaneous typescript by Marian Derby; City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (2/12/01).

[1] In the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby, "That is darkness" was replaced by "That is brightness."

[2] From Marian Derby transcript.

[3] Ibid. shows "(FALLING DOWN)" [not in quotes] written by hand next to the character or fragment shown here, which was scanned from the Derby transcript, p. 8. In this transcriber's opinion, Suzuki-roshi was not sketching the kanji character for "falling down," which looks quite different from that shown here. Rather, he appears to have been sketching what would happen if the character for "person" no longer was mutually supportive-i.e., it would fall down.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Text in brackets is from Marian Derby transcript. Not recorded on tape.

[6] From Marian Derby transcript.

[7] From Marian Derby transcript.

[8] According to the Marian Derby transcript, David Chadwick was the kokyo (attendant who leads chants) for that lecture, and Suzuki-roshi had spoken twenty minutes longer than his usual lecture time. The present transcriber (BR) checked with David on 9 December 1998. The latter confirmed his sincere desire to urge people out the door. But he also recalled that Suzuki-roshi may have been feeling a bit uncomfortable, and David wanted to change the subject quickly.

[9] Literally: "May it be that with this merit, universally pervading all, together (may we) attain the Buddha's way" (translation by David Chadwick). As chanted in English: "May our intention equally penetrate every being and place with the true merit of Buddha's way."

[10] These four lines are the Japanese version of the following four lines in English, which have been translated with slight variations through the years.

4 - Sandokai Lecture #6

Wednesday, June 10, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #6
Tassajara

[This lecture is concerned with the following lines of the Sandokai:

Shiki moto shitsuzo wo kotonishi, sho moto rakku wo kotonisu.

An wa jochu no koto ni kanai, mei wa seidaku no ku wo wakatsu.

Things have various natures, various forms.

There is good and bad, taste, sound, and feeling.

In darkness, superior and inferior cannot be distinguished;

in brightness, the duality of pure and impure is apparent.]

In my last lecture, although I did not literally explain about those sentences, but I almost explained about it.

Shiki moto shitsuzo wo kotonishi. Shiki moto shitsuzo wo kotonishi. Shiki is, you know, in Prajñāparamita Sutra. Shiki soku zeku. Shiki. Same character as shiki. Shiki moto shitsuzo wo kotonishi. Shiki means, you know, "form and color." It has two meanings: form and color. Things which-form and color. Shitsuzo wo kotonishi, sho moto rakku: Sho [is] in Prajñāparamita Sutra. We have many [of] this character-sho, voice, which is the object of, you know, ears. Sho moto-shitsuzo wo kotonishi-rakku wo kotonisu: means that whatever you see, you know-shitsuzô-shitsu means "quality" or "nature." "Quality" or "nature" is shitsu, like human nature or buddha nature or good nature, evil nature. Nature is shitsu. Zo means "figure."

So in things there is various- Things has various nature and various figure, various forms. And voice- When you hear voice, voice has-some voice is good and some voice is not good: agreeable or disagreeable. Rakku means- Something which you care for is raku.[1] Ku[2] is something which will create some bitter feeling or, you know, some-not-"suffering" is too big word, but, some, you know- It will create suffering. This is just- He is now talking about just form and voice, but same thing is true with taste, or sound, or know [no?]-or his feeling or taste. There is good taste and bad taste, and good sound and bad sound, and good feeling and bad feeling-something agreeable idea or disagreeable idea. There are many things.

And we suffer from it, you know. When you hear something good you will enjoy it, but when you hear something bad you will be annoyed or you will be disturbed by it. Although, you know, for usual person, you know, things happens in that way. But if you understand the reality completely, you know, you will not be bothered by it, because-and here is the reason is here.

We understand things in two ways. One way is, you know, as I told you in last lecture, to understand things in darkness. And the other understanding is to observe things in term of good or bad. That is- There are two ways of understanding. And we know that- We- Things themselves has no good or bad, you know. It is- Things are not good or bad. It is we people who discriminate things [as] good or bad. So things are not- There is no good or bad in things themselves. But we create- We discriminate things in term of good or bad.

So if we know that, you know, we will not suffer so much: "Oh, that is," you know, "what I am doing. Not things itself has no good or bad nature. To understand in this way is to understand things in utter darkness. You do not, you know, involved in dualistic understanding of good or bad.

So An, or An wa jochu no koto ni kanai. An is "darkness." Darkness include, you know, include good and bad. In the dark, superior or inferior cannot be distinguished. Here this word, jo-jo is, you know, "superior," and chu is "middle," but [laughs] actually it means-jochu-superior, middle, and inferior. So jochu means, actually, "superior and inferior," not "middle," you know. It is not so usual to say "superior or middle," you know [laughs]. When we say "superior," it is more natural to say "inferior," but as this is a kind of poem, and so sound-jo-it is better sound to say, you know, jochu rather than to say joge,[3] you know. Jochu -if we say jochu, means you feel, you know, better. Joge is too much discrimination, so he says-he used chu instead of ge. Jochu no koto ni kanai.

Koto is "words." This [pointing to ku character on the blackboard][4] is also "words." Utter darkness-superior-good words and bad words will be-will not make-will not disturb you. It means that it will not make much sense, you know, or you will not be bothered by it, you know. You will not be affect[ed] by good words or bad words.

This [kanai] means "to include," or "to fit," you know, together. Mei wa seidaku no ku wo wakatsu. Mei is "brightness." Brightness will- In the brightness only duality of pure or impure is apparent. In the brightness-sei is "pure," and this [daku] is "impure." Pure word- There is pure word and mud-muddy [laughs]-muddy word [laughs]. Pure word and, you know, nasty word [laughs]. In brightness we have dualistic, you know, words. Duality of the pure and impure.

This is- Here [pointing to mei], same words but this means "to make it clear" or "to become apparent." [Waka is the same character as mei, but as a verb it means "to make clear" or "to become apparent."][5] This two words [koto and ku] is "words." This [koto] is "words." This [koto] is more short-one words, maybe. And this [ku] is longer "words."

Anyway, in brightness there is only-there is dualistic words become apparent. In this way, we should, you know, understand things.

"Positive way" and, you know, "negative way," we say. Positive way-and positive way is to acknowledge, you know, things in term of good or bad, beautiful or ugly, good student or bad student. If you make, you know, good effort you will be a good student. To acknowledge the effort is, you know, positive way. Negative way is [laughs], you know, "Whatever you say, you will get thirty blow" [laughs]. "We do not accept anything." That is negative way. Positive way and negative way is, you know-should be, you know-sometime positive, sometime negative. We must have that kind of, you know, means of treating things.

But, you know, actually, you know, even though we [are] mad at someone, it does not mean, you know, he do not acknowledge. Because he knows him so well, so [laughs] sometime he will be angry with him. When you know he is very good, but sometime he will be very lazy [laughs]. Then, you know, [the teacher] will hit him. Sometime we will, you know, praise him or we will encourage him, but, you know, it does not mean we are using different quite method or quite different attitude. The understanding is the same, but the ways of, you know, treating him is different. For someone who sees things only, you know, [in a] negative way and become always-who is always, you know, pessimistic, you know, we will encourage him. But if he is too good [laughs] or too bright, then a teacher will be always scold him [laughs]. That is sometime our way. But originally it does not- Our way is- Our understanding is not different. But usually we [are] very much attached to bright side of things and dark side of things.

Do you know famous koan? A monk asked a master, "It is very hot. It is very hot. Is it possible to," you know, "to feel better?" And the master said, "Why don't you go to somewhere where there is no cold weather or hot weather? Why don't you go there?" [Laughs.] The disciple said, "Is there somewhere," you know, "where there is no cold or no hot?" The master said, "When it is cold you should be a cold Buddha. When it is hot you should be a hot Buddha." [Laughs.] That was the answer.

You think, you know, there is somewhere-if you practice zazen-you will attain, you know, some stage where there is no cold or no hot, or no pleasure or no suffering. You may think. So you ask him, yeah, "If we practice zazen, is it possible to attain that kind of," you know, "attainment?" But, you know, the true teacher may say, "When you suffer you should suffer. [Laughs.] When you feel good you should feel good." You should, you know, be a suffering Buddha. Sometimes you should be a crying Buddha sometime. Or you should be a very happy Buddha sometime.

But, you know, at the same time, the happiness, you know, in its true sense is not exactly the same happiness which usual people have. There is some difference, little bit difference, and that little bit makes a great difference [laughs]. Little bit different. He knows. Because he knows both side of the reality, you know, he has that kind of composure. He will not be disturbed by something bad, and he will not be extremely, you know- He will not be ecstatic, you know, about things. And he will have true joy, which will always [be] with him. And basic, you know, tone of life is same. And on it there is some, you know, good melody or sad melody. That is, you know, more-or-less, something enlightened people may have. That is the feeling some enlightened people may have. And how- It does not mean, you know- It means that, at the same time, when it is hot, you know, or when you are sad, you should be completely involved in sadness without care for something happy. When you are happy, you should just enjoy the happiness. But [laughs], you know, the- We are- Why we can do so is because we are always prepared for everything. Even though the circumstances changes all of a sudden, you know, you don't mind. Today you may be very happy, and next day we don't know what will happen to us. But we should be- When we are ready for things which will happen tomorrow, then, you know, we can enjoy today completely.

Actually how you can do it is not by, you know, [studying a] lecture [laughs] like this, you know, but your practice. So this is Sekito's words, but later, you know, in- Sekito Kisen Daiocho, Yakusan Igen Daiocho, Ungan Donjo Daiocho, Tozan Ryokai Daiocho. Tozan is fourth generation from Sekito, and [in] Tozan's time people stick to this kind of game, you know: brightness or darkness. And they were very much interested in talking about, you know, bright side and dark side and middle way. And they lost the point-how to, you know, obtain this kind of freedom from things.

So later, you know, Dogen-zenji did not use this kind of words so much. Dogen-zenji rather put emphasis on to get out of those words. How to get out of those words is to appreciate things moment after moment. That is more Dogen's way. So he rather put emphasis on- You know, he is more interested in the koan like: "When it is cold, you should be a cold Buddha. When it is hot, you should be a hot Buddha." That's all. Just hot. [?] To be completely, you know, involved in what you are doing is more Dogen's way-without, you know, thinking about those things-and because this kind of, you know, attainment will be obtained by actual practice, not by those words.

But this kind of words will help, you know, your understanding of things. When you are very much dualistic, when you are get into confusion, it may help you. But sometime, you know, you may be interested in talking about those things, you know, then we will lose our way. We should be interested in actual zazen, not in those words. And we should not [be] interested in to talk about those things-rather to be involved-rather we should practice actual zazen.

So Dogen-zenji's way is to, you know, to find the meaning in each being-like a grain of rice, you know, or a cup of water. A cup of water, you may say, is things, you know, which you see in brightness. But if-when you respect, when you pay full respect to the grain of rice, you know, it means actually when you respect it, as you respect it as you respect Buddha himself, that is, you know, you understand a grain of rice as a, you know, as absolute. Only when you do so-when you live in a dualistic, you know, world-completely involved in it-then you have-at that time you have absolute world at the same time in its true sense. When you practice zazen, you know, without seeking for any enlightenment or anything, then there is true enlightenment. That is more like Dogen-zenji's way.

If you have questions, please ask me. Hai.

Question/Answer Session

Student A: When something happens and I feel pain from it, part of me feels it, and part of me is trying to understand it at the same time. And I don't know whether that's because I am afraid of just letting go and feeling just pain, or whether that's wise understanding, you know. It's always- It's half and half. Like, it's not just pain, and it's- It is dualistic and I don't understand it. It's divided, I think.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm. Do you know why? [Laughs.] That is the point. When your, you know, feeling is divided, sometime you try to understand it, and sometime you, you know, feel. You, you know, make yourself feel, you know, whatever it is. But sometime you try to understand, you know, what is this feeling. What is the other side of the feeling, or something. Is that what you mean?

Student A: Yeah. Lots of the times it goes together, though, at the same time. I mean, like-Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. How? Will you explain it more?

Student A: Well, actually I can explain it better in pleasure than I can in pain. Like when I'm enjoying something, or when something gives me pleasure, and I want to- Like, it gives me such pleasure that part of me is saying, "Now, don't forget," you know, "everything dies." And my words are there, but also the understanding is also there. It's like half and half of me- Sometimes-and it's at different times-sometimes I completely just try to feel. I just let it in as much as it will come. Other times, I try to understand it. But most of the time, it's like half-and-half in the same experience. Like, part of me is opening to just let whatever's happening happen, and then part of me is saying. "Now, don't forget," you know, "this is the way things are, that [snaps fingers] like that, and it's gone." I feel like you've sort of already explained it when you said, you know, it's not just words, and if your base is really there, then the top of it can just move around, and it doesn't make so much difference what you do. Perhaps you've already answered me.

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. You know, it is- You have that kind of problem, you know, because you are involved in just personal, you know, problem-problem just for yourself. So you have that kind of problem, you know. It is, you know- As long as it means that- As long as you are involved in personal problem, you know, it is whatever understanding you may have, that is just, you know- That understanding is, you know, only in bright side in its worst sense [laughs]. It doesn't, you know- The other side of it is not bright side or darkness- absolute. It is so, but because you are involved in personal practice, you know, you have no chance to realize the other side of it.

We are talking, you know- When we talk about this, you know, we are talking-I am talking as if I am an enlightened person, and you are listening to it as if you are enlightened person [laughs]. In other words, you know, all of us are bodhisattva, and as a bodhisattva we are discussing, you know, this kind of problem. But when you apply this kind of talking just for intellectual understanding or just [to] your problem only, that is-you have no chance to understand this [thumps something-perhaps book]-the other side of it. That is why you have that problem. It is good, you know. If you [are] really practicing bodhisattva way, whichever side it may be, it is okay, you know. When you criticize yourself, it is okay. When you do what you want to do, that is also okay. You are not doing two different things. According to the situation, you are doing something good always. But because, you know- Why you don't have the confidence in your, you know, in your activity or in your life is because you are-your practice is involved in selfish practice. Okay?

Student A: I- That's something I don't understand. I really don't understand where the boundaries of selfishness are.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student A: I don't understand where selfishness begins and ends, you know. Like- I feel- Well, like, my whole life I was taught that if you can't help somebody, then don't do anything, you know?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: And I wouldn't- I couldn't understand, you know, how you could help anybody-how, you know- How are you going to help anybody? How would you possibly know what if [when] something is helpful to another person? And the only thing that I've ever come up with is to feel myself as a person, whatever bounds that may have-to be whoever I am and to just be human. And that is- I don't know how far that extends. I don't know what Margaret Crowley [?] is or how far she goes or how little she is.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: But I feel like the only way that I can possibly understand what human life is is to be human-to feel what it is to be human. And I don't understand when you say that that is selfish-to just experience everyday life.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: I don't understand that.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Don't understand, yeah. Because you don't, you know- You have- Your confidence is not big enough, strong enough. You say, you know, "I don't understand. I don't understand." That is what you are saying, you know. "I don't understand." What does it mean? If you don't understand, that is okay. Anyway, as long as you are here, you should do what you should do. You see?

Student A: But what is it that I should do? I-Suzuki-roshi: To follow our schedule, practice zazen, and chant sutra. That is what you should do here. So you are very well protected here. In city life, it is not so simple, you know. When you are in city, you are-our practice cannot be so simple. So it is difficult to criticize people, as [Grahame] Petchey[6] said, you know, who is in city, who is involved in family life, or, you know-it is very difficult. So here you are completely protected, and in this well-protected Tassajara, you should practice our way. You see? You want to, you know- You are trying too much, you know. Tassajara practice and city practice, and you want to attain everything in one place, you know. So that is why you are mixed up. "Human." What does it mean, you know? There is no human life except zazen or eating. [Tape turned.] ... city life. So there is no problem, even though you go to city life. Even though you have more complicated life than this. Okay. Same. You are still trying to, you know, feel something which is impossible for you to feel right now. As Dogen-zenji said, "There is no bird which fly," you know, "after you know what it is," you know [laughs]. Only way is just- This is, you know, our-should be our way: "Just fly." [Laughs, laughter.] Okay?

Student A: I don't understand that last statement you made.

Suzuki-roshi: Ah. You are, you know, I think you are fighting with something. You don't- You- Why don't you fly just like this? You are making yourself, you know, feel bad. That's all. "You don't understand." Because you try to understand, you don't understand. If you just [are] involved in our practice day-by-day, you know, when you get up, you should get up. Just get up. Okay? "What shall I do? I am very tired," you know [laughs]. So that is why you have, you know- Then you may think next time, "To become tired is some- I have some reason why I am tired. And when, maybe, when it is tired, you know, to stay in bed is human nature [laughs]. Why is it bad to stay in bed?" Something like that. There is no, you know, limit.

Oh, there is very, you know, interesting story. In China, in war period when the six powerful countries who were fighting-and king of the Sei, you know, wanted to invade the kingdom of Gi. But there were very good minister, and, you know, he wanted to persuade his king not to invade another country. So he talked about- He started to talk about the wonderful dog. And it was a good hunting dog. His master, you know- The dog's master set the hunting dog after-to catch a hare. Both, you know, both hare and hunting dog were very good. So even though the hunting dog was good, he couldn't catch him, you know. So at last, both hunting dog and hare tired out and dead [laughs]. And who gets, you know? No one gets any benefit [laughs] by setting a hunting dog after a hare. Except the, you know- If someone picked, you know, dead hare and dead dog up, he may be the only one who gets some benefit [laughs]. He talked about that kind of famous hunting dog. But he did not, you know, his master did not stop invading the neighboring country, you know. There is famous story.

We are something, you know, doing something like that. There is no end in chasing after: What will be the true way? What is human nature? Too much, you know- Our effort should not be directed in that way, or in this way, you know. Those things. Although I am explaining it, but we should not be- We shouldn't- Just try to understand or- It will help, you know. But you-we shouldn't think this is only way, this is the best way to understand Buddhism. So maybe because I am explaining this, so I am maybe-I am encouraging you to think about [laughs] your problem. But it is not so, actually. Okay? [Laughs.]

Student A: No [she laughs].

Suzuki-roshi: "No." That is what you want, you know, spirit of real practice. Okay? If you come here, you should practice hard. Just practice. Practice is first, okay? Forget all about human nature [laughs, laughter]. Human nature is in your practice. There is nowhere [else?]. Okay? Hai.

Student B: When I am fully awake I have, maybe, a little control over my desires, but in the mornings [laughs, laughter]-

Suzuki-roshi: That is what I am saying. In the morning you have trouble. I know that [laughs, laughter]. So that is why I say, "Get up!" [Pats on table four times.]

Student B: And how do you do that?

Suzuki-roshi: How you do that? Just do it. Or else someone will go and hit you. [Picks up stick. Makes a sort of humorous growl. Laughs, laughter.] Okay? [Laughter.] Great-

Student B: I "just got up" I think a couple of times, you know-Suzuki-roshi: That is good.

Student B: -jumped out of bed. But it was really- It was such a big thing that- [Laughs, laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, that is big thing [laughter]. So if you can get up, you know, pretty well, I think your practice is almost okay [laughs]. That is very good chance to practice our zazen, you know. Just get up. Okay? That is the most important thing.

Student B: It's like I hear the bell, and as soon as I hear it there's this big thing-

Suzuki-roshi: I don't hear anything from it. [Laughter.]

Student B: -and I just-I don't want to move. [Laughter.] Then I should get up before I hear the bell. [Laughs, laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Okay? I am very strict [laughter] on that point. Hai.

Student C [David Chadwick]: Roshi. You've made several comments on-concerning attitude toward the words behind you. [Presumably on the blackboard.] Does this- Does what you have said apply also, say, to the Heart Sutra and to all sutras?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

David Chadwick: Okay. You're not making any comment-any particular comment on the Sandokai.

Suzuki-roshi: No.

David Chadwick: Okay.

Suzuki-roshi: No particular comment. Same thing. Hai.

Student D: I was only sitting zazen for some years, and then a student here- People sometimes ask me questions about our practice, and about my practice, and why I am doing what I'm doing.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student D [Gerry --]: For example, someone may say to me, "How long have you been sitting zazen? How long have you been practicing?" And, at such a time, I may think, "Well, Gerry, you could say you've been practicing from beginningless beginning. And perhaps from my experience and from my intellectual understanding at the present time, I might expound on beginningless beginning. Or I might say, "Oh, three years or four years." I wonder, in such circumstance, if I say one thing or the other, there will be some communication and some information exchanged about one thing or another. But if I say, "Two or three years," it's very straightforward.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student D: It's quite to the point, and it's true, and it's perhaps more honest. If I say "beginningless beginning" and speak about such a thing, it may be that I know quite well something intellectually about that. But to truly understand that requires considerable confidence. And if I don't have the confidence at the particular time the question is asked, how shall I answer such a question?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. It's up to you [laughs]. Yeah. It is, you know- If someone who want to understand intellectually what is our practice, maybe we have to answer more intellectual way, even though it will not help completely. Intellectual understanding is important, but sometime, you know, you are okay, you know. You hesitate to give some intellectual understanding, so that is okay. But if you become proud of, you know, your intellectual understanding, it may be big mistake, I think. So how you answer for such question is very difficult. But if you understand the intention of making question for you, maybe, I can-you can answer in some appropriate way, I think. Hai.

Student E: Roshi, when you study a book, what does the book give you? You.

Suzuki-roshi: Give me?

Student E: Mm-hmm.

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. Mostly, you know, if you- I study various teachers' way. Now, for me it is necessary to know about various Zen masters. For you, maybe, it is not so important. But for me, I must have some clear picture of what I'm talking about. Or else we-I cannot say anything [laughs], you see? That is why I study before lecture. And my teacher always told me, "Even though it doesn't help," you know, "before lecture you should study." [Laughs, laughter.] Hai.

Student F: Could you speak a little on the nature of sound and of noise?

Suzuki-roshi: Sound and noise [laughs]? Some sound, you know- When you, you know, listen to it, you know, when you listen to it in zazen, you can distinguish sound from noise, you know. If you want to- Why I discriminate your sound or noise, you know, is because I want to, you know, I want to encourage your practice as a teacher. But, you know, sometime I don't- I just practice zazen. Just practice zazen with you, forgetting all about teacher or disciple [laughs]. Sometime. Sometime, you know, I feel I have to help you, so I, you know, discriminate your practice. Sometime I correct your posture, you know. But sometime I don't, because I want to sit, maybe, you know, with you. I think if I sit with you, you know, anyway, I am helping you, I am quite sure. But sometime I think it is necessary to correct your posture and to listen to you [hit] mokugyo or drum or bell.

It is not so easy- It is quite easy to tell, you know. You know, it is like to hand sutra cards for people. When you receive it, you know, the feeling you have, you know, is sometime, you know, maybe, you know- Sometime it is because of your, you know, disturbed mind, you may not feel so good. But if it is handed to you, you know, with some good feeling, you will naturally feel good. The way of talk, you know, everything is said. So, you know- In Japan, the- In bus station or in, you know, in train station they are clipping our ticket, you know. Someone, you know, will give you very good feeling just, you know, clip: "Hai. Hai. Hai." You know [laughs]. There is big difference in the way they clip our ticket. [Laughs.] I am talking about that kind of thing.

Oh. [Apparently discovers how late it is.]

---

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby; City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Verbatim transcript (checked against tape) by Bill Redican 6/1/00.

[1] Raku (Jap.) = comfort; pleasure; relief.

[2] Ku (Jap.) = agony; pain; anxiety; worry.

[3] Ge (Jap.) = lower in quality or position; inferior.

[4] From contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby. Ku is in the next line.

[5] From original transcript.

[6] Grahame Petchey was a student of Suzuki-roshi and the first president of San Francisco Zen Center.

5 - Sandokai Lecture #7

Saturday, June 13, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #7

Tassajara

[The following lines of the Sandokai are discussed in this lecture:

Line 17 Shidai no sho onozukara fukusu,

Line 18 ko no sono haha wo uru ga gotoshi.

Line 19 Hi wa nesshi kaze wa doyo,

Line 20 mizu wa uruoi chi wa kengo.

Line 17 The four elements resume their nature

Line 18 as a child has its mother.

Line 19 Fire is hot, wind blows,

Line 20 water wets, and earth is solid.]

Next-as we have big blackboard, I want to explain those characters.

This is-those characters are, of course, Chinese characters, and-but Japanese people read those characters in-in Japanese, you know, without changing the order of characters. How we read those characters is-this is one word, shidai:

Shidai-Shidai no. We put here no.[1] Shidai no sho onozukara fukusu.

[Writing on blackboard.]

Shidai no sho onozukara-we write here, you know, in kana-fukusu:

Ko no sono haha wo uru ga gotoshi. We read in this way, you know.

In Chinese:

[Line 17] Shi dai sho ji fuku

[Line 18] nyo shi toku go bo.

[Line 19] Ka net su do yo,

[Line 20] sui su shi ken go.

This is, you know, Chinese way of reading. But we-Japanese people read Chinese sentences like this:

[Line 17] Shidai no sho onozukara fukusu,

[Line 18] ko no sono haha wo uru ga gotoshi.

[Line 19] Hi wa nesshi kaze wa doyo,

[Line 20] mizu wa uruoi chi wa kengo.

And we put Shidai no-Shidai no sho: "Nature of," you know, "of-of" is no. "Nature of four elements." Onozukara, "naturally." Fukusu or "resume."

And this [gotoshi] is "like." And this [ko] is a "child." This [uru]is "have" or "obtain." And "this" [sono] is that or his "mother" [haha].

[Line 18] ko no sono haha wo uru ga gotoshi.

The order of words is different from-Japanese order of words different from Chinese order of words, which is like-something like, you know, English. So, you know-so we call those words tenyoha [okurigana][2] which is peculiar to Japanese language.

This [no] means, you know, "of." Shidai no sho. This [sho, "nature"] is, you know, subject and this [no, "of"] makes, you know, this word [shidai, "four elements"] adjective of this noun [sho, "nature"]. Shidai no sho. "Nature of four elements." Onozukara [fukusu]: "naturally resumed." Ko no-ko no-"like a child"-[uru] "get"-[sono]his-[haha] mother."

And fire heat, the wind blow; and water wet, and earth is solid [taps something like the tatami with his hand].

So we read Chinese scripture in two ways: sometime in Japanese, you know, this kind of scripture we read in two ways. Sometime in Japanese like this, you know. Our eyes should go [laughs]-go back and forth like this-Shidai no sho onozukara fukusu, ko no sono haha wo uru ga gotoshi-we read. Up and down. Sometime, you know, this kind of-this word may be two [or] three lines ahead. So we-after reading two-three lines we have to come back [to] this [character]. Rather complicated, but we have been doing-we have been reading in that way when we read Chinese language and Chinese books.

Tonight I must explain from here [the blackboard]. Shidai is "four elements." Buddhists, you know, understand-Buddhists have the idea of elements. Elements of various being. We count four elements, you know, like fire, water, and wind, and earth. Wind, fire, water, [and earth]. So those four elements-nature, you know, this elements has its own nature. We shouldn't say so, but tentatively we think those four elements has its-their nature.

Fire-nature of fire is to make things, you know, perfect, you know, to-like you boil something, you know, by heating things, things will be more, you know, mixed up [blended?] or something-more perfect, anyway, we say "perfection."

And wind brings things mature, you know, wind. I don't know why, but [laughs] wind nature, you know, encourage things to be more mature. Little bit different from this, you know [compares characters for fire and wind].[3] This [air][4] is more organic, you know, activity. This [fire][5] has more chemical, you know, activity.

[FIRE WIND WATER EARTH]

And this-water-nature of water is to contain things in it, you know. In water we [laughs]-wherever you go, there is water. So we rather think opposite way: Water contains everything, you know. Instead of saying tree has, you know, in the bark of the tree there is water, we may say, but the water contains bark of the tree-leaves and everything. So water is something great, big being in which everything exist. We exist in water.

And nature of earth is to-solid nature is the element of earth. Earth does not mean "land"-but some solid nature of the material is earth.

So things, you know-we-if you-according to Buddhists, you know, things will be-if you divide things, you know, [into] smallest piece imaginable, you know, like-I don't know English term for that. Do you see? Yeah.

Student: Atomic?

SR: Yeah. Something like that.

Student: Molecule.

Yeah. More- Yeah, "atom," maybe. But, you know, that is not final, you know, final piece. That final piece [is] called gokumi. Gokumi is the smallest piece imaginable, you know. That final being is-consists of-has four-those four natures. So we say final atom is consists of those four elements. So this is-it is something like, you know, modern physics, you know. I-I ca- [partial word]-I don't know how to explain it, you know, because I don't know the proper words for that. Plus and minus and, you know, how final atom is consist of is plus [positive valence] and minus [negative valence]. And those are, you know, something like that.

And we-the str- [partial word]-it is strange enough to say-they have same idea, you know-you-modern physics, you know, thinks final being is-has no weight or no size, you know. It is just current.

We-we Buddhists think in that way. Those-although final being is consist of those-has those four natures, and accordingly we can say it con- [partial word]-final piece is-consists of-consist of four elements, but-but that is-that is not something solid being. When we reach to this, you know, nature of being, that is just, you know, emptiness, we say.

So, you know, when we come to this idea, we come to the idea of emptiness. It is not-those elements is not something which exist actually [as a] materialistic being. It is something, you know, which is not material, which is just energy. So we call it ku [gokumi?].

So this is four elements [points to fire, water, wind, and earth], but we [Buddhists] add one more. And we say five elements. Five [Four] elements has, you know, add one more which is empty-empty nature. [Writes on board: [6]

Line 19 Hi wa nesshi kaze wa doyo,

Line 20 mizu wa uruoi chi wa kengo.]

So that is empty-all empty [laughs].

Even though it is empty, you know, from emptiness those nature will be appear, you know, will come into being. And as soon as those four na- [partial word]-be- [partial word]-nature come into being, we form idea of elements or final piece. And the material is consist of those elements. That is Buddhistic understanding of being. So-

It looks like we are explaining-talking about some material, but when we come to this, you know, idea of elements, that element is not just material. It is both spiritual and material. And when thinking, you know, mind is also-when we come to this element, thinking mind is included. So we say it is empty.

So when we say "emptiness"-emptiness-the idea of emptiness include both material and spiritual. Or material and-mind and objects. Subjective world and objective world. And emptiness is final being to which we-our thinking mind cannot reach.

So, Shidai no sho-nature of-nature-those [four] nature-"nature of four elements naturally," you know, "in itself"-you can say "[are] empty" [writes on board], but here he[7] says "resume to its own nature," you know. It means "come to emptiness."

[Line 18] Just like a children has his mother.

When, you know, there is children, there must be his mother, you know. Without children [laughs], there is no-without mother there is no children. That children is here means mother is here. That emptiness is here means four nature is here, you know. If four nature-even though four nature is there, that is nothing but tentative formation of the final emptiness. That is same thing as "a child has its-his own mother."

All those, you know, four sentence[8]-finally, you know, what does it mean is, you know, talking about, you know, independency of being. Although there is many, you know, elements, those elements originally-naturally co- [partial word]-resume to its nature. So although there is-there are many things, they are-each one of them are independent. And a child is independent, even though they have-he has his own mother. And fire is independent with its nature of heat; and wind is independent with its nature of moving; and water is independent with its nature of moisture; the earth is independent with its nature of solidness. So everything is independent, you know, it means. And this four sentences introduce, you know-follow the ten sentences which is talking about truth of independen- [partial word]-independency.

In this Sandokai, you know, Sekito-zenji-Sekito-zenji-Sekito explained the reality in two ways. Now he is explaining reality from the viewpoint of dependency. Four elements are independent, although it has its own source. A child is independent, although he has his mother. Fire is independent with its nature of heat. Water is independent with its nature of moisture. And earth is independent with its nature of solidness.

Here translation goes-I don't know whose translation it is: [9] [Line 17] The characteristic of the four elements drew together.

Drew together. Characteristics of the four elements resume its self. "Resume its original nature," maybe, which is emptiness. And:

[Line 18] Like a child returning to its mother.

This is [laughs] rather poor, you know, translation maybe. "Like a child has its mother" is more accurate. That there is child means that there is mother, you know. That is what it means.

The heat of fire, the moving wind, the water wet, and the solid earth. It is better to put period here [Line 20, after "solid earth"[10]] and maybe "Like a child has its mother" [Line 18]. And heat-fire-element of fire has its nature of heat. The element of wind has its nature of moving. Or having fire-what [laughs]-I don't know how to say-the heat of fire, the moving wind-or "element of fire with its nature of heat, the element of wind with its nature of moving, the element of water with its nature of wet, the element of earth with its nature of solidness-are all independent," maybe. If you put period here [after "solid earth"] and- mis- [partial word]-[add to Line 17] "has its own nature," then maybe, you know, it is-it makes clear sense.

[Line 21] Eyes to see, sound to hear-

This is for next day, but I will repeat-I will read it-the connection, you know, so that you can understand this sentence better.

[Line 21] Eyes to see, sound to hear, and smells-

[Line 22] The sour and salty taste on the tongue.

[Line 23] But in each related things,

[Line 24] As leaves grow from roots,

[Line 25] End and beginning returns to the source.

[Line 26] "High" and "low" are used respectively:

And all those, you know [colons] [taps several times], better to put period here [after "respectively" etc.].

And-one, two, three, four, five, six-[Lines 21-26] those six sentences means the idea of, you know, understanding of independency. Things-things exist in two ways: one is independency, and the other is dependency or interrelated[ness]. But although they are interrelated, they are independent, you know. You-each one of you are independent, but you are related with each other. That is, you know- Even though you are related with each other, you are independent. So you can say both ways.

So this-all those sentences are expressing the idea of reality from the side of dependence-independence [corrected self]. Mmm.

So, you know-mmm-do you understand [laughs] what he means? Usually, you know, when we say "independent," you know [laughs], you have no idea of dependency. That is non-Buddhistic understanding. Buddhists, you know, always, think, you know-understand reality, you know. We know reality, you know, we understand things completely so we will not be mixed up. We will not be confused by saying "independency" or "dependency." If someone said, "Everything is independent," [we say], "Okay, yeah, that is so." And if some other person may say, "That is-things are interrelated," [we say], "Oh, that is okay." Both is okay. We just-we understand both side, so whatever you say, that is okay.

But if someone stick to some i- [partial word], you know, one-sided idea, you know, we may say "No!" [Laughs.] If you say everything is independent, "No!" If you stick to the idea [of] independency of the being, only, you know, stick to the idea of independency, I will say to him, "No! You are wrong." And if he stick to-if someone else stick to the idea of independency, you know, then we will say, "No! You are wrong."

There is many koans like this. "If the final karma," you know, "fire burned everything up, at that time whether buddha-nature [laughs] [will] still [be] there or not?"[11] That is question. And sometime he [the teacher] said, "Yes, it exist." Some other time, some monk came and asked him, "When the karma fire burned everything up, then what will become of the buddha-nature?" "It will not exist." [Laughs.] Both is true. People may ask him, you know, "Before you-then why did you say it will not-it will exist?" you know. Then he will get a big slap. "What are you talking about? Don't you understand what I mean?" you know. "'Buddha-nature will not exist' is right; 'will exist' is right." From the, you know, viewpoint of independency, you know, everything exist with its buddha-nature-even whatever happen to this world.

But even so, you know, nothing exist when we see from the viewpoint of utter darkness or absolute. Then nothing exist. That which exist is nothingness or darkness, in which maybe things will exist, but what you see or what you say about it is nothing. There is no way to explain things individually.

This is, you know, this is just intellectual, you know, explanation. But here we must have actual feeling. What kind of feeling you will have about things you see, you know-what kind of difference you have between, you know, from the understanding of usual person of just understanding of being, should be, you know, discussed more.

If we see things, you know, which happened in that-at that time, when we see, you will appreciate things which you see, and you will appreciate one by one everything. There you have pure gratitude. Even though you are seeing-observing one piece of flower-one-just one flower, that one flower include everything. It is not just flower; it is the absolute itself; it is Buddha himself. We see in that way. But at the same time, at that time we have, you know-that which exist is just flower, and no one to see or no-nothing to be seen. That which exist is just flower.

That is the feeling we have in our practice and in our everyday activity. Wherever you work, you have that kind of feeling: a continuity of that kind of refreshed, pure gratitude. So to see, you know, to treat things is to treat Buddha's equipment for us. We understand in this way. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

But when we memorize something, when we think about something, you know, in term of duality, we observe things, you know, intellectually and understand things intellectually. Even though we understand intellectually, we do not stick to the idea. That understanding should be improved, you know, day by day by our pure thinking. And we do not stick to old, you know, old stump [laughs], you know, stump of the tree. We do not sit on the same stump [laughs] always.[12]

We say, "You cannot catch fish in the same place." Today [laughs] fortunately you could catch a big fish at some certain place, but tomorrow you should, you know, fish [in] some other place. Or, you know, we say, or we say, you know, "to cut [notch]-to cut a boat to remember, you know, where we are" [laughs, laughter]. We are, you know-boat is actually going, so even though you cut, you know, a boat to remember a place-something beautiful. "Oh! There was something beautiful. This-and we should remember that beautiful thing-flower." Even though you cut the boat, edge of the-what do you call the-

Several students: Channel. Railing.

Suzuki-roshi: Rail? -maybe railing of the boat, you know, it doesn't help, because boat is going [laughs]. But we, you know, we usually do so, you know: "Oh! That was very good." And we cut the railing of the boat to remember something [laughs].

This kind of teaching suggest, you know, this kind of foolish, you know-our foolishness and what is actual Buddhist life. We should not wait here, you know, sitting [laughs] on the same stump all day. They will not come to the same place, with a gun, sitting on the stump [laughs]. It's very foolish [laughs]. Good example of, you know, thinking mind. Even though, you know-even [if] it is so, we should appreciate what you see right now. "Oh! That beautiful flower." You know, we should appreciate. We should have full appreciation of it, but we should not cut the rail-railing of the boat.

Or we should not wait, you know, maybe, for her coming, sitting [laughs], standing at the same place. She may come by this time of the day, but [laughs] sometimes she may come, but sometimes she doesn't come. I have something like this experience. I would stand up, you know-I would wait for her coming [laughs], sitting [laughs]. Sometime she may come; sometime, you know, she may not. So, you know, if she come, we are lucky. If she doesn't, that's okay [laughs, laughter]. If she come, you know, you are lucky. If she doesn't [laughs], you shouldn't complain [laughs, laughter].

Do you have some question? Hai.

Student A [Reb Anderson]: Last week you said that if we understand our closeness, our dependence with other things, then we are independent.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Reb: Are we independent even if we don't understand this?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, it is so, but for you I don't know. You know, if you-even though you don't understand it, but if you admit this truth, you know, it is so. So you cannot-you will not stick to some idea-one-only one idea. Or you will not be so arrogant, you know. Independent and interdependent. So, if you, you know, if you don't have actual close feeling to others, but if you know this fact, even intellectually, you know, you will not make-you will not make so big mistake, I don't think.

It is so-actually it is so, but the point is you don't feel so, you know, you don't understand in that way. So we-here there is something which we-which is very important [holding up or pointing to something?]. This kind of, you know-when we talk about this way, it means that we talk about things as if I am completely enlightened person [laughs]. For enlightened person, this is very true, but for the people who is not enlightened, this is just talk, you know.

So when our practice follow this kind of understanding, that is true, you know, Buddhism. It should not be just intellectual understanding. But even, you know, [if] you practice hard, without this kind of understanding, your practice may be very, you know-it doesn't make much sense. Your practice is still involved in the idea of somethingness. Hai.

Student B: What's missing? You said that for an enlightened person that's very true-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: -and for an unenlightened person it's just talk.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: What's missing-

Suzuki-roshi: [Speaking simultaneously with student.] What is missing?

Student B: -for an unenlightened person?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. The practice is missing. Practice is missing. So only when you practice zazen hard, this is true. And even though, at the same time, even though you practice hard, you know, your practice will not be always complete, you know. So at that time, there is big gap between the truth and your actual understanding-understand- [partial word]-actually experience. It doesn't, you know, go together. Your intellectual understanding is high, but your practice may be low.

So just intellectual-to have intellectual understanding is easy, we say, but actual practice-emotional-and more emotional practice is difficult. To feel in that way is difficult. So we say intellectual-and to have-to destroy the understanding-intellectual understanding of something is easy, you know. Or to have understanding of nothingness is easy. Intellectually it is easy. But emotionally it is not so difficult [easy?]. We easily stick to something. So, you know, it is-we say to-it is-emotional, you know, difficulty is as hard as to split a lotus in two, you know. Even though you split in two, the strings [roots?] [laughs]-long string will follow and you cannot get rid of it. Still string is here.

But thinking, you know, difficulties-intellectual difficulty is as easy as break a stone in two. [Makes whacking noise.] Nothing left, you know.

Student C [Bill Shurtleff?]: Does that mean that if a person sees one person doing something to another person that's hurting the other person-let's say that I see someone doing something that's hurting another person.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: And I feel emotionally upset by that hurting [?]-that actually I'm not seeing clearly and I'm not understanding what's happening.

Suzuki-roshi: Actually, what is the point of the question?

Student C: The question is: The only reason that I'm upset when I see someone doing something that looks like it's hurting another person is that-Suzuki-roshi: You-when you doing helping something or someone else?

Student C: I see a situation in which it looks to me as if one person is hurting another person. And I become upset in that situation.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, I see.

Student C: The question is: Is that-I'm becoming upset because I'm not seeing the situation as it actually is, and that if I were seeing it as it actually is, I wouldn't be emotionally upset. That's my question.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, I see. But that is very difficult question to answer, you know, because, you know, it is difficult to know whether one is helping the other with-in some appropriate way or not, you know? So if it is not appropriate, you will be upset, you know. At least you will worry, you know. When one is helping appropriate, you know, when you upset-sometimes that happens, you know. If, you know, you-if someone is helping your girlfriend in proper way [laughs], you may be-anyway you will be upset, you know. [Laughs, laughter.] That kind of thing happens pretty often, so it is very difficult [laughs, laughter] to answer.

Student C: Roshi, my question is more that a person who really sees things clearly-is there no situation that would upset him emotionally?

Suzuki-roshi: I don't think so, you know, emotionally, you know. But "upset" I say, or you say, but that feeling-there is big difference, you know, in that feeling too. Maybe Buddha will be upset, you know, easily- quite easily. But when he is upset, you know, even though he's upset he's not upset because-just because of him or because of his attachment or anything like that. And sometime he will be very angry [laughs], you know. Anger is al- [partial word]-allowed when that is Buddha's anger, you know, when he is angry when he should be angry. But that anger is not exactly the same anger we will have, usually. You know, that is, you know-if he is not upset when he should be upset, you know, that is also violence [violation] of the precepts. When he should be angry, he should be angry. He must be angry. That is how the difference between Mahayana precepts and more, you know-that's a characteristic of Mahayana way of observing precepts.

We say it is-sometime anger may be like a sunset, you know. It is beautiful. Red. [Laughs.] It is-anyway, it-although it is red and, you know, bright and red, but, you know, even though it looks like anger, but it is actually a beauty. So there is, you know, that kind of difference. But so how-you know, if-if anger comes, you know, from purity like a lotus, it is good, I think. From pure mind. Hai.

Student D: Roshi, I've observed that many times our emotions seem to be independent of our minds-of our intellectual understanding-and have a life of their own, a life outside that has nothing to do with the life of what you know or understand or in your mind.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student D: What is the source of emotion in the body or in our understanding? Where does that emotion-

Suzuki-roshi: Emotion-

Student D: -come from?

Suzuki-roshi: -you know, more-it is maybe mostly it comes from, you know, physical, you know, source, physical part of maybe, you know, physiological thing. And thinking is, you know, some mind which ignore, you know, those physical things-more universal, you know, river. We think-when we think, we think [as a] more universal river, ignoring each conditions and conditions-various conditions-or else we cannot think, you know. We-if we count various condition, you know, five, ten, or twenty, or more-one hundred conditions [laughs]-it is not possible to think.

So the characteristic of thinking mind is to ignore all the conditions and to follow the, you know, track of the thinking mind. So, you know, it doesn't fit. Thinking mind doesn't fit to the each, you know, case we meet-we face. So, you know, tendency of man is just to think and go on: Whatever it happens doesn't matter. [Makes humorous grunting noise, laughs.] "What are you talking about? We should do this!" you know. That is man's, you know, way. But women stick to various conditions and carefully observe various conditions and figure out what we should do one by one.

That is also true with our thinking mind and emotional feeling. So how to adjust is, you know, when we p- [partial word]-our actual practice is more physiological practice, not thinking mind. You know, ignoring all the conditions, just to sit on black cushion [taps cushion] is the practice.

So there is similarity, you know, in thinking mind and emotional practice. When you practice zazen, we ignore almost all the conditions we have. Our-when we practice zazen, our emotional situation is-already emotionally we ignore things. Just like you think. So in zazen practice there is-it is easier to, you know, to practice emotional practice and thinking practice.

Student D: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student D: What happens when the flame goes out?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? Flames?

Student D: Yeah. You said the heat is independent and dependent and interdependent all at the same time. But sometimes it goes out completely.

Suzuki-roshi: Goes-?

Student D: Turn it out-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh.

Student D: -like on that lamp. And there's no flame at all. You know, it's none of these things, is it?

Suzuki-roshi: But, yeah. That is [taps stick], you know, interesting questions-question-and they explain various way, you know. Heat-it does not mean just heat, you know. It is some element which exist in each piece of, you know, atom.

Student D: Can the flame go out in that little "each piece?"

Suzuki-roshi: Flame nature, maybe, you may say. You know, flame nature fall and [laughs]-some people, you know, some people say, "In each gokumi-gokumi is last element or last piece of the material. In last piece of the material, which is the-which you cannot divide any more, you know, last piece. In that last piece, four, you know, elements is in it. Last element is-consist of four elements in same, you know, in same quantity. And when, you know, fire element, you know, becomes strong, by some chance, you know, it will be a fire, you know. But if fire nature is-become weak, and water nature become strong, then it-that will be something water[y], you know. They explain in that way. So, even though four elements are equally, you know, exist in the last piece, you know, according to the situation, some element will become strong. That is one explanation.

And the other is, you know, according to the material, you know, in last piece, some piece will have stronger, you know, or more fire element-maybe 99 percent of fire element-then that will be fire, you know. Some school explain how fire exist and why-how fire, you know-why fire, you know, exist-why does it exist when we extinguish it?

Student D: That last little piece, then, will always have fire? It can never go away?

Suzuki-roshi: No, not that-not all-that piece is not completely fire, but, you know, it include some other element but not strong enough, sometime, or not much enough. They explain each things in that way-why water is water, you know. Water does not mean this water [taps his cup], you know. Water nature. Some element [laughs]. Some water-like element. It is not exactly water we see. Do you understand?

Student D: I think I do. Water has a nature to flow, so it's more than just that [1-2 words inaudible].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, but what they are talking about as water is not this water [tapping his cup of water]. Some, you know, some nature which exist in the last piece of element of things.

Student D: You can't lose that piece of water.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student D: You can't lose that water.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. [Laughs.]

Student E: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah.

Student E [Bill Shurtleff?]: Could I explain a little bit about how Western physics would say the same thing?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

That as a parti- [partial word]-as you get to the smallest particle, you can't tell when it turns into energy. There's a point at which it's no longer a particle, but it's also no longer energy. At the same time, you can't tell when it behaves like a wave and when it behaves like a particle. It behaves-sometimes if you think of it as a wave, it behaves like a wave. But if you think of it as a particle, it behaves like a particle. And the same thing is true with a charge-we say "an electrical charge." It has charge and yet it doesn't have charge, like an atom has positively charged protons, negatively charged electrons, and neutrons. But these conditions are continually changing, mostly depending on your point of view. That might be something like that understanding.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. Hai.

Student F: Roshi, I have some difficulty in listening to the lecture. For example, when I chant[ed] the Sandokai when I knew nothing about what it meant, I was able to concentrate on my breathing and my voice coming from my hara. But now I start thinking of san meaning "many," and do meaning something else. [Suzuki-roshi and several students are laughing.] And I lose touch with my activity. And now I find myself thinking, when you were holding your cup, "It has four elements." [Laughter.]

And it creates difficulty. I know it's because I get attached to what you say-to the words and to the ideas that they are. And the dark, the ri side, is becoming-is, you know, the ji side and the ri side. The ji now, when I chant the Sandokai, the intellectual, the bright side, is strong, and I don't enjoy chanting that sutra any more. [Laughter.]

Student G [David Chadwick]: He lost his ri.

Student F: Could you-could you maybe give me some advice on how to avoid these kinds of difficulties?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, you cannot avoid it. [Laughter.]

Student F: -or else maybe enjoy them?

Suzuki-roshi: That is, you know, why I am telling you. You know, you have to polish your, you know, understanding.

Student F: Is it understanding? You know, when we get up in the morning-and we talked about it the other day, that we should just-you say, "Get up! Just get up! [Suzuki-roshi laughs.] So this morning, when I woke up, I usually just get up. But then I heard-[loud laughter]-I started to think. I didn't get up right away. I waited until the [wake-up] bell came back across. It came once and then it came back, and then I started to think about what was said in the lecture, and I just gave up.

Suzuki-roshi: That is not because of lecture, but-[laughing]. That is not my fault.

Student F: It's-my question is-it's sort of a question really-can we-is our practice to have subjective understanding with-can we have subjective understanding of our practice without having some kind of objective or right understanding, or do we have to balance them, have both of them? Can we practice Buddha's way without knowing Buddha's way intellectually?

Suzuki-roshi: If you can, you are very lucky [laughs]. But, unfortunately, we cannot practice without intellectual understanding, I think. Yeah.

Student F: If we sit zazen and we have correct posture and we follow our breathing, do we have to have these kinds of concepts or ideas about Buddhism like the four elements and-Suzuki-roshi: No, no. At that time we should forget.

Student F: I mean, do we have to understand the ideas of Buddhism when we practice?

Suzuki-roshi: You have to, you know, because you tend to think [about] things in that way. So we have to, you know, back and forth, we should polish up our understanding so that we cannot be intellectually mixed up. That is important, I think.

Oh! [Sees how late the time is. Laughter.] When I saw it last time it was-I had fifteen minutes. Your question was too good. [Laughs.]

---

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby and City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (11/12/00).

[1] shi (Jap.) "four" + dai (Jap.) "great." Japanese adds "no" as a possessive article ("of") to the Chinese characters.

[2] Phonetically, S.R. said tenyoha. Derby MS gives okurigana.

[3] Derby, p. 3.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Derby, p. 4, added these two lines. Suzuki-roshi was writing on the board, but there did not seem enough time to write out both lines fully.

[7] Possibly Blyth ("the four elements return to their nature") or Masunaga ("end and beginning return to the source")-Line 17.

[8] As used here, "lines."

[9] It appears to have been Reiho Masunaga's translation, but in this transcript the text is presented verbatim as recited by Suzuki-roshi (i.e., often slightly modified from the Masunaga version). From Reiho Masunaga, The Soto Approach to Zen, Tokyo: Layman Buddhist Society Press, 1958, pp. 185-187.

[10] Derby, p. 6. Masunaga has a semicolon after "solid earth." Suzuki-roshi prefers a full period.

[11] From Blue Cliff Record, Case 29.

[12] Referring to an ancient Chinese story of a hunter who sees a rabbit run into a tree stump one day. Foolishly, he comes back the next day and waits for another rabbit to run into the same stump.

6 - Sandokai Lecture #8

Wednesday, June 17, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #8

Tassajara

[The following lines of the Sandokai are discussed in this lecture:

Line 21 Manako wa iro, mimi wa onjo,

Line 22 hana wa ka, shita wa kanso.

Line 23 Shikamo ichi-ichi no ho ni oite,

Line 24 ne ni yotte ha bumpusu.

Line 25 Hommatsu subekaraku shu ni kisu beshi.

Line 26 Sompī sono go wo mochiu.

Line 21 For eyes there is color and form, for ears there is sound,

Line 22 for the nose there is smell, and for the tongue there is taste;

Line 23 Each being comes out from the root

Line 24 as branches and leaves come out from the trunk.

Line 25 But both root and end should return to their original nature.

Line 26 The words we use are different--good and bad, respectful and mean-but through these words we should understand the absolute being or source of the teaching.]

In last lecture I explained the everything-independency of everything. "Independency of everything" means-of course, things are interdependent with each other, but at the same time, each being is independent because each being include the other being-the rest of the being. So when each being include whole world, then each being is actually independent. But at the same time, you know, each being, you know, looks like- When each being understood, you know, in term of big or small, black or white, heavy or light, man or nature-[Aside.] It is working?

Student: It doesn't sound like it.

Hmm? Oh. And that is the sound. Can you hear me? No. Huh? Oh. I must make-okay.

Student [to other students]: Perhaps you could move forward to make two rows.

Will you come nearer to me?

Student [to other students]: Come forward.

Sit one more row between. Okay. Yeah. Please come nearer as much as possible. [Sounds of movement.]

In Sandokai, you know, actually, [Sekito is] talking about reality and the people, you know, forgetting all about this point, involved in some, you know, getting to discrimination which school of Zen is right-right or wrong, you know. Southern school or Northern school. This kind of dispute were all over. So that is why Sekito-zenji-

Can you hear me now [laughs]? No?

That is why Sekito-zenji wrote this poem. And here he discuss from the viewpoint-he is talking about reality from viewpoint of independency, you know. So when we talk about, you know, independency, the Southern school is independent, you know. Northern school is independent. But there is no reason why we should compare two. Northern school represent, you know, all Buddhism. And Southern school include all the Buddhism. When, you know, both school is expressing whole Buddhism in their own way, you know, there is no reason why we should compare.

Rinzai school, you know, has its-has their own approach to reality, and Soto school has our own approach to the reality, you know. When they have-when there is-when approach is different, there is no reason why we should compare. That is the point, you know.

Sekito-zenji is pointing at this point, talking about what is reality. He actually do not talk about Northern school-dispute of Northern school or Southern school. But actually, talking about what is reality and what is Buddha's teaching in its true sense. He is, you know, pointing out at the mistake, you know, of the two schools at that-at his time.

Anyway, tonight-those three [couplets] we explained-I explained already four sentences-four clause-clauses. And now tonight I want to explain six more clause [lines] which denote the reality from the viewpoint of independency-independency. Here he says: "Eyes-is "eyes." "Eye-eyes to see, ear to hear sound." For eyes there is color or form. This shiki [iro?][1] means "color and form."

[Line 21] Manako wa iro, mimi wa onjo,

[Line 21] For eyes there is color; for ears there is sound and voice.

[Line 22] And for nose there is smell; for tongue there is taste of salt or sour.

This, you know, means-it looks like, you know, he is talking about duality or dependency-dependency of dharma of eyes and its object. But actually, when, you know, we-even though you see something, you know, if you see things in its true sense, there is nothing to be seen or no one to see, you know, actually. But when you analyze, there someone who is seeing something and something which is seen by us-by eyes. This is only one activity-only one, you know, activity could be understand in two ways. I see something. But actually when I see something really, you know, there is no one who is seeing it and who-nothing to be seen, actually. Both is true, and he is talking about oneness of the form and eyes here. That is how, you know, Buddhists observe things. But sometime we observe-we understand things in its dualistic sense, but we don't forget to-dualistic understanding of "I see" or "someone is seen by someone-something is seen by someone is some interpretation-something which our thinking mind produce. Subjective-subject and object. But subject and object is one. So subject and object is one and two. Or that is our understanding. One and many. One and two.

So he want to say is for eyes, there is form; for ears there is sound and voice. But actually, there is no two or-there is no form or no eyes. When you say "eyes," eyes include form. When you say "form," form include eyes. If there is no form, nothing to see, you know, eyes is not eyes anymore [laughs]. Because there is something to see, eyes become eyes. Same is true with ears and nose. Dogen-zenji says, "If there is no river," you know, "there is no ship." Even though there is ship, that is not ship [laughs]. That will be a house [laughs, laughter]. Because there is a river, a ship becomes ship. Same is true with our eyes.

Usually, you know, non-Buddhists why, you know, they become attached to objective world or something they see, is they understand only one way, you know. "Here is something very good," you know, "or sweet. I have to eat," you know. And we understand something exist here without, you know, us-whether we try to eat it or not, the cake exist. That is normal way of understanding. But cake is-become cake because we want to eat it. So we make cake, you know. There is no cake, actually, without us. When we understand in that way, we are not-we are seeing cake, but we are not seeing cake [laughs]. That is how we keep our precepts, you know.

We, you know, we kill some animal. Maybe we may kill some animal or worm or insects or earwigs [laughs, laughter]. But when we think, you know, "I am killing earwigs are here," you know, "many. So this is very harmful one, so I have to kill this one," you know. When you understand in that way, you understand things only dualistic way. So- But, you know, actually earwig and human being is one-not different. Even it is impossible to kill, you know, earwigs. Even though we think we killed it, you know, actually we cannot. It is not possible, even though you smash it [thumps fist on floor or table, laughs], it is still alive. That tentative form of earwig may vanish, but actually whole world-as long as, you know, whole world, including us, is exist, we cannot kill it. When we come to this understanding, we can keep our precepts completely.

But even so [laughs], you know, we should not kill, you know, anything without any reason or with some convenient reason-making some reason why I should kill: "Because," you know, "earwig eats vegetables, so that is why I must kill them." And "It is nothing wrong to kill animals," you know, "so I am killing the earwig."

With this- With some reason, you know, you kill an animal, that is not our way. Actually, when you kill animal, you don't feel so good. That should be, you know- That is also included in your understanding. "Even though I don't feel good, I have to kill. Even though it is not possible," you know, "tentatively I am killing animal." In this way, whole world, you know-something is going in the big world.

So without sticking to any idea of killing or not killing, or without, you know, with some reason why we kill or why we don't kill-if you observe our precept in that way, that is not actual way of observing precepts. How you observe precepts is to have complete understanding of reality is how you don't kill. Do you understand? In other word, how you understand, you know, my lecture is how you don't kill [laughs]. How you practice zazen is how you do not kill animal. In other words, you should not, you know, live in the world of duality only.

We should observe our world in two ways: from-one is from dualistic, you know, way; the other is from the viewpoint of absolute. So, "It is not good to kill," is right. It is not impossible-and "Even though you think you kill, you didn't kill." That is another side. So, you know, even though you break your precepts, you are violent [have violated] your precepts-after doing it, if you feel very sorry, you know-"Oh, I am sorry" [laughs]. If you say "I am very sorry" to the wigs-earwigs, you know, then that is Buddhist way.

In this way, our practice will go on and on and on. You may think, you know, if you-if there is precepts we should observe it literally, or else we cannot be Buddhist. Or, you know, if you feel good when you observe some precepts, that is not Buddhist way-our way. Our way is, you know, sometime we may kill animal. But to feel sorry, that is our way. To feel sorry is included in our precepts. That is how we observe precepts. And, you know, this kind of activity will go on and on and on. And everyone is, you know, involved in this kind of activity. Everything is doing this kind of thing. But way they do-the feeling they have may be-may not be same. One will be, you know- One has no idea of precepts or attainment. The other has trying to make themselves feel good [laughs] by some religion or precepts-observing precepts. That is not Buddhist way.

Buddhist way is, in one word, jiji. Jiji is to-to encourage, you know, to encourage people when they have good feeling and to get rid of their suffering. To help to get rid of their suffering. That is true love. It is not just to give something, or to receive something, or to observe precepts, or to attain something we do not practice our way. We practice our way as things, you know, naturally is-are going. And to follow people, and to suffer with them, and help to relieve their suffering, and to encourage people to go on and on and on. That is Buddhist way. That is how we observe precepts.

So, you know, we see something but we do not see something. We feel always oneness of the subjective world and objecting world. Oneness of eyes and form and color. The oneness of the taste and mouth. So we do not, you know, especially we don't have to attach to something especially. We don't have to feels especially good, you know, because of Buddhist practice. When we practice our way in this way, there-we are all independent. That is what he [Sekito] is talking about.

And:

[Line 23] Shikamo ichi-ichi no ho ni oite,

[Line 24] ne ni yotte ha bumpusu.

Ichi-ichi: "Each dharma." Dharma means eyes, nose, tongue, ears, or form, or taste, small or taste or sounds is-all those things are dharma. "Each being, each dharma has its own-is-has a root which is buddha nature, which is world of oneness," you know, "which is absolute, which is buddha nature. Each being comes out from-from the root like leaves, you know, comes out from the root or trunk."

So we-when we see many things, we should not, you know, just see things as it is, but we should know how each things exist. Because of the root, we exist. Because of the absolute Buddha nature, we exist. When we exist-understand things in this way, we have oneness, you know. When I am here, you are there. When there is man, there is woman, you know. But woman is independent and man is independent. So there is-when something happens, there is always oneness of the subjective world and objective world.

So:

[Line 25] Hommatsu subekaraku shu ni kisu beshi.

Hommatsu- Hom is "root," and matsu is-matsu is "end." "Root and end," we may say, but "both root and end should reduce to-should resume to the original nature."

[Line 26 Sompi sono go wo mochiu.]

"The words we use is different-good words and bad words, good words-respectful word and mean word-but through those words, we should understand-we should understand-the absolute being or source of the teaching." That is, you know, what is said here. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

[Aside:] Are you recording?

[Inaudible answer by tape operator.]

This is okay. Aha.

In one of the-in Bonmo-kyo-Bonmo-kyo is the important scripture of precepts. In Bonmo-kyo it says, "To see-to see is not to see [laughs], and not to see is to see [laughs]." Do you understand? "To see is not to see. And not to see is to see." You know, that is how we, you know, observe "don't act in unchaste," you know, act, you know.

To see a woman [laughs], you know, is not to see the woman [laughs]. To see the woman is not to see the woman. Not to see the woman is to see the woman [laughs]. Do you understand? To eat fish, you know, or meat-to eat meat is not to eat meat. And not to eat meat is not to eat meat [laughs]. To- You understand precepts only one way. "Not to see-not to eat meat" is how you observe precepts. But not to eat, you know, meat is to eat meat [laughs]. You are eating meat.

There is two monks, you know, once travelling together. And there were a big river, where there was no bridge to cross. So they were waiting on the one side of the bank. While they were waiting, a beautiful woman came [laughs]. So they were very much encouraged to cross the river with her. And, at last, one of them, you know, decided, you know, one of them carried her on his back and crossed the river. The other monk, after crossing the river and on the way to somewhere, the other monk became furious [laughs]. "You are," you know, "you are a monk! You violate precepts", you know, "not to see or-a woman. As a monk, it is not so good. Why did you do that?"

The monk who helped [laughs] the lady said, "You are still carrying [laughs] a woman. I forgot about her long long time ago. You are still carrying-you are still violating the precepts" [laughs], he said, you know. Maybe to, you know, it is not completely right to help her, you know, as a monk. It may be, you know, it may not be perfectly right. Even so-even so, as a man-as a-as a-as all human being are our friend, we should help them, you know, even we violate Buddhist precepts we should help her. But if you think about it, you know, uselessly, you know, when there is no need to think about, to think about it, you know, is-is actually violating the precepts.

So to see-to see a woman is not to see the woman. To help her actually is not-actually he is not helping her, you know. When- Just because to help her if you cross [with] her on his back is-actually he is not, you know, helping her. Do you understand? He is not helping her. So not to help her, you know, is to help her in its true sense.

When you are involved in dualistic sense of violating precepts, or man and woman, or monk and layman, that is violating the precepts and [is a] poor understanding of Buddha's teaching. That is why-how we sit, you know. We just sit, without any idea of attain-any idea of attainment, without any idea of doing anything, just to sit is our way. To be involved-completely involved in sitting meditation is our zazen-without any idea of attainment, any idea of waste of time or meaningful, you know, practice. Just to sit is our way. And this is how you keep our precepts.

Sometime we will be angry, and sometime we will smile. Sometime we will [be] mad at people-your friend. Sometime you will give a kind words to them. But, you know, actually what we are doing [is] just to observe our way.

[Sighs.] Okay? [Laughs.] I cannot explain it so well, but I think you must have understood what I mean. Do you have some question? I have some more time. Hai.

Student A: [One-two words unclear] you were talking about just before. But I-I don't feel as though that Buddhism or talk about Buddhism or Sandokai-I don't feel how it's the same as my life or my practice. I feel some separation between what I do-sitting zazen or eating, and so on-and then some talk. And it seems just like maybe talk is about what I've been doing or haven't been doing. But-Somehow it seems like it's-it's like something else. It is way out there.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Way out, yeah. Yeah. Maybe so. I felt in that way [laughs] for pretty long time [laughs, laughter], you know. I think so-I agree [laughs]. You know, it is rather difficult to, you know, to give you actual feeling, you know, by lecture, you know. That is why, you know, the old masters, you know, twisted their [students'] noses or hit at [laughs]-hit at them. "Right here!" you know. "What are you thinking about?" That is- In short, that is the point. I am going round and round the point, you know, so I am using words. We say, "to scratch itchy fingers [toes] on the shoes [with shoes on]" [laughs, laughter]. I am scratching itchy fingers on your shoes. How about it? It doesn't- It doesn't help you so much, maybe. Even so, I have to talk [laughs]. Hai.

Student B: Roshi, when you said that we can't-like when we kill an earwig or any insect or anything like that, when you said that we can't kill it because as long-

Suzuki-roshi: You cannot-

Student B: -as long as everything is here it can't die.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: Does that like say that each moment will always be-each thing will always be that thing, and it's like-

Suzuki-roshi: It is-

Student B: -this lecture will always be this lecture?

Suzuki-roshi: It is so, you know. It is so when you see things, you know, as-it-is, it is so.

Student B: But even- Even if, like, the body of the earwig dies, you're saying that- Well, what happens to the earwig's karma?

Suzuki-roshi: Karma [laughs]?

Student B: Where does the earwig go?

Suzuki-roshi: Earwigs go to the source of the reality [laughs, laughter]. They know where to go [laughs, laughter]. So when we speak in this way, what you will feel [laughs]-but it is something. Just talk, you know. But when you suffer a lot, you know, it will be a great relief to know that. Hai.

Student C: Roshi, what is the difference between you and me?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Ah. There is difference and no difference [laughs]. That will be the answer, you know. That is why, you know, we practice together. And because we are not different we practice. So if one side is missing, we cannot practice. If you are quite different from me, there is no reason why you should practice with me. Because we are same- If we are same, if we are truly same, there is no reason [laughs] why we practice together. Because we are different, we practice our way, and because we are same, originally same, we practice our way. So not different and different. This kind of thing is something which you do not know, you know.

Last-Oh- The teacher Trungpa[2] was referring to this point. Our traditional practice start from this, you know, source of the teaching which is nothing, which is absolute, which is non-duality.

But usually when you practice something, you are attracted [to] something, you know-eyes or nose, taste or form, you know, not by this [may have pointed to the character shu on the blackboard] original source of the teaching. The original source of the teaching is not something which could-can be told, so we say, "tongueless speech." "Tongueless speech." We are talking about something which it is impossible to talk. That is called teisho, you know, not lecture [laughs]. We can explain those words, but by those words we are explaining [that] which is empty. So we call the- words, "the finger pointing at the moon." If you understand what is moon, finger is not necessary anymore. So what you should understand is not-is not my words. But, you know, you should realize by your true experience what we-I mean. So you do n [partial word]- You have- You are blank [laughs], you know, you are blind in-on this point, so you feel I am talking about something, some words, you know, in some sophisticated way. So it looks like very, you know, so-called "Buddhistic way," you know. Buddhistic way is not those words but the thing which we really mean. Hai.

Student D: In killing the earwig, there is no words or memories or anything. There is just the experience of killing the earwig. Is that the teacher that leads to the source-that leads you the experience of the source?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student D: Is the experience of killing the earwig, not the talk about it, the teacher?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. You know, and at that time, you know, you shouldn't feel like Buddhist or good monk or sinful monk, you know [laughs], or violating your precepts. You should, you know-when you are working in the garden, you know, for some purpose you should be involved in that activity completely. Sometime you can-you may be mad at the earwigs [makes humorous growling noise, laughs], you know. But no one can blame you if you, you know-no one can say anything-criticize you. You should have that much confidence, you know. If you are expelled from Tassajara because you killed a-a lot of earwigs [laughs, laughter], you should go, "Okay. I will go." That's all. You-you must have, you know, not confidence-it is more than confidence, you know. You don't have to fight with anyone. If you have that much, you know, understanding in what you are doing, that is good. That is our way.

Student E: When we say that we don't harm sentient beings, or earwigs, or anything else, do we say that because it's impossible to harm them, or because it's wrong to harm them, or both?

Suzuki-roshi: Both, yeah. We should know that is not possible, you know. Why it is not possible not to kill is because that is words. Words cannot reach so-that area. But only when you [are] caught by words, you know, you say "possible" or "impossible." That is how, actually, you live, you know, every day-killing something, sacrificing something. You just apply Buddha's teaching to give you some good excuse, that's all. And you feel good, you know: Very superficial understanding of Buddhism. So both is true, you know. You-We super [partial word]- Even though it is superficial understanding, we cannot help feeling bad when you kill something. You don't feel so good.

But even though you don't feel so good, that does not mean that you are doing something wrong-because you are not killing, actually. But if you, you know, say, "Because I am not killing anything, so it is okay to kill" [laughs], that is wrong because you stick to the words or precepts, which is just words. It is not true heart of Buddha's-true feeling of Buddha.

Student F: Roshi, every animal has a way of living, of eating, of raising its young, of relating to the world, that is in keeping with its particular dharma or the dao of its being. Does not man have a specific and particular way of living, and eating, and raising his young, and relating to each other that is in keeping with his dharma or his dao?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Not absolutely, but, you know, we have to make best effort to keep, you know, dharma. That is, you know, those words. Words is necessary. Even though it is necessary, you shouldn't think this is complete, you know. We should make constant effort to produce new dharma, one after another. Produce new dharma, new precepts.

We say, "this is human life," you may say. But that human life is for today, not for tomorrow. Tomorrow we must have more improved, better way to live. This kind of effort should be continued. That is why we have bad feeling, you know. If we have some bad feeling, it means something. So we should improve our way. And-but you should not expect any perfect dharma, you know, in term of "you should do" or "you shouldn't."

So there is-no one can insist [on] their own way, but we should appreciate their effort to improve our dharma. That is Buddhist way. Does it make some sense [laughs]? Hai.

Student G: Can the true dharma be passed on if the disciple does not surpass the teacher? You say that we must always, every day, improve our way, make the best effort. And I've heard you say, "For the true teaching to be passed on, the disciple must surpass the teacher." Can we carry on the dharma even if we don't surpass the teacher?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. Yeah. "Surpass" [laughs] is also dualistic word, so we shouldn't stick to [laughs], you know-our-I-there is no reason why I-if you surpass my, you know, me, there is no reason why I don't feel so bad or so good, you know. Actually, that-which is better is just words.

Student G: To have the same- I mean, to have the same understanding as the teacher's. The same understanding would be something that would be static or fixed. It wouldn't be something that we're changing. So if we were to have your understanding right now, tomorrow, that would be-what would that be?

Student off-mike: Impossible. [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Not easy, so-even, you know, to create one page of the new dharma is very difficult. Even though you feel you sometime you invented something new [laughing], but Buddha is always waiting, you know: "Come here." But you feel you invented something new, you know. But Buddha is here: "Oh! You come here. Good boy." [Laughs.] " I have some more things for you. Come nearer to me," Buddha will say. So it is very hard to surpass his teaching. [Laughs, laughter.]

Ooo-kay. [Said in mock resignation.] [Laughs, laughter.]

That is more valuable than my talk. [Laughs, laughter.] [May have been speaking to the tape operator or tape recorder itself.] You are very good disciple.

---

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby; City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican 6/5/00.

[1] S.R. said shiki. Derby MS gives iro.

[2] Vidyadhara the Venerable Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche (1939-1987), a Trungpa tulku in the Kagyu lineage. According to an early transcript, he gave a talk at Tassajara the previous evening.

7 - Sandokai Lecture #9

Saturday, June 20, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #9
Tassajara

[The following lines of the Sandokai are discussed in this lecture:

Line 27 Meichu ni atatte an ari,

Line 28 anso wo motte o koto nakare.

Line 29 Anchū ni atatte mei ari,

Line 30 meiso wo motte miru koto nakare.

Line 27 Within brightness actually there is utter darkness;

Line 28 but you should not meet someone just with darkness.

Line 29 Within darkness there is brightness

Line 30 but you should not see others only with the eyes of brightness.]

First I will explain the two terms mei and an, "brightness" and "darkness." Brightness means relative, dualistic world of term and words, you know-the thinking world or visible world in which we live. And darkness means, you know, absolute world where there is no exchange value or materialistic value or spiritual value even-the world our words does not reach-the world our thinking mind cannot reach. Beyond words, beyond thinking there is world. This is the world of absolute-the opposite to the world of relative or dualistic world.

And it is necessary for us who live in realm of-realm of duality to have good understanding of the absolute, which may be the idea of deity or god, usually. But in Buddhism, we do not, you know, have any idea about deity or about god because the absolute is the absolute because it is beyond our understanding or dualistic thinking. But we cannot deny this world of absolute, or a kind of idea of deity.

But as people may say, Buddhism is atheism. Maybe so, you know, because we have no particular idea of God. We know there is, but we don't want to know what it is, because we know that the absolute is absolute because our dualistic mind cannot reach. And we know that our-we know the limit of our thinking mind or intellectuality. Buddhists intellectualize our intellectuality, so we do not say anything about the absolute. But there is. That is what we mean by an. An is, you know, "darkness, utter darkness."

Mei is "sun and moon." Mei-the character mei is-means "sun and moon":

[mei]

This [ari] is-this word-"there is," you know-this is verb "is"-"there is":

[ari]

[Line 27 Meichu ni atatte an ari,

Line 28 anso wo motte o koto nakare.

Line 29 Anchu ni atatte mei ari,

Line 30 meiso wo motte miru koto nakare.]

"Within"-this [chu] is, at the same time, "middle." This is masani[1] [atatte?]-it means that-"actually." "Actually in-within-within brightness, mei, masani, actually, within brightness, mei-chu, and there is darkness, utter darkness." The brightness means relative world, and relative world-"within relative world there is utter darkness."

This is a literal translation. But it doesn't make sense [laughs]-literal translation doesn't make sense. "Within relative world there is-there is darkness." So we must-we must-we must understand the actual meaning of this character ari, "there is." "There is"-"There is"-you know, your-your-when you say "there is," you know, "there is something-there is something on the table, on the earth, or in Tassajara," "there is something in Tassajara or on something [or] in something."

But this-in this case, this ari is different character from another character of ari. This character means, you know, this is-this part of the character ari means, you know, "flesh" or "skin."

[ari, character [Root for [hada, character for "there is"] "flesh"] [2] for "skin, body"]

So already a part of it, you know, not just "there is something," but that the way it exist is closely related to, you know, "something."

So-mei, "brightness and darkness is not, you know, in-in brightness there is darkness. This is more dualistic understanding, but when we use this [ari] character, you know, closer relationship darkness and brightness. Like, you know, I have my skin [laughs]. I have my skin, you may say. You may say, "I have my hand." [Laughs.] Yet your hand is, you know, a part of you. Your skin is a part of you.

So actually, you know, there-it-it is not any more dualistic, you know. You yourself-skin is you yourself; your hands are your hands. But you say-I don't know why-"I have two hands." But hands may say [laughs]-I have-hands, you know, may feel very funny [laughs, laughter]. "Oh, I am, you know, a part of you, you know, and you say you have two hands. What does it mean? Do you mean you have four hands instead of me [two]?" you may say.

So, if possible, I think you must have another character for "have," you know. Chinese people has two characters. When we say, "There is a stone or book or the table," they use another character, zai:

[zai]

And when we say, "We have two hands," we use this character [ari]-[which means] "there is" too:

[ari]

We say "there is," actually, "two hands": nihon te ga arimasu-you know, "there is two hands"-anata ni wa-you know-"you-in you there is two hands," we say. In that case, the character we use is this [ari].

So it means, anyway, the very close relationship between brightness and darkness. And actually darkness itself is brightness, actually, you know. Dark or bright is within your mind, you know, because within your mind you have some standard or degree or measurement, you know, how bright this room is, you know. If it is, you know, usually-unusually bright we say this room is bright. If it is unusually dark, you know, you say it is dark. But it is, you know-you can say this room is bright; at the same time, you c- [partial word-"can"]-someone may say, this room is very dark." Someone who came from San Francisco may say, "Oh, Tassajara is very dark." Someone from-came out of cave, may say, "This Tassajara is very bright, like a capital city." So bright or dark is not-is within ourselves-within. Because we have some standard we say bright or dark, but actually brightness is darkness and darkness is brightness.

So even though we say "utter darkness," it does not mean there is nothing in utter darkness. There is many things. But when you have bright light you will see many things, in term of, you know, Caucasian or Japanese, you know. That's all-man and woman, stone or lamp. This kind of thing exist in brightness.

But when we say da- [partial word] "utter darkness" or "world of absolute," which is beyond our thinking, you may think this is some world which is quite different from our actual human world, but this is also a mistake. If you understand in that way-if you understand darkness in that way, that darkness is not which [what] we mean by darkness.

You prepare, you know, various-you will-I think you are preparing some dishes for Ed-Ed's wedding, you know. You may, you know, dish out various, you know, food in separate, you know-this is dessert, this is salad, soup, you know, in different dishes. That is brightness. But actually, when you eat, [laughs] you know, in your mouth various food will be mixed up. There is no dessert or no soup or no bread. All mixed up in your tummy.

At that time it works, you know. When it is clearly dish out, it is not yet working. It is not actually food [laughs]. Food is, you know, brightness. And when it is in your tummy, you know, it is darkness. But even in darkness there is lettuce and soup and everything in your tummy [laughs, laughter]. Same thing-same thing, you know, changing its form, it start to work.

So utter darkness, actually-things happens in its true sense. In brightness, you know, you feel good and you feel as if you have a big dish, you know, but food is not serving its-their own purpose yet. That is brightness.

So when you don't know what you are doing, actually you are acting fully, with full mindedness-with full mind. When you are thinking, you are not yet, you know, start to work. You are not yet working on it. So actually when we, you know, start to work, there is bright side and dark side. Both dark side and bright side is there. When you are actually practicing Buddhist way, there is bright-bright side and dark side, and relationship between darkness and brightness is this [ari]relationship, like a relationship between skin and our body. You cannot actually say this is skin and this is body.

So-

[Line 28] anso wo motte o koto nakare.

Nakare is "not"- "do not." Motte "with." Anso "dark side, dark outlook." "Do not"- This is o. O means "to meet" or sometime "to treat." "To meet and treat," you know. "To own [?] and treat." Or "to meet and treat," or "to meet and treat someone like your friend."

So you should not treat things just, you know-you should not treat or understand, maybe-O.

This character o-au, "to meet, to encounter," means like, you know, a mountain or like a cloud to meet a mountain. You know, o. Here is mountain, you know, Tassajara mountain. Here is cloud. And cloud from ocean will meet mountains. This kind of relationship is o.

With the understanding of brightness-darkness, you should not meet with things, you know. With understanding of brightness-darkness, you should not meet people. [Laughs.] If you, you know, meet people with blind-with your eyes shut, you know, ignoring your friend, you know-how old is he or how handsome he is [laughs], ignoring all the characteristic of your friend, you should not meet friend. It is because that is just one-sided understanding, because, you know, in the darkness there is brightness. In the darkness, even though you understand the intimacy-intimate relationship between you and your friend. But friend is friend; you are you, you know.

It is maybe one very close relationship, so maybe relationship will be one like husband and his wife. But husband is husband, and wife is wife. That is real relationship. So don't meet your friend without understanding of brightness of duality, you know. Close relationship is dark, you know, because if your relationship is very close, you know, one with him or her, very close, but you are you and your friend is your friend. So you should not meet with someone with the idea of darkness only. So you should not meet someone-someone is, you know, abbreviated [understood]. You should not meet someone with darkness. So means "characteristic" or "outlook."

And this is-and next one [line] is:

[Line 29] Anchu ni atatte mei ari.

This [Lines 29 and 30] is opposite [of Lines 27 and 28]. Masani-an-an is "darkness." Again, this third line [Line 29] repeating same thing in different way. Now "In the darkness there is brightness." Same thing, you know. In the darkness-in the darkness, even, you know, [when] we are in intimate relationship, there is, you know, man and woman, which is brightness, duality of man and woman. So, you should not say, or you should not see the other-see others with the eyes of brightness only, because the other side of brightness is darkness. Darkness and brightness is two side of one coin.

We are liable to be caught by preconceived idea. If you, you know, have-if you experience something bad with somebody-"Oh, he is a bad person. He is always," you know, "mean with me. Always mean with me." That is to say, he, you know, see people with just brightness, you know: "He is always mean." But it cannot be so. You should know why he is so mean with you, because the relationship is so close, you know, so intimate [laughs]. So it is easy for him to be mean with you. It is easy to [be] mad at you, you know. If you are quite stranger, you know, you cannot-he cannot be so angry with you. Because your relationship is so close, so intimate, relationship is not-is more than relationship of the two persons. It is just one.

So when, you know, he is angry [laughs], you will be angry, that's all-because you are one. So when one is angry, the other will be angry. So you-if-when you understand in that way, you understand the other side of the brightness, which is darkness. "Oh! He is so angry with me because he is so close to me." If you understand in that way, even though you have become angry, you will not feel so bad. This is rather difficult, you know. When you think, "He is bad," it is difficult for us to change the idea of "He is bad." But it cannot be so. Sometime he was bad, but now we don't know whether he is good or bad. We should see.

So we should not cling to the idea of darkness or brightness. We should not cling to the idea of equality or idea of diversity or differentiation. But this is pretty difficult. It seems to be pretty difficult. Most people, once he has some grudge with someone, it is almost impossible to change their relationship. But if we are Buddhist, we should be able to switch our mind from bad to good and from good to bad. If you are able to do so, "bad" does not mean bad, "good" does not mean good anymore. But at the same time, good is good and bad is bad [laughs]. Do you understand? [Laughter.] In this way we should understand our thinking-our relationship between-between us.

The-there is some poem: [Tape turned over.]

The mother of blue mountain and the son of-or children of white cloud.

All day long they live together, and yet they do not know who is mother and who is children, you know [laughs].

The mountain is mountain, and white cloud is white cloud floating back and forth, you know [laughs], around the mountain like a children. There is white [blue] mountain, and there is white-there is blue mountain and there is white clouds. There is, but they don't know that they are white cloud or blue mountain. Even though they don't know, they know well-so well that they don't know.

That is the experience you will have in your zazen practice. You will hear insects and stream. Actually you hear it. But you are sitting and stream is running. You are sitting and stream is running. But actually you are hearing it-you hear it. Even though you hear it, you have no idea of stream or no idea of zazen. You are just on the black cushion. You are just there like a blue mountain with white cloud.

Now this kind of relationship [is] fully explained in those four lines [27-30]. The translation goes: "Within-within-within brightness there is darkness. Don't be attached to the darkness," you know. "Within the darkness there is brightness. Don't see-" I forgot. "Don't see with-"

Student A (David Chadwick): Roshi, are you talking about Blyth's translation?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

David: He says the same thing-Blyth.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh.

David: "Don't be attached to the brightness."

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. That is Masunaga's translation. Translation cannot be, you know, perfect. It is difficult, you know [laughs]. You know, it is impossible, you know [laughs]. No words for this kind of expression or ari. Ari means "nothing." "There is" means "there is no." "Brightness" means "darkness." [Laughs.] Then, you know, "brightness" doesn't mean anything if it also means "darkness." [Laughs.] That is why I said "double-edged,"[3] you know. Brightness? Darkness? Which is it? What is it? But there is brightness and darkness.

There should not be any question [laughs] on this point, but if you have some question please ask me [laughter]-if you want to get hit! [Laughs, laughter.]

Student B: Roshi, what about focus?

Focus?

Yeah. Like you say, "The clouds don't know they are the children of the mountain," and vice-versa. But we humans, when we unwrap our oryoki bowls, we focus on doing that, not listening to the stream-a different activity.

Suzuki-roshi: No. Same activity.

Student B: For me it's different.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] That is why you get stuck. [1 word inaudible-"sorry"?]

Student B: If I [1-2 words inaudible] deserve [?] it.

Suzuki-roshi: To you it is different [laughing], that's right.

Student B: I'm not focused, you know.

Suzuki-roshi: When you really focus on it, there is- there is brightness and darkness. When you are thinking, you know, about it, there are two sides. Now you are asking a question, you know. When you ask a question you are thinking [laughs], so, you know, you know, it is hard for me to answer for your question. So I may be very angry with you. This is only one way. [Laughs, laughter.] If you get hit, you will stop thinking about it.

Student B: Probably.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Probably.

Student C: Roshi, why do we shave our heads?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student C: Why do we shave our heads?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] So that you can, you know, your thinking mind can go as smoothly as like this [rubbing his shaved head with his hand][4] [laughs, laughter]. Very smooth. Bright, dark, you know, very smoothly- because, you know, [two words unclear; then makes shhh noise, imitating razor]. To get rid of ornament, you know- unnecessary, you know, we should not have anything which is not necessary [laughs, laughter- a student may have done something]. Some other questions?

Student D: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai. Oh.

Student D: In the Diamond Sutra it says that if you're suffering misfortunes in this life it is because of sins or mistakes you committed in past lives, and that by suffering these misfortunes now, you will work out these mistakes or make retribution for them, you know, atone-atone for these mistakes or sins and open the way for enlightenment. I don't-it seemed like a very heavy load when I read it [laughs], you know. I didn't understand it. I didn't-it added a new dimension [laughs] to my problem [laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: It will help, you know. Because, you know, that you suffer now means, you know, not because someone make you suffer or-but you caused your suffering. So that is why you suffer. If you understand in that way, you have no complaint. And at the same time, we say if you understand only in that way, it is-you understand things this way, you know-you understand your life just from the viewpoint of, you know, suffering or karma, you know, in that way-dualistic way why we suffer. "What should we do?"-like this [gestures?]. That is to be caught by the idea of karma.

Student D: Idea of calm or karma?

Suzuki-roshi: Karma. You are caught by some idea already if you think in that way. So we should be free from that kind of one-sided view, which is this side [gesturing?]. Even though we say "karma," you know, karma doesn't exist. Even is we say, you know, karma doesn't exist, then you may say whatever you do, it's all right, you may say. That is- That means that you are caught by the idea of darkness.

So the real way is like, you know-the other day I said-I told-I discussed-we discussed about earwig [laughs], you know-why we kill earwigs. We have to kill them, but, you know, but you shouldn't say it is all right to kill them, you know. It is not all right [laughs, laughter]. Both, you know. You have to kill it, but it is not all right to kill it. We should understand our activity from both sides. If you don't feel so good, you should make more effort. You should find out how to, you know, how not to disturb earwig [laughs] and protect your vegetables. Even so, you will, you know, you waste too much time. If you waste too much time, Tassajara student cannot eat anything [laughs, laughter]. So anyway, you have to continue, you know, to make-to find out some good idea one after another. That is our way. Hai.

Student E: Roshi, what is the difference between understanding things from both sides, or understanding our activities from both sides, and not understanding things at all-not understanding our activities at all?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh-not understanding at all is [laughs]-no need to talk about. But that is not true, you know. If you tell them-if you see-if you have chance to listen to lecture or listen to-read some books, you will un- [partial word]-we will understand. But to understand intellectually-intellectual understanding is understanding of-hmm-ah, this is difficult to translate- Understanding of- You know, truth-truth is truth. But when you understand truth by your mind, truth which you have in your mind is also true, you know. There is no two truths-only one truth is truth. But the truth which you have-which you understand with your mind is not true with your actual activity or actual feeling or actual life, because our actual life does not go so easily as you understand. You know this is perfectly-this is perfect truth. But for us it is not true [laughs], you know. We cannot act in that way.

So there is two kinds of-way of understanding the truth. One is intellectual truth, which is called honbunjo. Honbunjo. Understanding of original [one word unclear] words-honbun-hon means "fundamental." Bunmeans "judgment"- "truth which is true-which is always true." Whether we understand it or not, truth is true, you know. "We understand," we say, but that understanding is just intellectual understanding. That understanding is right, whether we understand it or not, whether Buddha appear in this world or not, the truth is truth, you know.

But truth for us, actually, is-for Buddha it was true, but for us it is not true, you know. We cannot accept truth as it is, so for us it is not true. So that is truth in our practice. From viewpoint of practice, truth is not always true, so we should not mixed-mix up two truths: truth which is always true [and] truth which is true with Buddha or with some people but not true with beginners. Does it make sense? Hai.

Student F: Reverend Suzuki? Is that difference between- Buddha stressed the difference between samma-samadhi and samadhi. Is that the difference? Being-Suzuki-roshi: Samadhi?

Student F: Samá ,[5] "equanimity," or "right samadhi"-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student F: -and samadhi, which was-

Suzuki-roshi: I don't understand Sanskrit, so-

Student F: Hmm. Samadhi is "truth," and samá is "equanimity" or "right."

Suzuki-roshi: "Equal"?

Student F: Equanimity or rightfulness. And Buddha stressed in his time that many of the religions in his time had attained samadhi-many people had attained samadhi-but Buddha did not accept this samadhi and-until it was set round with equa- [partial word]-a univer- [partial word]-equanimity. Is that what you just said?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah. Yeah. You know, to stress some picture is not our way, you know. We more- We put more emphasis on actual, you know, our actual life. That is practice. That is why we must practice even though we have-all of us have Buddha nature. That is true whether Buddha said [it] or not. That is true. But unfortunately [laughs], you know, for most of us it is not true [laughs]. I don't know why, you know. Hai.

Student G: Roshi, when one comes to see the darkness in the light and the light in the darkness, do they finally become the same thing- darkness and light-or do they always remain separately darkness and light?

Suzuki-roshi: Darkness? No.

Student G: Do they become one-do they become the same thing?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. Yes. Same thing-

Student G: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: -you know, but our lazy mind, you know, separate darkness from brightness, and we seek for darkness. But that is still lazy-to seek for, you know, the mind-to seek for darkness or absolute. So to plunge into the bright brightness, to find darkness in brightness, or to find out buddha-nature in our-in perfect zazen is our zazen. Anyway, whether you are sleepy or not, you know, good students [laughs] or bad students, you should sit. That is only way to have darkness in your bright brightness-dualistic practice.

Okay.

[Bell rings. Chant.]

---

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby and City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (10/16/00).

[1] Masani appears in Line 34; it is possible that Suzuki-roshi was skipping down to that line, per Japanese poetic practice.

[2] From Andrew N. Nelson, The Modern Reader's Japanese-English Character Dictionary, 2nd edition, p. 738.

[3] See SR-70-06-03.

[4] From early transcript.

[5] The student may have been asking about Pali samma as well as Sanskrit samá. The Pali samma means "supreme," "perfect," or "right"; the corresponding term in Sanskrit is samyak. Samá means "equability," "equanimity," or "impeturbability" (Monier-Williams, p. 1152). Samma-samadhi, or "right concentration," is the last link of the Eightfold Path. Samma-samadhi has been defined as "concentration of mind associated with wholesome (kusala) consciousness, which eventually may reach the absorptions (jhana)"-Nyanatiloka, Buddhist Dictionary: Manual of Buddhist Terms and Doctrines, 4th edition, Kandy, Sri Lanka: Buddhist Publication Society, 1980, p. 109.

8 - Sandokai Lecture #10

Thursday, June 25, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #10

Tassajara

[This lecture is concerned with the following lines of the Sandokai:

Meian ono-ono aitaishite,

hisuru ni zengo no ayumi no gotoshi.

(Transliteration by Kazuaki Tanahashi.)

Darkness and brightness stand with each other like when one foot is forward and the other is behind in walking.

(Translation by Suzuki-roshi.)]

Now we are still talking about the reality from the light of independency. Even though we are discussing about independency, we always refer to the dependency-interdependency, so you may, you know, feel as if I am always [laughs] talking same thing. But actually it is not so. We are talking about, you know, independency now, not dependency.

"Dependency and independency," we say, but it is actually two side of the one coin. People say, you know, Japanese people [laughs] are very tough. People may say [so]. But that is the one side of the Japanese, you know, people. The other side is, you know, softness. Should be, but I don't know exactly [laughs]. I hope so [laughs]. But they are very kind. Some people, you know, who visited Japan may say Japanese people are very kind. But some people may say Japanese people are very tough. But for a long time, because of the Buddhistic training, they are trained in that way, you know. Even in children's song, we say, he is, you know, describing hero called Momotaro. Momotaro. Peach Boy. Peach Boy. Do you know Momotaro?

Momotaro was born when an old couple-old couple lived in the riverside. One day, old mother picked up a peach from the stream and came back [to] her home. And from the peach, you know, Momotaro was born.

Momotaro came out [laughs], and he was very strong but very gentle [laughs]-very kind and gentle. But he was very strong. Japanese children sing a song: Ki wa ya sa shi ku te-chi ka ra mo chi.[1] "He was very kind, but he was very strong." That was Momotaro. Not only he was strong, but he was very kind. It is Japanese idealistic character. What do you call? You must have some, you know, some-Student: You'd call him a man you can ride the river with.

Oh. [Laughs.] No. What-

Students: Folk hero. Folk hero.

Huh?

Student: A folk hero.

Uh-huh. "Folk hero." Yeah. Folk hero.

That, you know, unless- Without soft mind, you cannot [be] really strong. That he is strong- Why he is so strong is he has soft mind. If he is just, you know, if he has the other side of the character, he cannot be really strong. Because he is very sympathetic with someone, so sometime, you know, because of sympathy, to help someone, you know, he will be very strong.

But strong person just for himself is not so strong, you know. Strong person who is, on the other hand, very kind will be supported [by] people, and could be a really folk hero, you know. Just strong is not really strong. When we have both soft side and strong side, he could be a really strong.

And, you know, it is easy to, you know, to fight and win, maybe, but it is not so easy to endure when he is defeated, you know, without crying, you know. Let your enemy-not enemy, but let your foe, you know, beat you. "Okay." You know, that is very difficult. Unless you can endure the bitterness of the defeat, you know, you cannot be really strong.

So to be strong means, you know, to be gentle and kind and meek, maybe. If you can be, you know, weak when you- If you are ready to be weak, you are very strong. We say: "Willow tree-willow tree, you know-cannot be broken by snow," we say. Yanagi ni yuki ore nashi.[2] Yuki ore is "snow break," or [laughs] weight of the snow will break, maybe, some strong tree, but tree like a willow cannot be. Even though weight of the snow will bend, will twist the branch, but even heavy snow like we had the year before-last year-you know, cannot break the willow branch. Yanagi ni yuki ore nashi. Bamboo, you know, bend quite easily. Looks like very weak, but no snow can break it. This is always true.

So Meian. Darkness and brightness is opposite. [Someone writes on board.] Oh. [Laughter.] It is better to forget [laughs, laughter]. Better without [laughs]. Meian, you know. Mei is "brightness"; an is "darkness"-absolute and relative. The pair of opposite, you know, here [thumps once on table]. Meian-brightness and darkness.

Hisiru means "to face each other," to be a pair, you know, face [-to-face] with each. "With each other" is ai, and a "face with each other" or "stand with each other" is tai. And this is each and this is each other, and this is stand [presumably pointing to Chinese characters on the blackboard]. Ono-ono means "each other." Ai also "each other." Ai, you know.

Hisiru. Hisiru means "to stand against"-something like that, you know. To fall with [against] [laughs], you know, standing with each other. Hisiru ni. Hisiru ni is "like." Gotoshi is also "like." If you compare, you know, this is "compare." This is like the "foot forward and backward," and "forward and behind." Zen is "forward," go is "behind." "Foot behind and forward and behind"-this is walk, in walking.

This is very good, you know, parable-very good way of explaining oneness or, you know, actual function of the two pair of opposite. This is actually explaining our practice, how we apply, you know, the pair of opposite idea in our everyday life-like zazen and enlightenment, and reality and idea, good and bad, strong and weak-

Uh, can you hear me? Oh. You don't hear me. That's awful. Why don't you come between the two line? Here. [Pauses as students file in.]

The people, you know, when they feel they are strong, you know, they don't, you know, want to be weak, you know. The people who think he is-they are weak, you know, never try to be strong [laughs]. That is quite usual, you know. "I am very weak." [Laughs.] He remains always weak. And he cannot be strong. And people who is strong-who thinks, you know, who think he is strong, you know- For the people who thinks he is strong, it is difficult for them to be weak, you know. But sometime we should be strong and sometime we should be weak, you know. Just if you remain always weak, or if you always want to be strong, then they cannot be strong in its true sense.

When you learn something, you know, you should be able to, you know, teach people. You should, you know, [apply] same effort to teach something. And if you want to teach, you should be, you know, you should be humble enough to learn something. Then you can teach them. Just because you know something-if you try to teach something to others, you cannot teach anything. When you are, you know, ready to be taught by someone, if necessary, then you can teach people in its true sense. So to learn is to teach, and to teach is to learn. If you think you are always a student [laughs], you cannot learn anything. Why you learn is because you have to, you know, teach others after you learn something, you know.

So to observe some morality, you know- Actually, there is no actual moral code, you know, moral standard, but how you find out the actual moral code is when you think, you know, how to teach someone-you will find out the moral code for yourself [laughs]. The moral code is for others, and when you find out some moral code for others, you will have actual moral code for yourself. After Japan was defeated completely [laughs], you know, absolutely surrendered, and before Japan was completely defeated, they thought Japanese people had some, you know, teaching or moral code which they should, you know, observe, and if they only observed that kind of moral code, they will not make any mistake. And their moral code is absolutely right and straight. They thought in that way. But that is-that moral code, unfortunately, [was] something which was written up or, you know, set up in Meiji-first part of Meiji period.

So after losing, you know, the war, after they lost the confidence in their morality, they didn't know what to do, what kind of kind of morals they should observe. They didn't know what to do. But there is- It was not so actually it should-it couldn't be so difficult to find out the moral code. If you- I always said, "You have your children. If you think of your children and how to raise your children, then you will naturally know the moral code for yourself." When you think moral code is just for yourself, that is one-sided understanding. Moral code is rather for others, to help others. And naturally that will-the moral code you will find out, to help others, or how to be kind to others, then that moral code is also for yourself.

So we say, to go heading to east one hundred miles is to go heading to the west one hundred miles. When the moon is high, you know, the moon in the water will be high. But usually people, you know, observe the moon above the water, and they do not see the moon in the water. So when you see the moon deep into the water, you should know that this moon is very high, you know. That moon is deep means that the moon is high. We should have this kind of understanding. So, you know, the moon in the water is independent, you know, but-and also the moon over the, high up on the water, is also independent. But, you know, the moon on the water is the moon in the water too. We should understand in that way. So the moon in the water is independent. The moon over the water is also independent. When you are strong, you should be strong. You should be very tough. But that toughness comes from your gentle kindness, you know. When you are kind you should be just kind, but it does not mean you are not strong.

So ladies are weak, you know, physically weak [laughs]. Because ladies are physically weak, they are strong. Sometime, you know, they are stronger than [laughs] boys are. That is true. We don't know which is stronger. When they, you know, completely independent-they have completely independent nature, which is their own-they are, you know, they have same strength, equal strength, with everyone: absolutely equal strength. When you are comparing, you know, which is stronger, you know-A or B, I or he, you know-then you don't have real strength. When you are completely independent, then-completely independent with your nature, you know-then it means that you are absolutely-absolute power in relative situation. So in relative situation, man and woman, you know, relative nature, there is absolute power. Do you understand? When, you know, woman is involved in competition, you know, with men, they are not so strong. When woman become completely [laughs] woman, they have absolute power. Do you understand this point?

Student: Mm-hmm.

[Laughs.]

So brightness and darkness, although it is pair of opposite, but, you know, it is al [incomplete word]-at the same time, they have equality. For an instance, like step before and forward and backwards-not backwards, forward and back. This is very good, you know, parable to explain- It, it- [Student coughs loudly.] Excuse me. Do you understand, you know, this parable? Absolute and relative is like a step forward and before and back. Step before and back. Step, you know, forward when you walk, you know. Step forward immediately becomes step behind [laughs]. Then, is this step-your right foot is which step [laughs]: before or step behind [laughs]? Which is it? We say "brightness and darkness." But which is darkness and which is brightness [laughs]? It is difficult to tell.

Student: Couldn't tell you the difference.

Mmm.

So step-what does it say here in this [R. H. Blyth's] translation? "Like the foot before and the foot behind in walking." "Like the foot before and the foot behind in walking." "Foot before and foot behind," we say. Foot before and foot behind. But when you're actually walking, you know, there is no step behind or no foot before. Actually walking. If you stop, you know, walking and think [laughs, laughter], right hand sometime maybe foot before and left hand maybe foot behind.

Ohh. Can you hear me? No? Difficult?

And it means that, at the same time, when, you know, when you are walking, it means that actual practice, you know, when you are actually practicing our way, there is no foot before or no foot behind. But if you think about it, you know, there is foot behind and foot before. So when you think, there is brightness and darkness. But when actually practice our way or when actually your foot is walking, there is no, you know, brightness or no darkness or no foot before or no foot behind.

And if I say so, you may think it is not necessary to think about zazen is no good [laughs]. And you should just sit. If you say so [laughs], you are also, you know, caught by idea of this foot is foot before and the left foot is foot behind. Then you cannot walk [laughs] any more. If you forget all about, you know, left hand, left foot, or right foot, you can walk. Actually when you are walking, you have no idea of left foot or right foot [laughs]. If you are aware of right foot and left foot, you cannot walk, you cannot run.

As I said, you know, if you chew your food there is no rice, or no pickles, or no soup [laughs], you know, if you chew it up. And if you mix it. And when you mix it in your mouth, it will be, you know, digested and in your tummy, and food will serve their own purpose. Even so, we should eat, we should, you know, dish out one thing after another, one dish and after another. And dessert should come last. There is some order, you know. Even though there is some order, you should chew it and you should mix it, or else food does not serve its own purpose. It is necessary to think about it, to make recipe, but it is also necessary to mix everything up and chew it up.

[Someone writes on blackboard.]

Meian ono-ono aitaishite,

hisuru ni zengo no ayumi no gotoshi.

This is very good interpretation of the reality and good explanation of our practice-good suggestion. How we practice our way and what kind of activity is going [on] in our everyday life. With this line, the interpretation of the reality from the light of independency [is] finished.

Question/Answer Session

Do you have some question? Hai.

Student A [Mel Weitsman]: Roshi, when you say "independency," I'm confused with whether you mean "independence" or "interdependency."

Suzuki-roshi: "Interdependency." Oh, no. "Independency." Excuse me. Interdependency is more dependency, you know [laughs].

Mel Weitsman: "Independence" is-Suzuki-roshi: Independent-you know, idea of independency and dependency.

Student B: Roshi, in English we have no word "independency." We have the word "independence"-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh! "Independence." "Independence." Excuse me. "Independence" means [laughs] to me, you know, it is not fit, you know, so well. "Independence" means, you know, may be noun, but more-what I mean is, you know, noun, but maybe same thing.

Student C: We have a noun "dependency" so we can have "independency."

Students in background: Right. Yeah.

Student C: We have the other. "Dependency" is a good English word.

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm-mm. And you have no in-

Student C: No "independency." [Laughs, laughter.]

Student B: Now we have an "independency"!

Student D: You limp on one foot.

Suzuki-roshi: One foot. [Laughs.] "Independent" is so strong, you know. So there is no need to have [laughs] so delicate word. [Strikes the table with his stick.] If you are independent [strikes table again], that's all. [Laughs, laughter.] You don't care anything. [Laughs, laughter.] "Shut up!" [Laughs, laughter.] That is not what we mean. So, you know, independent, you know-when you are independent, you know, it is very, you know, vulnerable and weak situation-dangerous, at least.

Student E: Isn't this idea that people get of their own independence a delusion that they get? They don't realize that- [2-3 words inaudible].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Delusion, yeah, actually so. When, you know, when they think, you know, "I am independent," it is not true, you know. You are dependent on everything.

Student F: Roshi, if a woman competes with a man, she's vulnerable? Weak?

Suzuki-roshi: "Weak?" I cannot say "weak," but, you know-

Student F: I was trying to figure out how you can tell the difference between what a woman and what a man's supposed to be.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. More? Excuse me? [Students were talking among themselves. SR is apparently talking to one of them.]

Student G: I'm sorry [laughs].

Student F: You know, like, if a woman competes with a man-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student F: -then she's weak, but how do you know what the man and woman is supposed to be like in the beginning? Anyone?

Suzuki-roshi: Like- Weak, I don't say. If you compete, you know, man and woman, anyway, you know, and the comparing with each other by some standards, setting up some standards, you know, or-in some category you compete, you know. Sometime man will be stronger. And sometime the woman will be stronger. Anyway, you know, you cannot be always stronger-strong. But when you become absolutely, you know, woman, you know, you have always absolute value, because no one take over your position. So you are needed.

Student F: But that's not-that's my question. Is that just mean having children and keeping house?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] [Tape turned over.] [SR and students still laughing] ... big problem now. [Laughs, laughter.] My mistake, maybe. I'll talk with you some other time. [Loud laughter.]

Ahh. Do you have some question? More question? Please ask me something, you know [laughter]. Maybe you couldn't hear me so well [laughs].

Student G: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student G: Roshi, I have some trouble with just the relevancy of your lecture [nervous laughter]. I'd just like you to say one more thing about it; I don't know what. I can't quite see what it's all about. I know you're talking about opposites and things like that.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. [Laughs.] The re [partial word]- Hmm. I am, you know- Purpose of what I am saying is, you know, to open some quite different approach to the reality. You know, you are, you know, observing things just from one side or the other side. That's all. And you stick to some understanding just from one side. That is why I am talking in this way. This is necessary. As a Buddhist- Buddhist has no, you know, strictly speaking, no teaching we have. We don't have any teaching. We have no god or, you know, no deity. What we have is nothingness [laughs]. That's all. We don't have anything. So how can- How, you know, is it possible for Buddhists to be religious, you know? What kind of, you know, what kind of composure we have, you know? It will be the point. You will be- Will be your question. The answer is this kind of understanding of reality, not some special idea of God or deity, but the understanding of reality, you know, which we are always facing to. Where we are? What we are doing, you know? Who is he? Who is she, you know? That is, you know, our understanding of-

When we understand "she" or "he" in this way, we don't need to have any special teaching or idea of God because, strictly speaking, everything is God for us. When we observe things, you know, in this way, everything can be a god for us. So we don't need any special God. Moment after moment we are facing to the God. And each one of us [is] also God or Buddha. So we don't need any special idea of God. That is, you know, maybe the point. Hai.

Student H: Roshi, that sounds very good to me, but then how come we take vows? Like when Ed and Meg got married-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: -you said that they should take refuge in the triple treasure and the, you know, the ten cardinal precepts. And things seemed [1-3 words inaudible].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, yeah. We take vow or we observe precepts. We read sutra. But sutra or precepts-understanding of sutra or precepts should be right understanding like this. If we don't- Even though you read, you know, scriptures or observe precepts without right understanding, you know, that will be the precepts, which is brightness or darkness. So when you are caught by, or when you rely on precepts or scripture, it is not Buddhist scripture any more.

Student H: But then, if- I mean, if I say, "Okay, I'm not going to speak ill of others."

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm?

Student H: Suppose I take a precept that says I won't speak ill of others.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: And, you know, if I follow that precept-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: -it seems like [aside inaudible]- If I don't follow the precept, it seems like there's no reason for it at all, you know, and if I do follow the precept religiously, it seems like, you know, I am being caught by it.

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm.

Student H: I mean, I'd be happy to take the Sandokai as precepts that- You know, I just don't understand. If they're not rigid, they don't seem to be any use at all. And if they are rigid they don't seem to be consistent with the Sandokai and things like that.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student H: I mean, it- I always wondered about that part in the meal chant where we say, you know, "to practice good and avoid evil."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: And I asked you about that once, and you said something to the effect that that means just, you know, pay attention to what we're doing. Don't look around, don't, you know, don't get caught by it.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: But if that's so, I mean, why don't we say that? Why don't we say, "I practice- I vow to," you know, "practice zazen in my everyday life and not be caught by rules"?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: You know, why go through this "good and evil" thing, you know? It doesn't seem- It seems kind of phony.

Suzuki-roshi: Nooo. [Laughter.] You are trying to argue with me, that's all [laughs, laughter]. You need precepts, actually, you know, even though, you know, you shouldn't, you know [laughs]. It is not possible to violate precepts actually. You know, you cannot. But you feel, you know, as if you are violating precepts, you know. Actually, you feel in that way. So, if you actually feel in that way, you should accept your feeling and, if you accept that feeling, then you have to, you know, say something: "Excuse me," or "I am sorry," or something. That is also quite natural. This is, you know, working precepts. This is, you know, dead: "Don't kill" is dead precepts. "Excuse me" is actual working precepts, which is, you know, not foot behind or foot before. Do you understand? If you read precepts [and say or think], "Okay, I will do that," you know, that is precepts. And when you feel you violate it, you may say, "Oh, excuse me." That is quite natural, you know.

Student H: If it were natural-and I feel very natural about some of the precepts-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: You know, I feel just naturally that I shouldn't, you know, talk nasty things about people.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: But sometimes, mmm- [as if to say, "I don't know"]

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.]

Student H: If you said to me, like, not to take harmful drugs? At least sometimes it seems natural to take those things, because they don't seem so harmful. But, you know, I mean, if the precepts were all natural, and, you know, if I just wanted to do it like that-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah.

Student H: -and if it works [?], you know, that's a different thing.

Suzuki-roshi: When you say so, you know, you may say, "It is quite natural for me to live in this world, to be born in this world." You know, it means that. You see? But is it natural? [Laughs, laughter.] [Students commenting off-mike.] Hmm? [Laughter.] You are already accepted, you know, which you shouldn't accept. Why did you come here? That is already maybe big mistake [laughs, laughter].

Student H: They didn't say [1-2 words inaudible] when I came here.

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student H: They didn't ask me about precepts. They just wanted to know if I had $2.50 a day.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, loud laughter.]

Student I [David Chadwick?]: You know, maybe the office should say, "You have $2.50, and are you willing to follow their precepts?" [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Good bargain. Good deal. But it cannot be so, you know, simple. So we- Anyway, you know, you should say, "Oh, I am sorry." That is necessary. If you, you know- When you are born, you cannot say so [laughs, laughter]. But now you can say so [laughs]. So you should say, "Oh, I am sorry to be your daughter or to be your son. Oh, excuse me." [Laughs, laughter.] "Oh, I am sorry I caused you a lot of trouble for you. Oh, excuse me." You should say so. That is actual precepts, you know. Hai.

Student J [Grahame Petchey?]: Roshi, sometimes I feel this way about listening to lectures. And maybe this is somewhat the same question that Stanley was asking. It's like, at one time I was just walking along, and suddenly someone came and said, "Did you realize that when you're walking, when one foot is ahead, the other foot's behind?"

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student J: I said, "No!" [Laughter.] "I hadn't thought about that." And so for a long time, then, that amazed me: You know, that when one foot was ahead the other one was behind.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student J: And I was very aware. "I wonder why he ever asked me such a," you know, "a question like that? Was I aware that when one foot is ahead the other is behind?" And I used to think about it a lot, you know. [Laughter.] One foot ahead and the other behind, and it's always that way, but this was a very strange thing and it occupied my attention: the one foot being ahead and the other behind.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student J: And then after a long time, I found that I was just walking again-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student J: -you know, and then I didn't think so much about that. And then one day as I was walking, another man came up and said, "Did you realize that when you're walking, one foot is ahead and the other is behind?"

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student J: And-it's like, I feel right at that point right now.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: You know, I [laughs]-I still don't understand it at all, you know: That one foot is ahead and the other is behind.

Suzuki-roshi: But-

Student L: I still have to deal with it somehow, you know, that I can't understand what it means. But it's certainly right there.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: And half of me says, "What's the relevance of it?"-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: -because it doesn't bother me any more-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: -and another half of me says, "Yeah but it's still happening like that," you know, "every time you take a step. That's still right there happening."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. You know-

Student L: Do you see what I'm saying?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah. For your, you know, life, you know, if you think just your life only, you know, as a personal practice, you know, it doesn't make much sense. But if you see what we are doing-all human being doing-you know, that is exactly how we cause trouble for human being. You know, right foot or left foot, maybe Rinzai or Soto, or America or Soviet Union, or peace or war, you know. If you understand in that way this is big, big problem, and how you solve it is to walk on and on and on. Hai.

Student M: Do I understand you to say that the problem is how to be aware of all these opposites and polarities and precepts without being conscious of being aware? The consciousness sort of fixes things-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student M: -and that is not real either. It fixes the chain.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Chain will be, you know, fixed, and you cannot move, you know. But still you should move, you know. And time doesn't wait for you. So you should go on and on and on following the reality. If you think about this point, you already started to walk, you know. If you [are] just thinking about it, you know, it doesn't work, and you are not walking forward. But if you think, you know, "The world is going on and on. We are becoming older and older, you know. Today will not come again, and tomorrow I have to go to somewhere," you know. If you think in that way, you know, you cannot think same thing always, one after another. You should go on and on and on. At that time you do not-you cannot stop and thinking.

So anyway, you should go on and on and on, making best effort. When you make best effort, that is actually you are walking. So, you know, left foot sometime may be, you know, behind. Sometime may be forward-ahead. Sometime you feel as if you are doing something good, and sometime you feel as if you are doing something bad. But, you know, in that way, you are going on and on and on. That is, you have to accept it. If you have to accept it, and if you have to live on each moment, actually you are living on each moment. Then you should do something. You should say something. "Say something!" [pats the table with his hand three or four times gently] [laughs, laughter], a Rinzai master maybe say. "Say something now!" [hits the table with his stick once for each syllable]. What do you say? That is, you know, the point.

Student N: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student N: We have an expression in America: "Put your best foot forward." [Laughs.]

Suzuki-roshi: "Best foot"?

Student N: That's what we say.

Suzuki-roshi: Ahh.

Student N: Put your best foot forward. So maybe that's where we get hung up on it. We have to decide which of the two feet we are going to put out because that's the good foot.

Suzuki-roshi: "Best foot forward"?

Student N: Ahh.

Suzuki-roshi: "Best foot forward." [Laughter.]

Student N: Which means you only take one step, you know.

Suzuki-roshi: And next time you may try to "best foot forward" again.

Student N: Then you'll hop [laughs].

Suzuki-roshi: "Best foot forward." That is not actually what we are doing, I don't think, you know. We say, you know, Ashiba motsureru, [3] you know. By thinking, you know, if-when your feet does not go smoothly, you know, it means that you are involved in some idea, and, you know, Ashiba motsureru, you cannot walk smoothly. So if you, you know, if you try to make best foot forward always, your foot will be-will not go smoothly, I think. That will not be best way. I don't know, actually, what do you mean by "best foot forward"? So, this kind of teaching follows actual practice of zazen, you know, in everyday life, so that we can smoothly go [on] and on and on, we have this kind of idea. Without being caught by right foot of left foot. Right or wrong. Good or bad. Without confused, you know, disturbed way of footing-footwork. Smoothly you should go. That is our purpose of practice.

Mmm. I have no time any more. Excuse me.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (11/21/00).

[1] Momotaro is a classic nursery song of Japan. The lyrics are found, for example, in We Japanese, p. 322.

[2] Yanagi = willow; ni = [?]; yuki = snow; ore = broken piece (of twig); nashi = [?].

[3] Ashiba = foot; motsureru = tangled.

9 - Sandokai Lecture #11

Saturday, June 27, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #11

Tassajara

[The following lines of the Sandokai are discussed in this lecture:

Line 33 Bammotsu onozukara ko ari,

Line 34 masani yo to sho to wo iu beshi.

Line 35 Ji sonsure ba kangai gasshi,

Line 36 ri ozure ba sempo saso.

(Transliteration by Kazuaki Tanahashi.)

Line 33 Everything--all beings--have their own virtue.

Line 34 You should know how to apply this truth.

Line 35 Things and emptiness are like a container and its cover fitting together,

Line 36 like two arrows meeting head-on.

(Translation by Suzuki-roshi.)]

[Begins with indecipherable whisper.] Today's lecture will be about how we observe everything-how we understand everything and how we should treat things-with what kind of understanding is the-will be the purpose of tonight's lecture. Everything has the-[sudden loud feedback from the sound system. Suzuki-roshi stops speaking. Whispering exchange takes place about the sound system.] Oh. Okay.

Before I talk about the value of things or how we understand things, we should-I think I must explain those words [referring to the text on the blackboard].* The important words here is-this is, you know-bammotsu is "myriad of things." It means "many things," "all things." [Ari means]* "has." [Onozukara means]* "naturally"- "naturally." [Ko means]* has "function" or-this ko means "function" or "virtue."

Because, you know, if something has some function, you know, that function will be virtue for us-value, you know, exchange value. Or-value as a, you know-mostly we-when we say "value" it is exchange value, but this value [ko ] means more-it-a wider meaning. This has more wider meaning, you know. The ko-this ko- Ko is not [exactly?] function or-utility [searching for word and seemed to find it in "utility"]. So utility is more like value, you know. But it means more-it has more wider sense.

Ahhh. I don't know what to s- [partial word-"say"?]- [Laughs.] Funct-[partial word-"function"?]-ko. Ko is- It is sometime- It may be "merit," you know. Sometime it may be someone's-what someone did, you know, in his life or in our society or in our small society or community. Ko. This word include those things like virtue or utility, or some merit, or some deed. Everything has its own, you know- Because this [bammotsu] is-this "everything" include human being, and mountain and river, and stars and suns [planets]* and fixed stars- Everything. It include everything. So function of-. Its function is, you know- Everything has function. Because of this function, that function will be for us value or virtue.

So this is, you know- This function- When we say "function"-function, you may wonder, "function of what," you know? Function of something. That something could be ri.

And we must crit- [partial word]- I have to use many technical terms tonight, so [laughs] I want to explain, first of all, those technical terms I have to use. For an instance, you see something. You see- Oh. [Laughs, laughter. The sound system is suddenly turned up and Roshi hears his own voice coming back from the loudspeakers.]* You hear [laughs, laughter], you know, voice, you know. But this voice is, you know, will be- You say you are listening to me, but you actually what you are listening to is maybe my voice, or you are listening to some function of, you know, electricity or machine, you know. That machine, you know- The electricity will be the function of something, you know, function of some universal, you know, entity of electric, you know-electricity which covers almost all-whole world, whole universe.

So actually you are not listening to me, you know, you are listening more like listening to our universe-univer- [partial word]-voice of universe, maybe. Voice of electricity. This is, you know, one understanding of my lecture. And another understanding will be, you know, you are listening to my nature, you know, what kind of nature I have. And you are listening to the nature of electricity. So when we, you know-when you see something or when you listen to something, already you have idea of whole universe. It is so-called-it, maybe- When we, you know, understand things in that way, we call it understanding of tai. Tai means "body." Body. But it is more ontological, you know, big body which include many thi- [partial word-"things"?]-everything.

And its nature is sho.[1] But that sho does not mean some special nature. It means nature of everything-basic nature for everything. And when we understand things more than-something beyond our words, we call it ri, "truth." Truth is not- Truth, when we say "true character," you know, it is something beyond our idea of good and bad, long and short, right or wrong. That is ri, which, you know, include various meaning of things.

Ko -and we have another word here, yo. This word [yo ] is used-related to ri. And this word, yo or ko [it appears that Suzuki-roshi corrected himself and decided on ko ], is related to things-virtue of things-and this [yo? ] is application of the truth, you know.

Looks like same, you know. Ko is "virtue," you know. Yo is, you know, "usage." But when we say yo, it is more function of truth or ri. When we say ko, it is function of things-each things-each thing [ji]. This is- Of course, we sometime we use it for, you know, for many things, but mostly here, we-in Buddhist technical term, this is-this word [yo] is related to ri.

And here [in Lines 33 and 34]* we-he is talking about oneness of yo and ko (virtue of things). "And the truth applied itself to each occasion and every thing."

Mmm. It doesn't [laughs] make much sense [laughs, laughter]. Maybe I will translate it literally: "Ea- [partial word]-Everything-all things-has- There is virtue in all being-myriad." This [bam] is myriad. This [motsu] is "things." "Many things." "There is their own virtue in many things."

You should say-masani [2] means "you should." "Should," you know. This [iu] is "say." And its application [yo ] and the place [sho]. "You should say"-here it says "say," but it means "you should see," you know-"see" and "say." "You should notice." When you notice something, you will say [something], so same thing.

"You should say," or "You should notice its application and where the truth is applied." So if you see things, you should know there-there is-true teaching is revealing itself. And you should see it. And, you know, in what w- [partial word]- Sho means "place." "In," you know, "in what place the truth revealing itself."

Hmm. And sometime we use this word [ko] and this word [yo] together: koyo. Ko means, you know, "function." And yo is its utility. Koyo means, you know- When we say koyo, we understand each things [ji ]. And not only each things, we understand background of each things, which is ri. So we do not understand things just as you see [them]. You-we understand background of each things.

And we should know how you use it, you know. To know how you use it is to know the teaching. When you know the background of things, or way things are going, that is ri-way things are going. Then you will know how to use it.

So "to understand things" means to understand background of everything. And to understand value of it means to understand how you use it in right way-how-and according to the place-according to the place-according to the things-we should know how you use it. To know how you use it is to know the background of each things. That is to see things-as-it-is, you know.

Usually, to see things-as-it-is, means, you know- Usually, even though you say, "I see things-as-it-is," you don't. You see the one side of the truth, or one side of the each reality-one side of the reality, not the oth-[partial word-"other"?]-background. You don't see the background, which is ri. You only see things in term of ji-each event, each things-and you think each thing exist in that way, but it is not so. Each things are changing and related with each other. And each things has its background. The reason why- There is reason why they are here.

So to see things-as-it-is means to understand ji and ri is one, and distinction and equality is one, application of the truth and the value of the things is one. When we understand in this way, we understand things-as-it-is. So we, you know-for an instance, we thinks, you know, all universe is for human being [laughs]-only for human being. That is not right understanding, you know. That is very selfish understanding.

Our understanding is mostly based on, you know, human-centered idea. So you don't see true value of the things. You don't appreciate the true value of things. Nowadays we talk about, you know-our idea is more-became wider. Our way of understanding things are more free and wider. But even so, our understanding of things is very human-centered understanding.

So you have many questions [laughs] to ask me. If you understand this point clearly, there is not much things to ask. Most of the questions and problems are, you know, created by human-centered selfish idea. "What is birth and death?" you know [laughs]. That is already very self-centered, you know, idea. Of course, birth and death is our, you know, our virtue [pointing to ko].* To [laughs]-to die is our virtue; you know. To come [in]to this world is also our virtue. And there we see, you know, how things are going: not only us: everything is going in that way-birth and-appeared and disappeared, and became older and older, or growing bigger and bigger. In that way, everything exist. Why our-should we, you know, treat ourselves specially [laughs]? Birth and death. When we say "birth and death," is mostly birth and death of human being. When you, you know, understand birth and death as, you know, birth and death of every things, including plants or vegetables or trees, you know, it is not anymore a problem. If it is problem, it is problem of everything, including us. If that is problem of everything, it is not problem anymore [laughs, laughter].

So every-almost all the question comes from narrow understanding of things. So it is necessary, you know-to understand things in this way: more wider sense, more clear understanding is necessary. You may think to talk about this kind of thing doesn't help you at all [laughs, laughter]. It will not help you [laughing] as a selfish, you know, human being. It will not help any selfish human being. Buddhism does not-do not treat human being in special category. When we treat human being in a special category, we treat human being who has very egoistic deluded being [laughs]. That is human nature.

But you accept, you know, actually. You do not reflect on our human nature and try to, you know, find out some truth-try to find out some confidence in yourself. But that is not possible, because background is wrong.

So here [Bammotsu onozukara ko ari] we say, "everything-all being-has its own virtue." So human being should be in the place where we are. [Writes on board.] Sho. Tokoro.[3] "Place."

And human being has some nature. So according to the nature, we should live like human being. Only when we live like human nature [being] who is-who has selfish human nature, you know, it means that you are following the truth in its greater sense, because we count [take into account?], you know, our nature in our judgement. So we should live like human being. That is how we should live in this world. So we cannot-we should not try to be a cats or dog, which has, you know, more freedom [laughs] and [are] less selfish. Human beings should be put in a cage or [laughs] invisible, you know, big cage, when dog and cats is-has no special cage of morality or, you know, teaching or religion. They don't need any religion. But we human being need religion. We human being should say, "excuse me" [laughs], but cats and dog don't need to say "excuse me." So human being should follow our way, and cats and dogs should follow their way. This is, you know, how we should apply our-the truth for everything.

Although, you know, if we, you know, observe human way and cats and dog observe animal way, it looks like human way and animal way is different. Why it is different is because we human being has different nature from animal and different form from animal. Although it is different, but background of our nature is same. Because, you know, the place we live-where we live-is different-so application of the truth should be different. Like we use electricity, you know. We will use it as a light, you know, and sometime as a speaker. But when you use electricity, according to the usage of the electricity, you know, the mechanism should be different.

So human being has its own mechanism, and animal has its own mechanism. So, you know, even though way of using it is different, but we are all using same electricity. So is the application of the truth. This is actually what he is talking about-Sekito is talking about.

So we should not attach to the difference of the usage because we are using same nature, or same thing-same true nature or buddha-nature. So we are doing actually same thing. So time and-according to the situation, we will use buddha-nature in different way. That is how we apply-how we find out the true nature in-within ourselves in everyday life.

Next two-oh [adjusts mike]-next two line:

Ji sonsure ba kangai gasshi,

[ri ozure ba sempo saso.]

Ji means-I explained already ji-"various things and events," and including things you have in your mind-"things you think about" is ji. Ri is "something beyond your thinking or beyond your understanding or perception" is ri. And again, ji and ri is same thing.

When we think about [something], we are think[ing] about this [ji?]. So actually, it doesn't- Same thing, but we must understand in two ways. We should not-our understanding limit in this area of ji.

Now, Ji sonsure ba kangai gasshi. Ji-when we see-where there is ji, things, there is ri, like cover [gai] and its container [kan], you know, meet together. Ri is, you know, understood in this sentence [Line 35]. "Where there is ri-there-ji-there is ri, like cover and-container and cover meet." [4] It means that where there is someone, you know, that I am here means that the true buddha nature is here. So I am, you know, tentative expression of buddha nature, and- I am not just "I," you know. It is more than "I." I am expressing true nature in my own way, so that I am here means that all whole universe is there [here], like that there is lamp [referring to the kerosene lamp on the altar],* there is kerosene oil. That there is ri, or where there is ri, there is ji. Ji is understood in this line: ri ozure ba sempo saso. Ri ozure ba.

Ri means-I already explained. Ri ozure ba. When ri accord with the event-"the way ri accord with ji " (events or things) "is like two arrow meet together." And there is old story for this. [5] There were-in China, in old China, in War Period, [6] there were famous-famous archery master [Hiei]. [7] And his disciple, Kisho, [8] you know, were-was also very good at-in archery [laughs]. And his disciple, you know, became very ambitious, and he [laughs] wanted to compete with him [Hiei]. And he was waiting for his master's coming with bow and arrow like this [demonstrating].* Seeing his disciple, you know, the teacher also, you know, took the bow and arrow and hit-tried to hit first [laughs], but both of them are so good and quick that arrow meet against [each other] in the air. Shhht! [Laughs.] [Tape turned over.]

That, you know, that I am old, for an instance, there is some reason [laughs]. Without reason, I do not become old [laughs]. And without reason, you know, I cannot be-I couldn't be youth, you know, a boy. With same reason, I became old, you know, so we cannot complain why I became old [laughs]. The background of, you know, my being old is the background of my being raised up as a youth-as a beautiful boy [laughs, laughter]. If I should complain, I should complain when I become a, you know, good youth and see a beautiful girl [laughs]. I should complain at that time also, because, you know, background of my being old is always same, you know. We-we-I am supported-I have been supported [by] same background, and I shall be also supported [by it] even [when] I die. [Laughs, laughter.] That is, you know, our understanding.

When you, you know- To accept things, you say, looks like very difficult, but it is not difficult. It is very easy to accept things-as-it-is. Very easy. If it is not easy, if it is difficult, "Why it is difficult?" you should think, you know. Maybe, you may say, it is because of your shallow, you know, selfish understanding of yourself. But you say-you may say why [do] we have selfish understanding of things? But selfish understanding of things is also necessary. Because we are selfish, you know, we work hard. Without selfish understanding, we cannot work.

So we need some candy [laughs] always. That candy will be selfish understanding. It is not something to be rejected, but it is something which helps you always. So, you should be, you know, grateful for your selfish understanding which create [laughs] many questions. That is just question. It does not mean much [laughs, laughter]. You can enjoy question and answer, you know [laughs, laughter]. You can play j- [partial word-"joke"?] play game with it, but you shouldn't be so sincere about that. That is understanding of middle way.

The understanding of middle way could be understanding of ri, emptiness, and understanding of somethingness, which is ri [ji]. And both is necessary, you know, because we are human being and we-our destiny is to live for maybe 80 years or 90 years as a human being, so we must have some selfish, you know, way of life. Because we have selfish way of life, we will have difficulties, at the same time, which we should accept. When you accept, you know, in that way, it is middle way. You don't reject it. You accept it, but you don't stick to it, you know. You just enjoy it-enjoy your human life as long as you live. That is middle way, you know. That is understanding of ji and ri.

So, when there is ji, there is ri; when there is ri, there is ji. To understand in this way is to enjoy our life without rejecting problems or suffering.

Suffering, you know- I noticed something, you know, very important, which I did not put emphasis on it so much so far. Suffering is very valuable thing, I think. Our zazen practice should be, you know-I understand today, when I was talking with someone-discussing with someone, you know. Our practice may be-could be, you know, suffering-practice of suffering. How we suffer will be our practice [laughs]. It helps a lot.

I think most of us has suffering, as you have pain in your legs when you sit. In everyday life, you have suffering. Bishop Yamada[9]-do you know him? Perhaps some of you may know him. His- He put emphasis on unshu, which Hakuin-zenji practiced for a long time.[10] He was weak. He suffered consumption when he was young, and he conquered the illness by zazen practice. His zazen is called, you know, unshu. Unshu means to-when you take breathing, you do groar-what [how] do you say-"m-m-m-mmm"?

Students: Groan?

Suzuki-roshi: Groan? M-m-m-mmm. When you suffer, you know, you say "m-m-m-mmm" [laughs] or "m-m-m-mmhh."

Students: Sigh?

Suzuki-roshi: No, not sigh.

Students: Moan?

Suzuki-roshi: Moan-no. More strength-like a tiger in pain.

Students: Roar? Growl?

Suzuki-roshi: Growl? [Laughing.] He always said when you-your breathing should be like breathing you when you suffer. M-m-m-mmm, m-m-m-mmm. [Laughs, laughter.] Instead of saying "m-m-m-mmm, m-m-m-mmm," [laughs, laughter] he said you should put more strength here [pointing to hara]* and take long exhaling like [demonstrates exhale], without saying "m-m-m-mmm," you know. You know, when you say "m-m-m-mmm, m-m-m-mmm"-when you say "mmm" it is not unshu. But when you don't say like the last alphabet [letter] of Sanskrit, "mmm," you know, "m-m-m-mmm." So he is- Hakuin called it unshu. When you repeat this unshu like you suffer from something, physically or mentally, and you-your practice is directed just to suffer[ing] you have, then that is-can be a good practice. It does [is] not different from shikantaza.

When you, you know, you suffer just from-by here [pointing to his chest and panting]*-this is, you know, agony, you know. When you suffer completely, you should suffer from "m-m-m-mmm." You feel good, you know, when you do that [laughs, laughter]. It is much better than to say nothing or just to lie down.

Bishop Yamada, you know, had from his-he has had always difficulties until quite recently. He became-he, you know, is, maybe, over the cloud,[11] you know [laughs]. So maybe when he was in America, he suffered a lot in Los Angeles [laughs, laughter]. He suffered. But I have-at that time, I have not much suffer, you know-suffer from, so I couldn't understand-I couldn't agree with his practice of unshu, like, you know, a sick person [might]. "M-m-m-mmm." [Laughs, laughter.] "What is that practice?" I thought. [Laughs, laughter.] "M-m-m-mmm, m-m-m-mmm." But I found out, you know, why he practiced that kind of practice. And I found out that that practice helps us a lot. Of course, he understood, you know, what is suffering. No one likes suffering, but our destiny is to have suffering. That is human destiny. And how we suffer is the point. No one enjoys suffering, but we should not be completely caught by suffering. We should know how to suffer our human suffering. That may be Bishop Yamada's practice.

So, to find out oneness of ji and ri, oneness of joy and suffering, oneness of joy of enlightenment and difficulty of practice is, in one word, our practice which is called "middle way."

Mmm. Do you-did you understand [pointing to Lines 35 and 36]?*

You may say, when there is suffering, there there is joy of suffering, or there there is nirvana. When even you are in nirvana, you know, you cannot be-get out of suffering. That is true nirvana. Buddhist nirvana is something like that. In suffering there is nirvana. That is true understanding of nirvana. "Extinction of-complete extinction of desire," we say, but what does it means by-by it is to have complete understanding of it and to live accordingly. That is zazen, you know. You are like this [sitting upright]. You are not this way-this side of-leaning over [to] the side of nirvana, or leaning against the side of the suffering. Right here. That is our zazen. So everyone can sit, you know, [everyone can] practice our zazen.

Mmm. No time to have question and answer. Ah, maybe.

I am talking about-I am following his poem one by one, or-so-it is-but actually it is necessary to read from beginning to end, you know, like this. If you talk about [it] piece by piece, it doesn't make much sense.

But next lecture will be the something like conclusion of all the lectures we-I gave. He is very strict, you know, in the conclusion [laughs]. Very strict. You cannot escape from him. [Makes humorous noise.] You cannot say anything [laughs]. If you say something you will get a big stick, that's all [laughs, laughter]. [Makes another humorous noise.] At [In] his time, you know, the Zen world was too noisy, so he became angry with it. "Shut up!" [laughs]-that is what he said, actually, in one word [laughs]. So I shouldn't talk so long. Maybe already too long [laughs]. Excuse me.

-----

Sources: Contemporaneous typescript and notes by Marian Derby; City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican 6/1/00.

* From the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby.

* From the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby.

[1] Marian Derby's transcript has a margin note stating: "NOT THE 'SHO' IN THE TEXT," which means "place" in Line 34 (masani yo to sho to wo iu beshi).

* From the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby.

[2] David Chadwick's manuscript on the Sandokai states that beshi means "should," and masani means "actually," "properly," or "naturally." The Random House Japanese-English Dictionary states that masa ni means "exactly" or "really."

* From the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby.

[3] tokoro: place, part, address.

[4] Hence, "Where there is ji there is ri, like container and cover meet."

* From the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby.

[5] The full story of two arrows meeting in mid-air is found in The Book of Lieh-tzŭ (Ch'ung-hsu chen-ching, or True Book of the Expanding Emptiness): (A. C. Graham, trans., London: John Murray, 1960, pp. 112-113). This collection of stories and essays is attributed to Lieh-tzu, a Daoist philosopher from the Warring States Period, but its written form may date from as late as 300 C.E.

[6] The Warring States Period extends from 430 to 221 B.C.E.

[7] Hiei (Ch. Fei Wei). A written annotation in Marian Derby's transcript gives the Japanese version of his name as Higi.

[8] Kisho (Ch. Chi Ch'ang).

[9] The late Reirin Yamada was Soto Zen bishop of North America from 1960 to 1965. He led several sesshins at Zen Center.

[10] Hakuin-zenji (1689-1769) was an important Japanese Zen master who revitalized and systematized the Rinzai school. His breathing practices are described in the autobiographical essay "Yasenkana," reprinted in Trevor Leggett's The Tiger's Cave (London: Rider and Company, 1964, pp. 142-156).

* From the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby.

[11] Perhaps meaning "over his suffering."

* From the contemporaneous transcript by Marian Derby.

10 - Whole-Body Zazen

Sunday, June 28, 1970

Whole-Body Zazen
Tassajara

You should sit zazen with your whole body; your spine, mouth, toes, mudra. Check on your posture during zazen. Each part of your body should practice zazen independently or separately; your toe should practice zazen independently, your mudra should practice zazen independently; your spine and your mouth should practice zazen independently. You should feel each part of your body doing zazen separately. Each part of your body should participate completely in zazen.

Check to see that each part of your body is doing zazen independently. This is also known as shikantaza. To think, "I am doing zazen" or "My body is doing zazen" is wrong understanding. It is a self-centered idea.

The mudra is especially important. You should not feel as if you are resting your mudra on the heel of your foot for your own convenience. Your mudra should be placed in its own position.

Don't move your legs for your own convenience. Your legs are practicing their own zazen independently and are completely involved in their own pain. They are doing zazen through pain. You should allow them to practice their own zazen. If you think you are practicing zazen, you are involved in some selfish, egotistical idea.

If you think that you have some difficulty in some part of your body, then the rest of the body should help the part that is in difficulty. You are not having difficulty with some part of your body, but the part of the body is having difficulty: for example, your mudra is having difficulty. Your whole body should help your mudra do zazen.

The entire universe is doing zazen in the same way that your body is doing zazen. When all parts of your body are practicing zazen, then that is how the whole universe practice zazen. Each mountain and each river is going and flowing independently. All parts of the universe are participating in their practice. The mountain practice independently. The river practices independently. Thus the whole universe practices independently.

When you see something, you may think that you are watching something else [outside yourself].[1] But, actually, you are watching your mudra or your toe. That is why zazen practice represents the whole universe. We should do zazen with this feeling in our practice. You should not say, "I practice zazen with my body." It is not so.

Dogen-zenji says, "Water does not flow, but the bridge flows." You may say that your mind is practicing zazen and ignore your body, the practice of your body. Sometimes when you think that you are doing zazen with an imperturbable mind, you ignore the body, but it is also necessary to have the opposite understanding at the same time. Your body is practicing zazen in imperturbability while your mind is moving. Your legs are practicing zazen with pain. Water is practicing zazen with movement, yet the water is still while flowing because flowing is its stillness, or its nature. The bridge is doing zazen without moving.

Let the water flow, as that is the water's' practice. Let the bridge stay and sit there, because that is the actual practice of the bridge. The bridge is practicing zazen; painful legs are practicing zazen; imperturbable zazen is practicing zazen. This is our practice.

-----

Edited by Bill Redican from the original transcript; no tape has been located. Only minor editorial changes were made by Redican (e.g., punctuation, spacing). No words were substituted or deleted from the original transcript (10/16/00).

[1] In parentheses in the original transcript.

1970 juli (12)

1 - Sandokai Lecture #12

Saturday, July 04, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #12 "It Is Not Always So"
Tassajara

[This lecture is concerned with the following lines of the Sandokai:

Koto wo uke te wa subekaraku shu wo esu beshi.

Mizukara kiku wo rissuru koto nakare.

Sokumoku do wo ese zumba,

ashi wo hakobu mo izukunzo michi wo shiran.

(Transliteration by Kazuaki Tanahashi.)

If you listen to the words, you should understand the source of the teaching.

Don't establish your own rules.

If you don't practice in your everyday life as you walk, how can you know the way?

(Translation by Suzuki-roshi.)]

Tonight and tonight lecture and one more lecture will be the last concluding lecture for Sandokai.

And here it says Koto wo uke te wa subekaraku shu wo esu beshi. Koto means "the first character." We read from this side, you know: Koto wo-Koto? Koto wo uke te wa. Koto means "words." Uke te wa: "to receive" or "to listen to"; "to receive," you know. This is something like "hand," you know. The same type [?] character-"to receive." If you receive words, it means that if you receive teaching, you should-subekaraku-you should-subekaraku-should-you should.

Shu wo-shu is "source of the teaching"-shu-source of the teaching which is beyond our words. Esu beshi is "to have actual understanding of it." So if you listen to the words, you should understand-e-understand- shu-source of the teaching. Usually we, you know, stick to words, and it is difficult, because we stick to words, it is difficult to see the true meaning of the teaching. So we say, "words or teaching is finger pointing at the moon." If you stick to the finger pointing at the moon, you cannot see the moon. So words is just-to suggest the real meaning of the truth is the words. So we shouldn't stick to words, but we should know actually what the words mean.

At his time, you know, at Sekito's time, many people stick to words-or each one's, each Zen masters [taught] personal characteristic of Zen. Each masters had, at that time, their own way of introducing the real teaching to the disciples. And they stick to some special teachers-some particular way, so Zen was divided in many schools, and it was very hard to the student [to know], "Which is the true way?" And actually, to wonder which is the true way is already, you know, wrong. Each was, you know- Each teachers is suggesting the true teaching by his own way, so each teachers, you know, true- Each teachers is suggesting same truth-same source of the teaching which was transmitted from Buddha. Without knowing the source of the teaching, to stick to words was wrong, and actually that was what the teachers at his [Sekito's] time was doing, or students' way of studying Zen.

So he [Sekito] said-he says, "If you receive words, you should understand the source of the teaching." Source of the teaching is the teaching which is transmitted from Buddha and which is beyond each one's own way of expressing the teaching or suggesting the teaching. Do you- Oh.

Student: Roshi, can't see.

Okay. They cannot see. All right.

Words. Words. Koto. [Someone writing on blackboard.] We go this way. You know, this is Chinese character, and we read-Japanese people read from here to here [laughs]-opposite way. This is "words." This is words. Koto wo uke te wa subekaraku shu wo esu beshi.

And next sentence is, Mizukara kiku wo rissuru koto nakare. Mizukara kiku wo rissuru koto nakare. "You" is understood. "You should not": nakare is "not," "should not." Rules: kiku means "rules." Rissuru is "to establish." Mizukara: "by yourself." "You should not establish rules for yourselves." It means that you should not establish, you know, some rules for yourself, and you should not stick to it or you should not [be] bound by it. [Laughs.] That is most people-what most people does. You say, "This is right" and "This is wrong." And [laughs] you say so-when you say so you establish some rules for yourself [laughs]. And because you say so [laughs], naturally you will stick to it and you will be bound by it.

That is, you know, why Zen school-Zen teachers, you know, divided in many ways: Soto, Rinzai, Obaku, Ummon, Hogen, Igyo, you know. There are many schools. But originally it is one teaching. But they establish, you know, or their disciple establish one school and stick to their "family way" and bound by their family way. That is how Zen school is divided in many schools. Why Zen school is divided in many branches is because they stick to words. When they understand Buddha's teaching, they understand the Buddha's original teaching in their own way [laughs] and stick to their understanding. And they think that is Buddha's teaching. In other words, they stick to, you know, fingers pointing at the moon. And if three people are pointing at the same moon, you know, three people have [laughs]-each person has his own fingers and if this is teaching there are already three schools. But the moon is one [laughs, laughter]. So he [Sekito] says, "Don't," you know, "establish his own rules for yourself."

Nakare means "do not." Mizukara is "for yourself" or "for himself." Kiku is "rules." This is very important in our practice. We are liable to establish our rules. "This is," you know, "rule of Tassajara," you may say [laughs]. But rules is the finger to, you know, to have good practice in Tassajara according to the situation. So actually rules are important, but you should not think this is the only, you know, way, this is the true teaching, or-and that rules, you know, they have is wrong. You shouldn't understand in that way. In everyday life, it is true, you know. You shouldn't stick to your own understanding of things. Something which is good for someone is not always good for someone else, so you should not, you know, make special rules for everyone. But even so, rules are important. It is important, but when you stick to it and when you force the rules to others too much, it is, you know, to establish rules and to force the rule for others.

So when you, you know, enter monastery, anyway, once you enter some monastery you shouldn't say, "This is my way" [laughs]. If you come to Tassajara, you should obey Tassajara's rules. You should not establish your own rules for yourself. What you should do at Tassajara through Tassajara rules to see the actual moon is, you know, how you practice zazen at Tassajara. Rules is not the point. The actual teaching the rules will catch is the point. So observing rules naturally you will understand what is the real teaching.

So this is, you know- From the beginning, this point is maybe missing in almost all of us. Most of the people, you know, start to study Zen to know what is Zen. This is already wrong. It is the first step to, you know, to- It means that he is always trying to provide some understanding or rules for himself.

The way you study Zen is like-you should be- The way you study Zen should be the way a fish, you know, pick up its food [laughs], you know [laughs]. They do not try to catch anything, you know. They are just swimming around. And [laughs] if something good come-snap! [Bites teeth together.] [Laughs, laughter.] While you are following Tassajara rules, you know, even though it is so hot, anyway you are observing Tassajara rules [laughs], eating in hot zendo [laughs], like a fish, you know, swimming around, and, you know, as you are doing so, you will get something. I don't know whether you realize it or not. Anyway, as long as you are following rules, you will have something. Even though you don't have anything or you don't study anything, actually you are studying, like a fish, you know, like a fish doesn't know what they are eating. That's all [laughs]. In that way we should study Zen. To understand does not mean to, you know, to understand something by hear [or "here," pointing to head?].

For Zen student, if you ask question, you know, "What is good?" to Zen student, Zen student may answer, "Something you should-something you do is good, and something you don't is bad." [Laughs.] That is answer. Something you do is good, and something you don't is bad. [Laughs.] That's all. You don't think so much about good or bad.

So Dogen-zenji says, "The power of 'do not' is good." Power of "do not." That is something intuitive-very inmost function of ourselves: innate nature. Our innate nature have some function before you say [said?] "good" or "bad." That function is something-is sometime good and sometime bad. We understand in that way. But that innate nature is beyond the idea of good or bad. So when you start to wonder why we practice zazen in such a hot weather [laughs, laughter], then, you know, that is the first step to the confusion [laughs, laughter]. We should be like a fish, always swimming around in the river. That is Zen student [laughs]. Don't, you know- So Dogen-zenji said, "There is no bird that fly after knowing what is sky or where is the limit of the sky." They just fly in the big sky. That is how we practice zazen.

So you should not make some rules for yourself. Or you should not try to make rules for yourself. These is very strict words, you know. It looks like very- It looks like it doesn't mean much, but actually when he say so, he is waiting with big stick [laughs]. If you say something [Sekito says], "Don't make rules for yourself! Don't try to understand by your head." He is waiting like this [laughs] [Suzuki-roshi holds up the pointer or stick as if ready to strike].[1] So when he say so, we cannot say anything. Hai. Hai. [Laughs.] [The Hai/Hai exchange was said as if two people were talking to each other.] That's all. You shouldn't say even "Hai." You should do things like a mule or ass [laughs].

You may say, "This is absolute surrender." It is not so. It is, you know, the way to understand what is the source of the teaching. When we say, "source of the teaching," we liable to, you know, wonder what it is. But source of the teaching is not something which you can understand by words, but something which you will-which you have when you do things quite naturally and intuitively without saying "good" or "bad."

Time is always going on and on. We have not much time to say "good" or "bad" [laughs]. You know, moment after moment we should follow the flow of the time. You should go with the time goes. We don't have time to say "this way" or "that way." When we become tired of, you know, doing something, you may say, "this way" or "that way" just to kill time. But [laughs] actually when you see the vegetables in the garden which is almost, you know, dry up in the hot weather, you have not much time to [laughs] say what will be the appropriate thing to do for us, you know, for today [laughs]. While we are discussing we are becoming more and more hungry. So kitchen people should go to the kitchen and prepare some food for next meal [laughs]. That is the most important thing.

But it does not mean there is, you know, it is waste of time to think about. It is good thing to think about, but we should not stick to words or stick to rules too much. This is very delicate point. Without ignoring rules, without sticking to the rules, we should continue our Tassajara practice. This is the way Sekito is suggesting.

And he says, Sokumoku do wo ese zumba. Sokumoku do wo ese zumba, ashi wo hakobu mo izukunzo michi wo shiran. Sokumoku: Soku is to, you know-excuse me? [Laughs.] Soku is, you know, the antenna of the, you know, insects; moku is "eyes." So it means that to use our eyes and our five senses. Sokumoku: moku is "eyes"; soku is "sense organs."

Do wo ese zumba: do is "dao" [someone is writing on the blackboard]. E means "understand not," you know. "If you don't understand dao with eyes and sense organs."

Ashi wo hakobu: ashi means "foot." Hakobu means "to carry on," "to go," you know, "to carry on."

Izukunzo: "how." "How could you do that," it means this words.
Izukunzo.

Michi wo: michi is "way"; shiran, "to know."

"If you don't understand dao, way, you don't understand way, how could you-even though you move or you operate your foot-operate"- (uma is "operate")-"your foot-your feet-how could you know the-could you know-shiran-could you know-michi-way-(michi is 'way')-how could you know the way?"

So it means that only way is using your five senses-sense organs-eyes and many sense organs-whenever you go, using your sense organs like eyes and nose, and at that time simultaneously understanding the source of the teaching. If you don't do that, even though you prac- [incomplete word]- ashi wo hakobu-"to operate your feet" means to practice. So even though you practice, you cannot know the true way: michi wo. Michi-true way. Michi wo shiran.

So, you know, the way is-the more important thing is not rules but to, you know, find out the true mean [partial word] source of the teaching with your eyes, with your ears, wherever you are, you know-is how you understand the source of the teaching. That is more direct way to know the source of the teaching without trying to establish some particular way for yourselves. So if you stick to words, and if you do not see true way by your eyes, by your nose, ears, or tongue-sticking to some rules and, you know, ignoring actually direct experience of everyday life, even though you practice zazen, it doesn't work, he [Sekito] says. So without, you know, saying this way-"Rinzai" or "Soto," or "this way" or "that way"-to have direct experience of everyday life is more important thing, and that is how we understand the true source of the teaching transmitted from Buddha. That is the conclusion of the Sandokai.

So true way could be, you know, could be a stick. True way- The original way of Buddha could be a stone. Like Ummon said, "It may be a toilet paper" [laughs]. What is true way? Or what is Buddha? Buddha is something which is beyond our understanding. So Buddha could be everything. It is, you know, just- Instead of "Buddha," we say, you know, "toilet paper" [laughs]. Anyway, even though you say "Buddha," it doesn't make much sense [laughs]. So it may be much better to say "toilet paper" or "three pounds of hemp," as Tozan said [laughs].

So, you know, the best way is if you, you know, if someone ask you, "Who is Buddha?" the answer may be, "You are Buddha too" [laughs]. That will be the answer. If you, you know- Then, if someone ask, "What is mountain?" "The mountain is also Buddha" [laughs]. That will be the answer. So in Japanese, mo mata. Mo mata is "also." If you say, you know- You shouldn't say, "This is Buddha." Rather- If you say, "This is Buddha," that statement will lead you [to] some misunderstanding. So, "This is also Buddha." If you say so, it is okay. It does not mean you don't stick to lamp. But lamp is Buddha, you know. If someone ask, "Where is Buddha?" you may say, "Here is Buddha too." If you say "too" it is okay. It is not so definite. "Too," you know. So somewhere else- Buddha may be somewhere else too [laughs]. [Tape turned over.]

[So the secret of the perfect Zen statement is, "It is not always so." ]
[2] ... [under]standing. This is Tassajara rules, but it is not always so. This is- As long as you are at Tassajara, you know, this is our rule. But it is not always so. You should not forget this point. So this is also Buddha's way-Buddha's rule. If you say so, there is no danger. There is no-You will not invite any misunderstanding.

And this is how you get rid of selfish practice. Even though you think you are practicing Buddha's way, you are liable to be involved in selfish practice when you say, "This is- The way should be like this," you know. If you- If that statement is strict enough to accept this kind of teaching, it is okay. If, you know- Even though you say, "This is our way-our Tassajara way." You should definitely say so. But you should be ready to accept some other's way.

This is rather difficult, you know: to have very strict-having very strict, strong confidence in your actual practice and flexible enough to accept other's way too is rather difficult. For you, you know, to be ready to accept someone's teaching is not strict way. But unless you are ready to accept other's practice, you cannot be so strict with your own way. Only when you are, you know, ready to accept someone's opinion you could say, "Definitely you should do so." And you may say, "As long as I'm here you should do so" [laughs]. Even though, you know, you say so, it does not mean- It means that if someone else come, I will observe his way. Or else you cannot, you know, you cannot be so strict with yourself. Do you understand this point?

So usually strictness means to become rigid, to be caught by your own understanding and no or-do not provide any room for others. That is usual way, you know. That is not our way.

So my master always said-if someone ask his opinion about something, about some matter, he always said, "If you asked me," you know, "my opinion is this!" [hits the table with stick at "this"] [laughs, laughter]. When he say so, he is very strong [laughs]. Why he could be so strong is because he says, "If you ask me" [hits table with stick] [laughs]. You know, that is our way. So to be just, you know, yourself is to be-to have-to be ready to accept other's opinion too. That is very important point. Each moment you should intuitively know what you should do. But it does not mean to reject someone else['s] opinion.

In some translation, it says, Koto wo uke te wa . Koto means "forementioned," you know, "things" or "words." How many words I don't know, but, you know, but it is not so. This is more wider meaning: Koto is, maybe, "words." "Words," maybe-not only words in Sandokai, but also various words we mean, we use, and it may include various idea which we have or we may have, or things we see or things we hear. So koto include everything. And ashi wo hakobu means "practice." Sokumoku means "our everyday affairs," "our everyday life."

"In everyday life there is dao, and if you do not practice our way in everyday activity, there is no way to-no approach to the true way." That is what he [Sekito] means. Don't stick to words. Don't, you know, make your own rules and force the rules to others. It is not possible to force any rules for others, because each one has his own way, and each one should have his own way.

That is the conclusion of Sandokai.

Ah. Just right time, maybe [laughs, laughter]. Hmm? I am sorry we have no time [laughs] for you to ask question.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997.
Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican 6/1/00.

[1] The description in brackets is from the original typescript.

[2] Sentence in brackets from original transcript. Not on tape.

2 - Sandokai Lecture #13

Monday, July 06, 1970

Sandokai Lecture #13: "Don't Spend Your Time in Vain"
Tassajara

[This lecture is concerned with the following lines of the Sandokai:

Ayumi wo susumure ba gonnon ni ara zu,
mayote senga no ko wo hedatsu.

Tsutsushin de sangen no hito ni mosu,
koin munashiku wataru koto nakare.

(Transliteration by Kazuaki Tanahashi.)

The goal is neither far nor near.

If you stick to the idea of good or bad, you will be separated from the way
by high mountains or big rivers.

Seekers of the truth,
don't spend your time in vain.

(Translation by Suzuki-roshi.)]

Here it says:

Ayumi wo susumure ba gonnon ni ara zu,
mayote senga no ko wo hedatsu.

Tsutsushin de sangen no hito ni mosu,
koin munashiku wataru koto nakare.

Ayumi wo susumure ba. Ayumi is "foot" or "step." Susumure ba: "to carry on." Susumure ba gonnon ni ara zu. Gon is "near"; on is "far away." Ayumi wo susumure ba. Ayumi is actually "practice," you know. Ayumi wo susumure ba gonnon ni ara zu.

"There is no idea of far away from the goal or nearer to the goal." This is very important. When you [are] involved in selfish practice, there is, you know-you have some idea of attainment. And when you have-you strive for to attain enlightenment or to reach the goal, you have naturally, "We are far away"-you know, idea of, "We are far away from the goal." Or, "We are almost there," you know. Gonnon: "near" or "far away."

But if you really practice our way, enlightenment is there. Mmm. Maybe this is rather difficult to accept [laughs], you know. When you practice zazen without any idea of attainment, there is actually enlightenment. Or you may understand in this way like Dogen-zenji explained: In our selfish practice there is enlightenment and there is practice. Practice and enlightenment is two-a pair of opposite idea. But when we realize-when we understand our practice and enlightenment as an event in realm of great dharma world, enlightenment and practice is two event which appears in a great dharma world. The both practice and enlightenment is also events, you know, which will have-which many events in our life or in our dharma world. When we understand in that way, enlightenment is one of the event which symbolize the dharma world, and practice is also an event which symbolize our big dharma world. So there is- If both symbolize or express or suggest the big dharma world, you know, actually we sh- [partial word], there is no need for us to be discouraged because we do not attain enlightenment or why we should be extremely happy with our enlightenment. Actually there is no difference. Both has equal value.

So enlightenment- If enlightenment is important, practice is also important. We cannot evaluate which is good or bad. When we understand in this way, in each step we have enlightenment. Even though we have enlightenment, you know, there will not be no need to be excited with it. And step by step we will continue endless practice, appreciating the dharma world-bliss of dharma world. That is so-called- it "practice based on enlightenment"-a practice beyond our experience of good and bad, a practice which is beyond our selfish practice.

Last night, he [Sekito] said, "Whatever you see, if you," you know, "that is- Whatever you see, that is dao." Unless you don't understand in that way, you will not-even though you practice our practice you will-the practice not work. And tonight, you know, in this line he says, "If you," you know, "practice our way in its true sense, there is no problem of, 'We are almost there' or 'We are far away from the point'," it is said. Beginners' practice and great Zen masters' practice are not different. But if you [are] involved in selfish practice, then that is delusion. Mayote senga no ko wo hedatsu. If you practice deluded practice, if you practice our way, you know, in dualistic sense-practice and enlightenment-then there is barrier or difficulties of mountain and river-crossing river or mountain: Senga no ko: This is "mountain"; this is "river"; this is "difficulties." [Suzuki-roshi is presumed to be pointing to characters on blackboard.] You will be, you know, you will have-you will be separated from the dao by the difficulties of crossing mountain and river: Mayote senga no ko wo hedatsu.

And next line is Tsutsushin de sangen no hito ni mosu. Tsutsushin de is "most respectfully" or "reverently." "I tell all the seekers of the way." Sangen no hito means "seekers of the truth." San is like sanzen, like sanpai? [1] Sanzen means, you know, "to visit Zen masters." San. Gen is "profound teaching." Hito means "man." So "to visit profound teaching" or "to study profound teaching"- "those who study profound teaching." "I say this much to the people who want to visit the real teacher." Gen is, you know, "profound"- "profound teaching."

Koin munashiku wataru koto nakare. Koin means "sunbeam" or "day and night." Ko is "beam"- "sunbeam"; and in means "shadow." And koin- this is one word- koin means "day and night" or "time."

Munashiku- "don't"- wataru is "to spend" or "to cross"- "to pass." "Not"- nakare is "not." Munashiku is "in vain." Wataru is "to pass." "Don't pass day and night without doing anything" or "in vain."

To, you know, to pass day and night in vain does not mean only to, you know, goof off [laughs] without doing anything. It is- that is maybe, you know, one way of [laughs] passing the day and night without doing anything [laughs], but it does not mean, you know, such a- what he [Sekito] means is more profound: Even though you, you know, work very hard, sometime you may be, you know, passing your day and- valuable time without doing anything, we say so. If you don't know what you are doing [laughs], or he is passing his time in vain, he may say, "No, I am striving very hard to make my saving account [laughs] ten thousand dollars" [laughs], but to us, you know, it is just spending his time in vain. It doesn't make much sense [laughs].

Even though you, you know, work hard in Tassajara, you know, in work period, it doesn't mean- it does not mean you are, you know- it does not always mean you are spending your time properly- doing something properly [laughs]. Mmm. [Laughs.] What does it mean then [laughs]? If you goof off [laughs] you are also, you know, wasting your time. Even though you work hard, maybe you are, you know, spending your time in vain. This is maybe a kind of koan for you [laughs].

Do you know what does it mean, "Every day is good day"? [Laughs.] "Every day is good day." This is famous, you know, koan. "Every day is good day." It does not mean, you know, don't make complaint even though you have some difficulties: "Even though it is hot, you shouldn't complain. Even though it is cold, you shouldn't complain. Whatever happened, you shouldn't complain." It does not mean, you know, something like that.

"Every day is good day." What it means [is], "Don't," you know, "spend your time in vain." I think most people are spending their time in vain. If he say, "No, I am always busy." But if he say so [laughs], it is sure sign of [laughs] his spending time in vain.

Most people do things, you know, as he know what he is doing, with some purpose. But even so, I don't think they are doing things with proper understanding of their activity. I think still he may be doing things in vain. When you do something with usual purpose, which is based on some evaluation, or useful or useless, or good or bad, valuable or less valuable- that is, you know, not perfect understanding. You know, if you do things whether it is good or bad, you know, or successful or unsuccessful, out of question. Because you feel you should do them, then that is real practice. Not because of Buddha or because of yourself, or because of the true, or because of for yourself or for others. If you do things for the things, that is true way.

Mmm. I cannot explain so well. Maybe I shouldn't explain so much [laughs]. You shouldn't do things just because you feel good, or you shouldn't stop doing things just [because] you don't feel so good. Whether you feel good or bad, there is something which you should do. Unless-if you don't have this kind of feeling-if you don't understand this kind of feeling-of doing things, you know, whether it is right or wrong, or good or bad-if you don't understand this kind of feeling, you are not yet started our way in its true sense.

I don't know why, you know, I am [laughs] in Tassajara [laughs]. Not for you or for myself, or not even for Buddha or for Buddhism. I am just here [laughs]. I cannot- You know, I don't feel so good if-even when I think I have to leave Tassajara in two-three weeks, I don't feel so good. I don't know why [laughs.] I don't think that is just because you are my students. I don't think so. I do not have any particular person whom I love so much [laughs]. I don't know why I have to be there. I have not much attachment to Tassajara. It is not because of I attach to Tassajara.

Hmm. Anyway, I am not seek [partial word]-I am not, you know, expecting anything in future or in term of monastery or Buddhism. But I don't want to, you know, live-I don't want to live in the air. I want to be right here. I want to stand on my feet, you know. The only way to stand on my feet is when I am Tassajara I should be at Tassajara [laughs]. That is the reason why, you know, I am here. I want to be here. That is the most important thing for me: to stand on my feet and to sit on my black cushion. I don't trust anything but [laughs] my feet or my black cushion. This is my friend, always. My feet is always my friend. When I am in bed, my bed is my friend. There is no Buddha, or no Buddhism, or no zazen. If, you know, you ask me, "What is zazen?" you know, my answer will be, "To sit on black cushion is zazen," or "To walk with my feet is my zazen." To stay at this moment on this place is my zazen. There is no other zazen.

When I am really standing on my feet I am, you know, not lost. So, for me, that is, you know, nirvana, for me. So there is no need to travel, to cross, you know, mountain or river, for me. I am right here on the dharma world. So I have no difficulty to cross mountain and river. That is how, you know, we do not waste our time. Moment after moment we should live on this moment, right here, without sacrificing this moment for the future.

At Sekito's time, there were, you know, naturally, you know, especially Zen Buddhism is very poliminous [polemical], you know. The background of the teaching is always some discussion or a kind of fight.

Especially in Chinese Buddhism you can see this kind of context in their teaching. And talking about various way of practice and various way of understanding of Zen. They were lost in dispute [laughs]. There were many schools of Zen. But because they were involved in some kind of right teaching or wrong teaching, or traditional teaching or some heretical teaching (heresy), they lost their main point of practice. So that is why he says, "Don't spend your time in vain," sacrificing their actual practice for some idealistic, you know, practice, to attain some perfection of what kind of understanding is traditional understanding told by the Sixth Patriarch-compiling, you know, Sutra of Sixth Patriarch in their own way [laughs], and [saying], "This is the Sixth Patriarch's way. Those who do not have this book is not," you know, "the descendant of the Sixth Patriarch." This kind of, you know, understanding of Zen were prevail [prevalent] at that time. That is why he says, "Don't," you know, "I reverently say to the seekers of the profound way, don't spend your time in vain." It is, you know-what it means is very profound. Without being, you know, caught by some idea, you know, some selfish understanding or practice or teaching-to follow right practice is our way. [Tape turned. Sentence completed.]

This kind of practice is called "polishing tile practice" [laughs]. Tile. "To polish tile practice." Usually, people may polish a mirror, you know, because if you polish it, you know, it will be a clear, good mirror, you know. To have clea- [partial word]- Why you polish it is to have clear surface of the mirror. But if someone start polish a tile [laughs], you know- For the people who understand why we polish a mirror is to have a mirror-like complete, you know, shiny surface of it. So if someone start to polish a tile, you may laughed at him.

So to polish tile is-to make good tile is to polish tile. And to polish mirror is to have actual mirror is why we polish a mirror. [Someone may say,] "Oh, this is just a tile. It cannot be a mirror." You know, that is the practice [of those] who easily give up their practice because he thinks, you know, "Anyway, I cannot be a good [laughs] Zen student. It may be better to give up without polishing it, without sitting zazen." Without realizing, tile is, you know, valuable-sometime much more valuable than a mirror, because a mirror is too expensive for the roofing [laughs]. No one can, you know, afford to make a roof by mirror. Tile is very good for to make our roof. So tile is also important, as mirror is important to see, to look yourself into it. That is "tile-polishing practice." Mazen, we say.

As you know, there is a famous story[2] between Baso,[3] the grandson of the Sixth Patriarch, and Nangaku,[4] a disciple of the Sixth Patriarch. Baso, you know, was practicing zazen. Nangaku, the teacher-who passed, you know, by-asked him, "What are you doing?" "I am practicing zazen to be a buddha." "Ah, that's very nice of you" [laughs, laughter], "trying to be a Buddha." And the teacher [Nangaku] picked up a tile and started to polish it [laughs].

So Baso asked him, you know, with some curiosity, "What are you doing?" [laughs, laughter]. He [Nangaku] said, "I want to make this tile a mirror." [Laughs.] And the disciple Baso asked him whether it is possible to, you know, make tile a mirror. He [Nangaku] said, "Well [laughs], you said," you know, "you are practicing zazen to be a buddha, but buddha is not always someone who attained enlightenment. Everyone is buddha. Whether they attained enlightenment or not, they are buddha." "You said, 'To be a buddha,' but to be a buddha sometime means to practice-" His [Baso's], you know, answer was, "I want to be a buddha by practicing-by sitting practice." And so he said-teacher [Nangaku] said, "You said, 'practice in sitting position.' But Zen is not," you know, "always-to sit in sitting position is not Zen always. Whatever you do, that will be zazen."

So he was lost, you know. Baso was lost. "Then what will be the appropriate practice?" [he asked]. And so he explained-he asked without explaining to him, he asked, "If a cart does not go," you know, "which would be the appropriate way: to hit a cart or to hit a horse?" [Laughs.] "Which will be the appropriate [way]?" But he couldn't answer because the disciple Baso was still involved in practice to attain something.

So he [Nangaku] continued the explanation of the practice. In short, I cannot translate it literally, but what he said was, "If you think [by] whipping a cart or horse, you can," you know, "drive a cart is [you are] wrong, because cart and horse actually is not separated, is one." To whip a horse means to whip a cart, you know. And if you whip on cart, naturally horse will go [laughs], because they are one.

So to practice and enlightenment is one, like a cart and horse is one. So if you, you know, practice actually physical practice, as a practice, that is also enlightenment. And that you practice Buddha's practice, of course, that is enlightenment. But actually that is practice too. We call practice based on enlightenment is "real practice which has no end." We call enlightenment which started with practice, which is one with practice, is "beginningless enlightenment," because, you know, if someone start practice, there is enlightenment. Where there is practice there is enlightenment. Where there is enlightenment there is also practice. There is no enlightenment without practice. If you don't stay on this spot realizing your position, then you are not practicing our way. So if you are wasting your time or if you are trying to sacrifice your present practice for future attainment, that is not real practice.

Sekito actually was the direct disciple of the Sixth Patriarch. He knew the Sixth Patriarch's way-practice very well. So when Katakū Jinne [5] and his disciples started to denounce the Northern school of Jinshu, [6] he [Sekito] felt bad about them attaching to some, you know, idea, and denouncing, you know, superficially, without realizing what is real practice. (The Hoku-shu Zen [7] [was] Jinshu's practice.)

This kind of-this understanding is extended-succeeded by Dogen in Japan, and Dogen extended his idea more widely and not just, you know, logically but more emotional way-more, with more feeling and more poetic way through his tenacious, you know, thinking mind.

So some people may say Sandokai is not so good, you know, because it is so philosophical. [Laughs.] It may be so, you know, if you don't understand the background of his [Sekito's] teaching, and if your mind does not penetrate through his words. We say to read back of the paper, you know, not printed characters, but the other side of the book. You may feel in that way. But this is actually very important, you know, work-Sandokai.

Do you have some questions?

Question/Answer Session

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student A: I don't understand all the vows we make.

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm? Vow?

Student A: Well, I understand what you said tonight, but, you know, in the light of what you say, you know, I don't understand all the vows and stuff. Like, if there's no sentient beings to save, why do we say how we "vow to save sentient beings?" It seems like a big joke to me.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Because your practice is, you know, always confined in realm of, you know, why we practice zazen. What does it mean, by your practice. Anyway, actually, you are practicing very good. Why do you practice your practice so good? [Laughs.] I don't understand. [Laughs.]

Student A: It doesn't feel very good to me.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah. Anyway, you are doing well. [Laughs, laughter.] Because, maybe, because I give lectures, you know, my lecture will, you know, will be some enticement [laughs, laughter]. May be better not to hear my lecture-just practice zazen.

Student A: I don't mind zazen so much, but I kind of-I don't like to make promises that I don't understand.

Suzuki-roshi: "Make promise." Our promise, you know: If sentient beings are number [partial word]-numerous, you know, numberless, or desires are numberless-sentient beings are numerous, you know, it is-you cannot say, "I vow to save them" or "I vow to put an end to them." It is, you know, it is very silly. It doesn't make any sense [laughs]. This is true. I agree with you. It doesn't make any sense.

But still you do it. Why? You don't feel so good if you don't work for others. Our practice is not just to s [partial word]- We say, you know, we make four vows just, you know, in that way. But what we really means is more than that. But tentatively or for sake of sake of convenience, we, you know, say in that way just four.

But I feel in this way, really, truly, you know, it is lucky that we have, you know, inexhaustible desires and numerous sentient beings to save. And each of them is almost impossible to save them in term of, you know, "I save you" [laughs]. You cannot save in that way. But whether it is possible or not, to continue this kind of practice is our vow. Anyway, whether it is possible or not, out of question. Whether this is Buddhist way, or Bodhisattva's way, or Hinayana way, or Mahayana way is out of question. Anyhow, do it! That is our vow.

Student A: When I-I mean, when I don't- It seems cheating, you know. I mean, when I promise to do something, it seems, you know, I need to have some meaning. If it doesn't have any meaning, I won't say it. If it doesn't have any meaning to me, I can't say it.

Suzuki-roshi: Your arrogance. That is your arrogance.

Student A: I don't know. Maybe. But-

Suzuki-roshi: Even though you cry, that cry doesn't make any sense. You're still-your practice is still based on some selfish practice. You don't give up yourself. You have to suffer more and fight more with yourself. With yourself. No one to fight with-nothing to fight with. Fight with your selfish practice until you give up. That is most important point for real students. You shouldn't fool yourself. He doesn't want to be fooled by our teaching, or Zen, or something like that. That is right. You shouldn't [be] fooled by anything.

Student A: Well, what do I do at the end of lecture? I can't-I- You know, everybody will say the four vows, and I won't believe them. I-Suzuki-roshi: You don't have to believe in [them] literally, you know. Because various teachers and numerous people, you know, repeat it in that way, that is why you should do it. That's all. If, you know, they are cheating themselves, you know, you should be cheated, you should be fooled by it with all sentient beings. That you cannot do that means you want to be some special person. That is good, you know. That much spirit we should have. But the answer is, you know, that is not the way. You know, answer is very cold. Cannot be sympathetic with your, you know, practice. Some great teacher will give you some candy. Go and get candy.

Student A: It's not like that, Roshi. I mean, I just-maybe part of it is, but I still don't understand. I feel very-I don't feel right. Even if the whole world is fooled, if there is something I don't believe, or I don't understand-

Suzuki-roshi: "You don't understand." How much truth you can understand by your small mind? And you should know the limit of your thinking mind.

Student A: But- I forget-

Suzuki-roshi: What you see, you know, actually, you see various color, but how many colors do you see by your eyes?

Student A: But I can't-

Suzuki-roshi: How much sound you can hear? You only think, you know- Your thinking mind works dualistic only. You have no words to explain this kind of reality, you know. If you understand our teaching through those characters, it is almost impossible. This is just suggestion. You see? So because you stick to my words, or by scriptures, or you think scriptures should be something perfect, more convincing- You think in that way, but first of all, you know, we have to confess what I'm talking is not right. What I'm saying is not always true. I am suggesting something more than that. That's all. So to, you know- That is even- Not only Buddhism, but Confucius says, you know, "If it is," you know- "If someone want to fool you," you know, "you should be fooled by him." That is very important.

Student A: Even though practice is greater than words, still, in the small world of words, I don't feel strong enough yet to be inconsistent, you know. I don't feel that I can say, "Well, I don't see that light there," you know, because I do. I mean, it may be ignorance or something, but it seems like it's there to me. And in order to be kind of what I feel is straight or clear- If I say to you, "I don't see that lamp, Roshi," then something funny happens inside of me, you know. And sometimes that same funny thing happens when I say the vows, because I think, "Oh, okay, I vow to save all sentient beings." But then something is going on inside me, you know. There aren't any [2-3 words unintelligible]-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, I understand that. You know, we priest always put our hand together when you eat. How many times you put your hand together, you know. How many times you put your hand together in Tassajara, you know? I didn't like it at all, you know. I felt as if I am fooling myself [laughs], and, you know, I didn't feel so good. But as I had to, you know, I did it, that's all. But now I understand, you know, because I understand how foolish I am. I have not much strong spirit [laughs] as I had before. So I understand. But still, you know, truth is truth. I cannot agree with you now. Maybe if I were to be your age, I can agree with you. I could have agreed with you quite easily, and you would have been a great friend of mine, but now [laughs] I ca [partial word-probably "can't"] [be] your friend. Hai.

Student B: Roshi, do you think that we have any choice? For instance, I am here at Tassajara.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: Am I here at Tassajara by my choice, or am I simply here at Tassajara?

Suzuki-roshi: Well, that's- The answer for that is, you know, your buddha nature brought you here at Tassajara. That is my answer. Your choice is not- You ch [partial word]-. I think that was not comp [partial word], you know, your choice, you know, completely. Maybe your choice, you know, twenty or thirty percent your choice. But most of the reason for your [being] here is something more than that. That we hear Buddha's teaching is, you know, because of our previous study. And wisdom seek for wisdom. We are listening to the teaching which we have listened or have had studied under many teachers in my past life. Dogen said so. Wisdom seek for wisdom. But, you know, even though you feel, you know, "I am feeling this way right now, one hundred percent," you may say so, but actually that voice is now covers all of your being or character. But actually it is a little tiny part of you saying so, and you feel as if your whole body is saying so. That's all. That is, you know, so-called-it- Ahh. Maybe I shouldn't explain [laughs] so, you know, so much in traditional way.

Student B: Well then, if I were, say, to become buddha, would I have anything to do about it? Or would I have anything to do with it? Would I have anything to do with it?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. First of all, you know, try to forget yourself, and rely on your true voice-nonverbal voice-voiceless voice. And you listen to "tongueless speech," we say. Don't listen to my words. [Laughs.] Ahh. Think about this point, you know, and-. Hai.

Student C: Will I hear your stick on my shoulder tomorrow?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student C: In the morning-in the early morning, will I hear your stick on my shoulder?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Stick?

Student C: Will you hit me with your stick tomorrow morning?

Suzuki-roshi: Okay. All right.

Student D [Roovane ben Yumin]: Roshi? Is the voice- Whose voice is it that we listen to?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm! Your voice and Buddha's voice. That is, you know, what Sandokai is talking about. You think sometime [it is] your voice, but that voice is Buddha's voice. But you think in that way, you know, from one-sided feeling. You think you are here. You think you are, you know, Roovane, but [laughs] actually it is not so [laughs, laughter]. No, not at all. If I think I am Suzuki, you know, if someone call me "Suzuki" I [laughs] feel very funny. "Oh [laughs], is this Suzuki?" [Laughs.] "Oh no, I," you know- First reaction is, "No, I am not Suzuki." [Laughs.] Hai.

Student E: Roshi, this may be a good gassho [presumably bows], and someone may look at me and say, "Oh, this is good gassho."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student E: But there may be a cold heart behind this gassho.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. Cold heart or warm heart out of question. [Laughs, laughter.]

Student E: The [laughs] gassho is a good one [said as an aside]. Is it still good gassho [addressed more loudly to Suzuki-roshi]?

Suzuki-roshi: Perfect! [Laughs, laughter.] [End of tape. Not clear if Q&A session continued.]

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican 1/22/01.

[1] Sanpai (Jap.) = triple prostration.

[2] In Ching Te Ch'uan Teng Lu (Record of the Transmission of the Lamp), translated by Thomas and C. C. Cleary in The Blue Cliff Record (Appendix, p. 566).

[3] Baso Doitsu (Ch. Chiang-hsi Mazu Daoyi, 709-788): Tang Chan master of many other Chan masters; student of Nangaku Ejo.

[4] Nangaku Ejo (Ch. Nanyue Huairang, 677-744): Early Chan master; student of the Sixth Patriarch Daikan Eno (Ch. Dajian Huineng); master of Baso Doitsu.

[5] Katakū Jinne (Heze Shenhi, 670-762): a disciple of the Sixth Ancestor. He and/or his followers denounced Jinshu's teachings in the Sutra of the Sixth Ancestor.

[6] Daitsu Jinshu (Datong Shenxiu, 605-706): founder of the Northern school of Chan Buddhism.

[7] Hoku-shu Zen: Northern school of Chan Buddhism.

3 - Eko Lecture #1

Wednesday, July 08, 1970

Eko Lecture #1: The First Morning Eko
Tassajara

[This is the first in a series of six lectures by Suzuki-roshi on the four ekos chanted at the conclusion of morning services at San Francisco Zen Center and other Soto Zen temples and monasteries.

The lectures were delivered from July 8 to July 15, 1970.

The Japanese transliteration and English translation of the ekos are based, with minor changes, on David Chadwick's "EkoStudy Book: A Tassajara Project," December 1970 (unpublished manuscript, San Francisco Zen Center).

The First Morning Eko:

Choka butsuden fugin

Line 1. Aogi koi negawakuwa shinji, fushite shokan o taretamae.

Line 2. Jorai, Maka Hannyaharamita Shingyo, shosai myo kichijo darani o fujusu,

Line 3. atsumuru tokoro no shukun wa

Line 4. daion kyoshu honshi Shakamuni Butsu;

Line 5. Shintan Shoso Bodai Daruma-daiosho;

Line 6. Nichi-riki Shoso Eihei Dogen-daiosho;

Line 7. Daisho Monjushiri Bosatsu no tame ni shi tatematsuri.

Line 8. Kami jion ni mukuin koto o.

Morning Service Buddha Hall Sutra

Line 1. May Buddha observe [see?] us, and may we receive his true compassion.

Line 2. Thus, as we chant the Maha Prajña Paramita Hridaya Sutra and the Dharani for Removing Disasters, Line 3. we offer the collected merit to Line 4. the great kind founder, the original teacher, Shakyamuni Buddha;

Line 5. the First Patriarch of China, the great Bodhidharma;

Line 6. the First Patriarch of Japan, the great Eihei Dogen;

Line 7. and the great sage Mañjushri Bodhisattva.

Line 8. Let us reflect their compassion and mercy.]

I want to explain eko.[1] The eko is- After reciting sutra, we-[it is] a sort of explanation of why we recite sutra. And this sutra is for such-and-such buddha, or next sutra is for arhats, or third one is for our patriarchs, and fourth one is for disciples and students who is related to this monastery and the ancestors or relative who passed away. Those are eko.

The first sutra-first of all, we recite sutra for-for Shakyamuni Buddha. And here in Tassajara we recite sutra for Bodhidharma, who is the First Patriarch of China-and next-third-excuse me [first sutra]-and Bodhidharma and Dogen-zenji, who is the First Patriarch in Japan. So in India, we-Shakyamuni Buddha; in China, Bodhidharma; and in Japan, Dogen-zenji. The first Prajña Paramita Sutra is recited for those patriarchs and buddhas. But originally, even nowadays in Japan, we recite this sutra-first sutra for Buddha, and-and Dogen-zenji, and Keizan-zenji (who is the founder of Soji-ji Monastery),[2] and then we, you know, [invoke] Keizan-zenji and many deities who protects, you know, or who is related to Dogen-zenji.

When Dogen-zenji went to China-as you know, he went to China when he was twenty-four, with Myozen.[3] And he arrived-after he arriving-after his arriving at China, he stayed in-in the ship for three or four months, maybe three months. When he was there [on the ship], he was-once in a while he landed [went ashore] and visited many temples and came back to the ship. And in this way he spent three months.

During that time, his brother-dharma brother or he-who is Eisai-zenji's [4] disciple-who was Eisai's disciple, Myozen. Myozen did not stay in the ship. He landed [went ashore], and he went to his teacher's temple-a temple where his teacher studied and received transmission].[5] So he left Dogen in the ship, and he landed. Dogen, alone, [was] living in the ship and collecting information.

At last-no, before he landed, a monk, old monk about sixty-one, came-visited his ship. And Dogen, of course, wanted to know what is going on in China. That monk was from Aikuo-zan Monastery.[6] And in Aikuo-zan Monastery there was a shrine where the deity called ShoboshichiroDai Gongen. And we recite, you know, in Eihei-ji, and so many monasteries we recite. We call his name "Shoboshichiro Dai Gen Shiribosatsu." And that deity which is enshrined [at] Aikuo-zan, [is] also enshrined in Shobo-zan. Shobo-zan means "to invite treasure mountain" [laughs]-"inviting treasure mountain." Shobo-zan.

It is enshrined in the mountain where people can-from where people can see Japan and Korea. It may be pretty high mountain. And under [nearby] the mountain there is a big fishing port [laughs]. There various, you know, trading ship come in from Japan and Korea and many places. So we call-they call that mountain Shobozo-zan. Shobo-zan means "to invite treasure-treasure-inviting treasure mountain." So inviting the treasure and many things from other country. So this mountain-this deity is very-very closely related to Dogen-zenji's trip to China.

[In Japan] we say in the morning eko, "Shoboshichiro Dai Gen Shiribosatsu. Gatto no shinsai ni shukensu." Mmm. "Shoboshichiro Dai Gen Shiribosatsu." But here in America we don't recite, you know, [the name of this deity]. It doesn't mean much to you. So we skip "Shoboshichiro Dai Gen Shiribosatsu," or we say, "Gatto no shinsai." "Gatto no shinsai" means the temples in Japan who has long, long history-there many deities have been enshrined.

So those-we recite sutra [in Japan] first of all for those deities too. But we don't recite [in America]-we do not have this kind of [deities]-here in America we do not have this kind of deity, so we don't-so we just recite sutra for Shakyamuni Buddha and for Dogen-zenji [and] Bodhidharma. Bodhidharma is the First Patriarch in China; Dogen-zenji is the First Patriarch in Japan. So we recite sutra not only [to] Shakyamuni Buddha but also to those teachers.

[Line 1] Aogi koi negawakuwa shinji, fushite shokan o taretamae.

Aogi koi negawakuwa means-aogi is "to," you know, "to," you know, "to"-aogu means "to look"-what do you say, you know?[7] "To look at" or "to look up," you know. Altar is higher place, so Aogi koi negawakuwa shinji, fushite-. Aogi koi negawakuwa shinji, fushite shokan o taretamae. Shinji means "mercy." "I want to receive." Koi negawakuwa means "we want," you know. Koi negawakuwa. "I want to receive." Shokan is "wisdom." "I want to receive wisdom of the Buddha."

[Line 2] [Jorai Maka Hannyaharamita Shingyo,

shosai myo kichijo darani o fujusu.]

We have recite- Jorai means-jo is, you know-means-ahh, very difficult-jo [laughs]. "Up and down." "Up" is jo.[8] "Down" is ge.[9] Jorai means "We-," you know, "So far we recited sutra," you know. "So far we recited-the sutra we recited so far, maybe, the sutra we recited is four [?] jorai-jorai-the sutra Maka-Maha Prajña Paramita Hridaya Sutra. So far we recited the sutra of Maha Prajña Paramita, and we respectfully-." Hmm. "So far we recited sutra Prajña Paramita, and its merit is-by its merit, we want to repay the mercy of great teacher Shakyamuni Buddha and Joyo-daishi.[10]

[Line 5. Shintan Shoso Bodai Daruma-daiocho,

Line 6. Nichi-iki Shoso Eihei Dogen-daiocho.

Line 7. Daiocho Monjushiri Bosatsu no tame ni shi tatematsuri]

Nichi-iki Shoso-Nichi-iki-ah-Shintan[11] Shoso. Shintan-Shintan means "China." Shoso means "the First Patriarch." The First Patriarch in China, Bodhidharma-daiocho. And First Patriarch in Japan, Eihei Dogen-daiocho. Nichi-iki means "Japan." Shoso means "the First Patriarch." Eihei Dogen is Dogen's name. The monastery he founded is named "Eihei-ji." So Dogen is called after the monastery he founded. Dogen is called "Eihei Dogen." Eihei Dogen-daiocho-no tame ni shi tatematsuri. [12]

And we here [Tassajara], we recite sutra in zendo. And [in] zendo, as you know, we have Mañjushri Bodhisattva,[13] you know. So we also recite Prajña Paramita-Prajña Paramita Sutra is for Mañjushri Bodhisattva too.

So we call [recite] four names: the great benevolent teacher, Shakyamuni Buddha; the First Patriarch in China, Bodhidharma-daiocho; the First Patriarch in Japan, Eihei Dogen-daiocho; and the great-"-daiocho" means "great sage"[14]-great sage Mañjushri Bodhisattva. And we want to respect or repay the benevolence of those teachers and bodhisattva. That is what eko means-eko which we-which doan[15] recite means. Although what we-we skip many deities which has-which is related to our history, I think it is necessary for you to know what kind of feeling we have when we recite sutra for the-those teachers.

Let me continue something which Dogen experienced in his voyage to China. It was not so easy thing to go to China at that time. Three times-once of three times, you know, a ship-big ship could go to China, according to the historical events. So it cost a lot of money to go to China by a big ship, and it took more than one month to go to-from Japan to-to China. So it is not at all easy thing.

After arriving [in] China, Dogen spent three months in the ship. During [that] time, he was very much discouraged in one way-to see bad practice of Chinese famous Zen masters [laughs]. I think this is always true [laughs]. If you go to Japan to study Buddhism, you will be also discouraged to see many famous Zen-famous Zen masters. According-he described-Dogen-zenji described in Shobogenzo what kind of experience he had at that time, good and bad.[16]

He also. you know- He respected- After he received transmission because of Nyojo-zenji,[17] he respected Chinese priests very much.
But before he met with Nyojo-zenji, he was pretty critical with Chinese monks. For an instance, he said Chinese monks did not know even precepts, you know, which is described in Kegon Sutra or many other precepts-book of precepts-sutra of precepts. They didn't know [them] at all.

They-they had long fingernails [laughing] and long hair. Very interesting. And dirty clothing, and he did not-they did not know even to-how to rinse their mouth. That is why he wrote Shobo-[partial word]- in one of the fascicle of Shobogenzo, how to clean up our face and body after-when you go to rest room or when you get up.[18] And he says, you know, their breathing had strong smell [laughing] from too- When he talk with some famous teachers [laughter], he-he could hardly stay with him because his-their, you know, breath exhale is too bad-smells too bad [laughs, laughter]. And, you know, even in great China, there is not much good teachers, and he was very much discouraged. And they did not know even what is precepts.

But on the other hand, you know, the monk who visited his ship to buy mushroom, you know. At that time, maybe, Japan-ships from Japan loaded a lot of mushroom-Japanese mushroom. So head-head cook of Aikuo-zan Monastery, you know, visited ship from Japan, and he wanted to buy some mushroom. So Dogen-zenji, you know, seeing a monk who is buying mushroom and addressed him: "Where are you from?"

And he said, "I am a head cook of Aikuo-zan Monastery. Next day-next day is July 5th,[19] and we will have, you know, noodle-we must serve noodle for monks. So for-for noodle [soup] we want mushroom for seasoning." You know, if you put mushroom in noodle soup it taste very well, as you know. So for special occasion of July 5th, he [the tenzo] came to buy some mushroom to Dogen's ship. After-but he said, "I cannot talk with you so long because I am very busy. Tomorrow I must-by tomorrow-by this evening, I must go back to the temple because tomorrow we have to-I have to cook for monks."

But he was over sixty, so Dogen-zenji wondered, you know, in such a great monastery, there must be someone, you know, some young priest who may cook for monks, you know. And so he asked him to stay for one night to tell him something about Chinese monasteries. But he [the tenzo] said, "I am busy. I must go home-go-go back to the temple."

And Dogen asked again, "You are over sixty, you know. You don't have to work so hard. You must rest, and you must read some scriptures, or you must study some koan, or you must study-you must spend your time in sitting meditation or reading sutra," he said. "That is more appropriate practice for you," Dogen said.

That-but that monk said, "You don't know what is practice [laughs]. You, a venerable priest from Japan, do not know what is practice. And you don't even know what is character to read [laughs]. You don't know any characters! You don't know any Chinese character, even. You cannot read anything. Even though you read it, that's-that will not help you," he said. So he [Dogen] was very, you know, startled.

And Dogen asked again, "Then what is characters, you know? If I don't know any characters-I think I know many characters." In his mind, you know, he read whole scriptures three times, you know, at that time. It is difficult for usual person to read all the scriptures once, you know, even in his whole life. But at age of twenty-four, he went over three times all the scriptures.

But he [the tenzo] said, you know, "You don't know any character-Chinese characters even," [laughs] that monk said to him. And he [Dogen] was very ashamed of himself, and he couldn't say anything.

And that monk said, "If you want to know what is character, you should come to my monastery. Then I will show you what is actual character," that monk said to Dogen. And later Dogen says, "It is because of that monk that I could understand a little bit about Buddhism-Zen Buddhism." [20] So not all the-in China, even though almost all the monks were not so good, but there were several good ones, including this monk, head cook of Aikuo-zan.

The first sutra is for Shakyamuni Buddha. Shakyamuni Buddha means, you know, as you know, sometime he may be a historical buddha, and sometime he may be a dharma-dharma body, and sometime he may be you yourself, which is, you know, which has same buddha-nature as Buddha. So when we say "Shakyamuni Buddha," we mean Shakyamuni Buddha who is one with us, you know, who is one with Shakyamuni Buddha and with one with us. Shakyamuni Buddha is nothing but each one of ourselves. That is Shakyamuni Buddha in its true sense. The first sutra is Prajñā Paramita-is recited to the Shakyamuni Buddha which can be each one of ourselves-which can be a dharma body, or which can be a historical buddha who was born in two thousand and five hundred some years ago. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

Do you have some question? Hai.

Questions and Answers

Student A: Why is Mañjushri such a special bodhisattva for the zendo?

Suzuki-roshi: Bodhi- [partial word]-Mañjushri is, you know, symbol-symbolic buddha of wisdom. Wisdom means, you know-not wisdom in its true-usual sense. Wisdom means something more than that, which [is] not accumulation of knowledge or wisdom to know something. Wisdom means fundamental truth-so-called-it ri, you know, ri? Ri/ji.[21] So when we practice zazen, you know, what we will have is Mañjushri's wisdom, or Mañjushri's true nature. That is why we recite sutra-we have Mañjushri in zendo. So we resume the true nature of Mañjushri. We are supposed to resume the true nature of Mañjushri. That is why we have Mañjushri in our zendo. Hai.

Student B: Why did Dogen-zenji stay on the ship?

Suzuki-roshi: Stay on the ship? He wanted to-he [was acting] carefully, you know. He wanted to know where he should go, you know-where he should be. Once in a while, of course, he visited, you know, many temples around there, but he came back to the ship. And he was preparing to, you know-he-he was writing many letters to the many temples, you know. He did not, you know, he did not just, without any preparation, he did not call [on] any temples. Maybe, yeah, that is the reason. Hai.

Student C [David Chadwick]: In the last-the last line of the sutra, Kami jion ni mukuin koto o?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

David: The-that word mukuin-

Suzuki-roshi: Mukuin?

David: -it sort of-it means "pay back" or "compensation"-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

David: -or something. Could you explain exactly what that means? It seems to be a very important part of that-the eko.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Kami-kami is, you know, kami jion-kami means "up." So, you know, "towards Buddha," you know. Kami. "To the Buddha." Kami.

Jion means "Buddha's mercy." Buddha's mercy means Buddha who left teaching for us, Buddha who transmitted his spirit to us, and Buddha who encouraged-who is encouraging our practice, who is protecting our practice always, you know. So we say Ho nu no jiwan.[22] Ho nu no jiwan. Ho is "dharma milk," you know [laughs], the benevolence of dharma milk-giving dharma milk to-

David: Now-now-

Suzuki-roshi: -pay back his- [interrupted by David].

David: -who gives-who gives who?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? We.

Student C: The ones who are chanting-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

David: -are-are-are-

Suzuki-roshi: By merit of chanting this sutra, or by practice of chanting-

David: -are-

Suzuki-roshi: -what we want to do is to pay back [laughs] Buddha's, you know, mercy of milk-dharma milk.

David: -are-are we-are we paying it back by-by practicing-

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

David: -too [?]?

Suzuki-roshi: To pay back-the way to pay back to the [his] mercy is-to practice hard is only way to pay back his mercy. There is no other way. So practicing-chanting-sutra chanting sincerely, we pay back-in this way, we pay back to the mercy of Buddha. That is what it means. Hai.

Student D: I don't understand how there can be more than one buddha-how there can be-

Suzuki-roshi: More than-

Student D: Bodhidharma was one personality, and-and Dogen was another personality?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student D: How can this be?

Suzuki-roshi: It can be more, but we picked up [out], you know, just three. It can be numerous-innumerable, but we pick up Shakyamuni Buddha from India, from China Bodhidharma, from Japan Dogen-zenji. We should call Keizan-zenji's name, but when, you know, because we pick only one [laughing] from China, so in America we picked up only one from Japan, who is the First Patriarch in Japan. Do you understand?

Student D: Um, no-

Suzuki-roshi: It is-it is a kind of representative.

Student D: Do they-do these men differ-did they differ in personality?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student D: And how can that be if they are all buddhas?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] A good question. It must be so, you know. We should not be all, you know, we should not be like all-all of us shouldn't-should not be like Shakyamuni Buddha, who was born in India more than two thousand years ago. We cannot be the same. We must-we-the-the-we say, you know, we are like a candle: big and small candle, red and white candle, you know. And there is big and small candle, but fire is the same, you know. Or the stream is same-shallow and deep, and flowing fast. And some in-in mountain-in the mountain-in the mountain it will flow fast, in the field it will go slower and maybe deeper, but it is same water.

Unless you don't understand this point, you don't understand Buddhism. Spirit is the same, but how, you know, someone express it-the spirit is different. It cannot be same. Okay? So should be different, but there is no contradiction. Hai.

Student E: After the eko when we all say [chant] the Ji ho san shi-[23]

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student E: -eko?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student E: Could you say something about what it means [??]?

Suzuki-roshi: That is-maybe I have to explain tomorrow. Then. Some other questions? Hai. Hmm? Oh. Hai.

Student F: Roshi, daiosho-"great sage"-means something so big and so far away and so long ago, and this practice that we have here is so small and so new, and our flame-flame-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student F: -of our candle is so small that it's very hard sometimes to believe that when you say "Bodhidharma-daiosho" or Dogen's name in the eko, that they really will come here, that we can feel close to these men.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student F: I know it must be so, but it's very hard to feel.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. I, you know, I feel for you, you know. It is absolutely necessary, you know, to be related to this kind of, you know, spiritual history, you know. We must make a great effort to get contact with this kind of spiritual, you know, history or effort of great sages. You say you cannot understand. "There is no wonder for us. That I cannot understand," you may say. But it-it means that you gave up, you know [laughs], already to understand something which has been going, you know, in our human history.

Student G: If we chant sincerely, will that help us?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. Yeah. It-it-it will, you know, some day. Why I say "some day" is, you know, you will see here in Tassajara many teachers-many good teachers. Then you will-through their character they will understand-you will understand something, not literally, but you will feel something. So, you know, we have to-we have-we come to the point where we should make one step forward in our-in our practice in Zen Center. So far, you know, we somehow get together and started Zen Center practice so that, you know, to establish American Buddhism, you know. So far we have [been] striving for establishing something. But when you say "American Buddhism" or "establish something," you know, it is something like for your convenience. [You may think] "because this is America, America must have American-our own way of Buddhism."

That is very true [laughs]-very true-but one point is missing. As-what is your name? [speaking to Student D; unclear reply]-as someone said, you know, we cannot understand why we pick up-we, you know, pick up [out] Bodhidharma or Dogen or Buddha. They are three different characters.

Pretty soon you will have [laughs], you know, one more character, you know, in-from America. They are-should be different. It- They are different, but they should be connected with some spiritual relationship. That- Without this kind of effort, you cannot establish American Buddhism in its true sense.

American way-if you don't like to say "Buddhism"-American way should be established. And when it is established, it is-the American way should be closely related to some other country's way too. Your way should not be separated from other country's way. You know, that is-if you try to establish something special, something different from other country's way, that is, you know, selfish practice. It is not bodhisattva way.

So if you, you know, think about this, you have to understand, you know, Japanese Buddhism, Chinese Buddhism, and Indian Buddhism too as a Buddhist. So it is not so easy thing. So we should be concentrated on this point from now on. Hai.

Student H: Roshi, the phrase "dharma transmission"-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: -what exactly does that mean? What is the dharma transmission?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] If you are ready to listen to me, I will explain it to you. I have it and you haven't [laughing, laughter]. So when I give you, I will explain what it is. But if I-even though I explain it, if you don't understand, you know, it doesn't make any sense. So more closer relationship between us is important and necessary-real, you know, human relationship [laughs]. Hai.

David Chadwick: If your name were chanted in eko, would it be "Zenshin Shunryu-daiosho," like Eihei-Eihei-ji Dogen-Eihei Dogen?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh [laughs, laughter].

David: So would-would we use this-this place's name [Zenshin] or your personal name?

Suzuki-roshi: If my-my name isn't-I don't know. I have-my teacher gave me my name already. [24] Not "Zenshin Shunryu." [Laughs, laughter.]

David: You mean-well I thought-I thought that he was called Eihei Dogen-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

David: -in there because he was-he founded Eihei-ji Temple, not because Eihei was his name.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

David: Was Eihei his name?

Suzuki-roshi: Eihei, no. Not his name-his temple's name. He called his temple Eihei-ji.

David: Oh-okay. What-what should-how should you be called?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. That up to you [laughing, laughter continuing].
Whatever you call me, it's okay with me. Anyway, I don't listen to you.

David: You wouldn't be able to-you wouldn't be able to listen if we were chanting your name in the eko!

[Brief and mostly unclear exchange off-mike. Mike volume drops severely. Last thing S.R. says is "okay."]

Student G [Alan Marlow]: The name that one-I've been trying to figure out-the name that one's teacher gives one-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Alan: -when is that name used, as opposed to the-our-our name-Alan Marlow, or Shunryo [sic] Suzuki. How is-how is that name used and when is it used-the name that you're given by your teacher?

Suzuki-roshi: After you receive ordination, you know, strictly speaking, you know, we should use his n- [partial word: name]-his Buddhist name like Sojun,[25] you know. We'll do it, you know. "He is Sojun!"
[Laughs.] Uh-huh.

Mel [?]: Hai.

Suzuki-roshi: Hai. [Laughs, laughter.] Ohh-

Alan: No, but Roshi you don't use that-the name that your teacher gave you, do you?

Suzuki-roshi: My-my name is Shunryu.

Alan: Shunryo [sic].

Suzuki-roshi: Shunryu. This is the name.

Student I: What does it mean?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student I: What does it mean-"Shunryu"?

Suzuki-roshi: Not much. [Laughs, loud laughter.] You make me blushful [blush/bashful].

Student J: Roshi, would you tell me?

Suzuki-roshi: You-you must be a great teacher, you know. Not me. You must use your name, but I'm okay. I am here, anyway, drinking a lot of water. [Laughs, laughter.] My ma- [partial word: master?] teacher died when I was 32 years old.[26] So I was not so lucky, you know, in this point.

So I want to live as much as I can [laughs], you know. I was very weak. I don't think I-I didn't think I will live more than 50-60. But 66 is, so six is extra. Now I become greedy [laughs, laughter], because of you. Ten years more. Give me ten years, all right? I-I am asking Buddha, you know, give me ten years more. Then you will be, you know, 40-50. You will be a good teacher if you try hard.

If you follow Buddhist way, you will [be] sure to be a good person. That is quite-I am so sure about that. Each student here, you know, improved a lot. That is very true. So if you live-if you practice our way maybe five more years, you will be a quite different person.

Our way is difficult. Why it is difficult is it is because it is too simple. [Laughs, laughter.] It's like nothing happening at Tassajara [laughing]. All day long, day after day, we are carrying stones and building cabins, and scrubbing floors, eating same food. You know, it looks like nothing happening here. [Laughs, laughter.] But something great is happening here. I am quite sure about that.

Then you will know what is transmission, what is Bodhidharma, or Dogen, or Buddha. You yourself are Buddha. Then you will recite sutra with full joy, you know, to pay back their mercy.

Thank you very much.

---

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript and Eko Study Book by David Chadwick; transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997; transcript checked and corrected against tape by Bill Redican 11/20/99.

[1] Also ekomon: a dedication chanted by participants in a Buddhist ceremony in which any merit thought to arise from participating in the ceremony is transferred to or offered for all sentient beings to help them in their path toward enlightenment.

[2] Keizan Jokin (1268-1325): after Dogen, the most important Zen master in the Soto school. He reestablished an ancient Hosso monastery as Soji-ji in 1321.

[3] Myozen Ryonen (1184-1225): dharma successor of Eisai-zenji and, after Eisai, the second master of Dogen-zenji. This story is recounted in Dogen's Tenzo Kyokun ("Instructions for the Tenzo"), in Eihei Shingi. The events took place in June or July of 1223.

[4] Eisai-zenji (1141-1215): Japanese master of the Oryo lineage of Rinzaï Zen.

[5] Ching-te Monastery on Tien-tung Mountain.

[6] That is, the temple was located on Ayüwan(g)-shan (Jap. Aikuo) Mountain in eastern China (see T. Leighton and S. Okumura, Dogen's Pure Standards for the Zen Community, Albany: SUNY Press, 1996, p. 54).

[7] Aogu (Jap.): look up; look up to; ask for (advice); depend on.

[8] Jo (Jap.): best; upper.

[9] Ge (Jap.): lower in quality or ranking; lower position.

[10] Joyo-daishi: [Japanese name for ?]

[11] Shintan: Ancient Indian name for China.

[12] Suzuki-roshi appears to have jumped from the end of Line 6 to the middle of Line 7 ("no tame ...").

[13] Mañjushri Bodhisattva : the bodhisattva of wisdom; lit., "He Who Is Noble and Gentle." Throughout the lecture, Suzuki-roshi uses the Japanese version of the name (Manjushiri). For the sake of simplicity, the Sanskrit is used here in all cases except for the Japanese text of the ekos.

[14] -daiosho/-daishi (Jap.): From dai, "great, big, or serious," + osho or o + shi, "priest": lit., "great honored teacher." An honorific title for Zen masters conferred after death. Used in formal contexts such as ceremonies or chants.

[15] Doan (Jap.): generally, anyone who plays an instrument such as a bell or drum in a Zen temple; specifically, the person who keeps time in the zendo and sounds the bells in a Soto Zen monastery.

[16] Shobogenzo fascicle(s): [State names of fascicles?] .

[17] Tendo Nyojo: Tien-tung Ju-Ching (1163-1228).

[18] He may have been referring to the Shobogenzo fascicle Senjo ("Rules for the Lavatory") or Senmen ("Washing the Face").

[19] July 5th: The fifth day of the fifth month is traditionally celebrated in Chinese and Japanese monasteries (Leighton and Okumura, op. cit., p. 54).

[20] In Tenzo Kyokun ("Instructions for the Tenzo").

[21] See, e.g., SR-70-06-01 and SR-70-06-03. Ri refers to the noumenal: the true source of teaching that is beyond words. Ji refers to the phenomenal: aspects of existence that can be apprehended with the senses or that can be thought about as objects.

[22] [Phonetic only.] Translation: .

[23] Ji ho san shi i shi fu: "All buddhas ten directions three times."

[24] Suzuki-roshi was given the Buddhist name "Shunryu" at birth by his father Butsumon Sogaku, a Soto Zen priest. The two Japanese characters for Shunryu translate as "Excellent Emerging." He was later given the Buddhist name Shogaku, "Auspicious Peak," by his master Gyokujun So-on on May 18, 1917. [David Chadwick, Crooked Cucumber, New York: Broadway, 1999, pp. 3, 20.]

[25] Probably referring to Sojun Mel Weitsman.

[26] Gyokujun So-on Suzuki (c. 1877-1934).

4 - Eko Lecture #2

Friday, July 10, 1970

Eko Lecture #2: The Second Morning Eko
Tassajara

[This is the second in a series of six lectures by Suzuki-roshi on the four ekos chanted at the conclusion of morning services at San Francisco Zen Center and other Soto Zen temples and monasteries.

The Second Morning Eko:

Choka ugu fugin

Line 1. Aogi koi negawakuwa shokan, fushite kanno o taretamae.

Line 2. Jorai, Maka Hannyaharamita Shingyo o fujusu, atsumuru tokoro no kudoku wa,

Line 3. jippo joju no sambo, kakai muryo no kensho,

Line 4. juroku dai arakan, issai no ugu burui kenzoku ni eko su.

Line 5. Koinego tokoro wa,

Line 6. sanmyo rokutsu, mappo o shobo ni kaeshi goriki hachige,
gunjo o musho ni michibiki.

Line 7. Sammon no nirin tsuneni tenji, kokudo no sansai nagaku sho sen koto o.

Dedication for the Morning Service Arhat's Sutra[1]

Line 1. May Buddha observe [see?] us and respond.

Line 2. Thus, as we chant the Maha Prajña Paramita Hridaya Sutra, we dedicate the collected merit to

Line 3. the all-pervading, ever-present Triple Treasure,
the innumerable wise men in the ocean of enlightenment,

Line 4. the sixteen great arhats and all other arhats.

Line 5. May it be that

Line 6. with the Three Insights and the Six Universal Powers, the true teaching be restored in the age of decline.

With the Five Powers and Eight Ways of Liberation,
may all sentient beings be led to nirvana.

Line 7. May the two wheels of this temple forever turn and this country always avert the Three Calamities.]

[The first chanting is chanted][2] in Buddha hall. In China and also in Japan, we have seven important buildings. One is sammon.[3] Sammon is main gate.

And the first building you see in front of sammon is Buddha hall [butsuden]. When-here we have the first chanting. Usually those-this Buddha hall is the building where we celebrate for our nation or for our president or emperor-something which is related to the country. That is the most official-the building where the most official ceremonies are held.

And behind the butsuden-Buddha hall-we have hatto, where we give lecture or where we observe memorial service-services for members-where we recite sutras. This is so-called-it hatto. Hatto means "hall of-dharma hall," the place where we spread dharma.

And [on] the left-hand side of the butsuden there is kitchen, kuin or kuri.[4] Kuin or kuri. That is the kitchen. And usually guest room is-rooms are attached to the [1 word unclear]-attached to the kitchen building. And [on] the other side of the kitchen-excuse me, the opposite side of the kitchen-left-hand side of the Buddha hall,[5] we have sodo or zendo.

So that makes 1-2-3-4 [counting]. And we have 5-that makes 5: sammon (the main gate), and Buddha hall, hatto, and kitchen, and sodo-zendo or sodo. And we count two more. The one is restroom. We call it tosu. Usually tosu is built right-hand side of the-as you enter, right-hand side of the main gate we have tosu.[6] Tosu is rest room. And we have also bath room-bath room or bathing room, you know [yokushitsu]. That is, you know-you have bath room and restroom is same, but in zendo we have-in monastery we have two separate building. And so we have seven important buildings.[7]

And in zendo and bath room and toilet, we do not talk, you know. That is rule. In zendo we don't talk [laughs]. In bath room we shouldn't talk. And in rest- [partial word] in restroom or toilet we shouldn't talk. That is so "three silent practice-three silent practice place," we call it.

And the first, most formally, the first chanting is chanted in butsuden, Buddha hall. And next chant is usually chanted in hatto. [At] Eihei-ji, right now we chant all those sutra in hatto. But most fo- [partial word]-if it is something very formal for the country, like chanting we have first-the first of every month, or fifteenth of every month, we chant sutra for the country. In that case, we chant it in Buddha hall. And noon service usually held in Buddha hall too.

And next-next service or chanting is for arhat.[8] This point, you know-you may wonder why Mahayana Buddhists chant for Hinayana, you know, arhats [laughs]. You may wonder, but we strictly observe chanting for arhats who is so-called-it, you know, Hinayana Buddhist. Hinayana or Mahayana is, you know, just, you know-when Mahayana Buddhists arise, they denounced, you know, Theravada Buddhist because of they-Theravada Buddhists or Hinayana Buddhists just, you know-their practice is just for themselves and not much for others. And Mahayana Buddhist-Buddhists' practice is for others too-for themselves and for others too.

But this is a kind of, you know, discrimination which we should-as a Buddhist, which we shouldn't [practice]. So in Soto School-or I think in Rinzaï too-we recite a sutra for arhats, who were the direct disciples of Buddha. And there are many arhats. We count at least sixteen arhats.

Many of tho- [partial word]-we find-find many Buddha's disciples which belong to-which is included ten famous buddhas, outstanding buddhas, and disciple.

There are various kinds of Buddha's disciple, you know: the disciple who was very forgetful, maybe like me [laughs]. He couldn't-he couldn't remember a single words even. So Buddha didn't know what to do with him. So he taught him to sweep garden only, and he swept the garden always. And at that time he was saying-sweeping garden and-and sweep your mind. And he was sweeping the garden, reciting that short words. But he practiced his way so sincere that-so at last he attained arhatship by sweeping garden. He is very famous, you know. Buddhists, you know, put emphasis in actual, you know, attainment, not wisdom-not wisdom acquired by intellectual study, but actual experience of renunciation to-which will go beyond our intellectual understanding of the teaching.

Those arhats-the arhats, you know-their practice, of course, you know-arhats practice for arhats-or practice of Theravadin Buddhism-or we call it sometime Hinayana practice-is, as you know, practice of four stage of meditation.[9] Most teachers who come [from] southern countries or from Tibet talks about four stage of practice which we will attain by our meditation. For-for us Zen student, it is important to know what is the four stages of zazen.

The first stage is the practice, you know, with various-with many desires or ignorance. The cause of ignorance is-cause of-we count desires maybe four or five. The drowsiness, you know. And ignorance-so-called-it mumyo-ignorance. Ignorance of no under- [partial word]-ignorance-ignorance means, you know, has very deep sense.[10] Because of ignorance we came [laughs]-we appeared in this world. It is more than, you know, ignorance in its intellectual sense. And greed. Those are three important, you know, and anger. The fi- [partial word]-in the first stage we shouldn't have, you know, drowsiness [laughs]. If you-when you are sleepy, even though you are sitting, you are not actually sitting. So drowsiness is the enemy of the practice.

And anger is also the enemy of the practice. If you are angry, you know, you cannot sit, you know. When you sit, you are, you know-when you start to sit, you are not angry anymore. But as long as you are sitting, you have no anger. You will have some of desires, but controlling somehow the desires, except drowsiness or anger, we can sit pretty well. And when we-when you sit, your mind become clear, and you can think, you know, in the first stage.

So in the first stage, you will have clear mind-clear thinking mind, and you will have control of, you know, some control of various desires, and you have no anger. You have no drowsiness. That is the first stage.

[In] the second stage, you have-you don't think. That is the second stage. But you have, you know, so- [partial word]-you have emotional, you know, trouble or desires, but you don't think.

In the third stage, you don't have emotional, you know, problem. Emotionally you are calm in the third stage. And you have joy of calmness of, you know, or calming-joy of no problem of emotional problem-problems. So there you have emotionally-joy of being emotionally very calm.

In the last stage, which is the fourth stage, you [do not?] have even joy of calming down or conquering emotional difficulties. You have no joy of anything. That is the fourth stage. And there, you know, you will attain arhatship. There you have nothing to attain or nothing to study at the fourth stage, which is the highest stage. But later, you know, they-they put one more stage over it. But actual practice is the fourth stage is in a form world. And over the form world we have no-no-form [?] world. And no-no-form world is-consist of the meditation in which we experience nothingness of outward object.

And next one is, you know, the nothingness within ourselves, you know. Even though you experience emptiness of outward object, you have some idea of outward object, you know, noth- [partial word]-emptiness of outward objects, so your mind is directed to outwards.

But in next stage your mind will be directed inward, like a jewel, you know, shine [by?] itself. And like jewel has nothing, you know, in themselves. That is the second stage.

And [in] the third stage, we have no idea of anything which is inside or outside. That is the third stage. And [in] the fourth stage is-we don't have any idea of somethingness or nothingness. Or we have no idea of nothingness even. That is the last stage.

So we count eight, you know, dhyana: [11] first to fourth stage, and adding to it four stages. The last stage is the characteristic, you know-you can see the characteristic of Buddhism.

When you, you know, in usual, you know, Indian meditation-according to usual meditation-excluding Buddhist meditation-those who meditate, you know, [in the] first stage will, you know, accordingly, you will be [re?]born in the first deva or heaven. And when you practice second dhyana, you will be [re?]born-you will come-appear in the second heaven. In this way we have, you know, respectively, four heavens.

But, you know, if-if you-someone who appeared in heaven, according to Buddhism, should disappear from heaven too, you know [laughs]. Something which appears should disappear, you know. There is nothing which does not disappear. So even, you know, [if] you go to heaven, you know, you appear in the heaven, you should disappear from the heaven. That is, you know, so-called-it "karma."

You have karma, you know. You create karma to go to, you know, heaven, and as long as you have karma to go to heaven, that karma will continue, and you will eventually, you know [laughs], went down to the bottom of the first or "desire world." So unless you, you know-as long as you are depend on karma, your practice is depend on karma activity or karmic practice. That practice is not Buddhist practice, because it is-the practice is involved in karmic activity.

So Buddhist practice should go beyond karmic practice. That is why we practice shikantaza, which is go beyond the way to go which is-which do not expect any result from our practice. Just to sit, just to resume our true nature is our practice, without, you know, trying to attain something, without being involved in karmic activity. That is Buddhist practice, you know. Various teachers, so far, from southern countries and Tibet, emphasize this point.

Our practice should start from nothing and end in to nothing [laughs]. That is [laughs] our practice. So that is, you know, the stage arhat, you know, will attain finally. That is arhat. They-their practice is very-very much similar to the non-Buddhistic practice, but actually there is clear distinction from non-Buddhistic practice.

[Line 1. Aogi koi negawakuwa shokan, fushite kanno o taretamae.]

In-in the sutra-in the eko we say, Aogi koi negawakuwa shokan, fushite kanno o taretamae. Aogi koi negawakuwa. Aogi-aogi is "to-to look upward." Aogi koi negawakuwa. Koi negawakuwa.is "we-what we want-I want or I ask." "Looking upward, what we ask is" shokan. Shokan is "Buddha's witness," you know, or "Buddha's protection." Fushite kanno o taretamae. Fushite means "to-to kneel down." Fushite. Fushite kanno o taretamae-"respond." When we have-when we kneel down with selfish [selfless?] attitude, with pure mind, then buddha-nature hereby will appear. So kanno means "respond."

Objectively speaking, you know-subjectively speaking, our buddha-nature arise from our innate nature, but objectively speaking, buddha-nature will come to us when we kneel down with pure mind. The buddha-nature will come to us. So fushite-"kneeling down, we ask respond-response of buddha-nature." It means that, you know, "we, looking upward, seeing respectively many arhats, we ask for their protection, and, looking-kneeling down, we ask arhats to join our practice." That is what it means.

[Line 2. Jorai, Maka Hannyaharamita Shingyo o fujusu, atsumuru tokoro no kudoku wa]

Jorai, you know, "so far-why we recite it-this sutra." Jorai. Jo is "up." Rai is "come." So "until now we recited Prajña Paramita Sutra." And why we recite it, the Prajña Paramita Sutra, was-the merit-atsumuru tokoro no kudoko wa. Atsumuru is "to-we concentrate" or "gather up," you know, the merit of reciting sutra.

[Line 3. jippo joju no sambo, kakai muryo no kensho]

We recite the sutra for-jippo joju no sambo. Jippo joju no sambo kakai muryo no kenjo[12], we say. I-I didn't put in-eyes-my eyes [laughs]. [Probably referring to eyeglasses.] Jippo joju no sambo. Jippo is ten-okay-it's-it is okay-jippo joju is-jippo means "ten directions." Joju means "always present." Joju. Ju is "dwell" or "live" or "is." "Which exist in ten direction." [13] Jo is "always." Ju is "dwell" or "live." So the sambo is "three treasures." So jippo-"three treasures which is-which present-which is present in ten directions always."

And kakai muryo no kenjo. Kakai is-ka is "seed"-oh no, "fruits," and kai is "ocean." Muryo is "limitless." Mu is "no." Ryo is "limit" or "measure." "Beyond measurement." So innumerable or incalculable or limitless.

Kensho means like sages and arhats. So ka-why we say "fruit" words is if you practice our way, that will be a-a seed of, you know, attainment, or seed of the merit. So practice-if practice is seed, the-what you will have by it is the result or fruit. But here, you know, we shouldn't understand fruit is next and seed is first. Fruit and seed is result in the same time in our practice. We should understand in that way, but rhetorically [?] we should say kakai muryo no kensho: "All the sages and arhats, which are in the limitless sea of the attainment, especially sixteen arhats-sixteen arhats."

[Line 4. juroku dai arakan, issai no ogu burui kenzoku ni eko su.]

Juroku. Juroku is "sixteen." [14] Dai arakan: "the great arhats." And issai-"all." Issai is "all." Ogu-ogu is another name of arhats, "who is worthy for offering," you know. [15] O means "respond," and gu is "offering": "who is worthy for receive offering." That is arhat. "All the arhats."

Burui kenzoku. "And the arhats who belongs to each sixteen arhats," you know. There are sixteen arhats, and many arhats, you know-under each of sixteen arhats there were many arhats. That is kenzoku. Kenzoku is "the family," you know. Sixteen arhats were the head of [each of] the family of arhats. So [laughs]-many arhats. So some-in some temple, we say juroku dai arakan-gohyaku[16][corrects juroku to gohyaku] dai arakan. Sometime we say-we count five hundred [arhats].

Some people say why we say five hundred arhats is in the first assembly after Buddha, seventy-about one hundred years after Buddha passed away, they had big meeting to, you know, to-we say ketsuju. [17] Ketsuju means to-to have meeting and discuss about the teaching Buddha left and recited-someone recited the teaching, what Buddha told them, and the rest of the people, you know, corrected if there is some correction. And it is okay they-all of them said that was what Buddha said. They agreed. In this way, scripture was transmitted to us. So there were supposed to be five hundred disciples, so we say "five h-" [partial word]-gohyaku dai arakan, "five hundred arhats." But anyway, we count sixteen arhats or more.

Issai no ugu. Issai no, or "all [of]." [18] Ugu-ugu is another name of arhats. Arhats has many names. Arhats has, you know, because-according to the attainment, they have so many names, like "no-return sage." [19] "No-return sage" is after, you know, extinguishing all his karma. They do not come back to, you know, to this world anymore [laughs] because he has no karma to come back. That is a kind of stage he will attain. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over. Rest of original tape is extremely slow.]

... maybe tomorrow.

They have five powers. One of the five power is to-power to be sure that he will not come back, you know, in desire world again. That is one of the power of arhats or confidence of arhats. So we say arhats is fugen-ka: [20] "no-return stage" or "no-return sage." Or "slaying-enemy sage." [21] "Enemy" means, you know, enemy of mortality. So he has no enemy like [such as] mortality-like, you know, physical and mental desires. [22]

So sometime we call him-we translate, you know-Chinese people translated arhats in many ways: fugen-no sage or setsuzoku-no sage-setsuzoku is "slaying enemy sage." [23] Ugu is the one of the name of, or one of the translation of "arhats." Issai no ugu burui kenzoku. Kenzoku is "family." Burui is something like "tribe," you know. Bu is "group." [The suffix] -zoku is also "group." [24] They-there were various group of arhats.

[Line 5. Koinego tokoro wa,

Line 6. sanmyo rokutsu, mappo o shobo ni kaeshi goriki hachige,
gunjo o musho ni michibiki.

Line 7. Sammon no nirin tsuneni tenji, kokudo no sansai nagaku sho
sen koto o.]

Koinego tokoro wa,

sanmyo rokutsu, mappo o shobo ni kaeshi goriki hachige,
gunjo o musho ni michibiki.

Sammon no nirin tsuneni tenji, kokudo no sansai nagaku sho sen koto o.

Maybe better to explain this part-to leave it for next-tomorrow's lecture.

If we, you know, if you call-if you-if you say them [then?], you may think there [them?] is something quite different from Hinayana practice, but it is not actually so, especially for Soto school. Hinayana practice is- is very important. We do not discriminate [against] Hinayana practice at all. We respect arhats, and we respect their effort. And we ask arhats to join our practice, or we, you know, we-our desire, our wish is to practice hard as arhats practice. That is why we recite sutra for arhats every morning.

Do you have some question? Hai.

Questions and Answers

Student A: I read in Zen Notes[25] Sokei-an said that the arhat in the final stage liberates himself by his intellect-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student A: -liberates himself by his intellect.

Suzuki-roshi: Intellect? Intellect.

Student : Does that mean by thinking?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Thinking. That is not last stage, you know. It is the second-third stage they have no intellectual thinking. But they have joy of, you know, conquering our desires. That is the third stage. And last stage, we have no desire-no joy of anything but [1 word]. That is the last step. Maybe you-

Student A: Well, you said it was the last stage. And it made me think that when you use the word "intellect," it didn't mean that-

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe so.

Student B: -it didn't mean that [6-8 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe so. The difference is, you know, we have clear thinking. And they has [?] went without desires. But they are with-what we don't have is [1 word] and anger. We don't have. [Laughs.] Because you don't have it [laughs], you will not seek it. So, you know-interesting-more interesting point is, you know, everyone can, you know, go further. So final step is similar to arhats-last stage for arhats. [Tape ends, apparently before the question/answer session is finished.]

Appendix A: The Second Morning Eko

"Suzuki Roshi's Revised Translation of Morning EKO II"

Line 1. May Buddha observe our practice and give us his response to our sincerity.

Line 2. Thus, as we chant the Maha Prajñā Paramita Hridaya Sutra, we dedicate the collected merit to:

Line 3. the Three Treasures in the Ten Directions, past, present, and future, the innumerable wise men and sages who are in the Sea of the Fruit of Practice, and Line 4. the sixteen great arhats and their followers who attained the supreme attainment of arhatship.

Line 5. What we aspire to is that Line 6. the Three Powers the Six Unrestricted Ways of the arhats may be always with us in our unceasing effort to renew Buddha's way, to save all sentient beings from the world of suffering and confusion, Line 7. to keep the Two Wheels of the dharma turning forever, and to avert the Three Calamities forever.

[Note: This translation, with minor grammatical revisions by the present transcriber, was reprinted from David Chadwick's Eko Study Book, 1970, p. 82. According to David Chadwick (10/8/99), he may have reviewed the translation with Suzuki-roshi, but, if so, only briefly. It does not follow the text of the transcript as Suzuki-roshi translated this eko. (See, e.g., the end of SR-70-07-12.)]

---

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript and Eko Study Book by David Chadwick; transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997; transcript checked and corrected against tape by Bill Redican 11/18/99.

Appendix B

Eihei-ji Monastery, Fukui Prefecture, Japan

From Daihonzan Eiheiji, Yoshida-gun

Fukui-ken, Japan 910-12, 1988

[1] Another English version, entitled "Suzuki Roshi's Revised Translation of Morning EKO II" is appended from Chadwick, 1970, p. 82. See Appendix A.

[2] The first words of the lecture are missing on tape. Phrase in brackets was based on Suzuki-roshi's own wording in Paragraph 7.

[3] Also sanmon.

[4] Also commonly daikuin, "main kitchen."

[5] If the kitchen is to the left of the Buddha hall, the sodo/zendo would be on the right (directions described while facing the Buddha hall from the main gate).

[6] At Eihei-ji, the yokushitsu (bathing hall) is to the right of the main gate, and the tosu (toilet) is to the left.

[7] Sammon, butsuden, hatto, sodo/zendo, (dai)kuin, yokushitsu, tosu.

[8] Suzuki-roshi pronounced it "arahat" throughout, which is one of several variations on the word: arhat (San.), arahat (Pali), arakan (Jap.), fusho (Jap.), ogo (Jap.), lohan (Chin.), rakan (Jap.), and setsuzoku (Jap. trans. of Chin.).

[9] Possibly referring to the four stages of the supramundane path (magga) taught in the Hinayana tradition: (1) stream-enterer; (2) once-returner; (3) never-returner; and (4) worthy one (arhat).

[10] mumyo: mu (Jap. "no"); myo (Jap. "to be clear"); ignorance of the true nature of existence (cf. SR-67-08-14).

[11] dhyana (Sanskrit) or jhana (Pali): meditation; absorption; an absorbed state of mind arising from concentration.

[12] Not kensho, as in version at start of lecture. Kenjo and kensho may be two different ways of pronouncing the same word in Japanese.

[13] Ten directions (jippo): the four standard points of the compass

(N, S, E, W), plus the mid-points (NE, SE, NW, SW), plus up and down.

[14] By tradition, there were sixteen original disciples of Shakyamuni Buddha.

[15] Arhat is also derived from the root "worthy": arh, "to deserve, to be worthy, to be fit." The Japanese arakan may derive from araka, "remote": an arahant is said to be remote (araka) from sinful things (see Majjhima Nikaya, I, 280).

[16] gohyaku (Jap.): five hundred.

[17] 500 monks, all arhats, are said to have assembled in 480 B.C.E. near Rajagriha, India, for the First Buddhist Council.

[18] The no indicates the possessive "of."

[19] Possibly referring to the third of the four stages of the supramundane path: the stage of never-returning. Someone who has reached this stage (an anagamin) is not born again in the world of desire or sensuality (kamadhatu).

[20] fugen-ka: Japanese term for Sanskrit anagamin. See also anagon (Jap.).

[21] See Note 22.

[22] A never-returner has overcome the first five fetters: (1) belief in one's individuality or ego (drishti), (2) skepticism or doubt, (3) clinging to rites and rules, (4) craving, desire, or sensual appetite, and (5) hatred or resentment. An arhat also overcomes the remaining five fetters.

[23] Also, "killing the thief" or "killing the enemy"-i.e., overcoming passions. Hence, someone who has overcome his or her passions.

[24] As in kenzoku.

[25] From 1954-1995, a monthly publication of The First Zen Institute of America (founded in New York City by Sokei-an Sasaki [1882-1945]).

5 - Eko Lecture #3

Saturday, July 11, 1970

Eko Lecture #3: The Second Morning Eko, Part 2 of 3
Tassajara

[This is the third in a series of six lectures by Suzuki-roshi on the four ekos chanted at the conclusion of morning services at San Francisco Zen Center and other Soto Zen temples and monasteries.

The Second Morning Eko:

Choka ugu fugin

Line 1. Aogi koi negawakuwa shokan, fushite kanno o taretamae.

Line 2. Jorai, Maka Hannyaharamita Shingyo o fujusu, atsumuru tokoro no kudoku wa,

Line 3. jippo joju no sambo, kakai muryo no kensho,

Line 4. juroku dai arakan, issai no ugu burui kenzoku ni eko su.

Line 5. Koinego tokoro wa,

Line 6. sanmyo rokutsu, mappo o shobo ni kaeshi goriki hachige, gunjo o musho ni michibiki.

Line 7. Sammon no nirin tsuneni tenji, kokudo no sansai nagaku sho sen koto o.

Dedication for the Morning Service Arhat's Sutra

Line 1. May Buddha observe [see?] us and respond.

Line 2. Thus, as we chant the Maha Prajña Paramita Hridaya Sutra, we dedicate the collected merit to Line 3. the all-pervading, ever-present Triple Treasure, the innumerable wise men in the ocean of enlightenment,

Line 4. the sixteen great arhats and all other arhats.

Line 5. May it be that

Line 6. with the Three Insights and the Six Universal Powers,

the true teaching be restored in the age of decline.

With the Five Powers and Eight Ways of Liberation,

may all sentient beings be led to nirvana.

Line 7. May the two wheels of this temple forever turn and this country always avert the Three Calamities.]

Last night I-I explained-oh, excuse me-already about arhat. The second sutra-second sutra reciting of Prajña Paramita Sutra is for arhats. And in eko it says:

[Line 1.] Jo-Aogi koi negawakuwa shokan, fushite kanno o taretamae.

[Line 2.] Jorai, Hanyā Shingyo o fujusu, atsumuru tokoro no kudoku wa,

Some people say, Jorai, Maka Hanyaharamita Shingyo o fujusu, but some other people say, Jorai, Hanyā Shingyo-don't-without saying Maka. That is more usual. Jorai, Hanyā Shingyo o fujusu.

When we, you know, when kokyo start sutra, we say MakaHanyaharamita Shingyo, and when we-in-in sutra-in eko we say, Jorai, HanyāShingyo o fujusu. That is more usual. But you can say:

[Line 2.] Jorai, Maka Hanyaharamita Shingyo o fujusu, atsumuru tokoro no kudoku wa,

[Line 3.] jippo joju no sambo, kakai muryo no kenjo,[1]

[Line 4.] juroku dai arakan, ogu issai burui[2] kenzoku ni eko su.

We already-I explained already so far, and tonight I have to explain about arhats' so-called-it "supernatural power."

Sanmyo[3] rokutsu. Sanmyo rokutsu is-sanmyo is the-the power of-of clair- [partial word]-clairvoyant, you know, to see things through various obstacles. He-he can see his past life, even.

And next one is to hear everything from a distant. That is a[n] arhat's power. And the last one is the power to put an end to the kar- [partial word]-karmic life. So arhat-for arhats there is no karma because he extinguished all the desires, and he has no-he doesn't cause any karma.

That is the third one. Sanmyo. San is "three." Myo is "clear-clear powerful power." That is sanmyo.

The rokutsu.[4] Rokutsu is-in rokutsu is those three [sanmyo] is included. And when we say rokutsu, to-the power to read someone's mind is the-one of them. And to know, you know- The first one in rokutsu-the first one is the-to see everything-clairvoyant-ears to-capable of hearing everything. So-and to read someone's mind, to have insight into others. And he is able to observe or-observe the cause of the various suffering. And-shuku-shuku-shukumyotsu[5]-and he has power of to see people's past life, including his past life. And he has a kind of supernatural power to fly, you know, or to cross the river without boat-that kind of supernatural perfect freedom from everything. This is more, you know, subjective, you know, power. But you-you cannot say this kind of power is something objective power. [It is] more subjective, but for him, you know, that ki- [partial word: kind?]-he [an arhat] has that kind of power. Or he thinks, you know, he-he has some conviction, you know, like this.

And how he attained this kind of power is power of practice. And this kind of practice is called, in Chinese, shuzen. Shuzen means practice to attain some supernatural power is shu- [partial word]-a kind of practice which is called shuzen.

But the last one-the-to know, to extinguish all the cause of the karma, is the more Buddhistic practice and only Buddhist-the power only Buddhist have. The Buddhist, you know-purpose of Buddhist practice is to be free from karma is the-why Buddhist practice Buddhist way.

And the last one is the most important one. So there is some koan about this. Some, you know, arhat-some sage or hermit called [on] the Buddha and said, "We have five supernatural powers, but I heard that you have six, you know, supernatural power. What is the last one?" [Laughs.] And the gedo, or, you know, the hermit or sage asked Buddha. Buddha didn't say anything, but he said-the hermit said in this way: "What is that-what is that power which we do not have?"-he asked-sage asked-hermit asked.

Buddha said, without answering to his question-yeah-he said, "What will be that," you know, "what will be that last super-" [partial word]-not supernatural power, but-"that last power? What do you think it is?"- Buddha asked.

Buddha knows that even-even though he explain, he [the sage] will not understand what is the last one, the power to be completely free from karma. Usually, you know, people, even Buddhist, thinks after attaining arhatship they will have that sixth powers, including the power to be free from karma. But that last, you know, the power to be free from karma, is not any special [laughs] power. It is quite, you know, usual power we have.

But we do not care for that power so much, and we ignore that power always. Although we have it, we ignore it, and we think we have no such power. But actually we have. So the sage thought, "Buddha must have some special power," you know. Five powers he-he has is already supernatural, special power, but "Buddha has more special power," he thought. But Buddha, you know, didn't have any special power. But he knows what kind of power he himself has.

Usually, because we don't know what is that power, we are involved in karmic practice. If we know that, you know, we have-originally have that kind of power, we will not, you know, create any karma. Just because we are ignorant of it, we create karma for ourselves. So even to, you know, practice to attain some special power is, you know, actually to create karma for himself. So even though-because of those practice-to fly to the heaven or to-to go to the heavenly body without any trouble, but if he-if he goes to the-some heavenly body, he has to come back to this world. If you die, you know, in the heavenly body-if he appeared in-if he take a bath in the heavenly body, he should die in the heavenly body. That is-that kind of, you know, supernatural power do not possess any power to be free from karma. But last power, which Buddhist has, [is] the power to be free from karma, and for that purpose we practice our way.

Dogen-zenji, you know, in his Shobogenzo, [in] the fascicle of supernatural power, "Jinzu." [6] Jinzu-rokujinzu, [7] we say. "Six." Jin is, you know, usually translated, maybe, [as] "supernatural power," but jin is "true"-something which is true is jin. True power. Tsu is, you know, to-the power which is-maybe you can use the word "omnipresent," or "wherever you go, there is that power"-the power which everyone has. That is tsu in its true sense.

But, you know, when we say five power or six power, that power is power to work for some purpose. But true power which we have or fundamental original power which we have is the power to work everywhere under various circumstances. That is tsu. Rokujinzu: six true universal powers-you cannot say "universal"-or effective power or-mmm-it doesn't come, that word-very useful words-English words. You can-something you can-power you can apply to every circumstances.

There is also-in Shobogenzo ["Jinzu"], he [Dogen] referred to the story, you know, Zen story between Isan [8] and his disciple, Kyozan. [9] Isan [and] Kyozan are the founder of Igyo-shu. I-kyo-shu. "Isan's/Kyozan's school." Isan, you know, one day was taking nap [laughing] in his cabin, maybe. He was sleeping. And his disciple, you know, Kyozan, opened the door and see the-his teacher Kyozan [Isan] was sleeping. So his-Isan, you know, the teacher [thought] "Oh, someone-someone came. Oh my!" So he turned to the wall, you know. He was sleeping this way. But because someone came, he turned to the-faced to the wall-turned, you know, his body.

And-and his disciple Kyozan [said], "Oh, I am sorry," he said, "but don't be disturbed. I am your disciple. Don't worry. [Laughs.] Don't be so formal," you know, he said.

And he [Isan] was going out [got up to leave], you know, and the teacher said, "Hey, Kyozan." [Laughs, laughter.]

And Kyozan, you know, came back. And sha- [partial word] "May I help you?" he said.

"Yes. I had a good dream," you know, "so I want to tell you about my dream."

The disciple said-disciple, you know, sit down [and asked], "What was the dream?"-[laughs, laughter] his disciple said.

And Kyozan [Isan] said, "What do you think that was?"-the teacher said.

That was the story, you know. [Laughs, laughter.] And, you know, what is, then, supernatural power? What is a supernatural power? Supernatural power is already there, you know [laughing], and moreover, you know, his disciple, because he was asked, "What do you think my dream was?"-so he went out to the kitchen and brought a-a b-[partial word: basin?]-brought some water in the basin with towel. And put the water, you know-offered the water to Kyozan-Isan.

Isan [said or thought], "Oh, this is very good!" And he washed his face and wiped his face with the towel. And, you know, as soon as he wiped-finished wiping his face, Kyogen,[10] another disciple, came in. And, you know, Isan again [said]: "We are talking about good-my good dream. What do you think it was?"[laughs]-Isan asked Kyozan [Kyogen].[11] Kyozan [Kyogen], you know, went to the kitchen again and brought a cup of tea [laughs].

"Please have a cup of tea because you washed your face already. How about cup of tea?" That was, you know, Isan-Kyozan's [Kyogen's?] supernatural power [laughs]. That was the koan [laughs].

This kind of, you know, power could be extended everywhere, you know. There is no end, you know, [to] this kind of good relationship between teacher and disciple. There is no end in the relationship. Even though he is teacher, he has no idea of being their teacher. Even though they are disciple, they-they feel as if his [their] teacher is their friend. But they know exactly, you know, what [laughs] their teacher need and what they-what his-what he means. That is-Dogen-zenji says, that is real, you know, power who-which really well-trained teachers and disciple-disciples have.

This kind of power, you know, or this kind of-way of practice, for us, it is, you know, we ignore this kind of practice. You may, you know, rigidly practice zazen [laughs], but you will ignore this kind of practice. Sometime your rigid idea of practice will-be hindrance of the real practice, which was going [on] between Isan and Kyozan. Dogen-zenji-Dogen admired their practice very much. "That is real practice," he said.

When you continue this kind of practice without any idea of teacher or disciple or practice, even, then there is no way to create karma. Even though you see things, you know, things does not create any problem for you because you don't feel you saw something, you know. Even though you see it, you don't even remember what you have seen. If it is necessary it will be in your mind, but when it is not necessary that object-that object you saw will vanish. So no karma, or no trace of practice, or no trace of activity remain. That is-that kind of practice looks like very easy and common [laughs], but actually this kind of practice will ap- [partial word: appear?]-will go [on] between, you know, good teacher and good disciple. This is, you know, actually the last power of sanmyo, and last power of six supernatural power.

[Line 6.] sanmyo rokutsu, mappo o shobo ni kaeshi goriki hachige,
gunjo o musho ni michibiki.

Sanmyo rokutsu. Sanmyo rokutsu. And-and in eko it says, Sanmyo rokutsu, mappo o shobo ni kaeshi. Mappo-mappo is, you know, last stage in Buddhist history, where there is no more Buddhism [laughs, laughter]. [12] Last period. According to. you know, scripture, last-first 1,000 year after Buddha's death is the shobo, "the age of right law-right dharma." There they practice our way very hard, and there there is teacher and teaching, and-and so they can attain enlightenment in the first 1,000 years after Buddha passed away.

And next stage, next-after 1,000 year, the zobo-period of zobo will start. There there is teaching, but-and there is, you know, teachers, but teachers who has no enlightenment. So [laughs] knows-teachers knows what is Buddhism, but actually they do not practice so hard. But they know what is Buddhism intellectually. So there is no student who attain enlightenment. That is, you know, the time of zobo, which will continue for 1,000 years more.

And the last period is after 2,000 year from Buddha's death, and there there is no Buddhism. There may be some, you know, relics of Buddhism [laughs], but there is no Buddhism at all. Even [if] there is teaching, no one read it. No one knows what is Buddhism. According to some scriptures, you know, it is so.

And that period in Ja- [partial word]-history of Japanese Buddhism, that mappo, the last period, started from Kamakura period, when Nichiren [13] or Shinran[14] appear. Dogen, you know, appeared in that-in the same age. It is-it may be about 1200 [C.E.], yeah. And so Shinran or Dogen-Shinran or Nichiren thought because this is, you know, a time of the last period of Buddhism where-when Buddhism will be banished [vanished?], so the teaching should be changed. The teaching should be some teaching which is-which could be applied in the last period of Buddhism.

That is why Nichiren and-and by Nichiren and Shinran, a kind of reformation of Buddhism was done. But it is not actually reformation, you know. It is more, we can say, restoration of [Buddhism]. He-they tried to restore the Buddhism-the Buddhism in the time of Buddha.

But way, you know-Shinran, for an instance, thought, because it is-it is not possible to attain enlightenment any more for the people in this period, so the only way is to, you know, to ask the help of Buddha, and by means of Buddha's help will-will be saved, reciting, you know, Namu Amida butsu. And with strong faith, believing in Amida Buddha's power, they will be saved. That was, in short, Shinran's way.

And Nichiren, you know, thought it is, you know, the time of mappo now, but according to Lotus Sutra, if we recite Lotus Sutra, or if we recite it for-for others, or if we obtain Lotus Sutra, even, the merit of obtaining the Lotus Sutra, or merit of reciting Lotus Sutra will save us even in the period-period of mappo. So ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... maybe his good means of, you know, maybe so. But he actually believed in that-believed in that way. Even though people may read Lotus Sutra, if they do not actually observe things as it is described in Lotus Sutra, he cannot be a true teacher. So he wanted to prove the power of Lotus Sutra. So he-so that he can prove the power of the Lotus Sutra, he did many things-he tried many things. Once he was almost killed by the people which was sent by government at Kamakura, but their sword break-broke when they wanted to kill Nichiren. That was actually appeared in that way as you read it in Lotus Sutra.

So he said, "This is the power of," you know, "Lotus Sutra." And he said, you know, "If-because we-no one believe in Lotus Sutra, which is the only sutra for the period of mappo, so something terrible will happen to Japan." And several years later, you know, the Mongolians, you know, came, you know, to conquer Japan with many ships. But Nichiren thought, "If-if I am believe in this sutra, the Japan will not be conquered." And as he said so, the Mongolian ships were destroyed by the hurricane [laughs] before they arrived to Hakata in Kyushu.[15] So people, you know, were terrified [by] the power of the Lotus Sutra. In that way, you know, Nichiren School was established.

Shinran, you know-after the many years of war period, when people did not know what to do, Shinran said, "If you say-just say Namu Amida butsu, you will be saved.[16] Amida Buddha will save you. So why don't you recite the name of Amida Buddha?" Without traveling [to] various countries, sometime he was sent to some lonely island, [like] Sado, but he did not stop his practice. He was strongly believe in Amida Buddha and his power of faith.

In this way, you know, in Kamakura period, even [if] it was already the last period of Buddhism, a new Buddhism, you know, arise. Dogen was one of them. But Dogen's attitude is quite different, you know. He did not believe in, you know, mappo. That is just skillful means of Buddha. Actually, there is no such thing [as the] last period or the first period or second period. That is just Buddha-to encourage people to believe in Buddhism. Buddha said so to encourage people. So that is just skillful means.

So even [if] it is the time of mappo, if we practice hard we will attain enlightenment. The Buddha-Buddhism will not die. He believed in-Dogen believed in his practice, the practice of, you know, practice of non-practice. That is [laughs] Dogen's practice. There is nothing to practice, especially. Whatever we do, that is practice. If so, there is no special practice.

By shikantaza you will not gain anything, but you will be you yourself. So by shikantaza you will establish yourself on yourself. You will be you. Tile will be a tile. Mirror will be a mirror. And that is, you know, our practice. There is no secret in our practice. If that is practice, there is no special teaching like Buddhism. The Buddhism is already there when Buddha appeared in this world. It is not because Buddha appeared in this world [that] Buddhism was established. That is, you know, Dogen-zenji's understanding of Buddhism.

So the last power of practice is without being involved in karmic practice. How we should practice our way was Buddhist practice. So Buddhist practice start from nothing-nothingness, not from somethingness. We start our practice from nothing to attain nothing [laughs]. That is Buddhist practice. You may think that is very strange, but that is, in short, Buddha's-Buddhist practice.

[Line 6.] sanmyo rokutsu, mappo o shobo ni kaeshi goriki hachige,
gunjo o musho ni michibiki.

Sanmyo rokutsu, mappo o shobo ni kaeshi goriki hachige. Goriki-goriki is-here it says: faith, and exertion-exertion, mindfulness, contemplation-contemplation-zazen, you know-dhyana-and wisdom. This-those are five powers.

And hachige. Hachige is rather complicated. It is related to Theravadan practice. I explained last night about primitive Buddhist practice: four stage for zazen, for Zen-four stages of Zen, of form world, [and] four practice of non-form world. That makes eight. And in each stage there is attainment-renunciation. Eight-eight meditation power, or eight kinds of renunciation to free one from attachment-our attachment-to free from everything.

The first-as I explained last night, the-in the first stage you have no anger, or you have no drowsiness. Because you are not angry, and you-your mind is very calm, so you can think clearly. And you have physical joy, and spiritual joy, and concentration. So in the first stage you have clear thinking which can be, you know, contemplation of shastra[17] of teaching-dharma, or you can observe things clearly. That is thinking mind. And physical joy, and mental joy, and concentration. So you have four. One-two-three-four-five.

And in the second stage, you-you-you don't think in the second stage. So your mind is more clear, you know, because you don't think even. There is no waves of mind-thinking mind-so you are, you know, physically and mentally or emotionally or mentally, you will be more-you have a kind of joy of [being] free from emotional disturbance or thinking faculties. And you have concentration-good concentration.

So you have there inner purity of mind-inner purity of mind free from thinking, and you have physical joy, and physical or emotional, you may say, or emotional joy and spiritual joy, or mental joy and concentration. By this-in this stage, what you will have-the power you will have is to see all things. How you get, you know, how you get this kind of power, you know-they practice, you know, various practice, you know, [for example] to see a skeleton [laughs]-to put skeleton in front of you and you sit [concentrate] on it. So even [if a] beautiful lady appears in front of you, we may say, "Oh, that is skeleton!" [Laughs.] "In that way you will be free from, you know, objective world." [Laughs, laughter.]

You may laugh, but actually they did it-sometime in front of fire they sit; in front of water they sit. Or they contemplated on our physical being, observing physical body is a bag of nasty things [laughs]. It is [laughs, laughter]-it looks-looks like beautiful. It is mostly practice for men, maybe [laughs]. "So a woman, maybe, looks like very beautiful, but inside of the woman is nasty, you know [laughs, laughter]-[containing] five organs and many things" [laughs, laughter]. They practiced, you know, in that way. That is more, you know [laughs]- And in that way they wanted to be free from objective world.

But in the second stage, they, you know, changed their way-not to-to contemplate on objective being, but to contemplate in- [partial word]-inward, you know. Directed their concentration inward. And inwardly they could make ourselves sure that we are not permanent any more. So it is foolish to attach to ourselves. If so, it may be more foolish to attach to something outside [laughs]. If, you know, each one-each [something like a light bulb pops loudly; laughs, laughter]- If he is, you know, not worthy to attach to, then the people may, you know-outside people could be more worth- [partial word]-worthless to attach to. In that way, they wanted to be free from outward object. So their practice was the power of practice to see all things as impure, and thereby removed their lust-lust or desires.

Second one is to remove attachment to external phenomenon. Those, you know, power will be gained by-in the first and second stage of practice. And third one is the power of not to give arise [a rise?] to the desires even [if] phenomenon looks like beautiful, you know. Now, you know, after attaining the attach- [partial word]-detachment from themselves and from outside world, you know, they are quite sure-he will be quite sure that he has power of detachment.

So to make their power sure [sure of their power?], they tried to see some beautiful flowers, you know. If they, you know, attach to it-if they become attached to it or not. They tried, you know [laughs]. They opened their eyes and saw some beautiful lady. [They saw] if he attached to her again or not. That-and if he doesn't attach to someone, that is-it means that he has really, you know, the power of detachment [laughs]. In that way they test themselves. That is two [to?], you know, that is the third one. And it will-in this way, the-each-in each stage, they obtained more power of detachment and until they attain arhatship.

It is described in this way, but if you literally take this description, it is-it doesn't make much sense. But later, you know, in the formless world, when they attained the world of formlessness, their practice-their power obtained by their practice is to contemplate boundless space-boundless space of form, you know.

And they contemplate on the limitless consciousness of ourselves. That is more inward practice. So their practice became wider and wider and until their practice come to the area of void. That is the fifth one. And fourth one was to contemplate on boundless space. And the fifth one is to contemplate limitless world of consciousness inwardly. That is fifth one. Sixth one is to contemplate non-substantiality-non-substantiality. There is nothing, nothingness, complete voidness-not voidness-but nothingness.

And seventh one [is] to contemplate the state of beyond thought. The seventh one is to contemplate on substantial- [partial word]-non-substantiality in term of, you know, substance. The seventh one is to contemplate on beyond thought, you know. To contemplate on non-substantiality, you know. Non-substantiality is a kind of idea, isn't it? Non-substantiality. So to go beyond the idea of no- -non-substantiality is the seventh one.

And last one is metsujin-jo,[18] which is same as the third one of the three-sanmyo. To attain metsujin-jo-metsujin-jo is, you know-metsujin-jo: to-to have no karmic activity-a cessation of all the activity.

So for a long time, you know, they practiced zazen literally in this way-attached to this kind of psychological analysis, but actual practice cannot be like this actually. You can, you know, analyze your practice in that way-four or eight [stages of practice] or practice of form world, or practice of no- -no-form world. But actual practice, you know, cannot be like that.

So more and more Buddhists started to put more emphasis on actual practice, without analyzing our practice, without being involved in this kinds of, you know, stages. But if you carefully, you know, understand this kind of, you know, stages and interpretation of the stages, as I explained last night, there is very important key to the actual practice. But if you miss that kind of point, you will be easily caught by it.

Step by step: stepladder practice. We call it "stepladder practice." There is no end in stepladder practice. At first, you know, you may say there is three steps, but in each three steps-in each step there is three steps [laughs], and in each of the three steps there is three steps, if you carefully analyze it. So at least we have eighty-one steps or more [laughs]. Eighty-one, you know, eighty-one-two hundred [laughs, laughter] and forty-one stages. No end. So we shouldn't be caught by this kind of interpretation, you know. But we should have eyes to see what [it] actually means. And the people who set up this kind of teaching, you know, has-carefully they set up this kind of teaching, and commentary is-we have a great amount of commentary to those stepladder-like practice, so that it cannot be stepladder practice. We should, you know, understand this point.

So Dogen-zenji did not ignore this kind of practice and this kind of commentary and this kind of stepladder practice. But he more put emphasis on the everyday practice like to serve tea or to give their teacher water and towel or a cup of tea.

Hmm. Oh! [Probably discovers the late hour.] Excuse me [laughs]. No time for question tonight.

---

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript and Eko Study Book by David Chadwick; transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997; transcript checked and corrected against tape by Bill Redican 11/17/99.

[1] Not kensho, as in version at start of transcript. They may be two different ways of saying the same word in Japanese.

[2] Not issai no ogu burui, as in version at start of transcript.

[3] (Suzuki-roshi clearly says sanmyo, not sammyo. But both spellings are common.) Sanmyo refers to the three transcendental types of knowledge attained by an arhat, bodhisattva, or buddha. They are a subset of the six rokutsu (see below): (1) pubbenivassanussati (Pali): knowledge of former lives; (2) dibbacakkhu (Pali): divine eye; knowledge of the future destiny of oneself and others; (3) asavakkhaya (Pali): knowledge of the sufferings of the present life and the ways to remove their root cause, mental intoxicants.

[4] rokutsu or rokujinzu (Jap.); sad abhijñah (San.); chal-abhiñña (Pali): The six kinds of supernatural powers attributed to an arhat, bodhisattva, or buddha. The traditional six are:

(1) iddhividha (Pali): magical powers

(2) dibbasota (Pali): divine ear

(3) ceto-pariya-ñāna (Pali): knowledge of the minds of others

(4) dibbacakkhu (Pali): divine eye

(5) pubbenivassanussati (Pali): knowledge of former lives

(6) asavakkhaya (Pali): extinction of mental intoxicants or passions.

[See, e.g., G. P. Malalasekera (Ed.), Encyclopaedia of Buddhism, 1965, Vol. I, p. 98.]

[5] shukumyotsu (Jap.): Japanese term for No. 5, pubbenivassanussati. (See H. Inagaki, A Dictionary of Japanese Buddhist Terms, 1992, p. 252.)

[6] jinzu (Jap.): abhijñā (San.) or abhiñña (Pali). The five powers of sages or the six powers of arhats.

[7] rokujinzu or rokutsu (Jap.): sad abhijñah (San.) or chalabhiñña (Pali). The six kinds of supernatural powers. Roku (Jap.) = "six."

[8] Isan Reiyu or Zen Master Daii (Jap. for Guishan Lingyu): 771-853. Chan master of southern China; student and dharma heir of Hyakujo Ekai (Baizhang Huaihai).

[9] Kyozan (Gyozan) Ejaku (Jap. for Yangshan Huiji): 807-883. He and his master Isan co-founded the Iggyo School of Chan (Iggyo-shu in Japanese).

[10] Kyogen Chikan (Jap. for Xiangyan Zhixian): d. 898. Chan master; student and dharma heir of Isan.

[11] In the fascicle "Jinzu," Isan asks the question of Kyogen (not Kyozan), who then goes to get Isan a cup of tea.

[12] See also SR-70-06-01, pp. 11 and 13 (the third Sandokai lecture), for another discussion of these three time periods (the shozomatsu). The length of the time periods (e.g., 500 vs. 1000 years) differs from lecture to lecture, just as there are at least four views on the length of shobo and zobo in Zen literature (see, e.g., Japanese-English Buddhist Dictionary, p. 299).

[13] Nichiren (1222-1282): founder of Nichiren or New Lotus school of Buddhism in Japan, which places great emphasis on the Lotus Sutra.

[14] Shonin Shinran (1173-1262): founder of Jodo-shin-shu school of Buddhism in Japan, a community of lay followers who believe that liberation is attained by the help and grace of Amida Buddha.

[15] The first Mongol invasion fleet was damaged by a storm in November of 1274. The second Mongol invasion fleet was similarly afflicted in 1281.

[16] Namu Amida butsu: "Veneration to Buddha Amitabha." This nembutsu, recitation of the name of Amida (Amitabha) Buddha, is the meditation practice of the Jodo-shin-shu. If nembutsu is done with complete devotion, the practitioner may be reborn in the Pure Land of Amitabha.

[17] shastra (śastra, Sanskrit): instruction or textbook.

[18] metsujin-jo (Jap.) or nirodha-samapatti (Pali): "extinction of feeling and perception"; a state resembling death except for a sense of warmth, life, and consciousness.

6 - Eko Lecture #4

Sunday, July 12, 1970

Eko Lecture #4: The Second Morning Eko, Part 3 of 3
Tassajara

[This is the fourth in a series of six lectures by Suzuki-roshi on the four ekos chanted at the conclusion of morning services at San Francisco Zen Center and other Soto Zen temples and monasteries.

The Second Morning Eko:

Choka ugu fugin

Line 1. Aogi koi negawakuwa shokan, fushite kanno o taretamae.

Line 2. Jorai, Maka Hannyaharamita Shingyo o fujusu, atsumuru tokoro no kudoku wa,

Line 3. jippo joju no sambo, kakai muryo no kensho,

Line 4. juroku dai arakan, issai no ogu burui kenzoku ni eko su.

Line 5. Koinego tokoro wa,

Line 6. sanmyo rokutsu, mappo o shobo ni kaeshi goriki hachige,
gunjo o musho ni michibiki.

Line 7. Sammon no nirin tsuneni tenji, kokudo no sansai nagaku sho sen koto o.

Dedication for the Morning Service Arhat's Sutra

Line 1. May Buddha observe [see?] us and respond.

Line 2. Thus, as we chant the Maha Prajña Paramita Hridaya Sutra, we dedicate the collected merit to

Line 3. the all-pervading, ever-present Triple Treasure,
the innumerable wise men in the ocean of enlightenment,

Line 4. the sixteen great arhats and all other arhats.

Line 5. May it be that

Line 6. with the Three Insights and the Six Universal Powers,
the true teaching be restored in the age of decline.

With the Five Powers and Eight Ways of Liberation,
may all sentient beings be led to nirvana.

Line 7. May the two wheels of this temple forever turn and this country always avert the Three Calamities.]

In the second recitation of the Prajña Paramita Sutra, we dedicate for the-to the arhats and many various sages in the-in the world. And what we pray is-what we pray is-this is the translation Mel [Weitsman] and I did. "What we pray is that the wisdom-that the wisdom-and Three Wisdom-and the Six Unrestruct- [partial word]-Unrestricted Ways of the arhats."

Three Wisdom-we explain the Three Wisdom. "And the Six Unrestrict- [partial word]-Unrestr- [partial word]-Unrestricted Ways of the arhats may be always with us in our unceas-[partial word]-unceasing effort to renew Buddha's way to save all sentient beings from the world of suffering and confusion." "World of suffering and confusion" means the mappo. "And to keep Buddha's way always new to our-always-our al-[partial word]-world always." That is the spirit of Dogen.

We understand the three period of Buddhism[1] is just the skillful means of Buddha to encourage people to practice our way. And next: "And we encourage ourselves, and we pray to-we pray to arhats to encourage ourselves, to continue our practice, even in our adversity, and keep the wheel of dharma turning forever, and to avert disasters of fire, water, and wind, and calamities of war, epidemics, and famine. That is, actually, what it says in this eko. After reciting sutra we recite-ek- [partial word]-doan recite eko, as you know.

And I-I have to explain more about what we pray in this-the second paragraph of the eko. Actually we-it is-according to the usual way of observing ceremony, we Zen Buddhist apply the usual way of prayer. But, according to Dogen-zenji, there is no need for us to expect help from outside. He says: "We are protected, actually, from inside firmly, so we don't have to expect any protect from outside." That is his spirit. Nyingmo sude ni sakan nare kemo nan somata.[2] We are protected from inside, you know, by ourselves, always, incessantly.

So, we don't have to expect any help from, you know, outside. But actually, it is so-our belief is so, but, when we recite sutra, we follow the usual-we apply usually-usual dedication-way of dedication. And this is also Dogen's, you know, idea. He says-for an instance-I cannot find out his word regarding- We, you know, ac- [partial word: actually?]-we do not have any idea of dirty or pure, or any idea of calamity or disaster. But even so, he says, we have, you know, practice of cleaning restroom, you know. That is a kind of practice. We clean our body, you know, because our body is filthy, you know. Even though, you know, we-our face, or mouth, or body is clean, we sh- [partial word: should?]-when-if you get up, you should wash your face, and rinse clean your mouth, you know, even though it is clean. We do it as a practice, you know, but not because it is dirty. That is our practice.

So, if you think, you know, to cleaning of [to clean] restroom is dirty work, that is wrong-wrong idea. Restroom is not dirty. Clean. Even though you don't clean it, it is clean. Or more than clean. But, you know, even-but we have to clean it as a practice, not because it is dirty. If you do it because it is dirty-if you think you have to clean it because it is dirty, that is not our way.

[Line 6. sanmyo rokutsu, mappo o shobo ni kaeshi goriki hachige,
gunjo o musho ni michibiki.]

So far we explained goriki and hachige. And next word is gunjo o musho ni michibiki. Gunjo means "all sentient beings." Gun is "various folk" of [or] "folks," you know. Jo means "living being." So it means "sentient being." Musho[3] means "arhatship"-another name of arhat. Gunjo. But here it means "sentient being who is [in] confusion and suffering." Gunjo o musho: "to lead sentient beings who is in defilement to the arhatship by the power of unrestricted power of arhat."

[Line 7. Sammon no nirin tsuneni tenji, kokudo no sansai nagaku sho sen koto o.]

And Sammon no nirin. Sammon means "the main gate of the temple," but sometime it means-sammon-means "temple." Sometime it is one of the building which is gate, but sometime it means "temple"-all the temple. Sammon no nirin. Nirin is "two wheels." Two wheel is dharma wheel and-and alms wheel or materialistic support.

So when dharma wheel is turning, you know, our belief is if the dharma wheel is turning-going, then the materialistic wheel will be, you know, will-will be going, too. That-that we are not supported by anyone means our dharma wheel, actually, is not going [laughs]. So we should know that. If our dharma wheel doesn't go-if we are not supported by people, it means that our dharma wheel is not going. This is very true.

I-you know-I have-you know-I-since I know this world of Dogen-zenji, I experienced it, I tested whether [laughs] it is true or not. So I-even when I was in, you know, when I was almost, you know, especially in the-during the war, wartime, I had not much to eat [laughs]. Most priest, you know, worked to earn some money to support themselves and to support their families. But my belief was if I, you know, observe Buddhist way, faithfully, someone will support me, you know. If no one support me, it means that Dogen's world was not true [laughs, laughter]. So I never ask anyone to give anything to me, and I just observed the Buddhist way, without working in, you know, as a teacher, or as a clerk of the town office [laughs, laughter], or I-I raised some vegetables and sweet potato [laughs]. That is why I know how to raise vegetables [laughs] pretty well.

When I was cultivating temple garden, you know, I have pretty spacious temple garden in front of the building, so I dig the garden out, and took out all the stones, and put manure in it, and I raised, you know sweet-I was trying to raise sweet potato, and some [laughing] villagers came and helped me too. And I had a good crop.

And one day, my neighbor came and opened my rice box, you know. I had rice box as much-as big as this [probably gesturing to students] and as long as this. Pretty big. One day, they came and-came to help me cooking. When they opened the rice box, there was no rice at all [laughing]. She was quite astonish-astound, and she, you know, brought me some rice-not much, you know. She didn't have so much rice. And, you know, my neighbors and my members collected some rice, you know. But I had pretty many members, so I had a half, maybe [probably indicating that the rice-box was half-filled]-pretty many rice. But, you know, when people found out that I have a-a lot of rice [laughs], they come to the temple. So I gave it-gave my rice to them. And the more I gave my rice to them, the more I got the rice [laughs, laughter].

But at the time, Japanese people had a awful time, you know. At that time, most people-city people went to the farmer's family and [ex] changed their dressing [dresses], or geta,[4] or whatever it may be. Something good was changed to food: potato, or rice, or sweet potato, or pumpkin. But I had no difficult- [partial word]-no such difficulties. Most of the time, I had a plenty of food. But I didn't feel so good, you know, to eat something special, something different from the usual people, so I tried to eat the same food which was given to us.

The Tassajara food, you know, is wonderful, you know: strong and rich, in comparison to the food we had in the wartime. So I-I don't have any complaint about food. And, if you observe our way strictly, we will be-we are sure to be protected by Buddha. That is very true. We should-should trust people, and we should trust Buddha. Since then, since wartime, Japanese priest started to wear, you know, your suit, you know, giving up robes-not give up, but when they have funeral service [laughs], or memorial service, they wear it, you know, to observe service. But usually they didn't. I didn't feel so good about that, you know. So that is why I didn't, you know-I don't wear-that is why I always wear robes.

When I was coming to America, you know, almost all the priests who is going abroad wear, you know, good suits and shiny shoes [laughs, laughter], but the head was not shiny, their hair was pretty long and well-combed, but their shoes were very shiny. With shiny shoes and new suits [laughs, laughter], they came to America, because, you know, they thought to propagate Buddhism to America. They have to wear something-they have to be like-something like American people. But, even though they wear-they buy best suits and best shoes, Japanese are Japanese. They cannot be American people anyway. And the American people will find some fault in your wearing-way of wearing your suits or shoes. So, anyway, Japanese are Japanese, you know.

So that is one reason why I didn't come to America in, you know, suits. Another reason is I was disgusted with the priest who gave up robe and change their robe into suits to support themselves. When Dogen said: "We are protected from within, firmly, why do we expect support from outside?" That is our spirit. But [laughs] nowadays they started to lose that kind of spirit. The priests in Japan-most priests, I may say, in Japan, does not respect their way, their practice.

So we should [not?] expect from-material support from outside, but what we here it says, what we pray is dharma wheel and alms-and-what do you call it?-material fre- [partial word]-wheel goes smoothly forever. But to observe this kind of ceremony is important. Not because we have to beg arhats to help us, but because that is the way which we have [been] observing for long, long time. And this is, you know, how to repay the-to the bene- [partial word]-benevolence of the Buddha and arhats. Buddha and arhats are the people who, you know, supported themselves by their practice only, so if we observe, if we pay full respect to the arhat we will be also protected.

Sammon no nirin. Sammon no nirin. "Two wheels of Budd- [partial word]-temple will-may go smoothly." We say: "-food wheel and dharma wheel may go smoothly, and may the calamities of the country and the temple"-calamity like war, epidemic, and famine, or fire, water, wind. And big calamity is the calamity we will have in the last period of-kalpa-time. Many eons of time after all the universe will have big disaster-disaster, then we say koka.[5]

To some extent, you know, our universe will, you know, will-go on and on and will be built firmly, and firmer and firmer, until some-when we-when the universe go to some point, it will go to the destructive-it will enter into the process of destruction. That is also, you know, a kind of good means of Buddha.

We don't know-to-you know-if you-if we are going to the way of destruction, personally, we-from the time we were-we were born, we are going to the-we are in the process of death [laughs], you know, but that is just our understanding. But at the last period of time we will have big disaster. That is the "big disaster." The "small disaster" will be war, and epidemics, and famine, or flood, or fire, and the typhoon or hurricane. "May those, you know, disasters avert from us." That is how we-what we decide in the second-in the second dedication-dedication of the Prajñā Paramita Sutra. Words is going this way, you know: "I pray, I beg, may such-and-such," but spirit is different.

So in-when you recite sutra, you should express this spirit, you know. We should not, you know, observe our way or recite our sutra to ask arhat to help us, you know. That is not our spirit. When we recite sutra, the feeling we create here is the feeling of non-duality, perfect calmness, and strong conviction in our practice. That kind of feeling should be always with us. If that kind of feeling [is] always with us, we will be supported anyway.

If our practice, you know, become involved in dualistic, selfish practice to support our building, or organization, or to support our personal life, you know, there is not much feeling in our dedication. Only when, you know, we have strong confidence in our way, and without expecting anything, with, you know, deep, calm feeling, if we recite sutra, there there is our rea- [partial word: real?]-actual practice. That is, you know, context of our practice-meaning of practice.

So if you cannot express that kind of feeling in your way of dedication, that is not our way. So Dogen says: "If we do not practice our way with, you know, with everyone, with all sentient beings, with every being in the world, or in the cosmic space, that is not Buddhist way."

So the spirit of zazen, you know, the zazen practice, should be always with us, especially when we recite sutra or observe ceremony. The spirit should be always there, that kind of spirit: not dualistic selfish spirit, but calm, and deep, and firm-with firm conviction, we should observe our way. That is actually arhat's unrestricted power.

So to clairvoyance or to hear something, you know, through or from distant, is just a part of our power-unrestricted power. Our power should be always with all beings, and our everyday life should be protected-that kind of power which pervade everywhere-which is everywhere. That is, you know, the last unrestricted power of arhat and the most important unrest- [partial word: unrestricted?]-power of arhat.

When we observe our way in that way, you know .... [Tape turned over. Possibly not many words lost.] ... even though you want to create karma in that way, that is not possible. Because we are always with us, we are always one with all buddha-world, where there is no karmic activity. That which is going in the world of Buddha is just, you know, Buddha activity, there is nothing but Buddha activity in the realm of dharma world. In that way, when we observe our way, we do not create any karma. We are beyond the karmic world. So with this spirit, and with this understanding, we should observe our way. So when we observe our way in this-with this understanding, there must be actual spirit of this kind.

Nowadays, you know, as our world become busier and busier, you know, even in a big monastery in Japan, they have not much [laughs] time to dedicate, you know, our way, you know, without any idea of time. So, you know, their doan is watching always time [laughs, laughter]-time to, maybe-"How many memorial service we may have?" [laughs], or "Ten more service, then it will be-will be-our breakfast will be-very late, so, let's make it faster [laughing, laughter]. It become faster and faster!

As we know, you know, how much-before we start morning service, we know how much service we will have, so from the beginning, we-we s- [partial word: say?]: Maka Hannyaharamita Shingyo [chanting very fast]-GONG! [Laughs, laughter.]

They may think, you know, if they recite many sutras, they will be supported better [laughing], but actually it is not so. It is same, you know. Even though you cannot observe memorial service, ten [times]-but if you observe, you know, with the-with our spirit, one or two, we'll be supported anyway, you know.

If we are involved in the idea of time too much, you know, or feeling of the members too much, we will lose our way, and in this way, we lose our way, we lose our practice. And naturally, people lose Buddhism, you know. Our members thinks we have our priest, but priest is not any more priest because they are already involved in dualistic practice-involved in busy life, busy world, busy mundane world-so there is no priest, you know. Even though priest is there, they are not practicing priest way.

So, we say, "They're-they cover their pan with-you know [laughing], cover of bathroom." They mixed up, you know, worldly practice and priest practice. That is how we lose our way. So when priest observe our way like priest, there is priest. When we do not observe our way like priest, we are, you know, "cover of the restroom" [laughs], not cover of the pots and pan.

"To help others" mean-does not mean to help others for their convenience sake. Maybe, you know, priests may be the most troublesome people [laughs]. May be very difficult to handle. Even they offer, you know, million dollar, they may say "oh, thank you." Even one penny, they will "thank you." They will say "thank you," that's all. It is very hard-difficult to handle.

That is, you know, when-when-when people wants real priest, they should handle priest carefully. They shouldn't mixed up, you know, priest with someone else. Though we should not lose this confidence within ourselves, we don't have to say, you know, in-by words, but within ourselves we must have strong confidence in Buddha's way, and we should be supported from within, not from outside. So Buddhists should be Buddhist, completely. When Buddhist really become Buddhist, you will be supported as a Buddhist.

The eko will be like this:

[Line 2] We dedicate the merit of the recite-recitation of this

Prajña Paramita Hridaya Sutra to [Line 3] the Triple Treasures-Buddha, dharma and sangha, and to the sages in the sea of the fruitful world of buddhahood,

[Line 4] and the sixteen arhats and their followers who attained the supreme attainments of the arhatship.

[Line 5] What we pray is that [Line 6] the Three Wisdoms of-Six-Three Wisdoms and the Six Unrestricted Ways of the arhats may be always with us in our unceasing effort of-effort to renew Buddha's way forever. All sentient-to-excuse me-Buddha's way-to renew Buddha's way, to save all sentient beings, and sentient beings from the world of suffering and confusion.

[Line 7] And all the-and encourages-encourage us to continue our practice, even in our adversities, and keep the wheel of dharma turning forever. And to avert destruction of fire, water, and wind, and calamities of war, epidemic, and famines.

This will be the translation of the eko. Maybe good idea to recite, you know, eko after English, you know, Prajña-after reciting the English translation of Prajña Paramita Hridaya Sutra. In the second, you know, service. Tomorrow I will explain the third one, which is dedicated to the-our patriarchs.

Thank you very much.

---

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript and Eko Study Book by David Chadwick; transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997; transcript checked and corrected against tape by Nigel Edmonds and Bill Redican (2/9/01).

[1] Shobo, zobo, and mappo.

[2] Phonetic only. Assumed to be quoting Dogen-zenji.

[3] musho (Jap.): no-nature; devoid of self-nature or fixed nature.

[4] geta (Jap.): Japanese wooden clogs.

[5] koka (Jap.), kalpagni (San.): the fire that occurs at the end of the kalpa of destruction.

7 - Eko Lecture #5

Monday, July 13, 1970

Eko Lecture #5: The Third Morning Eko
Tassajara

[This is the fifth in a series of six lectures by Suzuki-roshi on the four ekos chanted at the conclusion of morning services at San Francisco Zen Center and other Soto Zen temples and monasteries.

The Third Morning Eko:

Choka sodo fugin

Line 1. Aogi koi negawakuwa shokan, fushite kanno o taretamae.

Line 2. Jorai, Sandokai o fujusu, atsumuru tokoro no shukun wa, Bibashi-butsum-daiosho,

Shiki-butsum-daiosho,

Bishafu-butsum-daiosho,

Kuruson-butsum-daiosho,

Kunagonmuni-butsum-daiosho,

Kasho-butsum-daiosho,

Shakamuni-butsum-daiosho,

Makakasho-daiosho

Ananda-daiosho,

Shonawashu-daiosho,

Ubakikuta-daiosho,
Daitaka-daiosho,
Mishaka-daiosho,
Vashumitsu-daiosho,
Butsudanandai-daiosho,
Fudamitta-daiosho,
Barishiba-daiosho,
Funayasha-daiosho,
Anabotei-daiosho,
Kabimara-daiosho,
Nagyaharajuna-daiosho,
Kanadaiba-daiosho,
Ragorata-daiosho,
Sogyanandai[1]-daioho,
Kayashata-daiosho,
Kumorata-daiosho,
Shayata-daiosho,
Vashubanzu-daiosho,
Manura-daiosho,
Kakurokuna-daiosho,
Shishibodai-daiosho,
Bashashita-daiosho,
Funyomitta-daiosho,
Hannyatara-daiosho,
Bodaidaruma-daiosho,

Taiso[2] Eka-daiosho,
Kanchi Sosan-daiosho,
Dai-i Doshin-daiosho,
Daiman Konin-daiosho,[3]
Daikan Eno-daiosho,
Seigen Gyoshi-daiosho,
Sekito Kisen-daiosho,
Yakusan Igen-daiosho,
Ungan Donjo-daiosho,
Tozan Ryokai-daiosho,
Ungo Doyo[4]-daiosho,
Doan Dohi-daiosho,
Doan Kanshi-daiosho,
Ryozan Enkan-daiosho,
Taiyo Kyogen-daiosho,
Tosu Gisei-daiosho,
Fuyo Dokai-daiosho,
Tanka Shijun-daiosho,
Choryo[5] Seiryō-daiosho,[6]
Tendo Sogaku[7]-daiosho,
Setcho[8] Chikan-daiosho,
Tendo Nyojo-daiosho,
Eihei Dogen-daiosho,
Koun Ejo-daiosho,
Tetsu Gikai-daiosho,

Keizan Jokin-daiosho,

Line 3. sangoku dento rekidai soshi no tame ni shi tatematsuri,

Line 4. kami jion ni makuin koto o.

Morning Service Patriarch Hall Sutra

Line 1. May Buddha observe us and may we receive his true compassion.

Line 2. Thus, as we recite the Sandokai [we offer] the merit collected hereby to:

Vipashyin Buddha,

Shikin Buddha,

Vishvabhu Buddha,

Krakucchanda Buddha,

Kanakamuni Buddha,

Kashyapa Buddha,

Shakyamuni Buddha,

Mahakashyapa,

Ananda,

Shanavasin,

Upagupta,

Dhitika,

Mishaka,

Vasumitra,

Buddhanandi,

Buddhamitra,

Parshva,

Punyayasha, Anabodhi,
Kapimala,
Nagarjuna,
Kanadeva,
Rahulabhadra, Samghanandi,
Samghayathata,
Kumaralata,
Shayata, Vasubandhu,
Manorata,

Haklenayasha, Simhabodhi, Bashashita,
Punyamitra,
Prajñadhara,
Bodhidharma,
Dazu Huike,
Jianzhe Sengcan,
Dayi Daoxin,
Daman Hongren,
Dajian Huineng "Caoxi," Qingyuan Xingsi,
Shitou Xiqian,

Yaoshan Weiyān,
Yunyan Tānshēng,
Dongshan Liāngjiē,
Yunju Dāoyīng,
Tong'an Dāopi,
Tongan Guānzhī,
Liāngshan Yuānguān,
Dayāng Jīngxuān "Jīngyān," Touzi Yīqīng,
Furong Dāokāi,
Dānxiā Zīchūn,
Zhēnxiē Qīngliāo "Chānglù," Tiāntōng Zōngjuē,
Xuēdōu Zhījiān "Zu'an," Tiāntōng Rujīng,
Eīhēi Dōgēn,
Kōun Ejo,
Tetsu Gikai,
Keizan Jokin,

Line 3. successive generations of patriarchs who have transmitted the true teaching through three countries.

Line 4. Let us reflect their compassion and mercy.]

Tonight I want to explain the third eko. The third sutra we chant in every morning is Sandokai-Sandokai. We chant-originally, we chant it in sodo-patriarchs [hall]-where our patriarchs are enshrined. According to Chinese books about rules of a Zen monastery, the patriarch's building or hall [joyoden] is left-hand side of the hatto [dharma hall]. And there were-they enshrined their Buddha. And the other side, right-hand side of the building, Bodhidharma was enshrined. And Hyakujo[9] also, enshrined, right-hand side of the-you know, if this is building [sound of paper being unfolded: probably gesturing]-hatto is here, and right-hand side, as you enter. The building [joyoden] is [on the] left-hand side [corrected left vs. right] as you enter. This is hatto-like this-and [on the] left-hand side as you enter, there is buddha-patriarch's hall. And here they enshrined Hyakujo and Bodhidharma. This side. And [on] the other-the other side of the building, they enshrined their resident priests. That was, according to the record, that was how they enshrined patriarchs.

In Japan, instead of-as it is difficult to have so completed-so complete, perfect building, so we have in-in, you know, in Buddha hall, we have patriarch's hall most-in the most temple. In Eihei-ji we have special building, but there we enshrine patriarchs, Bodhidharma, and Dogen-zenji, and successive patriarchs or masters for that temple. And there-when we observe very formal service like memorial service for patriarchs we observe the ceremony in that building, but usually we observe all the dedication in hatto, the main building-center building. Here is hatto [probably gestures], and this is-if this is hatto, this is-this is butsuden-this is hatto. Sam- [partial word: sammon]-main gate is here. And [on] this side there is kitchen. And [on] this side there is zendo. And we observe, every morning, dedication for the patriarchs.

In Buddhism, especially in Zen, we, you know, we have special feeling to our patriarchs. Buddha, you know-according to our teaching, Buddha is someone who passed away more than two thousand and-two thousand five hundred years ago. But Buddha's spirit will last forever, as long as we have-we have descendant of the Buddha-disciple of Buddha-successive or-successive patriarchs. So actual, you know, Buddha is your teacher. This is our belief.

And you will be a Buddha too, and strictly speaking, each one of us are-is Buddha. Buddha's spirit, you know, is the spirit which will last forever. Why, you know, Buddha's spirit is immortal is because his spirit is supported by everyone of us and everything. And his spirit is supported by every being. So Buddha's spirit is always with us and with all being. That is how Buddha's spirit is supported.

So that is what actually mean by absolute spirit-absolute-absolute Buddha. So Buddha can be-once Buddha can be a Gautama Buddha, but year after year, when time changes, next Buddha will appear. And incessant- [partial word]-incessantly, forever, Buddha's spirit will appear. When we, you know, realize this truth completely, we each one of us become Buddha in its true sense. Each one of us is Buddha objectively and subjectively. When you acknowledge yourself as a son of Buddha, how you can acknowledge yourself a son of Buddha is through your teacher. We say we can transmit our teaching "from warm hand to warm hand," you know, without any cessation-without any hindrance. To be-to be completely one with your master is how to be a Buddha.

Buddha said once, according to Mahaparinibbana Sutra.[10] "You should rely on self-light, light of self. And you should rely on light of dharma." So we-we call-we call hotomyo-jitomyo.[11] Hotomyo is "dharma lamp." Jitomyo is "light of self-self-lamp." "Self," you know, originally "self-lamp," and there's no difference between "self-lamp" and "buddha-lamp." But so-how to-we shouldn't-we must depend on ourselves. He always taught us to depend on ourselves. We should not depend on someone else. And you yourself is someone who-whom you can depend on. Without depend on yourself, how is it possible to find out someone-something who can depend on. He says in Dhammapada: "You yourself is refuge for yourself," or "You yourself is something which you can depend on." Without depend on yourself, how is it possible to find out something-something to depend on? Only you is something which you can depend on. So we call it jitomyo, "lamp of self." Hotomyo means, you know, "lamp of dharma"-dharma in its wide sense, everything, various being, and it-in its narrow sense, Buddha's teaching. Buddha's teaching, as I said now, is immortal because it is manifestation of the real truth which is-which exist with everything, which is supported by everything, and at the same time, which is supporting by-supporting everything.

So everything is supported by dharma, and dharma is supporting everything. So dharma is-so dharma is everything, and everything is dharma. Dharma and teaching is one. That is our conviction, our faith. And it-it is actually so. That is why we, you know, transmit our lamp to others. You may say: "If everyone has, you know, his own lamp, there will be no need to transmit a lamp to others." But even though you have it, if you don't feel you have it, it doesn't make sense. How you have the feeling of having dharma lamp within yourself is to-through your teaching-your teacher.

So "transmission of dharma" means to "find your own lamp through your teacher," you know. That is transmission. Ju-ju is "to give transmission" or sometime, "to receive transmission." Ju or "receive." This is hand. To accept something is ju, and to offer something is also ju. And ju means "realization" in Buddhism-in Zen Buddhism, you know, ju means, "realization." So ju equal kaku. Kaku means sometime "enlightenment" or "realization" or "to realize something." That it is so is kaku.

So to, you know, when-you recei- [partial word]-how you receive transmission from your teacher is to realize your own, you know, nature, your own lamp through your teacher. Even though you read Buddha's saying one thousand time, Buddha is already passed away, you know. It-he is not here. You may say, "his spirit is here," you may say, but we do not believe in some-some spirit like a, you know [laughs], like something-jewel, or burning fire, you know, in the air-floating in the air [laughs].

We do not believe in "Buddha's soul" in that way. Buddha is already with us. That we, you know, realize our true nature is to realize Buddha's nature. So you-that you realize buddha-nature is the true evidence of the Buddha's presence. You know, when you realize, Buddha is here. When you don't realize, there is no Buddha for you, even though it is-is here. If you don't realize it, you know, it doesn't make any sense.

I had, this evening, treat of Japanese noodle with our guest [laughs]. Noodle is something which is supposed to be long, but my lecture is not-is supposed to be short, you know [laughs]. If noodle is-is very good noodle it is very long, and if it is not so good it is very short. So I think my lecture is not so good, so it should be short, you know [laughs, laughter]. So I am trying not to make it, you know, it is not possible for bad noodle to be long, you know [laughs, laughter]. So my lecture for tonight will be very short, especially after having a good noodle, which is very long [laughs, laughter]. But our transmission should be very long, very long, long, long-one should be. And our transmission is "special noodle," you know.

Dogen-zenji said: "When we realize buddha-nature, you know, you are the teacher-a teacher of your master too. And you will be even a teacher of Shakyamuni Buddha. When you attain enlightenment, Shakyamuni Buddha is-could be your disciple." And it is very much so.

So our noodle has no end. Circle, you know, our noodle is circle. So it is difficult to eat [laughs, laughter]. You know, if noodle is very good [laughs], when you eat it, you know, when you sip it [makes slurping noise]-like this, you know, even though the end of-end of the noodle is [laughs, laughter]-is arrive at you tongue, the other end should be here [probably gestures] if it is good noodle.

But Buddha's noodle is no end [laughs, laughter continuing]. So there's no way to eat, you know. You cannot see it and you cannot eat it. Only way to eat that noodle is to become noodle. That is our way. When you become noodle, you-you don't know which is end, and which is the beginning, and which is the end. That is, you know, Soto Zen noodle-special noodle for us.

So in here, you know, we dedicate Sandokai for our teachers. And after Sando- [partial word]-reciting a sutra, we have a kind of invocation to recite names of patriarchs from Shakyamuni Buddha to-to us. I'm, you know, I'm supposed to be seventy-nine-ninth generation from Buddha if Bodhidharma is twenty-eighth patriarch from Buddha. Historically, we don't know, you know, we have no accurate record for that. But almost, you know, it is supposed to be so.

And Dogen-zenji is the fiftieth-fifty-one patriarch from Buddha. And Nyojo-zenji is fifty. And, you know, after Dogen-zenji, in my lineage we count twenty-as I am sixty-nine-so how much? Anyway, I am seventy-ninth. If-you know, if-you know-I must say, if Bodhidharma is Twenty-Eighth Patriarch, why I say so is I am not so sure, you know, no one is so sure that if Bodhidharma is exactly Twenty-Eighth Patriarch from Buddha. But after Bodhidharma it is clear-our lineage is very clear. There is no doubt that Dogen-zenji is the Fifty-First Patriarch from Buddha.

So the center of-the third dedication is actually the most important dedication for each one of us. And first one and second one is-first one is for, you know, Buddha as, you know, as we are one of the schools of Zen, so-called-it Soto-Soto school. And as a-as a school of Buddhism, we have some special-we have object of worship, which is Buddha. And, you know, Buddha, and Dogen-zenji, and Keizan-zenji in Japanese Soto.

But here we, as I said before, here we recite sutra first of all [for] Buddha and the First Patriarch of China, Bodhidharma, and First Patriarch of Japan, Dogen-zenji. That is what we recite sutra for- [partial word: formal?]-the m- [partial word: most?]-as a most formal, you know, dedication.

And next is for the arhats-Buddha's disciples, which is the arhats in primitive Buddhist-Buddha's age-original Buddhist time-Buddha's time. But this one, the third one, is directly related to-to us-actually, each one of us, having dedication for ourselves. And the third one is, I think, you know, the most important dedication for each one of us. What we say is quite simple, you know. With the merit of reciting Sandokai I-we dedicate to our patriarchs, and we recite names of the patriarch. That is what we do.

Here I-I have some difference to this lecture. Dogen-zenji said in-in his Shobogenzo fascicle of patriarch: [12] "When my form-[partial word]-my teacher Tendo Nyojo-daiosho-when I waited for the-my teacher Tendo Nyojo, Old Buddha,-daiosho, he bowed those patriarchs."

"Those patriarchs" is-he-he says, before Buddha, seven; after-in India, until Bodhidharma, we have twenty-eight; and in China, twenty-two. And, until Tendo Nyojo, my [his] teacher, "I waited for my teacher and I could bow to those teachers." It mean that Buddha bowing to Buddha, and each patriarchs are Buddha.

The Yuibutsu yobutsu[13]-four characters-but this-if you explain it, it is very difficult to explain. "Only Buddha" and Yuibutsu-"only Buddha." Yobutsu means "with Buddha." "Only Buddha and with Buddha." It means that you are Buddha and I am Buddha.

When you are Buddha, you know, I am not Buddha, you are Buddha. When I am Buddha, you are not Buddha. So each one of us are Buddha. So you can say, "You and me are Buddha." And sometime you can say, "I am a only Buddha." So he says Yuibutsu yobutsu. This is his technical term.

Yuibutsu: "Only Buddha," you know, "I am only Buddha" is not perfect. Sometime I am-when I am Buddha, you are not Buddha. But we are, two of us, Buddha [laughs]. Do you understand? Yuibutsu yobutsu.

You may say, you know, you-it is difficult for you to understand the idea of transmission. Why it is difficult is, you know, when you say "transmission," you think as if you have something to transmit, you know: It is some traditional way of observing things or traditional understanding of Buddhism or something. You understand in that way. So there must be something to transmit. "But I don't want that kind of old tradition." That will [be?] what you may say. Because you have-when you say-we say "transmission," you say-you think there is something to transmit and your teacher is someone who transmit something to you. So if you receive transmission, you should, you know, obey completely, you know, to your teacher. So you should do things exactly as your teacher did. You will be-you will have that kind of idea.

So that is why it is difficult, you know, to accept transmission. But, you know, between teacher and disciple, if, you know, disciple receive transmission, he is a teacher [laughs]. Not me, you know. But sometime I may be a teacher. When disciple bow, you know, to me, I am a voluntary teacher. Even though two of us, different person, both with different character, with different way, you can express the, you know, Buddha's way. And when you express Buddha way-Buddha way in your own way, then your way include everything, including your teacher. So ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... to have vivid and refreshed way of expression of our true way. So disciple cannot be-disciple's way cannot be exactly like teacher's way. But there must be some similarity, but even though they are similar, actually what they will do is quite different. Teacher and disciples, usually speak, you know, same language [laughs]. I don't mean Japanese or American [laughs]-Eng- [partial word]-English language, you know. Language-by "language," I mean -Yo!-[laughs] [thumps something three times-possibly himself]-this kind of language. No! [Laughs.] This kind of language, you know. We should be able to understand with each other, in that way.

That is, you know, rokujinzu,[14] the six supernatural power of arhat. They understand things completely, you know. They understand something which is beyond word. They understand something which is told by Japanese or, you know, English, and more than that. That kind of relationship should be in [between] teacher and disciple. Even though they are living apart from teacher, there must be that kind of communication or else he is not, you know, teacher or disciple. How that is possible is, you know, because of our true practice-through our true practice-true zazen practice.

Generally speaking, actually, before you become your teacher's disciple, you may receive his transmission. And, you know, after receiving transmission, long, long time after you receive transmission, you will realize [laughing] what was transmission-what was your-who was your teacher. "Oh, he was my teacher!" You will realize it when it is too late, maybe. But you will come to that point if you continue in your practice.

So there is no need to worry [laughs], even though you receive transmission or lay ordination. Before, you don't know exactly what it was, even though you [were] ordained before you have not much understanding about ordination ceremony. That is okay, I think. If you, you know, feel some commitment to continue your practice, then it is okay. Some day, you will realize it.

I thought, you know, I-from the beginning, you know, I thought Gyokujun So-on was my teacher, you know. But, you know, but on the other hand, after many-I found out that, many years later, I was not his disciple at that time [laughs]. I thought I was, you know. I had a strong conviction of my being disciple of my teacher, but I found out that I was not his disciple in its true sense. Now I think I am, you know, his disciple. But I don't know how I feel next year [laughs]. Next year I may say, "Oh, last year I was [laughs] his disciple, yes [?]."

In this way, you know [laughs], your teacher is always with you. Sometime with you, and-but sometime you feel he is not your teacher. Or he was not your teacher. He-and sometime he will not be [laughs] your teacher. But it is okay, anyway. You will be his teacher. Teacher and disciple is, you know, that kind of relationship.

Day after day, we have strong conviction in our relationship, but that is not complete. It's-our relationship should be extended forever. So you are, anyway, bound to be your teacher's disciple. But it does not mean, you know, you should stick to the idea of relationship between teacher and disciple. Whether you stick to it or not, relationship is there. Buddha, you know, is taking care of it, whether you understand it or not. Our relationship between teacher and disciple is so wide and so deep, that we cannot-our small mind cannot understand what it is. There is no other way to understand the relationship between teacher and disciple.

So anyway, you know, to, you know-day by day you should bow to him, you know, that is the only way. It is day to day practice and practice just for that moment. Even though you don't bow to him, you are related to him, anyway. So if you don't, you don't feel good. If you do, you feel good, that's all [laughs]. It is not so difficult thing to bow to him. So better to bow to him, even though you don't know who he is.

Perhaps you may not understand what I am saying right now, but actually, if you have someone who can trust, you will feel good. And if you have someone who entrust your responsibility, you will feel good, you know. In that way, we can, you know, live forever. We will have eternal life. Entrusting our responsibility-sharing our responsibility with many people. That is, you know, relationship between teacher and disciple. And that is why we recite sutra for-for our teachers every morning.

Thank you very much.

---

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript and Eko Study Book by David Chadwick; transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997; transcript checked and corrected against tape by Nigel Edmonds and Bill Redican (2/9/01).

[1] Chadwick text gave as "Soyanandai."

[2] Also Taiso.

[3] Also Dajian Gunin.

[4] Chadwick text gave as one word.

[5] Chadwick text gave as Choro.

[6] Also, more commonly, Shingetsu Shoryo.

[7] Also Sokaku.

[8] Chadwick text gave as Seccho.

[9] Hyakujo Ekai (Jap.) or Pai-chang Huai-hai (Chin.): 720-814. Chinese Ch'an master of the T'ang period and dharma successor of Baso.

[10] Suzuki-roshi pronounced it parinibbana (Pali), not parinirvana (Sanskrit).

[11] Hoto (Jap.): "lamp of the dharma"; Buddhist teaching that dispels spiritual darkness as a lamp dispels shadow.

[12] The Shobogenzo fascicle is: _____.

[13] "Yuibutsu yobutsu": "Only Buddha and Buddha," a phrase from the Lotus Sutra as well as the title of a fascicle of Dogen's Shobogenzo. Yui means "only" or "solely." Yo means "and" or "together with." Butsu means "Buddha."

[14] See SR-70-07-11, p. 3 (fn. 4).

8 - Eko Lecture #6

Wednesday, July 15, 1970

Eko Lecture #6: The Fourth Morning Eko
Tassajara

[This is the last in a series of six lectures by Suzuki-roshi on the four ekos chanted at the conclusion of morning services at San Francisco Zen Center and other Soto Zen temples and monasteries.

The Fourth Morning Eko:

Choka shido[1] fugin

Line 1. Aogi koi negawakuwa sambo, fushite shokan o taretamae.

Line 2. Jorai, Dai hi shin darani o fujusu,

Line 3. atsumuru tokoro no kudoku wa,

Line 4. tozan bosu hokkai bosogya to kakkaku honi,

Line 5. kokka korosha sho shorei,

Line 6. tozan kechien shido no danna,

Line 7. gassan seishu no roku shin kenzoku shichi se no bumo, hokkaino ganjiki ni eko su,

Line 8. onajiku bodai o madoka ni sen koto o.

Dedication for the Morning Service Ancestor's Sutra

Line 1. May Buddha observe [see?] us and give us the true Triple Treasure.

Line 2. Thus, as we chant the Dai Hi Shin Darani, Line 3. we dedicate the collected merit to Line 4. this temple's deceased monks plus all deceased monks, each one dignified,

Line 5. all the souls of this nation's actual benefactors,

Line 6. this temple's members and supporters,

Line 7. this temple's priests and monks and all their relatives for seven generations, and all sentient beings in the realm of the true law.

Line 8. May they be completely enlightened.]

The last chanting will be the chanting for the-for monks, you know, or students who is related-who was-who passed away: student related to the temple or monastery. We, for an instance-last year Trudy Dixon passed away, and we had a ceremony-memorial service the other day. But not only [on] memorial days but also we recite sutra every morning for monks and students who passed away, and the parents or ancestors of we students, and our donors, and the people who worked for the country-for our country. That is-is the last service we have every morning.

[Line 1. Aogi koi negawakuwa sambo, fushite shokan o taretamae.]

And in its eko says: Aogi koinegawakuwa sambo, fushite shokan o taretamae. Aogi koinegawakuwa means: "Looking upwards to the altar, we pray or we-we ask for Three Treasure's presence-Buddha, dharma, sangha-and, with the merit of reciting Dai Hi Shin Darani, we dedicate for the-for the monks and students who is related to us and passed away. And parents or ancestors of every student, and ancestors-ancestors and parents of our donors, and the people who worked hard for the country. And what we wish is that by the merit of reciting sutra we-we can-we want to help their practice, and I want them to help our practice-encourage our practice." That is the meaning of the last eko.

In each-in Japan, this kind of, you know, custom or dedication started already [in] Buddha's time. If you read scriptures you will have [read about] many event. And on that occasion Buddha told his disciples to recite sutra or to make offering for those-for their parents. Maybe first event, as far as we know, the King Hashinoku-o[2] asked Buddha to [if he could] make offering to Buddha and to-to make-to give sermon on that occasion. That is the first event, maybe. After that, in India, there are-in India, it is a kind of a custom to make offering.

And offering is-there are two kinds of offering: alms-offering, you know, alms-giving, and dharma-giving. Those are two, you know, two kinds of offering. To give sermon, or to-to give-to recite sutra or to practice zazen is a kind of offering to the people and to the deceased too. And the best alms-offering was supposed to be to offer something-to offer-to make alms-offering to priest was the best offering. And for the priest to give in such an occasion, they would-Buddha would-give them-give them some sermon. And later, we have, in alms-giving, we have incense-offering of incense, offering of flower, and offering of light, and offering of food. And those are, you know, most important offering to Buddha.

To incense-offering to offer incense means, you know, to offer incense, to ask Buddha to come is the meaning of offering incense. When Buddha, you know, know someone is burning incense, Buddha would go-Buddha would visit the family who is, you know, who make incense offering, and he respond to their wish, and he would give sermon.

So incense is sometime called "messenger," you know, not messenger from Buddha [laughs], but messenger from someone to-for Buddha to come. That is, you know, original meaning of offering incense. Later, incense offering means like is fragrant of incense pervades everywhere. Buddha's teaching and Buddha's wisdom or buddha-nature is everywhere. So it is the incense offering symbolize Buddha's inspiring activity. But originally, we think, incense is to invite, you know, to ask Buddha to come.

And flower-we, you know, offer flower in this way nowadays, but before, in India, they scatter flowers when Buddha come, you know. Maybe that is more Indian way. I don't know. I haven't been to India yet, but I understand they are observing-still observing that kind of rituals. In Vedanta society, you know, they, you know, they offer, you know, flowers to the altar. That will be the Indian way, but later in China or Japan, we offer flower in flower vase, like this.

Water-water also-when we drink water, all the thirst, you know, will go. All the flame of, you know, many desires will calm down [laughs]. So the water symbolize the wisdom-wisdom which will clear up our mind, wisdom which make our thirsty desire to calm down. So water means wisdom.

And light or candle also symbolize the wisdom which will break the darkness of the ignorance. And, as you know, we-when we offer light and flower, light is more-supposed to be more important offering. So we offer light left-hand side, and offer flower right-hand side of the Buddha. If I am Buddha, here there is flower, and this side there is candle. That is more usual. And we offer water and incense center.

Food-not only food-as you see in Lotus Sutra, there is four offerings or more: food, medicine, and wearing [clothing] or bed. Onjiki efuku. Efuku is-onjiki is food. Efuku is clothing. And gaku-gaku is bed. Those are also important alms-giving.

When we say hokuyo in Japanese, you know, we-in Japanese we say hokuyo itashimasho ari- [partial word]-or hokuyo or oniga itashimasho. Our member may come-would come maybe tomorrow, or the day-week-"tomorrow is my mother's memorial day, so we want to have hokuyo-hokuyo itashimasho." Hokuyo means, you know, ku means "offering." Or "to offer" is ku. Yo means "to encourage," you know, their parent or their mother's spirit to practice more, and ask her encouragement for our practice is, you know, yo. Yo means "to-to give-to give some nourishment" or "to encourage" is yo.

In-and-when in Japan, you know, I didn't like so much, but [laughs] anyway, when they observe hokuyo or memorial service, and they would, you know, have a kind of-not party, but, you know, they provide various dishes for priest. Originally, you know, priest-they invited priest to give them some talk or to give them some sermon. And they would offer food for the sermon.

So still, in Jap- [partial word]-in China and Japan, whenever we observe-when we observe memorial service for their parents or their ancestors, they would give us food. A lot of food. If I cannot-if we cannot eat it, they give us, you know, too much, so we cannot finish it. If we cannot finish it, they would ask us to carry it back. When I was a little temple disciple, I had a very difficult time [laughing] to take them back to my temple. My teacher would leave as soon as he say goodbye. Yatomo gyatso animashte.[3] And wearing geta,[4] they-he would go-go back. And my duty was to, you know, to borrow some bags, you know, to put various food in it, and to carry his food and my food. And if I am youngest, you know, I would carry my older disciples' food too [laughs].

Sometime-and they may say, "As it is too hot, how about this watermelon? Please carry it back." [Laughs.] Sometime pumpkin. Pump- [partial word]-watermelon is, you know, good-still good, but pumpkin is awful to carry [laughs, laughter]. It is, you know, always rolling, you know, right and left on my back, this way and that way, because it is round. Watermelon is very smooth, so it doesn't hurt-didn't hurt my back so badly. But pumpkin is awful, you know, because it is [laughs] not-it is rough. And we say dekokoboko.[5] Boko is-this is boko [probably gestures]-V-shaped, you know, and M-shape is deko [laughs]. Dekoboko. Several time, you know, I was given pumpkin when I was coming home.

Anyway, in Japan we observe-in the countryside we observe memorial service in that way. It-they are very good people, and they observe it very sincerely without, you know, asking too-too much question. Yesterday someone was saying-what-what was the song-religion?-religion?

Student: "Give Me that Old-Time Religion."

Oh-"Old-Time Religion," yeah. "Old-time religion [laughs] was good enough." [Laughs, laughter.] It is exactly so, you know. They don't mind what it is. "Old-time religion is good enough for me" [laughs, laughter].

But it was not so happy with me, you know, when I have to do some-[partial word]-too much about it.

And-ohigan, you know. Ohigan-do you know ohigan? Spring and evening-autumn equinox day. We every-almost all the family observe big memorial service. And they would, you know-each family will make offering to my temple's Buddha [laughs]. You know, so, if my village is-if there-were eighty families in my village, eighty-from eighty families we would-Buddha would-receive eighty, you know, offerings. Sometime mochi.[6] Sometime dango. Dango is "rice bowl." It is originated in India, you know, and Japanese peoples still observe it, you know, Indian custom to offer dango, which is "rice bowl." You-you grind rice and steam it and make rice bowl and offer. So, you know, Indian people, as you know, when they eat they make bowl and eat it, so they-we still offer, you know, dango to the Buddha-one of the important offering to their-to the Buddha and their family shrine.

In Japan, actually, we are-we were too busy in taking care of memorial service or funeral service, and we actually didn't have not much time to practice zazen even. And around the temple there-mostly we have big cemetery, and to clean cemetery-cemetery of the family who is not-is not in village. Recently, you know, in countryside of the Japan, people give up their home and go to the city to work, to have more-to have better job.

So in the country, there are-there are many tombstone no one actually taking care of. So in ohigan or equinox day, we-we were pretty busy. This is for-I think hokuyo. Originally it is good-it has deep meaning, but if, you know, we depend on alms-giving or preaching too much, forgetting the fundamental-fundamental practice of zazen, Buddhism will be lost. I hope-I think in America we Zen Buddhist will not be involved in such a activity so much, I hope. But I think we should not forget our friend with whom we practice, and who encouraged us, and who had very good time with us. We shouldn't forget. But I don't think it is necessary to have big celebration or to have big memorial service for them.

As Dogen-zenji said: "If you," you know, "if you have-if you want to make alms-giving, the cherry blossom in the mountain will be good offering-will be a good offering." Even a cherry blossom in deep mountain will be a good offering-will be maybe the best offering. So to have this kind of sentiment is important, but we should not be involved in that kind of activity too much, I think.

That is-anyway, we-last dedication is for our ancestors and for priests and students who practiced with us, and for people who worked for-who worked hard for our country and society.

I think this will be, as I am going to visit Japan end of August, I must-I am leaving Tassajara the day after tomorrow, and tomorrow evening we want to observe a kind of ceremony for our friend. So there will be no lecture. Accordingly, this lecture will be the last lecture for a while. If you have some question, please ask me. Hai.

Questions and Answers

Student A: Roshi, in a week or so the ordination-lay ordination of students will take place.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Oh, I see.

Student A: And some- [partial word: someone?]-a week or so ago,[7] someone asked you what your name meant. You said "not much," so you're not attached to your name very much.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: And though your name has much use-has many uses-we all see it and stand behind your name with our best effort. Buddhism is a name that many people attach to-many-though it too uses. So, as in the West, where-so as in the West, I believe in the East, as well, such names as Buddhism often do not have so much standing behind it. There are, perhaps, many people who are Buddhists who are not religious. And there are not many people who have never heard of Buddhism-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: -a practice that [2-3 words unclear]. You yourself once said that Buddhism, to use a term [3-6 words unclear]. Why then did you recommend last week [2-3 words unclear] lay ordination, and what is the difference that ordination will make? [Sentence may have finished.]

Tape ends abruptly.]

---

—

Sources: Contemporaneous transcript and Eko Study Book by David Chadwick; transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997; transcript checked and corrected against tape by Nigel Edmonds and Bill Redican 11/24/99.

[1] Probably shidoden (Jap.): The memorial service hall in a Zen temple, which contains memorial tablets for lay practitioners and their families. Memorial services are also performed here, at the request of lay practitioners, for their relatives and friends.

[2] Hashinoku-o: Prasenajit, the king of Shravasti in central India, born in the same year as Shakyamuni Buddha.

[3] Poor phonetic only.

[4] Japanese wooden clogs.

[5] dekokoboku (Jap.): uneven or bumpy surface.

[6] mochi: Japanese rice cake.

[7] See SR-70-07-08.

9 - Japanese Way, American Way, Buddhist Way

Sunday, July 19, 1970

Japanese Way, American Way, Buddhist Way
City Center, San Francisco

After-after forty days of my leaving from here I feel I am a stranger to the building, not to you but [laughs] to the building and my cups and [laughs, laughter]. I forgot where is my-where was my things. Each time I need something, I have to try to think about "Where is it? Oh! There." [Laughs.] Something like that.

I am thinking about now, at the same, time Dogen-zenji's teaching: "There are people who is in enlightenment over enlightenment and delusion in delusion." You know, enlightenment over enlightenment [laughs]. It does not mean after attaining enlightenment he lost himself, and he-that he became a hermit or something.

"Enlightenment over en- [partial word]-over enlightenment" may be too much enlightenment [laughs, laughter] for you. But "enlightenment over enlightenment"-maybe tr- [partial word]-my translation is wrong, but I don't know how to translate it.

"Enlightenment over enlightenment" means to forget enlightenment after attaining enlightenment. Such people, you know, because they have no idea of enlightenment anymore because they already have gone through enlightenment, so there is no trace of enlightenment in their mind. So they have, you know, they do not stick to enlightenment anymore. They do not stick to Buddhist way anymore. So they are quite common. And you-common enough-to be a ordinary person.

So he [Dogen] says-delusion-in delusion-meichu umei, gojo tokugo.[1] Goshō tokugo means "enlightenment-after enlightenment" or "over enlightenment." And [meichu umei means] "delusion in delusion."

Many people ask me, you know, "At Tassajara you are practicing Japanese way [laughs]-Japanese Zen." What- "Do you think that is appropriate for us," you know, "to observe Japanese way of practice?"

Are we going to be a Japanese [laughs] after," you know, "practicing zazen?" They ask me that kind of question.

Our purpose of zazen is, of course, first of all we should be-we should attain enlightenment or we should get through our practice. But after, you know, you become a real Buddhist, you know, then you should forget that you are Buddhist. Even though you wear robe, you should forget all about what you are we- [partial word]-wearing. This is very important point.

But I don't mean that you shouldn't wear robe after [laughs] you attained enlightenment. I don't mean that because you attained enlightenment there is no need for you to practice zazen anymore. You should, you know, continue your zazen practice. But in that zazen practice, you should have complete freedom even from zazen practice. There you have no idea of zazen, or eating-no special idea of oryoki, you know, eating-eating by oryoki or practicing in cross-legged position.

This is a very interesting point. And if you really get through our practice, you will enjoy [laughs] your robe, you know, because you have no idea. When we have no idea of robe-wearing robes or practicing zazen, people, you know, may ask you, "Why do you wear such a long-sleeved robe? Isn't it better to wear something simple?" Sometimes they may ask me, and sometimes they may say, "Oh, that is beautiful!" [Laughs.] "Let me see how long your sleeve [laughs] is-are."

Many people ask me various question, but, you know, for me, you know, it doesn't-my feeling and their feeling about my robe is completely different. I don't mind what I wear, you know. But people-when people become interested in what I am wearing: "Oh! Ohh [laughs]. My sleeves are very long!" [Laughs.] "Oh, this must be a very inconvenient!"-you know.

But when people think it is inconvenient, you know, if I don't feel, you know, inconvenient, this is strange feeling. "What-what am I wearing?" [Laughs.] You know, you may have that kind of, you know, feeling. And this is actually the secret of-secret of how to live in this world and how to be successful in your business. Is there some businessman [laughs] here? I don't know. I don't think so, but if there is some businessman, I want to tell him the secret of [laughs, laughter] how to be a successful [laughter] businessman.

Nowadays, it is not so much, but when I was quite young-young schoolboy, what we see in Yokohama City, where there was a big port, you know, Yokohama: It is big trading center, and there were many cups and pots and everything for ho- [partial word]-foreign countries to export. What we see there was not supposed to be Japanese article, you know. But to me, it was-to us, it was not at all Japanese, you know, things. It is things to attract, you know, foreigners as a Japanese article, but it isn't-it was not actually-they were not actually Japanese article.

They were too-maybe too much Japanese [laughs] or something.

Anyway, we felt very bad about-to see-about seeing that kind of article to be called Japanese, you know, article. When your understanding-when your practice is not good enough or very superficial, you will buy that kind of thing, thinking that they are Japanese article. If you really understand what is Japanese article, what you may buy is really Japanese, and which could be applied in-which could be very harmonious articles in your own room. Sometime you may not realize this is Japanese article, because it will be very-it will go with the furn-[partial word]-other furnitures or things you have there. That is, you know, what I want to call Japanese article.

There are many such articles which is really Japanese and which could be really American. That kind in-that kind of article is the article I want to introduce [to] you. And what that kind of, you know, Zen is I want to introduce to America. That is why I stick to robes [laughs]. Do you understand? Maybe not.

I thought at that time, when I saw many, you know, pseudo-Japanese articles, you know, in-in Yokohama, I felt very bad and I felt very sad to see them and to export that kind of a thing as Japanese article.

At that time I thought-I thought I might go to abroad after understanding our Zen completely to introduce real, you know, Zen Buddhism to some other countries. Buddhism I want to introduce to this country is, I think should be very, very Japanese in its true sense, and at the same time it could be, you know, completely applied in America too.

So I am very particular about, you know, about design of the temple or altar. I don't like, you know, too-too much Japanese things or too-not enough Japanese or seemingly too much, but in its real sense it is not enough Japanese, you know. When our practice is not good enough, we will stick to our practice. We have no freedom from our practice. When we understand Dogen-zenji's way completely, when he said: "no trace of enlightenment there," or "enlightenment-after enlightenment. Over"-not over-"after enlightenment."

I don't mean that, you know, I am completely Japanese or completely Zen teacher. I don't think so, I must confess [laughs] because, you know, I am very much, maybe, Japanese still, and I may stick to Japanese-Japanese way, maybe, still. But what I am trying to [do] is without changing my, you know, outlook, and to be completely-how to be completely Japanese or forget all about Japanese. This is not so easy thing. You shouldn't think this is quite easy. If you think it is quite easy, it is-will be a great mistake.

So at-at the same time, I do not accept so-called-it "American way" [laughs, laughter], as I don't accept Japanese way so easily, even though this is Japanese, old, beautiful, you know, thing. "No," I may say, most of the time. So even though you say "this is American way," I don't easily accept that. Here there is real point of our practice in Tassajara and in City zendo: how to be real American-how to be, for us, how to be a real Japanese, without, you know, changing our original nature-original face. Before we attain this point for Japanese it was necessary, you know, to be a Chinese, and I think it is necessary, you know, for you to be a Japanese once [laughing], and forget all about American or Chinese.

Without this kind of, you know, determination, you cannot be a Buddhist in its real sense. Even though you do not actually attain this point-even though you don't attain this point, as long as you know the-how to be a real Buddhist, then that will be a great help for American culture, and not only for American culture but also for Japanese culture and some other culture, if you have eyes to see what is real, you know, human culture and what is not.

As it is, you know, already-as the day is already going shorter and shorter, and we already see the flowers in-flowers outside-autumn flower-some Chinese, you know, monk said: "Don't you see the flower of-red flower, on"-I don't know what do you call that tree you have a kind-it looks like-the trunk looks like a manzanita, you know, red trunk, and it is-it is not e- [partial word]-evergreen tree, and it has, in this time of the year, it has beautiful pink or most-red, you may say red-flowers. "You don't-don't you see the-that flower in-in-in that tree?" I don't know the name of that tree in Engl- [partial word]-in English. "Those," you know, "flowers, are result of hard practice of," you know, "successive masters. Don't you see that flower? That is result of various," you know, "masters' practice. It is," you know, "for-for-for the tree, it is not difficult to be that way."

Without fail at this time of the year that flower comes out in the same color, quite naturally. But for us human being, to be like that is almost impossible. But many successive teachers attained that kind of, you know, natural practice, which is free from everything, and which is quite natural to himself. And always helping people, without saying anything, just to be there in the corner of-of their garden is enough. But for us human being, it is after training after training, practice after practice our teachers attain that kind of freedom: "Don't you see the flower?"

Without knowing what is human being, what is the nature of human being, why we suffer so much, [and] what we are doing every day, we have no ground to talk about freedom. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

... maybe help [?] you.

You may say-I think you can say that all the Budd- [partial word]-Buddha's teaching-power of teaching is-are all the [1 word unclear] teaching about what is human nature. But [1 word unclear] with a great mercy and wisdom, he taught about our human nature. And he wanted to make us realize what kind of practice you should have-we should have, and what kind of understanding we should have.

Actually when you realize what Buddha meant, there is no reason why we sh- [partial word]-we should be just Japanese or why we should be just American. All of us should be a son of Buddha. When the various river flow into a big ocean, there is no names of river or water. When all of us become-all human being become Buddhist, there is no Japanese or no American people.

And yet, Japanese will be just Japanese, and American people will be just American people. We are now, and-practicing our way in Buddhist way, to forget the disti- [partial word]-distinction between Japanese, and Chinese, or Indian, or American. When we get out of the-those area, we will be real Buddhist.

I want you to trust me [laughs]. I don't try to force Japanese way to you. Actually, you know, I don't like stinky Japanese way [laughs]- which stinks like Japanese, you know. And at the same time, I want you to practice Buddhist way in its true sense and see what will happen to you.

If you have doubt in your practice-you cannot practice our way without having any doubt and, you know, involved in the practice in its, you know-with great confidence, or conviction, you can practice our way.

You shouldn't say "American way" or "Japanese way." If you say so, I must find out what you mean by that. I am very strict with that point. Since I am quite young, I was making a great effort on that point. Maybe that is why I came to America.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Nigel Edmonds and Bill Redican (10/19/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] mei (delusion); chu (inside or within); u (again); mei (delusion); go (enlightenment); jo (to put on top of); toku (get); go (enlightenment). From Dogen's Shobogenzo "Genjo Koan."

10 - Mudra Practice And How To Accept Instructions From Various Teachers

Sunday, July 26, 1970

Mudra Practice And How To Accept Instructions From Various Teachers San Francisco

This morning, I want to talk about our practice, as usual [laughs], especially when we have various teachers. So far we had Tatsugami-roshi[1] and Yoshida-roshi.[2] And you will be-you will have-your practice must be confused a little bit [laughs], this way or that way [laughs]. But actually for you there is only one practice. There is no need to be confused when you have right understanding of our practice of Dogen-zenji. But I don't say Dogen-zenji's way, this way, or that way.

For advanced students, what I want to talk about will be easily understood. You know, for an instance, when you, you know-about mudra you have in your zazen. Keizan-zenji,[3] you know, says: "Put your mind on your mudra, or in your palm." And some teacher-Yoshida-roshi says-say: "Put your thumb on your middle finger, like-over your middle finger." Some other teacher says, you know," put your thumb-have a vertical line by [between] your pointing finger and thumb, like this [presumably gestures].

Recently what-I notice that some-some of you [laughs] [were] doing this too much this way. Someone's finger-finger-thumb is not right over middle finger, you know. Maybe [laughs] like this. Going the extreme, you know, like this. That is not what Yoshida-roshi said.

This is too much.

We say if you-if your thumb is too much like this, it means that your mind will be contaminated, you know, too rigid and too narrow. [Loud sound of a falling object.] Uh-oh [laughs, laughter]. If your, you know, thumb is too much like this, you know, your mind is too open or too easy, or, you know, too much free, you know. So when-when your finger-thumb is like this, or just in right place, someone may say "this" or will say "this [that]," but it should not be like this, or should not be too-or inside.

The point is, you know, the point is, to let you-let your hands practice zazen and find your mudra-right posture, and let your mudra practice zazen, you know. When you practice zazen, you are not putting your thumb this way, or-outside or inside too much. Just find good place for them to practice zazen, for mudra [to] practice zazen, and it is not you are controlling your mudra. Let-let it have the right practice. That is the-how you adjust your mudra.

So when you do like this, when you practice zazen, your mudra is also practicing zazen, for your mudra is independent from your practice and your-as your practice is independent practice, including all the practice-all the practices-all the Buddha's practice, when you practice zazen, all the Buddhas also practicing zazen.

And as your mudra is practicing zazen, you yourself is also practicing zazen, and every part of your body is practicing zazen. In-with this, you know, feeling or idea, if you practice zazen, that is real practice.

Here you will have some question. When actually your legs has pain, or when actually you find it difficult to have good mudra, you know, it-it may be necessary to have some idea controlling your mudra this way or that way.

Here, Dogen-zenji's-there is Dogen-zenji's answer for that. He says: "For the beginner, if there is no idea of this way or that way [laughs], that is not true practice," he says. For beginner-for beginners there must be some rules, or some idea of controlling, or having this posture or that posture, or which is right or which is wrong. There must be some idea of right or wrong, good or bad. If there is no idea of good or bad for beginner, that is not right practice either, he says. I think this is very true. I think for most of you it is necessary to-to force or to make some effort, you know, to keep right posture.

If you, you know, let your necks-neck or mudra practicing-practice zazen as they like [laughs], it will not be good practice either. So he says-Dogen-zenji says: "It is necessary to have some idea of practice, good practice or bad practice, but true pra- [partial word]-in the true practice, there is no idea of controlling or-controlling your physical posture. It should be quite natural with your hand, with your legs, and with your necks-neck, and every part-part of your body.

Here is Dogen-zenji's poem: [4]

Tide ebbed, tide ebbed, no blowing wind, an abandoned boat on the lonesome shore,
the moonlight shining meets sky-midnight sky.

Tide ebbed, no blowing wind,
an abandoned boat on the lonesome shore,
the moonlight shining midni- [partial word]-midnight sky.

This is actually, you know, Dogen-zenji's, you know, Dogen-zenji-Dogen-zenji's practice:

Tide ebbed, no blowing wind,
an abandoned boat on the lonesome shore,

the moonlight shining midnight sky.

The ebb tide, no blowing wind, an abandoned boat, and the moonlight. Those are one whole, you know, beautiful picture of seashore in-in a-in midnight-in a midnight. The moon-the moon is practicing zazen. A boat without anyone, you know [laughs] boat-abandoned boat-boat on the shore is practicing zazen, where is-where there is no wind and no tide coming. No wind disturbing his practice. No tide or wind is disturbing the boat, but above the sky the big moon is shining calmly. So you may say the moon does not control anything, the abandoned ship is not disturbed by anything. They are-each of them are practicing complete zazen. And those are-but this whole picture is also the picture of zazen practice or of whole world in the midnight.

But if you don't understand the point of zazen, you don't understand this picture in this way. You may put emphasis on the moon or on the abandoned ship. But if you, you know, see the abandoned ship that will be the point of this picture, but if you see the moon the moon will be the point of this whole picture. But actually both abandoned ship and the moon is-can be the point of this picture. But there is no two points [laughs], but one point. But that one point could be, you know, boat or the moon.

So your practice could be practice of the mudra. So I think that is why Keizan-zenji said: "Put your mind on your palm." Here, right here. At that time, the mudra is practicing zazen, not you [laughs]. But if you don't understand what Keizan-zenji really meant-"If you don't put your mind on your palm, that is not true zazen," [laughs] you may say. That is wrong understanding. When you practice real zazen, you know, actually, you know, the palm is-your mudra is practicing zazen. So naturally the mind of the mudra will be on the mud- [partial word]-in the mudra.

Keizan-zenji is not emphasizing some particular practice of putting mind on your mudra, and he does not say if you do not put your mudra on your, you know, hands, on your palm, that is not true practice. In the true practice, you know, actually mudra is practicing zazen with its own mind, and mudra is-practice-mudra's practice-zazen practice include your practice and practice of whole world.

So Dogen-zenji said: "If your practice does not include everyone's practice, that is not true practice." I am talking about actual feeling in your practice. I'm not [laughs], you know, I'm not talking about some particular practice of mind. When you reach-when you have that kind of, you know, feeling or interpretation of zazen, with its actual feeling, I think that is so-called-it Dogen-zenji's shikantaza.

If you practice, you know, in that way, you will not be confused by various teachers' instructions. Various teachers' ins- [partial word]-instruction has some, you know, purpose, some reason why he-why they say so. If you understand why they say so, you will, you know- various teachers' instruction will help you. But if you bec- [partial word]- it is, you know, very-very usual for us to say: "This is the right posture, this is not right posture, he is good teacher, and he is not good teacher." But when you, you know, sincerely practice your own practice, you know, seeking for the maturity of your practice, various teachers' instruction will be a good food for your practice, and you will appreciate various teachers' instructions. And you will not understand-accept their instructions with hasty mind. You will carefully, you know, ask: "What does it mean?" And you will carefully show your way to him-to them, and ask their advice. Then you will have good instruction.

Actual zazen practice is not something which you can, you know, explain in some-in-in-in your book, you know, this way or that way [laughs]. That is almost impossible, because each one of us has different difficulties in our practice. That is why you must have your teachers, and you must have dokusan with your teacher.

So Dogen-zenji says: "The point of practice is practice of zazen, actual practice of zazen." And sanshi monpo [5]-dokusan-to ask instruction from your teacher. Both is necessary, he says.

I want you to, you know, to practice more carefully and more sincerely our zazen. Constant, you know, effort, constant careful effort is necessary for your zazen, or it is not zazen-actual zazen. As Sekito-zenji said: "Step by step," you know, "observing things, you should practice zazen, or else even though you practice zazen it will not make any sense. And don't say 'this way or that way.' And don't set up any rules. And don't be restricted by some rules."

So if you-when your-your practice is sincere enough, then, you know, you cannot be restri- [partial word]-restricted in some particular way of practice. Day by day, year after year, your practice will make some progress, and then-then your-your way of practice will be changed. So there could be any particular wa- [partial word]-actual way, actual-special way. [Sentence appears to have been finished. Tape turned over.]

... your practice is not sincere. Practice you are talking about is someone's practice [laughing]-maybe Yoshida-roshi's practice or Tatsugami-roshi's practice, and not your practice. Putting aside your practice and talking about someone's practice doesn't mean anything. If you-if some teacher said: "This is-will be the be- [partial word]-good way," then you should, you know, actually think if that is appropriate practice for you or not, and you should ask question. Then, you know, you will have your own practice.

Anyway, I am very grateful to have various teachers for-for you, and to have various instructions from various teachers. Actually we need more teachers, but unless you have, you know, real-unless you know how to practice zazen, no one can help you. You know, in the heavy you know, rain may wash away the seed, small seed like sesame [laughs] when it has no root [laughs]. We should not be like a sesame without-without roots [laughs]-without its own roots. Because if you have no roots in your practice, you will be washed away. But if you have really a good root, even your sesame-your practice is like sesame-like-the heavy rain will help you a lot. So I want you not to lose our good-our good chance to practice our way.

Thank you very much.

-----
Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Nigel Edmonds and Bill Redican (9/21/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Tatsugami Sotan Ryosen: Ino-roshi of Eihei-ji temple in Japan. Head of training at Tassajara in 1970.

[2] Yoshida Eshun. Teacher of okesa sewing in the lineage of Hashimoto-roshi.

[3] Keizan Jokin (1268-1325). Fourth patriarch of Japanese Soto Zen.

[4] Waka 19-J (composed in 1247):

Shobogenzo Treasury of the True Dharma Eye

Nami mo hiki In the heart of the night, kaze mo tsunaganu the moonlight framing sute obune a small boat drifting, tsuki koso yawa no tossed not by the waves sakai nari keri. nor swayed by the breeze.

From Steven Heine, The Zen Poetry of Dogen, Boston: Tuttle, 1997, pp. 36-37.

[5] San (visit); shi (master); mon (ask about); po (dharma)-Japanese.

11 - How To Understand Rituals And Precepts

Tuesday, July 28, 1970

How To Understand Rituals And Precepts: Zazen, Rituals And Precepts Cannot Be Separated
San Francisco

This evening I want to talk about some problems you have when you come to Zen Center. And you understand why we practice-zazen practice, pretty well. But why we observe this kind of ritual-rituals, is maybe rather difficult to understand why. Actually, it is not something to be explained [laughs] so well. If you ask me why we observe or why I observe those rituals, you know, without much problem is difficult to answer.

But first of all, why I do it is because-because I have been doing for a long time [laughs]. So for me there is not much problem [laughs, laughter]. So I-I tend to think that because I have no problem in observing my way, there must not be problem-so much problem for you [laughs]. But actually, you are an Amer- [partial word]-you are Americans, and I am Japanese, and you have been-you were not practicing Bud- [partial word]-Buddhist way, so there must be various problems [laughs].

So this kind of problem is almost impossible to solve. But if you, you know, actually follow our way I think you will reach-you will have some understanding of our rituals. And what I want to talk about is actually about precepts, you know.

But precepts for me is also include rituals. And when we say "precepts," it-it is actually another name of our zazen practice. For us, zazen practice and observation of rituals are not different-two different things. How to observe our rituals is how to observe our precepts. The way we observe, and the idea of observing practice or rituals are actually same. And our practice, especially as a-as Soto school, put emphasis on our everyday life, including rituals, or eating, or way of going [to] restroom, or bathroom [laughs] too. All those things are included in our practice.

So the way we practice zazen, the-the way we practice rituals, and the way we-way of life as a Buddhist or Zen student is fundamentally the same. But when we talk about our way of life or rituals, you know, actually you face to some rules. Rules of life will be, you know, rules of observing prec- [partial word]-ceremony is rituals. And rules of-in our everyday life is our precepts.

So we-we have, you know, here we have the idea of rules. When we say "precepts," precepts means some rules usually, but that is just a superficial understanding of rituals-precepts. Precepts is actually-expression of our true nature is precepts. And how we express our true nature is always according to the place or situation under which you live. So to practice zazen is to be yourself, you know, on your black cushion, and to observe our precepts is just to be yourself. And how we observe our rituals [is] to be with people in Buddha hall.

So as you have some way of sitting in-on black cushion, you know, we have some way of observing our rituals or ceremony. And spirit of, you know, in our prac- [partial word]-in zazen practice, the point is to get rid of thinking mind-to be free from thinking mind, or to be free from emotional activity. In short, that is the practice of selflessness. And in our rituals observation, the point is to be free from selfish idea-or the rituals-practice of rituals is practice of selflessness.

First of all you enter, you know, you bow. The bow means to-we say gotai-tochi.[1] Gotai is "our body." Our-to- [partial word]-tochi is "to throw away our body." It means that, in short, practice of selflessness, you know, to throw away our physical and mental being. And-or we offer, you know, ourselves to Buddha. That is our practice of bow. To bow-when you bow, you bow and lift your hand. That means to lift Buddha's feet, which is on your palm, like this, and you feel Buddha on your palm. So in this way, you-when you practice bow, you have no-or you shouldn't have-you are supposed not to have any idea of self, you know. You give up everything.

When Buddha was begging, his follower, you know, spread his hair on the ground, muddy ground, and let Buddha pass that place. That is-is supposed to be the origin of why we bow. And in ritual, you know, you bow and work. You do everything by some sign [laughs], you know, that is, you know, that kind of thing is-maybe the things you may not like so much [laughs]. Just-it looks like very formal, you know, to-to-to do everything by sign, by bell. Whether you want to do it or not, you must do it [laughs]. But it looks like very formal. And actually you-as long as you are in Buddha hall-hall, you should observe our way according to the rules we have here. But why we do it is to forget ourselves and to become one-to feel or to be, you know, Zen student actually in this Buddha hall. That is why we-we observe our rituals.

And this is very important point. To feel your being here, right in this time, is very important practice for us. And actually, that is the point of observing precepts and observing rituals and practice of zazen. To feel or to be yourself at certain time, in certain place. For that purpose, we practice our way.

So actual feeling cannot-could not be understood without observing it. When you observe it, you feel actual feeling of rituals. As long as you try to know what does it mean or why you do it, you know, it is difficult to feel your actual being on that place.

Only when you do it you will, you know, feel your being. To be a Buddhist is to do things like Buddha, like your friend do. That is actually, you know, to-how to be a Buddhist [laughs]. It does not mean, you know, when you are able to observe our rituals as your friend do, then you will be-you will have no problem in your everyday life. That kind of feeling or practice will be extended in your everyday life.

You will find yourself in various situation, and you will intuitively know what you should do. And you will react-you will have right reaction to someone's, you know, activity. When you, you know, you have-when you lack, or when you are not able to respond to the people without, you know, thinking how to-without wondering what he has in his mind or what-what is the reason why he, you know, force something to you [laughs], you know, then it-maybe sometime you can. But most of the time I don't think you will have right-you cannot have right respond, or you will not have most intuitive, you know, respond to the people.

So why we-you do it is, you know, I want you to do it until I think, at least, you know, he is-until I think-quite sure about his respond, you know, to other people. How he respond to others is very important point. As a teacher, you know, when we teachers see our students, you may be trying to be, you know, [to] act right, and try to understand people, but most of the time it is rather difficult to have-to be very-to have some kind of intuition. And for-if you have this kind of, you know, if you start to have this kind of intuition, you have big confidence in yourself, and you can trust people, and you can trust yourself. And so, all the problem-problems which is created by yourself will be no more. You will have no more problem-something, you know, almost all the people may have. That is why, you know, we have training or practice.

My, you know, master[2] used to say to us, you know: "If you stay with me for," you know, "for several years, whether you become a priest or not," you know, "if you become a priest, you will be a good priest, and you-if you stay-remain layman, you will be a good," you know, "layman or good citizen," he always said, "and you will have no problem in your life."

And I think that is-that was very true, you know. I was the six[th] youngest disciple when [laughs] I became my master's disciple. And-and two of us become a-became a priest, but rest of the disciples became, you know, remain laymen. And they are very good, you know, actually. When they come to my teacher they were, you know, some [laughs]-they had some trouble, you know. But all-most of-one disciple who passed away, you know, is exception, but rest of the people has been doing pretty well, although they are not priest. You may-so I think that is very true.

Anyway, this kind of practice is very-very good practice for you. You may think our practice is like a army practice or something [laughs], but actually it is not so. The idea is quite different. Maybe Japanese army, you know, copied our practice, you know. Maybe looks like so, but they couldn't copy [laughs] our spirit.

As you trust your innate nature, which is called buddha-nature, you should trust your innate nature. That is the most important point. And if you trust, you know, your true nature, you should trust your teacher too. That is very important. Not because your teacher is perfect, you know, but because his innate nature which is same with-with you. The point that-point of practice between teacher and disciple is to get rid of, you know, selfish idea as much as possible and to trust each other. When you-only when you trust your teacher, I think you can practice zazen, and you can practice ritual, and you can act as a Zen Center student.

So to be always, you know, to remain always as a Zen Center student is very important point for you. And how you, you know, become a Zen Center student is to trust your true nature, and to trust your teacher, and to trust your zazen practice without, you know, saying why [laughs]. I think you should do it, as long as you come here. And if you don't want to do so-you do not want to do so, you shouldn't come here, I think. As long as you come here, you should follow our way, or else maybe you will waste your time and you will have regret, you know.

So in this way, I think, we can carry on our schedule. And how we carry on our schedule is how we observe our precepts. Precepts started by Buddha, you know, when he said "Don't do this-that, or don't," you know, "behave like that," you know. That was the origin of precepts. So in India, at Buddha's time, they have Buddha's precepts. And in China, they have more Chinese-they have precepts which is based on Chinese way of life. We have sixteen precepts, you know, but those precepts is the essential, you know, precepts which we should observe as a Japanese, as an American, as a-a-an Indian priest, you know, or layman. That is sixteen precepts.

And those precepts are the precepts which you can apply, you know, to various-apply to your everyday life. We say "Don't kill," you know, but "Don't kill" does not mean just don't kill flies or insects, you know. Actually it is too late [laughs], you know. If you-"Oh, here!"-if you say, "Here is a fly," whether you should kill it or not, it is too late! That problem is always with us, you know. Before you see fly, we have always this kind of problem. When you eat, what you will say, you know: "Seventy-two labors brought us this rice," you know. When we say so, you know, "Seventy-two labors" include, you know, to keep grains from various insects, you know.

So, you know, it is not just-not to kill insects. When you eat, when you say, "Seventy-two labors brought us this rice," you know, it include already the precepts-precept of "not to kill." But actually, you know, after making a great effort to protect corns-corn from insects, we can eat. So at that time we, you know, the way you, you know, observe-ho-[partial word]-the feeling you say "Seventy-two labors" is, you know, should be, you know, related to the precept "not to kill," you know. So "not to kill," precept "not to kill" is not any special-special precept.

To be-to exist here in this way is the result of, you know, sacrificing many animals and plants [laughs]. You are always sacrificing something for your being. So as long as you are involved in dualistic concept, you know, it is not possible for you to observe our precepts.

So the point is how to be-how to get out of this kind of dualistic concept and fill our being with gratitude is the point of practice. So it is very foolish to say, "not to kill," you know, actually. But why we say "not to kill" is to point out or to-to understand our life from various point-pointing up at, you know, various points. "Not to kill," "not to steal," you know, "not to speak ill of others." Each of those precepts include the other precepts. And each practice or rituals we observe include the other. So if you know-if you have actual feeling of your being here, then it is the way-that is the way you observe precepts and the way you practice zazen.

So if it is not-if you understand how you observe our precepts, even one of them, you can observe the rest of the precepts and you can practice our zazen, you can observe our rituals. Zazen practice and observation of rituals or precepts cannot be separated. How to experience this kind of, you know, feeling, is, you know, why you-is how you understand our precepts.

So, actually, if you say it is difficult, it may be very difficult. But, you know, it cannot be so difficult thing if you say, "I will do it." That's-that's-that is how you observe precepts, even without thinking, you know, whether I can con- [partial word]-observe it or not, you know. "I will do it" means, you know, "don't kill animals." "Yes," you may say-you can say, because originally it is not possible to kill anything [laughs]. You think you-you killed [laughs], but actually, you-you cannot. Even though you think you killed, but they are still alive [laughs]. Even though you eat, you know, something, it is still alive in your body. If something leave your body, they are still alive.

It is not possible for anything to be killed. So only way is to-to be grateful for everything you have [laughs]. That is how you, you know, keep our precepts without, you know, having dualistic understanding of precepts.

Then you may say, "If so, there will not be no need to have precepts." But unless you make yourself quite sure, you know, you cannot feel your presence, you don't feel your being, you do not feel you are alive here. You do not have any gratitude of-or joy of life or gratitude for everything. So, you know, you may-you can easily say: "No, I wouldn't. I wouldn't kill anything." But it means that you will not sacrifice anything-sacrifice yourself for anything. You will be just you. You will not be caught by dualistic, you know, understanding of yourself, and you will feel yourself, as you feel yourself in your zazen.

It is rather difficult to explain [laughs], you know, but that is actually how we observe precepts. So Dogen-zenji says: "Even though we do not try to observe precepts," you know, "and like a-like a-scarecrow [laughs], "you know, "no evil come to you." It is strange, you know [laughs]. When you have, you know-when you feel your being, you know, in its true sense right here, no, you know, evil come. You cannot viola- [partial word]-violate any precepts, and whatever you do, that is expression of your true nature.

You will not say: "I shouldn't say so" [laughs] or "I shouldn't do that." You will be quite free from that kind of regret or arrogance of observing something-observing some special precepts. That is how you observe precepts.

To-to repeat precepts is to knock [?], you know, or-or to chew your brown rice [laughs]. Without chewing your brown rice, you cannot eat it, you know. Only when you chew, you know [laughs], for pretty long time, like this, you will, you know, you will appreciate the taste of brown rice. When you say, "Oh this is awful! [Laughs.] How many times should I," you know, "chew it before I swallow it down?" That is, you know, very foolish way of chewing brown rice or eating brown rice. If you say, "Oh, sixteen precepts!" [Laughs.] "Awful," you know, "to be a Buddhist!" [Laughs, laughter.] Then, you know, you have no chance to have a real taste of Buddhist way. If you do it one by one, that is how you chew it-how you chew brown rice and how you practice our way.

And pretty soon you will have ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... you may say.

Hmm. I have not much things to say for tonight, but as you may have various, you know, not doubt, but you may have many questions on this point, I try to explain why we observe our rituals and our precepts.

Precepts observation is just to say HAI! [Loudly.] [Laughs.] That is how you observe precepts, you know. You-you shouldn't care-"Hai!" [Said without pause between "care" and "Hai!"] [Laughs.] Shut your eyes. "Hai!"-you should say. That is how you observe your precepts.

When flies come, you know, you should, you know, kill him-kill them. Wsht! [Laughs, laughter.] But you are always prepared, you know, for doing something wrong, maybe, you know. Even though when you are eating you are prepared for it, you know-"uh-oh" [?] [laughs]. You are not eating your rice carelessly, you know. You, you know, you are reciting from your bottom of heart, "Seventy-two labors" or "Sevent-[partial word]-[laughs]-"Seventy-two labors" or something incredible [laughs, laughter]. Anyway, you will say: "Seventy-two labors." That is actually how you bow here, you know. There is no other way [laughs], as long as you live here.

If your practice doesn't reach, you know, so-so far, it is not real practice. That is how you feel, you know, eternal life in, you know, inwith the mortal body. When you say "Seventy-two labors," there is, you know, Buddha, already, where there is nothing happens, you know, even though many things happen. But that is a part of, you know, Buddha's mercy.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Nigel Edmonds and Bill Redican (9/28/00).

[1] From gotai (Jap.): "the five body (members)"-head, two arms, and two legs;

tochi (Jap.): "prostrating one's body."

[2] Gyokujun So-on.

12 - Sesshin Meeting

Friday, July 31, 1970

Sesshin Meeting
San Francisco

... [laughter]. What he-she meant is if you stand up, you know, with painful legs or sleeping legs, you will [laughs]-it will be dan- [partial word]-dangerous [laughs, laughter]. That is why she said so-so, you know. I think that is very important, you know, and even though you feel your legs, okay. But it is better to make it-make them sure [laughs], rubbing, you know, your knee.

Student A: I thought what she was saying was that once we stood up, we were supposed to stand there without-before we started walking.

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me, I don't-

Student A: I thought that, you know-

Suzuki-roshi: -I don't know what she said, you know, so it is difficult [laughter].

Student A: I just won't move [laughing] until the person in front of me leaves.

Suzuki-roshi: When you make kinhin, you know, walk, you know, so that you give them- You know, if you walk too slowly or if you have too much, you know, distance, between you and someone ahead of you, that will make other person difficult to walk, so you should be careful, you know, abo- [partial word]-about distance between you and a person ahead of you. So keep certain, you know, distance. And if, you know, someone like me, you know, walk-naturally I walk slowly, you know. That will give others some difficulties. And as I walk very slowly, we-I will have big distance from [laughs] a person who is walking ahead of me.

So if you-if you have too much distance in between, you know, catch up to the person. That is, you know, very small things, but that kind of small things is pretty important to-to have good feeling in our practice.

Maybe do you have something more to say? [Apparently addressing a student who had spoken earlier.] Ah.

I am so-so much encouraged to see so many students, old and new. I hope we can sit together with good feeling.

The purpose of sesshin is to have more stable practice for us, especially those who are involved in busy, everyday life. It is good occasion to resume our true nature and to open our mind for various circumstances you may have in your everyday life.

And it may be incredibly important to-to practice with the students who you-whom you [are] acquainted with. Even though you do not communicate by words, you know, just to be with them, you know, will be a big encouragement. Verbal, you know communication tend to be very superficial, but when you don't [laughs] speak, you know, your communication between you will be very much encouraged, and your mind become-will become very subtle. And your intuition will be open by staying [in] silence. This is very-just to stay, without saying-stay here without saying anything for five days with you is already very meaningful. That is why we do not talk.

We, you know, when we [are] involved in some superficial interesting matters, because of some special interest, your true feeling will be covered by the-some special feeling. So to open your innate nature, and to feel something from bottom of your heart, it is necessary to remain silent, and that kind of practice will-through this kind of practice you will have more, you know, intuitive understanding of teaching, and your intuition will be improved.

"Not to talk" does not mean to, you know, to keep you in deaf and [laughs] dumb, you know. Just to improve your intuition, we practice silence during sesshin time. And so same thing is true with your reading. If you read something interest-interesting, because of something you become interest-interested in it, your intuition will be-it will be the disturbance of your [ability to] to open your intuition. That is why we don't read.

So if you-it doesn't mean to, you know, to confine yourself in dark, you know, room [laughs]. It means that, you know, you-to encourage your intuition or to encourage your-to open your, you know, true mind is why we do not read. In zazen, we do not think, you know, even.

If-some of you maybe Rinzai student who is practicing koan practice. If so, he can, you know, practice koan practice-practice too. But in koan practice it is not necessary to speak or to read.

Of course, for-especially for beginners it may be difficult to stay silent or not to read even newspapers. You may be very-you may be very-very much bored, so-[laughs, laughter] [sounds of nearby hammering]. You know, in that case, you should ask Kyo-san [?]. Do you know what his [1 word unclear]? If you do so, someone will hit you.

And that kind of thing [door slams nearby] will be taken care of mostly by old students, you know. In, you know, in sesshin, usually, everything will be taken care of by old student, and old student help, you know, new st- [partial word]-must help new students to practice more. And so old students, you know, take care of many things: serving meals for you, and giving some instructions, and carrying sticks. Those things will be-should be well taken care [of] by old students.

Try anyway. Sit [laughs], you know, and see what will happen to you [laughter]. And try to keep right posture according to the instruction. Important things is to follow the rules, you know. This is very important. "To follow rules" means to find, you know, to let you find your-yourself, you know. If, you know, there is no rules, it is difficult for you, you know, to find yourself because you don't know whe-[partial word]-where you are. [Laughs.] If there is food, you will know what time is it, and when we should eat, and which way we should walk [work?] [laughs].

If there is no rules, you know, and no one taking care of you, it is rather difficult to practice. And it will be a great help. It is much better than to have no rules and sit in one corner of the room five days, you know, without doing anything. So rules is something you should understand. Rules is something which you-which help you, you know. That is rules. Instead of, you know, restricting you by some, you know, cord.

If you have some question, I think I can answer.

Student B: During the sesshin should we still go on counting our breath, or would you recommend some other form of zazen?

Suzuki-roshi: There are various kinds of practice. Following breathing, or counting breathing, or ko- [partial word]-koan practice. But I recommend you to, maybe this time, you know, following breathing practice.

Student B: Followingbreathing-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: -or counting?

Suzuki-roshi: If-if, you know-when you find it difficult to count, you know-no, no, to follow your breathing, counting breathing will, you know, may help you because if you count your breathing, you know exactly what you are doing. Or when you-your practice get lost, immediately, you will, you know, know it. So that will-will be a-it-that will help you. So-but following breathing is good.

Student B: Just following breathing, but then you can't, you know, go in too deep [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. And at that time, don't, you know-don't make too much effort in, you know, in making your breathing slow down or, you know, making faster or anything like that. Just-if you just follow your breathing, then naturally, your-your breathing will be good, you know, appropriate for your practice, without-even though you don't try to make it slower, if your breathing is fast-too fast, the breathing will be slowed down.

Student C: For dokusan do you sign up every day for that day, or do you sign up Sunday for the whole week?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe better to sign up, you know.

Student C: Every day?

Suzuki-roshi: Not every day. Hmm? What-what-what was-?

Dan Welch: Just-there'll be a list, and just sign up once, whenever. Recommend that you sign up early-soon as possible. If there's nobody on the list, there will be dokusan, so-

Student D: Dan, will Suzuki-roshi be giving dokusan, do you know?

Dan: He'll be giving a few.

Student D: Will there be a sign-up sheet?

Dan: No.

Student D: So-

Dan: I can take care of that.

Suzuki-roshi: If you send me some patient by ambulance [laughs, laughter], I will see the patient [laughs, laughter]. Do you have some question? Hai.

Student E: This is a beginner's question, but do you-in your last lecture you said if another roshi had said: "You can put your mind in the palm of your hand." And I didn't really understand, but I-I tried that, and [laughter]-it was very-very calming. It made me feel very calm, and I'm wondering if that's alright to do that, to calm your expiration [4-6 words unclear]. [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Actually then, I created one more problem [laughter]. I said, you know, so that you-you may not be, you know, you may not be caught by some particular practice. Do you understand?

Student E: They are to do nothing but follow your breath.

Suzuki-roshi: And, you know, we have various-you will listen [to] various instructions, you know, but what I am saying is instruction will be given to you so that, you know-to help you, you know, to help your practice. That is why we give you instruction. We do not give instruction so that I can force some practice, special practice, on you, you know. Or it does not mean you should do this or you shouldn't do this. You know, you may have various intr- [partial word]-instructions, but if you, you know, think that will help, then you can do it. So that is up to you.

Student F: Where do the services take place? In the zendo also-

Dan: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: -or the Buddha hall?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, in zendo. In sesshin time we do everything in zendo. Some more questions?

Student G: What is the form for taking dokusan?

Dan: The ha- [partial word]-before you go-for those of you who have never had dokusan before, the jisha, right, the person you-the attendant for the roshi during sesshin, she's-LauriePalmer will do it this time. He will instruct you before it's your turn to go.

Suzuki-roshi: Some more questions maybe?

[Suzuki-roshi whispers with student (probably Dan Welch) for 2-3 sentences.]

Dan: Okay, uh-

Suzuki-roshi: Thank you very much.

Dan: -if you all know where your seats are, located in the zendo. We'd like to go down and sit last [3-4 words unclear].

-----
Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997.
Transcript checked against tape by Nigel Edmonds and Bill Redican
(3/30/00).

1970 augustus (10)

1 - Sesshin Lecture #1

Saturday, August 01, 1970

Sesshin Lecture #1
San Francisco[1]

In this sesshin, I have been explaining the context of our practice and, at the same time, the meaning of rules and precepts. But for us, precepts-observation of precepts and practice of zazen is same thing, you know, not different [just] as our everyday life and practice, zazen practice, is one.

After sesshin, we will have ordination ceremony for Paul [Discoe] and Reb [Anderson]. And-and then we will have lay ordination ceremony for the students-all the students who has been practicing zazen who-who has practiced zazen for three years before 1967. And so that is why I explained the meaning of our practice, zazen practice, or way of our zazen practice, referring to the precepts and rules-rules which you may like [laughs]-you may not like so much [laughs].

But if you know what is the precepts and what is rules, you-whether you like it or not, it is something with you, always, before-even before you are born-you were born. So we say: "If there is something, there is rules about it or in it." [Laughs.] There is nothing without rules, you know. That something [is] there means that some rules is there. That is rules. But before we, you know, know our true nature or some truth or rules which is always with you-you, you know, you think when-when someone explain how you exist or what is, you know, your true nature, then that is Buddha's teaching, not mine [laughs]. Nothing to do with me.

"If I am Buddhist [laughs], maybe we have to observe Buddha's precepts. But I am not Buddhist," you know, "I am not yet Buddhist, so that rules is nothing to do with me. But fortunately or unfortunately, if I go to Zen Center, you know, to listen to lecture [laughs] we have to, you know, behave like other students be- [partial word]-behave. That is rules." You may understand in that way. But where Zen Center exist, there is Zen Center's rules.

As you have your true nature, and, you know, to-to be ordained or to become a Buddhist disci- [partial word]-Buddha's disciple is to receive precepts. But that precepts, as I explained-actually precepts you have-which you have essentially-which you essentially have, originally have. But before you know yourself, you know, through practice pretty long time, you don't know your true nature.

When you-for an instance, when you cook rice for the first time [laughs], there is rules how you, you know, cook rice. So according, you know, to the way or rules, you know, to cook rice you can, you know-first you wash rice, you know, rice and-soaked in water maybe four, five hours or-no, no-wash it and take it in basket to get rid of water, and keep in the basket, you know, for-for [four?] five hours, and adding 20% more water to the rice, and burn it for maybe twenty minutes or more [laughs, laughter]. Then [laughing] you will have a beautiful, you know, well-cooked rice!

So we know that, you know, if you practice zazen [laughs], if you observe precepts, you will be a good person, you know, like Buddha [laughs]. But the-but if you have no experience of cooking rice, you know, and on-even though you know how to cook it, but when you cook it for the first time, if I-if you-you dip it in-if you, you know-after you wash it-is it-to wait two-three hours before you cook, oh, that's terrible! [Laughs.] To wait two-three hours before we start to cook!

And even though you start to cook, you know, you will worry, you know-you know, before you see well-cooked rice. And is it-is the water enough? May- [partial word]-maybe [laughs], and it may want more water, you know. Or then someone will tell him-tell you: "No, don't add any more water. That is okay." "No! Water [laughs] is not-I think water is not enough, so maybe I want to add some more water. " Yes, no, yes, no. [Laughs, laughter.] That kind of problem arise.

It is same thing with our practice, you know. If you just practice zazen, you know, according to the instruction, you will be a good person anyway [laughs]. But because you have no experience of, you know, perfect prac- [partial word]-practice, you worry, you know. That is, you know, you will have some doubt in your practice, and if your teacher says, "Don't move." [Laughs.] "Continue practice," you know, then you may say, "Oh my! That's awful!" [Laughs.] That is same thing [as when] you, you know, feel uneasy before you see the well-cooked rice.

When you make soup, you know, if you make soup according to the recipe-how much shoyu sauce or salt to put [in], you know, you will have good soup. But, you know, you-perhaps you want to make it sure, so you will taste the soup. "Oh, oh, this-it will not be-we may need some more salt. Maybe better to put some more salt!" Or you may think it is better to add shoyu sauce too-little bit [laughs]. Recipe says no shoyu sauce, but maybe better to put some [laughs] shoyu sauce, and you will taste it. "Oh. Not-maybe we'll need [laughs, laughter] more salt." While you are tasti- [partial word]-you know, tasting, your tongue, you know, get accustomed to the salt [laughs, laughter]. So [laughs, laughter] are they salt tasting [does the dish taste salty]? I'll add to it-a little bit more salt. [Laughs.] And finally you will have terribly salty soup.

That is, you know, excessive, you know, practice, you know. To make a great effort in your practice is good, but you should-even though you make a hard discipline, it is same thing, you know. Or sometime, you will-your practice will be lost. So from the student's side, you know, it looks like rules. From the Buddha's side, teacher's side, you know, there is no problem.

So for a student, as I said, something which looks like rules, or precepts, or prohibitory rules is not, Dogen-zenji says, true Buddhism. At first, all de- [partial word]-all the precepts looks like rules, but we must have it, you know.

So ordination ceremony is to trust Buddha. Or trust-to trust Buddha's precepts. Or to trust your teacher, even though you don't-because you don't know exactly, you are not get through Buddha's practice.

So it is necessary for you [to be] trusting Buddha, and for some gurus to you. That is necessary, for you, for a student. But Buddha may say, "I am not forcing anything," you know. "The rules you should observe is essentially-something you have essentially. Originally you have rules." That is what Buddha may say.

We say: "If you practice zazen, there is, you know, there there is Buddha nature, true nature. That is just expression of true nature." To observe-when you observe precepts, there there is your true nature. But if someone, you know, watch-see our practice, it looks like teacher is forcing some rules to many students. Here is, you know, bamboo sprout, you know, growing every day. Before bamboo become bamboo, you know, it will be a bamboo sprout two feet long or three feet long. It is growing very rapidly. But even though, you know, bamboo sprout is completely-looks like completely different, very, very different from bamboo, but bamboo is-even though it looks like very different, you know, bamboo sprout is really bamboo, and when-before it become bamboo, it should be in that shape, you know. It cannot be big, perfect bamboo, as you use.

But if you don't sit, you don't know bamboo through and through, you know. You may say-someone may say, you know, "He is fooling us," you know [laughing], "telling us this is bamboo. But this is not bamboo. Bamboo is more taller and with leaves. But this ha- [partial word]-this has no leaves! [Laughs, laughter.] Moreover, it is covered by something, some funny thing. [Laughs.] This cannot be a bamboo!" [Laughs.]

But when it is young, you know, there is-there must be some form, you know, even though-which is different from the mother bamboo. But no one actually forces bamboo sprout in that way, you know. Naturally it is in that way and growing in that way. But most people say, without understanding bamboo through and through, they have some idea of bamboo. We have some idea about our way of life and human nature, but unfortunately most of us do not know human nature through and through, like Buddha understood human nature.

You may say Buddha's teaching is the teaching of human nature. He will be a man or sage who had enormous understanding-unusual understanding about our human nature. So that is why, you know, he set up that kind of precepts. So from Buddha's side, it is our true nature. But from our side, it looks like something funny, you know: Buddha treating us, you know, forcing us to be a [laughs] bamboo sprout. [Laughs.] You may understand in that way. That is the trouble. How we solve the pro- [partial word]-this problem is for us, you know, to trust the precepts, and to join his practice. And for Buddha, you know, acknowledging student's quality or true nature, which is same as Buddha. And help students to be a Buddha. That is, from Buddha's viewpoint, that is his way.

Actual-our zazen practice is called practice of-practice [of being] one with enlightenment. It mean that from Buddha-from Buddha, it is enlightenment. From us, you know, it is practice. But actual practice is-actually, for us it is training. For Buddha it is expression of true nature. Actually it is so.

That is, you know, the-if we say, "our practice is expression of practice," you cannot agree with that. But if you say, "our practice is training to be a Buddha," Buddha will not agree with your understanding. And both is true, you know [laughs]. For you, it is training, that is true. For Buddha it is expre- [partial word]-expression of Buddha-nature, and he accept our practice whether it is perfect or imperfect.

When you-so for you, how to become a Zen student is-even though it is not so, you should, you know, receive precepts. You-even though you cannot accept it through and through, trusting him you should accept it. As you cook a rice according to the, you know, instruction. If you can do it just, you know, according to the instruction, that is best. But even though you, you know, you are confused, you know, while you are cooking, it can be-it i- [partial word]-it may be okay.

But anyway, you should start our way, and you should try to, you know, try to trust our instruction, our precepts, our zazen practice. This is, you know, actually to-how you join our practice, why you receive our precepts.

When I was working [laughs]-I was working on a stone with student at Tassajara, you know. He will ask him-I asked him to hit, you know, a stone, to cut it, you know. The stone has naturally-originally some, you know, layer, you know-stripes or layer. I know if he continue to hit it, it will be, you know, broken in two-two pieces. But, you know, I-if- because my student didn't, you know-haven't-didn't have the experience of cutting it, you know. So while he was-he became tired of hitting it [laughs], but I-I-I was quite sure, you know, he will cut it [laughs].

It is same thing, you know. The teacher knows, you know, it will-it will be cut, but student doesn't know, you know. So he doubt. But-but at last, you know, it was cut all of a sudden in two. Phht! [Laughs.] That is, you know, practice. It is not so easy, you know. It looks like almost impossible, sometime. But after long, long experience, you know, of various teacher, not only Dogen-zenji, you know, or Bodhidharma, you know, we know what kind of stone a human being is. So if we continue to practice in this way, he will be clearly, you know, cut. We know that. That is, you know, Buddha's-Buddhist way, and Buddha knows that. But even though you don't know it, if you continue to do it, it will work.

So to, you know, to start to trust, you know, the way, Buddhist way, is how-why you join our order, actually. And we say when you join the order-order, and started to hit it, hit the stone, [in the] same place over and over again. And when it is broke in two, we don't know, you know, why-by the last one, it was broken, or by the first one it was broken. You know, it is difficult to know. Anyway, first hit is-was working, that is clear. So we say even though our practice is not perfect, as long as you are practicing our way, that is enlightenment itself, that is how you cut the stone, how you become a buddha.

And for Buddha, you know, if he become a buddha, you know, even though he become a buddha, he cannot stay [in the] buddha stage. He will naturally start to help others, and he will continue his practice forever. Knowing-because he knows hu- [partial word]-human nature, and because he knows, you know, almost all the people does not know human nature so well, so he cannot trust their own true nature. And they will be confused.

So for Buddha, he cannot help starting to practice with others, and he cannot help helping others too. And in that way, you know, Buddha start again our practice, join our practice. He will practice with us always. So Buddha become student, and student eventually become a Buddha. And Buddha and we student is always one. That is the picture of our practice.

To have this kind of relationship between Buddha and you, or teacher and discip- [partial word]-disciple is very important, or, without this relationship, you know, Buddhism cannot survive or exist. Buddhism is not just moral code or is not philosophy or story, you know. Buddhism is actual way to become human-for human being to be human. So Buddha's teaching is how to be human being-human, and how to [for] Buddha [to] be Buddha. Although there are two names, human being or sentient being, or Buddha, but actua- [partial word]-essentially, it is one. Who knows human nature is Buddha; who do not have-do not know human nature through and through is sentient beings.

In ordination, when-when you join our order, you know, we-you will receive a robe which was designed by Buddha and which was weared by Buddha. And to receive this robe means to trust him. It is so important that to have Buddha, that we, you know, to encourage our way-seeking mind, to be free from our doubt, to have strong faith in our way, or to encourage our way we wear robe, which is set up by Buddha and used by Buddha. But nowadays, it is a symbol: symbol of teaching, symbol of his precepts, spirit, and-and it express by its color and by the material we use and size we decide, you know, we express Buddha's teaching too. Not just symbol, but to understand teaching, which is expressed in robe, is also necessary. So for-for us it is the teaching itself, and it is the Buddha's spirit itself, even though we cannot use it to protect us from cold or from hot weather.

You may say, you know, recently, knowing that it may be difficult to understand-to accept Buddha's teaching, I, you know, I am talking about it without any-without changing or-or without any modification. Between our superficial understanding of human nature, and his deeper-deep understanding of human nature, there is big difference. It is quite natural for us to accept the teaching is difficult. For you, may be difficult and for-for us, too-for us Japanese too. You may say Japanese people [laughs]-Japanese culture is, you know, already ninety-nine [point] nine percent Buddhism, so it may be easy. But, you know ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over. Side B of original is recorded very poorly: severe pitch distortions for the brief remainder of tape.]

... for you to, you know, understand Buddhism or for Japanese to understand Buddhism. Japanese people, you know, their life is based on Buddha's teaching [laughs]-on ninety-nine percent Buddhism. And your-your, you know, way of life is very very different from [laughs] Buddhist way. I don't know which is, you know, [more] difficult.

This kind of thing is, you know- I think you will find it easier to understand Buddha's teaching than Japanese may do because, you know, for an instance, if someone make a robe for you, you know, or if someone make a robe or dress there is suits for you, you know. If you do it from the beginning [laughs], you can do it very [2-3 words unclear]. But if someone sewed, you know, all the [6-10 words unclear] [laughs] it is very difficult [3 words unclear] ... [Tape ends mid-sentence with severe pitch distortion.]

---

Sources: City Center transcript by Meg Brown. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Re-transcribed by Nigel Edmonds, December 1999. Checked against tape by Bill Redican (12/23/99).

[1] The date of this lecture is uncertain. It may or may not be the first lecture of the sesshin.

2 - Sesshin Lecture #2

Sunday, August 02, 1970

Sesshin Lecture #2

True Practice As Expression Of Buddha-Nature

San Francisco

In Japan, a terrible fire broke out, and some hotel was burned down, and many sightseeing people killed in the fire. And recently in Japan, they had many sightseeing people even to Eihei-ji, where monk-only monks practice our way. Uchiyama-roshi[1]-Uchiyama-roshi said in his book[2]-if you open the book, he says recently, "Everything is going like that" [laughs]. Because we have so many sightseeing people, [laughs], so many years of hotels is built as one building after another. So the building is very complicated. So once something happens [laughs], they don't-it is difficult to figure out which is entrance and which is fire escape [laughs]. [Coughs heavily.] Excuse me.

I am very much interested in Uchiyama-roshi's remark, and it-it is something like that happening to us too [laughs]. Zen Center become bigger and bigger [laughs], and people-students who come here will find it very difficult which is entrance and which is fire escape [laughs]. I, you know, I thought maybe he is teasing me [laughs]. But what he said is very true, I think. The world situation is something like that.

But we should know, you know, the right entrance for zendo. Dogen-zenji says in Shobogenzo, right entrance for the Buddha hall is zazen. Zazen practice is right entrance. So everyone should, you know, enter the big right-from the big wide entrance. Because no-no Buddhist-there is no Buddhist who does not practice zazen. So all the teaching comes out from zazen, and what we obtain by practice of zazen is transmitted mind from Buddha to us. So when we practice zazen, all the treasures transmitted to us will come out from our transmitted mind. And how to open up our transmitted mind is practice of zazen.

So to talk about-to discuss about transmitted mind or true mind, or to express our true buddha-nature is through our practice. That is "Sesshin sessho,"[3] about which I talked last night. Why, you know, streetcars and bus and airplane is so crowded is there are too many people who seek for, you know, some special sightseeing place. Why we-our way is mixed up or confused is because we are practicing sightseeing zazen [laughs].

There is actually-this is not word I made up-"sightseeing practice."
Some Chinese people say "sightseeing practice" [laughs]. Or Dogenzenji says, "Why do you give up your own seat and wandering about various countries?"

So we should not involved in hasty idea of attainment. We should not practice to achieve something-to attain something. Step by step, appreciating, you know, our everyday life-day by day, step by step is our way. When we cannot see what we are doing, where we are, it is useless, you know, to put ourselves in hard practice.

If you, you know, if you invite, you know, some kabuki player [laughs]- kabuki-how do you say?-kabuki dancer or player from Japan, it costs a lot of money [laughs]. If you-even though you invite a first-class monk, you know, or even you can invite archbishop from Japan [for] the same amount of money [laughs].

So many people, you know, go to Japan and to study something about Zen, but it is rather difficult, you know, to study Zen in Japan. Many people ask me, "Could you introduce me to some monastery?" But I have no idea, you know. So I may say, "Maybe why don't you stay at Zen Center?" [Laughs.] And almost all the people say that, "I thought that will be your answer." [Laughs, laughter.] He knows very well. They know very well but, you know, why they go to Japan is to encourage [raise?] hotel, you know, money [laughs] to build some more new buildings.

They may be very happy to see you, but it is the waste of time and money for you. And you will be very much discouraged because, you know, you couldn't see any good Zen master. It is almost impossible to-even though there is-there are good Zen masters, but it is difficult to meet him. And it is difficult to underst- [partial word]-study under him.
You may figure out why it is so quite easily.

But practice of zazen and watching our step-steps, one after another, this practice is actually true zazen practice. We say our practice should be like, you know, a cow, you know [laughs]. Our practice should not be-our steps should not be like a horse. You-you cannot gallop, you know. You should walk slowly, like an elephant or like a cow. And if you, you know, if you can walk slowly, without not much, you know, gaining idea, then you are already a good Zen student. There is no other way to follow our way.

At the end of Sung dynasty,[4] we have many Zen masters. And most Zen masters encourage people to attain-to have enlightenment experience. You know, that is, you know, why they encourage, you know, people to attain sudden enlightenment, with some psychological, you know, way, is to meet the people's-student's desire-to satisfy student's, you know, desires. They provided that kind of technique or trick [laughs]. It may not be trick-I shall be scolded if I say "trick."

[Laughs, laughter.] But I-I feel-my feeling about, you know, that kind of practice is, you know, something like a trick, you know.

So Zen masters will be a good friend of psychologist [laughs]. And they will help with each other [laughs] how to, you know, explain-or how to explain enlightenment experience. And psychologist will explore some new field in psychology, but Zen or-Zen is, you know, originally Zen is completely different from that kind of practice.

Actually Dogen-zenji, you know, point up-point out this point very sharply. In "Sesshin sessho," in Shobogenzo-in chapter of "Sesshin sessho," he referred to another story. Tozan-daishi,[5] the founder of-actual founder of Soto school-oh, no-I [already] told you about the story between Tozan-daishi and Mitsu Shihaku.[6]

He referred to another story about First Patriarch of China and the Second Patriarch in China. The First Patriarch, Bodhidharma, told the Second Patriarch, Eka[7]-he said: "If you-if you want to enter our practice, you should stop-or you should cut off your self from outward objects. And you should stop your emotional and thinking activity within yourself. And when you become like a brick or stone wall, you will be-you will enter. That is how you enter our way."

That was what, you know, Bodhidharma said to the-to his disciple Eka. But it was actually-for him, it was very difficult practice, as you must have experienced [laughs]. Even to stop your mind is [laughs] difficult enough. It is so for the Second Patriarch. So he, you know, tried very hard, but he couldn't, you know, understand what he meant actually.

So the Second Patriarch, after trying very hard, he thought, you know, he could, you know-he could understood what he meant, at last. So he said to him, "Perhaps I understood what you meant." When he said so, Bodhidharma thought, "Oh, this student must have understood what I meant." So he did not ask any questions. "Okay, you must have understood." [Laughs, laughter.] That is what-all what Bodhidharma said to him.

x

But he said, "Is it," you know, "Is it-is there cessation in your," you know, "way? Is-is there a break," you know, "in your sesshin?" [laughing]-twenty minutes' break or thirty minutes' break. "Is there some break in your practice-in your sesshin?" he said-Bodhidharma said.

And Eka said, "No break, no cessation in our practice." Bodhidharma said, "Then who are you? [Laughs.] Who has," you know, "constant practice? Who are you?"-just, he said-"Who are you?"

Eka said, "Because I know myself very well, so it is difficult to say who I am. [Laughs.] Because I understand myself so well, so I cannot say who I am." And Bodhidharma said, "That's right. You are my disciple." Do you understand? [Laughs, laughter.]

Our zazen practice is not-is not to attain enlightenment actually-rather to express our true nature. Even though, you know, you don't feel you are expressing your true nature, but actually you are expressing your true nature when you practice zazen. And that something is, you know, according to the Tozan-daishi, it is someone in front-back of the building [laughs]. Someone is talking something-backyard of the across the street. What are they talking about, you know?

That someone is actually not a particular-not any particular person. That someone means, you know, our true nature. So always, you know, true nature within ourselves is talking about Buddhism-discussing about Buddhism. And whatever we do actually [is] expression of buddha-nature.

So at last, you know, the-Eka-the Second Patriarch, understood, came to this point. So he said, you know, "I think I understood what you meant-what you meant by to become a stone wall [laughs] or brick [wall]. I understand. The stone wall itself is buddha-nature, and brick are also-bricks are also buddha-nature. Everything is expression of buddha-nature, so now I understand what is buddha-nature. Before, I thought after attaining-after I attain enlightenment, we will know who is in backyard of the-of a-of the house. But there is no special person who is talking some special teaching. There is no special person," you know, "but all things we see, all what we hear about, is expression of buddha-nature." [8]

When we say buddha-nature, so buddha-nature is everything. We say buddha-nature is our innate true nature which is universal to every one of us, or even to various being: sentient beings or animate or inanimate being. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

... special nature which you can understand. How you understand the universal nature is through everything. There is only one way to-to have approach to the universal, so to say universal nature. So only way, you know, to-to realize our true nature is to know who I am-who is doing constantly something.

So he said, when Bodhidharma asked him, "Is there cessation in your true practice, after you enter or even before you enter, or before you join our true practice-is there any cessation?"

He said: "No," you know, "even before Buddha there is no cessation in the prac- [partial word]-in our practice, because our practice is Buddha's practice, which has no beginning and no end." So he says "no cessation."

"Then who is practicing that kind of practice, or who are you? Which is," you know, "which join this kind of practice?"

You know, he-he may be-he may be Eka-personally he may be Eka, but actually what he-he is doing is constant, permanent, ever-lasting practice which was started beginningless time to-and end in endless time. So, you know, it is difficult to say who-who is practicing [laughs] our way.

So Bodhidharma said, "Various-every patriarchs practicing same way as you do. I am practicing that way, and you are practicing that way." First of all, you know, when we practice zazen-when you practice zazen, you should know this point clearly. So you cannot waste your time. Even though your zazen is not so good, but it's-but that is zazen. Even though you will not-you may not understand what it is even, someday, sometime, you know-someday and someone will, you know, accept your practice. Only when you practice, you know, right here without wandering about, without being involved in sightseeing zazen, so I say why don't you sit here, you know.

It-it does not mean, you know-what I mean is, if you don't give up sightseeing zazen [laughs], you have no chance to join our practice. If you understand this point, you know, even though make a-make a big, big trip, that is not sightseeing zazen. That is real practice for you.

So point is to have-to have good start and to join the real practice which is always true and which has-which has no danger in your practice. So our practice, you know, not-is not necessary be hard one, you know, or good one. Good or bad doesn't matter [laughs]. If you sit with this understanding, and if you do not waste your time, or if you have conviction in your buddha-nature, then sooner or later you will find yourself in-in amidst of great Zen masters.

When you read, you know-especially young ambitious people read Zen books, you know, or when you listen to various Zen masters talk, they will talk about-about their masters who is very strict with him, or hardship he had in their-in his young age. And, you know, and he may say it is very difficult to be a good Zen master [laughs]. And we haven't so-so many good Zen masters so far, and maybe more difficult to have Zen masters-good Zen master in future.

So, you know, you will be very discouraged, you know. It means that you cannot be a Zen master [laughs]. But when you understand real practice-what it is, you know, this is-you will never be involved in such a foolish, you know, problem like Sengai.[9] When-maybe 6-7 [years ago?]-2-3 years after I came to America, I went to Fields Bookstore, and I saw Sengai's picture, you know. And, you know, it was something like calendar [laughs]. And frog was on the calendar. And Sengai said, "If frog," you know, "if someone can be a buddha, I-maybe I can be a buddha too." [10] [Laughing.]

Frog was sitting like this [probably gestures] [laughs, laughter]. "If people can be a buddha by practice of sitting, then I can be [laughs]-soon I will be a buddha" [laughs]. For the people who knows what is actual practice, you know, even though they don't experience enlightenment experience, if he sees someone who, you know, who is sitting to attain enlightenment [laughs], we think he is like a frog sitting [laughs].

Actually their sitting is much better than [laughs, laughter] our zazen. I always admire, you know, their practice-much better than my practice. They never get-they never be sleepy, you know. Their eyes is always open. [Laughs, laughter.] Tatsugami-roshi[11] will admire him very much, I think. "Open your eyes!"-you know. But there is no need, you know, for him to say so if we are like a frog [laughs, laughter]. And they do something very, you know, appropriate intuitively and [in an] appropriate way. You know, when something-when something come, they go like this-chomp! [Laughs, laughter.] [Sounds like he is snapping at something with his mouth, like a frog catching a fly.] Never-they never miss anything, but they, you know, are always calm, you know [laughs, laughter], and still.

I always think "I wish I could be a frog." So Sengai says, you know: Moshimo-Zazen shite moshimo hotoke ni naru naraba,[12] you know: "If by practice," you know-"If by practice we can be a buddha-" you know. He doesn't say anything more [laughs], and he draw a frog [laughing]-sitting frog.

This kind of, you know-if you understand what Sengai is feeling when, you know, you see a picture of a frog, you are already, you know, Zen-you have already understood what is Zen. There [is a] lot of humor in it, and there is good understanding of our practice. Even though our practice is-is not better than frog, you know, we will continue to sit. And we can accept a frog as our good example of practice.

I think that is a kind of enlightenment, but if-you should know how you, you know, actually understand a frog. Sengai, you know, drew-after, you know, practicing pretty long time [laughs], you will, you know, partly laugh-laugh at someone who is involved in wrong idea of practice, and partly you will, you know, laugh at yourself [laughs] who is sitting always [laughs] without doing anything-without making not much progress. You will laugh at yourself. When you can laugh, you know, at yourself, humorously, then there is, you know, enlightenment. But still, your zazen is beginner's zazen or sometimes worse than beginner's zazen [laughs].

Sometime I [am] ashamed of myself when I see someone-some student's practice which is very good. "Oh, he is very good." You know, I think-I wish I could be as young as-as he is once more. But it too late.

But anyway, our practice cannot be better than sitting of a frog. So it is okay. But to see someone who is practicing good zazen is very impressive, not only to me but also for everyone. I think that is-if your zazen is good enough to give good impression to others, your zazen is pretty good. Even though you don't think so, it is actually very good zazen. But even though you think your zazen is very good, and you think you [are] proud of your enlightenment experience like this, you know, if he doesn't impress anyone [laughs], his zazen may not be wrong practice.

I think, you know, there are several important points or factor in our practice. One is to-not to-we should not [be] involved in hasty gaining idea in our practice. We say, you know, we should not practice zazen for sake of others or sake of yourself. Just practice-just practice zazen for zazen. It means you should just sit. You should not sit for fame or profit. Just practice zazen.

We, you know, we say many things-not to do this, you know-or we talk about precepts, but the point of practice-observing precepts is there is no need not to do something bad. There is no need to try not to do something bad, but if you do good thing like zazen, you cannot do bad thing at the same time [laughs, laughter].

So if you, you know, continue, you know, positively something-continue to do something good, that is how you observe our precepts. So the point is just to sit, forgetting all about fame or profit. Just to sit for sake of zazen. That is one point. And that-that kind of attitude is also the attitude to-to have real way-seeking mind. Way-seeking mind means, you know, to find out inmost desire.

At first, you know, maybe you will-first step will be, you know, to know what is good and what is bad. Like when you go to shopping, you know, you will-it may be difficult to know what-which material you choose. For an instance, if you go to draper's shop, you know, all the materials-there are various color-there are various quality of material in various color, and it is rather difficult to choose, you know.

Starting from that kind of practice, you know, you should brush up your intuition. How to buy or get something good is, you know-if you try to compare one to the other [laughs], you will-even though you spend two-three days, you will not get something appropriate for you. And after trying two-three days [laughs], what you will get will be something which is not at all appropriate to you, and you should visit the same store again. If they change it for someone or something else, you are lucky [laughs].

Don't say this kind of practice is useless. It is actually first step to our way. But how you, you know, get-how you practice good practice and how you buy something appropriate to you is same. When you are not involved in it, you know, shopping too much, you can get something appropriate.

So what-after you know the secret of intuitive, you know, activity which is free from various restriction, you will, you know, find our way in your everyday activity. Until, you know, you, you know, you understand why we practice zazen and what is actually true activity, intuitive activity, free from various desires and restrictions, it is difficult to figure out, you know, what is good practice, what is, you know, what kind of-how you practice zazen. But it is okay. If you continue it, eventually, little by little, without knowing how you acquired that kind of intuition-intuitive activity, you will-anyway you will get it.

So it is rather foolish, you know, to-to be involved in some particular hard special practice. Our practice is hard enough [laughs], so don't, you know, seek for some special enlightenment, and don't seek for some special practice-way of special practice. Dogen-zenji said there is no Buddha who attained enlightenment-real enlightenment, who gave up our zazen practice. Only through our zazen practice various teachers attained-there is no other word, so I say "attained enlightenment" [laughs]-became Buddhist, real Buddhist. [Sentence finished. Tape changed to Tape 2.]

By the same way as you do something else, our pra- [partial word]-the-our practice is very different from usual practice. You know, you have book Zen and Archery,[13] you know, but when you understand our practice, you know-because the author understand real practice, archery can be, you know, Zen, but only for him it is Zen [laughs]. If you don't understand how [to] practice archery in its true sense, even though you practice very hard, that is-that-what technique you acquire is just technique. It doesn't help-help you through and through. You will be-you can hit a mark without fail, but without bow and arrow you cannot do anything. If you understand the author's point, when archery is-could be Zen, then maybe, you know, without bow and arrow the archery will help you. How you get that kind of, maybe, power or ability is only through right practice.

So, you know, we should make, you know, right practice-we should have right understanding of practice so you should have-to have right understanding of practice you should have right teacher who has right understanding of practice. So you should not have any gaining idea in our practice. And follow your teacher. And you should understand completely what is right practice. So Dogen-zenji says, you know, right practice and sanshi monbo. Sanshi monbo is "to have good teacher" and, you know, "to receive right guidance in your practice." [14] Or else you will not understand, you know, what is Zen.

And one more thing is, you know, maybe, we say Sozoku ya tai nan. [15] Sozoku is-"to continue our practice is very difficult thing," maybe the most difficult thing. If you continue it, having right understanding by good teacher, and if you practice it without any gaining idea, and continue right practice or fundamental practice-the only one practice, which is fundamental to various practice is the most important thing.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar (1997).
Translation of Japanese terms kindly provided by Shohaku Okumura-sensei. Checked against tape by Bill Redican (5/25/00).

[1] Kosho Uchiyama-roshi: (c. 1912-1998): Disciple of "Homeless" Kodo Sawaki-roshi and sixth abbot of Antai-ji Zen temple in Japan.

[2] Possibly Modern Civilization and Zen, Administrative Office of Soto
Zen, 1967.

[3] "Sesshin sessho": "Expounding the Mind and Expounding the Essential Nature," a fascicle of Dogen's Shobogenzo.

[4] Sung dynasty: 960-1279.

[5] Dongshan Liangjie (Tozan Ryokai): 807-869. Ch'an master of the T'ang period and co-founder of the Soto school of Zen (with his disciple Sozan). "Daishi" means "great master."

[6] Mitsu Shihaku (Shinzan Somitsu): dharma brother of Tozan. "Mitsu" is the last character of his name; "Shihaku" means "uncle teacher."
Tozan and Mitsu traveled together for twenty years.

[7] Dazu Huike (Taiso Eko): 487-593. Dharma successor of Bodhidharma.

[8] It is not clear to the transcriber where Suzuki-roshi intended the quote of Eka to end.

[9] Sengai Gibon (1751-1837): Japanese Rinzai master.

[10] Literally, "If a man becomes a Buddha by practicing zazen-" (Sengai Gibon, "The Meditating Frog," in D. T. Suzuki, Sengai the Zen Master, Greenwich, CT: New York Graphic Society Ltd., 1971). The frog is pictured on p. 94.

[11] Sotan Ryosen Tatsugami-roshi: Soto Zen master and ino-roshi at Eihei-ji for many years. He was head of training at Tassajara for several practice periods.

[12] Suzuki-roshi is quoting Sengai's one-line verse: Zazen shite moshimo hotoke ni naru naraba-.

[13] Eugen Herrigel, Zen in the Art of Archery. New York: Pantheon

Books, 1953.

[14] Literally: sanshi = "visiting teachers"; monbo (also monpo) = "hearing the dharma" (Jap.).

[15] Literally: "continuity is very difficult" (Suzuki-roshi is quoting Tozan Ryokai).

3 - Right Teaching and Right Practice

Monday, August 03, 1970

Right Teaching and Right Practice

In our practice two important practice is zazen practice and to listen to pure teacher, or right teacher. This is just like two fields of _____. Without practice, you cannot understand teaching. You cannot listen to your teacher and without practice, without listening to your teacher, your practice will be, cannot be right practice. Right practice, by right practice we mean practice, fundamental practice from which you can start ... from which various teaching will come out. So from right practice, if you have right practice you have already right teaching there. So right practice is the foundation of all Buddhist activity. Right practice. It is--it cannot be compared to various practice or training. There are many ways of Zen practice. There are many practice, zazen practice, meditation practice, but our practice is, cannot be compared to other practice. I don't say which is important or which is better but anyway without foundation various practice does not work. So if you practice some particular practice which has no foundation, your practice--you will eventually, you know, fall into a pit hole. You will be caught by it and you will lose your freedom. But if you have--if you have the foundation to your various practice, the various practice will work and will help you. Right practice we mean that kind of foundation of practice. It is not--it is more than practice. So when you have foundation to your practice even though your practice is not perfect, it will help you. That is right practice. And what is--if you want to know actually what is right practice, as I told you, it is necessary to practice with right teacher, who understands what is right practice.

And right practice is also foundation of precepts. Precepts. When you do not have right practice, you will hesitate to accept precepts, but if you have right practice you can accept precepts. Whatever precepts may be, you can accept. So precepts for the people who have right practice is called "bodhisattva precepts," in comparison to some other so-called-it "Hinayana precepts," which is quite different. The way of observing is quite different. Last night I talked about--little bit about it. I said if you do something good, you cannot, you cannot--you have no time to do something bad. That is how you keep precepts.

Why we say "bodhisattva precepts" is--it is based on bodhisattva mind. As you know, bodhisattva mind is to save others, all sentient beings before you save yourself. That is bodhisattva mind. To save others is first and to save ourselves is next. Or we say, bodhisattva mind, bodhisattva mind ... bodhisattva mind is spirit, to devote ourselves in serving others.

How you then, how you arise bodhisattva mind will be the next point. You will ask me how you arise bodhisattva mind. You-many people ask me about this point. How they, you know, question will be something like this:

"I have various problems, and you say, you always say you should not try to attain enlightenment. You should not be involved in selfish practice. If so, to try to save others is also, you know, gaining idea because you have some purpose or some idea of doing something. So that will not be actually bodhisattva mind."

Actually we will have this kind of question always. To practice purely you start to try to do something, to help others. But you may wonder whether you are doing something to help others or to help yourselves. It is very difficult to know which. I think you may suffer on this point a lot, as I did when I was young. Whenever I try-while I am trying continually doing something, more and more, I feel lose my confidence. For instance, if you clean restroom as your everyday task ....

4 - Sesshin Lecture #4

Tuesday, August 04, 1970

Sesshin Lecture #4
San Francisco

In-in everyday life, to observe precepts and, in our practice, to continue our zazen looks like different, but actually it is same. In actual zazen, whether-even though your practice is not perfect, if you practice our way, there there is enlightenment because originally, you know, our practice is expression of our true buddha-mind.

Because you-your-because of your discrimination, you say your practice is not good. But if we do not, you know-if we do not discriminate [in] our practice, that is really the expression of the-our true nature, which is buddha-nature.

And in our everyday life, if we observe precepts even for a moment with this-with our mind-with our mind which is changing always, then the momentous change-on the momentous changing mind, real, you know, moon of the buddha-mind will appear: bodhi-mind will be there. So actually there is no difference.

So the point is, you know, moment after moment we satisfy our practice and without discrimina- [partial word]-without criticizing your mind too much, to do something which is good is only way for us. And if-when you understand way-seeking mind, or buddha-mind, or bodhi-mind in this way, actually everything is encouraging us to have buddha-mind or bodhisattva-mind, which is to help others before we help ourselves. When you, you know, try to help others, everything you have will be-will give you chance to help others. So whatever it is, the things you see, things you hear will give you chance to help others.

So that mind to help others will give you a big opportunity to treat everything [as] a Buddha-Buddha's gift. And when you say "before we save ourselves, we will get-we will be free from selfish idea," when you give up selfish idea, there there is chance to have buddha-mind. The world is, you know-if you say "before we save ourselves, to save others" looks like dualistic. But our understanding of bodhisattva-mind is not dualistic. It is, you know, extended. Understanding of oneness of giving something-someone who give and someone who receive-this is the characteristic of our way. Practice and enlightenment is one, you know. Someone who save and who is saved is one. So there is no problem in observing this-our way.

The precepts is also very clear. There is no precepts to observe, you know, or no one who is observing precepts-no problem at all. Precepts-if you say "precepts," you are precepts itself. And if you say "you," you know, you have, you know-"you" are already precepts. And there is no precepts or no one who observe precepts. In this way, we have to observe our precepts, and we have to arise bodhisattva-mind, and we have to practice our way.

It is not, you know-Dogen-zenji says it is not because of your power of practicing zazen or power of, you know, bodhisattva-mind that you attain enlightenment, that you become buddha. It is not [through] power of practice or it is not, you know, power of arising bodhisattva-mind that you become buddha. And he says even though you attain enlightenment, you have to practice zazen. Even though you attain-you become buddha, you have to have-you have to extend bodhisattva-mind. Even though you become buddha, you have to observe precepts.

That is actually, you know, why he said before you save yourself, you should save others. So, you know, this idea is beyond the idea of attainment-to be buddha or to observe precepts. Usually, you know [laughs], you think, you know, why you practice zazen is to attain enlightenment, why you arise bodhisattva-mind is by power of bodhisattva-mind, [and] you will, you know, be a buddha. By observing precepts you will-you can practice zazen and you will become a buddha. You will understand in that way.

But Dogen-zenji says, you know, it is not because of the bod- [partial word]-observing-because of arising bodhisattva-mind that you become buddha. And even though [laughs] you arise bodhisattva-mind, you should try to, you know-you should continue the bodhisattva way.

Before you save yourself, you should save others. Even though you attain enlightenment, you know, you should continue it. Do you understand? You should continue it. After-even though you have, you know, acquired-you have attained enlightenment, you should continue it.

So bodhisattva-mind is not the way to attain buddhahood. Just-bodhisattva-mind is mind which should be continued forever, whether you attain enlightenment or not. Whether you are a buddha or not, anyway, bodhisattva-mind is the mind which buddha and someone who is not yet buddha should continue.

So you may say bodhisattva-you may think bodhisattva-buddha is, you know, highest, and bodhisattva is next, you know. And pratyeka[1] and shravaka[2] is, you know, will follow. But [laughs] when we understand bodhisattva way in that way, or when we understand our practice in that way, which is important for us, enlightenment [laughs] or practice-which is important? Which is, you know, better? Bodhisattva or buddha [laughs]? Very difficult to say. In one way, maybe, bodhisattva is. You know, buddha-if you become buddha, if that is the end of the practice or end of everything, you know [laughs].

So after you are-become buddha, what you will do [laughs, laughter]? Then that buddha will not exist forever. And if there is somewhere to go, it may be [that] you have to start again from [laughs, laughter]-. Bodhisattva way is the way which we should continue anyway. So we say, "before you save yourself," you know, "you should try to save others." The meaning is very deep. And the meaning, you know, will provide a very easy approach. But very easy, but it is so lofty idea. There is no end, you know, in bodhisattva way.

So we transmit, you know, bodhisattva precept to you [laughs]. We do not say, you know, "buddha precepts." We say "bodhisattva precepts." We-I don't want to discriminate, you know, Theravada way or Mahayana way-so-called-it "Mahayana way," but true spirit of Buddha is actually in Mahayana way. And by Mahayana practice we could-Buddhism could survive for a long time.

So four vow we recite every day is very important.[3] And the precepts we transmit from Buddha to us-transmitted from Buddha to us is very important. And to express the meaning of Buddha's truth-meaning of Buddha's precepts, we call it, you know, "bodhisattva precepts" instead of calling [it] "buddha precepts." We can say "buddha precepts," but if we say-to make this point clear-non-duality of-idea of non-duality and idea of true duality, we use "bodhisattva precepts."

Even though we say "bodhisattva way," we do not discriminate bodhisattva way or Hinayana way. But if we call it-call our precepts "bodhisattva," you know, then you will have much clear[er] understanding of precepts. And you will find out easier to observe. And you will find the deeper meaning of observing precepts.

So for us, even though we have, you know, we are the son-all of us is descendant of Buddha-son of Buddha, but we call, you know, all successive patriarchs "bodhisattva," you know. Buddha is a bodhisattva. And for us, you know, we understand in that way. Bodhidharma is a bodhisattva. And Eka[4] is bodhisattva. Dogen is bodhisattva. And the precepts you will have, you know, in lay ordination is called "bodhisattva transmission of precepts."

For several nights, I am concentrate-my talk is, you know, concentrated on this point of, you know, why you have-you receive bodhisattva precepts when you, you know, are [receive] lay ordination. Recently I did not put emphasis on Dogen-zenji's zazen practice, which is shikantaza. But shikantaka-we do not say even "shikantaka." But we just say "zazen."

In comparison to the zazen, to attain enlightenment, we call it shikantaka because we have no gaining idea in our practice. And in our practice, practice and enlightenment is one. When you practice our zazen there is enlightenment. We rather put emphasis on, you know, practice rather than enlightenment. Front, you know-front gate is-for us is practice. And, you know, our precepts-Zen precepts is, you know-all Zen precepts is bodhisattva pre- [partial word]-is called "bodhisattva precepts."

And precepts you will receive in lay ordination-precepts transmission you will receive in lay ordination is [one] in which it says there is no difference between Rinzai precepts and Soto precepts. It is bodhisattva precepts. This is very important point. Not dualistic precepts. And the precepts always one with you. And always should be kept by you. Even though you do not try to keep it, it is there.

So that is why I said last night[5] you should say "yes." There is-you cannot say "no." [Laughs.] My lecture was, you know-the point of my lecture was this point: bodhisattva practice-bodhisattva precepts.

So on okechimyaku [6] it says, "Busso shoden bosatsu daikai." [7] Bosatsu is "bodhisattva" in Japanese. And after you receive it, you know, the most important thing is to continue it, you know. Moment after moment, you should say, "Yes-yes I will." [Laughs.] Moment after moment. And you should continue our practice, even though you experience enlightenment experience. You should continue it. That is golden rule for all Zen student, whether you are Rinzai student or Soto student.

I don't want to repeat same thing over and over. I think you have understood. I think I have some more time, so if you have question, please ask me. Hai.

Student A: You said if you come to zazen in bodhisattva-mind, it's not the way to enlightenment.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.]

Student A: I think I [1 word] that.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Many times, yes.

Student A: What is the way?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe so, you know, but, you know, as I said right now, you know, if, you know, Zen is way to attain enlightenment-if you take, you know, literally, you know, you will misunderstand our practice-bodhisattva practice, you know. Bodhisattva practice-bodhisattva way is the way which, you know, regardless you are buddha or not, you should-way you should continue forever is bodhisattva way.

If you say, you know, "buddha way," if you become buddha that will be the end. So to, you know, to make the meaning of our practice clear, we say zazen is not to attain enlightenment. Do you understand? You will be mistaken by saying you practice zazen to attain enlightenment. So when we practice zazen, that-so we say beginner's mind is everything, you know. When you arise bodhisattva-mind, there is already buddha-mind. And it is everything. So, you know, I don't know which is more appropriate word: bodhisattva way or buddha way. I don't know. Maybe, you know, better to call it "bodhisattva way" rather than "buddha way." Buddha way is something like "dead way." [Laughs.] Not active-not alive. And looks like very-we are not buddha. When we say "buddha," we are sentient being. So there is big gap between buddha and sentient being.

But bodhi- [partial word]-when we say "bodhisattva," bodhisattva include all sentient being. And bodhisattva way is especially for sentient being. Do you understand? You-we-you know-[laughs] to make our way clear, you know, I said "our way is not to attain enlightenment." But we do not reject enlightenment experience. We welcome [laughs, laughter] to attain enlightenment. But if we call, you know-if we say in that way, you know, you-"Oh, I had a great experience! So my practice is over. [Laughs, laughter.] I have done it!" [Said in an ironic voice.] If you say so, you will actually lose your enlightenment.

So if you shouldn't say so, maybe-I think maybe you shouldn't say so. It is better not to say so. And it's better to continue bodhisattva practice. Hai.

Student B: Is there a meaning-a concrete meaning for "saving all sentient beings," or is doing zazen saving all sentient beings? Is there some other way to understand what that means?

Suzuki-roshi: Sentient? All, you know? Save sentient being-to help, you know, you can say "to help." You can start, you know, very, you know-to save sentient beings, you know, is not just to give something to others, you know: to almsgiving or to help people when they are in difficulty, you know, materially or spiritually. But it is, you know, to make freeway or to work on factory is actually to help others. But it does not mean, you know, only to help others just materially or spiritually. It is-the spirit is-the meaning is greater than that. But we-to begin with, we should try to help others in various way-easy way. And while you are doing, that is practice. While you are doing, you will find out how difficult it is, you know. Then you will, you know, improve the way to help others. Naturally, you should practice zazen. Hai.

Student C: Is there a reason-or what is the reason why we should [6-10 words.] Does it have something to do with the consciousness [1-2 words] or something [1-3 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Ahh. No. Here, you know, we practice in that way. But it does not mean you should, you know, continue to eat, you know, as you eat here. It is a kind of practice-training, maybe.

Student C: Is it a discipline to try to deprive yourself, say, when an urge to eat certain food [1-2 words]-

Suzuki-roshi: No.

Student C: -if you wanted to eat it. Like, you [1-2 words]-can that help your practice or something [1-2 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, yes. Nondiscrimination is very important in our eating practice. [Laughs, laughter.] We Japanese people do not like, you know, raw vegetables so much. Especially we don't eat beans, you know, without cooking. The smell is so strong [laughs, laughter]! But in San Francisco zendo, as long as I am here [laughs, laughter], I have to eat, you know, raw beans and [laughs, laughter]-which have strong smell! All salad looks like, to me, you know, green bean. If you cook it, it has not much strong smell. Good flavor [laughs]. But if you don't cook, all the salad will-looks like to me green bean [laughs, laughter]. But, you know, we should not discriminate [laughs, laughter]. Non-discrimination is very important [laughs, laughter]. Hai.

Student D: Roshi, why do we eat the banana and throw away the skin?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] I don't know. [Laughter.] Maybe very difficult to eat. I tried [laughs, laughter], but it was too difficult. And actually, I think if you eat it, you know, your tummy will stop, you know [laughs, laughter]. You will-you will have hard time in your restroom next morning [laughs, laughter]. So that is too much. Hai.

Student E: Roshi, did you-did I understand-last night did I understand you correctly when-getting back to the business of helping others-trying to help others-that it shouldn't-it shouldn't be with the conscious mind? It should just be what it is-just don't bother with it [?]-a sort of natural thing [?]?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, you know, it is like-when you help them, you know, you don't have not much problem because you are a man who is helping someone. But those who are helped, you know, there will be some problem there. If you receive something from someone, if you change your position, you will find out why. And it-if you-if you are conscious about giving something, you know, then it will be-it will create some problem unnecessarily. In this point, American people are very good, I think. If you give [something to] someone, that's all [laughs]. I find many things, you know, outside of my room. I don't know who gave it to me. They just give it to me. So, you know, I appreciate their kindness in its true sense. But if you-if I know who gave it to me, you know, I-I have, of course, no bad feeling, so I don't mind so much whether I know who gave it to me or I don't know. It doesn't matter so much. But I think it is better, if it is possible, if you can do it without dualistic idea of giving or "I am giving something to others." Hai. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over. First part of student's question not recorded.]

Student F: ... in practice. In this context, I'd like to understand effort, because it's also said that the way is effortless.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student F: The way is effortless.

Suzuki-roshi: Way?

Student F: The way, or-Suzuki-roshi: Wave?

Student F: Right practice.

Suzuki-roshi: Ah. Right practice. Yeah.

Student F: That's what I'd like to know. Is right practice effortless?

Suzuki-roshi: Effortless?

Student F: Yes. With no effort.

Suzuki-roshi: No effort of, you know-no effort with gaining idea. Effort to, you know, maybe to give up gaining idea. Effort to continue it without, you know, dualistic idea: just to do it. That kind of effort is necess- [partial word]-always important. Hai.

Student G: Roshi, would you say something about shila-the Bodhisattva concept of [1 word].

Student H: That was Sanskrit.

Suzuki-roshi: Bodhisattva?

Student G: Shila-morality. [6-8 words] bodhisattva way.

Suzuki-roshi: In contrast to-in Sanskrit [laughs, laughter]? I don't know Sanskrit. "Bodhisattva" is Sanskrit, I know, but- I am sorry.

Student G: The bodhisattva concept of morality.

Suzuki-roshi: Ah, concept of morality.

Student G: Yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: Morality-morality is, you know-it is more than morality. Morality is-if you underst- [partial word]-if you see our precepts, it is exactly morality, which you should observe as a human being. But bodhisattva way is more than that. That is why I have to explain it, you know, why I explained so far. If it is morality, you know, if you read the precepts, you know: "Don't kill," you know. "Don't steal." Or, "Don't speak ill of others." If you read in that way, literally, that is morality. And actually, we are observing-most people are observing morality to some extent. That is morality.

But bodhisattva way is the way when, you know-bodhisattva way include morality but more than that. If you, you know, observe it in dualistic sense, it is morality. If you understand bodhisattva way deeper than that, it is, maybe, religious activity. So moral world, religious world, there is-there are two or more.

Maybe your question is arised because I said, you know, intuitively, you know, or without any idea observing it. But it does not mean to ignore the moral code-codes. Okay? Hai.

Student I: What is suffering? What is that relieves suffering?

Suzuki-roshi: Suffering is, you know, in short, to expect, you know, something which you cannot expect is cause of suffering-in short, you know. We want to live longer, but, you know, we cannot live so long. Maybe one hundred years or-mostly less than that. But we want to live more than that. There we have suffering. We want to meet someone who you love [laughs], but, you know, it is not possible-always possible. Some day you have to be separated from someone who you love. And, you know, you will meet someone who you not like so much [laughing]. That is very true, you know. You say you don't like him or like her. But may say-you must ask her how she feels. Then it is very difficult, you know. Even though you love her, she may say no [laughs, laughter]. That is cause of suffering. So in short, you know [laughs, laughter], the things does not go-do not go as you expect. That is suffering.

And so, how to get out of suffering is to have, you know, quiet mind. That you can eat green pea [laughs, laughter] is how to get out of suffering. You know, if you-if your mind is calm and very soft, you know, you can eat it, and actually it is very good, you know [laughs, laughter]. So we say:

Jiki ni oite to naru mono wa,

ho ni oitemo mata to nari. [8]

You know-you-a man who does not discriminate food will be, you know-will not discriminate in our dharma too.

You-you will not say, "I cannot observe this precepts. But this is very good precepts [laughing, laughter]. Very convenient for me." To criticize someone-we use precepts to criticize someone, you know: "'Don't speak ill of others.' You see? What did you say now? You shouldn't criticize me [laughs, laughter], because precept says don't criticize anyone." That is not how we observe precepts. Hai.

Student J [David Chadwick]: Sometimes when I've heard definitions of suffering by Rahula in What the Buddha Taught,[9] and that doctor who spoke at Zen Center a couple of years ago-Dr.-

Student K: Conze [?]?

David: No, no. That young guy who went to Ceylon.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

David: They define suffering in such a big way, you know-it was like-do you-do you-do you think of suffering as-it-is your understanding of suffering including everything: good and bad, happy and unhappy-all experiences?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah. Yeah, suffering covers-teaching of suffering covers almost whole Buddhism.

Student K: Burns.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student L: Burn. [Laughs, laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Yeah. Dr. Burns, yeah.

David: Could you-could you repeat what he thought-what he thought on [2-4 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: No, I cannot. My mind is not so explicit, you know, to, you know-it is big, you know, topic to speak about. I know that much. But, you know, in one word, that is how we suffer. But that teaching covers almost whole teaching, you know.

Duhkha, sukha-you know, in-our life could be divided into renunciation from suffering and suffering. But it is actually one, you know. Because it is one, the teaching of suffering covers of-covers teaching of enlightenment.

Student M: I thought you said that we should begin by practicing as if we were shopping-as if we were shopping for things?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student M: Would you-how did that fit in with buying the rotten vegetables? Would the bad vegetables be what you would buy [?]??

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] No, I-when-at that time I have no idea of buying something, you know. It is a kind of-my special practice, maybe, you know. Not-but I didn't-I-that is my habit or feeling, you know. When you-when I see it-good, you know, fresh vegetables and fresh apples and, you know, old, you know, rotten apple, I feel if I don't buy it, if I don't eat it right now, you know, it will be-no one will buy it, so he must throw it-throw it away. So if I buy it, you know, that apple will save-will help us. But if I don't, for that apple there is no chance to serve its purpose [laughs, laughter]. Immediately I feel in that way, so I cannot help buying bad ones first and leaving good ones for someone, you know, because many people will like it, you know. Maybe if you work in the kitchen you will have that kind of feeling, you know.

Student M: Wouldn't you then always buy bad things [?]??

Suzuki-roshi: No, not always.

Student M: Bad [1 word], bad [1 word].

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] No. No, not always, you know, especially food, you know. If it is some-if it is-if I buy a motorcar, I want to buy a brand new perfect ones [laughs, laughter]. But the more you have knowledge of something, you know, you will be, you know, like me when I buy something-some apples or something. Before you have not much knowledge about it, you will, you know, buy something good first. If you have good knowledge of, you know, car, even though it doesn't look like so good, but you know how to-because if you know how to mend it you will buy it, you know, because maybe it is cheaper. And you know how to make good use of it. So if your mind is very kind and very clear, you will observe in that way without having superficial discrimination. Some question? Hai.

Student N: When you say "attaining enlightenment," are you saying gradual enlightenment always? And when you talk about enlightenment experiences, do you mean experiences that are an encouragement to our practice?

Suzuki-roshi: Why I say so is, you know, because you say "enlightenment." But mostly it is not great enlightenment. It is, you know, many small enlightenments-not big one which covers various-every experience. Enlightenment, like Dogen-zenji describe, is the enlightenment which covers everything, you know. You cannot-no one cannot get out of his enlightenment [laughs]. It is so big, you know.

Student O: Can you explain the difference between koan practice and shikantaza practice?

Suzuki-roshi: I don't know koan practice so well, you know. But for us, koan-koan is-"koan" originally means official statements or rules-issue, you know, from the government. So which is something which you observe-absolute rules or statements of enlightenment, you know, for Zen. So how you find out the absolute truth in each story of Zen story is koan practice. But for us, you know, our everyday life is already big koan, you know [laughs, laughter]. So, you know, we, you know, we do not stick to some traditional special koans. Some question? Hai.

Student P: [3-4 words] the difference between the bodhisattva-mind and the buddha-mind? [4-8 words.] Is the buddha-mind something that occurs only after death?

Suzuki-roshi: No. In its true sense, buddha-mind-there must not be any difference between bodhisattva-mind [and] buddha-mind, you know. Should be same. But, you know, for a long time, you know, Buddha-Buddha's-Buddhism was mistaken or misunderstood. And, you know, when-after a long time they found out the true meaning of precepts-sutra. And they started to use "bodhisattva"-word "bodhisattva" instead of "buddha." They put emphasis on bodhisattva stage rather than buddha stage, which is perfect. Bodhisattva stage which is not perfect. But in bodhisattva-in idea-idea of buddha is also fully included-maybe more advanced buddha [laughs] in term-in-the meaning of words is-may be deeper when old Buddhist called Buddha "Buddha."

Student P: In what sense, then, does our zazen heal others?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student P: In what sense, then, does zazen help others?

Suzuki-roshi: Help others? Yeah.

Student P: I was assuming that it only helps-

Suzuki-roshi: -yourself.

Student P: -yourself.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. No. No-definitely not. Maybe, you know, as I said right now, you know, because, you know, you do not know yourself so much, you know, and you don't know what you are doing to others so much, but you know what others do to you, you know very much [laughs]. And actually, you are doing same thing to others [laughs, laughter]. If you realize that, you know, you will think [laughs].

Student Q: Is it necessary to accept freedom as a form of suffering?

Suzuki-roshi: Freedom-

Student Q: Is it true?

Suzuki-roshi: Freedom. The idea of freedom or-?

Student Q: The experience of freedom.

Suzuki-roshi: Experience of freedom.

Student Q: Yes. Is that also suffering when you [2-4 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: I think so. Freedom-you may say freedom is also cause of suffering because you have, you know, fear of losing freedom. So you [feel that you] should protect your freedom [laughs, laughter]. Then, you know [laughing], freedom will cause some trouble for you. Hai.

Student Q: Isn't that the original discrimination-freedom versus-or enlightenment versus non-enlightenment or freedom versus non-freedom? Isn't that the original discrimination?

Suzuki-roshi: Freedom. Yeah, freedom-maybe so, you know. You know, the-something which is-some idea which is dualistic, you know, is, anyway, cause of problem because, you know, it is-it makes pair of opposites, you know. So there is no words which mean something without any opposite idea. So if you stick [to] one side, you know, you will cause trouble-stick to one side. So when you are in the position which include both side, or understanding which you include-which you can-which you can include both side, that is how to be free from, you know, suffering. Hai.

Student R: The Theravadan scriptures talk about many different levels of meditation. Does zazen include all of these, or is it different?

Suzuki-roshi: "Include" is, you know, very vague, you know. But it is-at least it is-our practice is foundation of those practice. Without, you know, our practice, you know, it doesn't work. It will, you know-if it is actually, you know, stepladder-like practice, you know, it will create problem. And it should be one practice, you know, and it should be a different experience of one practice. Then, you know, those various steps will work-will help. So if you open your eyes, you know, and if you understand our practice and see those stages of attainment, it makes sense.

Mmm. Just a moment. I-I think I have-I haven't time any more. Do I have some more time?

Student: 9:10 [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Okay. Thank you.

---

Source: Original City Center tape transcribed and checked by Bill Redican (11/29/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] pratyeka-yana: attaining enlightenment by and for only oneself, the end result of which is becoming a pratyeka-buddha. It is one of the three vehicles (triyana) that can bring one to nirvana: shravaka-yana, pratyeka-yana, and bodhisattva-yana.

[2] shravaka-yana: seeking personal enlightenment by listening to the dharma and gaining insight, the end result of which is becoming an arhat.

[3] "Beings are numberless; I vow to save them.

Delusions are inexhaustible; I vow to end them.

Buddha gates are boundless; I vow to enter them.

Buddha's way is unsurpassable; I vow to become it."

[4] Dazu Huike (Taiso Eka): 487-593. Second patriarch of Zen in China. Dharma successor of Bodhidharma.

[5] SR-70-08-03.

[6] okechimiyaku: a genealogy of Zen succession. (See also SR-71-06-09, p. 9.)

[7] Busso shoden bosatsu daikai-Busso: Buddha and ancestors; sho: "right" or "true" (as in Shobogenzo); den: transmitting; bosatsu: bodhisattva; daikai: precepts for monks and nuns. Hence, "great precepts for bodhisattvas correctly transmitted by buddhas and ancestors," or, more traditionally, "bodhisattva precepts of the correct transmission of the Buddha ancestors."

[8] Jiki (food); ni oite (about); to (absolute or equality); naru (become); mono wa (person), ho (dharma); ni oitemo (about); mata (also); to (absolute or equality); nari (end-of-sentence marker). Suzuki-roshi is referring to Dogen-zenji's "Fushuku-hanpo" ("The Dharma for Taking Food"), from Eihei (Dai)Shingi, Line 1. See T. D. Leighton and S. Okumura, Dogen's Pure Standards for the Zen Community, Albany: SUNY, 1996, p. 83. [See also SR-70-08-15.]

[9] Walpola Sri Rahula, What the Buddha Taught (Bedford: Gordon Fraser Gallery, 1959).

5 - Priest Ordination Ceremony: Paul Discoe And Reb Anderson

Sunday, August 09, 1970

Priest Ordination Ceremony: Paul Discoe And Reb Anderson
San Francisco

Suzuki-roshi (speaking formally): [1] ... Paul Discoe and [1 word unclear] Reb Anderson, who have come here to be ordained as a disciple of the Buddha. Listen to-listen calmly and attentively.

Due to surpassing affinities, this ordination ceremony become possible. As Buddha's disciple, you have acquired the opportunity to receive the teaching transmitted from Shakyamuni Buddha through the patriarchs to me and to manifest the Buddha's way forever.

Even the buddhas and patriarchs cannot help but admire you who are earnestly seeking the Buddha's path in this world. With sincere belief in his dharma and practicing his way with [2-3 words] for all sentient beings.

It is rare indeed to receive a human body in this cosmic world. However, since we cannot avoid the reality of birth and death, we must deeply and gratefully appreciate how meaningful and marvelous this present existence is. There indeed is the opportunity to listen to the dharma, and the appearance of Buddha in this world is our great joy.

Embracing Buddha's teaching, we seriously accept-sincerely accept the buddhas as our parents. And moment after moment we endeavor to live the life of enlightenment which transcends greed, anger, and self-delusion. Thus, Paul and Reb reflect on the circumstance that have made this ceremony possible and considered deeply the innumerable blessing of your family and friends.

The great deliverance bestowed upon you by your father is higher than a mountain. And your mother's love is deeper than the ocean. It is my sincerest wish that you return at least a small part of this parental kindness, and with your whole life express your gratitude to all those who have cared so much for you.

[After 50 seconds, the recorder was stopped for an unknown interval.]

The last hair is called shura. Only Buddha is able to cut it off. Now I will shave it off. Do you allow me to do this?

Paul: Yes I will.

[Wood clappers (kaishaku) are struck twice.]

Suzuki-roshi (chanting):

Shaving your head and again shaving your head, you are now in the path of the Buddha with immovable mind of great determination, having made a vow to save all sentient beings from their suffering.

Shaving your head and again shaving your head, you are now in the path of the Buddha with immovable mind of great determination, having made a vow to save all sentient beings from their suffering.

Shaving your head and again shaving your head, you are now in the path of the Buddha and immovable mind of great determination, having made a vow to save all sentient beings from their suffering-having made a vow to save all sentient beings from their suffering.

Suzuki-roshi (speaking formally):

Nyoho[2][?]. Paul Discoe, your name-your Buddhist name will be Daiho Zengyu. And your friend will call you by name of Zengyu. August Ninth, Nineteen-Seventy.

Nyoho[?]. Reb Anderson, your Buddhist name will be Tenshin Zenki. And your friend will call you by name of Tenshin. August Ninth, Nineteen-Seventy.

[After 35 seconds, recorder was stopped for an unknown interval.]

Suzuki-roshi (speaking formally): Do you want to receive Buddha's precepts? You should make confession. There are two ways-there are two meanings-two meanings in confession, but there is a way for confession transmitted from the Buddha through the patriarchs to us. Recite after my words.

Suzuki-roshi (chanting): All the karma ever created by me-

[Clappers 1X.]-

Ordinands (chanting): -since of old, on account of greed, anger, and self-delusion, which have no beginning, born of my body, speech, and thought, I now make whole open confession of it. [Clappers 1X.]

All the karma ever created by me since of old, on account of greed, anger, and self-delusion, which have no beginning, born of my body, speech, and thought, I now make whole open confession of it. [Clappers 1X.]

All the karma ever created by me since of old, on account of greed, anger, and self-delusion, which have no beginning, born of my body, speech, and thought, I now make whole open confession of it.

[After seven seconds, recorder was stopped for an unknown interval.]

Suzuki-roshi (speaking formally): Now we should receive the Triple Treasures. [Clappers 1X.]

Suzuki-roshi (chanting): I take refuge in the Buddha.

All in room (chanting): I take refuge in the Buddha.

Suzuki-roshi (chanting): I take refuge in the dharma. [Clappers 1X.]

All in room (chanting): I take refuge in the dharma.

Suzuki-roshi (chanting): I take refuge in the sangha. [Clappers 1X.]

All in room (chanting): I take refuge in the sangha.

Suzuki-roshi (chanting): I take refuge in the dharma. [Clappers 1X.]

All in room (chanting): I take ...

[Recorder was stopped for an unknown interval.]

Suzuki-roshi (speaking formally): In the Buddha realms, in all directions, the earth trembles and flower fall-flowers fall. What is the meaning of such an extraordinary sight? Buddha says in this world of [2-3 words], for us [?] who want to receive the precepts, having received true [?] discourse on bodhisattva's precepts, revealed [?] by their teacher who had previously received them from his teachers, are allowed to receive the Buddha's precepts, and now they are sure to be buddha. Therefore, the universe manifests such a joyous omen. From hearing this, the bodhisattva bow to them and said [?], if so, we have now accepted the precepts and by keeping them with the spirit of Shakyamuni Buddha, the great teacher and sage.

Our study and practice are accompanied by innumerable bodhisattvas. This is due to the perennial and diamond-like element of the bodhisattva's precepts. Due to ripening [?] of this great opportunity, their bodies are resting in the dharma world. And all the world are involved in those bodhisattva precepts.

In the realm of the great observance of bodhisattva precepts, who are practicing the precepts for whom [?] as the great precepts practice-to whom it may [?] are going, the observance of the pure bodhisattva precepts, there is no subjectivity or objectivity and no merit-it-no merit even in pure practice. Thus, our practice continues forever. We should preserve the good fruit of those true merit of bodhisattva precepts and mutually share the true buddha way with all sentient beings.

Here we have Zengyu and Tenshin, and bodhisattva's precepts have been transmitted to them, and they have joined our order of Buddha. It is our heartfelt desire that they will be mindful of those precepts and manifest the precepts in their everyday live.

[Brief conversation off-mike.] [Clapper 1X.]

Suzuki-roshi begins to chant in Japanese:

Sesshi kai ziki ...

[Recorder stopped for unknown interval.]

Suzuki-roshi (speaking informally):

I am so grateful to have [name unclear]-sensei and Nishima [?]-sensi for the ordination of Zengyu-san and Tenshin-san. And I'm so happy with all of your friend to have-to have this ordination ceremony.

I have-I want to say just thank you for our teachers and your friend, who make this occasion possible for us. It is, of course, not only our effort but also especially for the-of the patriarchs and-patriarchs and originated from Buddha's enlightenment.

If-but if one attains enlightenment, all the sentient beings will be enlightened. The-there is this kind of truth which we-which is difficult to accept, but that is very true. And to have a disciple who will attain enlightenment is the most important thing for our society. Your parents raise you so that you can contribute some good element for our society. First of all, we all should be very grateful for Zengyu-san's parents and for Tenshin-san's parents, who raise you with this spirit.

Everyone has the spirit to save others. That spirit is always inside with us. Our true mind is always the spirit-mind to save all sentient beings. In your happiness, or in your adversity, or even in critical moment of each one of us, the things-the mind which is-which comes out always, in such a moment, is the mind who want to contribute something to our human work. This is the mind Buddha found out in its true sense. After leaving various things behind him, he found out this truth. He found out true mind, which to- which is a spirit to save all sentient beings, and became Buddha.

On this point, if you think about the true spirit of saving others, which is bodhisattva-mind and which is buddha-mind too, we will realize how important it is to have someone who will be the good example of our human being which has-which have the true spirit of saving others before-even before save themselves. When we think and reach this point, we cannot help extolling this ceremony of ordination, which means to join our order, to save all sentient beings.

I want to express my heartfelt gratitude for Buddha, for our teachers, for your parents, and all of you, and all sentient beings in the world.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center original tape. Transcribed by Katharine Shields 6/6/00. Checked against tape by Bill Redican 6/29/00.

[1] Opening words are missing on tape.

[2] Presuming nyoho is correct, it means "to act in conformity with the regulations prescribed by the Buddhas and patriarchs" (Y. Yukoi, The Japanese-English Zen Buddhist Dictionary. Tokyo: Sankibo, 1991, p. 510).

6 - Open Mind

Sunday, August 16, 1970

Open Mind
San Francisco

[The first part of the lecture was not recorded.]

... restore the Buddhist teaching in its original way.

So that you don't know anything about Buddhism is very good [laughs]. We have no trouble to-to make you piece by piece [laughs].

So here, you know, and-American people has very open-minded-is very open-minded. So for you, it is accept the teaching, you know, without trouble. That is my feeling.

And one more point is because your mind is open, and we have not much prejudice, you know, you know-you see things clearly. And if the teaching is not pure enough, and-then you will not accept it. But there is-of course there is some danger. The danger is, you know, you will easily, you know, [get] caught by some wrong teaching too. You-you-someone said, you know, American people are like a sheep [laughs]. There is that-that danger. And if you meet with some ambitious person, you will be easily, you know, involved in wrong activity. That is one danger. But for sincere teacher, American people is maybe the best friend.

Anyway, this evening, I wanted to make our practice clear from two viewpoint: from student's viewpoint and from teacher's standpoint. And when we have mutual trust, then the student's way will become teacher's way, teacher's way will become one with student way. And, we will have-there we will have Dogen's way of practice, which is called "practice based on original enlightenment."

I am so grateful to-to have-to finish this sesshin with this kind of warm feeling.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center tape. Transcription by Nigel Edmonds and Bill Redican (checked March 16, 2000). [The original tape continues with what appears to be a different complete lecture, which has been cataloged as SR-70-08-16B.]

7 - Push Yourself Into Some Very Strong Hard Rule

Sunday, August 16, 1970

To Be Honest And Sincere In Its True Sense It Is Necessary To Push Yourself Into Some Very Strong Hard Rule
San Francisco

[This is the second of two lectures with this date. This lecture began mid-way on Side A of the original tape after a prior lecture ended. It appears to be complete.]

The meaning of our practice [is compassion?] way of life-way of life, or your life ... [inaudible] ... because you like to sit on the floor more ... [next few paragraphs inaudible]. Instead of sitting on chair, Buddha said please sit down here and relax and talk more with calmness of mind and _____ carefully. Let's sit on the ground or floor. It is of course easy or convenient to live on chair. If you sit on the floor, you should adjust yourself to the ground and you should make effort, physical effort, to sit down, to stand on the floor. If you use chair there is not much _____ in sitting or in standing up. Moreover, you have wheels. I am very interested in the chair with wheels [casters?]. It is very easy to fall. I thought it was too convenient. In that way we will become, we will lose our faculty of adjusting ourself to the nature.

Recently, maybe the basic idea of our way of life, basic thought, or philosophy of our modern life is to conquer nature. And another element will be to develop our desires. To achieve something, and to gain something by something may be like (war) ... when that something develops some technique to conquer nature, so ... to extend our _____, to conquer nature. Instead of adjusting our self to the nature or appreciating nature, or to become one with nature. We, most of the people, I think, you realize already how human beings have been living in this world, that may be _____ _____. But one more thing that is missing is how we should develop our desires. That will be the _____ _____, and maybe already realize that we have to go back to a more primitive way of life than civilized way of life. That is what we have realized already. But, here there is something which is-which our long practice suggests. That is how we adjust ourselves to that nature. Here there is something which our Zen practice suggests-that is how we adjust our self to that nature. Nature ... [inaudible] ... And which direction our desires should be directed.

You may say the practice of zazen-you will understand why we practice-which pretty well, but you don't understand why we use our oryoki. But actually when we use oryoki many people find some feeling about _____ _____ and some feeling of paying attention to many things you have or you handle. In _____, that is the way we clean up, but if you use oryoki, you wash one by one, carefully, without making noise-that is our practice. Then we have a kind of feeling of engagement [?] in this world, with everything.

Our desires may be extended more _____ _____ even in our physical feeling. In that way then you _____ _____. In ritual, when you recite sutra you should find out, and you should hold sutra card in some certain way ... _____. This kind of practice in comparison to your usual practice is-to sit wherever you want and reciting whatever you want to do, you may feel good in that way, but feeling-when you feel in that way, you don't have much chance to feel your (being). When you find yourself at some exact-that is already to feel your being. And to do something in some certain way, you will feel the feeling of your teacher, and patriarchs and Buddhas. Doing something in the same way, you can really have the feeling our teachers had, our ancestors had. It means that you truly find yourself in the history of long, long practice. And to practice with people in the same way you will feel yourself in the ... _____. You will find yourself (time and space this time). That is being one with everything.

If you sit and-if you sit and realize yourself, that is enlightenment. Realize yourself on this point right now, all the Buddhas will attain enlightenment with you, and all the teachers will attain enlightenment with you. That is what we said and what we meant.

To practice our traditional way-in that way-you may think that you will be enslaved by the tradition of _____ traditional way. But actually, purpose of practice is realization of our being. If you lose this point, our practice doesn't mean anything and your everyday life doesn't mean anything. As I said, even though we are in Tassajara or even though you practice in the big mountain, you cannot separate it from this world. You are all-you are in the destiny [?] of being enslaved-by our practice ... As human being has particular nature as a human being-we must have, we must think about what is our nature. By _____, we will not find out our way, that is actual Buddha way.

Actually the Buddha was the one to notice this point and to establish this kind of practice for us. But Buddha said before you-there was the Six Patriarch, maybe-time-wise we don't know ... [inaudible] ... it means that this is ... to find yourself right now means to find many beings in _____ and to find many ancestors-many descendants after him. So his confidence was-I already met the teacher who-whom I met, and I already saw the people who will appear in this world even though I haven't met them. I haven't met them, yet I save all sentient beings. If-or whether I save them or not, actually they are saved. Actually they are living with us, with you. It is very simple teaching and the fact that he points out-the enlightenment he attains is very not special, very _____ and plain. But as Zen teachers say-if you do not practice your enlightenment doesn't make any sense. If you do not use your oryoki, and push forward, pushing backward [?] this world does not make much sense. We cannot feel our being in this world.

At Tassajara, here, you know, my teeth was not so good. So I didn't like to chew brown rice or some hard vegetables. But by chewing-after [unclear] my teeth completely, and chewing them carefully, and-I found some special, you know, taste. I feel as if I have perfect kitchen, you know [laughs, laughter], within my mouth. And I appreciate to put something in my mouth-after cooking it very well and carefully, I ate it.

But this kind of [ 2 words] usually I-I thought-my wife is cooking-someone else is cooking-and my way is just to eat [laughs, laughter]. That was my way of life, I thought. But now I have and I am cooking my food by myself. Because I cook by myself, I appreciate the taste of the food. That is actually how I feel, you know. ...

So I think what we are doing is-something great is coming out from our life in Zen Center. And so I think if you observe your practice or your way of life and observe your feeling, against this _____ world ... the feeling you have is a more (precious) life. You will find out many treasures for human being. We should rather to walk slowly and understand ... If possible we should fly with our arms [laughs]. ... If you fly big airplane as I ... more feeling of ...

[Sentence not finished. End of Side A. Tape turned over.]

... if I could fly, you know, with-with my arms like this, that is wonderful. When I studied at Eihei-ji with my teacher, you know, this is- I forgot [i.e., SR forgot train of thought]-any-anyway, if I were a bird, this is fantastic [laughs, laughter]. I wish I were a bird. This is fantastic! Right now we are flying by big birds-airplane, but according to the earth, you know, there is many-you can appreciate moving. You will have big sail [?]. ... And you will enjoy many things and beautiful. [inaudible]. It doesn't make much sense [laughs, laughter].

We are so serious, you know, in one way. Why don't you try to fly by your arms, you know? Even though you cannot, you should work, I think. Then you will feel your being completely. Even though you are ... , if there is some way of feeling yourself even though you do not think or because you do not think anything you have full feeling of your being on the practice. Usually because you think of some philosophical thing-I think, therefore I am-you as-I don't think, therefore I am! Even though your own practice there is a way to feel completely-that is not religion or mysticism. It is actually thought. When you find out the way how to live ... When you practice our way-we should forget everything and try to find out-try to find yourself in your _____. That is why actually we must be strict-we have strict rules. Unless we have-our human nature is very sneaky. Without some strict way we will go this way and that way. Even though [inaudible] ... we are very sneaky. We are _____ very clever. To be very honest and sincere in its true sense, it is necessary to push yourself into some very strong hard rule. Maybe that is not good enough. Unless you want to find yourself in it ... you find out yourself in such a strict, such an iron box, maybe easiest way to feel yourself end in everyday life to feel yourself is more, much more difficult. But the first step may be to find yourself in strong iron box.

But as long as you are trying to force into iron box, it is not possible-it is like to read instruction about practice. There are many instructions about our practice. But if you actually do it, it will take just one minute. For an instance, if you want to describe how I drink a cup of water, I don't know whether you can describe it very accurately. But if I-maybe better in this sense-we put emphasis on strong _____ trust you to be ready to do it and to _____ actual experience of practice, getting rid of _____ complications. We will have more practice under Tatsugami-roshi or some other teacher, some others teachers from Japan. But the point of our practice is how to feel under various situations and circumstances-how to adjust yourself to the _____, and how to make right effort as human being for many centuries, several centuries. Making wrong efforts, so we should resume right efforts in developing our human life.

Thank you very much.

[Chant follows.]

8 - Lay Ordination Ceremony

Sunday, August 23, 1970

Lay Ordination Ceremony
Sunday, August 23, 1970

San Francisco[1]

[Sound Problem]

Tape operator (possibly Yvonne Rand): First part of Roshi's address here is inaudible on the original tape.

Suzuki-roshi:

... and obtain similar to result according to [1 word unclear] like our [1-2] bodhisattva way. [2-3] bodhisattva spirit. [3-4] of our practice. And how you, you know, actually practice may be in [1-2]. You say "Hai!" That is the point of practice. When you say "Hai," you are one with your "hai." One with your Zen. One with your [1]. And one with your [1].

So when you say Hai!-or when you say "Yes, I will!"-then there is true mind of helping, you know. And if you cannot say "Hai!" from the bottom of heart, with all of your strength, that practice doesn't work.

[5-7] start with this practice of "Yes, I will!" That is the fundamental practice of bodhisattva practice. And to have complete perfect understanding of how important it is to say "Hai" is your whole life's practice.

Thank you.

[Inkin bell rings twice. Tape recorder is stopped and restarted after an unknown period. Then kaishaku clappers are struck three times.]

Suzuki-roshi: [2] If you want to be [1-2] and practicing our [1] precepts, you should start with pure practice of confession. There are two ways and two meanings in the Buddhist way of confession. However, you have the way of confession transmitted from the Buddha through the patriarchs to you. Reciting after my words:

[Clappers 1X.]

Suzuki-roshi (chanting): All the karma ever created by me-

All ordineses (chanting): -since of old, on account of greed, anger, and self-delusion, which has no beginning, born of my body, speech, and thought ... [Tape recorder was stopped and restarted after an unknown interval.][3]

Suzuki-roshi: ... and pure [1] and pure heart. This ordination ceremony is [2-3 words]. This is actually the second time-second ordination ceremony for Zen Center, because while we didn't have lay ordination ceremony [2-3] because I didn't want to give you some special idea of Zen Buddhist. Bodhisattva way-according to bodhisattva teaching, every-actually every sentient being is bodhisattva. Whether or not they are aware of it, they are actually disciples of the Buddha. As this is our conviction, we didn't-I didn't want to give you some special idea of Zen Buddhist. But time has come for us to strive for more sincerely to help others.

As we have so many students here, inside and outside of Zen Center, we need more help. And I decided to have lay ordination for you just to help others, but not to give you some special idea of lay Buddhist, because all of us are Buddhists actually. This is not [1-2] idea. This is the idea or spirit for [2-3 words] Buddha's way.

Accordingly, our way is like Avalokiteshvara Buddha-Bodhisattva. When he want to save ladies, he take-he will take the form of lady. For boys, he will take form of boy. For fishermen, he will be a fisherman. More sophisticated Chinese expression is "to be like white bird in the snow." White bird in the snow. When people are like snow, we should be like snow. When people become black, we should be black. And being always with them, without any idea of discrimination, and we can help others in its true sense, without giving anything-any special teaching or material. This is actually bodhisattva way.

We are-how we actually-this kind of freedom from everything and this kind of acting [?]-this kind of soft-minded-this is true practice [1-2 words: "already"?]. You may think we are forcing you in some form-forcing some rituals on you, or forcing some special teaching on you, and forcing you to say, "Yes, I will!" But those things are provided for you just to be like a white bird in the snow.

When you [2 words: "go through"?] your practice, you will-practice doesn't [1-2], you will have [1-2] in spite of practice and point of helping others. This is why we had ordination ceremony today.

For all of us, included-including various great teachers, it is not at all easy to be like white bird in the snow. Somehow, anyway, we should make best effort to be like a white bird. No matter if previous teacher [1-2 words: "passed"?].

In this way, if you help yourself through practice, you can help others without anything. Just to be with people will be enough.

I am so grateful to have this kind of very very formal ordination ceremony. Without the guidance of Tatsugami-roshi [?], who came to visit Zen Center-and who came just to visit Zen Center-just to help our practice. [1] we have this kind of very formal ordination ceremony here at Zen Center.

After sewing your robe, in spite of busy everyday life you live [?], I think this is also good example of the Buddha. So even [though] we are busy, there is a way to practice the most formal practice. Even though humans-all human being in the city are busy, there is no reason why they cannot practice our way to be like Avalokiteshvara [?]. If all of us practice pure [?] way [3-4] and practice our way and doing our practice of bodhisattva, the result will be great.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: Original tape transcribed by Bill Redican (28 June 2000). The second part of this lecture was printed in an edited form in Wind Bell, Fall-Winter 1970-71, Vol. IX, No. 3-4, p. 9-11. Sound problem: Level and quality of the original tape are very poor. This lecture should be audio-enhanced if possible.

[1] According to Zen Center records, this lay ordination was performed on August 23, 1970. The 36 ordainees included Carl Bielefeldt, David Chadwick, Katherine Thanas, Jerome Peterson, and Yvonne Rand. The original tape was labeled 7/23/70, but August is correct. The date was confirmed on the back of David Chadwick's rakusu in SR's own hand.

[2] The following several paragraphs are similar to the priest's ordination ceremony that Suzuki-roshi followed for Paul Discoe and Reb Anderson earlier in the month (see lecture SR-70-08-09).

[3] The following text appears to be the original lecture upon which the edited Wind Bell lecture was based. Earlier fragments printed above were not included in the Wind Bell lecture.

9 - Leaving for Japan

Tuesday, August 25, 1970

Leaving for Japan

[One of two lectures for this date.]

San Francisco

As some of-some of you may know, tomorrow I am leaving San Francisco for-for a while and coming back December first or second. I'm not so clear yet, but for three months I shall be in Japan.[1]

I feel very sorry for-for you-not to be with you, but there there is something I must do for Zen Center. First of all, Dick Baker will receive transmission.[2] And I am hoping that we can-Dick and me-can do something, you know, for-even a little bit of important-important teaching. If we can translate it into English, it may be one step for Zen Center practice.

Those, you know, teachings is not-is not something which we talk about for-for people in general. Only, you know, who is ready to receive transmission, you know, can study because it is pretty difficult to study. But at-it is, I think, it is important for us, you know, for you to know what kind of idea we have in-about our practice, or about our everyday life, or about our zazen. Without this kind of fundamental understanding, it is pretty difficult to make the purpose of our practice clear.

It is-usually, you know, when someone receive transmission, we had-we had, you know, lecture for some selected people-ten or more people, you know. Only for the-for that kind of lecture, only yellow-robed person could attend. It is-it is called Zenka-e,[3] you know, or Shitsunai sammotsu-hiben koa.[4] I attended several times. Still [laughs] it was pretty difficult to figure out clearly, you know-clear my understanding. It was pretty difficult, especially when it is written in Chinese. It is very difficult. We can read it, but it is difficult even to make question about it. Maybe this kind of study will be our whole life study. And it [is] worth [it] to study over and over again. But it-it may be necessary, you know, to explain it-to translate it, you know, as much as possible.

This kind of thing I have in my mind, but I myself is very busy in Japan, and he will be also busy. And he has to go to Eihei-ji. So I-I cannot promise you whether we can do it or not. One by one, whenever we, you know, have yellow-robed monk or student, you know-little by little, if we can contribute something for us will be-eventually result will be great, I think.

This not something which we can do without many people's help-many teachers' help. More and more we will be concentrated in this direction to make-to make our practice, you know, stronger and clear. Fortunately, Dogen-zenji's way of study is not just, you know, study of Zen. Its study covers all-all the Buddhism. So it may take pretty long time, you know, to understand him, but we-if you-we make effort little by little, then I think we will have very good understanding of our way: not only Zen but also all Buddhism.

So for us it is necessary, you know, to study-intellectual study is also important. But one person cannot do everything. So according to your background, you can, you know, share our study. So we have-you have various chance, you know-various possibility in our study. Those who are interested in some other teaching, they can study some other teaching. Those who are interested in practice of Zen, they can prac- [partial word]-study practice of Zen. Those who has good understanding of some other philosophy or some other cultural study-they can-you can comp- [partial word]-contribute for our study.

So you don't have to, you know, afraid of anything, you know. You cannot-I-almost-it is almost impossible for you to get out of our study. Whatever you study, it will [laughs] contribute [to] our study. So we do not discriminate Zen or other teaching. At the same time, for us it is not so easy, you know, to organize or to, you know, to organize our study. First of all, we should be very friendly with each other, without insisting some-someone's own way, you know. We must have very wide generous mind, and we should understand with each other. That is, you know, actually why we practice together.

Although our study is very wide, but we have-fortunately we have center of the study. That center, you know, will be realized by your-by your practice of Zen and by your teacher. So, you know, teacher's responsibility is to give you the center of the study and to give you the center of your life. And for you, you know, it is important or it is indispensable to have the center of your study. When you have center of the study, you don't afraid of anything, because you can, you know, always-there is no-because you have, always, you know, some conviction in your study. The intellectual study is very superficial and sometime is-it is very stimulating. And sometime it is very strong.

So if you don't have center, you know, you will be always shaky, you know, like this [probably gestures]. But when you have center, you know, even though you go this way [probably gestures], back and forth, but you don't lose yourself. That is flexibility. Because-without the center of study, you will be easily get into some sectarian or fanatic, you know, religion. When you have center, you know, you know, you have-you don't have to, you know, rigid, or you don't have to be even stronger-strong, you know. You will stay quite flexible.

Some-someone said, "Dogen-zenji went to China," you know, "just to get flexible mind. That is why he w- [partial word]-what he studied, you know, what he studied in China. But that is-because of his, you know, strong conviction-because of-because he had center in his study, according to him that is transmitted, you know, way or spirit, he-he had, you know, flexible mind. And he didn't afraid of anything. He didn't cling to anything, and he said when he come-came back to Japan he said, "I came back with nothing." [Laughs.] "And I found out our eyes is [horizontal]-and our nose is vertical. That is what I have learned [?]"[5]-what he found out in Japan-in China.

That kind of, you know, conviction will-you will have that kind of conviction if you really, you know, understand what is the center of practice. Zen Center, you know-we, you know-we call ourselves "Zen Center," but "Center" is important. Zen Center Cultural Center or, you know, you can call us, you know, in various way. But "Center" is very important anyway.

We have, as you must have noticed already, we have started some formal and rigid, you know, practice. Maybe it looks like so, maybe. Why we do this is just to find out, you know, the center of our practice.

We have, you know-the meaning of, you know, or why we have-we started Zen Center is because our practice is-more and more our Zen practice bec- [partial word]-losing our center. And so, naturally, we Zen student will be involved in idea of Soto or Rinzai, you know, without knowing what is Rinzai or what is Soto. And especially, you know-I am sorry to say so, but especially in Japan, you know, Zen is not so healthy. And they are involved in various, you know, unnecessarily covered or, you know-covered by old, you know, old tradition-traditional way. Although we are, you know, practicing very rigid-rigidly practicing something, but our way is, you know-if you say "old" it is old-older than, you know, this-way of practice in Japan become popular. We are going back-we are-we don't-we want to study original, you know, old, old pure way of Dogen.

So the way we are studying is Dogen's way, which was not so popular when he started. He confronted with, you know, various way of practice which was popular at that-at his time. So to get rid of that kind of, you know, popular way of study, he rigidly, you know, practice something sincerely with few students. And that kind of way, you know, more and more developed. But at the same time, when Soto school become popular, you know, our way, you know, became more and more impure. So we want to go back to the original way just was-just-which was practiced just by Dogen and his students.

And through this kind of pure st- [partial word]-practice, we want to understand or realize his pure way. As we are, you know, we have started this kind of group here, we should-we think we should not introduce, you know, something which is not so important. We want to introduce you something which is pure and which is easier to understand, which is even beyond cultural background.

I think if we introduce, you know, the way which was, you know, established by him when he-when he did not like, you know, the practice which was going [on] at his time. So in this sense, you know, to introduce his way-his pure way here means, you know, to introduce something which is more appropriate for American new generation. That is why, you know, we started Zen Center.

And another point was in Japan, you know, only priest are practicing Zen, you know. If you go to Eihei-ji, you know, no layman cannot practice Zen with monks. This is, you know, wrong. Here in Zen Center, you know, monks and city people or whatever they are can practice our way in the same place. Even though you listen to teaching of Dogen, if you don't practice it is impossible to find out why he, you know, left that kind-why he practiced his way in that-in such a way.

So for us the most important thing is practice. And to practice with people is the motto of Zen Center-not just priest. With, you know, everyone to practice zazen is the most important point of our practice here, especially in city. And that is also bodhisattva way. And that is the only way to-only way for religion to survive.

If, you know, Buddhism-when Buddhism owned, you know-is understood just by priest, it doesn't, you know, help people. It doesn't survive in that way. In its true sense it doesn't survive. Rejecting various purpose of propagating our way, without nothing-without anything, to be with people and to help to practice with them, and what will result is real help for the people. With-when we practice our way with this spirit, I think true Buddha's spirit will be actually here.

I have no special, you know, purpose of-oh, you cannot hear?-I have no purpose of my trip to Japan this time, but I want to be, you know, with Dick and with my close friend as much as possible. And I don't want to try to, you know, explain what we are doing here, you know. But for some people it will be a good stimulation, you know. For the sincere person what we are doing will be, you know, will be good news. And more teachers like Yoshida-roshi[6] or Tatsugami-roshi[7] will come and help us, I hope.

Actually, he-they will be also helped, you know, st- [partial word]-you know, by you, you know, as I am very much encouraged by your sincere practice-sincere pure practice. And we feel, you know, a kind of responsibility. You do not come to Zen Center-you didn't come to Zen Center to be a priest or to be a, you know, to-to have some special, you know, status. You just, you know, came and studying something which we have here. And you are-you are sticking [to] our way for many years, now. And you don't leave Zen Center [laughs]. It is, you know-it is awful thing, you know, to see [laughs, laughter]. You know, it is terrible thing. And I myself don't know what to do, you know [laughs, laughter]. But anyway we are-here we are doing something.

Some time I feel very bad, you know, because I am losing my physical, you know, strength more every day-each year, you know. When you are growing fast, you know, maybe as long as you keep that-this kind of, you know, sincerity in your study-study of yourself, then I think you will have naturally good teacher from everywhere. This is, I think, something amazing, you know. And we-and at the same time, we should be very grateful to come across this-this kind of situation.

I don't think this kind of chance-I don't think human being will have this kind of chance so many times-maybe-many-once in many hundreds of years. I think we are now in very, you know, important-we came to very important time. Without this kind of, you know, understanding, you know, our-what we are doing doesn't make any sense.

You know, we are-we do not contribute our society so much, you know. But because of the world situation-our human world situation is like this, we have to do this. And because you feel you have to do something with this kind of situation, you are here studying. Not only ourselves: I think many and many people in America has same feeling, and even in Japan the younger generation, you know, is-has-have same feeling. Maybe, you know, crazy people, you may say, but in usual time, you know, if it is fifty years or thirty years ago, we are crazy people [laughs]-we are crazy. But now, you know, we are not crazy at all.

So I think we sh- [partial word]-must be very grateful to be here and studying something here, even though we don't know what-what is it [loud laughter]. I think something will, you know-if you believe in your buddha-nature within yourself, something must come out from us. Something must result from our activity or from our effort.

As long as you have this kind of pure effort, no one can fool you, you know. When you have some idea of study, you will be easily fooled by him, or someone. But when you don't care for anything, there is no way to fool you [laughs, laughter], even though, you know, he show you, you know, beautiful car, "Oh, I don't care for that." Even though someone, you know, give you so- [partial word]-a lot of money, you may say, "No, I don't-I don't care for money," you know. There is no way to fool you.

But there is some danger, you know. I-the danger I feel, you know, is when you-your-you start-you have involved in, you know, involved in practice of gaining idea, you know. That is one danger. So as Dogen, we should not practice our way for something else-not even for ourselves. We should study our way just for the way, not for anything else. Then no one can fool you. So eventually, you know, you-you- [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... some idea which is called truth, you know. You will be fooled-easily fooled by the word "truth." So even Buddhism will be, you know-the name of Buddhism will be very dangerous for us. That is, you know, our way, actually.

So we-we should-we must not give any chance, you know, for anyone to fool you, you know. You shouldn't be fooled by something. When he-Dogen-zenji said, "I found," you know, "our eyes is level and our-my nose-our nose is horizontal [vertical], and I am not fooled by anything, fooled by anyone." [Laughs.] That is, I think, very strong, and very strong conviction in his practice, you know, in himself. Even though I don't understand anything, it is okay. Even though I am nobody, it is okay. Then no one can fool you. That is important.

So on this point, you know, you should be very strict with yourself. Don't be fooled by anything. Or don't try to be fooled by something [laughs]. You know, sometime I see many people who is try-who is studying, you know, Zen, just to be fooled by [laughs, laughter] someone. But it is, you know, it-if so, he is going opposite way.

When you have this kind of spirit, naturally you will be friendly, you know, and you will help with each other. And we can extend our way. Maybe three months will not be so long time. The end of December I will see you again [laughs], if I am not fooled by [laughs, laughter] something.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Bill Redican (12/26/00).

[1] This trip is discussed by Okusan-sensei in her interview with Kazuaki Tanahashi reproduced at [www.cuke.com] and in Crooked Cucumber, p. 358 et seq.

[2] Completed on December 8, 1970.

[3] Zenka: _____. -e: possibly realization.

[4] Shitsunai sammotsu-hiben: a work on the "secret transmission of the law," written by the Soto monk Man-jin, concerning three dharma-transmission ceremonies (shisho, daiji, and kechimyaku). koa (possibly also ko): lecture.

[5] Dogen-zenji, commenting on his journey to China: "I didn't go to many monasteries, but I happened to see my teacher and directly found that my eyes are vertical and my nose is horizontal. Then I was not to be fooled by anyone. So I came back with open hands" (Eihei Koroku, Chapter 1, translated by Thomas Cleary, Rational Zen, p. 45).

[6] Yoshida Eshun-roshi: Teacher of okesa sewing in the lineage of Hashimoto Eko-roshi.

[7] Sotan Ryosen Tatsugami-roshi: Ino-roshi from Eihei-ji who served as head of training at Tassajara for the Spring and Fall 1970 practice periods.

10 - Lay Ordination: White Bird In The Snow

Tuesday, August 25, 1970

Lay Ordination: White Bird In The Snow
[No tape.]

I am so grateful to have this ordination ceremony for you, our old students. This is actually the second time ... the second ordination ceremony for Zen Center. Because why we didn't have lay ordination ceremony more often was because I didn't want to give you some special idea of lay Buddhists. Bodhisattva way, according to Bodhisattva teaching, every ... actually every sentient beings are Bodhisattva, whether or not they are aware of it they are actually disciples of the Buddha. As this is our conviction, we didn't I didn't want to give you some special idea of lay Buddhists, but time has come for us to strive for more sincerely to help others.

As we have so many students here, inside and outside of Zen Center, we need more help. And I decided to have Lay Ordination for you just to help others but not to give you some special idea of lay Buddhists, because all of us are Buddhists actually. This is not conceited idea, this is idea of spirit transmitted from Buddha to us. Accordingly, our way is like Avalokiteshvara Buddha, Bodhisattva. When he wants to save ladies, he took, he takes the form of ladies; for boys, he takes form of boys; for fisherman, he will be a fisherman. More sophisticated Chinese expression is to be like white bird in the snow-white bird in the snow. When people are like snow, we should be like snow. When people become black, we should be black. And being always with them without any idea of discrimination, and we can help others in its true sense without giving anything, any special teaching or materials, this is actually Bodhisattva way.

And now ... how we actually ... this kind of freedom from everything, and this kind of asking, and this kind of soft-minded spirit is to practice our way. You may think we are forcing you in same form, forcing some rituals on you or forcing some special teaching on you and forcing you to say, "yes, I will." But, those things are provided for you just to be like a white bird in the snow. When you go through those practice, and when you practice zazen in this way, you have point of zazen and point of practice and point of helping others. This is why we had ordination ceremony today, all of us, including various great teachers. It is not at all easy to be like white bird in the snow.

But then, somehow, anyway, we should make best effort to be like a white bird. Remember that this is not easy task. In this way, if you help yourself through practice, you ... you can help others, without anything, just to be with people will be enough.

Ah ... I am so grateful to have this kind of very, very formal ordination ceremony. Without guidance of Yoshida-roshi, who came just to visit

Zen Center, and just to help us, help our practice ... we could have this kind of very formal ordination, lay ordination ceremony. After sewing your robe, in spite of busy, everyday life of yours, and I think this is also good example of the Buddhist, or even though we are busy, there is some way to practice the most formal practice. Even though we ... all human beings in the city ... are busy, there is no reason why they cannot practice our way to be like white bird in the snow. If all of us taking your way for good example and practice our way and join our practice of Bodhisattva, the result will be great.

Thank you very much.

1970 december (4)

1 - Lecture After Trip To Japan: Zazen As Our Foundation

Sunday, December 13, 1970

Lecture After Trip To Japan: Zazen As Our Foundation

In this trip,[1] I studied in Japan [laughs], you know, and I found out many things, and many things happened. Many things has happened since I visited Japan four years ago.

Can you hear me? [Laughs.]

Japan changed a lot. Not only various food and materials now is very high. Transportation changed, and the road is pretty good now. And people there are very busy, and they-their life is more now Western-style and busy. If you go from here to America [Japan?], you will be amazed how busy life they have in Japan.

Because of the easy transportation, their-the area they work expanded. For an instance, before they-be- [partial word]-four years ago, the station I went [to] was Yaizu station, but nowadays mostly I go to Shizuoka station, which is three times as far, or four times as far as-from-from-to go to Yaizu. So accordingly, they have to buy something driving car four times more.

It looks like Japan has no more old culture, but actually it is not so. But it looks like they lost old Japanese culture. But if you go to Kyoto you will see many Japanese young generation who are studying old temples and old traditional culture of Japan. So I think if you say Japan has completely changed, that is not true. But it looks like Japan-life of Japan changed a lot.

Meantime, as you may know, Yukio Mishima[2] committed suicide [laughs]. Did you know that [laughs]? He is a-he is a novelist, and he was a-one of the most famous, you know, writer. But he committed suicide in jieitai camp. He tried to appeal his feeling to the-not soldiers, but to the people who is-who are working at jieitai. Do you know jieitai?

I don't know-self--self-defensive, self-defense-not "army" but-[3]

Student: I think we call it "National Guard"-

Not-?

Student: -for the protection of the internal of the country. [2 words unclear: "Japan does" of "from vandals"?]

Uh-huh. Ah. Yeah. He expected jieitai will become-sooner or later will become a kind of army [laughs]. But jieitai didn't change. So-and he believed in former emperor system. But Japan did-has no sign of changing towards emperor system-old emperor system. So he was rather disappointed. But, on the other hand, he was a-a kind of romantist [romanticist].

Why he committed suicide is nowadays people talks about many things and write many things, but what they write or talk about is not much-things not much to do with his own life. He-they are talking about something in what he feels-what they feel or what they think. That is why-but he didn't like that. What he write was what he actually want-wanted to do. Peoples, you know, interesting is-people liked his work very much. But actually, you know, not much people take his art-take his work so seriously. So he-maybe he wanted to know how-how people accept his writing. He thought, you know, if he-if he has that kind of enthusiasm, people may change, you know, by writing something. But people didn't change at all. That is why he finally committed suicide. Maybe-I may be wrong, but I feel it that way.

When I compare, nowadays, life of Japan to the one you have in America, America has no tradition and no-no special culture. But they accept many cultures, as Japanese people, you know, accept various culture from abr- [partial word: abroad]-from Western countries. But as the land is so narrow, and, accordingly, as they have to work so hard, they have no time to, you know, to have-to have time to feel things, you know, while in America, you know, people has more time to think or to feel. Japanese people, you know, are always busy and always doing things in very fast pace. But in America no one works so hard as they do. Our life is not so busy here. So you have time to feel something from your bottom of heart. I think this point is very important.

You have time to sit and to bring your life right into your home. I think that is the meaning of sitting. So when you-it is necessary-I-I thought it is necessary for Japanese to spare [spend?] their time in sitting, forgetting everything, putting busy life aside. If they know how to sit, their life will change.

I think sitting is the bottom of our life. And everyday activity or intellectual study will be the other two side of the triangle. Japan-the most people has no bottom [laughs]. They have just, you know, two-two side of the triangle. So the two side is not so stable, you know, because they have no bottom. American people, whether you know what is zazen, you have something like, you know, your life is-what you-your life is more or less has bottom, which-which is something like sitting meditation. In Japan, even though we talk about Zen, Zen is, you know [laughs], still two side of triangle. They think that is something which they should study, you know, intellectually. Or something they can find out in old, old, you know, classics, or something which could be found in Eihei-ji or various monasteries. They don't know actually what is zazen. But here you have no big traditional monasteries, but the life you have, you know, is more [or] less life with bottom of sitting meditation.

When I was, you know, writing something I thought it is easy to write something in nighttime rather than daytime. I could write many-many pages or ten or fifteen or sometime twenty pages at nighttime. But when I started to correct or to read what I wrote again, the part I wrote [at] nighttime, you know, more-more and more became less and less. [Laughter.] The part I wrote in daytime is very constant [laughs]. There was not much need to correct or to cross-to erase out [laughs].

So I felt it may be, you know, good for an artist, you know, to work in nighttime when your imagination, you know, is very strong. But for real thinker or for religious people, it may not-it may not be so good. Nighttime will not be so good time to work. Nighttime, I thought, we should rest. Daytime, you know, [we should be] with people and we should work more practically.

Advantage of the life of leisure, or life of-life with openness of our mind is very valuable. And that is what I felt, you know, in Japan, especially when I read Yukio Mishima's committing suicide. They didn't talk about his suicide so much, but people did not have so bad feeling about-about his-about what he did. Of course, you know, it is not our tendency to criticize people who passed away. Although they do not, you know, agree with him, they-they had a kind of sympathy. But that is, you know, just superficial influence of him over Japanese people.

Zazen practice is not, you know, a kind of formal practice which could be compare[d] with some other activity. The main point of zazen is to open our life for everything and to see things as they are and to feel things as they are, as they come, without any prejudice, without any special feeling, which could be the foundation of our life. That is zazen practice. So practice by itself does not mean anything [laughs], you know. But when something come [comes up?] or when you face to something, it-it will have the tremendous-the important meaning. By itself it is just plain water, but if someone-something come, the plain water will reflect-plain calm water will reflect things as they are. If you, you know, have no zazen practice, the things you see is just a picture of something, not actual reality. But only when you have zazen mind, things you have will become real.

We say, "The painted cake cannot be eaten." [Laughs.] You cannot eat painted cake, even though it is beautiful. If you have no zazen, you- what you see, what you eat, is painted cake. You cannot eat homemade bread. You will eat just, you know, white [laughs, laughter] bread. That is, you know, why we sit.

I felt very sorry for Japanese sincere students who are studying old culture, you know, without realizing-realizing this point. Whatever they study, it is, you know-without zazen it is, you know, just picture.

I think my trip this time was very valuable-give me very valuable experience. I was very busy in Japan, and main purpose of my trip is Dick Baker's transmission ceremony which took about-more than one month. He has-he had been working for that-not ceremony-but for transmission-accepting transmission from me. You may ask what does it mean [laughs], but you shouldn't ask [laughs, laughter] because, you know, you will have-you will have just a picture of transmission, you know. When time come for you to receive transmission, or when you realize something, you know, that is actual transmission. So we have-we say we have nothing to transmit [laughs]. What you have is-to realize what you have is actual transmission. On December 8th, we finished his transmission ceremony.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Checked against tape by Bill Redican (12/23/99).

[1] In SR-70-08-25-A, Suzuki-roshi stated that he was leaving the next day for a trip to Japan lasting three months.

[2] Pen name of Japanese novelist Kimitake Hiroaka (1925-1970), who committed seppuku at the Ichigaya headquarters of the Eastern Army on Nov. 25, 1970, after unsuccessfully trying to rally his listeners to rise up to save Japan. His Shield Society (Tate no Kai) was dissolved shortly thereafter. Mishima's posthumous Buddhist name is Shobuin Bunkan Koi Koji.

[3] Japan (Ground) Self-Defense Force.

2 - What Is Self? What Is Our Practice?

Sunday, December 20, 1970

What Is Self? What Is Our Practice?
San Francisco

In my last trip to Japan I found out many things. The feeling I had there was-they were-you know, Japanese people nowadays are trying very hard, but according to Uchiyama-roshi,[1] you know-do you know him? He is in Kyoto, and he is practicing with students. And many Caucasian students were there. And when I went there they asked me to speak something [laughs], so I just saw them and talked a little.

Japanese people now-group, group-bo-kei: name="_ftnref2" title=""> [2] group is group, but bo-kei means "lose themselves." Lose themselves in group. That is Japanese life now. Group bo-kei. Japan is a big family or big group. [Laughs.] They lose themselves [laughing] in group, so they don't know what they are doing actually. I don't say ma [partial word-"many"?] all of them, but most of people there lose themselves in group.

And, you know, some-some people who thinks themselves rid of Japan also has some confidence in their effort of making progress in every direction. But still they were involved-they were lose themselves, they are lose themselves in group, and they don't know. It is difficult for them to know what is-what are they doing. Even though they do not have any information from other countries outside of the countries, I think if their mind is calm enough to see, you know, to realize what they are doing [laughs], you know, it is not so difficult to see themselves.

But, unfortunately, they lose-they have lost themselves in group-big group of Japan. And Japanese-weak point of Japanese people is ecstasy, you know [laughs]. They, you know-when I was, you know, in junior or senior high school, our principal always told us you should not be in ecstasy [laughs]. If, you know, they become-they make some progress in something, they easily get into ecstasy [laughs, laughter] or, or, "How nice is it." [Laughs.] That is, you know, tendency of Japanese people.

And so, that is why, according to Dick [Baker], you know, that is why Japanese people who visit Japan find it very difficult to live in Japan. I think so too. And in comparison to the-that kind of tendency, I think in America there is opposite tendency, which is individualism. And based on individual, individual [laughs]-[He is struggling here with the pronunciation of the word "individual."]-excuse me, individual practice. If you practice our way, Buddhism will become Daoism [laughs, laughter]. The difference between Daoist and Buddhist is one is, you know, hermit. The Buddhist is more realistic, you know. That is the difference. So I think people in America has opposite, you know, tendency, which is-which makes good pair to Japanese people. One is this extreme, you know, making effort this way. The other is making effort the other way.

And so, that is why I think I have difficult time in San Francisco [laughs, laughter]. Knowing Japanese tendency and Japanese people's tendency, you know, and your way of life, it is very difficult to, you know, to keep harmony. And while you are young it is okay, but even so, if you want to make real effort, real progress in your practice, you must have some base of the life or more deeper complete understanding of the practice and way of life.

This morning I want to talk about, you know, what is self and what is our practice. We have no-in Buddhism we use word "self" in some different way. When we say "self" it means always-it emphasize selflessness, you know. Because people has idea of self, you know, we use that word to express our-to explain our way. We use that word "self," but actually Buddhist has no such word as "self."

But using the word "self," we say selflessness. Selflessness means, you know, to see things-as-it-is. When we have no-we are not caught by idea of self we can see things-as-it-is, and things-as-it-is is selflessness. So as things exists as-they-are, we also exist as-we-are. That is selflessness. It doesn't mean we do not exist. We exist, but we exist as we are. And to know, to realize or to-not to know or not to realize-but to have that kind of mood of life is our purpose of practice.

So if we understand, we-if we can see, observe things in this way without not much idea of self, it is not individualism or it is not right life involved in only group, forgetting themselves. Forgetting themselves in group is big selfishness, you know. To encourage, or to-to encourage the idea of self, they enjoy the group self. So instead of small self, they have gr- [partial word-"group"?] big self.

Wh- [partial word]-in the country like Japan, you know, maybe it is difficult to-not to be involved in that kind of, you know, busy, you know, life. For an instance, right now, many people are building big cabin with big stone, like I do [laughs, laughter]. But idea is different. But they are doing. If you, you know, go to the suburb of small or big town, you will see big, beautiful Japanese building surrounded by big stones and beautiful bonsai-like tree. It may cost a lot of money [laughs]. If one built that kind of building in, in some place, some other person who see it will imitate it, you know. And they will build same building, or more beautiful one. And in that way [laughs], one after another [laughing] they build big mansion-like building and beautiful garden. To me that is, you know-I don't think they are enjoying their garden at all.

So if I go to, if I visit Japan, they invite me to their new house, new residence [laughs] and introduce me, you know, the garden, new garden they built. But it seems to me they do not enjoy the garden or building so much, so much as I do [laughs, laughter]. Maybe that is why they want me to see [laughs, laughter]. It is ridiculous, you know, to be involved in that kind of competition without doing [laughing] what they're building, you know. They just build it, and they are very glad if someone says he is very successful person or something like that, you know.

So, I-I told-I told them it is very beautiful, but in America, you know, rich people do not build so beautiful building. They have big, you know, property, but in which s- [partial word] very humble, you know, common building they have. This is-Japan may be now very wealthy, but anyway it is quite different. Our way of life in Japan is quite different from [what] they have in America. Now I am not-I haven't-I can say exactly how I feel, you know, because I am in, mostly I am in America [laughs].

This kind of tendency-it is pretty difficult for us to be free from that kind of life or tendency of life. If you-but as a Buddhist, if you think of, for an instance, Ten Grave Prohibitory Precepts, you know, you will understand what kind of understanding of life we have. "Don't kill," you know. We have to encourage our spirit to follow Buddhist way. We shouldn't be killed or we shouldn't kill real Buddhist spirit. We should not steal anything, you know, which does not belong to us. Why we steal something is because we don't know what is real value of things. Whether it belongs to me or to others does not make much sense.

When you steal something, you, you know, you-it means that you know your ego, but you don't know what the materials or things are. Don't behave or don't be indulge[d] in something, or don't act unchaste acts. It means that you should not be indulge[d] into something. You should not be caught by something.

I like old art objects [laughs], and my teacher would say "Don't-don't act unchaste acts." [Laughs.] To him it is unchaste act to be attracted by something, some antique or old art object is unchaste act [laughs] to him. It may be so.

So one by one, if you think of-think about what the Ten Grave Prohibitory Precepts are, you will know what is Buddhist life. Knowing this, you know, tendency of human life, I think you will find out what is zazen practice. To find or to realize what we are and what things are in its true sense is the main purpose of our practice. On your black cushion, if you find yourself, you know, in its true sense, you exist there. But that you exist there means that everything exist as you exist. Even though you do not observe things, you know, one by one, the way you exist on your black cushion is the way things exist on each position. So there is no need for us, when we sit, to be greedy or to be involved in useless competition.

When you act, you know, if your life is based on zazen practice, you will have always good harmony with your family, with your neighbors, and things you treat. You will not make, you know, excessive effort or you will not be idle. You will do exactly, you know, [what] you needed. That is, you know, feeling of zazen. You sit. So that you exist here is that Buddha exist, and that Buddha exist means that you exist here. There is no difference between Buddha and you. Buddha exist in that way, and you exist in that way.

So, if you are Buddha, Buddha is, of course, Buddha and everything could be Buddha. Buddha is someone, you know, who attained buddhahood after making a great effort for many-six years. Before he make-attain buddhahood-before he realize this point, he was Buddha. But he realize what is Gautama Buddha himself. And when he found out himself, he realized everything exist in that way. So for him there was no problem. And according to the tendency of human being, he left his teaching because we make many mistakes. So the teaching was, you know, expressed-left, "Don't do that, don't be that way!" Because you are originally, you know, you will be happy if you are exactly as you are. So don't be that way or this way too much. That was Buddha's teaching, which is called Middle Way.

So only when you have zazen practice in your everyday life, you will be free from life of hermit or life of excessive busy life. We will know how we can help others only when we know how we should exist. I think that is why Zen Center should be in San Francisco and to make right effort as Buddha told us. So we must extend zazen practice to everyday life, and we must encourage zazen people, zazen practice, to many people. In this way, having right practice in our everyday life, I think we can help others in its true sense.

Thank you very much.

---

Sources: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Joan Amaral and Bill Redican 9/28/00. Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Uchiyama Kosho-roshi (c. 1912-1998): Disciple of "Homeless" Sawaki Kodo-roshi and sixth abbot of Antai-ji temple in Gentaku, northern Kyoto, Japan. Disciples include Shohaku Okumura-roshi.

[2] bo (to forget); kei (lineage or group of origin).

3 - Come Back to Emptiness

Wednesday, December 23, 1970

Come Back to Emptiness
Introduced by Jakusho Kwong-roshi

Mill Valley Zendo

Zazen-zazen practice, for us, more and more become important.

Nowadays, as you may feel, we are human being. We came to the point where we must start-maybe it is too late but, even so, we must start some new movement. In America it is not so-so bad, but in Japan it is very bad because the land is so narrow. And what people did for [to] their own land is awful. Soon they will not have anything to eat. And I-we think, even though we die will come to-to the earth. And everything, you know, which appeared should come back to the earth or in its wide sense it-it must come back to emptiness. But something we human being did for [to] our earth or land is pretty difficult to go back, to resume its old home of emptiness.

We human being appeared on this earth and did many things to the earth. And as long as we could, you know-everything resume to emptiness, it was okay. But now it is not-what we did is pretty difficult to resume to emptiness. If you raise, you know, vegetables-vegetables contain something harmful to you. If you eat something, if you breathe air-everything, you know, has already some poison for us. And poison we made remains on the earth almost looks like forever. It cannot be forever, but for human being it is-it is almost forever.

People talks about this kind of thing, but they do not feel so deeply or bad about this. I feel-if I could, you know, after death become emptiness, I feel very good. But what we did, as Buddha says, is, you know, create karma-awful karma.

We-how we create karma is because of the ego. So we should try to-try to get rid of ego as much as possible. So, as Buddha says, egolessness is the most important point for our practice, for our life. When you have not much ego, we feel eternal life for us. Even though we create ego, that ego is strong enough to support yourself, not more than-create problem-unnecessary then. In other word, if we go back to emptiness it is okay. Even though we create something bad, that karma should be reduced to emptiness [laughs] as soon as possible, as soon enough for human being to live on this earth.

This kind of life should be based on zazen practice. If we do not practice zazen we accumulate ego-centered activity, one after another. And we have no time to see, to realize what we are doing. But what-only when you start your activity or your life from zazen then you will-you wouldn't create so much karma-bad karma. And even [though] you create some karma, you know what you are doing and you can control yourself. And you have-you are sensitive enough to feel what you are doing. And when you see something growing naturally and beautifully you will appreciate it. But when you are-your life is involved in awful karma, without seeing anything, without appreciating anything, without feeling anything good, then your-your life is nothing but the karmic life. I don't say I'm not creating any karma, but I can see actually what we are doing here.

I have- I came back from Japan and realized the difference between the life in Japan and in America. There is big difference. In Japan- Japan is Buddhist country, but Japan is already covered by big karma. But here in America, we have some chance to start something new. Maybe Japan is a kind of factory where people create very bad karma, but in America I don't think so. I think the people who is-who live in America has some responsibility to save all human being. And people who live in such country like Japan should be-should have bodhisattva's mind to sacrifice themselves for human life, human activity, or human being. Even though they themselves cannot have real way of Buddhist life, but they should accept it-their own karma-and they should help people in their own activity, for an instance. If Japan is big factory, they should make something good and help people. But here in America, I think you must have more human like-life, and you must have real practice here. And you must set up some new way of life without creating not much karma, without spoiling the beautiful land you have.

How you can do this is to practice zazen-not all day long, but at least one hour or two hours a day. And you should start your life, you should renew your life, you should go back to emptiness and start your life again and again. Then you will have real Buddhism way of life.

My temple in Japan [Rinso-in], when you would drink water from the stream-you know, not stream, but big and small, small spring. But the water we-they drink now in that temple, I don't think it is good enough; it is not pure enough, I know. And people may know what kind of water they're drinking; but they give up to talk about it. If they talk about it, you know, what they feel, you know, what they have will seems [?] like a bad feeling. and [there is] no way to, you know, purify the water. There is no way.

The earth itself is already not good for human beings. It's terrible, you know. The vegetables they raise is not good enough, I don't think. And I thought what will be the way to eat good vegetable, good water? But no way to get pure water. No more place to raise good vegetable or water.

I didn't talk about this, you know, when I was in Japan. It is so cruel to talk about this kind of thing.

People who take-make trip by fast train. When I was young I would, you know, I-we were very happy to see Mount Fuji. But people now, instead of looking, instead of seeing Mount Fuji, they see the other side of the train where there is many factories and pollution, polluted water. And they talk about how bad it is without seeing Mount Fuji [laughs]. It's awful condition. Last time I visited Japan, four years ago, it was not so bad, but in four days-in four years it changed a lot. But we must be, the-I think we forget, we human being, does not-do not realize what we are doing and what is our karma.

So I-we should encourage people to sit and go back to, you know, emptiness. When you sit instead of, you know, having some gaining idea of attaining something, you should go back to emptiness on your black cushion, and start-to start something new. Where your practice is involved in some gaining idea of attaining something, it means that you are encouraging ego. As long as you have too much ego, your life will be karmic life. This point should be remembered. And you should know what is pure zazen, what is true zazen transmitted from Buddha to us, which include Buddha's teaching which is the foundation of various teaching of Buddha, which is a way to observe our precepts. When-only when you practice true zazen it is possible to observe Buddha's precepts.

This morning you repeated Prajñāparamita Sutra three times. That is very encouraging. We should repeat, you know-for ourselves we should, I think, practice zazen with silence, with calmness of our mind, with empty mind. But maybe for others, you know, let them know what is Prajñāparamita Sutra-what does it mean to us, over and over again, until they understand what is Prajñāparamita Sutra-and how important it is to practice zazen for us, for human being. It is our practice now. It cannot be just for Zen Buddhists. It should be for all human being. And this is not religion any more; this is something we should do. Even though it may be too late, but we should try our best. If we really awake-if you-we are really awakened, it cannot be too late. I think we must have more positive, you know, practice too for people. Let us sit with people and let us recite Prajñāparamita Sutra with all human being.

I couldn't, you know, express how I feel, but I think you must have understood what I mean. I'm so glad to see so many people in this zendo. Encouraging, you know. Young, small students. We must, you know, try very hard.

Thank you very much. Okay.

-----
Source: Original tape provided by Sonoma Zen Center, marked "Mill Valley Zendo, Suzuki Roshi, Shingyo, Teisho, 12/23/70." Transcribed by Jeffrey Schneider (July 1999) and checked against tape by Bill Redican (30 August 1999). Mill Valley Zendo was under the direction of Jakusho Kwong-roshi.

4 - Sickness and True Practice

Sunday, December 27, 1970

Sickness and True Practice
San Francisco

Dogen-zenji said sickness does not, you know, destroy-destroy people, but no practice will destroy people. Sickness does not destroy people, but no practice destroy people. What do you mean [laughs]? What does it mean? "No practice destroy people."

If, you know, we have no idea of practice, sickness-even sickness does not mean anything, you know, because when we cannot practice, we call it sick- [partial word]-sickness. But, you know, if you have no idea of practice, what is sickness? Maybe for the people whose purpose of life is to enjoy life, you know, when he cannot enjoy his life, it is sickness. But it is-that idea is self-contradiction, you know, because sickness is also a part of [laughs]-part of life. Maybe because he want to enjoy our life, he want to enjoy in its-enjoy in its more common sense-common sensitivity-enjoy our life. When you cannot enjoy our life, it is sickness [laughs], but, you know, sickness also, you know, [is] a part of life, especially when you become old. You will be al- [partial word]-almost everyday you will be sick [laughs]. So that-that does not, you know, mean anything to the old people.

So how to enjoy our old life is, you know, to have the idea of practice. When someone cannot [laughs] practice, you know: "Oh, I am sick." [Laughs.] "It means something." But even in their bed, you know, they have, you know, something to do: to have more better practice or more formal practice. So they-they will try to, you know, keep up more ordinal [ordinary?] way of practice, having medicine or-or something. Anyway, he will try.

That is a part of practice. That kind of-when-so when we have idea of practice, you know, we-we will not-we don't lose ourselves. But when you have no idea of practice, in its true sense, you will be-you will lose, you know, your meaning of life. Here you will find out that idea, you know, if you-if your purpose of life is to enjoy your life, there is some, you know, something is missing there. It is not complete. The joy of life cannot be a complete, you know-perfect purpose cannot be a purpose of life because [?] only the true idea of practice wi- [partial word: will?]- can be a purpose of life.

Without any purpose of life, we cannot live, and if, you know, even though you have purpose of life, the purpose-when purpose of life is not good enough or perfect enough, then you will lose yourself. You will lose your meaning of life. So when-only when you have complete purpose of life, you-you can survive-you can have a life-have a true joy of life, wherever you are, whenever it-it may be: in sickness, in adversity, or whatever happen to you, you will still have joy of life. You can enjoy sickness even.

So to-to be ill means, you know, to have another practice there. This kind of life-the life with purpose or practice-that practice will be the practice which help themselves and which help others. To do things with people-not-not just help himself-to help others-this kind of practice-if you-if your purpose of life is to help yourself, to help others, then whenever you are, you will have chance to practice.

When I was young, I have my teacher-I had my teacher. But when I was thirty-two, I lost my teacher. He passed away.[1] So I had not much chance to, you know, practice under my teacher. But-under my master [corrects "teacher"], but I-I had some other masters. So I could practice-I could continue my practice. But it is important for you, you know, to have more intimate relationship with your teacher, which you don't have here. [At] Zen Center, we have too many teachers, so I am sorry we haven't [laughs] give you this kind of, you know, practice.

But that is very important. But if you have true, you know-if you understand true-what is true practice or purpose of true life, wherever you are, even without teacher, you can practice pretty well, as I did after [age] thirty-two. [Laughs.] For an instance, you know, when I was [at] Soko-ji, as some of-I told you many times [laughs], but still I want to talk-tell-I want to talk about [it] again-because I found, you know, tremendous joy of practice when I was-each time I went to the grocery store-grocery store to buy some vegetables. I would choose, you know, the fruit which is, you know, almost, you know, almost going to, you know, rotten [laughs]-soft, you know.

If grapefruit is soft, it is-it mean it is not already so good, you know. Grapefruit is sour, but soft, you know, grapefruits with-with-even though it-it has no mold on it, it taste bitter, you know [laughs]. Do you know the taste? Fresh one is only sour, but old one is bitter. I will choose, you know, that kind of soft grapefruits or vegetables with lead [red? dead?] leaves already on it. I found there my practice. When I divide something, you know, one grapefruit with someone else, you know, I give the top part to someone-someone, and the bottom part I take. Top part is usually better than bottom part, even though top part is small, you know. Maybe you will take [laughs] top part, don't you? [Laughs, laughter.] But I take bottom part. You may feel strange [laughs], you know. If I explain my way, you may feel very strange. But I found there, you know, a kind of practice when I eat.

So it is not matter of "That," you know, "practice is good or bad," you know. When you say, "My practice is wrong," you [laughs]-your purpose of life is, you know, something different from me. That is why you say, "Oh, that practice is very poor," you know, "very strange," you know. But to me it is not strange. That is, you know, my practice.

Of course, you cannot be-as long as you live in this society, you cannot be always like that [laughs]. You cannot be always like that but, you know, if the purpose of life is established within yourself, you will make your best, and, you know, when it is possible, you will do it. When it is not impossible-you find it difficult or impossible, you-you will not do it. But even why it is, you know, why it is difficult to practice is because our society is sick [laughs], you know. Sick. So we cannot practice it.

But "sick" means something, you know. When we sick-when we say our society is sick, you know, that "sick"-that idea of sickness is based on true practice. When [laughs] your, you know, understanding what you mean by, you know, sickness is based on some idea of purpose of life, then you have to fight with society, you know. You will be very much disappointed with society, as you don't feel so good when you are sick.

So "sickness," we say, but real meaning of sickness, you know-if you think about the sickness more, according to the person, the real meaning of sickness will [laughs]-will-will be quite different.

Buddha left us the teaching which could be real medicine of true sickness. So Buddhist, you know, has-knows what is sickness for each one of us, and what is sickness for the society. So we know how-what is the remedy, or how to, you know, confront with the sickness we have. That is why we call him a good doctor. Buddha-another name of Buddha is Good Doctor.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Bill Redican (January 5, 2000).

[1] Gyokujun So-on Suzuki is said to have died on May 3, 1934. Suzuki-roshi was born on May 18, 1904, so there is some discrepancy in dates.

1971 (49)

1971 januari (5)

1 - Universal Self, Individual Experience

Sunday, January 03, 1971

Universal Self, Individual Experience
San Francisco

Last Sunday I remember I talked about our surrounding, which is civilized world and busy world, and world of science and world of technique. Although I couldn't talk about fully about those things, but I tried [laughs] anyway. And I talked about something about practice or why we practice zazen. But I did not talk about self-who practice zazen-who practice zazen.

What is self is a big problem, you know. Unless we don't understand what is self, unless we don't reflect on our self, whether our everyday life is self-centered or a life of selflessness, we cannot, you know, have right practice: the practice to settle oneself, you know, on self. That is, you know, [Dainin] Katagiri-sensei's [laughs] word: "to settle oneself on the self." You cannot understand what does it mean.

So most people, I think, you know, especially the people who are here, are the people who knows who, you know, who has pretty good prospective [perspective] to our surrounding, to our modern life. But, you know, I don't think you understand what is self fully. And those who are more, you know-in Zen Center, I think, there are two kinds [laughs] of students, if I classify, you know. One type of the student is a student who practice a hermit-like practice [laughter], and other is, you know, the other group of people are the people more radical and intellectual.

But-so-and one type of, you know, people seek for self, you know, practice to attain something or to more like individual practice. So instead of going to deep mountain, they come to Zen Center. And, you know, tentatively or-they come to Zen Center because there we can practice, you know. They will be free from busy world-a kind of hermitage, you know, -like practice. And that is, you know, still they don't forget, you know, they don't know how to be free from self. Still their practice is based on gaining idea: to attain some, you know, trance or some attainment. Instead of using LSD [laughs], they practice zazen [laughs]. That kind of practice, you know [laughs]. That is not our practice, actually, but you can practice that kind of practice in Zen Center too. So that is why, I think, you come to Zen Center. But actually this is not our practice. Our practice is quite different from that kind of practice.

Those who work hard, you know, in Zen Center-staying everyday here, watching our everyday activity in Zen Center-I don't think they [laughs] understand fully what is our practice. It is not so easy to understand, unless you have more- It needs more study, and we need more practice until you understand this kind of practice to settle oneself on oneself.

Of course, zazen practice is a kind of human experience which is quite different from the experience you have in modern life. So we must know, maybe, what kind of life we have in this actual society, in this "civilized world," so-called it "civilized world." To settle oneself on oneself, you know, to settle oneself on oneself, you know-that "oneself" is not universal self. The purpose of our practice is not to settle oneself on universal self. This point is, you know, very important. Modern life is so-called-it "scientific world"-world of science or technique is the world. The science, you know, already based on universal self. The experience you have in scientific world can be repeated over and over again. The truth which is true to someone will be, at the same time, true with, you know, someone else. So this kind of experience is universal experience. So this kind of communication we have between people is communication, you know, on the base of universal self. When one, you know, understands, when one thinks, "that is true," is true to someone else too. So that kind of truth is maybe scientific truth.

But there something is missing still. Universal self will create some natural role, you know. "Natural role," we say, but it is not actually natural role. It is based on universal self. The universal self cannot be at the same time always, you know, individual experience-cannot create individual experience. Actually, something you experience is only true with you only, you know. It cannot be true with someone else. When you think it is true, you know, you think the experience you had is true with someone else, at that time you are forcing your experience to others [laughs] actually. But there is some reason why you, you know, think in that way. The reason why is the universal self make you, you know, make you false-your experience to others. In that way, you know, universal- When we live in universal self, you will lose your actual, you know, self, or big self [laughs].

It is very strange, you know. When you talk about big self, you talk about universal self [laughs]. So, you know, it is opposite to me: Universal self is not true self. It may be scientific truth, which is based on universal self or science, scientific truth. It looks like you can repeat your experience over and over again. So that kind of people, when he has some kind enlightenment, you know, kensho, he wants to repeat it again [laughs]. If you lose it, you feel very, you know, very sorry. But true, you know, enlightenment experience cannot be, you know, repeated again. Only experience-or scientific fact could be repeated over and over again. So the more you emphasize big self, the more you lose the true self. That is actually what we are doing.

We can discuss something, you know, with people. Or we can discuss about Zen Center rules [laughs]. But [laughs], you know, that is just rules, just, you know, picture of our Zen Center life. But actual Zen Center life is not to follow the formality, to follow the rule we set up. So even though you faithfully, you know, obey Zen Center rules, that is not true practice which we mean. Our practice is practice to settle oneself on self, you know, which means to have always new, fresh, you know, experience with your, you know, true self. But it doesn't mean- Real practice is- Even it is so, as long as you live in Zen Center, you should follow our rules.

And while following our rules, or in its wide sense, you know, living in this actual life of science, how to develop our practice is the point of practice. We know how, you know, we can develop Dogen's practice in Zen Center, in group practice like this. Our practice is individual practice; at the same time, it is group practice. And our practice is hermit-like practice; and at the same time, our practice can be practiced in this modern world. This is the characteristic of Dogen's practice. That is true meaning of "to settle oneself on self," you know. Even though you are in this modern society, you should not lose, you know, your fresh experience moment after moment. We should not be caught, or we should know the fresh vitality within ourselves.

Yesterday two teachers [laughs] came to me and talked about their experience, you know. I was very much interested in it. Both of them were good teachers. And what they said was sometime, you know, a student-sometimes they find students, you know, very agitated [active?] (what was the word?) lazy-lazience-you know, in lazience, very responsive.

Student: "Disoriented."

Mmm? Disoriented. Who are you[laughs]talking about? [i.e., himself?] [Laughs, laughter.] Disoriented. Sometimes they didn't, you know. Why it is so is they lose true self, you know. That is why, you know, when student find his teacher like a machine [laughs], he-they will never, you know, respond-give him good response. When they are real, you know, teacher, or self-acting, you know-when they are based on real self, you know, when they are settled on true self, you know, they quickly respond to them.

Why this kind of difference happens to the same person? It is not matter of just when they are in good condition or some other reason-even though, you know, I know that kind of ex-how it happens. Even though we are sick, you know, students give you very good response. When a teacher is sick, you know, they will worry about him very much and give him very good response.

There is some point which we must understand. For instance, we observe ceremonies very formally and strict way, even though we observe ceremony very formally if, you know, that is just formal ceremony, the people who practice it will not enjoy the ceremony, and people who see the-to attend that ceremony will not be interested in it.

Kitano-zenji[1]-when I was at Eihei-ji, the abbot of Eihei-ji was Kitano-zenji. When he come, you know, to hatto [2] [long pause], we had, you know, special feeling with our practice. He observed our ceremony very strictly with good spirit, but when he bow, you know, he is so old that when he bow it looked like it is impossible to stand up again, you know [laughs]. He had very difficult time to stand up again. He almost looks like sick person who is going to die. And when he stand up [laughs], and [not] showing any, you know, agony [laughs] with joy he stand up, but actually it was terrible effort for him. You know, that is very fresh, you know, very, you know, strong, you know, fresh activity. It is not just formality which is based on his, you know, spirit of Zen.

We practice zazen in zendo, but we understand that it is rare opportunity to sit in zendo. Morning after morning we feel in that way, you know. Why we practice Zen is not to establish Zen Center or to, you know, observe the formality of Zen Center. Or we do not practice zazen to attain something or to have a special, you know, experience about Zen. To go back to the life activity which is the foundation of all our activity, and to settle every activity we take on that activity of practice is the purpose of practice.

[Kosho] Uchiyama-roshi, you know, Uchiyama-roshi wrote [drew] a manga (you know manga?) [laughs] comic [laughs], and on the person, his head is, you know, picture of his head is (I should brought it to show you, but-) it's various activity you have in your mind. In that picture, you lose yourself on this mundane world. And you lose yourself in religion [delusion?] [laughs]. Many people are losing themselves in religion. They cannot find out true self in their religion. The more they believe in religion, they lose true self, you know, in religion. They cannot-that is why, maybe, they practice, they believe in religion: to lose themselves, so that you can forget all about our modern world. That is why you believe in or you practice some religion.

But that kind of, you know, picture is its head, and his body is sitting [laughs] on, you know, to settle oneself, you know, to settle all those, you know, activity on zazen is our practice. I couldn't [laughs] explain it so well, but the point is, you know, that kind of- So point is, you know- Anyway, point is to practice zazen, you know, true zazen, every morning, and to organize or to feel yourself in everyday life, whatever life it may be-Zen Center life or city life or in deep mountain, you should not forget the true foundation of your life. That is, you know, actually our practice.

Maybe it is necessary to explain what is our universal self more. This is very important for Zen Center, because Zen Center become bigger and bigger. And Zen Center looks like, you know, now, a kind of company [laughs, laughter], but there is some difference [laughs], some difference, you know. [Sentence completed. Tape turned over.]

You know, if you know clearly, you know, what is our framework of society now, you will find out the difference between Zen Center and some company in San Francisco. You should understand it. Maybe because you don't know what is, you know, the framework of our society, you don't know what is our practice. You hate it, that's all [laughs]. You don't like it. That is good [SR said "good" tentatively and humorously], but [laughs, laughter] if you hate it, you know, before you hate it you should know what it is first of all.

Maybe so it is necessary, you know, for us to study more, to talk about more about our framework of, you know, our society, modern world, and what kind of, you know, mistake we have been making for maybe from 1800, after Industrial Revolution. Is that correct? Yeah. After Industrial Revolution. I talked about Japanese militarism, you know [laughs], but, you know, it is not only Japan. All over the world that kind of idea was going. That is our life after 1800. And what kind of base we had? How we lost- At that time already we started to lose ourselves, and we lost the foundation of zazen practice.

Perhaps, you know, it is maybe useless to explain it, you know, but our understanding about it is a little bit different, you know, from usual understanding of our modern world.

Anyway, I think we should try hard to extend our practice in our organization, and in our practice and in our everyday life or in city life.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997.
Verbatim transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican 9/13/99.

[1] Gempo Kitano-zenji (1842-1933): The 67th abbot of Eihei-ji.

[2] Dharma hall.

2 - Right Concentration

Sunday, January 10, 1971

Right Concentration
San Francisco

... [1] were given about our practice referring to Avalokiteshvara Bodhisattva? What is, you know, who is Avalokiteshvara? I don't mean a man or a woman [laughs]. He is, by the way- He's supposed to be a man who take sometime figure of a woman, you know. In disguise of a woman he help people. That is Avalokiteshvara Bodhisattva. Sometime, you know, he has one thousand hands-one thousand hands-to help others. But, you know, if he is concentrated on one hand only, you know [laughs], 999 hands will be no use [laughs].

Our concentration does not mean to be concentrated on one thing, you know. Without, you know, trying to concentrate our mind, you know, without trying to concentrate, concentrated on something, we should be ready to be concentrated on something, you know. For an instance, if I am watching someone, you know, like this [laughs], my eyes is concentrated on one person like this. You know, I cannot see, you know, even it is necessary, it is difficult to change my concentration to others. We say "to do things one by one," but what it means is, you know, without [laughs]-ah, it may be difficult-maybe not to try to explain it so well [laughs]. Nature [of] it is difficult to explain. But look at my eyes, you know. This is eyes, you know, I am watching someone [laughs]. And this is my eyes, you know, when I practice zazen. I'm [not] watching anybody [laughs], but if someone move, I can catch him [laughs, laughter].

There is your- So- Mmm. From old time, the main point of practice is to have clear, calm mind. In short, that is our practice, and that is our, maybe, faith, you know, belief. By "belief" we don't mean to believe in something. Our practice should not be something like fanatic, you know, practice. Or infatuation is not our practice, you know. Just, you know, to always to have calm, serene mind, whatever you do, you know. Even you eat something good, your mind should be very calm to be ready to appreciate, you know, the labor of making food and the effort of making, you know, dishes, and chopsticks, and, you know, bowls, and everything. And we, you know, we should appreciate each vegetables, you know-one by one-its own flavor. That is, you know, how we make food, you know, and how you eat food. So we don't put so much seasoning or flavor to food. We rather appreciate each, you know, food. That is, we say, "calorie." Calorie is not flavor. Flavor is, you know, something you put, you know, is flavor.

So, you know, to know someone is to sense someone's flavor. Flavor [laughs] is not smell [laughs] but something you feel from someone. And each one has some, you know, particular flavor or not-flavor [laughs]-personality from which many, you know, feelings comes out, and each one has each one's own flavor. Then we have, you know, good relationship with each other. We are really friendly with each other. To be friendly does not mean to occupy someone or to stick to someone, you know, or try not to lose your friend, but to have full appreciation of his or her own personality or flavor, you know.

So to appreciate things and people, we should be-our minds should be calm and pure or clear. So to have this kind of mind, we practice zazen. So when we practice zazen, we just-that is what do we mean by "just sit," "just sit," without not much gaining idea-to be you yourself-or to "settle oneself on oneself." [2] That is, you know, our practice.

"Freedom," you say, but maybe freedom you mean and freedom we Zen Buddhists mean may not be exactly the same. Maybe same, but not exactly. For instance, you know, to attain freedom [laughs] we cross our legs [laughs] and we keep our posture straight, and we keep our eyes in some certain way and we open our ears, you know, to everything, even without trying to open. Let our eyes open to everything. But there is some way to have this readiness, to have this openness, because or else by nature we are liable to be, you know, go extreme and to stick to something, losing, you know, our calmness of mind or mirror-like mind. So there must be some way, you know, to obtain this kind of calmness of your mind, of clearness of your mind. That is zazen practice.

So it does not mean- It looks like, you know, to force something physically, you know, some form physically on you and to create, you know, some special state of mind. Is maybe- You may think that is Zen practice, and you may think this kind of state of mind is, you know, Zen practice, you know: To have mirror-like mind is Zen practice. It is so, but [laughs]-but [laughs]- If you practice zazen, you know, to attain that kind of, you know, mirror-like mind, that is not already the practice we mean. There is slight difference. If you practice zazen to obtain, you know, a kind of state of mind, it is already art of Zen. Art of Zen.

The difference between art of Zen and true Zen [laughs]- Do you, do you- Oh. What is the difference, do you think? Art of Zen and Zen. Actually, you have it, you know, when you do not try. Because you try to do something, you lose it. When you try to do something, you know, it means that you are concentrated on one hand of one thousand hand, you know [laughs]. You lose 999 hands. So that is why we say just to sit, you know. It does not mean, you know, to stop your mind altogether, you know, or to be concentrated on your breathing completely. It doesn't mean that. But it is a kind of, you know, help, you know, to have better practice. When you count your breathing, you don't think so much. You don't have so much gaining idea. Counting breathing doesn't mean much to you. So that is why, maybe, someone get bored about [laughs] counting breathing. "It doesn't mean anything." But when you think so, you know, your way of understanding of real practice is lost. Why we, you know, practice- Why we try to be concentrated or let our mind go with breathing is not to be, you know, involved in some complicated practice in which you will lose yourself. So to have calmness of your mind, or pure mind, or open mind, we apply this kind of practice.

Art of Zen or, you know, is- I don't know so much about art, but art of Zen is, you know, skill of Zen or skill of practice. You know, to be like Zen master [laughs], you know, skillful Zen master who have big strength and who have good practice. It may be your, you know- Some of you may practice zazen to be like someone like, you know, [Sotan Ryosen] Tatsugami-roshi, for an instance [laughs]. "Oh, I want to be like him. I must try hard," you know [laughs]. You are learning art of Zen [laughs, laughter]. You are not practicing true zazen [laughs]. That is how you [laughs] study art, you know: How to draw straight line [laughs] or how to, you know, to control your mind, that is art of Zen. But Zen is for everyone, you know, even though he cannot draw a straight line. If he can [in] any way draw a line, that is our Zen. And if that is very natural to a boy, even though it is not straight, it is beautiful [laughs]. Maybe that is, you know, art- Or more than art so, you know, people like some work done by children rather than done by, you know, famous artist. There is some difference. I don't know how to explain it.

So whether you like [laughs] cross-legged position or not, or whether you can do it or not, if you know what is true zazen, you can do it. Somehow you will figure out if you watch Tatsugami-roshi's practice carefully, with openness of your mind, then you learn something from it, or when your mind is based on gaining idea [laughs], what you learn is art of Zen, not true Zen.

So, you know, the most important thing in our practice is, you know, just, you know, follow our schedule and to do things with people [laughs]. Again, you know, this is, you may say, "group practice" [laughs]. It is not so [laughs]. Group practice is quite different thing. It is a kind of art. You know, in wartime, when we are practicing zazen, some young people who were very much encouraged by, you know, militaristic, you know, mood of Japan told me that in the [Soto-shu-kyokai-] Shushogi,[3] you know, it says, "To understand what is, you know, birth and death is main point of our practice." [Laughs.] But even though we don't know anything about Shushogi, you know, I can die easily in [at the] front [laughs]. That is group practice, I think, you know. Encouraged by trumpet and guns and war cry (WRAAA) [laughs, laughter], he is normal [?]. It is quite easy to die. That kind of practice is not our practice. We practice with people, you know, first of all. But goal of practice is to practice with mountain, and with river, and with trees, and with stones-with everything in the world, in the universe-and to find ourselves in this big cosmos. And in this big world we should intuitively know which way to go.

When, you know, your surrounding show some sign, you know, to go this way or that way, you should intuitively go this way or that way. Show a sign, you know. When they show some sign, we should intuitively follow it. I am very much interested in the word "show a sign." "Show," you know. "Sign" is something which is shown, you know, by something else to you, and even though you have no idea of following sign, you know, if some sign is shown, you will, you know, go that direction. This is the real practice Dogen-zenji meant. If your practice does not go with everything, with-he doesn't say with your friend-with everything, it is not real practice.

How you can practice with everything is to have, you know, calmness of your mind. So how you, you know- So to come to Zen Center and practice our way is good, but you should not make a big mistake. Maybe you [laughs] already made a mistake [laughs, laughter], but you should know that you are making mistake, but I cannot help coming here [laughs], you know. Then your practice have quite different quality. Meaning is different. "You," in that case, means you which is involved in wrong idea, you know. That is you. So I think you have to accept it: "I am involved in wrong practice," you know. Then your practice include your wrong practice and "you," in that case, means you which includes some wrong practice.

But, you know, we should accept it, because it is there already. You cannot do anything about it. There is no need to try to get rid of it. But if you, you know, open your eyes, true eyes, and accept it, there there is real practice [laughs]. Do you understand? It is not matter of right or wrong, but how to accept frankly, with openness of your mind, what you are doing. That is most important point. Then you will accept "you" thinking something else in your practice, you know [laughs]. "Ah, something came over already." And you should accept that "you" too. You should not try to, you know, to be free from the images you have: "Oh! Here they come" [laughs, laughter]. That is, you know [laughs], this kind of eyes [laughs]. You are not watching any special thing. Someone is moving over there. "Oh, he is moving [laughs]." But if he stop moving [laughs], your eyes is, you know, same. In that way, if your practice include everything, that is, you know, one after another, if your real practice, if you do not lose some kind of, you may say, "state of mind," that is, you know, your practice.

So this is, you know- This kind of practice is a practice which is unknown to most of the people and which is very important for us-which is transmitted from Buddha to Bodhidharma and Dogen-zenji. So our practice is not group practice or, you know- By means of, you know, people we practice, so it looks like group practice but it is not so, actually. Maybe group practice with everything in the world. Then [laughs] that is not group practice any more [laughs]. You know, group exist in big society: this group, or that group. That is group practice. Our practice is not, you know, Soto practice, you know. Rinzai, Soto, or Obaku, you know: That is group practice, but our practice is to practice with everything. If there is someone else, you know, we should include that person too. We should practice with that person. So our measure of practice is limitless-we should have ... . [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.] When we have this base, we have real freedom.

Each one of our being means [needs?] something. But when you measure or evaluate your value of being, you know, good or bad, or right or wrong, or black or white [laughs], that is, you know, comparative value. You will not have absolute value in your being. When you evaluate yourself by measure of limitless measure, each one of us is really will be settled on real self, you know. To be just you is enough, you know. Because you have short, you know, limited measure, you know, or a dualistic measure, you lose your value.

Hmm. Black one should be just black, white [laughs] one should be just white. That is enough, you know. What do you need more than that? Why do you need more than that? Because of your, you know, small measurement. We must know this point, and we should know what is real practice for human being and for everything. And for everything.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (11/15/00).

[1] Opening words not recorded on tape.

[2] Suzuki-roshi is quoting Dainin Katagiri-roshi: "To settle the self on the self and let the flower of the life force bloom" [see, e.g., SR-71-01-03, Paragraph 2], who may in turn have been quoting Dogen.

[3] A book of excerpts from Shobogenzo by Rozan Takushu and Houn Fugai.

3 - Lay Ordination Ceremony

Monday, January 11, 1971

Lay Ordination Ceremony
City Center, San Francisco

I wanted to talk about ordination ceremony, but I think it is pretty difficult to explain it, you know, because-even-because you have no idea of, you know, Buddhist priesthood. And what you have in your mind is priest in America, you know, so [laughs], I have no word to communicate.

[SR interrupted on tape. Narrator says here: "A good portion of the tape was inaudible on the original here." (This suggests that their tape was a copy.) SR then resumes, presumably after a gap.]

... inanimate and animate beings. So everything has its own position in Buddha's-in Bud- [partial word]-as a Buddhist. That is fundamental teaching of Buddhism, and that is the structure of the teaching. So we cannot say priest is highest. Or animal is lowest.

Tentatively, as we are, you know, human being, or as we are teacher or disciples, but we are all friends of-of Buddhist. We are all Buddhist. Tentatively, we take some responsibility to express Buddha's teaching. But each one of us-because each one of us has one's own position and responsibility, so the value of each one is the same. That is fundamental, you know, structure of sangha.

With this understanding, we observe ordination ceremony. Some of them will become priest, and some of them will remain, you know, laymen. And we will fulfill our responsibility to realize-for the realization of the teaching-for the practice of our teaching. This is, you know, why we have ordination ceremony, because we need, you know, priest. But it doesn't mean priest is highest or something like that.

But when we, you know, have some ceremony, or when we have some activity, according to the situation, someone will take more responsibility, and that is quite natural thing which will happen to us. And with this spirit, I want you to join our ordination ceremony. As some day you will be a priest or a nun. No one knows [laughs], you know, what will happen to us. But whatever happen to us, if you want to join our order, and express Buddha's spirit, I want you to join our ceremony, and I shall be very grateful for you if you appreciate our effort.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original tape SR-71-01-11. Transcribed and checked by Bill Redican 9/21/99.

4 - Gaining Idea

Saturday, January 16, 1971

Gaining Idea
San Francisco

Something valuable [laughs]-not jewel or not candy, but something which is very valuable. You recite right now, you know, a verse on unsurpassable, you know, teaching. What is actually-how to, you know, receive this kind of treasure is, you know, to have well-oriented mind. I have been talking about self for maybe three lectures-what is self and what is your surrounding, what kind of thing you see, how you accept things, and purpose of zazen.

Purpose of zazen, why we practice zazen is to be a boss of everything. That is why you practice zazen. If you practice zazen, you will be a boss of your surrounding-whenever you are, you are boss [laughs]. But if I say so, it will create some misunderstanding: you are boss, you know, you are boss of everyone or everything. And you is, you know, also, in your mind, you are boss of everything, you know. When you understand in that way, you know, you are enslaved by idea of you and, you know, your friend, or everyone-all the people surrounding you. You are, you know, you know, you exist in your mind as a kind of idea, and also people exist in your mind as a member of [laughs] delusion [laughs]. I say "delusion" because when those idea is not well-supported by your practice, then that is delusion, you know. When you are enslaved by the idea of "you or others," then that is delusion. When real, you know, power of practice is supporting those idea, at that time, you know, I say you are "you" who is practicing our way is boss of everything, boss of you yourself, you know.

That is why we say, or Buddha say, you have to control yourself, you know, control yourself. When, you know, you have something you have to control, that is, you know, deluded you, not real you. "You" are in your mind as an idea, you know [laughs], and you are deluded by the idea of you, and [laughs] you are enslaved by the idea of people, so, you know, you have difficulty or confusion between idea of you and idea of your friend. That is confused [laughs] mind. But when you have, you know, you support or you are supporting in its true sense-not encouraging [laughs]. I don't mean to encourage, but you are. Those idea are well controlled by your power of practice, then, you know, that "you," you know, is boss of everything. So even confused mind will be supported by your practice.

That is how, you know, how things, you know, how sound of motor car or various sound, you know, come to your ear when you are practicing zazen. Even though you practice zazen, you may hear various voice. Sometime you may have various idea, you know, in your mind, but if your practice is good, you know, it is, you know-it is supported-not "supported"-your practice obtains, you know, those things from outside. It is not actually from outside, but, you know, are things you have at that moment. At that time, you know, things you see or you hear is a part of you, you know. You include, actually-your practice owns or include the things you hear, images you have, but your practice is strong enough to obtain it, to have it, to own it, without being enslaved by it, as if you have your own hands, your own eyes.

You know, it doesn't create any trouble, even though it looks like, you know, you know, creating problem, you know. Sometime, you know, this hand and this hand will fight [laughs]-not fight-it looks like fighting, you know, when you [laughs] holding, you know, something like this. [Probably made a gesture with hands.] It looks like this hand is fighting with the other hand [laughs]. But, you know, it is not problem for you. They are trying to do something, that's all [laughs].

When you are really boss of everything, even though it looks like confusion, you know, it is not confusion. Even though it looks like confusion, you know, it is not confusion. Even though you look like doing something wrong, you know, some bad thing [laughs], people may say, "Oh, he is doing something bad." [Laughs.] But, you know, that is, you know, their understanding. For you it is not bad. You are not doing anything bad. It is, you know-because "you" owns everything, and you manage things as if you manage your hands. So it is not bad. So, you know, "don't do something bad" means let yourself be, you know, with everything and let everything as they want to. That is the power of practice, and that is quite different from doing something wrong. And by doing something wrong, by doing something wrong, you may suffer, you know, but for him there is no suffering. He is just, you know, managing things in some way, as his own. So it is a part of practice you do in your everyday life.

The precepts also should be observed in this way, you know. You observe precepts not because you have to follow Buddha's words, but because to extend or to have true practice in our everyday life or to settle yourself on yourself. That self, you know, include everything.

You know, sometime we say, you know, you have to extend our practice on everyday life is to be completely involved in your activity, or to be one with, you know, what you have or what you do. That is how you extend our practice, you know, in your everyday life. But that is not, you know, so clear. Then you may ask, you know, to be caught by baseball mania [laughs] is, maybe, our practice [laughs]. To be infatuated in some, you know, gambling [laughs] or something, may be practice [laughs], you may say, but that is not our practice. Do you know why? Why that is not practice? Because you are enslaved by it [laughs], you know. You are not boss of, you know, gambling. Gambling is boss of you [laughs]. Your practice is not working. You are enslaved by something which you create in your mind. You know, the machine is just going [laughs] without thinking or without doing anything [laughs], but your mind works on it, you know, and you create some delusion on the machine. And, you know, your gaining idea or your playful speculative idea, you know, makes machines, you know, gambling, that's all. So you are enslaved by yourself and by machine too. You are not practicing zazen at all. You are not boss of, you do not own the machine, you do not own your legs, you know, so, you know, as soon as you get up, your legs [laughs] wants to go to Reno. [Laughs, laughter.] You don't own your legs even [laughs]. There is no practice, you know, which support your legs. That is the difference, you know.

So to be one with something, you know, does not mean to be caught by something. Why you caught by something is you become a member of something, you know, in your idea. You already create some, you know, something interesting in your mind. And as a member of, you know, the group, you, you know, become very insuggestic [suggestive], you know. You feel some zeal to be a member of, you know [laughs], to be a member of the group you have in your mind. And you are enslaved by it, and you have nothing but something which you create in your mind. There is no practice-nothing which is supporting you. You are not boss, and you even lose yourself, you know. That is the difference.

So we say you have to practice zazen without any gaining idea, gaining of idea, without any purpose [laughs] even, we have to practice zazen. Let things work as they go, supporting everything, you know, as your own. So you have always-real you have-real practice has orientation. It has orientation or direction. But it has no purpose or no gaining idea. We do not practice zazen because of something which is in your mind, but because, you know, your real "you," you know, [is] well-oriented, and, you know, and always extending itself. It has some direction, you know, direction, which works always outside and at the same time inside too. It has some, you know, always some feeling or direction. That direction does not work, you know, will not be realized, will not happen to be active, but when something come, at the same time it includes everything. So whatever it is, you know, it will work on it. Whether it is good or bad, it doesn't matter. Something bad come, "Okay, you are [laughs], you know, a part of me." Something good come, you know, you will say, "Oh, okay."

We do not have any special goal or special object or purpose of practice. It doesn't matter whatever it is. That is why we call it "Big Mind," because it include, you know, include everything. So we call it "Big Mind." Because it is great we do not say "Big Mind." Whatever it is, it include within us, and we own it, so we call it "Big Mind," "purposeless purpose," or we say "tongueless tongue" [laughs] "tongueless tongue."

Even though I talk [about] something, there is no purpose [laughs], you know. I am talking to myself [laughs], you know, because you are a part of me, so I have no purpose of [laughs, laughter]. I have no purpose in my talk. Something is going, you know, that's all. How it goes is, you know, because of the real joy to share the joy of, you know, practice.

So maybe you practice our practice to share our practice with everything. So when one is practice zazen, everything [is] practicing zazen. When you practice zazen, everything you have, you know, is practicing zazen. Buddha practice zazen, Bodhidharma practice zazen, and everything practice zazen with you. And you share the practice with everything. So, you know-it happens in that way. Our real life happens in that way. Our real bodhisattva way happens in that way. That is how you help others, you know. Help others. "To help others," means to share the practice with people. With children, you know, with people on the street. We have to share the practice, even though they do not practice zazen, you know, like this, you know [laughs], we can share the practice because if I see people, you know, people is already here. And I practice zazen with him, with the sound of the car, with everything.

So to have well-oriented mind is, you know-if someone ask me why you practice zazen, I may answer to have well-oriented mind I practice zazen. Without any purpose we practice zazen. Without any special purpose. So point is not to lose this kind of, you know, well-oriented mind. In Japan, you know, in Japan, children has, you know, Bodhidharma toy, you know. Do you know the paper toy, made of paper? And it, you know-even though you toss it, it will stand up [laughs]. Well-oriented [laughs, laughter] practice. People enjoy the toy, you know, tossing around, because it stand up, wherever it goes, it will stand up like this. It doesn't matter where it goes. That is, you know, good example of our practice.

So our practice should be with everything, you know, with everything. Without being enslaved by it, we should be able to share the practice with everything. That is how you establish yourself, you know, on yourself. And we should know that "the self," we say, but it include everything. It is ready to include everything. And it is not even "it," you know [laughs]. It is something which include, you know, everything is real self. We don't know where it is [laughs]. If you say, "Here is my mind," that is already some idea of, you know [laughs] self. It is here instead of here [laughs]. When you say, "Here. Here is my self," you know, but actually, at that time, the self is here [laughs], not here [laughs, laughter]. And your brain is up here too [laughs, laughter]. Where is it? No one knows. [Laughs.] The only way is to participate [in] the practice, Buddha-practice, and to share the joy of practice. That is, you know, so-called-it, anraku no homon[1]-"easiest and most," you know, "easy and joyful practice."

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Translation of Japanese terms and research assistance by Shohaku Okumura-sensei. Verbatim transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican 9/14/00.

[1] Anraku (well-being and peace) + no (means previous word, anraku, is in the possessive case) + homon (practice, teaching, dharma gate). Hence, "dharma gate of peace and joy." Dogen used this expression in Bendowa and Fukan zazengi.

5 - Meeting Yourself

Saturday, January 23, 1971

Meeting Yourself
San Francisco

Most of us, maybe, want to know what is self. This is a big problem. Why you have this problem, you know, and is- I want to understand [laughs] why you have this problem. I'm trying to understand. And even though, it seems to me, even though you try to understand who are you, it is, you know, it is endless trip, you know, and you will never see your self.

You say to sit without thinking too much is difficult. Just to sit is difficult. But more difficult thing will be to try to think about your self [laughs]. This is much more difficult. To do is maybe easy, you know, but to have some conclusion, you know, to it is almost impossible, and you will continue it until you become crazy [laughs, laughter]. That is, you know, when you don't know what to do with your self. Or when you don't know, when you find out it is impossible to know who you are, you know, you become crazy.

Moreover, your culture is based on the idea of self and science and Christianity [laughs]. So those element, you know, idea of Christianity or sinful idea of Christianity or, you know, idea of science, scientific-oriented mind, makes your confusion greater. You try to always, when you sit, you know, perhaps most of you sit to improve your zazen. That idea to improve, you know, is a very Christian-like, you know, idea and, at the same time, a scientific idea: to improve. You acknowledge some improvement of our culture or civilization. We understand our civilization, you know, improved a lot. But, you know, when we say "scientific" in sense of science, you know, or "improve" means before you went to Japan by ship, now you go to airplane or jumbo [laughs] plane. That is improvement.

So when you say "some improvement," it include idea of value. And that is at the same time, you know, base of our framework of our society-economy. Now I understand you are rejecting that kind of, you know, idea of civilization. But you do not, you know, reject the idea of improvement. You still try to improve something.

And I think in Christianity, you know, all the improvement or civilization should be, you know, end. When the Last (what do you call it?) Last [Judgment], you know- When you are judged, you know, when what you have done is judged by God [laughs], you should go to hell [laughs, laughter]. You have done- You have made a atomic bomb, so you should go to [laughs] hell. You invented, you know, jumbo jet plane, so you should go [laughs, laughter] to hell. And when you go to- That is the end of everything. So our society has some end, you know. When we have end, you can say "improvement." You are improving our civilization just to go to hell [laughs]. That is, you know, improvement according for the Christian.

My friend [George] Hagiwara[1] has very Christian-oriented mind. He criticize always, you know, people, scientists, who are trying to go to the moon, you know. Someday all of us will be, you know, must go to hell [laughs] by trying that kind of thing [laughs, laughter], he always says to me. At first I couldn't understand what he meant, actually. Now, you know, I have some clear understanding, you know, how he feels. He believe in, you know, Last Judgement of God.

What I am talking about is the idea of improvement, which we Buddhists do not, you know, have so much. Nowadays, you know, in Japan or in China, all the people are trying to improve their way of life. We are deeply involved in the idea of improvement of something-to improve something. This kind of element, you know, of idea of to practice- When you practice zazen, you maybe try to improve yourself, and you want to know yourself more, you know, psychological way. That is why you are involved in-interested in psychology so much.

But psychology will tell you about your psychological things, but psychology will not tell you exactly who you are [laughs]. It is one of the many, you know, interpretation of your mind. One of the many. So if you go to, you know, psychologist or psychiatrist, endlessly you will have new information about [laughs] you [laughs]. Endless. So as long as you are going, maybe you feel, you know, some release. You feel as if, you know, all the psychological burden you have, you know, you will be released [from] the burden you carry by a psychologist, by a psychiatrist. But, you know, the way we understand [laughs] ourselves is quite different from that kind of understanding.

This morning I want to introduce Tozan's, you know, famous saying. Tozan,[2] the founder of Chinese Soto school, he said, "Don't try to see yourself," maybe, "objectively." Maybe we can say scientific way. He didn't say so, but, "Don't try to see something which was given to you,"

you know. In other words, don't try to see, you know, some information about you which is given to you by some objective truth. That is information.

He says real you is quite different from the information you will have. Real you is not that kind of thing. "I go by myself my own way," he says [laughs]. "I go by myself in my own way. Wherever I see, I meet with myself. Wherever I go, I meet myself." When you [laughs]- So, you know, he reject that kind of effort to try to be, try to cling to the information about yourself. But you should, he says, but you should go, you know, alone with your legs. Or you should, you know, in other word, you should practice our way, you know, with people. Whatever people may say [laughs], you should go your way, and you should practice with people.

This is, you know, another point. "With people" is another point. It means to meet yourself is to practice with people. To meet yourself. When you- You will see yourself- Someone's practice, you know, if you see someone practicing hard, you will see yourself. You say, you know, if you are impressed by someone's practice, "Oh, she is doing very well," you know. That "she" is not she or you. Something more than that. "Oh, she is doing very well," you know [laughs]. What is "she"? After thinking, you know, for a while, "Oh, she is there [laughs], I am here." But when you, you know, struck, when you are impressed by her practice, you know, that "her" is not you or she. When you see it, when you're struck by it, that is actually real you [laughs]. "You" is, you know- Tentatively I say "you," but it is- That "you" is pure experience of our practice. As long as you are trying to, you know, improve yourself [laughs], you know, having some core of idea of self, you know, trying to improve yourself, that is wrong practice. That is not practice we mean.

When you, you know, empty your mind, you know, when you give up everything and just practice zazen with your open mind, whatever you see, that is to meet yourself. There there is "you," you know, you which is beyond she or he or me. So as long as you are cling to the idea of self and trying to improve your practice, trying to, you know, to find out something, or to see, you know, improved self, better self, or to find better practice, then your practice, you know, is in [has gone] astray. You have no time to, you know, to reach the goal, so eventually you will be tired out, or and you will say, "Zen is no good. [Laughs.] I practiced zazen for ten years, but I didn't [laughs] gain anything!" [Laughs, laughter.] But if you just come here and sit with sincere student and find yourself among them, and, you know, then that is, if you continue in that way, our practice. That is our practice. And this kind of experience could be everywhere. As Tozan said, "Wherever I go, I meet with myself." If he see water, that is he himself. Even though he cannot see himself in the water, you know, to see water is enough for him.

I think it's a, it- I don't want to, you know, criticize someone's religion, Christianity or anything, but if you do not understand the nature of the religion, you know, you believe in, you will be lost. Even though you are a very good Christian, you say you are a very good Christian, or-even though people say you are good Christian, but, you know, you will be lost if you don't understand how to be a good Christian. Teaching is good, but when you don't understand the real teaching, you will be lost. So actually for a Christian, you know, if you go to church and do this or [laughs] you don't do this [probably making a gesture] [laughs, laughter]. I don't know this way or that way or [laughter]- That is enough [laughs], you know. There is, you know, complete liberation. You are saved at that time. Because you, you know, pray for [to] God for something, you know [laughs], you cannot save yourself. Actually, you know, when you are already saved, you know, you say, you know, you pray for His help [laughs]. That is why, you know, you cannot be a good Christian.

So how you understand yourself is not to understand yourself objectively or try to cling to the information, you know, from various source. If people say you are crazy-"Okay, I am crazy." [Laughs.] If people say you are bad student, "Okay, I am-maybe so I am bad student, but I am trying, you know, pretty hard." That is enough, you know. In this way, when you, you know, continue or when you sit in that way, accepting, you know, yourself and accepting everything with yourself, when you are involved in various, you know, silly problem, you should sit with the problem you have. You know, that is you, you know, at that time. When you try to get out of it, out of them, you know, that is already wrong practice. If you cling to, you know, some idea created by you, like self or some objective world, you will be lost in objective world which you created by your mind. So you are creating one after another [laughs], so there is no end. There maybe there many kinds of world, and, you know, you are creating. To create it may be very interesting- To see many things is very interesting, but you should not be lost in it.

Another side of, you know, our practice is we, you know, we try to think and we try to act. We do not try to, you know, to be like a stone, you know. We- For us, our everyday life is our practice. Instead of being enslaved by thinking mind or imagination or emotional activity, we just, you know, think, in its true sense. Thinking mind, thinking activity, comes out, you know, from true self, which include everything.

Before we think in our practice, trees, and birds, and everything is thinking, you know. And when they think, they grow their [they?] sing, you know. That is their thinking. There is no need for us to think, you know [laughs], more than that. You know, if you see things as it is, that is thinking. Already we are thinking. This kind of pure thinking is the thinking mind we have in our practice, so we have always freedom from ourselves too. And we can see things as it is. At the same time, we can think about things.

For us there is no truth or no falsehood because we have no particular, you know, standard for our thinking, standard to which we cling to. [The preceding sentence was finished by Suzuki-roshi, but the rest of the lecture was not recorded on tape. A handwritten note was enclosed with the original tape containing a summary of the missing conclusion: Before you ask for dokusan with me, start your own practice. Stand on your own feet. Then I can help you. If you want to find out about yourself, maybe better to go to someone else. They will tell you many interesting things.]

---

---

Source: City Center transcript plus handwritten note enclosed with original tape. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Verbatim transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican 9/8/99.

[1] One of the Japanese-American members of the Soko-ji congregation. The Hagiwara family were, before WWII, caretakers of the Japanese Tea Garden in San Francisco. George's father was said to have been appointed by Emperor Meiji.

[2] Tozan Ryokai (Chin. Dongshan Liangjie or Tung-shan Liang-chieh, 807-869): Chan master of the Tang period.

1971 februari (9)

1 - Sesshin Lecture #1

Friday, February 05, 1971

Sesshin Lecture #1
San Francisco

Purpose of sesshin is to be completely one with our practice. That is purpose of sesshin. Sesshin. Sesshin means- We use two Chinese characters for setsu. Setsu means to treat or, you know, like you treat your guests or like a teacher [student?] treat his teacher, is setsu. Another setsu is "to control" or "to arrange things in order." Anyway, it means to have proper function of mind.

When we say "control," something which is controlled is our five senses and will, or mind, Small Mind, Monkey Mind which should be controlled. And if-why we control our mind is to resume to our true Big Mind. When Monkey Mind is always take over big activity of Big Mind, you know, we naturally become a monkey [laughs]. So Monkey Mind must have his boss, which is Big Mind.

And when we say "Big Mind," then while we practice zazen, it is the Big Mind controlling the Small Mind. It is not so, you know, but only when Small Mind become calm, the Big Mind, you know, start to start its true activity. So in our everyday life, almost all the time, we are involved in activity of Small Mind. That is why we should practice zazen and we should be completely involved in this kind of practice.

Good example of our practice is, you know, a turtle, you know, which has four legs, you know, and head and tail-and six, you know, six parts of his body is sometime outside of the shell, sometime inside [laughs]. We must have that kind of, you know, activity. Sometime, you know, our head and tail and legs should be out [laughs], or else you cannot eat or anything. You cannot walk. So when you want to eat or go out [laughs, laughter], four legs should be out. [Laughs.] But if it is always out, you will be caught by something [laughs]. So, you know, in case of danger, you know, you should [laughs] draw up all the legs and head and tail. This is sesshin [laughs, laughter]. For, you know, one week our [laughs] head and tail and legs should be inside of the shell. Then, you know, no one can catch you [laughter, laughs]. In scripture said even demon or devil cannot destroy you if you, you know, are inside of the shell-if your six parts of your body inside of-actually, six means five senses and, you know, mind.

But in zazen we do not try to stop thinking, you know, or we do not try to listen or hear or see anything. But we, you know-if something appears in your mind, leave it, you know. And if you hear something, you should hear it, and you should just accept it, you know. "Oh [laughs], that's all." No second activity appears in your zazen-should not appear. Sound-that is one activity. Second one is, "What is the sound? Is a motor car or, you know, or garbage car, or something?" you know. That is second notion, second activity. If you hear it, that's all, you know. You hear. If you see, that's all. You have no-you don't make any judgement. You do not figure out what it is. Just open your eyes and see something. Maybe when you practice zazen, you may, you know, try to make some sense by what you are watching, you know. What, or "It looks like river" [laughs]. "It looks like dragon" [laughs]. While you are thinking, you should not do so, you know [laughs]. When you are sitting pretty long time, you know, watching same place [laughs, laughter], it may look like, you know, various things [laughs, laughter]. It may be good idea, you know, to kill time [laughs], but it is not sesshin.

It may be good idea to be concentrated on something, you know, but to have good-concentrated mind is not zazen, you know. It is not zazen. Of course, it is one of the many elements of the practice, but calmness of mind is necessary, and you shouldn't intensify five sense organs' activity. You should just leave your sense organs as they are. That is how you free your true mind, or how you open your true mind. Only when you can do so in everyday life you will have soft mind. You don't have not much preconceived idea. Some bad habit of your way of thinking will not appear so strongly. It will appear, but it will not appear so strongly. And you will have generous mind and Big Mind, and what you will say will help others.

I think you have Zuimonki. If you read Zuimonki,[1] you will understand why we practice zazen. One night, he [Dogen] talked to his students and said, "This story is-the story I was told by someone, so I am not sure if that is correct or not." But he said some influential person, Ichijo Motoie, you know, maybe his-he may not be his direct relative but was one of the many relative. One day his sword was stolen, you know, and they knew that no one else couldn't broke into, so they thought some of his men must have stolen it. So naturally they tried to find out, and the sword was found and took back to him. But Motoie said, "This is not my sword [laughs], this isn't-so give it back to someone who own it. This is not mine," he said. But most of the people knew that that man who had it had stolen that sword, but because he said he did not accuse of it, so no one couldn't say anything. So, you know [laughs], nothing happened [laughs, laughter]. That kind of, you know, calmness of mind is the mind we should have, he says.

And he emphasize, you know, life of bare life, you know. Hardly support him to live-something poor, you know-a bare life. Without expecting anything, just practice our way. But many student asked him why that is possible, you know, without any plan-just to live and just to practice zazen, how is it possible to support his temple or his group? But he said, "When it is difficult to support our temple, we will think about it. But [laughs] until then, it is not necessary to think about it." [Laughs, laughter.]

So before something happens, to think about it too much is not our way. If we have generous Big Mind and if we have strong spirit of practice, then, you know, there is no need to worry about anything. That is the way how we have complete calmness of your mind. Because you have something, you should worry about it, but if you don't, there is no need to worry about losing it.

One night he said, "Even some teaching you think it is complete and right teaching, even though you think so, there may be someone who tell you better way. Then, you know, you should change your understanding of the teaching." In this way, we should improve our understanding of the teaching forever. That is our way. So even something you think which is completely right, you know, you shouldn't stick to it. It is right at that time, so because you think so, you followed the theory or rules, but you have some, you know, space in your mind to change the idea. That is soft mind [laughs].

Why, you know, is it possible for you to change your idea, you know, is because you know what kind of monkey is thinking [laughs, laughter]. So sometime he may follow monkey's suggestion-"Oh yeah [laughs, laughter], that's right [laughs]. If we go that direction, we may have some food. Okay, let's go!" [Laughs, laughter.] But if there is something better [laughs], he may say, "Oh monkey, maybe better to go this way!" [Laughs, laughter.] Because he is naturally he is a monkey, he may follow, you know. But if you stick to, you know, your greed or anger or some vulgar, you know, emotional mind, stick to the thinking mind, monkey mind, he cannot change his former notion.

So in our practice, we should rely on something great. So in that great area we should, you know, sit. The pain you have in your legs or some difficulty you have when you are sitting is something happened-something happened-something may happen in the great area. But as long as you do not lose the feeling that you are in the area of buddha-nature, you can sit, you know, even though you have some difficulties. But when you want to escape from it, or when you try to improve your practice or improve your being in that big area, that is-it means you created another problem for your being. But if you just exist there, then you will have chance to appreciate something which surround yourself, and you can accept yourself completely, without changing anything. That is our practice.

So it is a kind of belief or faith which is, of course, different from usual faith to believe in some concrete idea or being. But believing something which is supporting us and supporting all our activities-thinking mind or emotional feeling. All those things are actually supported by something big which has no form or color. Which is impossible to know what it is, but something exist there, not in the sense of material or spiritual, but something not material or not spiritual. We say "spiritual or material," but it is something more than that. Something like that always exist, and we exist in that area. When you feel in that way, that is right pure thinking. You feel in that way, that is pure feeling of being. Every activity should start from this, you know, kind of feeling.

When I was young, you know, many Zen masters says, "What is Buddha? Buddha is something which make bamboo bamboo [laughs], which make bamboo long [laughs], which make stone round." That is [laughs] buddha-nature, they said. I couldn't understand [laughs] because I wanted to figure out what it is, you know [laughs], and I didn't feel so good if I cannot, you know, figure out what it is in usual sense: big or small, right or wrong, good or bad. But if you practice zazen, and, on the other hand, if you realize how foolish we are, you know, if you see yourself like animals in the zoo [laughs, laughter], then you will understand who you are. Each time I go to the zoo, you know, I think, you know, animals may be very much interested of human being, or American people who is black, white [laughs], yellow, and many Americans, you know. I am [laughs] American too, you know. "Oh, he is also American! [Laughs, laughter.] How strange American he is!" [Laughs.] They may, you know, enjoy us, you know. Animals in San Francisco Zoo is very lucky, you know. [Finished sentence. Tape change.] If they are in Japan, you know, they always may see small [laughs, laughter] human being-small and short leg [laughs, laughter]. Not so interesting at all [laughs, laughter].

I don't say you should fool yourself, you know. It is exactly so [laughs]. But usually you say, "I am an American [laughs]," or, "I am a human being. So it is alright for us to kill animals, to eat animal." But that is not right. Maybe we have to eat, but, you know, it is not right. But while you are repeating the same thing, you know, you use, you know, you begin to think in that way. So you lose your pure thinking, pure observation of yourself.

If you practice zazen, if you are brave enough to throw yourself on the floor, you know [laughs], for seven days [laughs], you may be a little bit better-not too much, but [laughs, laughter] but that little bit is very important, you know. That little bit understanding will help your rigidity, you know, your stubbornness. Almost all the problems we create because of our stubborn mind will be vanish.

But actually, zazen help us not so much, you know, not so much. But if you know how to help yourself, you know, and if you know how valuable it is, if you have even smallest, you know, understanding of the reality, your, you know, way of thinking will completely change, and the problem you create will not be problem anymore. But as long as we live we have problem. And that is also true [laughs]. So you shouldn't think-you shouldn't practice zazen to, you know, attain some big enlightenment which will change your whole being [laughs]. That is not right understanding. That maybe so-called-it, you know, "Zen," you know, but true Zen is not like that.

Zen does not include all the teaching of Buddhism, but Zen-this kind of understanding will save various labor of studying so many scriptures. If you understand little bit of this, you know, if you read scriptures, it will make sense. You don't have to, you know, seek some truth in the scriptures we have. We even try to read all the scriptures. It maybe whole life job to read our scripture once, but if you don't know the point, you know, you have to, you know, seek for the truth in the scripture. If you know this point, all the scripture you will read will help you, will be a good nourishment for us.

In this sesshin, I think we will be concentrated to have experience or to have real experience of true practice. Forgetting all about gaining idea, we should just sit here. If this room is too cold, we will make it warm, and if your legs become painful, you can stretch your legs. And if it is too difficult, you know, you can rest, but we should continue our practice for seven days.

Thank you very much.

["For this seven-day sesshin, there are only transcriptions for lectures given on Days 1, 3, 5, 7, and the closing words. I don't know if those were the only lectures given, or the only ones recorded, or the only ones transcribed." -Brian Fikes.

One of the lectures on Day 2 of the sesshin, and maybe others, was given by Ryogen Yoshimura. -Bill Redican, May 2000.]

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Verbatim transcript (checked against tape) by Bill Redican 5/22/00.

[1] Book 4, No. 16.

2 - Sesshin Lecture #3

Sunday, February 07, 1971

Sesshin Lecture #3
San Francisco

This morning I said you must find yourself in each being. That is actually what Tozan [Ryokai]-zenji said: Don't try to seek yourself. Don't try to figure out who is you. "You" found out in that way is far away from real you. He is not anymore you. But if I go my own way, wherever I go, I see myself. You know, if you, you know, take your own step, it means bodhisattva way. Wherever you go, you will see yourself. You will meet with yourself. And, he says, the image you see in the water when you want to figure out who is you is not you, but actually just what you see in the water is you yourself.

In Sandokai we have same statements: You are not him, and he is you, you know [laughs]. It is paradoxical, you know. It is to catch your mind, they use some paradoxical, you know, statement like this. You are not him, but he is you. It means that when you try to figure out who is you, even though you see yourself in the mirror, he is not you. But if you just see your, you know, figure in the mirror, without any idea of, you know, trying to figure out what is you- Why it is not you when you figure out who is you [laughs] is, you know [laughs], because of your self-centered mind, you know, limited mind, you cannot see.

A self-centered, you know, practice doesn't work [laughs]. You know, if you try to attain enlightenment, or if you want to be some great Zen master, you cannot be actually great Zen master. When you don't try to be so, you know, or before you try to do so, or before you practice our way, you are buddha. But because of your limited practice, self-centered practice, even though you practice your way, you cannot have real practice. You will miss, you know, yourself, lose yourself in small, self-centered practice.

And this morning I told you first of all, anyway, you should try to help others. But when I say so, there may be some misunderstanding. You will have misunderstanding. Whatever you do, that is [laughs], you know, our practice. The misunderstanding is, you know, comes from also selfish practice, or practice of gaining idea-limited practice.

But it is, you know [laughs], pretty hard to practice our way without any, you know, expectation, without any gaining idea. It is actually very difficult. So that is why we have various rules, you know, in zendo. Because of those rules, you know, just to follow the rules, just you follow the rule without any idea of self, you know. Or giving up your idea of self, you can practice, you know, real practice which is not based on self-centered idea. Unless you give up your self-centered practice, idea of self-centered practice, you cannot follow your pract-[partial word: "practice"?] [laughs] [our] rules, you know. So rules will help you to give up your self-centered practice which wouldn't work, but rather encourage you to practice real practice. So rules will help you to have good practice.

In Lotus Sutra, you know, we have one chapter, you know, in which Buddha is talking about our rules. Why we observe our practice is just to help ourselves to keep our practice and make us easy to help ourselves. It is the practice, you know, easy practice, you know. You may think to follow rigid rules is difficult practice. Someone said, you know, "Oh, I wish I hadn't start this, you know, kind of difficult religion [laughs] like Zen [laughs]." Maybe we feel in that way. Our small mind will feel in that way. But if you know what is real practice, you know, then various precepts and rules of Buddhist way will help us, you know. And we find it easy to follow bodhisattva way because of the rules set up by Buddha.

[Nyogen] Senzaki. Do you know Senzaki-roshi? Perhaps you may know him. And he said, and in his last word, "Don't put head upon [laughs] your own head [laughs]." "Don't put head upon your own head." Because you, you know, put, you know, another [laughs] head upon your head, you are involved in foolish, self-centered practice. Even though it is Buddha's head, you shouldn't put [laughs] upon your head. It is better to have only one head [laughs, laughter].

So, you know, try to attain enlightenment is, you know, try to put another head on your own head [laughs]. You cannot move so easily [laughs, laughter]. We are not trying to put anything on our head. We just, you know, try to experience who am I, what is our own head-that's all. How you, you know, find out your head is our practice. Again, "to find out" does not mean, you know, to find out some head [laughs] upon your head, to find out your head which is thinking. How is it possible to, you know, think about your thinking mind? You know, how is it possible to see your own eyes? That is not possible. But there is only one way for us, you know, which makes us possible to realize what is my own head. If you knock it [laughs], you may feel it. "This is," you know, "my head." In other word, to put some limitation, you know, to put my head under some limitation is how we realize our own head.

By the way, a famous Zen master in China, Echu-kokushi[1] (Nanyo Echu), [2] who is one of the disciple of the Sixth Patriarch- He was a very good Zen master. But he had not much, you know, descendant of himself, so we don't know him so well. But he himself was a great Zen master. When he was dying, Emperor[3] asked his jisha, you know, what kind of a tombstone should we make for him after something, you know, happened to him. But Echu-kokushi told the Emperor's messenger that, "Ask my student. Ask my disciple." [4] And they made a tombstone for him, and about that tombstone they had a kind of discussion. And one of the students said, "It is as big as this country. This tombstone covers all the state south of Lake Hsiang and north of Lake T'an is included in his tombstone." Another student said [laughs], you know, "No. It will include whole world."

But I would rather say, you know, as his teacher Nanyo Echu said when he was asked, "Any stone will be good," you know, "good enough." Even a small stone can be good enough for me." You know, which do you [laughs] like, whole world or small stone? I rather prefer, you know, a small stone, you know, which we can carry or move, you know. If you know what is the small stone, you know, that is you yourself, which will cover everything. But if you think, you know, big whole universe is yourself, you will be lost [laughs]. You have- It doesn't make any sense.

You need, you know, one small room for yourself. That is very true. And when you find yourself really in the small room, as one of your room, then there is you yourself, and whole universe is there. And whole universe makes sense to you, you know. Without your room, whole universe doesn't make any sense. So what you need now is the small room, and what you will need after your death is a small stone, maybe. That is very true. That is actual reality, which is always true with everyone.

So don't talk about whole universe or some mysterious experience, but to find yourself in the small room or in the rigid practice of Zen. "You shouldn't go that way" [laughs]. You should go [laughs] this way. You should cross your legs this way." Under this kind of limitation, you will find yourself. Real self is there, you know. But because you say, you know, because you discuss whether this room is good or bad, big or small, you know, you lose your real room. Before you discuss, before you are caught by, you know, discrimination or thinking mind, you own your room.

So if you find a true joy under some, you know, limitation, and that is only way to, you know, realize whole universe. There is no other way for us to get approach to the whole universe. When you exist right here, you know, whole universe makes sense to you. Before you think about it, it is important to give up your, you know, foolish discrimination or foolish idea of freedom or, you know-

In this way, we must practice our way, you know. Why you practice zazen is to be filled with real spirit of bodhisattva and real feeling of your being, which transcend our thinking mind or emotional activity. So as long as you are, you know, you don't give up your thinking mind, it is not possible to, you know, to make your enlightenment happen to you. That experience may happen in various way. You say, "big enlightenment" or "small enlightenment" [laughs], but, you know, actually there is no small enlightenment or no big enlightenment.

After your death, do you need big stone or small stone [laughs]? It doesn't make much sense. Anyway, you need something, you know, that's all. You need something. And better to have smaller ones, you know, better to have very narrow rigid [laughs] practice, you know. It is easier for you to follow. If it is, you know- If the rules is provided in big scale, you may feel very good to see it [laughs], but you will find a great difficulty, you know, how to follow that kind of complicated big-scaled rules.

The rules must be very simple. Simpler the better, and stricter the better. Actually it is so, but if we make it too strict, you know, what will happen will be, you know, you will rely on or and you will just goof off, you know [laughs]. Strict rules [laughs]. It is easy to follow strict rules, you know. If you do exactly what your teacher says, that's all [laughs]. It works, but, you know, but on the other hand, you don't make much effort. So, you know, should not be too big or should not be too small, as [Ekai] Hyakujo-zenji[5] said, "Thinking about various rules which previous patriarchs and Zen teachers followed, you know, we-I made this," you know, "rule." Comparing various rules we had, he set up some rules, some appropriate good-sized rules for us. That is how Zen rules was originated. And since then, we are trying to improve his rules according to the circumstances under which we practice our way.

You have no danger in our Zen practice to be involved in small-minded practice. And you can trust our rules, because our rules is after improvement of many great Zen masters we have now here. Of course, I think we should improve or we should have more appropriate rules for us, but point is, you know, the spirit to follow or understanding why we must follow our way and we must have some rules in our practice. [Finished sentence. Tape turned over.]

By now, you know, after many centuries since we are completely involved in scientific world, we should, you know, be free from thinking mind, you know. We come to the point where we should find out real self, you know, giving up superficial self of universal self, which you can, you know, which you can replace for someone's self [laughs], you know. We have enjoyed, you know, some universal, you know, some medicine which is for everyone [laughs]. It will not help you so much if some medicine is for everyone, you know. Do you, you know, trust some medicine for everyone? Medicine should be just for yourself, you know [laughs]. It may be better than nothing, but each one must have his own medicine.

Buddha, you know, prescribed the medicine for patient according to the person. That is real medicine. But scientific mind create, you know, some medicine for everyone, you know, to sell [laughs], you know, as much as possible [laughs, laughter]. "This medicine is for everyone." Then everyone will buy it. But that kind of medicine cannot help people so well. Sometime it may be poisonous for someone, you know.

Scientific mind can provide something universal, but not for special person. Scientific mind will deprive [derive?], you know, some specialty, you know, from each one, from each being, and they understand people in summary [some way?], picking up some similarity and prescribe medicine for that universal, you know, similarity of many people.

But right now, we should, you know, we should have our own mind instead of putting another big universal self on our head. It is useless, you know. Not useless, but sometime when it is rain, it will help [laughs] to protect you, but in such a place like California, you know, it is useless [laughs, laughter]. We don't need umbrella so much here [laughs]. The more you universalize something, you know, you lose the point of life. If you see something through telescope [laughs], you know, you may see many things, but it is better to see them by your own naked eye. That is our way, without using something which will help you to universalize things.

It is better to stick to one thing rather than to, you know, to be, to try to understand many things. It is better to appreciate something one by one, rather than, you know, to put everything in your pocket [laughs]. You will not see it, you know [laughs]. It's better to pick one flower after another and see it. This is better. This is our way. We put emphasis on validity rather than, you know, universality, you know. Direct, you know, effect on each one of us-that is our practice.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican 7/31/00.

[1] The honorific title -kokushi (Jap.) means "teacher of the nation" or "master of the country," a title bestowed on the teacher of a Japanese emperor; the Japanese equivalent of the Chinese "Kuo-shih." Also "-guoshi" (Jap.).

[2] Nanyang Huizhong (675-775): early Chinese Ch'an master; student of Huineng, the Sixth Patriarch. He was Court Chan Master for Emperor Suzong and his successor Emperor Daizong. Also known as Chu-kokushi (Jap.).

[3] Emperor Suzong (Su-tsung).

[4] His disciple was Tan Yuan: See The Blue Cliff Record, Case 18.

[5] Baizhang Huaihai (Hyakujo Ekai): 720-814. Chan master. Dharma heir of Mazu Daoyi. Author of Hyakujo Shingi, a set of rules for Zen monastics.

3 - Sesshin Lecture #5

Tuesday, February 09, 1971

Sesshin Lecture #5
San Francisco

I think, as Yoshimura-sensei[1] told you the other night, Zen masters has some humorous [laughs], you know, element in their life. And, you know, even after death [laughs], or even more, we, you know, know how humorous [laughs] they were if you know them. Humor is, you know- Only when he has real, you know-he has some understanding more than real, you know, then he could be humorous, you know. So humor is more real than [laughs] reality, you know. Reality is not so real. But if you see [laughs, laughter] comic, you know, you know, that is more real than [laughs] usual pictures, you know.

So I think because they have something real, you know, so at the same time they can be always humorous, you know. When they say, you know, something usual, you know, not [laughs]- The way they say, or in his mind, you know, he is always expressing it in some [way] as if he is drawing some comic, you know [laughs]. But for us, for him, maybe, it is comic, but for us it is very real and serious thing.

When I was young, or when I was at Eihei-ji, Kumazawa-zenji,[2] you know, Kumazawa-zenji-at that time he was kannin.[3] In sesshin he gave us a talk when we are tired out [laughs]. It was third day or fourth day. And he started to talk about something, and he said, "Suzume-a sparrow," you know, "sparrow has broken a tori'i." Do you know tori'i? Shrine gate, you know, like this [gestures]. A sparrow [laughs] broke [laughs, laughter] tori'i made of stone [laughs, laughter]. And he started to explain how a sparrow did it [laughs]. But, in Japanese, you know, "Kosuzumega." [4] I still remember: "Kosuzumega ishi no tori'i o fumiotta." [5] And he said, "Do you understand?" [Laughs, laughter.] And he repeated several times, but no one laughed, you know [laughs, laughter], because he was so serious. But "fumioru" sometime means "funderu." [6] It is, you know, "stepping on the stone," that is "fumioru-fumioru-funderu," you know. It's "stepping-stepping" you know, "on the stone," and at the same time it mean "to break" [laughs]. How is it possible [laughs] for a sparrow to break a stone gate?

But we thought, "That is Zen story." [Laughs, laughter.] What he means must be something deep, you know [laughs, laughter]. But he was just joking [laughs, laughter] with a serious, you know, manner like this. He was like this. [Gestures?] As he, you know, is trained very well by zazen practice, he is always serious, but he is always, you know, humorous at the same time. Not just serious, but some element of, you know, happiness or joy is in it. He is always relaxed. And, you know, maybe- Recently I found out that it was a joke, you know [laughs, laughter], but not many people, I think, know that was joke [laughs, laughter]. Quite recently. We didn't talk about, you know, that story anymore.

As we were young, we did not like so ridiculous, you know, stories [laughs, laughter]. Fooling, you know, around serious students, you know. "Oh no! He is fooling us." [Laughs.] We didn't like at all. So we didn't talk about it any more. But quite recently, you know, "Oh!" [Laughs, laughter.] "He was fooling us when we are practicing seriously." [Laughs, delayed laughter.]

When he was dying, you know, do you know what he did [laughs, laughter]? For maybe ninety-six years he was fooling us [laughs]. You know, when he was almost dying, he stretched his arm for the, you know, water pitcher (what do you say? "pitcher"), and the jisha gave him the pitcher. And he swallowed the pitcher and said,

"KAAA!" [7] [very loudly]. And he [laughs, laughter] was no more. He vanished from this world. [Laughter.]

No [laughter continues]. It is terrible [laughs, laughter], you know. And, you know, newspaper [laughs, laughter] reporters including, you know, famous Zen masters, you know, admired his [laughs] death, you know, but I think maybe he was fooling us [laughs, laughter]. You know, that was what he is doing, you know.

When he visited my hometown when I was in Japan five years ago, I, you know, tried to persuade him to come to America. And he asked, you know, about America, for pretty long time [laughs]. He make various questions about America. And he looks like, you know, he agreed. But after, you know, explaining maybe long long time, you know, he said, "Oh, that will be a good job for Takashina-roshi.[8] [Laughs, laughter.] "Not for me." [Laughs, laughter.] "Maybe Takashina-roshi." He is always, you know, like that.

When, you know, the old old lady in Yaizu offered, you know, natsu [9] melon (or what do you call?) melon, you know, very sweet and very expensive. She brought it to him. And he was watching it, you know. I was with her. "Oh, very good, very good, but I don't like it." [Laughs, laughter.] "I would rather give it to my students," he said. And he clapped his hand [laughs; Suzuki-roshi clapped hands twice] and [said], "Take it to your room!" [Laughs, laughter.] In front of her. But when he does it so, you know, so nice, so she couldn't be angry with him, you know [laughs].

So I don't know. It is pretty difficult to know what kind of, you know, mind he has [laughs, laughter]. He is always same, but what he does is always something different [laughs]. So I knew him pretty well, but recently, you know, I find out many things about him-not new things, but something I find out, you know, what he was doing little by little. I think that is real comedy, I think.

And at the same time, Yoshimura-sensei was talking about anti-Buddhism or anti-Buddha or non-Buddha, you know. I think that is, you know, exactly what he was doing [laughs, laughter]. What he did is something more than we can understand or we can see, you know. So even though does something, you know, that is-we cannot take it literally. So actually he isn't doing anything, you know. He is just moving his mouth, that's all [laughs, laughter]. The only way to know is [laughs]-I don't know how to understand him, but how to be like him is already known to us by Dogen-zenji, you know. How to be like him. Living with people, you know, and living in confusion, always, you know, outside of the confusion: That is, you know, core of practice maybe.

Oh by the way, I have new glasses. So I must use this you know. And I have something to read here [laughs, laughter] [unfolds page]. Oh this- [Laughs, laughter. Took out wrong piece of paper. Much laughter.] This is new one, yeah. Dogen-zenji said, you know [laughs, laughter]:

The Third Patriarch in China said, "The first principle," you know, "the supreme way," maybe, "is not difficult. If you are away from discrimination, if you stay away from discrimination, whatever you see, that is it." And hearing this statement of the Third Patriarch of China, many people may say every dharma or everything is not good or not bad by itself, in itself, and there is nothing which is right or which is wrong. So the only way is according to his nature. He should intuitively take his path. And some of the people may say you should not, you know, talk about the supreme way, but draw a circle or stand, stick, fist. Or knock the floor by staff. Or slap students by hands, or give [get] them to give big cry will be the way to express the supreme way.

But Dogen-zenji said here:

But those understanding is not right, or it is still the understanding of cave dwelling [laughs]. That's not-. Cave dwelling. They are, you know, dwelling in the cave [laughs]. And the saying is something like that.

And that is what Dogen says about the supreme way. But he says, you know, "What will be the supreme way?" In Bendowa,[10] he says:

Buddhas and Patriarchs appears because of this supreme way, and he does not observe anything but supreme way. If there is a chance for the dharma, dharma will appear. If there is no chance for the dharma to appear, dharma will not appear.

That is, you know, what he says. Oh [laughs]. Ah, you know.

But he says, "Supreme way is like a big konjicho"[11] I don't know Sanskrit name for it: big bird which will cover whole world by his wing. If he give one beat over the water, the water, the tidal wave will, you know, arise, and bottom of the sea will expose, you know. And it is so big as the bottom of the sea exposed, he will see dragons. Some of them is alive and some of them already dead by big tidal wave. And he may see many fish already dead, but he pick up only dragons who is still alive [laughs]. And he may be the most, you know, discriminative animal [laughs] in the world [laughs]. Stong [laughs] and discriminative animal.

And that will be [laughs], Dogen-zenji says, that will be the good example of no discrimination [laughs]. But, you know, when Dogen-zenji says so, discrimination is strict discrimination, you know. When he says so, he changed the angle [?] already. Discrimination, you know- You have discrimination in the realm of thinking mind, you know, or imagination or feeling or emotional activity. You discriminate. You say right or wrong, good or bad, agreeable or disagreeable, or you like it or you don't like it. But how is it possible, you know, to reach the supreme way which is beyond discrimination is what Dogen-zenji is talking about.

Oh, by the way, why, you know- Shakyamuni Buddha didn't talk about self or talk about God or Buddha. Figuratively he talked about him, but he didn't point out anything as Buddha. Maybe, I think, you know, if, you know, as Yoshimura-sensei pointed out, if he [Buddha], you know, described something about a deity, you know, or absolute being or God, he may be a founder of another Hindu religion, you know [laughs]. That is very true [laughs]. But that was not the reason why he didn't talk about it [laughs, laughter]. I am not opposing to him [Yoshimura] at all, but, you know [laughs], because that was very interesting point. So I thought about it, you know, more [laughs, laughter].

You know, if some religion appears, you know, and some teaching was described or left by someone, you know, you may have various priest, you know, who will, you know, follow his teaching. And some, you know, priest can live [laughs] on it, you know, explaining or selling his teaching, you know. "This is very valuable teaching [laughs, laughter]. This is [laughs, laughter] supreme way. Why don't you come and listen to me?" [Laughs, laughter.] "And he will be such-and-such [laughs]. That is how to maintain, you know, our activity." So in that way many thing will appear which is not supreme way. Instead of supreme way, you know, we will have many secondary way, which should be rejected. And you must have noticed that he al-... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... by magic power, or foreseeing something, or you should not talk about astrology, you know. You should not be astrologist. With this kind of knowledge or power, you shouldn't fool people [laughs], you know. He [Buddha?] was so strict on this point, he did not allow any religion to be like that, including his own religion. So he didn't talk about anything-single word for the-I cannot say single word-maybe some time he-I don't know exactly, but he didn't anyway. He did talk about what it is, but, you know, what exist, you know, in what way, something exist beyond our world. He, I think, he is tired of this kind of, you know, religious activity at that time. So his, you know, his main point is to, you know, to establish something which is very pure, and very accurate, and very real. The way, you know, he talk about, similar [similes?] he use, or way he talked about is very mystic, but what he is talking about is exactly what we are doing, you know. Anything [nothing?] mysterious. If you know ourselves, you can understand what he was saying. And if you understand what he was saying, you will understand yourself more, you know. More real self will be found by reading his words or by listening to his words.

Dogen-zenji also, you know, when he says konjicho, you know, picks up only living dragon, he is talking about now about our practice. So his instruction about our practice is very accurate, very strict, you know [laughs]. More strict than, you know, more particular than this bird. He didn't, you know, he doesn't want anything if that is not real. He doesn't practice if it is not right practice. He practice only when he see it is right.

So what he says is not just usual, you know, way of paradoxical way of talking, you know, speaking about Zen. He has accurate point, and his whole effort is directed on our everyday practice. He doesn't ignore anything. So that is why we think we believe in his practice. If we follow him, you know, we can, you know, we will have that kind of, not power, but ability; or that kind of possibility is there only when we observe his way.

When I say "accurate," you know, there is no mysterious meaning in it. You can use your own judgment, you know. If you don't accept it, you know, if your thinking mind doesn't accept it, according to Dogen-zenji, there is no need to observe it. So everything we do should be explained fully, but that, you know, explanation is not good enough. And according to when you accept his teaching, by here, now, then, you should observe it by your body. Then, you know, your understanding is not so important when you start to practice, but before that, maybe, understanding is important.

Why I became interested in Buddhism is because Buddhist explains things very [laughs] well and accurate, and we cannot, you know, give any comment to it, you know. All the comment is already, you know, given to various teaching. Even though you think you, you know, think of some, you know, direct comment to it, you know, maybe, "This is good understanding of the teaching." You may think. But if you, you know, see some other book, someone already did it [laughs]. Almost nothing, you know, to find out, almost nothing to say. It is so, you know, accurate. And many various, you know, naughty students, you know, played, you know, big play [laughs], big fight about our scriptures.

So it is possible for us to make full use of our mind, but the point is, if you want to have supreme way, you know, it is not possible to have it by thinking. If you accept, you know, our teaching logically, by critical eyes, then you should start our practice provided by those strict teachers. So in one way, you know, non-discrimination is our way. On the other hand, when you do something, we must be very sincere. [Refolds and puts away paper.]

I think we are now, you know, making pretty good effort in Zen Center, but there are many danger, you know. Unless we have very strict eye on ourselves, we will lose our way, you know. Even though you can talk about Buddhism, you know, even though you have very very very, you know, deep logical understanding of it, but that is not enough.

So, you know, non-discrimination means to discriminate which can be discriminated. That is, you know, discrimination of discrimination [laughs] is true discrimination. And when you discriminate your discrimination, next thing you should do to have some practice of non-discrimination established by someone who is very discriminative [laughs].

So, you know, I think you can spend, you know, this life and next life, you know, if there is next life, or forever you should work on this [laughs, laughter]. Then something, you know- Anyway, we human being can survive on this big world, or else we will be lost. We will be lost, but nothing will happen [laughs, laughter]. But, you know, if that is okay, you know [laughs], it may be okay, but to say so is quite easy, but I don't think you can accept that. So as long as we live, we should work on this and protect ourselves from something wrong or something, some fake, you know. We should only follow something right, you know, something true, you know. That is our spirit and spirit of practice.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Translation of Japanese terms and research assistance by Shohaku Okumura-roshi. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (9/27/00).

[1] Ryogen Yoshimura, who came from Japan to San Francisco in 1969 to assist Suzuki-roshi (see Wind Bell, 1970, Vol. IX, No. 1, p. 30). He died at a young age after returning to Japan.

[2] Kumazawa Taizen (1873-1968). Later the 73rd abbot of Eihei-ji.

[3] Also kansu: Secretary of a Zen monastery; one of the six traditional operations officers (rokuchiji) of a Zen monastery (along with tsusu, secretary-general; fusu, accountant; ino, officer in charge of general affairs; tenzo, head of the kitchen; and shissui, officer of maintenance).

[4] Ko = "baby"; suzume = "sparrow"; ga indicates "sparrow" is the subject.

[5] Ishi = "stone"; no means the previous word, ishi, is possessive; tori'i = "shrine gate"; o means that the previous word, tori'i, is the direct object of fumiotta, "to break."

[6] Fumioru can mean either "to break" or "to step on." Funderu means only "to step on."

[7] Ka! may have been used as an exclamation similar to "Ha!" or "Ho!" [cf. Isshu Miura and Ruth Fuller Sasaki, Zen Dust, p. 82].

[8] Rosen Takashina (1870-1968): 71st abbot of Eihei-ji.

[9] Natsu = summer.

[10] "Discourse on the Practice of the Way," a fascicle in Dogen's Shobogenzo.

[11] Konjicho [also myojicho (Jap.) and garuda (Sanskrit)]: A "gold-winged bird"; originally, a mythological bird said to eat dragons; one of eight supernatural beings who protect Buddhism; an incarnation of a deity who saves people. [Hisao Inagaki, A Dictionary of Buddhist Terms, 4th edition, Kyoto: Nagata Bunshodo, 1992, p. 187.]

4 - Sesshin Lecture, 7th Day: Page Street Apples

Friday, February 12, 1971

Sesshin Lecture, 7th Day: Page Street Apples
San Francisco

This is the seventh day of the sesshin, and you came already too far. So you cannot, you know, give up [laughs, laughter]. So only way is to stay here. And I feel I had a very good crop [laughs]. You may feel you are not yet ripened. But even though you are still ripening, but if you stay in our storehouse anyway, it will be a good apples [laughs]-Page Street apples, ready to be served [laughs, laughter]. So I have nothing to worry [about], and I don't think you have any more worry about your practice.

Perhaps some of you started sesshin because you have too many things to solve, or some of you must have thought if you come and sit here, maybe your problem will be solved. But, you know, the problem which you-which is-any-whatever problem it may be, something which is given to you could be solved anyway because Buddha will not give you anything-any more than you can solve and you need. Whatever it is, whatever problem it may be, the problem you have is just enough problems [laughs, laughter] for you.

So I think you should trust him, you know, just enough-not too much. And, you know-and his-if it is not too much, Buddha is ready to give you some more problems [laughs, laughter] just to survive, you know, just to appreciate problems. Buddha is always giving you something, because if you have nothing to cope with, you know, it may be terrible life-as if you are, you know, it is like-problem without life [life without problems] is to sit in this zendo for seven days without doing anything.

But, you know, I think you have had many problems to cope with in this zendo, or maybe more problems than you had in the city. You think it is easy to solve problem in zendo than in the city, but actually it is not so. You will find out more problems which you have had. But why you didn't feel so is you are fooled by something, and because of that you couldn't find out the problems you had. And if you do not, you know, know what kind of problem you have, the result will be terrible, you know. Unexpected problem will appear, you know, but it is not something which you didn't have, you know. Nothing will happen-no problem will happen if you do not have, you know-originally if you do not have problems. Because you had problem, only result came out when you did not expect it. So it is better to, you know, find out problems earlier-as soon as possible.

But in our practice, there is no need-you don't have to worry what will happen to us, because Buddha will give you, you know, just enough problems. I think that is, you know, to-to sit-we Soto students sit, you know, facing to the wall-in other word, facing to Buddha with your back-face [laughs]-back-front face and back-face [laughs]-I don't know how to say-how to express it, you know. You-you sit, you know, like this. Buddha is there [behind you],[1] and [you are] trusting him, you know. If you make some mistake, Buddha may say [laughing], "turn over." It means that you are involved in some dualistic problem, you know. You have some problem in the-in sense of duality, you know. So Buddha says, you know, "turn over."

And you should listen to him, you know [laughs]. But usually, if you trust him completely, you know, there is no need to face the Buddha. This is the attitude of complete trust, you know. Your enemies or some problems, you know, will, you know, come through the back, not from the, you know, the front. So to expose your back to the Buddha means to express the complete trust with Buddha.

And even though you have problem which you-you don't need, which you feel you don't need, or too much-which you feel [are] too much [of a] problem-problems, but trusting him, you should sit with problems. And, at the same time, you should be ready to refuse it if it is too much. But this will not be necessary, you know. There will not be no need to refuse it, because more and more the problems you think [are] problem will change into something you need.

So you know that, "If I refuse problem, I may regret. So I must keep anyway I must keep this because I am not so sure if this is real problem or Buddha's help," you know. [Laughs.] "Maybe better to keep it." And you sit in this way, you know. "Okay. [Laughs.] Anyway, it will-we will understand what Buddha give-gave us." And Buddha may say, "If you really don't need it, any time I will accept it.[Laughs.] Give it back to me." But if Buddha say so, you may think, you know, "Oh, may be better [laughs, laughter] to keep it. There may be some meaning," you know, "in this problem. Oh, better to keep it." And you should sit. If you sit in this way, you will find various problems as a kind of valuable treasures which is indispensable for you and especially indispensable for Zen students.

So before you sit, before you accept yourself as you are, and before you-so-before you accept the problem you have, your position, you cannot sit in its true sense. But if you fix your mind, trusting him, and sit, then in it-there is no confusion or problems any more.

What you should do is to wait. Be patient enough and wait until the problem will make some sense to you, until you can appreciate your being here and your being-your position, whatever it is. That is how you practice zazen.

So if you only practice zazen, there is no need to expect Buddha to help you. Buddha is always helping you. But usually what we are doing is refusing Buddha's offer. For an instance, if you, you know, ask help-ask some special help from special person, you know, it means that you-you are refusing, you know, Buddha's offering and asking for some other things which is not here yet. So you are refusing him. You are refusing what you have already. And you are refusing to accept treasures you have.

You are like a pig, you know. When I was young, as my father was very poor, he raised many pigs. And if you give pigs a bucket of food, you know, if you are not there he will eat it. As long as you are there, he will not eat it, expecting me to give more food [laughs, laughter]. So you must be very careful. And you-if you put, you know, if you move, he will kick out the food from the bucket [laughs]. I think that is what you are doing, you know [laughs, laughter].

Just to cause more problem for you [laughs], you seek for something. But there is no need for you to seek for anything. You have plenty. And you have just enough problem. This is mysterious thing, you know-mystery of the life. We have just enough problem: not too much or not too little. So there is no need to ask something for anybody-there is no need to ask anyone's help if you are patient enough, if you are strong enough to accept it. But when you are not strong enough to accept you-accept problem, or strong enough to sit calmly and peacefully, trusting Buddha. Yeah, I said "trusting Buddha," you know [laughs]. I already give you the answer. Only way may be to trust Buddha, you know, to trust your being-why you are here, how you are here, you know. Because you are helped, and because the way you are helped is perfect, you exist here. If it is too much, you will die. If it is too little, you will die. You are, you know, receiving something, you know-as much as you need-just as much as you need. So only way is, you know, to trust him, or to trust your being here. That is, you know, spirit of Zen.

Zen master-you may think Zen master is-all the Zen master is very tough. [Thumps the ground and laughs.] It-he looks like very tough, you know, when you need him to be tough. [Thumps the ground and laughs.] But, you know, he is not tough-so tough. He is just tough enough for you, that's all! [Laughs, laughter.] Actually, you don't need your master if you really-if you know how to practice zazen.

It is already, you know, the last day. Perhaps if you have this kind of understanding, I think if you have problem still, you know, if you are blue apple yet [laughs]-blue or green apple-not blue [laughing, ongoing laughter]-after being red, you will be blue. That is [?] too late. Maybe better than green-to stay green. If you feel you are still, you know, green, but, you know-even though you feel you are still green, you want-maybe you want to continue this sesshin more, I think [laughs]. I am so sure about it.

Last day will be the day for-to-to have-to make our practice meaningful, you know. How to make our practice meaning[ful] will be the-will be our schedule. So I want you just to sit, you know, and to be ready to go to market [as ripe apples], for-to be ready to be served for Zen students.

That is all what I wanted to say this morning. So let's, you know, sit more and-to have full appreciation of our practice.

(12/13/00).

[1] Words in brackets from original transcript (not on tape).

5 - Sesshin Lecture, 7th Day: Closing Words

Friday, February 12, 1971

Sesshin Lecture, 7th Day: Closing Words

San Francisco

The Sixth Patriarch[1] said: "To dwell on emptiness and to keep calm mind is not zazen," he said. Or he said, you know: "Just to sit in squatting-sitting position is not Zen." But we say, you know, you-you have to just sit [laughs]. If you don't understand what is our practice and stick to those words, you will be confused. But if you understand what is real Zen, it is quite usual warning, you know-a kind of warning for us.

Now our sesshin is almost [at an] end. But-and some people, maybe, you know, go back to their home and participate or involved in previous everyday activities. But if you practice-if you have been practicing true zazen, you will not, you know-you may be happy to go back to your everyday life. You may be encouraged, you know, by our practice to-in going back to your everyday life. But if you feel, you know, if you feel hesitate [hesitant] to go back to your or-go back to your city life or everyday life, it means that, you know, you will still stick to zazen.

So that is why the Sixth Patriarch said: "If you," you know, "dwell on emptiness and stick to your practice, then that is not true zazen." When you practice zazen, moment after moment, you accept what you have now and what you have in that moment, and satisfying with everything you do, and you don't-you do not-you don't have any complaint because you just accept it, then that is zazen. Or even though you cannot do that, you know what you should do. Then sitting zazen will encourage you to do some other thing. Just as you accepted your painful legs, you accept difficult everyday life. Because city life may be more difficult than your zazen practice, so zazen practice will encourage you to have more difficulties.

If you understand in this way what is zazen, that is right understanding. If you have, especially in your seven-days practice, having some taste of real practice, without losing the taste of practice, and continue your busy activity, then that will be great encouragement. Even though you are [it is] difficult, and even though you are busy, you have always, you know, taste of calmness of your mind, not because you stick to it but because you enjoy it. There is some difference [between] "to stick to it" and "to enjoy it." When you enjoy it, you don't have to stick to it, you know [laughs, laughter]. So if you have real, you know, taste of our practice, you can enjoy it all the time, incessantly. Whatever you do, that taste is not something you have to stick to it, something you have to recall it. That is, you know, true enlightenment. But even though you think you attained enlightenment, you know, when you are busy, when you are some-in some difficulty, and you think you need, you know, to have that experience again [laughs], that is not real enlightenment because that enlightenment is something you have to stick to it [laughs]. But real enlightenment is always with you, and [there is] no need for you to stick to or for-there is no need even to think about it. It is always with you. So difficulty itself is enlightenment. Busy life itself is enlightened activity. That is true enlightenment.

But even though expect-you-even though you want to have this-have a taste of true practice, you know, it may be difficult to have it. Only way to have it is, you know, just to continue right practice according to-following the right instruction and right teacher. That is the only way. If you follow right schedule in your practice, you know, naturally or some day you may have a taste of it. Nowadays, you know, you make date [laughing], you know, young people are making date, but, you know, enlightenment is not something which you can meet by date.

But if you, you know, follow-if you organize your life, if you get up at some certain time and pick up bag lunch at certain time, and go out for the work, then if you have some girlfriend or boyfriend, you know, you will meet her, you know, without any date. There is no need for you [laughs, laughter] to make date. At some certain time, she will come to the corner. You will usually see her, you know. That is our way, you know. It is rather foolish to make phone call, you know [laughing, laughter]. It is, you know-it is troublesome, you know. And you sh-[partial word]-even though you meet her, if you meet her by date, you know, by telephone call, you know: "Hey! I am leaving now," if they-if she doesn't come to the corner, you know, you will be irritated. If you do not make any date, you know, and if she come at some certain time to the corner, you will be really happy. That is, you know, how you attain enlightenment [laughing, loud laughter]. It is not a laughing matter. I am talking about something real, you know. I think you will agree with me.

That is, you know, how not to stick to enlightenment. Not to make any date means not to expect enlightenment or stick to enlightenment. Being encouraged by enlightenment, by seeing her even though you don't say anything-you don't talk with her, just have a glance of her is enough. And all day long you will be happy [laughs]. But if you, you know, are demanding too much of her, then already it means that you stick to enlightenment.

That is what he-the Sixth Patriarch meant when you-when he said: "Just to," you know, "dwell on emptiness is not true practice." Originally he attained enlightenment by one famous statement: "Without dwelling on anything, you will have true mind." If you d- [partial word]-so it means that if you stick to something, you will lose your enlightenment. Even though you try hard, you know, in making an appointment or date, it doesn't work. If you attain enlightenment in that way, you know, it may not be-most of the time it may not be true enlightenment. The enlightenment you will have in that way is enlightenment which you will stick to, and which-and is not something which is always with you, which will always encourage you.

This point is very important. So even though we finish our sesshin, we should continue well-organized life and to-to have real enlightenment. When you practice hard according to the right instruction of your teacher, then that is how you have real enlightenment experience.

In this sesshin-this sesshin was very fruitful sesshin, and some of you already had a good taste of our practice. Even though you haven't real taste of practice, I think, you knew-you have understood how you practice zazen. So what you should do from now on is to continue our true practice.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (12/13/00).

[1] Dajian Hui-neng (Daikan Eno): 638-713.

6 - Calmness of Mind

Saturday, February 13, 1971

Calmness of Mind
San Francisco

Good morning.

We have been practicing sesshin, so I feel I didn't see some of you for a long, long time. We actually-"sesshin" means, you know, to, in one sense, to calm down, to have more calmness of mind in our activity and in our practice. But what does it mean, by "calmness of your mind." It's maybe pretty difficult for you to understand.

The calmness of mind is, you know, for instance, you may think if you seclude yourself in some remoted mountain or seclude yourself in zendo, you know, and practice without saying anything, without taking some good food or some food which will give you some pleasure or excitement [laughs], or without hearing someone's, you know, opinion, in this way you will have calmness of your mind. But that will help, but it is not the calmness of mind which we mean, because real-if, you know, that is calmness of mind, you will have worry to lose the calmness of your mind, you know. When you feel so, calmness of your mind is not already there. If you think-if you afraid of losing the-or being disturbed by someone, you know, that is not already calmness of your mind.

So real calmness of our mind is, you know, as I told you in sesshin time, to have, you know, oneness of the mind with your surrounding. That is real calmness of your mind. You are not, you know, you are- You are not him, but he is you, I said, you know, as Tozan-zenji- I referred to Tozan-zenji's words, you know. "You are not him," you know, when you say, "I am," you know, when you say, seeing yourself in the mirror when you say, "This is me," you know [laughs]. But that is not you, because that is not you in its true sense because you think, "This is," you know, "This I me. This is me." Dualistic.

But rather when you say, you know, "This is," you know, excuse me, "I am this," you know. When you say, "I am the image in the mirror," when you say so, "I"-strong idea of "I" is here. "Who is I? Who am I?" You know, you are always seeking who you are. "Maybe," you know, "someday I will understand who I am," and, "Oh, now I met with me. I am this one," you know, "this image in the mirror."

But this is, you know, "you" in dualistic sense: me and him-the image. But rather when you say, "This is me," you know, image comes first and "you" follows, you know. "This is me," you know. There is not much strong idea of "you." You are rather, you know, involved in something you see. At that time, you know, you are one to some extent, or, you know, sometime completely, sometime incompletely, but anyway not much idea of "you" is not included. So when you say, "This is me," you know, it is more like calmness of your mind in which you can see things.

This morning I brought some material for you to-[unfolds paper]. And I want to refer to Buddha's, you know, last words. And this is, you know-the translation, you know, goes-someone translated. But translation goes like this:

The Merit of Seclusion: Yea Brethren, if you desire quietude in action and joy, always avoid confusion and noise. Live alone in a quiet retreat. The man who lives in solitude is respectfully worshiped by Indra and all the gods.

And it goes more, but-Dogen-zenji's, you know, explanation to it goes like this: Calmness means, you know, and Dogen-zenji give the title to this part of Buddha's last word: How to Enjoy the Calmness. And-in Japanese or Chinese, jakujo. Jak means, you know (and this is my explanation), jak means "no sound" or "no voice," you know, "not much voice," you know [laughs], "very calm." And jo means-"jo" is-nowadays we use it in various way, but jo is also "calmness," but it is more "calmness of our mind," "inner calmness," but "inner calmness," but more positive and, you know, some function is there. You know, "to do something very carefully," you know, and "to do something with calmness of your mind," or "to do things precisely," "to say something precisely"-not too much or not too little [laughs], just, you know, just enough. This is what we mean by "jo."

So to enjoy the calmness means to do things, you know, in your surrounding which you are with careful mind, and to do things precisely and to do things thoroughly, without error. How you can do it is when you enjoy [laughs] the calmness of your mind, you know. So when you enjoy the calmness of your mind, that is zazen practice. In zazen practice [laughs] you should enjoy the calmness of your mind.

And you will have, of course, pain, but if you fix your mind to practice zazen, even though you have, you know, pain, you have joy of one to become one with pain, you know. To become one-you suffer with pain [laughs], with pain, but I don't say "with pain" [laughs] but "with pain" [laughs, laughter]. Do you understand me? With pain. Joy of pain [laughs, laughter]. "Oh no!" [Laughs, laughter.] You may say, "Oh no." But if you, you know, fix your mind, you know, to get married with pain [laughs], you will have joy of, you know, marriage with pain.

That is oneness of, you know, pain and you. And at that time you have no idea of pain, but rather pain is you, you know. Pain. What is in your practice is just pain [laughs], no more you! "Ahhh!" [Laughs, laughter.] Just pain. That is calmness of your mind. And when you feel in that way, you have calmness of your mind in pain. People may say, "He is struggling with [laughs] pain," but "with" is, you know, extra. When you are one with pain, you are not struggling with pain. You are struggling pain [laughs]. Always "with" is necessary. Struggling pain. Enjoying the pain. Pain is going on, you know. Pain may be very happy, you know [laughs], to go with you [laughs, laughter]. That is, you know, complete calmness of your mind.

So even though you are city, you know, it is possible to have calmness of your mind. But because you fight with the pain or voice from everywhere, you have no calmness of your mind. So that is how you seclude yourself from city. Physically and also mentally, you will be in city, but if you become completely- If you fix your mind to exist in city-"This is my zendo" [laughs]-when you do not try to escape from the city-"This is my zendo, I must practice zazen here," you know-then everyone will listen to you, even deity [deities, et seq.] in the heaven will listen to you. But as long as you are involved in the fight, "Oh, this is right. Oh, that is not right." And then even [though] you are in Zen Center, you know, you are in the confusion of city.

That is confused mind. Even in confusion you can have the calmness of your mind. Because you have calmness of your mind, you can see clearly, and you will find out how you can-how you solve the problem or how you dissolve the problem. When you see it, you know, the problems will be dissolved-or, I mean-problems will dissolve. It goes, you know, naturally in its way, and you are just one with it and with your calmness of your mind you are watching it. "Ohhh" [laughs]. "Okay." You may say, "Okay." You don't fight with it, but you see how it dissolve, or how it resume calmness where there is no problem.

To do so, what is necessary there is the practice-the big, you know, decision to practice zazen right here. Only when you have this confidence you will have absolute dignity. Not small dignity (your dignity or my dignity), but, like sutra says, "Even various deity in the heaven will listen to you, will admire you and respect you." That is not just, you know, talk, it is not just story. It happens in that way. And it has been happening in that way in our Buddhist history.

[Unfolds paper.] This is a translation of Buddha's last words-literal, literal translation:

This is why you should leave your own and other communities to live alone in the solitude, pondering the extinction of the origin of suffering.

Why we suffer, you know, how we suffer.

-pondering about the extinction of the origin of suffering. Those who rejoice in company have the pain of company, just as when many birds flocks upon a great tree, it is in danger. Attachment to the world drown one in suffering of mankind, just as an old elephant drowning in the mud cannot get himself out.

This is what is called "solitude." This is what is called "seclusion." But we should not take, you know, his word literally. We should, you know, know exactly what he meant.

As our group became larger and larger, you know, bigger and bigger, we tend to lose this point. When we were small group, you know, this kind of-there was not much danger of this kind. But right now, actually we have, I must confess [laughs], sometime I myself involved in the confusion [laughs, laughter]. But this point should be always remembered. And if the danger is greater, you know, I think our practice will become deeper and deeper. But if you [laughs] escape, not seclude, you know, try to escape from the confusion, the confusion will be bigger. You add one more confusion of escaping from it.

What you should do, you know, whether Zen Center is big or small, it is not problem. It is same thing, you know. If you have real practice here, even though we have many things to do, if you have real practice, it doesn't matter at all. But as we are very lazy [laughs], lazy animal [laughs], you know, if we have not much problem, we have not much spirit to practice zazen. But maybe to have-there is some advantage in our practice when we are big group. But on the other hand, we have some disadvantage, you know, of losing ourself in the problems we have. How not to be lost in our problem is our practice.

I feel, you know, I have a lot of things to say, you know, on this point, but, you know, the foundation of our spirit, our practice, is here: to come to attain calmness of your mind or to have spirit to be here always. Wherever you are, the place you are is your zendo. Whatever you are doing, that is your practice.

Maybe even so, it is better for us to share our, you know, problems. And under some limitation, it is better to practice our way because for a beginner it is easier. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.] [Whatever your position may be] [1] ... [if?] you practice this practice, you will be worshipped [laughs] by all the people and all the deities in the heaven too. [Laughs.] But don't laugh at me [laughs, laughter]. I am not [laughs], you know [laughs], I am not talking something, you know, mysterious. Why I say so is because I cannot say, you know, we are the highest being and we human being knows every corner of the universe, you know [laughs]. So there may be some deity who are watching us, and he may say, "Oh, you are great. You are practicing [laughs] real practice. I worship you." [Laughs, laughter.] I am sure, you know, they will also respect you.

That kind of thing, you know-every day, if you carefully, you know, watch, you know, Zen Center, that kind of thing every day happening, you know. But you ignore it, that's all. No. You should not, you know, you shouldn't be caught by, you know, your own, you know, observation. So maybe even though you cannot trust a deity in the heaven [laughs], you must have some room, you know, to have some deity in the heaven. Even though you do not acknowledge it completely, but you must have some room for everything to exist, and your practice should be extended whatever it is, you know, where something exist. That much confidence you must have in your, you know, everyday practice.

Thank you very much.

---

Sources: City Center transcript and handwritten notation on Side A label of the original cassette. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (11/16/00).

[1] Text in brackets is from a notation on the Side A label of the original tape.

7 - Buddha's Practice

Saturday, February 20, 1971

Buddha's Practice
Tassajara

Buddha's practice goes first. Our practice goes.

We say, "our practice," but it is actually Buddha's practice. We should know this point. This is the key point of our practice.

I don't know how many people want to practice zazen, but as long as their practice [is] involving personal practice, it is not true practice. If we practice selfish personal practice, it means that we are accumulating our karma more and more instead of releasing our previous karma.

Because of many bad choice--things you accumulated in previous life--you are right here and practicing under [Sotan Ryosen] Tatsugami-roshi. In spite of his difficult situation, Tatsugami-roshi is here.

Again, when Buddha's practice goes first, real practice will be ours.

The more you know what is practice, the greater your practice will become.

We must be very, very grateful to join this practice--day by day, moment after moment.

Sorry to disturb your practice.

Thank you.

---

Source: Original tape SR-71-02-20 transcribed by Bill Redican 9/12/99.

8 - Actual Feeling of True Practice

Tuesday, February 23, 1971

Actual Feeling of True Practice
Tassajara

It is more than six months [laughs] since- Is it working?

Student: Yes.

-since I came to Tassajara, and I was very much impressed, you know, of your practice at this time. And I am now thinking about, you know- not thinking about-but actual feeling I have now, you know, and some, you know, prospect for the future-future life of Tassajara. I feel something right, and I want to talk, you know, a little bit about my feeling and my hope.

I don't know if you have actual feeling of true practice. I don't know, because, you know, why I say so is because I didn't know [laughs], you know, when I was practicing zazen. Even though I was practicing zazen when I was young, I didn't know exactly what it was. But although I had some feeling of practice, but, you know, it was pretty difficult to talk about the feeling I had. But now, you know, the feeling I had makes some sense right now for me, right now [laughs]. But at that time, it doesn't make much sense, although I had some feeling, and sometime I was very much impressed by our practice at Eihei-ji or some other monasteries. Or when I see some great teachers, listening to their teisho, I was very much impressed.

But it was difficult to organize that kind of experience-to put some order in those experience. Maybe because I wanted to put some order, you know, it was not possible. This way is to have full experience and to have full, you know, feeling in every practice. Then that is, you know, that was our way. But maybe it is true with you.

Why we couldn't satisfy our practice is one reason I didn't. I thought I did my best, but I didn't, you know [laughs], [make] enough effort for our practice. That is why. And another reason was because, you know, I wanted to put order, you know. People say "stepladder [laughs] stepladder Zen," you know. Actually, we are talking about, you know, enlightenment and practice is one, but still, you know, actually, my practice, at least, was stepladder practice, you know: "I understand this much, and next year," I thought, "I understand a little bit more, little bit more" [laughs]. That kind of, you know, practice doesn't make much sense. Maybe after you try, you know, stepladder [laughs] practice, you may realize, you know, that that was mistake.

This morning, you know, when [Sotan Ryosen] Tatsugami-roshi was, you know, giving dokusan when we are practicing zazen. I cannot explain you literally what he said, but, you know, our zazen is- If we don't, you know, feel some actual feeling of practice, some warm, you know, big satisfaction in your practice, that is not practice. Even though you sit, you know, with right posture, trying to have right posture, following your breathing, you know, and following all the instruction which was given to you, but maybe still, you know, it is, you know, empty [laughs] zazen.

Why it is empty zazen is you are just following instruction, you know, following form of, you know, practice. And you are following what the way you should do, even though you are counting, you know, you are not kind enough with yourself. That was the point of Tatsugami-roshi's saying this morning. You should be very kind, you know, with yourself. Not just count your breathing to, you know, to avoid your thinking mind, but to take best care of your breathing, you know. There is big difference, you know. Even though you are following breathing, you know, just to follow your breathing doesn't make sense. If you, you know, if you are very kind with your breathing, then, one after another, you will have, you know, refreshed warm feeling in your zazen.

Perhaps, you know, we are not kind enough with ourselves, with our practice. We understand that our practice is, you know- Still we understand, you know, our practice by following some instruction. Or if you only follow the instruction given by some teacher, then you will have good zazen, but [laughs] it is not so. Why you have instruction is how you are able to be kind with yourself. That is, you know, purpose of instruction.

If you don't feel Buddha's mercy in instruction, and if you don't feel, you know, Buddha's mercy on your form and breathing, you know, and take care of your practice, then there is no warm feeling in it, and it is not, you know, well-satisfied zazen. You should be fully satisfied with your, you know, practice. Or you should be very kind with yourself. So, you know, when you are very kind with yourself, naturally you will, you know, feel satisfaction, you know.

A mother may take care of her children, you know, even though she has no idea of how to make her baby happy, you know. But still, what she is doing for his mother is to, you know, to make her laugh or to make [laughs] her baby, you know, happy, you know. In that way you take care of your posture and your breathing, you know. There should be some warm feeling in it. And when you have warm feeling in your practice, that is actual good example of great mercy of Buddha. If you practice, you know, this way, whether you are priest or monk or layman, you know, you have actual practice which will help your everyday life, which will be extended to your everyday life. When you do something, you take utmost care, you know, of what you do. Then you feel good, you know.

So we say, you know, you are, you know, rather something on or in what you do. For instance, you know, as Tozan Daishi said-Tozan Ryokai Daiocho, you know. You recite his name every morning. And Tatsugami-roshi bow, you know. When Tatsugami-roshi bow, all the patriarchs, you recite their name. And Tozan Ryokai Daiocho, he, you know, attained- It is difficult to say, you know, when he attained enlightenment [laughs]. So he [laughs] attained enlightenment so many times [laughs, laughter]. So we cannot say, you know, when. But when he was, you know, crossing river, he saw himself in the river and he said, "Don't," you know, "try to figure out what is you. If you try to figure out what is you, what you will understand will be far away from you. You will not have even image of yourself." Don't try to do so.

But you, actual you, are rather in the river. You may say that is just shadow or that is just, you know, reflection of yourself, not me. You may say so. But if you carefully, you know, if you see it with warm-hearted, you know, feeling, that is you, you know. [Laughs.] You know, you think you are very warm-hearted [laughs], but when you, you know, try to understand how warm I am [laughs], even by temperature, you know [laughs], thermometer, you cannot measure your feeling actual. But when you take-see yourself in mirror or water with warm feeling, that is actually you. And whatever you do, you are there rather than here.

If this side of the monks are, you know, doing something, and the other side of the monks doing some other things, what [laughs] what Mañjushri is doing [laughs, laughter]? When you do something, there is Mañjushri, actually. Real you is there, you know. [Laughs.] You don't have to [laughs] seek for where is Mañjushri and what is he doing. If you actually, you know, [have] good practice in your everyday life, there is our practice, and there is Mañjushri, and there is true you, you know, real you. Don't say Mañjushri is here or there [points] or in the middle of the zendo. It is actually, you know, there when you do things with warm heart, by your warm-hearted mind. That is actual practice. That is how you take care of things. That is how you talk with people.

So there is many ways, you know, because some of you are priest, some of you are layman, and some of you are married priest and some [of] you are not married priest. But our practice is same, not different. Those who, you know, who are not monk and priest may, you know, may his own way, you know, to go. Those who are not married or who have already married, you know, they have their own way of extending our practice to everyday life. So although our situation is different, but, you know, practice is just one.

Mañjushri is actually one, but even though he is one, but [laughs] he is everywhere, you know, and with everyone, and with things what you do. Whatever practice you are involved in, there is Mañjushri. But secret is, you know, not to forget the true mercy of Buddha who takes care of everything. If we lose this point, you know, whatever you do, it doesn't make any sense.

Tatsugami-roshi put emphasis on warm heart, warm zazen. If you practice zazen, you will feel very warm. Even though it is cold, but you should feel some warm feeling in your practice. That is, you know- The warm feeling we have in our practice is, in other word, you know, enlightenment or Buddha's mercy, Buddha mind. It is not matter of just counting your breathing or, you know, following your breathing. Counting breathing is too too too, you know, tedious [laughs]. So maybe better just to follow [laughs] breathing. This is easier, you know, and less disturbance in our practice [laughs, laughter]. This is just [laughs, laughter]- Doesn't make any sense.

The point is, you know, one after another, inhaling and exhaling, you have to take care of, you know, the breathing in and out, just as a mother may watch a baby, you know. If a baby smile, mother may smile [laughs]. If a baby cry, mother will worry. "Ohh" [laughs]. That kind of, you know, close relationship-to be one with your practice is the point. I'm not talking about anything, you know, new. Same old things [laughs, laughter], I am sorry. But I was very impressed, you know, this morning when he was, you know, giving you dokusan. I wish you could understand Japanese [laughs], but you don't. But I think you must have felt some feeling from his, you know, talk.

Various rules we have here, you know, maybe like some, you know, I think maybe like some, you know, machine gun looking glass [sighting scope] [laughs]. Do you know the machine gun looking glass, you know? There is many line on it, you know. It is easier to see something, you know, where the target is, you know [laughs]. And it is for the teacher, of course, you know [laughs, laughter], to- Of course it is so, but, you know, it is for the student too: to work on it, you know, to work on something more carefully, you know. When you want to work on something more carefully, naturally you will count, you know, and naturally you want to figure out how to work on it, you know. That is just, you know, relying on your machine-gun looking glass. I don't know how you call it, but they have it, you know. If you see the movie, you know [laughter], BOOM! [Laughs, laughter.] It goes in that way. And there you see, you know, the glass in that way.

It is just to help your practice, you know, for teacher, some [?], or students. It is not something actual, you know. Actual relationship between teacher and the student is this, you know: "Hi, how are you?" But this is, you know, too direct and too much, so we have to have looking glass and you [laughs]. Through it, we need something, you know, between us. If we are too close with each other we cannot see, but we can feel. But, you know, if we feel too much too close [claps hands together twice], it doesn't make any sense. We cannot help each other. So we need some distance, you know.

So the rules will give us some distance between teacher and disciple. So because of the distance, student may have some freedom in his activity, and teacher will find out how to help, you know, him. When you play something, you know, if you are too close, you cannot play game. Only when you have some distance between you, you can you play something, you know [laughs]. You have some freedom. If student do not have any freedom, you know, teacher cannot tell actually what he wants to do and what kind of, you know, instruction he need. Only when he see from distance, you know, teacher can help him. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

... something to restrict your freedom, rather to give you freedom to behave and to act in your own way. And teacher, without criticizing him, you know, and knowing him-knowing student what really they want to do or what kind of mistake they have, and teacher may help him more meaningful and helpful. It is, for instance, it is something, you know, to-when you want to know whether this, you know, water is too much sugar or your coffee is too much sugar [laughs] or too little, you will stir it up, you know, or too strong or too weak. It is necessary to do something on, you know, coffee or on what you do. We should act on it, you know. That is rules. By rules we know what kind of experience you need or what kind of help you need.

The background or-our rules is based on, you know, also a warm, kind mind. So you are, you- It is not so important to follow the rules, you know, literal, but within the rules you should, you know, try hard. And sometime, if you don't feel so good, you should [laughs] try to break it [laughs, laughter]. You should do something like that. Oh no [laughs, laughter]. Then we will know, you know, what is wrong with him, you know [laughs, laughter]. Maybe his tongue is not so good, or today he lost his belt. That is also gives us some help, you know. So you are pretty free, you know, within our rules. But if you- So when you practice our way, you know, our rules are very very, you know, organized and very, you know- It doesn't, you know, words doesn't come up. Anyway, it is very good for students and for us.

That is actually Tassajara life. And that is why we make our rules [laughs] stricter and stricter, you know. Don't misunderstand us, you know. If your, you know, practice improves, you know, we have to have, you know, more-we have to know about your practice more, you know, carefully. So we must have very, you know, small, very fine, more lines on it anyway [laughs], so that we can measure exactly [laughs, laughter]. If your practice improve, more exact [laughs], you know, glass [crosshairs] is necessary.

You may think, you know, Tassajara became more and more rigid and, you know, strict. And what be-what will happen to us after all [laughs, laughter]? Nothing happens [laughs]. You are you-still you. You have big freedom, you know, but your practice will be improved a lot. And when your practice improve, you have good control over your everyday life. When you have good control of your desires and everyday life, then you will have, you know, big freedom from everything. That is, you know, goal of our practice for priest and for layman.

Ahhh. I don't think I have any more time.

Thank you very much.

And, yeah, you know. I have to go. I have to leave you this afternoon. Take care of your practice. Take good care [laughs] of practice and to be very kind with yourself.

Verbatim transcript checked against tape by Bill Redican 4/6/01.

9 - Maps and Trips

Saturday, February 27, 1971

Maps and Trips
San Francisco

The purpose of our practice is, of course, to maybe to have full enlightenment. Why we cannot have enlightenment is because of our, you know, delusion or mumyo, [1] we say. Or-because we are not-we don't have clear picture of this world, or we do not have eyes to see, you know, clearly, to see clearly, or to have clear understanding of this world. That is, you know, so-called-it called mumyo. Mumyo is delusion. Mu is "no." Myo is "clear." "No clear light."

We are-maybe we are-we Buddhist or we student or someone, you know, who do not have clear eyes to see, you know, what is the true way-which way to go [laughs]. So naturally you are wondering about, you know, to find out some truth, or to have-because you are wondering about, so you want to have some clear map, you know, which way to go. And that is why you must have teacher who, you know, give you some map or some instruction or which way to go.

Even though you have map, if you have a map or, you know, and you have teacher, there is still, you know, difficulty in your practice. The difficulty may be, you know, you have no-if you have-if you-as long as you trust your teacher, you know, you don't have to worry about the way, you know, you take. But because you have, you know, no worry, you know, you, you know, you are liable to, you know, to see something else, you know, because you have-you don't have to, you know, try to find out which way you should take. So you just follow [laughs] your teacher. When he goes fast, you go fast, and when he goes slow, you go slow.

You know, maybe teacher will be like your driver, you know. Because you have, you know-you don't have to worry about driving [laughs], so you see something [laughs], you know, outside of the car, and you will be easily caught by [laughs] something. Or, "Let's have a cup of tea [laughs], a cup of coffee. Let's stay here for two or three days [laughs]." So, you know, teacher, you know, must have accommodate [laughs] with your request, and in that way you will waste your time, you know. Instead of, you know, trying to-asking your way to take, you know, someone else, you will, you know, stop at the coffee shop and having coffee-more than you need [laughs]. That is a trouble you may have. And even though, you know, in that way, eventually you will arrive at, you know, the goal or city you want to go.

But, you know, but sometime you will lose your driver, you know, because it takes too long time to go-to arrive at that city, and if he is very old, he may die [laughs, laughter] before [laughs] you arrive at the city you want go. So naturally you should find out another driver [laughs]. But you have some advantage, you know, because you came, you know, already so far. So someone who, you know, find you, you know, will be very sympathetic with you, or [say], "You are very close to that city you want to go, so maybe I will take you to that city," you know. You will find out the advantage is, maybe, it is easy for you to find out someone who may, you know, drive you to the city. That is one advantage.

Ahhh.

But, you know, I think, you know, you will miss, you know, the driver, you know. After [laughs] he is no more, you know, you will miss him a lot. And there you have some advantage too, you know. Because you miss him, you will try hard, you know, next time-this time, you know, not to waste your time [laughs]. You know, if he dies, you know [laughs], you must find out another driver, so you will not waste your time and you will not disturb your driver anymore [laughs], saying, "Let's [laughs] stop here," you know. And especially you don't know how far it is city, you know, you want to go, so naturally this time you will, you know, you will not disturb the driver. That is the advantage.

But if you cannot find out a driver, anyway asking your way, you will, you know, make a trip on foot, you know. And maybe someone who has big confidence in himself [will say]: "Yes, I am strong enough. I can walk by myself," you know. But at that time the difficulty will be, you know, even though you actually arrive at the city, you know, you don't know [laughs], so you still wondering about, you know, where [laughs] to go [laughs]. You are actually in the city, but you don't know that is the city, you know. You will arrive eventually, at last. That is a trouble, you know.

Or another trouble maybe, you know, before you arrive [at] the real city, you know, you will think, "This is the city [laughs] which I wanted to go! This is the city." But that is not the city, you know. But when-before you arrive at real city, you think this is your city. That is another trouble. I think many people have this problem. The problem is to have right teacher, is to have good driver is a trouble, and not to, you know, disturb your driver, you know, is very difficult. Not to waste your time with your teacher is another difficulty, and, you know, to think you attained enlightenment before, you know, you attain enlightenment is another difficulty. Even though you have enlightenment, you know, you don't know, you know, that you have-you obtain enlightenment in your practice. That is another difficulty for us. In Japanese we have technical term, you know, for those difficulties.

Excuse me [sips water].

So best thing, you know, best thing is to have, you know, a good map. I mean by "good map" a clear understanding of our practice, even though to understand teaching does not mean you have enlightenment, you know, does not mean so. That is just intellectual understanding, you know, but, you know, that is just, you know, picture or map. And map is necessary, and you should know and you should know how to read your map and at least, you know, what kind of spirit is necessary, you know, when you have good driver. And, you know, if you have some experience of driving car, you know [laughs], you will not disturb your driver so much, so some experience or some idea of driving car will help.

This morning I want to talk about this point little bit, you know: the idea of, you know, driving your car. Our way, you know, is, you know, "way-seeking mind" we say, you know. Way-seeking mind is, you know, the understanding of how to drive. Way-seeking mind. Way-seeking mind is very difficult, maybe, you know, for you, although it is not so complicated thing. It is quite simple, but actually, to have it may be difficult. When we, you know, make trip-why you make trip is to go to some beautiful city or sight-seeing place. For instance, you know, it is-the way-seeking mind is lit [?]-and your desire to make trip, you know, is quite different thing [laughs]. Your desire. Your desire, you know. And, you know, to know this point is very important. To know this point-if you know this point, you can, you know, you have direction, you know, in your trip. You know which way to go, anyway.

Kitano-zenji-you know, when I was at the monastery, Eihei-ji Monastery, Kitano-zenji[2] was the archbishop of the Eihei-ji Monastery. When he was young, you know, he was making trip, takuhatsu. And when he reach to the, you know-he was an inveterate smoker [laughs], you know, and when he reached to the, you know, top of the pass, you know, and he took a rest there, sitting on a stone, and, you know, take out cigarettes or I don't know what it was, but-took out his pipe. And seeing the, you know, down, you know, he will arrive on that evening, you know, he took a cigarette. And it was wonderful, you know [laughs]. It was so wonderful, you know, to have a, you know, puff, you know.

So, you know, so it was so wonderful that he gave up. He stopped smoking at that time [laughs]. How about that [laughs, laughter]? You know, it must be, you know, foggy, you know. Through mist, you know, he could see the town. And he thought it may not be so difficult to, you know, arrive at that city, and so he must kill his time little bit more, and he was smoking. It was so nice that he stopped smoking. He knew, you know, what is, you know, real desire or what is desire exactly.

[Laughs.] This is another, maybe, story. I think here in San Francisco you don't have so [such] cold weather. At Tassajara, maybe, it is pretty cold, but in wintertime when you have a lot of snow, in wintertime you will have, you know, "frostbite?" or, you know, frostbite. Before spring come, you know, it will become very itchy [laughs]. You will scratch [scratches himself], you know. And there is, you know-I think there will be no more agreeable thing than to scratch your [laughs] itchy, you know, frostbites. This is the time of the year when we scratch, you know [laughs], frostbite. So you will do, you know, and more you do it, more the frostbite become itchy [laughs, laughter], and you cannot stop it. You know, you know, that is not so healthy, you know, thing to scratch it. And you know this is not wholesome, you know, condition of your skin. So no one try to be, to, you know, to have more frostbites [laughs]. No one want to have it, you know.

He knows, you know-Kitano-zenji knows this is not so very good [laughs], but, you know, it is not something, you know, he should desire so much, you know, he should attach so much, like, you know, like frostbite. So he didn't-no one try to have more snow-frostbite, but many people will be interested in that kind of joy or agreeable feeling, you know.

Because others have [?] [laughs], you cannot make good-quick trip, you know, fast trip to the goal-to the city you want to go. You know, you know, we shouldn't stop so long, but you will stop there. If you demand-if you ask driver, you know, "Let's," you know, "stop here," then driver, you know, knowing that this is just to kill time-waste of time-he may be annoyed. Or he may be sometime very sympathetic with you, you know. "Oh, okay," he may say [laughs], but he is not so happy.

So in that way, you know, but if you know, you know, if you only know you shouldn't scratch your frost bite so much, you know, you should know what kind of desire is, you know, will help you, you know, and how much desire you should have, you know. And naturally you will have control over it, as you don't scratch your frostbite so much. And it seems to me that it is very difficult for you not to scratch [laughs] frostbite. This is, you know, vital, you know, this is, you know, very big problem for us, this point. Even though you think you are striving for attaining enlightenment, actually you are sometime you are scratching [laughs], you know, frostbite.

That is, according to Buddha, that is to refrain from your desire. To refrain from your desire. Refrain from your desire. But it is not because, you know, desire, you-not because desire is bad, so you shouldn't have desire. It doesn't mean that. But to have right practice on your desire is the true practice. Desire itself will create, you know, if you let them, you know, alone, if you let them go, you know, without control over it, it will create you various karma, you know, and you will suffer from the karma. And so even though you think you are, you know, [doing a] religious practice, but unless you not notice this point, you will, you know, by religion, you will create another karma, you know.

To study Buddhism is to create karma [laughs, laughter]. [Sentence completed. Tape turned.] ... on the desire. But even though he gave up smoking, he has desire as long as he is alive, you know. But he knows how to treat his desire, that's all.

[Laughs.] Do you understand this point? I want you to understand this point very well, very clearly, before you make your trip. [Laughs.] Are you sure about this point? It is very foolish of you not to notice this point, very foolish, you know [laughs]. I am not talking about something, you know, difficult. To know this point is very difficult. Maybe to give up smoking is difficult. I know that. But to know this point cannot be so difficult, you know. If you only know this point, I don't say give up, but if you know this point, you know, you will know how to treat yourself. Even though it is difficult you will know that.

So it is easy to follow, you know, our practice, but if you don't know this point, whatever, you know, rules you have to help your practice, you know, you will, you know, you cannot follow it, you know. You don't like to follow it. Our rules is provided not from the standpoint of your, you know, wild desires. It is provided, you know, from standpoint of the enlightened person, enlightenment experience. So, but your understanding of our rules is, you know, from the viewpoint of wild-, you know, open desires: "freedom" and so on. It doesn't make any sense. [Laughs.] Don't you think so? You are just want to scratch your [laughs, laughter] frostbite-that is your freedom. It doesn't make any sense. If your mother said, "Don't do that," you will fight with her [laughs, laughter], that's all. That is what most people are doing, you know. Understanding of the rules. But our rules is not, you know, something like that. Our rules is, you know-we call it "pure rule," or "enlightened rules."

So if-it is the map to go to the city. It is, you know, to help your practice, you know, we have rules or we have maps, and you have driver. If you always, you know, demand your teacher to have more, you know, pleasure, [it is] only a trip. Doesn't, you know-that is big problem. But it is not-as we have, you know, desires, so it is not necessary to be too strict with it, you know. Maybe if you ask too many things, you know, [laughs] maybe your mother will [be] angry with [laughs] you. But what mother want to do is just, you know, just to make you come, that is all. If you do not drink anything, you know, she will worry, you know. "Don't drink so much," she may say, but, you know, if you doesn't drink at all, she may worry. So it is not necessary to be so strict, but you should know the point. And you should have right attitude, and you should, you know, be cooperative rather than disturbing, you know, your teacher. Okay? [Laughs, laughter.]

I won't saying, you know, because of me, but because I want to help you, you know, I am saying this point. It is very easy thing, you know, to understand and to do, and you can trust my words on this point [laughs]. I don't know when I say something very, you know, fancy [laughs, laughter]. I don't know. But I am very straightforward, you know. I have many experiences like this, you know. And you will enjoy, you know, your understanding of your desires, and naturally you will have good practice, and that good practice will help your, you know, everyday problem.

Here in this zendo, you know, we-our way is the so-called-it Soto way, you know, Soto way, not Rinzai way [laughs]. But "Soto way" we say, but actually, you know, our way is nothing but, you know, how to get rid of our confusion and our trouble from our life. So we, you know-Soto way put more emphasis on zazen. Zazen, zazen, zazen [laughs]. And what zazen means to you is to have, you know, to be yourself, you know. How to be yourself is, you know, how to treat yourself, you know, including various desires. How to treat yourself. How to treat your painful legs, you know, how to have good posture, how to make your smooth, good breathing.

When you, you know, really, when you take care of yourself, you know, then you will have mother-like mind, you know. You will not say-you will always say to yourself, "Oh, don't eat too much" [laughs], you know, because you are always taking care of yourself, like in your zazen, you know: always trying to take of yourself. When you become angry, you may say, "Oh, don't be angry so much." Or you may, but [laughs] it will not help, you know. You will treat your anger in that way.

That is how you treat yourself in your zazen. If you, you know, shout, "Don't do that!" you know, [laughs]. In zazen you cannot say so, you know. So naturally [laughs], you will, you know, because-even though you are angry [laughs], you will be like this [laughs], without saying, you know [laughs], "Don't be angry!" That is how you treat your anger [laughs]. So naturally, eventually anger will go, you know. You will not be so indignant about any special things. You will be tired. Actually, you have no time [laughs] to be angry. That is how you, you know, take care of yourself.

And if you become boss of yourself, include desires, then you will be a boss of everything, you know. Your practice include everything. The way you treat yourself is the way you treat, you know, your friend, the way you live in this society. You will not create any problem, but you will not even try to help others, but, you know, you are actually helping others in that way. And it is very difficult for almost all the people to be like that, you know. If, you know, you, you know, are like that, it will be good example for others, and others will follow your example. They will not recognize you, but they may feel very good to be around you.

So what you learn by Soto way is, you know, how you treat yourself, you know, and how you live in this world without creating karma for you and for others. You ignore the, you know, idea of karma. Mostly it seems to me, you know, you ignore, you, you know [laughs, laughter], you don't want to see your karma, even though you are creating a lot of karma, one after another, you know, one over [laughs] another. But you try to ignore it. But who will suffer from the karma? You yourself karma. No one else will suffer from it. And you cannot ignore the truth of cause and effect, you know. If you do something, if you create some karma because of no controlling practice over your karma, the result will come, you know. [Laughs.] You cannot escape from the law of karma. How you, you know, make your bad karma into good one is also power of practice. When you create bad karma, because of your good practice, bad karma will change its direction. It will not vanish, you know. Once you create karma, karma is there, always with you, but that karma will change its direction. Karma is not good or bad. But, you know, when you work on karma, it will be a good karma, and when you don't, you know, the karma will create various karma on you because you don't know how to treat yourself, how to treat your karma.

This point should be, you know, realized. Perhaps you don't want to hear [laughs] this part, but this is also true, you know. It is not so fancy Buddhist, you know, teaching. It is very very clear teaching. You know, no one can ignore this truth. Your foolish effort will try to ignore it, but it will never work.

If you force too much, you know, you will invite destruction. It is, you know, worse than war. We are actually, you know, creating war through everyday activity. You talk about peace in some angry, you know, mood [laughter, laughs]. Actually you are creating, you know, war with angry mood. Rhhh, rhhh! [Laughs.] That is war, you know.

We should know. We should open our, you know, dharma eyes, you know, and we should know the map, you know, once again, once more. And we should help together forever.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Translation of Japanese terms and research assistance by Shohaku Okumura-sensei. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (11/15/00).

[1] mumyo (Jap.): ignorant; dark; lightless; spiritual darkness; ignorance of the true nature of existence.

[2] Kitano Daiko Genpo (1862-1932 or 1842-1933): 67th abbot of Eihei-ji.

1971 maart (3)

1 - The Idea of Self

Tuesday, March 02, 1971

The Idea of Self

San Francisco

There are various kinds of religion, but why we have to [have] religion- this question is answered not only by religious leaders but also by psychologist. So the understanding of religion nowadays become more and more deeper. And I think- I don't know not much about psychology, nowadays psychology, but so far I understand, as you know, just as purpose of religion is to save [solve] our difficulties, the psychologist is working hard to save or to solve the problems of our life.

Why we have, you know, so many problems in our life is, you know, because of, you know, our social structure, which is not so good, or human relationship, you know, which is not also good. So that is why we have difficulties, and if the difficulties become too much, it will result [in] a nervous breakdown or some mental, you know, disorder.

But why we have this kind of, you know, problem in our society or in our individual life is, according to Buddhism, our problems is based on, you know, our structure of, you know, way we live, you know. The foundation is something wrong [laughs]. Our way of living is something wrong. That is so-called-it "leakage," you know, leakage. Or you may call it "break" or you don't say "breakage" [laughs], but maybe, you know, something like that. Something is wrong with our fundamental framework of life, you know. Something is wrong. This point is already pointed out by Buddha. What is wrong is, you know, according to Buddha, because we have various desires, you know. But that desires are limitless, you know, as well as Buddha's teaching [laughs]. It is limitless, you know: no limit in our desires. But actually the things which will satisfy our desire is not limitless, you know. It is limited. So there is already, you know, big gap between your desire and things which will suffice your desire. Even so, our way of life is, you know, based on our desires: to, you know, to have complete satisfaction of our desire, which is not possible.

And sometime you may, you know, choose some desire out of many desires, forgetting the rest of the desires, you know. You will choose one desire. That is what you will say to your girlfriend [laughs]: "I don't care anything [for anyone] but you." [Laughs.] It means that you gave up, you know, the rest of the desire and, you know, you try to satisfy only one desire-"to have you."

But it looks-it looks, you know-that is, maybe, by choosing one desires from out of many, you can think it is possible to satisfy your desire, but you will find out, you know, the nature of desire, you know. Even though you choose one out of many, that one desire is limitless [laughs]-no end-until you lose yourself in the desire.

And that is, you know, why we suffer, you know, as Buddha pointed out. Same thing is true with modern, you know, psychology or psychoanalysis-especially psychoanalysis based on existentialism, you know. According to them-modern psychologists-you know, the problem we have in our life is, you know, not because of something, you know, outside, you know, some object of desires, but based on, you know, your, you know, fundamental framework of life, you know. Something is some-you know, something wrong with it. What is wrong with it is in whatever way you seek for something, you know, you think things exist, you know, outside of yourself, not within yourself or not in relationship between you and things.

The way, you know, things exist is not in the way something exist independent from you. Or you do not exist, you know, in some way quite independent from your surrounding. So what actually exist is not you or not things, but some, you know, actual existence, you know, which is in the realm of relationship between you and surrounding. So as long as you think you-something exist outside, and you exist in spite of, you know, many things, you know, related with you, [and] you exist independent from them, then you have-you cannot get out of the difficulties.

Usually, I think, our-when we have difficulty in actual life, not in Zen Center [laughs], in actual life [laughs], in city life, maybe [laughs, laughter], you try hard, you know, in your own way, to have good relationship with people and, you know, and to get some money, you know. And to have good relationship with your family [laughs]. Even you do so, you know, it is, as you must have experienced, it is not so easy [laughs]. You have always difficulties.

You have, you know, so naturally you will, you know, give up, you know-not forever, but for a time-and you will find out some retreat, you know, like Zen Center [laughs]. That is why you come to Zen Center-some of them-because of this reason, come to Zen Center-and shut yourself up from the, you know, city life. And usually what-you know, usual people, you know, what usual people may do is, you know, shutting up themselves from the world and thinking hard to find out some, you know, good way. And when you feel you have some confidence in your, you know, way, you will go out to the city and work again, but still it is difficult. While you are repeating this kind of thing, you will be entrenched, you know, in some, you know, some line of thought or some idea, you know, of difficulty, and you will lose your confidence in yourself. That is, you know, how usual person is doing.

But here in Zen Center what you are doing should be different from this kind of, you know, shutting out yourself from world. But to find out, you know, quite different attitude to work on this kind of difficulties which you think, you know, exist, you know, outside of yourself. But in zazen practice, as you must have experienced, the way you take care of yourself, you know, is-should be the way [you] take care of your kitchen and your room and Zen Center. And this, you know-in this way you have more subjectivity and you have more subjective attitude towards, you know, your surrounding and taking care of your, you know, your surrounding or things around you. You will learn how to be boss of your surrounding, and instead of being drugged [dragged?] by things, you know, you will, you know, work on your surrounding. Then, you know, your circumstances will be quite different. This is, you know, actually how we work on our life.

And if we, you know, if we want to explain this kind of practice more carefully, you know, or more maybe fancy scholarly way, maybe [laughs, laughter], which I cannot do it so well, but, the things, you know, as we always, you know, repeating, do not exist, you know, without you, you know. Because you are here, things exist. If you were not here, things does not exist, you know. Maybe you may say even though you are not here, things-this building will exist. Even though you die, this building will exist. This kind of, you know, argument, is, according to Buddha, it is useless [laughs]-useless argument which will not help you so much, you know.

You have difficulties, you know, in your life which is, you know, which is consist of you and your surrounding. The problem only arise between you and your surrounding, which is directly [laughs] something to do with you [laughs]. You don't mind what kind [laughs] of things Japanese people [are] doing in Japan. You don't mind [laughs]. But you will mind what I will do or what your husband will do or what will your wife do in everyday life or your neighbors will do. That is actually our life. And when you think, "Even though I am not here," you know, you are not here, "things exist," that is, you know, that-if you think in that way, that will create more problem [laughs] to you. So you must take care of, you know, things which you are related directly, and more and more you should extend this kind of activity, you know, to more things. We should live in reality, not in delusion. We call it delusion, you know.

And, you know, we think-you may think, you know-you may worry about your future, you know. "Your future," you say, that is, but your future is, you know, something, you know, some situation you project, you know. Your-things you have right now around you, you project something to the future, and you become afraid of it, you know. And because you have some difficulty now, you think in your future you will have same difficulty. This is, you know, fear.

But actually that kind of a fear does not-is a illusion, you know, because it is something which you project, you know, to the future. And, you know, magic is here [laughs]. You have various material, you know, here with you, and you project what you have in [to the] future. And you become afraid of it, and you are confused, as you are confused right now. So point is, you know, how to, you know, solve-how to take care of your surrounding, you know, before you become afraid of, you know, your future.

You say you have such-and-such difficulties when you were young, you know. You know, psychoanalysts may say because your mother was very, you know, strict with you, that is why [laughs] you have, you know, difficulty in adapting yourself [to] your surrounding. Because of the fear you had, you know, your mind does not, you know, work properly right now. But that is, you know-even though you talk about past, you know, difficulties, it doesn't help. All the result is now, right now here. So to work on, you know, your problem right now is the best remedy. That is according to Buddha, you know. If you [are] shot by poison arrow, you know, you shouldn't talk about what poison it will be [laughs]. To pull out the arrow is the way, you know. Same thing is, you know, true with modern psychoanalysis, you know. And it is-I was amazed by what they say, you know [laughs, laughter]. They teaches me what is Buddhism [laughs].

Instead of, you know-when you have difficulties, you know, with your friend, for an instance, what you should do, you know, fundamentally, you know, in conclusion, what you should do is not to be, you know, enslaved by your circumstances but to go beyond the idea of self or to give up the idea of self. And, you know, that is the only way to get rid of all the source of difficulties. And they say that is, you know, how to get rid of the idea of self, you know, maybe by religious practice [laughs]. They say so. Only by religious practice you will get rid of idea of self.

As long as you stick to the idea of self, you will be enslaved by your surrounding, and instead of being boss of everything, you will be enslaved by them. Because we have self, according to them, you know, we seek for some possibility or-not "some possibility"-you seek for something good, you know, for yourself because you are here. So you seek for something good. But something good, according to them again, something good is, you know, is in the realm of good and bad, you know, and it is in realm of possibility, you know. The possibility means possibility of being good and possibility of being bad, you know. If you drive a car, there is two possibility: to have accident [laughs], to arrive at Monterey, you know, safely. There is two possibility [laughs]. As long as you are going to Monterey, you know, another possibility of accident is follows always with you.

But that possibility is not, you know, on the freeway. It is on your side, you know. To seek for something completely, you know, something good, completely indifferent from something bad [laughs], that is not possible [laughs] to have it, you know. Most of time you will arrive at Monterey without accident, but no one knows, you know, when you are driving, you know, if you [will] have accident or not. No one knows. Case by case, if you want to, you know-you may be, you know, one case out of thousands, you know [laughs], so no one knows.

But you seek for, you know, something good. That is, you know, altogether wrong, you know, way of seeking-way of having to get rid of uneasiness from your life. When you, you know, you know what you are doing exactly, you know, there you have chance to practice our way quite seriously, you know, to have more positive way, you know, in your life. How you have positive way in your life is, you know, instead of, you know, pushing yourself, you know, you should forget yourself, you should, you know, you should get rid of the root of the trouble, which is "you"-idea of "you" [laughs]. That is the root of the trouble. Because of the idea of "you," you know, because you stick to the idea of you, you have to choose something which is impossible to have.

And, you know, so far, various, you know, religion has been helping us. But if we come to this point, you know, not many religion can help, you know. The most religion will encourage your [laughs] idea of self. Maybe most religion, you know, will. Christianity is not. They don't. They say something: "You cannot add one more feet over your head," or something like that, you know. But most religion, you know, encourage you to, you know, pull more [laughs], to make your hands one feet longer, you know, to reach for something or to make yourself higher one feet to reach for something. If they believe in something, you will have more power or more ability. So that you will have more power or more ability, you know, you believe in the teaching they give you. But that is not, you know-that will not help. That will encourage your problems.

But [the] only way, you know, is to get rid of the idea of self. And here, you know, if I say so, "That is not possible," I'm sure you will say so. "That is not possible," you may say. [Laughs.] But it is possible [laughs]. Someone may say, "If you get rid of idea of self, you know, what will happen to you?" [Laughs.] You will be very lonely, you know [laughs for rest of sentence], without any idea of self. If the purpose of practice is to get rid of idea of self [laughs], you know, what will happen after you attain enlightenment [laughs]? Maybe all the people get enlightenment, you know, attain enlightenment. It may be okay [laughs], but I don't want to attain enlightenment [laughs], giving up myself, you know [laughs], to make other people happy [laughs]. "Oh no," you may say [laughs]. But, you know, it is not so. That is why, you know, Buddha, you know, had difficult time [laughs] to provide some way, you know, for people to get rid of this kind of idea.

Hmm.

Do you [laughs]-do you have some answer for that question? [Laughs.] What is our way, then, you know? How do you get rid of idea of self is the point. Of course, you cannot do it all at once. But there is a way to get rid of idea of self. [Drinks water. Says "Ahh" audibly. Puts cup down with an audible sound. Laughs, laughter.] Maybe I have [takes a sip of water]-if I start to talk about, you know, I don't feel, you know, so good. Before I tell you to have a cup of water, it is very good [laughs]. I feel I have some secret [laughs, laughter]. If I tell you, "Oh, that is what Roshi is talking [about] all the time," [laughs], and you may be discouraged. So maybe better not to tell you [laughs, laughter]. Ahh. [Laughter.] Everything is written on this paper [lecture notes?] [laughs, laughter]. I am selling you, you know, snake oil now [laughs, laughter]. Hai. [Laughs, laughter.]

Hmm. Ahh. [Laughs, laughter.] I haven't talk one hour yet, you know. So I must continue, maybe [laughs, laughter]. Do you have some question [laughs, laughter]? Yeah, please ask some question, you know. Hai.

Student A: I have an answer to that one on how to get out of self-concern for self-and I think it's concentration on truth and love. Those two things will get you right out of your self, I think.

Suzuki-roshi: Ahh-what?

Student A: Concentration on truth. In other words, any time you hear anything that you think isn't perfectly in agreement with how you yourself have thought about it, then you say what you think.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: You risk your-you don't care what they think about you because you're speaking the truth.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah.

Student A: And love. Those two things. And an extreme concentration on both, I think, will get you out of yourself.

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. Yeah. After you have good practice [laughs, laughter]. And another side of it, you know-how you have good practice, you know. That is the other side of the answer, you know. When you are well-concentrated, you know, on what you do and on what is happening here-not you or me-but, you know, what is happening in the realm of possibility. If you best take care of things, you know, in realm of possibility, that is only one way. There, you know, small "I" is not there. Some object is not there. What exist there is not something on the mirror, you know, or, you know, is not something-it is something on the mirror but not mirror or not you, you know. You are in the mirror, actually. You see? In the mirror. You are watching yourself in the mirror, but that "you" is not you, you see, and not mirror. What is it [laughs]? That is true reality. That is something which I talked about the other day, you know. "You" in the mirror-in the river. You see yourself-Tozan [Ryokai] saw himself in the mirror-in the water. That is something real: not himself, you know, not water, but real self.

If something bad happens, you know, happens to you, but you should know the other side of it is good [laughs], you know. When you say, "This is good or bad," already you say so, but things itself is not good or bad, you know. So you shouldn't be bothered by it. Something bad happens? It is okay, you know. It appeared in that way. How you have this kind of actual understanding of life is how you practice zazen. In your practice you don't hear, but sound comes, you know, to your ear, and your ear and something, you know, create something new here [hear?]. That's all. To understand in that way, you know, is to be-to go beyond you and things, you know. That is real love, you know. But when you carelessly say, "Love others," you know, in that case there may be, you know, some danger, you know, because you feel you love others, you know. But in real love there is no idea of or feeling of loving anyone else, you know. [Tape turned.]

... [through practice] [1] ... you know, experience, and you cannot even take hold of it, you know. You cannot understand yourself even [laughs], but real "you" is there. That's all.

Student B: Is it possible to make a mistake in some way?

Suzuki-roshi: Actually there is no mistake, you know, in our life. Whatever you do, it is not mistake [laughs]. But when I say there's no such thing like mistake, when I say so, you know, I am saying it, you know, in the viewpoint of our real practice. So in usual sense there is, of course, mistake, you know. But even though you make mistake, you don't have to, you know, have to worry about it too much. You must be, you know, free from it, and you must, you know, instead of being worried by it you should, you know, work on the result of your mistake, which is present [taps with hand or finger] right here.

Student B: The reason why you wouldn't call it a mistake is because like it's a step up the evolutionary ladder, and you learn from it, so it is really good. That's how I look at that. I mean, I don't have to worry about the good and bad of an act. I look at it like it's a test of you, so that you don't say, "Oh, that's a terrible thing that happened to me." Instead it was a testing situation. You were just tested. How did you come out of it?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Testing. Yeah. Maybe, yeah. To live on this moment is, anyhow, you know, important. Or else somehow you will create some confusion and distress. Hai.

Student B: When I-when I sit, I'm also-it's the same situation all the time.

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm.

Student B: When I get close to doing something without watching myself, when I get close to being balanced and just breathing and sitting, just before I seem to catch myself and say, "Oh! Now this may be as close to zazen."

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm.

Student B: And I've lost it. And I-I keep stopping myself. And I don't know what I'm afraid of or why I do that, you know.

Suzuki-roshi: You-

Student B: I couldn't get beyond it.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh, I couldn't follow you so well. Uh-huh? You-

Student B: My thinking mind won't-I feel like I'm controlled by it. And the minute that it begins to lose its control, and I just feel myself sitting just for half a second, and I'm just breathing and sitting and-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: -that's all that's happening. The minute that that begins to happen, I begin to think about it again. And I watch it. And then I'm no longer sitting. I'm thinking about it.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: And, and-seems like my thinking mind is so strong.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.]

Student B: I-I'm afraid, I think, to stop thinking that way because I hold on to it. I don't know how to-

Suzuki-roshi: Ohhh. I see. Stop, yeah. I am not saying to stop your thinking, you know. To think is okay.

Student B: I don't mean I'm trying to stop it. I mean that, uh-

Suzuki-roshi: Naturally you stop it, or intuitively, or-

Student B: I'm afraid of stopping. I continue it. I'm holding it.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, I see. You are afraid of stopping it, and you want to continue it.

Student B: Yeah, but I also don't want to [laughs, laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: But it goes. Thinking mind goes even though you don't try to stop it or try to continue it. It goes. Is that what you mean?

Student B: Yeah, but I go with it is the problem [laughter]. I guess I can't [1-2 words unclear].

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughing.] How you go with it. "You go with it" is pretty good, you know [laughs, laughter]. "You go with it." You follow, you know, with it, so thinking mind is going, not you, you know. And thinking mind is stronger and "you" is weaker, you know. I think so.

Isn't that so? So if-and if you are not, you know-soon, I think, you will not be afraid of, you know, going with it or afraid of stopping it, you know. You will just follow your thinking mind without being afraid of it or without trying to stop it. Then your, you know, your ego is very weak, you know, and thinking mind is so-called-it, you know, "think non-thinking." Dogen says, you know, "Think non-thinking." Non-thinking is pure thinking. Think-

Student B: Without any direction?

Suzuki-roshi: Without any direction. Follow. Then, you know, what is happening there is-cannot make any harm to you, you know, and rather it will help you.

Student B: But I'm afraid of that.

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm?

Student B: I'm afraid of that.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Don't-yeah-that is, you know, that is, you know, it is some evidence that your practice is involved in some, you know, some usual practice, you know, of, you know, doing something. Our practice is just sit. Let everything happen on you. That is, you know, looks like very difficult thing, but there is no other way to get rid of the root of the problem. And how you do it is to take care of yourself, you know, to take care of your breathing and thinking mind, we say, but, you know, if you do not reject it, or if you do not want to stop it with warm feeling, if you follow it, you know, if you are very kind with your thinking mind, then there is not much ego-as if you take care of your, you know, friend or children. You see? Thinking mind at that time is like a children [laughs] running around you, you know. "Ohhh [laughs], be careful!" [Laughs, laughter.] You know, that is the way. There is no-when you practice in that way there is no "you" anymore. That is the secret of, you know, to go beyond self-centered practice.

Nine o'clock [laughs]. Maybe one more question [laughs]. Hai.

Student C: Is it possible that it isn't because we are afraid of-because it seems we are not used to the experience of experiencing ourselves as one whole thing? It happens in a blink of an eyelash, that you are absolutely still and absolutely in one piece. They're not used to that.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: If you can that aspect of [10-15 words unclear] that you extend the time, I think, that it is possible to be like that.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: It comes upon you while you are doing zazen. All of a sudden [2-5 words] some idea of what zazen is about. But it doesn't stay with you, as she said.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: It stays for a second or for a few seconds. So it's a model of how you feel, I think.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Mm-hmm. Not only-our practice is not just sitting, you know. Way we eat, way we walk, you know, is a, you know, practice too. So if you walk or if you eat the way we eat, you know, then more and more you will have that kind of mind, you know. That is why we have-we practice tea ceremony, you know. Tea ceremony is established by Rikyu.[2] Rikyu? And, you know, because of his lord-his lord who is very impatient person, you know, and who did not like him so much, but he was his lord, so he has to offer tea, you know, always. But with perfect calmness of his mind, he, you know, made tea and offered [it to] his lord. When he does this, you know, he-in Japanese, we say suki no nai.[3] Suki no nai, you know, means his lord has no chance to, you know, kill him. With his complete calmness of mind, he is ready to [for] anything which will happen to him [laughs]. Complete calmness of his mind. But at last, you know, he killed himself, but tea ceremony was established by him [laughs]. If you act like he act, you know, you will feel his spirit.

So our zazen practice-not only zazen practice, but also meal practice or rituals is provided in that way originally. But nowadays, I don't know [laughs] so well. So if it is difficult for you to practice sitting zazen, you can study tea ceremony, you know.

Some student who was taking movie of tea ceremony invited me, you know, and asked me to explain what kind of, you know, action is Zen and what kind of action is not Zen. "Tell me," [laughs] he said. But all from the beginning to end, you know, what they do is supposed to be, you know, Zen-Zen practice. Not this part or that part. From beginning to end it should be zazen practice. So whether they know what is Zen or not, if they do it, you know, he will eventually, you know, find out what is Zen through action.

Thank you very much.

-----

Sources: City Center transcript and note on original tape case. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Translation of Japanese phrase by Shohaku Okumura-sensei. Transcript made verbatim by Bill Redican 3/30/01.

[1] The text in brackets is from a note on the original tape case (not on tape).

[2] Sen Soeki Rikyu (1522-1591) is credited with developing the Way of Tea in Japan. He served as tea master to the shogun Toyotomi Hideyoshi (1536-1598), who eventually ordered Rikyu to commit seppuku.

[3] suki ganai (Jap.): suki = unguarded moment, flaw, space, or room; no = of (possessive); nai = no. Hence, to be always on alert; to be thoroughly guarded.

2 - Admonishing Our Many Wishes

Tuesday, March 09, 1971

"Admonishing Our Many Wishes"

San Francisco

One day a Chinese famous Zen master was making a trip with a-with his disciple.[1] A [flock of] geese, you know, fly-were flying over-passed, you know, over their head, like this [probably gestures].

And disciple [teacher] said, "Where are they going?" or "What are they?"-oh-teacher said, "What are they?"

The disciple said, "They are geese."

"Where they are going?" [laughs] the teacher asked.

Disciple say, "I don't know," disciple said quite honestly because he didn't know [laughs].

Disciple [teacher] twisted his disciple's nose, like this [laughs, probably gestures].

As a disciple of Buddha, we should know what we are doing, you know, especially, you know, when we, you know, we are with his teacher, you know [laughs]. We should extend our practice, you know, in our everyday life, as you know. That is our practice. So if you know secret of your, you know, life, you will understand, you know, the meaning of practice. And if you know the meaning of practice, you can extend our practice to your everyday life. That is why-must be why the teacher twisted his disciple's nose. [Laughs.] "What are you doing now?" Actually, he was not talking about geese.

We feel very serious-we become [laughs] very serious when you-when you have problem, without knowing that you are creating problems always. And even though you, you know, you have a lot of trouble, somehow, you know, you can manage-you think you can manage it. "Oh, this is not big trouble," you know. "I can manage it quite easily"- without, you know, knowing how you should cope with the trouble.

The other day, you know, when we had shuso ceremony at Tassajara, someone asked shuso, Peter [Schneider], that kind of question, you know. And after many question and answer finished, Yoshimura-I thought it was Yoshimura[2]-Yoshimura-sensei said-no-Tatsugami-roshi [3] said, "A tiger," you know, "catch a mouse with his whole strength," you know. Whht! [Laughs.] A tiger does not, you know, ignore or does not slight any small animals. The way he catch a mouse and the way he catch or devour a cow is same way, you know. But usually, although we have many problems, this is minor problem. So you don't think it is necessary to-to treat it, you know, in relationship with our practice. But in this way, to treat our problem in that way is the-the way many countries treat their international problems: "This is minor problem. [Laughs.] So as long as we do not violate international treaties, it may be okay. [Laughs.] Unless we do not use atomic," you know, "weapon, we can fight," you know.

But that kind of, you know, small fight will eventually, you know, result [in] a big fight. It is same thing, you know. So even [though] the problem we have in our everyday life is small-may be small, but we should know how to solve those problems or else you will have big, big difficulties because of the law of karma, you know. Karma starts from small things, but it will result-it will accelerate your, you know, bad karma. And you should know how to cope with, you know, with those small difficulties or suffering.

Before Buddha's Nirvana Day,[4] I read some of his teaching about fundamental Buddhist way:

Admonishing our many wishes, yea brethren, in receiving all food and drink, you ought to accept them as medicine.

You must not accept or reject what you like or dislike. Just support your bodies, and avoid starvation and thirst.

As a bee in gathering flowers takes only the taste of-taste of them but does not harm their color or scent, so brethren, you may [?] accept just enough of people's offering to avoid distress.[5]

Don't have many demands and thereby break their good hearts.

Wise men, for an example, having judge the amount of capacity of his axis [arm's? actual?] strength, does not wear out its strength by overloading.

"Admonishing our many wishes": Oh-this is-"many wishes" means, you know, "many wish-many desires." "Many wishes"-it does-it-it is-in Chinese translation, it is-"small wishes," it says, you know. Small wishes.

The many wishes means, you know-many wishes or small wishes, or many desires and small desires-few desires-it is not matter of so many or so few, you know. It is-it is, you know, not to-the idea is to get rid of desires or to be-to go beyond desires. But to have, you know, little wishes means, you know, not to divide our concentration [on?] too [to?] many things. That is actual meaning, you know.

To do things, you know, with one true-hearted way, you know, with oneness of the mind-that is to have few wishes-many-or many wishes-to be restrained from many wishes. Many wishes looks like, you know, to have various desires-to eat or to sleep, you know. But [laughs] we cannot live-we cannot, you know, restrict or we cannot-it is almost impossible to get rid of some of many wishes, you know. All the wishes should be-we should have, but we should not divide our focus of activity. That is what it means.

"In receiving all food and drink, you ought to accept them as medicine," you know. When you accept-when you receive food, you should be concentrated, or you should accept it with your whole body and mind. That is what it means.

And at the same time, it means you should not accept it in dualistic idea of "you" and "food." You know, we say "we receive" or "we accept" food. We do not say "we take" food-maybe [laughs]-"as we take food and drink [laughs]," we say. That is, maybe, wrong translation. "As we accept food and drink"-we should say so, you know. Acc- [partial word]-"to take" and "accept" is different. "To take" is more dualistic, you know. "To accept" is more, you know, more complete activity. You know, to-you may say [laughs] "to take" is more complete, you know, action. But to accept is m- [partial word]-you know, not so complete, you know.

When you take something, you will grasp it like this [probably gestures]. This is complete [laughs]-complete concentration on your activity is there. But according to Buddha's teaching, you know, this [probably gestures] is not, you know, to grasp some food or to take food is not complete acceptance-it is dualis- [partial word]-because it is dualistic.

And in that way, we will create karma, you know. When you grasp it-when someone grasp it or someone may grasp it because some other person want to take it, you know. So you must be very quick [laughs, laughter]. That is activity, you know-dualistic activity which will create many karma [laughs]. But when you receive it, you know, you have it already here [probably gestures], so-and if you accept it with, you know, with great appreciation-"Thank you very much," you know-that is more-it is-the activity-Buddha-it is the true activity or small wishes-not "wishes" or small desires-Buddha meant. You ought to accept them-"accept them" is right. You ought to accept them as medicine, you know, with full appreciation of it, without not much dualistic mind.

"You must not accept or reject what you like or dislike," you know. Like or d- [partial word]-you must not accept it-accept it because-or reject it, you know-accept or reject is also dualistic. You ought not to accept-you must not accept or reject what you like or dislike.

"Just support your bodies, and avoid starvation and thirst." "Just support your bodies, and"-it means that you should not take it with a dualistic idea of good or bad or enough or small [not enough]. So this kind of, you know, teaching does not mean to con- [partial word]-to have controlling power over your desires. If it is so, you know, it is difficult to know how much you should accept, you know-how much-to accept how much food is, you know, appropriate for you. It is difficult to know the limit of the desire or to make some b- [partial word]-some limit to-to limit your food, you know.

If you want to control-[have] controlling power over your desires, you know, how much you should control is-will be the next problem. And in that way, you will make more problem, one after another. And you will make-maybe you will make some good excuse, you know, to have more food [laughs]. In that way, you know, you will lose your way.

The point is, you know, again, come back to the zazen practice. How much you-how you accept things is how you take care of your body and to know yourself, you know, like you sit in zazen with many desires and problems. If-to feel, you know, your problem as your own problem is our practice. So when you eat, you know, eating is a part of your practice, you know. To eat food as you practice zazen is how to accept your food. So "to accept" is not-the word "to accept" is not-has not any dualistic concept.

"Just support your bodies, and avoid the starvation and thirst." So if you know how you practice zazen, then you will know, you know, how much food you should take. And there is no danger of eating too much or eating too less.

"As a bee in gathering flowers takes only the taste of the flower but does not hurt their color or scent-" This is a very famous, you know, parable. "As a bee in gathering flowers takes only the taste of honey but does not hurt their color or scent-" It is-it means that-to take-to have true taste of the flower is, you know, not because-to take it not because flower is beautiful or scent is nice, but because, you know, to take care of you and flower. So to have, you know, to have direct feeling of flower and taste the honey from it. So there is no-like a bee, we have not much, you know, desire as we have in dualistic sense. So-

So it is not possible, you know, to extend our practice in our everyday life without, you know, knowing what kind of difficulties we have. What is the usual attitude to take care of our problems in our everyday life? We are not so careful, you know. You know, we may be like a carpenter bee sometime [laughs] and may violate many beautiful flowers. But sometime we may be a[n] ant, you know. Even though they do not, you know, destroy the flower, but they-because of the ant, the flower may die. They are too, you know, sticky [laughs], and stick too much always in the same flower. Purpose of flower having honey [nectar] is, you know, to-to help the plant in some way, you know, inviting bees, you know. To invite bees they have some honey [nectar]. But if-maybe they are expecting honeybee or something, not carpenter bee [laughs] or ant. So it is necessary to-to know whether we are like a carpenter bee or sticky small ant or what was-[laughs]. It looks like very gentle and kind [laughs], but eventually, if too many ants come to a flower, flower will die. So in, you know, in our everyday life, we should not, you know-our minds should be more careful, you know, or our mind must be more, you know, cautious, or attentive, or more reflective.

You may think, you know, our way is too-we have too much rules [laughs] about way of treating things, or way of speaking, or in various way we have various rules. But we should know that-before you say that is too much, you should know what you are doing, you know. You should know whether you are creating problem in your everyday life or creating bad karma for yourself and for others.

And you should know also why you suffer right now. There must be some reason you suffer. And if there is some reason to suffer, it is, you know, not possible [laughs] to escape from it. If there is some, you know-some reason, it is not possible to escape from it. Only way is to-by treating in some way, to change the function of the karma from bad to better. That is only way.

How you do that-how you can do that is-only when you are very attentive or when you know the nature of karma very well you can do that. It is not so easy to kick a stone by the [laughs]-on the roadside. If-because we have various, you know, karma we have now is created in some way, and law of karma cannot be, you know, changed. How you-according to the, you know-when you follow the karma and drive the karma in good direction [laughs], you know, you can, you know, avoid the destructive nature of the karma. How you can do that-you-is to be attentive to the nature of karma and nature of your desires and activities.

So, as Buddha pointed out, cause of-to know cause of suffering is to know how to avoid suffering. Why you suffer: If you know why you suffer, you know, you will know the cause and effect of the karma. And if-when you understand cause and effect and how it-how bad thing result-bad-bad cause result [in] bad effect-then, if you know that, you can, you know-in the same way, you can avoid the destructive power of the karma.

And there is some ways to make the power weaker. The best way is, you know [laughs], to make karma work on the voidness of the air. It-it will [not] create any harm to anybody. But mostly that is-looks like difficult for us because of-because we have-we exist here, you know, which is idea of self, you know. As long as we have idea of self, the karma has some object to work on. If you have no idea of self, you know, karma doesn't know what to do [laughing, laughter]. "Oh, where is my partner, where is my friend?"

But that looks like very difficult, and we know that. But some people, you know, try hard to banish [it] [laughs], you know. But I don't think that is possible. The best way is to treat them well, you know-to tame it. And that is how we control ourselves. And that is possible when we know-knowing the strict rule of karma, and work on our karma immediately.

Did you go to Dr. Lancaster's [seminar]? I think some of you went to Dr. Lancaster's seminar the other day. [One word] was making good point about, you know-good explanation to-how to take care of things. If you know something [is] wrong with your car, you should immediately [laughs], you know, stop your car and work on it. That is good point. But usually we don't. "Oh, this is minor problem of my car. [Laughs, laughter.] It doesn't stop," you know. "Let's go." That is not our way, you know. We should take care of our car very carefully, even though we can go on and on. But if you go on and on with many problems, the problems, you know, is constantly, you know, working on your car until it will create some destructive harm to your car.

Student A: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student A: What if-what if you know there is something wrong with your car, so you drive very slowly and you try to find out where the problem is? Can you do that? Or do you have to stop completely?

Suzuki-roshi: Well maybe you can drive slowly [laughs]. Well, anyway you should take care-immediate care is necessary, which you don't [laughs]. Perhaps if it-if you think it is minor problem, you don't do that, and you don't realize how dangerous it is, you know, to take care of-to have minor care of things. This is, I think, big problem for our society, you know. This point is missing, you know.

So as long as you [don't] violate your state law or federal law, you know, you feel you are [not] doing anything bad, you know. But even [though], you know, you do not violate your rules, you know, you are doing something which will result [in] some big result. And when you find-until you find yourself in some immediate, you know, necessity to violate your law when it is too late.

It looks like-you may say this is-it-our way is too, maybe, too timid or something. But this-when you find out-when you think, you know, when you understand this teaching is just about our desires, you may understand in that way. But if you understand this way of this kind of practice include our zazen practice and all-whole area of Buddhist teaching. One teaching covers whole teachings we have. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.] ... [whether it is Buddhist][6] way. It covers whole area.

If you think, you know, how to apply Buddhist teaching to your everyday life, you know, if that is, you know, why you practice zazen, that is wrong practice, you know. Buddhist-Buddha's teaching is here, and your life is here, you know, and you are borrowing some-you are-you are asking some aid from Buddha, or you-you ask Buddha's advice so that you may feel better, as if, you know, you think if you don't violate your law it is okay whatever you do. You-you have some excuse, you know: "I am not," you know, "doing anything wrong with our-with our society. I am not in- [partial word]-creating any-we are not creating any trouble between our countries," you know. But if you, you know, push your policy to the limit, what will happen? And when you find yourself-"Oh, we cannot," you know, "we have [to] stop our car." Maybe that is too late, you know. And it takes quite a lot of strength to stop it. So everyday care is very important.

You may always say "Rinzai way" or "Soto way," but there is no difference between Rinzai or Soto. But we are-we have, you know, we are just more-more careful, you know, in our everyday life and in our practice, that's all-in our way of practice. When we have this kind of idea of practice, according to the person's ability, you know, we can help with each other. Everyone has a good position, you know. Everyone will be very useful person in our society when-only when we try to take care of things with, you know, complete attention. When we rely on some, you know, strong way, then, you know, people needed will be limited. Unless you have strong, you know, physical power or sharp, you know, mental power, you cannot help people. But when we have very-various-when our way is very cautious, cautious enough not to leave anything behind, then everyone will have their own position in our society, and everyone can have good practice. I think this point should be aware of more. Do you have some more questions? Hai.

Student B: What do you mean by "good karma" and "bad karma"?

Suzuki-roshi: Karma is, you know-karma is a kind of, you know, succession-link of, you know, like a chain of cause and result which has-which is not bad or good, you know. But because-because we have-because of the viewpoint we take, it can be a good karma or bad karma. But anyway, karma is going. Hai.

Student C: In our actual life, what does it mean to stop?

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student C: In our actual life, what does it mean to stop?

Suzuki-roshi: Stop?

Student C: To stop to take care of-

Suzuki-roshi: Stop? [Laughs.]

Student C: -some minor problem.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, I-

Student C: Some [?] reaction of "stop."

Suzuki-roshi: I-I don't mean to stop and wait or escape from it. Yeah? You cannot escape from it. Actually you cannot stop. [Laughs, laughter.] Even though you look like stop [laughs], you are, you know, still going to prepare for something-to go ahead-to go on. That was, maybe, you know- Hai.

Student D: Does the "stop" mean that you try to withdraw from too much involvement in what happens so that you can detach yourself enough from it to really see what's happening? I want to see what I'm doing, yourself.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student D: It like a-it's like-it's a kind of a slight[ly] diminished involvement.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student D: Does it mean something like that?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. What I mean, you know, is more intuitive things, you know-not to think or, you know-but what I'm talking about is, you know, how, you know, how much misunderstanding you have or how much deluded you are, you know, in your own idea of good or bad, you know, good practice or bad practice, or in dualistic thinking mind. To get rid of those, you know, understanding of life I am talking-this kind of things-to know what you are actually doing.

Student D: Actually one can attempt to know one's motivation, but one can't really know what is good and what is bad-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student D: -because sometimes you think you do a good thing and it turns out to have been a bad thing after all [1-2 words unclear].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, at the same time. So, you know, in-when-only when you practice, you know, zazen without having-without being bothered by idea of good or bad-good sound or bad sound-you-when you accept it, when you have oneness of-you-subjectivity and objectivity, then, you know, that is the way how we are-we should go. That is the point of, you know-the point. And what you should do to find out some way thinking about which way we should take-that is not what I mean. It is confusing because I am talking-because I use the word "good" or "bad" or "to stop" or "go ahead," you know. But if you know what is your practice, you know, how you take care of yourself in zazen, you know, that is the way you take care of yourself. That is the point [laughs] of my, you know, my talk. Why you cannot completely agree with me [laughs] maybe is you take my word literally, losing the point of my talk. So- Hai.

Student E: Sometimes after sitting I-I will sit, and it will be very-I'll feel very good about it. And then after I've finished sitting I get up, and for a while afterwards I'll be-I'll find myself being irritated or nervous-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student E: -about any little thing-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student E: -and I'll-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student E: -lose my temper or-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student E: -be very-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student E: -irrational-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Mm-hmm.

Student E: -for, you know, half hour or so after I finish sitting.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. But-

Student E: It's like, one minute I'm sitting very quietly and then-

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah. That is very much so.

Student E: -for a half hour-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student E: -I'm very intimate [?]. I'm-not quiet, but jumpy and angry.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm

Student E: And I was wondering what-

Suzuki-roshi: What you should do. [Laughs, laughter.]

Student E: Yes. What should I do. [2-4 words unclear] if that's okay-if maybe that will go away. I don't know.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. At that time, you lost your practice, you know, like you lost your counting breathing when you are, you know, practicing counting-breathing practice. So even though you are counting, you know, you may lose your practice, you know. So if you, you know-so why I say instead of counting breathing or following your breathing, I say [be] more attentive to what you are doing, or to take care of yourself, or, you know, to take care of things, you know. In your practice, if you are following breathing, you know, or counting breathing, you think you are practicing zazen. But it is not always so. Even [laughs] though you are sitting very straight without, you know, sleeping, but sometime your zazen is not there. If you [are] really practicing zazen, you know, you have no second notion or no second thought. All the thought you have will be only direct thought which will come over-no second thought of good or bad-what it is, you know: "I shouldn't be bothered by it."

So delusion is-may be divided-there are two kinds of delusion: the delusion itself, you know-delusion which, you know, which can be understood various way, but-delusion itself is same but, you know-which can be many things-delusion which arise simultaneously. But delusion is one, you know-which is not [laughs]-when we are not in oneness of the mind, that is delusion. And delusion which will arise as a second notion or second thought is also delusion. Because of that, our practice will be divided in various way because of the second notion of good or bad, agreeable or disagreeable. When it comes to you, you know, it is not good or bad.

So after [laughs], you know-so only way is when you, you know, eat, you should eat: "Oh, thank you very much." [Laughs.] That is our way, based on pure practice. And if you practice long enough and attentive enough to your practice, you will easily, you know, find out where you are in your everyday life. And if you find out yourself where you are, there is no problem any more because only way is to resume your own way. So you have no one to be mad at [laughs].

So I am-actually I am giving you some material to test your practice, you know, as I told you, from other angle, you know, to encourage your good practice. So this is not just-what I'm talking about-small desires or something like that is not-not as a[n] art of life, you know, but what is the right practice. Hai.

Student F: Sometimes we speak of pure practice.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student F: Sometimes we speak of good practice.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Mm-hmm.

Student F: Are they the same, exactly?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, pure pr- [partial word]-same, I-pure practice, good practice, yeah, real practice, yeah, same.

Student F: But-but we sometimes also say that real practice goes beyond good and bad.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student F: So-so good practice is actually-I don't know. If it's good, it should be good, but if it is beyond good, then it should be bad too.

Suzuki-roshi: Beyond [laughs]-it is just words, you know [laughs, laughter]. Your mind is very, you know, very fancy. His mind is very fancy [laughs, laughter].

Student F: Okay. [Said in a humorous tone of resignation.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. [Laughs, laughter.] Some other questions?

Student G: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student G: I don't exactly how to tell you-can you do two things at a time-

Suzuki-roshi: No.

Student G: -and stay healthy through them [preceding five words uncertain]?

Suzuki-roshi: No. [Laughs, laughter.] That is not possible.

Student G: Not even if you do one just a little bit?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. No. That is not possible, you know. That is why, you know, it is easy, you know. If you can do two things at the same time, we will [laughs]-we will have a big trouble, you know. It is good, you know, that we can do-we can choose some-only one things, you know. We cannot choose two, anyway. Only when you fool yourself and you, you know, you are making excuse for yourself, you can do it. If you become very sincere with yourself, you cannot do that.

Student G: Well, if we live here and have a job outside, that's kind of like doing two different things.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Looks like [laughs, laughter] Zen Buddhists cannot eat or drink. [Laughs, laughter.]

Student H: Roshi, how can you tell if you are doing two things or one thing?

Suzuki-roshi: Two things or one thing.

Student H: Is it not always one thing if you do it in the right spirit?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. It is one thing, actually. But after you did something- or before you do something, you may say [it is] two things. But actually, when you start involved in something, it is-it cannot be two. So if you do things, you cannot do bad things, you know. So easiest way to do, you know, something [is] to choose something more appropriate to do at that time. I don't say [?] "something good" [laughs] because you will raise some other questions [laughs, laughter]. Some-some more questions?

Student I: Roshi? Sometimes there is "do not waste time"-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student I: -and other times it's "to be patient."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student I: But-and they seem as if there's two different ways.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student I: So if I do this, I'll be not wasting time. If I do this, I'll be impatient.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Yeah.

Student I: But shouldn't one-shouldn't they be the same?

Suzuki-roshi: "To waste time" means, you know, to waste time is-means without, you know, making-without having oneness of your mind with something else is to waste time in its-what-according to what we mean, you know. To waste time is to-to be involved in dualistic thinking only, without, you know, having the root of the practice. That is "to waste time." When we do not practicing our way, it is waste of time.

"To be patient," you know-it doesn't matter whether you are doing things quick or slow, okay? And that is also renunciation, you know. Renunciation means to refrain from dualistic world. Even though you are doing something in dualistic world, you know, we should be free from- on the other hand, we should be free from the idea-dualistic idea. Or you may say if you do one thing only, you know-if you make best effort on something you do, that is renunciation. That is non-duality. That is, you know, to be patient sometime. When your full effort [is] on your practice, that is, in short, not to waste your time. Okay? Yeah.

Student J: How about making plans for the future-what about working for a goal in the future?

Suzuki-roshi: For future. Future, you know-you say "future," you know, but future is-in-at the same time, right now. It is just word, you know. You project your activity in framework of past and present and future. There is no actual future, you know. Future will be different even though you, you know, have some plan or some idea about your future activity based on your present, you know-based on things you are doing right now. But-but [if] the plan is not related on your present situation, it is not-it is daydream. So sometime you will be involved in just daydream, you know-the typical type of [laughs] dualistic mind.

Student K: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student K: Does that mean that to think about what you want to do in the future is an entirely useless activity?

Suzuki-roshi: No, I don't think so.

Student K: You can think about what you want to do in the future without involving yourself in delusion?

Suzuki-roshi: If it is really future plan, you know, the future plan should involve present situation, or present situation should involve future plan. They must be-that-that future plan is a kind of possibility, you know, which is included-which is already in present situation. There may be various possibility, you know. Present possibility [is] not something which exist in future, or else [laughs] you will not [would not be able to?] think about it, you know. If there is no possibility, you don't think.

Student L: Is the future now in possibilities, or is it-

Suzuki-roshi: Future?

Student L: -actually something that actually is just occurring now, along with the past? And can we realize that there is no passing time and survive like [sounds like student snaps his fingers twice].

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Ahh [like a sigh].

Student L: How do you cope with the world as it appears-

Suzuki-roshi: C- [partial word]-appearance.

Student L: -as everyone else seems to see it appearing?

Suzuki-roshi: Appearance. Future appearance. It-it is question of reality, or appearance and reality, or phenomenal, you know, things and some ontological being, or a problem of present and future, or-?

Student L: Excuse me?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] I don't, you know, I don't catch my-my frame of [laughs]-framework of my mind does not catch your, you know, question, so that is why I am asking.

Student L: Well, I was wondering if the future exists as possibilities now, or does it exist as-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: -well, to me it appears as if, in the future, I'll be in another place and time, which I had read is illusion. But I don't see the same that-I don't see all the events of my life as simultaneous. It seems like if I saw them as simultaneous, I'd be very confused, or, you know, I wouldn't be able to cope with each event. Do you understand what I'm asking?

Suzuki-roshi: [Probably makes some gesture. Loud laughter.] Hai. I am sorry.

Student M: He said if there is no past or future, then everything's happening in his life at the same time, so that makes for one big confusion because then things wouldn't be happening before and after each other. [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: No. You know, the present has various meaning or face, you know-angle. But actually it is one, you know, interp- [partial word]-many interpretation of the present fact-event you have. As a possibility, there may be many possibility in, you know, in this present moment, but before it happens, nothing happens. So there is nothing to worry [about]. There is no confusion.

Is it okay? Yeah. [Laughs, laughter.] Yeah, it is-you are right. It is rather difficult to accept, you know.

Student L: Well, I hear certain things said and then I-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Yeah.

Student L: The world still appears-

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student L: -as time to time [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Yeah.

Student L: And I'm just asking you about how it really is.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. [Laughs, laughter.] Unfortunately, I am not so interested in [laughs], you know, some fancy idea [laughs] or many interpretation of things, you know. Oh. Some more question? Hai.

Student M: I was reading Trung- [partial word]-what's the guy who wrote Meditation in Action?[7] [Laughter.] He said-Trung- -Trungpa?

Student N: Chögyam Trungpa.

Student M: He said that-he made this comment-we have images of ourselves, you know, like sometimes you get the image that I'm-when you sit in meditation you have a fine image of how you sit-"I want to sit real good," you know.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student M: He said that you should examine you-

Suzuki-roshi: You should examine yourself?

Student M: -examine in close.

Suzuki-roshi: Closely.

Student M: Yeah. And I was wondering the best way to do that. [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: To examine?

Student M: Well, I have the image of myself as-when I walk, say-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student M: -I see myself. It's impossible to lose, you know.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. [Laughs, laughter.]

Student M: I wondered the best way to deal with it-deal with these images.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. To have feeling of Zen when you are walking or something-when you are eating.

Student M: To feel it rather than see it.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. What I mean is not, you know, to feel-to see yourself objectively. I don't mean so. Or to-to examine yourself, maybe, does not mean to, you know, to, you know, to see your mudra or, you know, to see your posture [laughs, laughter]. I don't think so, you know. If you are in perfect meditation or not will be the point. So when you walk, walk. What you should realize is, you know, when you are out of practice, then, you know, you will realize, "Oh, I lost my practice." In that way, rather than t- [partial word]-I, you know-to-to check yourself whether you are perfect or not, to check yourself whether you are-you lost your sitting or not. It is easy to find, you know, yourself when you lose your meditation. It is very easy. Then, you know, I think you have-you will have good practice eventually.

Student O: Excuse me, Roshi? Earlier Pat said something about dualistic practice. I experienced that. Is that bad practice? A lot of times, when I'm away from the building I practice chanting to [?] Buddha, and when I-Suzuki-roshi: Out of building.

Student O: Yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Uh-huh.

Student O: -as part of my practice.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh huh. Yeah. Uh-huh.

Student O: Is that a bad practice?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] Yeah, we have that kind of tendency, and I understand that, you know. After doing something seriously, you know, you may, you know, feel: "What I-what have I been doing [laughs] all those days?" [Laughs, laughter.]

Student O: I just-my involvement with the people here-I get completely involved. I'm meeting all kinds of fascinating people.

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. Yeah, but-we cannot be al- [partial word]- completely-we cannot continue practice always, you know. But you-if you know what is good practice, you know, then that will be a great help. And, if possible, you know, to-to have good practice when we are liable to lose our practice, that is very important. For an instance, after you sit for a long, long, long time, you know, [you may think] "Oh, sesshin is finished! [Laughs.] Rrrr!" [Laughs, laughter.] That will be almost all the people want to do. But that is not so good, you know. If you know that, you know, you should be careful. It is not so difficult, you know. If you are a little bit careful, you know, you can continue your practice. My policy was-before-with my-my policy with myself was, you know, to be-to remember the word "apt to" or "liable to"-to be so or to do so "liable to." That helps a lot. "We are liable to be so, but be careful." [Laughs.] That kind of thing is not so difficult, you know. Just to be-to know that-just to remember that word is-may be good help. Hai.

Student P: Sometimes we-we have an attitude of practicing, and sometimes we don't.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student P: What-what do we do when we don't have an attitude of practicing?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That [is a] good question. [Laughs.] You know, if I use the word "liable to," you know, people [are] liable to try not [to] practice zazen when you don't want to, you know. In such case, you should practice [laughs] zazen, you know. That will be the very good practice, you know. When you practice zazen when you want to, you know, then that practice has various danger or various wrong possibility. But when you do practice zazen when you don't want, you know, not much danger in your practice.

Student P: [3-4 words unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Do you-hmm?

Student Q: I don't know if that was your question.

Student P: I don't know if that's the question that I asked or not.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah, maybe so. [Laughs, laughter.] Your question, you know-almost all our questions will be answered [laughs], you know, in some other way [than] you want to ask me. For an instance, what will be how we should, you know, get out of birth and death, you know? What you may, you know, what you expect from him [a Zen master] may be, you know-even though you die, you know, you will have next life, you know, so it may be okay, you know. But almost all Zen master believe in-who believes in next life will not give you that kind of answer [laughs]. His answer will be, you know: "The life is such-and-such," you know. He will not answer-he will not give you the answer which you want. [Laughs, laughter.] And he will [be] very much concerned about your question: Why you make such a question, you know? And he will stick to the, you know, reason why you make question. [Sentence finished. Start of second tape.] ... to ask question. Maybe it's better to think, "Why do I make that kind of question?" Then question will be answered.

Student R: Roshi, you said that if something was wrong that we should stop and fix it. And in my life, if I feel something is wrong-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student R: -one of the ways that I try to do what I do is to sit zazen.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student R: But I can't see what it is. I can't find it. And no matter how I try, I-what should I do?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student R: How can I see it to fix it [?]?

Suzuki-roshi: How-yeah. Maybe, you know-how long, by the way, have you been practicing?

Student R: Two years.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student R: Two years.

Suzuki-roshi: Two years? Excuse me. [Drinks water.] I think you will-you will understand pretty soon.

Student S: I've been practicing five years. When will I understand?
[Loud laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: You don't understand-do you know why? [Laughs.] Do you know why?

Student S: No.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. [Laughs.] Maybe you-because you are trying to practice good practice. Maybe that is the reason. Hmm. Yeah. This is very good question. That will be the question almost all students will have, I think. [Laughs.] But, you know, you shouldn't be disappointed. The only way is to continue your practice because there is no other way, you know, to solve our problems. Just to continue our practice-there is no other way.

Student T: When you said there is no other way, what do you mean? There is no other way from what?

Suzuki-roshi: From-from practice of zazen.

Student T: There is no other way from-other than practice of zazen to find out who you are?

Suzuki-roshi: I don't think so.

Student T: Then [SR laughs, laughter]-then what is meant by-when-when-when it is said that there are many, many different ways, and that-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Many-Student T: -zazen isn't necessarily the way-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student T: -for that individual?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Yeah. What it means [is] there are many and many ways, you know. But it looks like it means-it looks like there are many and many ways, but that is-if it is, you know, really, actually-actual way, that is various name of zazen practice. It means, you know-it looks like many and many ways, but actually it is one way if it is actual practice. If it is not daydream or, you know-whatever you do, it looks like different, but actually it is one practice of Zen. And you may say-

Student T: Yoga is a different way than Zen.

Suzuki-roshi: Looks like. [Laughs, laughter.]

Student T: Well, okay. Okay. But I-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Oh, I see. Yeah.

Student T: [2-3 words unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Okay. Thank you very much.

---

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (12/18/00).

[1] Case 53 of The Blue Cliff Record. The teacher was Jiangxi Mazu Daoyi (Baso Doitsu): 709-788. The disciple was Baizhang Huaihai (Hyakujo Ekai): 720-814.

[2] Ryogen Yoshimura-sensei: Soto monk who came from Japan to San Francisco in 1969 to help Suzuki-roshi. (See Wind Bell, 1970, Vol. IX, No. 1, p. 30.) He died at a young age after returning to Japan.

[3] Sotan Ryosen Tatsugami-roshi: Soto Zen master and ino-roshi at Eihei-ji monastery in Japan for many years. A teacher or master of Jean Ross, Grahame Petchey, and Philip Wilson (all students of Suzuki-roshi) while they attended Eihei-ji. He visited Tassajara to help establish monastic forms and practices, and he was head of training at Tassajara for the Spring and Fall 1970 practice periods.

[4] Nirvana Day is the observation of the traditional Mahayana date of Shakyamuni Buddha's death, usually falling on the second Sunday in February, which in 1971 was February 14.

[5] This verse is from the Dhammapada, Verse 49. Literally: "As a bee without harming the flower, its colour or scent, flies away, collecting only the honey, even so should the sage wander in the village" [Dhammapada, trans. by Narada Thera Vajirarama, 1963, p. 53]. Suzuki-roshi is probably translating from a Chinese text (see p. 3). This verse is also commented upon in SR-71-08-03. The source(s) of the other quotes is not yet known.

[6] Text in brackets is from note on back of original tape case.

[7] Chogyam Trungpa, Meditation in Action. London: Stuart & Watkins, 1969.

3 - Lecture at Reed College, Portland

Friday, March 12, 1971

Lecture at Reed College, Portland, OR

It is not so easy to say what actual practice is, what Zen is. But anyway, I want to try. First of all, why we practice Zen may be the question most of you have. As you know, Buddha's first teaching is the Four Noble Truths. According to him, our life is a life of suffering. And if you know the cause of suffering, you will know how to go through our suffering, and you will attain Nirvana or enlightenment.

Tonight maybe it is better to explain why we suffer. Suffering includes various kinds of confusion or fears we may have because of our lack of understanding of our life. The reason we suffer, according to the Buddha, is because we have desire. Desire cannot be broken, because we have too much desire-there is no limit to our desire. That is why we suffer-because we have interest in strong desire. So our suffering will be limitless, deep and long. The suffering you feel is as deep as a night when you cannot sleep is long. When you cannot sleep, the night maybe very very long for you. That is why we suffer. The root of desire is so-called "ignorance" or "darkness." Ignorance means ignorance of our life, ignorance of human nature. If we know human nature and how we live in this world as a human being, then we will know why we suffer and how to go through suffering. I don't say that you will go beyond it, or that you eliminate suffering. But if you know the cause of suffering, which is ignorance of our life, then maybe this knowledge will be a great relief for you. Moreover, you will find out how to cope with our suffering. For instance, if you sit in a cross-legged position like this, at first you will have pain in your legs, as some of you must have experienced already. It is not so easy to deal with the pain you have in your legs as you sit. If some of you sit thirty or forty minutes, without any instruction, you will know how you can deal with suffering. The way to deal with, or to overcome your suffering is actually the precepts which the Buddhists observe. But the precepts still will not be good enough, because you don't know how to limit your original ignorance. So to work on the source of suffering and also to hunt the many big branchings of suffering is the true way to cope with the suffering you have. That is actually zazen practice. Through the practice of zazen you can cope with original sin, original ignorance, or darkness, and with the weaker branchings of suffering. I think the everyday lives of all of us are actually involved in this kind of suffering which originates from the source of ignorance.

Maybe I should explain more about ignorance. Ignorance means the dualistic thinking-mind and feeling-mind, or discrimination. That is the root of ignorance. Thinking mind is the first step of ignorance. It may seem strange, but according to Buddhism, it is so.

The other day I read Sasaki Roshi's lecture with questions and answers which you have. He pointed out that dualistic thinking mind does not catch reality. It will catch the shadow of reality, but it is not possible for dualistic thinking mind to have actual reality. For instance, when you say it is 8 o'clock now, it may not actually be exactly 8 o'clock-it may be a few seconds after 8 o'clock. Then you may say a few seconds after 8 o'clock, but then it may be one minute after 8. You know it is not possible for our thinking mind to follow reality. Our thinking mind is always behind reality. The characteristic of our thinking mind is that it will result in contradictions because the viewpoints we take. For instance, the idea of time is the idea of continuity-time is continuous. But at the same time, the idea of time is discontinuity. When you say it is 8 o'clock you take the idea of time as discontinuity. But on the other hand, time is continuous, so which is right-continuity or discontinuity? Both are right. But you will be confused. The reason we become confused is that we want some definite answer for our questions. But your thinking mind will not have any definite answer for your questions. If you want to have some definite answers, you must take some other approach. The approach you may take is to have direct experience of time. But time is an idea, so it is not possible to have a definite experience of time, then you should appeal to direct experience of things which change, always, as time goes.

That is actually how we have a final answer for our life. Again, this is our practice. Here I must explain our practice a little bit more. When you sit, at first it is almost impossible to stop your thinking mind. You can do it, but you cannot stop it completely. One after another, various images come. Or if you work on a koan, as long as you are working on it, your thinking mind will be concentrated on one thing only. If your mind is occupied with only one thing, it is as if you have stopped your mind. You have a chance to have direct experience of your life at that time.

If you cannot attain enlightenment, as long as you sit in some certain form, with various instruction about your breathing and posture, then your mind and body is open to the various things which come to you. You are open to everything, and your mind follows. At that time, you actually have direct experience of your own being and the outside world, your surroundings. When your practice is good enough, mature enough, then you practice zazen with your whole body and mind. For instance, you must take care of your mudra, because this mudra includes everything, just as our practice includes everything. The reason we say this mudra, or our practice includes everything, is that when you practice, you are taking care of everything, your whole body and mind. And this kind of feeling will be extended to whatever you do, whatever you see. You will see a thing not as an object, but as one part of something much bigger. So to take care and confused is that we want some definite answer for our questions. But your thinking mind will not have any definite answer for your questions. If you want to have some definite answers, you must take some other approach. The approach you may take is to have direct experience of time. But time is an idea, so it is not possible to have a definite experience of time, then you should appeal to direct experience of things which change, always, as time goes.

That is actually how we have a final answer for our life. Again, this is our practice. Here I must explain our practice a little bit more. When you sit, at first it is almost impossible to stop your thinking mind. You can do it, but you cannot stop it completely. One after another, various images come. Or if you work on a koan, as long as you are working on it, your thinking mind will be concentrated on one thing only. If your mind is occupied with only one thing, it is as if you have stopped your mind. You have a chance to have direct experience as your surroundings change, is there actually no suffering; because that is non-dualistic thinking. That is zazen practice. Usually our activity is involved in the dualistic area. But in Zen practice our mind is not dualistic-our mind is always with things, one with things and non-dualistic. Whatever we seek is part of our strength. That is actually our practice.

If you attain enlightenment, you can work on the root of ignorance, the root of duality. Even if you don't attain enlightenment, you will have this practice of not fighting with things. Then you can be with the suffering without cutting off the chain of suffering. At that time, it is not suffering anymore. When you attain this kind of practice, you will be called a Bodhisattva. Bodhisattva mind is the mind which becomes one with everything, helping others as one takes care of oneself. Actually, for Bodhisattva mind, there is no self, or this is only one self which includes everything. Anyway, it is not dualistic. When we say "I help you," that is dualistic. Without having any feeling of me or you, practicing zazen with you is Bodhisattva practice. For instance, if my hands take hold of a cup, this cup is already practicing zazen with me. Instead of saying, "I have a cup," my practice includes this cup. In this way, your practice will include everything.

The Bodhisattva way is many ways, but the most important point is to become one with others, to be kind and to have a warm feeling for others, with your mouth or with your life, to give teaching or to give materials things without any idea of giving or receiving, just giving with a warm heart. To help people in various ways, making tea or scrubbing the floor, or cleaning the restroom, without any idea of, "This restroom is dirty," is the Bodhisattva way. Just with a warm, good feeling you clean the restroom. In that way you can help people, and you have no confusion or suffering. This is how you extend zazen practice to your everyday life.

I think most people practice zazen when they don't have many problems, when they feel very good. But actually, you should practice zazen when you don't feel so good. The you will know how to live with your problems, how to take care of your problems without escaping from them, without fighting. You should practice zazen when you have problems, when you have bad feelings, -anxiety, confusion or hatred. And when you have good feelings, you may think it is not necessary to practice zazen, but that is also a mistake. The reason you have good feelings is because of your dualistic mind. A very good feeling is very dangerous because it is the other side of the bad feeling. So when you have good feelings, you must also practice zazen. When you have neutral feelings, it may not be so dualistic, , so it may not be necessary to practice zazen. Sometimes we practice zazen with neutral feelings, but that is not real zazen.

All of us right now are wearing everyday clothing, but if someone gives you new clothing, then you will give up your old clothing. Even though you say you have neutral feeling, it is not so. We always have latent desires sleeping in our pocket and waiting for a chance to come out. When some new clothing is given to you, then all at once the black snake of discrimination will come out. The way you can tell a Zen student is well trained is that their mind is always warm and kind, always calm, and not dualistic. But even for a good student there is some chance for the black snake of discrimination to come out.

In China we have an old, old interesting story. An old Chinese lady was having to take care of a Zen Master. While she was taking care of him, her daughter came. Her daughter was very beautiful and 18 years old. So the old lady maybe to test the Zen monk, told her daughter to give him a big hug and see his reaction. The daughter did as she was told, but he was like a wall or stone. His mind did not move. The old lady became very angry with the monk. She expelled him and burned down the house he was staying in. What do you think about that? There are various answers for that. Maybe a true Zen Master should not be like a wall or tree or stone. He should be human even though he practices zazen. Maybe that is why she burned down his home. She experimented with him. But Dogen Zenji's understanding or answer for this story is that the Zen monk did not lose his calmness of mind, which was very good, and the old woman who banished him, who experimented, was also good. And Dogen Zenji says, "Full of tears, the old lady must have experimented." That was the second test. The first test was agreeable, and the second was the opposite-she experimented and burned his home. And still he practiced. She wanted to know his reaction. Without complaint, he went away. So according to Dogen Zenji, the monk was great, the daughter was great, and the old lady was also great. They are three great teachers.

So it is rather difficult to know who is a well-trained teacher and who is not. If your teacher understands what real practice is, then, by talking to someone or by a glance at someone's face, the teacher can immediately see into that person's practice. A well-trained Zen Master expresses some feeling without anything being said. So there is no need to test--just to see him is enough. You can immediately feel his power of practice. At that time. True practice is right there.

You may say Zen is very difficult, but actually Zen is soft, because there is no limit to our practice, as there is no limit to our desire. If there is no limit to our desire, our practice has no limit. But even though there is no limit to our attainment, from the first step of our practice there is real complication. Real practice will help to keep you from suffering and keep suffering from arising. Again, Zen practice is not so hard. Our practice is everywhere. If you don't attain enlightenment, it is okay, as long as you do not lose these points-how to be kind to others and how to be one with others. When you have good practice, then without trying, without making so much effort, you can help others quite easily. At that time, someone who receives help will not realize that he was helped.

He is actually helping others. That is real alm-giving, and that is real teaching; to give some real teaching, not by words, but by just giving.

I prepared something (else) for this lecture, but I think it may be better for us to have some questions and answers.

Question: According to Zen theory of art, as I understand it, the painter when he paints a tree is to become a tree. Can you explain this?

Suzuki-roshi: I think you must have understood what I was talking about. To become one with it even though you don't have a picture of the tree in your mind is the way. The picture of the tree in your mind is already dead. If you are a good artist, without any picture, the tree will come out of you.

Question: Is that from feeling rather than visual?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, it is more than visual. If you depend on the vision you have, then the vision is too strong. When you have no intention, no vision of the tree, what do you have?

Question: If you reach enlightenment, is it possible to again lose enlightenment?

Suzuki-roshi: Enlightenment is not some idea or dead experience. It is actual. So you may study various Zen stories, but the actual answer for you cannot be the same. You will have your own understanding of it. It cannot be the same. You might think you can visualize or experience the same enlightenment experience again, but that is not possible. You don't have to. That kind of experience is not Zen experience. That is more like scientific knowledge.

Question: Sitting is so good and necessary to our life, so why should we even do things like going to school? Why should not we just sit all the time?

Suzuki-roshi: Zen and school are two completely different things. You should go to school, but the point is that if you think that by going to school you will be almighty, that is wrong. It is necessary for you to practice zazen. If you don't, what you acquire will be dead, will not work, or most likely, it will create more problems.

Question: Should we make an effort in our culture, even though we know we cannot make the culture what it should be, or a perfect culture?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, that is our way. Whether it is possible or not is out of the question. Because you see something, you should do it. When you see some problems, you should deal with them right now. It is not even a matter of you should or you shouldn't. We should be very honest and very straightforward in our way, to eliminate or confront the root of the problem if possible. It is a waste of time to confront the twigs and branches of the problem before the root-they should come second. First of all, it is necessary to confront the root of the problem. To resume the oneness of all being. To be part of everything and to let all things fall into our practice is the point. When we have this kind of feeling in our practice, then we can help others in its true sense. And if many people do so, it will be a great help. Something will happen. And I think we have come to the point where we should resume our original standpoint of the oneness of all being, to feel things as part of us, and to take care of things as a part of ourselves. If you do it through right practice, you are free from emotional discrimination or dualistic thinking mind, and you can help people. That is the only way to help people. If you want to help people, actually at that time you should not help people, because you want to. "You want to" is extra. You should just do it. And only through zazen practice is that possible. For instance, if you feel someone else's place with your heart, whether it is a man or woman, spiritual guardian or old lady, you can practice with the same feeling. That is how you help people without creating more problems. If you try to help them, you will create more problems for them. That is not our way. So we should work on the root of the problem.

Thank you very much.

1971 juni (8)

1 - Sesshin Lecture #1

Saturday, June 05, 1971

Sesshin Lecture #1
San Francisco

First of all, I want to explain, you know, I want you to understand what is our practice. You know, our practice we say, "just to sit." It is, you know, "just to sit," but I want to try to explain as much as possible what do we mean by "just to sit." Practice is usually, you know, practice to expect something: at least, if you practice, you know, some way, some practice, your practice will be improve. And if there is a goal of practice, you know, or if you practice aiming at something, you know, you will- your practice supposed to reach, you know, eventually, the goal of practice you expect. And actually, you know, if you practice, your practice itself will be improved day by day, you know.

That is very true, you know, but there is another, you know, one more, you know, understanding of practice, you know, like, you know, our practice is, you know, another understanding of practice. We practice it- our zazen-with two, with different, you know, understanding from this. But we cannot ignore the-our imp- [partial word: "improvement?"]- progress in our practice. Actually, if you practice, you know, day by day, you make big progress. And actually it will help, you know, your practice will help your health and your mental condition, you know. That is very true.

But that is not, you know, full understanding of practice. Another understanding of practice is, you know, when you practice, you know, there there is-goal is there, you know, not, you know, one year or two years later. But when you do it right there, there is goal of practice. When you practice our way with this understanding, there is many things you must take care of so that you could be or you will be-you can-you will be concentrated on your practice. You will be completely involved in the practice you have right now. That is why you have various instruction, you know, about your practice, so that you can practice hard enough to feel, you know, the goal of practice right now, when you do it.

You may ask me, you know, then, "My practice [laughs] usually, even in sesshin, my practice is not good enough to feel the goal of practice or to feel full meaning of my practice." You may ask in that way. Here you should apply another idea of practice, and you should know there is, you know, progress in your practice. But even though your practice is not good enough, you know, even though your practice is, you know, bad, you say, "My practice is bad," but even so there is no other practice for you [laughs] right now, you know. Good or bad, you know, that is your own practice, you know. There is no other way to accept yourself, to have, you know, approach to the perfect practice. There is no other way. If so, you know, you shouldn't say your practice is good or bad, you know. Even though you feel your practice is bad, that doesn't help your practice. Even though you say, "My practice is excellent," it doesn't help so much [laughs]. Your practice is same, you know. You are talking about your practice in various way, good or bad, that's all. We should know this point first of all.

Actually, this is how you understand Buddhist teaching. For us, you know, whatever it is, whatever you see, whatever you hear, that is actually Buddha's teaching. That is very true. And all the teaching Buddha or patriarchs taught us is interpretation of the truth we see, you know. Interpretation of the actual reality is the teaching, you know, although according to the situation, according to the time, there were many ways of explaining it, you know. Buddha explained it in his own way, according to the people with him. Bodhidharma, you know, gave instructions to Chinese people, you know, in his own way. But Buddha and Bodhidharma, you know, understood his friend is buddha and his follower is-were buddha, and buddha is nothing but what he-what they saw.

That is very true, but there is another side of the teaching. Without Buddha, without Bodhidharma, without people, you know, who may see things, you know, who live in this world, there is no beautiful flower or bright star. Because we are here, and because Buddha was there in India, there were teaching. That is another side of the truth. It means that there is, you know-what you see is expression of, you know, embodiment of the truth. But at the same time, for us, you know, subjectively, it is your own understanding of the truth, you know. When the understanding of yourself and embodiment of the truth, you know, become one there is real, you know, truth. Even though, you know, scientist, you know, explain the reality very carefully, you know, that is not truth we mean. The truth we mean is, you know, truth which is experienced actually, you know. The fact-through the fact you are facing to it come together, that is, you know, actual truth which will help us, which is our own.

So we say, "just to-just sit," you know, "just sit." And why we say "just sit" is because we have buddha-nature. So you just sit, you know. Then there is buddha-nature. So you just sit, you know [laughs], we say so. But that is not, that is, you know-if you understand fully that is good explanation, but there must be-there is misunderstanding. Most people will misunderstand "just to sit," you know. And moreover, we say, good-"Even though your practice is not so good, you know, that is perfect practice [laughs], so just to sit. Just sit."

But what you will understand will be, you know, because of your scientific mind, you know. Way scientific mind will understand is you see, you know, you objectively observe your and understand your practice, or see your practice or someone's practice, you know, "Oh anyway, they are sitting in the Buddha hall," you know, "so that is good practice [laughs]-perfect practice. There will be no need to encourage them," [laughs] you know, "and there is no need for them," you know, "to sit all day long. Maybe if, as much as possible, if they sit, that is okay. Even one hour is okay. One period is enough."

If-you may understand in that way. That kind of understanding is, maybe you could say, superficial understanding. But more clearly, if you want to understand this point, it is, you know, understanding of, you know, truth-as a[n] embodiment of the truth, you know. You don't understand-you have no understanding from the viewpoint of your subjective side.

Truth is there-always there. But if someone who do not observe the truth accept the truth, that is so-called-it, "painted cake," you know: cake on the paper which you cannot eat [laughs]. Even though you are actually sitting, you know, you are eating paper, you know, cake on the paper. So there is no taste, and you will give up because it doesn't mean anything, actually.

Or [you may say], "Zen is no good," you know, "it doesn't mean anything. Even though we sit seven days." [Laughs.] "Doesn't result [in] anything" [laughs], "so may be better to go to downtown and to eat something" [laughs], "instead of," you know, "food Zen Center provide." [Laughs.] That will be, you know, exactly, you know, what you will understand. But you, you know, you, you know, maybe you fool yourself, you know. And you are pleased, you know, when people call you Zen student [laughs]. That's all. So your practice is encouraging your ego, you know. You are not practicing Zen. If "just to sit" is like that, Zen does not mean anything. This is more-or-less intellectual understanding plus something, you know, plus some physical effort.

But our true zazen cannot be like that. If Zen is like that, Zen will not survive, you know, couldn't survive so long time [laughs]. Long time ago, Zen must have vanished from this world. Why Zen, you know, [is] still alive, you know, is because of the other side of the truth, you know: to accept the truth as your own. Various, you know, and patriarchs and great, you know, sage of Buddhist or various religion said, you know, "Buddha," you know, "left teaching just for me," [pats himself] you know, Nichiren said, you know. "Buddha left Lotus Sutra just [pats himself] for Nichiren. Just for me. Not for anyone else. Just for me."

If that side is forgotten, you know, the Buddha's teaching is nothing, you know, nothing but waste paper. "Just for me" means, you know, it is not arrogancy, you know. "Just for me" means, you know, because-when he has full appreciation of the teaching as his own, you know, he says, "All the teaching is just for me."

That is a side-that is the spirit we need in our zazen practice. Everyone can be, you know, Nichiren. Everyone can be Dogen or Bodhidharma. Because I practice, you know, zazen, there is Buddha, there is Dogen, there is Bodhidharma, and there is Buddha's teaching.

Actually, you know, we should realize that, you know, I am-you are only, you know, one being in this world. No one else exist. You are the only one who exist in this world. And that is very true. No one can take over your position. And that is very true, so all the teaching is just for you.

When you are young, you have no such feeling, you know [laughs]. You think you live fifty more or one hundred more years [laughs], so today is not so valuable for you. If you become my age, you know [laughs], you will really feel, "I am just one being, you know. No one can take over my position," you know, "so I must not fool myself," you know. This is very important point for Zen student-maybe for everyone, but, you know, especially for those who practice our way this point is very important.

Without this confidence or this understanding, you know, your practice will be involved in, you know, various, you know-you will expose your weakness in your practice, you know. "Oh, no, I am not," you know, "I am not good enough," you know, "to practice zazen," you know. "Look at me. What I have been doing?" you know. "I cannot practice," you know. "Zen is so beautiful and so perfect. How is it possible for me to join," you know, "their practice?" You will expose your various weak points, and you will, you know, feel, actually feel, various weakness of your character and of your conduct or habit, you know, you have. And, you know, in calm sitting, this kind of, you know, feeling will occupy you, and you cannot sit. But whatever you say about yourself, you are only one, you know. You cannot escape from this world, because the whole world is yours. That is, you know, that is very true-more than-it is more than truth, you know, which we can talk about. This is ultimate truth, you know.

How you can deny this fact that you are, you know, only one person? Even though you can criticize yourself-that is easy. But how you can deny this fact? That is, you know, that is the point we should face. If you understand this point, you know, you have no time to say good or bad-good practice or bad practice. Because you turn deaf ear to this truth, you have time to criticize yourself. When you realize this point, you can hear or you can see the truth, and you can practice zazen. You can accept the truth, whatever it is, you know. Whatever you see, that is truth. That is expression of the truth.

How you, you know-we say our practice is to open up yourself for everything-everything you see as a embodiment of the truth, as a bodhisattva, as a buddha-to open up yourself and accept buddha. [The song "Baby I'm Yours" is playing loudly in the background.] This is why we practice zazen and why, you know, everyone can join our practice and why this practice include every activity you have in your everyday life.

This kind of practice-our practice is so-not usual practice: cannot be, must not be usual practice which could be compare to various kind of practice as a means of, you know, attain something, to acquire something. By long, long experience of many people, you know, form we take and the way we take breathing, various instructions was accumulated-human experience.

So it is, at the same time our practice can be accumulation of human experience as, you know, scientific knowledge is. But the difference between scientific knowledge and Buddhist wisdom is Buddhists put emphasis on more subjective side of the truth. Not-objective-it is not only objectively true but also subjectively it has, you know, point which could be, you know, everyone's point. Each one of us have had this point and have been practicing our way. That is why we say every one of us is Buddha, and this is how we transmitted Buddha's teaching to us all. It is not just, you know, paper transmission. Subjective side has been always with us, and this point was emphasized always without losing objective, you know, side of the truth. Sometime, you know, people ignore the objective side of the truth-people who call themselves "spiritual" person who, you know, ignore the objective side of the truth. That is also a mistake.

But if we, you know, [are] caught by, you know, the objective side of the truth and rely on the truth, you know, with idle attitude, the objective truth will not help you, as we human being already start to experience, you know. Even though we can go to the moon, it doesn't help so much. As long as we rely on objective truth, scientific truth, you know, it doesn't help. Only when we, you know, each one of us feel the truth, appreciate the truth, and when we-each one of us, you know, appreciate truth, accept the truth, and ready to, you know, follow the truth, it will work. Putting themselves outside of the truth and study the truth, you know, then when something happen to him, you know [laughs], he doesn't know what to do.

[Laughs.] Do you know the story of the dragon, you know?[1] The Chinese person liked a dragon [laughs] very much. And he talked about dragon to his friend, and he painted [laughs] dragon, and he bought various kinds of, you know, dragon [laughs]. So dragon thought, "If I," you know, "if real dragon like me visited him, he may be very," you know, "happy." So one day [laughs], the real dragon sneaked into his room [laughs, laughter]. He couldn't know what to do! Waah! [Laughs, laughter.] He couldn't even run away. He couldn't even stand up. Waah! [Laughs, laughter.]

For long, long time we have been like, you know, like him. That is not our attitude. We should be always dragon-not only, you know, more than his friend, we should be always dragon himself. Then you will not be afraid of any dragon. But, you know, you may not know what is dragon [laughs] either [even?]. So that is another, you know [laughs] side of that, you know, another difficulty, you know, because [laughs] it is difficult to appreciate, you know, dragon.

So from various angle, we should be ready to study our way. With this kind of, you know, understanding you will practice zazen. Zazen become zazen, and zazen become your own zazen, and you are buddha. And, you know, you can, you know, express your true nature in various way. That is freedom from the form of practice, you know. Whatever you do, you can, you know, express your, you know-you will be really you, you know. Whatever you do, you know, you will be buddha in its true sense. The difference between this kind of practice with this understanding and, you know, the, you know, lazy practice with poor, superficial understanding of form and instructions and teaching, you know. There is big, big difference. After all, as Buddha said, you know, you should only rely on yourself. There is no one you can rely on. You should be relying on yourself. It means that you should be boss of everything. You should see, you should understand, you know, Buddha's teaching and our practice, you know, as your own, you know. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

...[at that time don't say ... "if you say yes" = covering eyes/ears/mouth ...][2] ... or bad, you know. Don't stick to your own karma you created. You should be free from the karma, you know, and plunge into the practice on each moment. Then, you know, there is no karma, you know, who will control you. You are free from karma in our practice. And if your everyday life is based on this practice, then your life is not karmic life. It looks like, you know, the way of life of non-Buddhist and Buddhist [is the] same, but it is completely different. One is karmic life, and other is the life, you know, free from karma.

In short, you know, if you can say, "Hai" [laughs], at that moment you are free from karma. If you can say, "Hai! Yes I will!" you know, then there is no karma. When you say "bad" [laughs], nevertheless, wait a moment [laughs, laughter]. At that moment you will, you know, be bound by your own karma. Quite easy [laughs]. "Yes, I will," you know. That is how you keep our precepts.

When you receive precepts, you know, I may say, "Can you," you know, "are you sure to keep this precepts?" you know [laughs]. If you think, "Oh, 'Don't kill'. I may kill many things [laughs]." Better not to say "yes," you know [laughs]. Then you cannot receive precepts. Anyway, you should say, "YES!" [laughs]. Then you can-you are keeping precepts-you kept precepts. When you keep precepts, at that moment, you know, whole world are keeping precepts in its true sense. You know, scientific mind will not accept what I say [laughs], but, you know, as Buddha said, as you accept it or not is, you know, my problem-your problem [laughs, laughter], you know, so ideal [I dare?] say, if you say, "Yes, I will," you know, then you are free from karma.

Even though, you know, you shouldn't say- Even though you say "Yes," you know, you don't mean "Yes" [laughs]. That will be- Someone may say, you know, but, you know, actually, if you say "YESSS" [laughs, laughter], if your mind is tender enough to say "YESSS" [laughs, laughter], I may look very, you know, look like, you know, children-like, maybe [laughs], but that is the way, you know, that is the way how you keep precepts.

So after giving various precepts to you one by one in this way, and after you accept-various priest, maybe 250 or 500 [laughs] you know, one by one, and what I should say after is, "You should keep our precept always in that way," you know. The way we keep precepts should be like that, you know. You say our, you know, ceremony to give precepts is, you know, just form-formal practice. It is not so. First of all, you know, I may say, if you receive precepts, you will be a son of Buddha and you will sit with Buddha. You will be sitting with the Buddha if you receive precepts. If you don't, you know, if you are always involved in, you know, karmic life with superficial understanding of subjective or objective side of the truth, you know, you are not Buddha. But receiving precepts or practicing zazen-true zazen, true precepts-and when you actually receive it from me, from teacher, then you are Buddha, and, you know, there is no difference between, you know, accepting precepts and practicing our zazen. There is no difference.

So, you know, your teacher may say, "You should," you know, "keep our precept in this way." So when you practice zazen, your teacher may say, "You are really Buddha." It is so. And your teacher may say, "You should practice zazen always in that way." That is the way you practice zazen. So it is not just form. It include, you know, truth and attainment and, you know, progress in your practice. You have, you know, all kinds of, you know, virtue in your practice.

That is the spirit, you know, you must have in your practice. Not difficult at all. If I say "spirit," you know, "good spirit" or "bad spirit," maybe someone like Eka[3] can be a [laughs], you know, Bodhidharma's disciple. But everyone can be Bodhidharma's disciple, you know, without cutting [off] your arm [laughs].

Ahhh. Okay?

Ah? Maybe one hour? Okay. Thank you.

Thank you very much.

---

Sources: City Center transcript and notes on the original tape shell, Side B. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (4/4/01).

[1] Probably referring to the story of Sho-kung (Jap. Seiko or Shoko) in the Hsin-hsu (Shinshi Ryaku). Sho-kung loved painted and carved dragons but was terrified when visited one day by the real thing. "Do not become so accustomed to images that you are dismayed by the real dragon" (Dogen-zenji, Fukun Zazen-gi, in Nishijima and Cross, ed., Shobogenzo, 1994, Vol. 1, p. 282).

[2] Text in brackets is from handwritten notes on the original cassette shell, Side B.

[3] Dazu Huike (Taiso Eka): 487-593. Second Chinese Zen Patriarch. He is said to have cut off his left arm and presented it to Bodhidharma, who then accepted him as his student.

2 - Okesa Ceremony

Sunday, June 06, 1971

Okesa Ceremony
San Francisco

[The tape begins with Tenshin-sensei Reb Anderson reciting the verse attributed by Shakyamuni Buddha, quoted in the fascicle "Kesa-koduko," in Dogen-zenji's Shobogenzo. The translation may have been by Suzuki-roshi.]

Tenshin-sensei: I will read now a translation of the sutra we just chanted:

Listen carefully, Chiko Bisshu,[1] to the ten precious virtues intrinsic to the garment of the great field of blessedness. While common clothing encourages the growth of delusion, the Buddha's garment of the dharma, the okesa, is by no means like that.

The okesa enables one, first of all, to achieve the completion of clear conscience. The okesa covers the dishonorable conduct. It is worthy to be called "the field where perpetual blessedness grows."

Secondly, the okesa enables one to rest in the ultimate repose, eliminating discomfort from cold and heat or a poisonous insect with the preserving way-seeking mind.

Thirdly, the okesa enables one to be free from greed in the homeless life of a monk and eradicates the five false views. It directs one's effort towards the right practice.

Fourthly, the okesa enables one to elicit the same blessedness as King Brahma by paying homage on one's knees to the okesa like a banner woven with gems.

Fifthly, the okesa enables one to enjoy happiness in heavenly and human worlds under no influence of sinfulness, always in the belief that wearing the okesa identifies itself with the worship of a stupa.

Sixthly, the okesa enables one to realize that as a true monk wears and reveres the okesa, made by the three proper methods and arrangement of its materials, color, and measurement, all his conduct is uncontaminated by upward attraction.

Seventhly, the okesa enables one to realize that all the buddhas admire its virtues and call it the fertile field, because to wear it is the best way to confer benefit on all beings.

Eighthly, the okesa enables one to cultivate the root of the enlightened mind and to practice under the inspiring influence of the okesa.

Ninthly, the okesa enables one to realize that the germ of the religious awakening is like a spring seedling-that it is growing, and the surpassing result of the enlightened mind is like an autumn fruit.

Tenthly, the okesa enables one to be unspoiled by the poisonous arrow of delusion due to wearing the indestructible armor.

The Buddha has, as mentioned briefly above, admired the ten precious virtues of the okesa which surpass all description, even if one were to spend an incredible time to describe it.

A dragon with even a thread of the okesa is able to escape the hazard of falling prey to the garuda,[2] king of birds.

Crossing the sea, carrying the okesa with him, he [a person] is by no means concerned about the danger of dragon, fish, and other devils. Even a thunderbolt or unforeseen disasters, fear and stay away from those who wear the okesa. All demons simply cannot reach a layman who wears the okesa.

When one seeks the life of a homeless monk with this awareness, and wants to be free from worldly desire for the sake of practice, demons' palaces in all the ten directions will shake and collapse. And the Buddha and buddhahood will be revealed.

Suzuki-roshi: Thank you very much for your [10-15 words obscured by mike noise] ... Yoshida-roshi.[3] I have heard of how important practice is to wear okesa. But it is not so easy to meet the occasion to have or to receive okesa-especially okesa which is made in proper way, you know. It is-you may feel funny if I say "proper," but to transmit teaching properly is not so easy thing.

I don't say we have been neglected the study of okesa for long long time. But under the very difficult circumstances, it was not so easy to transmit how to make okesa, how to wear okesa, and what does it mean to wear okesa. What is the relationship between our zazen practice and okesa-wearing practice? And what is the relationship between how to make okesa and our teaching transmitted from Buddha?

If you understand how to-how to practice zazen, and how to make okesa, how to wear okesa, then you may find out the similarity of two practice. It is not similar-not only similar but also it is the expression-two ways of expression of our buddha-nature.

The word-words we explain or express the virtue of okesa and virtue of our zazen practice maybe, you know, because the home of practice [?]. But if you really understand what does it mean by those explanation of okesa and of zazen practice, you will find out, "Oh, that is not two different thing. It is just one practice. It is not different in its spirit."

Right now, I don't have enough time to explain the sutra we recited right now. But for an instance, here it says, "The miraculous or supernatural power of okesa is beyond our understanding." [4] And it will lead our practice to go [?]. And it will enrich our practice. The word "supernatural" or "beyond our understanding," you know, it is nothing but another explanation of our zazen practice. We always say, "Just practice zazen. Just practice zazen." Why we say so is even though you think about it, you know, your thinking mind will not reach the real virtue of our practice because it is beyond our understanding.

We practice zazen, you know. By practice, only by practice you will understand what it is. And you will find out the real meaning of your everyday life: eating, sleeping, working, you know-whatever you do, because [if] your conduct, your intention [attention?] is based upon our true practice it makes sense. If we lose the foundation of real practice, our life does not mean anything even though you live more than one hundred years. It does not mean anything.

Today, at last, I could receive the proper-right okesa, properly made. I don't think-I don't think it is too late for me to receive this okesa. I don't think so. I'm still think I am very lucky to receive it, you know. You may think "He is-" you know, "We thought he is a great Zen master, but he just received okesa today." [Laughs.] You may think you-you are fooled by me. But, you know, my spirit is always aiming at one thing-one truth, which can be true with everyone: layman and priest, Japanese and American, and Indian people and European nation. We are in just one truth. That is why I always say it is not so easy thing to achieve Buddha's way. It cannot be so easy as long as our cultural background is different, as long as our way of life is different, our language is different, it cannot be so easy.

But there is something which all of us aim at. The okesa is the symbol of that oneness-the expression of this, you know, one goal, one spirit. Maybe even though I receive okesa right now, even though I shave my head long, long time ago, I must shave my head again and again. Even though I received ordination long, long time ago, but still it is necessary to receive okesa. Many and many a times [1 word unclear: "really"?) this kind of sincere practice, as long as you are-you do not lose the sincerity or way-seeking mind for the ultimate goal of human being, then every time you do something, that practice will enrich your experience of dharma and strength-make your spirit stronger and stronger. And you will be really a good example of bodhisattva.

No one can be too late to receive proper okesa. No one can be too late to be ordained as a Buddhist. Here I mean-Buddhist-I said "Buddhist," but I don't mean any special, you know, religious group. Only when you neglect-only when you lose the spirit to attain the oneness of all being, including all monks, all animate and inanimate being.

You say "this religion or that religion," "layman or priest." Actually, all of us should be eventually priests-all of us, without any exception. All of us should be priest. But until we have-we can accept priesthood from the bottom of the heart-bottom of your heart, you will be laymen. As Dogen-zenji said, right now we are teacher and disciple. But all of us are actually friend-friends of Buddhist.

Those who received okesa already, you should appreciate what does it mean-the meaning of receiving it. And those who haven't, you know, respect okesa. And you should know someday you will receive okesa.

And those who joined this family by chance, also should know-or may know some day what we are doing here. Some day.

So if you practice our way, this kind of spirit, you know, whatever you do, it makes sense. When you lose this spirit, you will be lost. Even though you wear okesa, you will be lost. So, you know, to respect the truth is a very important thing. You shouldn't-you shouldn't say "this or that" because everything has some meaning as they are.

I am so happy to have Yoshida-roshi here in Zen Center to introduce the real practice for us. I met Yoshida-roshi's teacher and master [Eko] Hashimoto-roshi[5] at Eihei-ji only once. But I heard of his sincere practice for long, long time. And he is no more. So Yoshida-roshi is as a successor of Hashimoto-roshi, striving for the study of okesa and continue Hashimoto-roshi's spirit. I don't know how to express my gratitude for her and for her teacher Hashimoto-roshi. Hashimoto-roshi was a good friend of my teacher Kishizawa [Ian]-roshi and also my master [Gyokujun So-on Suzuki] who helped Kishizawa-roshi.[6]

In Japan, you say Buddhism is almost died. But I don't think so. When, you know, something looks like dying, true spirit will arise. That is always true with something which is [1 word unclear]. If it is died-if it is dying, I think "let it die." If it is not true, it will die. So, you know, Buddha take care of something which is dying. If something is true, it will arise again. And true teacher will appear in some way. It is not number of people, but the quality of our practice. I think something will happen to America, where there is so many sincere student.

Thank you very much.

Thank you very much for [several words not clear: probably addressing Yoshida-roshi, possibly in Japanese].

---

Source: Original tape SR-71-06-06. Translation of Japanese terms and research assistance by Shohaku Okumura-sensei. Transcribed verbatim by Bill Redican (12/28/00).

[1] Chiko is the Japanese equivalent of the monk's name Jnanaprabha. Bisshu is probably the Japanese equivalent of Sanskrit bhikshu, monk. The original term that Dogen used in "Kesa-koduko" is biku.

[2] The great mythical bird who feeds upon dragons; one of the eight guardians of Buddhism (along with devas, dragons, et al.).

[3] Eshun Yoshida-roshi: Teacher of okesa sewing in the lineage of Eko Hashimoto-roshi.

[4] Attributed to Shakyamuni Buddha by Dogen-zenji in "Kesa-koduko."

[5] Eko Hashimoto-roshi: 1890-1965.

[6] Kishizawa Ian-roshi: 1865-1955.

3 - Sesshin Lecture #2

Monday, June 07, 1971

Sesshin Lecture #2

San Francisco

Shikantaza, zazen, is-our zazen is just to be ourselves. Just to be ourselves. We should not expect anything, you know, just to be ourselves. And continue this practice forever. That is our way, you know. Even, we say, even in, you know (what do you say?) [laughs], even in, you know [snaps fingers], [student: "Snap of the fingers?"] [laughs, laughter], you know, in snapping your fingers there are millions of kalpas-no, cetanas. [1] The unit of time. You know, we say "moment after moment," but in your actual practice, moment is too long, you know. If we say "moment," you know, or "one breathing after another," you still involved in-your mind still involved in, you know, following breathing, you know, to follow breathe. We say "to follow breathe," "to follow our breathing," but the feeling is, you know, in each, you know-to live in each moment.

If you live in each moment, you do not expect anything. With everything, you know, you become you yourself. If you, you know, feel strictly yourself [your self?], without any idea of time even, you know, in smallest particle of time you feel yourself [your self?]. That is zazen.

Why we say so is if we are involved in idea of time, various desires will, you know, start to act some mischiefs [laughs]-they will become mischievous, you know. So-but if you, you know-when you have no idea of time, with everything, you know, you bec- [partial word]-your practice will go on and on.

So this practice is not so easy. Maybe you cannot continue this practice for even for one day, one period. If you try to continue it one period, you know, you must make a big effort. So what will you do, then, rest of the time of your five days is to extend this feeling for each period, or to prepared for, you know, for this shikantaza. Maybe that is what you can do, and this preparation, or to extend the practice to another period of time, eventually will be extended to everyday life. So everyday life-how you practice or how you extend our practice is to expose yourself as you are, you know. You shouldn't try to be someone else [laughs]. You should be very honest with yourself, and you express yourself fully. And you should be brave enough to express yourself, whatever, you know, people may say, you know. It is all right. You should be just yourself, at least, at least for your teacher, you know. You should be just yourself.

Until your teacher may say, "Okay, in that way you should continue your practice," you know. Until your teacher say so, you should try hard. And after your teacher said, "Okay, now you should continue that practice," you know, "forever. You don't need me anymore," you know. That is, you know, actual practice, actual life of you. This is, you know, rather difficult unless you trust your teacher. Rather difficult, you know. But if you find out your teacher's spirit is the same spirit as you have, then you will be brave enough to continue this kind of practice.

Sometime you have to, you know, argue with your teacher-[laughs] sometime. That is okay. You should do that. But you should be ready to give up your argument, you know, when you are wrong, when you find out yourself, you know, sticking to some viewpoint [laughs] foolishly, you know, sticking to only one viewpoint. Or when you are making some excuse, you should give up. That is how you should-how to be honest with yourself. You should give up, you know: "I surrender. Okay." [Laughs.] "I am sorry." [Laughs.]

If you cannot accept what he says, you know, until you can accept him you should try to understand your teacher. For teacher and for you, what we should do is to perfect-to have perfect communication, you know. We should try to have perfect communication. So for a teacher, you know, the important point is, you know, always ready to surrender [laughs] to your disciple, you know. If teacher thinks, you know, he was wrong, he should say, "Oh, you are right. I was wrong." [Laughs.] If, you know, your teacher has that kind of spirit, you should have same spirit, you know. That is not so easy. You may think it is easy. If you continue this kind of practice, sometime people may think he is crazy [laughs]. Something wrong with him [laughs]. But doesn't matter.

We are not same, you know. Each one of us [is] different from the other. So each one has, you know, each one's problem. So, you know, it is okay. Anyway, you should be yourself. You should not, you know- Fortunately, you have Zen Center here, you know. Advantage of Zen Center for you is-Zen Center is not shade for you, shade which will protect you, you know. It is-it is not umbrella [laughs]. But, you know, there you can, you know, you can have, you know, real practice, you know. You can express yourself fully.

And you should open your eyes to, you know, appreciate other's practice, you know. You should, you know, you should be able to communicate with each other without words. Your mind-your eyes should be open to see other's practice. It does not mean to criticize others, but to appreciate or to know others.

That is why we have, you know, rules or rituals. You may say, you know, if you are practicing zazen, no one knows, you know, no one understand your practice [laughs], but, you know, when you are practicing, it-you know, for me, it is, you know, easiest chance to understand you. Especially from the-if you-if I see from your back, you know, it is very easy to understand what kind of practice you have. So that is [why] sometime walk around [the zendo], not to hit-not to hit you [laughs] but to see you [laughs]. Very interesting [laughs, laughter].

If you are, you know, dancing or talking [laughs] or making big noise, it is rather difficult to understand you [laughs]. If you are reciting sutra, you know, each one has each one's own voice [laughs] and in the way you recite sutra is different. And it is, you know, easy to know with each other, even though you are not trying to understand. But if you practice together, eventually, you know, naturally you will be a good friend. Sometime because you know with each other [laughs], you know too well [laughs], so you-there your have some difficulty because of your small mind. But as long as your mind is big enough to expose yourself and to accept others, if you practice, you know, zazen or rituals together, then you will be a good friend.

And another point is already we have free from idea of time. You shouldn't, you know, try to be ordained, or you shouldn't worry how long you should, you know, stay layman. Or if you become priest, you shouldn't worry what will be your next step. When you are lay student, as a lay student you should, without expecting to be something, you should, you know, [be] honest with yourself. Because you try to be someone else, you lose your practice and you lose your virtue. When you try to be-when you are faithful to your, you know, position or to your work, your true being of you is there. This is a very important point.

Zen Center is, you know, community, and those who come and sit is also, actually even though they are not a member, actually they are our member. We do-even though we do not call them "member," but in its true sense they are also our member. When they come for the first time to Zen Center it may be difficult for them to know what we are doing. But more and more, they will feel what we are doing and join our practice. So those who knows, who are practicing our way, should give them some idea of practice or feeling of practice. The best way to, you know, to give the feeling of practice is to have the feeling to-each one have our feeling fully. Then naturally people who come will feel it. But if our practice is wrong, you know, they will-what they will feel is something completely, you know, different from the proper feeling a Buddhist must have.

Why wrong feeling is created is because we, you know, we have-we are involved in selfish practice. I said don't have no idea of time, you know. Why I say so is if you [are] involved in idea of time-today or next year, you know, or tomorrow-idea of, you know, selfish practice will start from there. It is all right to have idea of time, but that is the extended practice of non-selfish practice on this moment, to express ourselves.

We don't know what will happen in-on each moment. So if you fail to express yourself fully, then you will regret [it] later. Because you expect some other time, you fail to express yourself fully. And you will be misunderstood by your friend. So you should be always express yourself fully. That is why we observe-we eat in some certain way. You may think, you know, in that way you cannot express yourself, but it is not so, you know. Because you have some way to, you know, serve, you know, you can express yourself-how much sincerity you have.

If there is no way, you know, the way is-if you have many ways of expressing yourself, you know, you don't know how to do it. So if you know how to do it, you know, you can express yourself in that way. It is big mistake if you think you cannot express, you know. If you want to express yourself, it may be, you know, the best way is to do something whatever you want to do. You may, you know, do, you know, exactly how you feel, you know, superficial feeling, you know, just choosing some way, you know. Because you or when you don't know what to do. Oh, you know, this is not [laughs], you know, you are not expressing yourself. If you know what to do exactly and you do [it] then you can, you know, express yourself fully.

So in that way, strong person express himself [in a] very strong way [laughs], and, you know, kind person will express himself, you know, very kindly, doing same thing, you know. When you pass [out] the sutra card, you know, from this end to the other end, you know, each one, you know, pass it [laughs] each one's own way. So if I see it, you know, it is easy to see, you know, because they do it same way. If they do it different way, you know, it is very difficult to know. Because you do, you know, it-all of you doing same way from this corner to the other [laughs], it is easy to see [laughs]. And because you repeat, you know, same thing over and over again, so everyone can understand, you know, your friend's way, you know. Eventually, though you shut your eyes, if you [laughs]-"Oh," [laughs] "that was Katherine." [Laughs, laughter.]

That is advantage of, you know, having rules and rituals. Or else, you know, your understanding or your relationship with people-without this kind of understanding, your understanding of people will be very superficial, you know. If someone wear beautiful [rubs own robe], you know, robe you think he is a good priest [laughs]. You know, if someone give you some beautiful thing, you think he is very kind to you [laughs], you know. That kind of understanding is very superficial. If he think [bring?], you know, a beautiful thing, you know, you think she is good person [laughs]. That kind of understanding is not, you know, good understanding. Very superficial.

Usually, you know, our system of the society is built up [in] some superficial, frivolous way, you know, always changing. What, you know, the controlling power will be money or something, you know, a big noise [laughs, laughter]. That is, you know, controlling power because our eyes, our ears are not open, [not] subtle enough to see things, and we are-our feeling is very, you know, dull.

Most people who visit Zen Center may feel Zen Center is very strange place [laughs]. "They do not talk so much. They do not even laugh." [Laughs.] "What are they doing?" [Laughs, laughter.] But we, you know, actually, you know, without talking so much, we can communicate. We don't say, you know, we don't smile always, but we can feel others' feeling, and our mind is always open, and we are behaving exactly, you know, behaving-expressing ourselves fully. Actually, you know, even though you are not trying to express yourself, you are expressing yourself anyway [laughs]. If your mind is open, you can see. Those who are accustomed to, you know, big noise, you know, cannot see anything here-that's all.

We should extend this kind of practice to city life, and we must have more friend, so that we can be-all of us can be a good friend of each other, of others. It is not difficult thing when you decide to be honest with yourself and to express yourself fully, without expecting anything. Just to, you know, be yourself and ready to understand others-that is how you extend our practice to everyday life.

But it is not so easy to be free from the selfish practice. So even for one hour a day, we should try to sit shikantaza, without moving, without expecting anything, as if you are, you know, in the last minute. Moment after moment, you know, you feel your last minute. Inhaling-in each inhaling and in each exhaling there is countless, you know, units of time, and you should live in each unit of time.

And smoothly exhaling first, and then inhaling. When you, you know- Calmness of your mind is beyond the end of your exhaling. And if you exhale in that way, smoothly, without even trying to exhale, you are going to the, you know, complete calmness of-you are entering into the complete perfect calmness of your mind. You do not exist anymore, you know. And if you enter the complete calmness of your mind, then naturally, you know, your exhaling will start from there. And all the blood you have will be, you know, cleaned, catching every, you know, everything from outside, and that fresh blood carrying everything from outside and pervade your body and refresh your body. You are completely refreshed. And you start to exhale, to extend that fresh feeling to the emptiness. You exhale. So, moment after moment, without trying [to do] anything, you continue shikantaza.

Complete shikantaza may be difficult because of your pain in your legs. But even though you have pain in your legs, you can do that. Even though your practice is not good enough, you can do that. So you-your breathing-with your breathing, you know, you will vanish gradually. You will fade into the emptiness. And natural inhaling ... [Tape turned over.]

[will bring back] [2] ... bring back to yourself with some color or form. And your exhaling, again, with your exhaling, you gradually fade into emptiness-empty white paper. That is shikantaza.

I'm just explaining, you know, the feeling of shikantaza. So when you- important point of shikantaza will be, you know, in, you know, in your inhaling. You, you know- important point is- excuse me- exhaling. Instead of trying to feel yourself, but try to fade in emptiness when you exhale.

When you have this practice in your last moment, you have nothing to [be] afraid of. You are actually, you know, aiming at emptiness, empty area. There is no other way for you to have a feeling of immortality- or mortality, oh, excuse me, mortality. You become one with everything after you exhale- completely exhale- with this feeling. If you are still alive, naturally you will, you know, inhale again. "Oh" [laughs, laughter], "I'm still alive!" [Laughs, laughter.] "Fortunately or unfortunately!" So you start to exhale and try to fade into emptiness. This is, you know- you don't know, maybe [laughs], what kind of feeling it is. But some of you will know it. By some chance you must have felt this kind of feeling.

When you have this practice, you know, you cannot be angry so easily [laughs]. Because you are interested in inhaling, you know, more than exhaling [laughs], you become angry quite easy [laughs]. You are trying to [be] alive always, you know. My friend, you know, wrote on newspaper the other day. He had heart attack, and what he could do was just exhaling. He couldn't take inhale. That was terrible feeling [laughs], he said. But if he, you know, could try to exhale, you know, at that moment as if we exhale, you know, aiming for emptiness, you know, then I think he didn't feel so bad. To have exhale is great, you know, joy for us, rather than inhaling. But he, you know, he tried to, you know, inhale- take another inhale, you know. He thought he cannot take inhale anymore- inhaling anymore. But if he could try to, you know, exhale as we do, then, you know, more easily I think he could take another inhaling.

So exhaling is very important for us. So to die is more important than to try to [be] alive. Because we always try to [be] alive, so we have trouble. Instead of trying to [be] alive or active, if we try to be calmer and die or fade away into emptiness, then, you know, naturally we will be taken care of. Buddha will take care of us. Because we lose mother's, you know, bosom [laughs], we are not anymore her children, you know. So if we like, you know, the emptiness like we, you know, like we, you know, feel your mother's bosom, then mother will take care of you. The moment after moment, you shouldn't lose this kind of, you know, practice when you practice, you know, shikantaza.

Various secret of religious practice is in this point. When they [Jodo-shu] say, "Namu Amida Butsu, Namu Amida Butsu," [3] you know, they wanted to be Amida Buddha's children. "Namu Amida Butsu, Namu Amida Butsu," you know. That is how they repeat Amida Buddha's name in their practice. Same thing is true with our zazen practice. Zazen practice is not different from their practice. If you know how to practice shikantaza, and if they know how to practice-how to repeat, excuse me, Amida Buddha's name, cannot be different, you know, as long as Amida Buddha's, you know, their practice is Buddhism. As a Buddhist, we have same practice in different way.

So we can, you know, enjoy, we are free, you know. We feel free to express ourselves, because we are ready to fade, you know, into emptiness. If you are trying to, you know, to be active and special and trying to do something, you know, you cannot express yourself. Small self will be expressed, but big self does not appear from the emptiness. From the emptiness, only great self will appear. That is shikantaza, okay? [Laughs, laughter.] Not so difficult [laughs] if you try, if you really try.

Thank you very much.

---

Sources: City Center transcript and notes on back of original tape case. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (12/28/00).

[1] kalpa (Sanskrit) or kappa (Pali): "world-period"; an inconceivably long period of time; an aeon. cetana (Sanskrit): "volition" or "don't think."

[2] The text in brackets is from a note on the back of the original tape case.

[3] "Veneration to Buddha Amida" or "Veneration to the Buddha of Boundless Light."

4 - Sesshin Lecture, Day 5

Wednesday, June 09, 1971

Sesshin Lecture, Day 5
San Francisco

[I thought there was another day of sesshin, but today is our last day.]
[1]

I think you, you know, have understood- (Can you hear me? Yeah? Not so well. Okay? Mmm?) You have understood what is zazen as your practice. But I didn't explain how you sit-I didn't give you instruction how you sit in detail, but I told you, you know, how I practice shikantaza-or zazen. Maybe that is my way, so I don't know how another teachers will, you know, sit, I don't know, but that is anyway my shikantaza.

I started this practice, actually, maybe two-two years ago, after I went to [2-4 words unclear; one earlier transcript states, "cross the creek at Tassajara"] [laughs, laughter], not because I saw many good place to sit, you know. There's two [or] three caves where you can sit. But not because of that. Perhaps some of you were swimming, you know, with me at that time. Some beautiful girl students [laughs, laughter] and Peter [Schneider?] was there [laughs, laughter]. And as you-I cannot swim, actually [laughs], but because they were enjoying swimming so much, so I thought I may join [laughs]. But I couldn't swim. But there were so many beautiful girls over there, so I tried to, you know, go there [laughs, laughter], without knowing I couldn't swim [laughs], so I was almost drowned [laughs, laughter]. But I knew that, you know, I will not die, I will not drown. I shall not be drowned to death, you know, because there are many students. So someone will help [laughs]. But I was not so serious.

But, you know, feeling was pretty bad, you know. Water is, you know-I am swallowing water [laughs]. So feeling was too bad, so I stretch my arm, you know, so that someone catch me [laughs]. But no one [laughs, laughter]-no one helped me. So I decided, you know, to go to the bottom [laughs, laughter], to work, but that was not possible either [laughs, laughter]. I was, you know, I couldn't reach to the bottom, or I couldn't get over the water. What I saw is beautiful girls' legs [laughs, laughter]. But I couldn't, you know [laughs], s- [partial word]-take hold of their legs, you know. I was rather scared [laughs, laughter].

At that time I realized that we will never have good practice, you know, unless we become quite serious, you know. I knew that I was not dying, you know, at that time, so I was not so serious, so I-because I was not so serious, you know, I, you know, had very difficult time. I thought if I, you know, knew I was, you know, anyway, I was dying, you know, I will not struggle anymore. What I could do is to stay still, you know [laughs], if I am dying, you know. Because I thought I had, you know, another moment, so I couldn't become so serious.

Since then, you know, I started shikantaza expecting, you know, another moment, moment after moment I tried to sit, you know, as if I am dying, you know, in the water. That helps a lot, you know. Since then my practice improved a lot. That is why, you know, and I tried so long time, and I think I am quite-I have good confidence in my practice, so I told you, you know, how I sit my shikantaza.

It was very interesting experience, you know. I was, you know, I was among beautiful girls [laughs], you know, and that sort of thing, you know, reminded me of Buddha's overcoming demons, you know [laughs, laughter]. I am sorry, you are not evil, but, you know, beautiful [laughs] demons [laughs, laughter]. But if I am dying, you know, those beautiful girls will not help, you know. If I am really dying, not because of water, but because of my, you know, sickness or something, it will not help.

So we can sit, you know, with demons and beautiful girls, and, you know, or demons or snakes. You know, snakes is okay, you know [laughs]. When I am dying, you know [laughs], it will not hurt me, you know. Anyway, I am dying, so it is okay. And they are with me. They will be happy to be with me, and I am very happy to be with them. In that situation, everything is with us, and, you know, we are happy to be with them, by not being hurt or helped or disturbed. But usually it is difficult to feel in that way because we have always involved in gaining idea, expecting something in future. So usually it is very difficult. But when you-at least when you practice zazen, you should not be caught by, you know, you shouldn't be involved in gaining idea.

The most important thing is to confront with yourself and to be yourself. Then naturally, you know, you can accept things as they are, and you can see things as they are. You will have perfect wisdom at that time. That is why I told you my way of zazen.

Now, as Katagiri-sensei[2] told you last night, you know, you awaken, you know, from the dream. By "dream," you know, he means, you know, our usual everyday life, which is involved in gaining idea. And when you expect things, you know, in various selfish way, that is actually the dream you have. But after awakening from the dream, you know, what you mean [need?] is another to come back, you know, to actual life, which include your dream, you know.

Your dream is actually, you know, in your everyday life. Actually, you cannot stop dreaming, and you will have also-your life will not be so different from the life you have in your dream. A dream is something you-in dreams, something you experienced, you know, appears. So actually [laughs], not much difference, you know. What you do is maybe same. But when you realize that this is dream, it is our life from Buddha's viewpoint.

When you, you know, when you are able to sit, you know-practice shikantaza-and when you experience shikantaza, and when you understand the meaning of shikantaza, the meaning of your everyday life will [be] completely different. [Laughs.] Do you understand [laughs] how different it is [laughs]? If you don't understand, maybe you are not yet practicing shikantaza, maybe.

What will be the difference? You have freedom, you know, from everything. That is, you know, the main point. Usually you have no freedom from things you have or you see, you know. But if you experience, you know, or if you understand the experience of shikantaza, you will have freedom from things. And you will enjoy, you know, your life in its true sense because you are not attached to anything.

We say always do not attach to anything, but, you know, literally it does not mean, so much, attachment or detachment. Detachment is not actually opposite of attachment. Attachment can be detachment, you know. Detachment can be attachment too. So words [laughs] doesn't mean so much, you know. "Detachment," you know [laughs, laughter]. "Attachment" [laughs]. Doesn't mean so much, you know.

Anyway, you know, if you become really happy, you know, really happy, and if that happiness, you know, continues, maybe that is detachment, you know, what we mean. Most of the happiness you have is a kind of happiness which you, after having that happiness, you will be [feel] regret, you know. "Oh," [laughs], "it was," you know, "at that time," you know, "we are very happy, but now [laughs] we are not so happy," you know. You will feel in that way.

But real happiness will last in your mind always and encourage you when you are not-in your adversity or in your happy life too. When you are successful, you will be, you know, you will enjoy the success, and you, you know, even though you fail, it is also good [laughs]. It will encourage you. Not encourage, but, anyway good. You can feel, you know, the feeling of-you can enjoy the feeling of failure: "Oh, this is pretty good." [Laughs, laughter.] "Not so bad as I thought," you know. That kind of feeling you will always have.

So you have always satisfied with things. So you have always enough. You don't want too much, you know, as you wanted before. Even though, you know, you start one-hundred-day sesshin from next morning, you can do it [laughs]. You will not be discouraged. You will not say, "I cannot do that," after five days [of] sesshin, "It is too much," you know [laughs]. You don't say so. "Okay, let's do it," you may say, you know, because you know you can do it.

In your life, you know, if you come to a great difficulty, you know, like you came to big mountain-not like Tassajara. Tassajara has many ways to go through [laughs], but big mountain doesn't have any passage, you know. Looks like so, actually, but, you know, even though you go Nepal, you know, there is way to get through. One-hundred [-day] sesshin is difficult if you, you know, do it. You can do it. Even though you die, nothing happens [laughs, laughter]. It is okay, you know. Something will happen anyway [laughs]. So you are always, you know, happy, and you will not be discouraged.

Dogen-zenji explained this kind of feeling, you know, in Tenzo kyokun, Instruction to the Head Cook, you know. Even though you think, "I cannot cook with this kind of poor material," but there is way to cook. If you really want to, you know, want to make your friends happy you can do it anyway. If you have big mind, kind mind, and joyful mind always. That kind of mind arise from shikantaza. As long as you expect, you know, anything in future, you know, you cannot, you know, do things well. When you don't expect anything and just do it, something will happen there. That is actually shikantaza.

The kind of life-and the kind of life-next point is, kind of life you choose will, you know, will be different. Before you may like something great, big, and beautiful [laughs]. Number one, you know, in California [laughs, laughter]. Number one Zen Center, and Zen practice, you know, Zen practice monastery in America, in the world. Even better than Japan [laughs]-Japanese monastery [laughs]. That will be, you know, what you want before you have right practice. The things you choose will be different and way of life you take will be different.

Your life, you know, from your age of hippie [laughs], is very different, I think. Time of hippie, you know, [is] different. Very Buddhist-like. That is why you like Buddhism, maybe. But if you become a Buddhist, your life will change more-more-you will be super-hippie [laughs, laughter], not usual one. Your style of, you know, your lifestyle is-looks like very Buddhistic, but not enough. And, you know, when you have that kind of, you know, strict practice and when you ignore your practice, your weak point of practice, then eventually you will have good practice. More and more you will understand what, you know, Zen master said and appreciate their life more and more.

After my lecture, I thought about what I said, you know. Usually I forget, you know [laughs], what I said quite easily, but [laughs] the lecture I gave you was pretty serious one, so [laughs]-result of actual experience, you know. So I thought about it, you know, and I thought-I think I put emphasis on some hard, you know, practice, you know, difficult, hard practice: "Don't expect," you know, "next moment," or something. "Don't move!" [Said with mock seriousness.] [Laughs, laughter.]

But I am sorry but I have to say so, you know, because your practice looks like too weak, you know. I want it [wanted?] to make you stronger, you know. But actually what I meant was you need, you know, even though your-that your practice is not so good is okay, but that you move is maybe okay, but, you know, if you lack confidence, you know, zazen cannot be zazen. If you, you know, are not strict enough with yourself, and if you have-if you [have a] lack of confidence, then it doesn't work. That is why I said so, but what you will-what makes your practice deeper and deeper, and the experience, you know, better and better, is usual effort, you know, usual effort-day-by-day effort to sit. That makes your experience, you know, better and better.

In China and in Japan there are many teachers who attained enlightenment, you know, like this [laughs] [snapped fingers]: Chht! [Laughs.] Like this [snapped fingers again] [laughs, laughter]. You may think so, but actually that was the result of many years practice or many times of failure. This is Dogen-zenji's famous words: "That you hit," you know, "a mark," you know, "is the result of ninety-nine times failure." [Laughs.] The last arrow hit the mark, but that is after ninety-nine times failure. So failure is okay actually. But each time you, you know, hit the mark, each time you shoot you do it, you know, with confidence, you are sure to hit the mark. That is, you know, important. So Dogen-zenji said, "Ninety-nine failure is okay." [Laughs.] So anyway, I will [laughs] continue to try to hit the mark that doesn't work.

So each time you sit, you know, it is necessary for you to do your best in your practice. Anyway, if you only sit, you know, [in the] cross-legged position for forty minutes, "That is zazen," you may think. But that is not zazen. If it is preparation, it is okay. Like you practice yoga, it is okay. But, you know, the most important point should be, you know, done-all your effort, physical and spiritual.

That is why, you know, we must have good breathing. Anyway, when you do something physically, breathing follows. And if your way of breathing is not appropriate, you know, you cannot do any physical work. Even [when] you sew, you know, breathing should be-should follow. When you lift some heavy things, you know, breathing should be completely, you know, controlled, or else you cannot lift heavy thing. You may say, breathing-anyway you can take breathing, but breathing-if you want to, you know, have good breathing, you know, it is not so easy. Your posture should be right, and your mudra should be right because your mudra is a symbol of your, you know, mentality. If spine is not straight, your breathing will not be deep enough.

So if you think about those point-how to make, you know, how to control all of your mental and physical, you know, effort. Of course it takes time, you know. Enlightenment does not come when [until] you are in perfect control of your mind and body, you know. You cannot accept it. You don't feel you have enlightenment. Or, in other word, when your mind and body [are] completely one, then enlightenment is there actually. Whatever you hear, whatever you think, that will be enlightenment. So it is not the sound of bamboo hit by a stone or color of plum trees that makes them enlightened, but their practice, you know, is there. So they attained enlightenment. So enlightenment could be many-so in your everyday life, you know, you have, you know, always chance to have enlightenment. Whatever you do, you know: If you go to restroom, there is, you know, chance to attain enlightenment. If you cook, there is enlightenment. If you clean floor, there is enlightenment.

I think we are very fortunate to have various teachers. It is not just, you know, happened in this way, but previous, you know, human effort came to this point. Your culture, you know, is, you know, came to this point where you want to study Zen. Japanese Zen tradition came to the point that we need some revival. It is not-this kind of feeling didn't happened-arised in Japan just, you know, ten or twenty years. But pretty long time, this kind of, you know, movement was there.

So far as I know, Oka Sotan-roshi,[3] you know, was the-all the source of-source of all the teachers, you know-source of power of all the teachers. Tatsugami-roshi,[4] you know, studied under Harada-roshi.[5] Harada-roshi's, you know, teacher was Oka Sotan. My teacher was Kishizawa-roshi,[6] and my master was Suzuki So-on,[7] and their teacher was, you know, Oka Sotan-roshi. Yoshimura-roshi's[8] teacher, you know, is Hashimoto-roshi.[9] Hashimoto-roshi's teacher is Oka Sotan-roshi, you know.

At Komazawa [University] there were, you know, good scholar of Buddhism-Eto Sokuo.[10] He was my classmate-my teacher's classmate-master's [Gyokujun So-on's] classmate when they were studying at Komazawa. At that time, Oka Sotan-roshi was head of Komazawa.

So if we, you know-things didn't happen, yeah, to Zen Center just by chance. If we don't know what to do, if we study, you know, Oka-roshi's teaching, Kishizawa-roshi's teaching, or [Kodo] Sawaki-roshi's [?] teaching, you know. Answer is there. [Sentence finished. Tape changed.] [... because all those teaching],[11] you know, came from one source. He was a really great, you know, teacher. Not only he was a great teacher for his disciples, but also for laymen who studied under him he was a great, you know, teacher.

I wanted to tell you, you know, something about how to extend our shikantaza to your everyday life, you know, today, right now. But-and I-I, you know-I take out the interpretation of precepts by Oka Sotan-roshi. And I read, you know, preface of it [laughs], preface, which was written by Kishizawa-roshi. And in the introduction of, written by Kishizawa-roshi for Oka Sotan-roshi's interpretation of precepts, he referred to Oka-roshi's, you know, precepts lineage, which was wrong [laughs]. Which was wrong.

Kishizawa-roshi knew, you know, under the, you know, many-after many years study under Oka-roshi, what is right lineage. Lineage should be like this, he knew-Kishizawa-roshi knew what-how it should be. But Oka-roshi's, you know, his teacher's lineage was wrong because Dogen-zenji's lineage consist of two lineage: Rinzai and Soto. And came to Dogen-zenji one from Nyojo[12] Soto lineage. Another is from Myozen, [13] Rinzai master, disciple of Eisai.[14]

But his lineage is just Soto, you know-Oka-roshi's. So, you know, Kishizawa-roshi have to ask him why. "Why is this, you know? It is wrong," you [he] said, "But your lineage is wrong" [laughs]. "What is that?" you know. When he asked him, you know, Oka Sotan-roshi, you know, his face changed, and tears came down from his eyes. "Yes, it is wrong." And he started to talk about his lineage.

When Oka-roshi was young, he wanted to go to Komazawa University-

Komazawa College-you know, to study Buddhism. He wanted to go there. But his master Token[15] did not allow him or could not afford to send Oka-roshi to school, so he didn't say yes so easily. So, you know, he said, you know, "I want to study hard and become a good teacher and give precepts, you know, jukai[16]-ojukai-having ojukai-e and precepts to many people, so let me study more." And his master Token was pleased: "Okay, then you can go."

But after he finished schooling, he came back. At that time he was making, you know, wood print, you know, for lineage, you know, to make, you know, lineage paper, okechimyaku.[17] Some of you already received my okechimyaku when you received, you know, rakusu. His master was making which is wrong, so Oka-roshi explained, you know, in detail, it should not be like this, you know. It should not be just lineage of Soto, it should be Rinzai and Soto.

His teacher agreed: "Okay, maybe I was wrong, but," you know, "this lineage is the lineage which Kankei-zenji[18] had"-also famous teacher-"Kankei-zenji had. So according to Kankei-zenji's lineage, my lineage is not wrong. But if Dogen-zenji's lineage is like that, it should be like that," you know, he said. So-and then-and he said, "I will make another wood print."

But Kishizawa-roshi-you know, when he came back and saw him-when Kishizawa-roshi-Oka-roshi saw him again, he, you know, he had-he was making-he finished half of it already, which was quite good. And his-Token-his teacher-Sotan-roshi's teacher went to some specialist to make it and studied how to make it and, you know, tried to do it again.

But as Oka-roshi came back, you know, he made it although it was not complete. But he made it. And show it to him. At that time, you know, Oka-roshi ag- [partial word] now-his face changed again, and tears came down, especially when he said, "This is the okechimyaku," you know, "lineage paper for you when you have big," you know, "ojukai-e. This is for you." When he said so, he almost cried and teacher and disciple cried, you know-what do you say-hugging and cried.

And then teacher said-Oka-roshi said, "This lineage paper is okay, although it is not," you know, "exactly [as] Dogen-zenji had it. It is okay. As long as," you know, "this wood last, I will use it." So that is why Oka-roshi's lineage paper is wrong. Because it was wrong, Kishizawa-roshi accused [him], you know, why [that] it is wrong. So when he was accused, again he [Oka] cried. Oka-roshi was that kind of person. It is not usual, you know, scholar or usual great Zen master. Not usual at all-very unusual. When, you know, why we say Dogen-zenji is so great is not because of Shobogenzo maybe, but because of his sincere practice, not only as a Zen master but also as a man, you know, as a human. He was the most sincere student of Buddhism. Oka-roshi was that kind of teacher, you know.

I didn't know actually, you know, what we should do with our old okesa after, you know, Yoshida-roshi show us which-how should be right traditional okesa, you know. I didn't know what to do. But, you know, when I took out [Oka-roshi's book on the precepts], I didn't know idea of solving this problem, you know, by Oka-roshi's help. But when I, you know-I wanted to know what will be the interpretation of precepts not to act [do] unchaste act, you know. So I wanted to know about it. But what I found out is that, you know, preface [by Kishizawa-zenji], you know, I haven't read that part. It was just, I thought, it is just introduction [laughs]. But, you know, when I need it, you know, it appears in front of me like that. You may say that is just by chance, but I don't feel in that way [laughs]. If you say things happen just by chance, you know, all the things happen just by chance [laughs]. When we don't know, we say, "Things happen by chance."

Katagiri-sensei and I, you know, discussed very hard about that point-what should we do? [Laughs.] We had no answer for that. It is not things-not that kind of thing we can ask Yoshida-roshi or someone else [about]. We should solve this problem just between us, who are responsible for this.

You think, you know, things happens, you know, in this way in America, at Zen Center, you know, but it is not just by chance. It is, you know, result of many years of many peoples' hard work, sincere work. It is not just, you know, way of propagating Buddhism. To us there is no idea of Buddhism. What is the truth will be always our, you know-main point is what will be the truth.

As Katagiri-sensei said, you know, last night, breathing should be upright to the sky. And we should sit on black cushion without moving, so that we can, you know, grow to the sky. That is, you know, how you practice zazen, how I practice zazen, how Katagiri-sensei practice zazen-as a priest, as a layman, you know. There is no difference in its-in the virtue, whether you are layman or a priest, if we know what is the purpose of practice and how we should grow-what will be our way of life as a Buddhist, you know. Only difference is, you know, we put more emphasis on the truth. Usual people do not respect truth so much, you know-little bit different [laughs].

But, you know, eventually you will find out which is more important, as you have already found out. We cannot be fooled by anything so easily, you know, and we shouldn't fool anyone. We must "settle ourselves on ourselves," as Katagiri-sensei says, you know. Excuse me [laughs]. "To settle one's self on one's self," you know, that is very important point. How you do it is to be yourself on each moment. Whatever you do, you must do it, you know. You shouldn't expect someone's help. You shouldn't be spoiled by some shelter, you know. You should protect yourself, and you should grow upright to the sky. That's all, you know. That's all, but little bit different, you know. Maybe we are crazy [laughs, laughter]. According to them we are crazy, but we think they are crazy [laughs]. It's okay [laughs]. We will find out pretty soon which is crazy [laughter].

Okay. Thank you.

---

Sources: City Center transcript and notes on back of the original tape case. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Translation of Japanese terms and research assistance by Shohaku Okumura-roshi and Miyagawa Keishi-san. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (12/22/00).

[1] Sentence in brackets is from original transcript. It was not recorded on tape and is thought to have been added by Brian Fikes, the original transcriber. A note in the original transcript stated: "There were many blanks in the first couple of sentences, which I filled in. -Brian F."

[2] Dainin Katagiri-roshi (1928-1990): Japanese Soto Zen master who first came to the United States in 1963. He was Suzuki-roshi's close colleague in the early years of San Francisco Zen Center, and he went on to establish the Minnesota Zen Meditation Center.

[3] Oka Sotan-roshi (1860-1922): a professor at and ultimately president of Komazawa University in Tokyo. He was the first in a series of lecturers on the Shobogenzo at Komazawa [Carl Bielefeldt, Sati Conference, MS p. 3]. His master was Nishiari Bokusan (1821-1910), the most prominent Meiji scholar of the Shobogenzo, from whom he received dharma transmission. He was teacher or master of Ian Kishizawa, Eko Hashimoto, Gyokujun So-on, Sawaki Kodo, and Sogaku Harada. He served as abbot of Daiji-ji and was named as the first abbot of Antai-ji temple in Gentaku, northern Kyoto, Japan. Shohaku Okumura stated that Sawaki Kodo and Eko Hashimoto studied with Oka Sotan at Shuzen-ji. [See also SR-71-06-12.]

[4] Soto Zen master and ino-roshi at Eihei-ji monastery in Japan for many years. A teacher or master of Jean Ross, Grahame Petchey, and Philip Wilson (all students of Suzuki-roshi) while they attended Eihei-ji. He visited Tassajara to help establish monastic forms and practices. He was head of training at Tassajara for the spring 1970 practice period and for two subsequent practice periods.

[5] Daiun Sogaku Harada-roshi (1870-1961): Soto teacher and abbot of Hosshin monastery in Japan who, together with his dharma heir Hakuun Ryoko Yasutani-roshi (1885-1973), employed koans in the Rinzai tradition as well as Soto shikantaza. Harada-roshi and Yasutani-roshi had several Western students, including Philip Kapleau (see, e.g., The Three Pillars of Zen).

[6] Ian Kishizawa-zenji (1865-1955): a leading interpreter of Dogen's Shobogenzo in his time, and author of a 24-volume commentary on it entitled Shobogenzo zenko. He received dharma transmission from Nishiari Bokusan and succeeded Oka Sotan and Gempo Kitano as official lecturer in the Shobogenzo series (the Genzo'e) at Eihei-ji, a position he held for thirteen years. Shunryu Suzuki attended him at Eihei-ji monastery when Kishizawa was seido (distinguished visiting priest in residence). Kishizawa served as third abbot of Antai-ji. After Ian Kishizawa left Eihei-ji, he moved to Gyokuden-in, a temple close to Shunryu Suzuki's own Rinso-in. Shunryu continued to study with Ian Kishizawa from 1932 until Kishizawa's death in 1955. [See Carl Bielefeldt, Sati MS, p. 5-6.]

[7] Suzuki So-on (c. 1877-1934): Gyokujun So-on Suzuki, Suzuki-roshi's master. He was legally adopted by the Suzuki family and received dharma transmission from Suzuki-roshi's father Sogaku Suzuki. He served as abbot of Zoun-in monastery, where Shunryu Suzuki began his monastic training.

[8] Ryogen Yoshimura: Soto monk who came from Japan to San Francisco in 1969 to help Suzuki-roshi. (See Wind Bell, 1970, Vol. IX, No. 1, p. 30.) He died at a young age after returning to Japan.

[9] Eko Hashimoto-roshi (d. 1967) was known as a scholar of Dogen's Shobogenzo and an authority on the origins of the traditional okesa. He was Dainin Katagiri-roshi's second master at Eihei-ji (Wind Bell, 1971, No. 1, p. 3).

[10] Eto Sokuo was a scholar at Komazawa University, Tokyo, when Suzuki-roshi was a student there. He was a classmate of Suzuki-roshi's master Gyokujun So-on and served as fourth abbot of Antai-ji. A specialist in Dogen's Shobogenzo, he edited the first popular version of that work (Tokyo, 1939-1943, 3 vol.). He is given credit for instigating the new era of scholarly interest in the Shobogenzo that continues to the present. He also urged a new emphasis on a combination of scholarship and practice. [See Carl Bielefeldt, Wind Bell, Winter 1998, p. 21; MA thesis.]

[11] Text in brackets from note on back of original tape case.

[12] Tendo Nyajo: one of the lineages of the Soto school of Zen.

[13] Myozen Ryonen (also Myozen Butsuju), 1184-1225: early master of the Oryo school of Rinzai Zen; dharma successor of Eisai-zenji. Dogen-zenji's teacher.

[14] Eisai-zenji (also Myoan Eisai or Zenko Kokushi), 1141-1215: early master of the Oryo school of Rinzai Zen; dharma successor of Chinese Oryo master Kian Esho.

[15] Token Mitetsu-roshi.

[16] Ju-jukai: the Ten Major Precepts; jukai is the ceremony of administering and receiving these precepts. The letter o- is an honorific prefix. The suffix -e possibly means "realization."

[17] okechimyaku: a genealogy of Zen succession.

[18] Koga Kankei-zenji: 61st abbot of Eihei-ji.

5 - Zen Center Students

Saturday, June 12, 1971

Zen Center Students
San Francisco

We say "Zen Center student," you know. Or, we say "Zen Center." But it is-tonight-today-I want to make this kind of idea clear, you know, as much as possible. Although, you know, I say, "You are Zen Center students," and although you say, "You are Zen Center students," you say, "I am Zen Center student." I don't know! [Laughs.] I am not so sure who you are. But to me, as long as you are here, you know, to me you are Zen Center students. [Laughs.] That's all. And if you go out from this building, I don't know who you are. [Laughs.]

Do you know who you are? [Laughs.] Is there any particular, you know-do you belong to some particular, you know, religion? Are you member of some particular church, or member, you know-do you strictly belong to some group? I don't know. Perhaps not. Most of you does not belong to any group in its strict sense. But some of them [you] may belong to-strictly belong to Zen Center. And if someone belong [laughs] to Zen Center in its strict sense, and some of you do not belong to any school and yet practicing our way in the same building, you know, how that is possible [laughs], you know? How is it possible to practice, you know, same-some certain way, you know, with someone who strictly belong to some group. How is it possible? If that is not possible, you know, should I accept student who belong to Zen Center in its strict sense? Should I do that?

Maybe some student thinks in that way, but, you know, I accept, you know, students from various religion. Some of you may be Christian. Some of you may be Rinzai students. Some of you may be, you know-may, you know, still, you know, have some other teacher in your mind-always, maybe. But still I accept them. Why is it possible for me to accept students, you know, from various religion as a Zen Center student without any discrimination? It's, you know-we, you know-I or we (same thing [laughs])-if I say "we" [laughs] you will be very much concerned about word "we." If I say "I," it may be okay, you know, but if I say "we," [laughs] it looks like, you know, there is some, you know, group, and so-called-it "Soto" or "Rinzai" group or, you know, Soto group. So if we say "we," you know, you may not feel so good, but to me it is same thing, you know. "We." "I." Same.

But anyway, at Zen Center, anyway, you know, I can accept students from various religion without any discrimination. That is why I must explain-I feel I have to explain why we sew rakus, you know, why we keep our precepts, you know, Buddhist precepts [laughs]. If I say "Buddhist precept," again you will not-some of you will not feel so good: "Buddhist precepts." you know. You think, you know, Buddhists have some particular precepts, but our precepts is not like that. So it is necessary for me to explain what is Buddhist precepts, why you sew rakus, you know, why you wear rakus.

I cannot, you know, or I have no intention to explain precepts in its traditional, you know, way, but I want to explain it as much as possible in some way who-in some way which you can understand, and which I, in some way, which I feel, you know, saying truthfully how I feel about precepts.

First of all, precepts, we say, or explanation of precepts-for an instance, Dogen-zenji or some other teachers-Bodhidharma-it's the precepts is, you know, something which everyone has, you know, as its-as his own nature. That is precepts. It is not, you know-precepts is not something which was decided by Buddha. Precepts is originally-precepts is something which makes Buddha Buddha, you know. Because of precepts he became Buddha. So precepts is first, and Buddha appeared, you know, next.

Before Buddha appear there were precepts. And so in this sense, before, you know, Bodhidharma appeared-came to China-there were precepts. So before everyone, you know, come to this world there is precepts. Everyone has the precepts in its true sense. When you come out, you know, you may be already, you know, male or female [laughs], so accordingly, you know, as soon as you take some form, there is some reason why you became-appear-in this world as a man or as a woman. And naturally women has their own way, and men has their own way. So, naturally various way of life will appear, and between boys [?], you know, according to his character, inborn character, or his physical, you know, condition, there must be various way of life. That is actually our precepts.

So, woman-a woman-who has more complicated physical, you know, body, has more precepts, and that is quite natural [laughs], you know.

You-a woman has more complicated-emotionally and physically, they are more complicated [laughs, laughter], so naturally a woman must have more precepts than [laughs] a man has. That is quite [laughs]-if you say, you know, that is not fair [laughs, laughter], it doesn't make sense, you know. It shouldn't be like that. If a woman has same precepts as a man has, that is not fair [laughs, laughter]. That is how precepts, you know, become written-down precepts.

And, you know, if so, you know, why should we say, you know, Buddhist precepts or Christian commandment or precepts, you know? According to the way of life, there are various interpretation of our true nature, our way of life, but originally it is, you know, just, you know, human nature.

According to the human nature, we have various precepts, and according to the condition we live, we have various precepts, that's all. When we, you know, transmit the precepts, we put emphasis on this point, you know, not each of 250 precepts, you know, but the, you know, original, you know, universal point which is, you know, universal to everyone, which is available to everyone, which, in some way, which everyone can accept it. We transmit our precepts. So instead of emphasizing-put emphasis on various, you know, precepts, one by one, we put more emphasis on our original human nature or buddha nature.

To realize what is our human nature beyond various way of life is, you know, our way of transmitting precepts. So explanation of each precept is how, you know, each precept appeared, or why we must have, for an instance, sixteen precepts, and how we can accept, you know, the precepts as their original, you know, nature is how you study precepts. And if so, intellectual, you know, study does not make sense. If you stick to-if you want to study, you know, precepts just by your head, you know, sixteen precepts, you can, you know, compare one precept to the other. And you-

But it is difficult to accept as just one precept, you know, which is the source of all precepts. It is not possible to understand, to accept precepts in that way by your mind only, so physical practice should follow. And if you, you know, come to the point where you should observe precepts one by one, then you will see what is the true meaning of the precepts. Before you, you know, face to the problem, precept is there, you know, and you are studying precepts.

But if you face to each problem you have, then, you know, just study of precepts doesn't work, and you should, you know, make some decision which way you take, you know. Usually there is good, you know, promising way, and, you know, maybe there is dark way and there is, you know, promising way. You can see some light ahead on you, you know, so you should make some choice. Then there is actual precepts, you know. So that kind of precepts could be found out when you face to real problem. That is actually how you observe precepts, how precepts make sense, you know, how precepts help you.

It is big mistake, you know-precepts show you, you know, always, you know, some certain way for you before you try to go, you know. When you try to make trip, you know, the sign will make sense, you know. If you-when you do not drive [laughs], sign does not make any sense. If you study sign, you know [laughs], from San Francisco to Los Angeles, you know, there could be various sign from San Francisco to Los Angeles, but [laughs] to study the sign doesn't make any sense. But if you drive a car from [laughs] San Francisco to Los Angeles, you know, what you do is just to follow the sign, and sign make sense.

So life is first, you know, your actual life is-way of life is first. And to accept various things which may happen to you in your future as it is and try to make some trip, you know, is the most important thing for you. So in this sense, you know, whether you are Buddhist or Christian, you know, for us it doesn't matter. Each one has each one's own problem, and that, you know, that problem, there is no diffi- [partial word]-no problem-Christian problem [laughs] or Buddhist problem. Because if, you know, you uselessly compare Christian precepts to Buddhist precepts, you know, you create problem. But if you are concentrated [on] actual life, moment after moment, and if you are sincere and honest on your life, you know, then there is no difference between Christian precepts or Buddhist precepts.

There is no name. Sign is just a sign-which way to go, you know. If you understand in that way, if you-if your way of life is concentrated on that point, there is no need to, you know, think about if this is Christian science or Buddhist-Christian precepts or Buddhist precepts. It doesn't matter. And what Christian people think is right is right for Buddhists too. If there is two ways, you know, something is wrong [laughs] with precepts. There is only one way for you to go.

But there is a problem again, you know, problem of right or left, good or bad. Mostly for us, you know, the problem is the problem of good or bad. But this is quite simple too, you know. And no one find it so difficult which is good and which is bad [laughs]. Because you want to-because of your ego-egoistic, you know [laughs], desire, you know, you want to make some excuse when you take wrong course. At that time you may say, "Buddha said" [laughs] or "Christ said" to make some excuse for you for going some wrong course. "Buddha put more emphasis on," you know, "more emphasis on sight-seeing trip, so maybe better to go through Santa Cruz instead of [laughs, laughter] [Highway] 101, because Buddha put emphasis," you know, "on it. So it may take more time. Although I have to arrive to Tassajara ten o'clock, but we have to," you know, "go around Santa Cruz. Maybe we will arrive at eleven o'clock. But Buddha said so [laughs, laughter]. I will go through Santa Cruz to Tassajara." That is actually, you know-when you say "Buddhism" or "Christianity," mostly, you know, you are making some excuse. But way is very simple, and there is-best way is to see sign, just to see sign. There is no problem actually.

Another point is when you observe precepts in your everyday life, if you-if you really, you know, want to know what is precepts, you should be concentrated on what you do. You shouldn't even think about precepts, you know. Then naturally you will, you know, find out your own way. That is something, you know, practice, you know, closely related to Zen practice. If you know-if you make trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles every day like driver, then, you know, you don't have to think so much the way you go to-about the way you go to Los Angeles. The only thing is to go to Los Angeles without having accident [laughs]. That is more important thing, you know, for a man, you know, who is driving car always. That is the point, you know: not precepts, but to be concentrated in each time, in each moment, in his driving. That is the most important point.

When Oka Sotan-roshi[1] was young boy [laughs], his teacher, Token-roshi,[2] told him to buy bean curd, you know. So he went to the store. On the way, he saw, you know, picture for advertising acrobatic [laughs] theater, and he was standing, seeing the various picture in front of the building. And while he was watching it [laughs], he heard, you know, bell of his own temple. It was sign of meal time [laughs]. He was supposed to come back to the temple with bean curd and cook [laughs]-finish cooking before meal time, but he was watching the picture so long time without knowing what time it was. Hearing the bell, he noticed, you know, his duty-what was his duty. So he, you know, dashed in the store. "Give me tofu!" [Laughs.] As soon as old [laughs] man gave it all to him, he dashed back. But on the way what he noticed was he left his hat [laughs] in the store. So he ran back again to the store. "Give me! Give me! Give me!" And the old man said-old woman said, "What?" "Give me!" He didn't s[ay], you know-he meant his hat, but, you know, he was so-his mind was so busy [laughs, laughter] and the word "hat" didn't come out. "Give me! Give me! Give me!" "What? What? What?" [Laughs, laughter.] And at last he could say "my hat." "Oh, your hat is on your head! What is matter with you?" [Laughs, laughter.] Again he dashed back to his temple with his hat. That was the story, you know [laughs].

The precept is something like his hat. Precept is always on his head [laughs]. Because he tried to find out, you know, because he wanted to say "hat" or "precepts," you know, it doesn't work, you know. If he has always, you know, his hat, then nothing to, you know, think about it. That is actually how we should keep our precepts. So we rather put, you know, an emphasis on actual practice or zazen, how to be concentrated on what we do, moment after moment.

In sesshin time I talked about shikantaza. I feel, you know, I met you,. you know-I haven't met you for so long time. We-several-most of you were sitting for five days, and some of you, you know, just-I am seeing some of you for the first time, I feel, you know. But actually, we were discussing about-I was make my-our practice clear, you know, what is shikantaza.

In short, shikantaza is to live in each moment. That is shikantaza-how to live in each moment. So it is, you know, you can apply shikantaza in your everyday life. And point is to be concentrated what you do in its true sense, without seeking for anything, you know, inside or outside. To do something-if you do something, you are with everything. When you ignore your actual activity, you know, thinking about something else, that is not real practice.

So real teaching is not, you know, outside of you; it is not inside of you. It is-when you do something, there there is real teaching, and there there is real practice. If you miss, you know, real practice in your everyday life, you will be regret[ful] later, you know. If you are doing your best, that is only way to, you know, to be yourself and to be with everyone. When you are with everyone, you are keeping our precepts, you know, without knowing, you know, whether you have your cap on your head, you know. Even though you don't notice it [laughs], your cap is here. If you become you yourself, and if you-if your practice include everything, moment after moment, you know, precepts-more explicit precepts is always with you.

That is, you know, another point maybe which is more important than verbal transmission of [or?] verbal precepts. If I tried to explain those precepts, it takes time. But how you keep it, in short, is to live in each moment, to be sincere with yourself always, without looking around. If you come here, you know, you must be you, that's all [laughs]. If so, you know, why is it necessary to say you are a Christian or you are, you know, Hindu? Why is that necessary?

It looks like, you know, we are-we are-I am trying to put you in some form, like zazen practice, but it is not so. Actually it is not so. Why we-I put emphasis on form of practice is that is the only way, you know, to have real concentration. If you miss, you know, one instruction which we may give you, there is no real concentration. If your back is like this, you know, you don't have-it is impossible to have deep, good, smooth breathing [laughs]. When you are like this, you know, when you feel as if, you know-to have-excuse me-to have good breathing is explained in-by Dogen various way, you know, using various characters. But, you know, good breathing means smooth, you know, breathing-smooth, smooth, deep breathing. And it should be calm, and it should be strong, without, you know, having any broking [breaking?]. You know, if you take breathing in this way, if you stop [laughs] at somewhere, it doesn't go through. When you have good posture, breathing, you know, could be very smooth and deep. And it should go-it should reach to your tummy, you know. You should feel in that way. But for a lady, maybe it is something different from my feeling. It looks like, because you have extra organ here, I think, you know. So ladies' breathing does not reach to the bottom of your tummy. You don't feel it in that way, maybe. But should be pretty deep, and feeling must be as if it comes to the bottom of your tummy. Actually breathing does not reach to your bottom of the tummy [laughs]. You know, it may come to the bottom of your lung, but it doesn't reach here. So same thing will be true with ladies' breathing, I think. The feeling should be like that [tape turned over], [you know. Deep breathing][3] ... feeling, you cannot be concentrated on what you do, if you want to do it properly.

When an artist, you know, of, you know, calligraphy or Japanese sumi ink, you know, artist work, you know, even though he is not in perfect posture of zazen, you know, they apply that posture in their work. So for them, one stroke or one line, you know, expresses many things, as our practice include everything, you know.

So that is why, you know, that may be the difference between usual, you know, art and Zen art. It-you know [laughs]-it is-full concentration is on one dot, on one line. And the way if you see the way they do it, you will understand it. Mostly, you know, they have the brush on his right hand, but, you know, which is working more hard-harder than his right hand, his left hand [laughs]. So you may say he is, you know, working by left hand with a brush on his right hand.

In the same way, whole way, same-all his whole body is working on one line. Maybe it is true with your art. Should be true, you know. If you're, you know, painting just by hand [laughs], by right hand, you know, like this [gestures], you cannot work properly. Some way, you know, your left hand should help right hand, and whole body should make your brush or your hand work freely to express something. So if you actually-if you become one with everything, if your brush, you know, include or express all of your effort, and if he is completely one with everything, you know, he can work in its true sense.

So that is why we put emphasis on, you know, on our posture. Some-you may say someone cannot, you know, sit. If he cannot sit as much as possible, you know, he should keep his back straight, and he should find out how to be concentrated on his, you know, activity. There must be some way to be concentrated on what you do. So while you are sitting, without dreaming of anything, you know, if you can express yourself fully in your zazen, there there is actual practice which include everything. If you have that practice, Buddha is with you, Bodhidharma is with you, and every sages should be with you, actually with you. At that time, who is Christ, who is Buddha, who is Bodhidharma, who is Dogen, you know? Who they are? It is you yourself.

You know, how is it possible for Buddha to exist forever? The only way is to exist with us. That is only way how he can exist. How is it possible to various sages to exist in our human history? Actual, you know, history is with you, and there is no need to think about it, because you have it. You are with them always. When you think about him, he is, you know, with you with some form. When you do not think about it, still he is with you. And that point should not be forgotten. You think if you-when you-only when you have his image with you he is there. That is, you know, not real, you know, being. Real being is always with you, when you do not even think about him. That is very-actual truth, you know. I forgot, you know, who said so, but when you think about him, he is always with you [laughs]. That is very simple, you know, words and very beautiful words. There were some more, you know, words like that, you know: "When you think about him, he is with you, but if you do not think about him, where is he?" [Laughs.] Where is he? You don't-you think he is not there anymore. That is very shallow, materialistic, you know, understanding. You are not sincere enough. You put him-put them in some book and put them in bookcase, that's all. That is why he suffers [laughs] in bookcase. If you do not put them in bookcase, he is always with you. Can you deny this fact? No one can deny this fact.

If you understand, you know, various sage in that way, you know, can you be just Buddhist? Or can you be just, you know, Christian? You cannot. You say, "I am Christian," but actually you are not only Christian but also Buddhist. That is very true. When you become you yourself, when you do not put them in bookcase, you know, how is it possible to say, "I am Christian" or "I am Buddhist"? Maybe next question will be, "Then why you wear Buddhist robe, and why you sew Buddhist, you know, robes?" That will be next question, but I don't have time to [laughs, laughter] talk about it right now.

But more important thing this spirit, you know, this practice, this sincerity, you know. Even though, you know, you may laughed at what Oka-roshi did when he was just a boy, but he was good priest [laughs], even though he was so small. He was very good. He must be scolded by master when he came back to [laughs] his temple, you know. They had to wait maybe another thirty minutes [laughs] before they ate, so he must be scolded. Even though he is scolded, he was a good boy, you know. There is no wonder about that point [laughs]. You cannot say he was-he didn't-he was not observing precepts. He faithfully observed, you know, precepts, and he put his hat always on his head. But sometimes [laughs] he forgot about his hat, that's all.

Did you understand? And I think I am so happy to see you, you know, from various religions. It is okay with me, and you don't have to feel this is Zen Center-special building for Soto priests [laughs]. You don't have to feel in that way. Here we are doing our best, you know, to live with people in its true sense. That's all.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Joe Galewsky (3/26/99) and Bill Redican (7/28/00).

[1] Oka Sotan-roshi (1860-1922): a professor at and ultimately president of Komazawa University in Tokyo, where Suzuki-roshi graduated. He was the first in a series of lecturers on the Shobogenzo at Komazawa [Carl Bielefeldt, Sati Conference, MS p. 3]. His master was Nishiari Bokusan, the most prominent Meiji scholar of the Shobogenzo, from whom he received dharma transmission. He was teacher or master of Ian Kishizawa, Eko Hashimoto, Gyokujun So-on, Sawaki Kodo, and Harada Sogaku. He served as abbot of Daiji-ji and was named as the first abbot of Antai-ji temple in Gentaku, northern Kyoto, Japan. (One of Oka Sotan's disciples, Zuirin Odagaki, was the second abbot of Antai-ji and is informally considered its founder. It is traditional to name one's teacher as the titular founder.) Shohaku Okumura stated that Sawaki Kodo and Eko Hashimoto studied with Oka Sotan at Shuzen-ji.

[2] Token-roshi:

[3] Source of words within brackets is a notation on the back of the original tape case.

6 - Sewing and Wearing the Buddhist Robes

Saturday, June 19, 1971

Sewing and Wearing the Buddhist Robes and How It Relates to Our Practice

San Francisco Zendo

Last Sunday I told you that, whatever religion you belong to, it doesn't matter when you to come and sit with us. That is because our way of sitting, of practice, is for you to become yourself. Katagiri Roshi always says, "to settle oneself on oneself." To be yourself. When you become you, yourself, at that moment your practice includes everything. Whatever there is, it is a part of you. So you practice with Buddha, you practice with Bodhidharma and you practice with Jesus. You practice with everyone in the future or in past. That is our practice. But when you do not become yourself, it doesn't happen in that way.

So if you come here and sit with us, you're not only sitting with us, but you are also sitting with everything, including animate and inanimate beings. Dogen Zenji said, if your practice doesn't include everything, that is not real practice.

It is not that after practicing for long time, you attain enlightenment and your practice includes everything, and you can practice with everyone. When you join our practice, your practice includes everything. And if you think that in two or three years, after your practice improves, that your practice will be perfect enough to include everything, that is a mistake. Something is missing in that practice. The sincerity is missing.

When you do practice, forgetting yourself, or where you are or how long you are there, then your practice includes everything. When you say "I practice zazen at Zen Center." "I" and "Zen Center" are extra. You're limiting your practice by the idea of "Zen Center" or "my practice." When you say "my practice," the practice is very small. When you say "Zen Center," practice is very limited. When you forget all about those kinds of ideas and just practice, then, at that time, your practice is perfect and includes everything, past, present and future. That is the point of practice.

If you have this kind of spirit in your practice, you will not be happy with lazy practice, or be involved in the ideas of "how long," or of "what kind" of practice it is. You will not be so happy to hear the words "Buddhism," or "Zen," or "Rinzai," or "Soto." You'll be bothered by those names.

You may ask me, "Why do you wear this kind of robe all the time? Why do you sit in the same way all the time?" Tomorrow we will start a sewing sesshin, an okesa or rakusu sewing sesshin. You may think we are wearing some special robe but actually it is not so. The way Buddha made this robe was, as you know, that he collected the various materials on the street, or at a graveyard, and he collected material which was thrown away by the people. There were big pieces and small pieces, so after cleaning and purifying them, he sewed them together in this way.

This kind of design is planned so that you can use big and small pieces of material. Small pieces can be used for the smaller parts and big ones can be used for the big parts. The color also cannot be a bright, beautiful color because the materials Buddha used were old. So whatever it was, Buddha used it, and it became his robe.

He said that when human beings first appeared on this earth, they had a very long life and were very big. Much bigger than you are. They were very big. But, gradually, people became smaller and smaller, like the Japanese (laughs). But you shouldn't think that a big robe, bright in color could not be used for Shakyamuni Buddha's robe. That would be a wrong understanding, he said. A bright colored robe could be a robe for Shakyamuni Buddha. What this means is that, whatever color it is, it could be Buddhist robe. Only when you forget all about what color it is, or what material it is made of, can it be our robe. It could be silk, it could be linen, it could be cotton, but when we use it, it is not silk or cotton or linen. It is Buddha's robe.

When we say "Buddha's robe," it is just a robe, just that material. When this material is just this material, it is not any particular material. It is part of the universe. Not this material. Because you say this is for this table, or that stool, it is special. But if this is just this material, then it could be mine, it could be for Buddha, and it could be for you. This is exactly the same practice as your zazen practice. When you just become you, then that is how that practice includes everything. When we let this material just be this material, without saying mine or yours, then this material could be for everyone. And it is something more than material to cover this stool.

With this understanding, we make a robe. You may say, "that is a Buddhist robe," but we do not make our robe just for ourselves. We are making something greater, which will include everything, which could be everyone's. So if there's a certain way to make a robe, that way summarizes this real practice in something we wear. Anyway, we need some thing to wear. Especially when it is cold, you must wear something. So maybe it's better to wear something by which we can express our real understanding so that people can join our practice. That is why we make a robe.

If you miss this point, our robes will not be our robes, will not be Buddha's robe. Only when we understand this point and can make a robe with this spirit, is it Buddha's robe.

Right now you're listening to me, but each one of you should live in the world with this spirit we have been talking about. Strictly speaking, you shouldn't listen to me; you should do it yourself, you should be you. You should have your own way of life with this kind of spirit. Then all of you, each one of you, is a Buddhist. When you force your way on others, when you think Buddha's way is the best way, Buddhism cannot be Buddhism. Buddhism is not one of the many ways, but, rather, each one's own way. It is not the Japanese way or the American way.

Because I am Japanese, I am doing things the Japanese way. That is the only reason that I behave like a Japanese. I don't say the Japanese way is the best way of all. If you think that way, that cannot even be the Japanese way. When a Japanese person becomes Japanese, then he is really Japanese. He can be understood wherever he goes. There's no need for me to change my way. If you really want to make an okesa or rakusu, it will be Buddha's robe. If you feel as if you are imitating Buddha's robe, then that is not Buddha's robe.

So if you really want to be a Buddha, or Buddha's disciple, naturally you will make and wear Buddha's robe. But that does not mean propagating Buddhism. It just means that you really want to be a Buddhist. That's all. If you really want to be a Buddhist, through and through, naturally what you say and do will be like what Buddha did or Bodhidharma did.

That point is rather confusing. Before, I said that if you really become you, you include everything. Right now I'm saying if you're a Buddhist, if you really want to be a Buddhist, you will naturally want to wear Buddha's robe. The reason I wear this robe is that this robe symbolizes that spirit in its true sense: the spirit of using material as it is, and of being me, myself. Because this robe symbolizes that spirit, I wear it. So when we wear those robes, there's no contradiction. Do you understand?

[Response and question:] "No. Roshi, you said there's no contradiction, but you just said that robes are only worn to be a disciple of the Buddha and not to propagate Buddhism, but just before that you said you wear the robe to express your understanding so that the people can tell....?"

Roshi: Not to propagate Buddhism, but to help them understand what each person's way should be. That's the difference. A non-Buddhist may think I am a Buddhist, but I don't think I am a Buddhist. If it is necessary for them to call me something, or to call myself something, maybe, for the sake of convenience, I can be a Buddhist. That's okay. I am happy to be a Buddhist.

[Another question not intelligible--clarified by someone in the audience as:] "If you don't think you're a Buddhist, Roshi, what do you think you are?"

Roshi: You need your name, so it is okay to have a name, but it is not necessary to stick to my name just for the sake of convenience. In Zen Center we have some rules. On the one side, the rules are to guide our practice, and on the other side to encourage our spirit. Often, people want to be someone special: "I am Buddhist," or "I am Zen Master." (laughs) So to discourage us from sticking a label or name on ourselves, we practice zazen and we have rules and rituals. Unfortunately, people may think they are practicing the Soto way, and, therefore, the Soto way is pretty good. We may become very proud of the Soto way. That is the danger, so, I must have a big stick!

Question: Isn't there the danger that people may want to wear those robes or special costumes to be something special? And is it necessary then to wear those robes to be called a Buddhist?

Roshi: If you going to discuss something like this, that kind of question arises. We are now in this building, and I'm giving a lecture and you are listening to me. That's all. (laughs). So now I'm explaining why I am talking and why you are listening. That's all. I started to explain a little bit about what a robe is. Anyway, we have to wear something, so to encourage that kind of spirit, we have this kind of thing.

Question: What do you think we are?

Roshi: I don't know. If you say that I am Suzuki, that makes me think more. Something like, "That is Suzuki's name," [laughs] so maybe it would be better not to have any name. But I don't feel good if you think, "he's so great, and I'm so small." Small Suzuki and ... [laughs] Great Suzuki. Perhaps it's better not to think about it so much. Actually, that is practice, you know. You asked me, "What do you think you are?" but I am trying to forget who I am! [general laughter] Maybe that is a pretty interesting discussion. You get the point.

Soto Zen Buddhists have very elaborate rituals and a very elaborate practice. In one way, it is an advantage, but in another way it may it will create some problem for you. So we must have a strong spirit, so that we don't get lost in our practice. When you have a strong spirit, then the Soto way will help you, but when you rely on this kind of practice too much, you will be lost completely. You must be very careful, and when you become very careful about this kind of danger, then your life will be taken care of pretty well. When you have real spirit, this kind of practice will extend into your city life. And you will be well taken care of by Buddha. Naturally, the rules are provided to help to protect us from that kind of danger. Without knowing that it is a danger, we become proud of our danger, and that is terrible.

This is a danger not only for Soto students, but for all human beings. We suffer from this kind of pride or selfish satisfaction. We have no time to be satisfied with anything. We must continue to do one thing after another; we have no time to stick to any one thing.

Thank you very much.

7 - Sesshin lecture: sewing sesshin

Sunday, June 20, 1971

Sesshin Lecture
San Francisco

This sesshin-we call it "sewing sesshin"-sesshin and, actually, rakusu sewing-okesa-sewing sesshin. Our okesa is not just-just symbol of our teaching, but it is actually dharma itself. But unless you have proper understanding of it, the rakusu is something which you wear as a symbol of Buddhist. But that is not proper understanding.

The proper understanding of our zazen or rakusu is same, not different. Proper understanding of zazen is, at the same time, proper understanding of rakusu. So unless you have real experience of zazen-zazen experience, rakusu is not actually rakusu; it is just something which you wear. It is not dharma itself.

You may think I told you yesterday[1] about rakusu-okesa, and okesa Buddha made-okesa. Gathering various material and sewed together and design it in this way after the shape of paddy field. But here[2] Dogen-zenji says, refer to the ten-ten names of okesa.

By the way, Dogen-zenji wrote more than 95 fascicles of teaching about transmitted teaching. And two of them is about okesa, two of-two fascicles about okesa. "Kesa-kudoku" nomaki and "Den-e" nomaki.[3] So you may understand how important okesa is for us, you know, and those two fascicles are very long in comparison to other fascicles.

"Kesa-kudoku" means virtue of okesa, and "Den-e" nomaki means transmitted-about transmitted robe-"Den-e." He refers to ten names of okesa or funzo-e. [4] Funzo-e means, you know-fun is dung or dung. Fun [is], you know, something dirty. Zo is to "rubbish" or "dust." E isrobe.

And-one[5] is goshaku-e: robe bitten [chewed on] by cow or animal, you know. And the second is mat- [partial word: "material"?] robe made by material-made of material which was bitten [chewed on] by rabbits. And [third is] robe made of burned [material] partly destroyed by fire, you know, like if someone smoke, you know. There may be many holes in the material, so eventually he will throw it-throw it away-that kind of material. [Fourth,] gassui-e is material which was thrown away by ladies because of menses, you know. And fifth is child-child bed? [I.e., child birth.] Child bed. What [do you call it]? Child bed. Material-made of the material, you know, tainted by, thrown [away] by-because of the child bed material. Oh. Do you understand [laughs] what I mean? And sixth is material which was, you know, which was-which covered the altar of shrine, you know, some old material which was used in the altar of some various, you know, shrine-shrine of various deities. And seventh is made by material which is thrown away in graveyard. And eighth is material made of material which is offered to god, you know, when someone prayed-pray something for god, then they offer material to god. And [ninth is] some material which a king or-king used. Or [tenth is] material which you pick up on the street. Those are, you know, with those material-those material could be okesa.

So usually, you know, the material which usual person thrown away, we pick up and make okesa. The point is-so okesa is not always could be made by some dirty material, you know. Whether it is dirty or not dirty is not the point. The material which people thrown away could be our okesa. This is the point. So Dogen-zenji says whether it is beautiful embroider[y] or silk or leather, it doesn't matter. Material is-we should not say okesa should be made by some dirty material, you know. Whether it is dirty or clean or beautiful or not beautiful is not the point. This point is very important, but, you know, it may be rather difficult to-for you to understand.

From here, from two pages, he talks about this spirit which is rather difficult to explain. You could understand only by practice. Only if you understand what is zazen you will understand this point. You may say your zazen is sometime-your zazen is good and sometime your zazen is not good, you know [laughs]. Sometime your zazen will be sleepy zazen [laughs], drowsy zazen. "Oh, this is not zazen," you may say. You will understand, you know, your zazen in that way, but true zazen, you know, is not, you know-true understanding of zazen cannot be like that. Zazen is not sleepy zazen or drowsy zazen or good zazen. When you, you know, you are free from the idea of good zazen or bad zazen or sleepy zazen, then, you know, you have right understanding of zazen. Anyway, you must practice zazen. If I say so, you know, it is okay, you know, to sleep in zazen [laughs]. You may understand in that way.

If I-if you say, you know, "Whatever you wear, that is okesa." Dogen-zenji actually say so, you know, in here. He refer to the Third Patriarch of India-India.[6] His-he was-no one knows whether it is true or not-he was born with-with robe [laughs]. When he was born, he wear, already, okesa [laughs, laughter]. Dogen-zenji said, "What kind of robe is it? Is it," you know, "a silk? Is it leather? [Laughs.] What kind of robe is it?" And his robe is not traditional robe, you know. When-when he, you know-before he became a Third Patriarch in India, it was usual wear it, you know, because he was wearing always. After he joined the order, you know, his robe became robe.

So robe-understanding of robe is something more than you understand. So if you say-if you understand robe [as] just something-some material to wear, it is not perfect understanding. This morning I said you should, you know, be concentrated on every stitch, you know-every stitch-as you are concentrated on your breathing. "Concentration," we say, but that is not actually point. Actual point is-real point is to become one with what you do-to become one with your practice. So anyway, you know, in your practice, you should try to be concentrated on each stitches-on each stitch, and someday you will understand what does it mean. Not immediately [laughs].

I think you are lucky, very lucky, you know, to have robe, you know, like this, which was brought by Bodhidharma from India and which is transmitted from Bodhidharma to the Sixth Patriarch.[7] And that robe is-is now in Obai-zan-Obai-zan monastery.[8]

And various king [emperors], for an instance, Daiso, King [Emperor] Daiso, at the end of Tang dynasty, sent his messenger to the monastery and asked [for] the robe. And Dogen-zenji, you know, referred to the letter which was presented by the king [emperor] to that monastery. And he referred to the many various events which happened to those famous monasteries. Not only, you know, we have transmitted robe but also we have, you know, at the same time, we have proper understanding of robe, and based on actual practice of zazen transmitted from Bodhidharma and the Sixth Patriarch.

Usually if I say "teaching" or "practice," it could be-it could be one of the many practice, you know. If I say "religion," it could be one of the many religion. But if you really understand what is zazen, it is not so.

Recently I am putting emphasis on this point. What kind of practice we have at Zen Center? This is very important point, not only for us, but also for all the people who are interested in religious practice. If we-if we lose this point, we will end up, you know, sectarians. If you really want to be free from sectarianism, you know, we should know this point. We should have this point. Until, you know, you really accept this point, you should continue our practice. Then, you know, all-all the people who are practicing religious practice will be your good friend, and you can help them a great-a lot, instead of fighting [laughs]. Even though you do not fight with your mouth, you know, your mind is always fighting. No good [laughs]. That is not religion, you know.

Everyone-as every religious people notice-already notice this point, and they know how bad they are [laughs]. Still, they stick to some idea. Some of them, you know, in disguise of non-sectarianism [laughs], still they are developing sectarianism. Even though they say, "We are not sectarian." But actually, they are sectarian from my viewpoint or to my-to me, to my eyes, I know-I can tell [laughing] quite easily whether they are sectarian or not. Although they may say, "Oh, Suzuki-roshi is terrible sectarian [laughs]. He stick to Soto way." Yes, I stick to Soto way [laughs], but I am not so bad sectarian as they are [laughs, laughter]. My mind, is, you know, always open, you know. They are my good friend, although I wear Soto robe, although I respect Eshun Yoshida-roshi's[9] special robe, I am not sectarian. I wish you can understand this point. At least my disciple should understand this point.

And he [Dogen] refers to, also, various okesa like gojo-e[10]-seven-strip robe, five-strip robe, nine-strip robe. Because, you know, a five-strip robe is for your usual, you know-the robe for when you work, you know. Small one. That is five-strip robe. And seven-strip robe is-you use when you practice zazen with people. That is seven-strip. And nine-strip robe is you use when you officially or formally-when you practice formal practice for some special person, or for your nation, or for your teacher, or when you take service. And there are many more kinds of robes, but strips-nine strips. Up to one hundred is, you know, very formal one.

You know, you should know [the reason] why he refers to this kind-many kinds of robe is [that the] robe should be always with you, you know. He put emphasis to wear or to have robe always with you, you know. It is not some special thing you wear, you know. That is wrong idea. That is something which you have always with you, like the Third Patriarch in India's robe. He was born with robe, so for him it is not possible to take it off [laughs]. His skin is already robe. Those are the most important point when you have-when you want to have proper understanding of okesa.

This kind of lecture is maybe too special[ized], so may be difficult for you to understand, I know. If I have some more time, I can answer your question. That would be better-better, I think. If you have question, please ask me, and if you have wrong understanding, I must correct you. Hai.

Student A: What is the meaning of the rice paddy? Why-why is the rice paddy mentioned?

Suzuki-roshi: Rice?

Student A: Rice field related to the rakusu. What does that mean?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. He, you know-when Buddha was asked to-to make, you know, some robe like uniform for his disciple, by Bimbisara,[11] King Bimbisara, you know, he was thinking about the loo- [partial word: "look"?] design and he saw paddy field, you know, or-and he thought, "This will be-" you know, "we should design our robe in that way. Big patch and small patch. Big and small. We can use various kinds of material if we design in that way." That is how robe was originated.

But spirit of making robe was not too fair in-ordinal [ordinary?], you know, viewpoint which we human being [are] liable to have. We have many weakness-weak points. Because of that we will create wrong understanding of things: not only robe, but also whatever you see because of our human nature, you know. We create many misunderstanding. So how to be free from that kind of misunderstanding or attachment and to develop human nature properly was his, you know, point. But design was just, you know, made when he saw paddy field.

Student A: What is the meaning of the design on the maneki?[12]

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? Yeah?

Student A: Yeah. The design?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, that is-I don't think that it-that is just to keep, you know, keep two-two parts tied together. It is pine, you know, pine leaf. That is, you know-in Japan, pine symbolize-pine is-pine tree is-is supposed to be-first of all, it is always green, and pine tree lives long long time, and it doesn't change its color all year round. So we have some special feeling about pine, and that pine leaf we use in various way, you know, that design. When you make some-some furoshiki,[13] you know, we put pine leaves [on them], you know. I think that is why maybe better to ask Yoshida-roshi [laughs]. He may have some reason-she may have some reason, but I think that is more very common, you know, for Japanese in Japanese culture to use pine leaves. You notice, you know, many-we have many pine-tree design or pine-leaves design. We like bamboo also. Bamboo.

Student B: Where does the rakusu ceremony originate?

Suzuki-roshi: Originate?

Student B: Yeah. How long-how long has the form that we are using now been practiced?

Suzuki-roshi: At least we, you know, we can find in-maybe in Japan, you know, originated by Dogen or more older maybe. Every school has this kind of ceremony, you know. Each school. Dogen-zenji studied, you know, various school, and he had some confidence, you know, in the way he observed those rituals and background of those rituals.

Student C: Roshi, why do we use new materials?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student C: Why do we buy new material to make robes?

Suzuki-roshi: That is wrong understanding, you know. He says, in his book, "Sometime you can use new material. Don't be," you know, "caught by new material or old material or beautiful or not beautiful." Okay? New material is okay; silk is okay [laughs].

Student C: Even synthetic?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm?

Student C: Even synthetic? [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Synthetic is okay. That could be his understanding, you know. You-we are liable to, you know, to go [to] one extreme. That is, you know-Dogen-zenji didn't write. That is, you know, maybe our human nature, you know. We want to rely on something: this extreme or that extreme, you know. If-if you do not care for something beautiful [laughs], you stick to something dirty [laughs] and feel better. If you cannot afford to have gold or a diamond [laughs], you will collect some stone-something. That is human nature. That way we lose our freedom.

So when we see things-as-it-is, you know, then any material can be, you know, can be robe. The color-why, you may then ask, why do we use subdued color? [Sentence finished; tape turned over.]

... color is. Or buy new material and cut, you know, without using whole of material is to put emphasis on non-attachment: to destroy or get rid of or to be free from our human tendency which will create problem for us. That point should be, you know, rejected. Human nature is good, but because of one weak point, it doesn't work [laughs], you know. So that point should be, you know, if we can take care of that point in some way, we-any material can be, you know, robe. That is, you know, how you make robe by various material. Do you understand?

So there is some point which you cannot change [laughs], you know. Whether you are Christian or Buddhist, this point cannot be changed [taps on something repeatedly]. If you, you know, change this point, Buddhist cannot be Buddhist, you know. A Christian cannot be good Christian. Everything will be mixed up and destroyed because of-just because of this point, which we call, sometime, "attachment." You see? Do you understand? That is very-that is our enemy, maybe, which does not exist, but we-we create because of idleness. Because we do not work hard enough, we create this problem. Okay? So you can buy material. This is okay.

Student D: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student D: I'm trying to understand this point sometimes. It seems like what you said was because human beings have a certain nature of attaching to things, that we set up some rules or some forms. For example, when Lisa asked me what should be made out of robe materials. The first thing is that people are kind of-human beings have a funny nature, and they want, you know, there's always attachment to things. So one of the things we do to destroy that kind of attachment is to set up a rule.

Suzuki-roshi: Set up? Destroy? Not destroy-after destroying, you know, that attachment and set up rule. That is wrong, you see? Big difference, you know. Difference between after destroying attachment to set up rule. You know, if you can only take care of-destroy is wrong, you know, to say-if you say "destroy," is-that is wrong practice, you know. Human nature has some weak point, but we must take care of it. That is what I really mean-not destroy.

But anyway, after taking-taking good care of this point, to set up some rule and, you know, it's wrong, you know. To take care of this weak point we have rules, you know, and if we-if only take care of this point, there is no need to have rules [laughs]. Whatever you wear, you know-your skin-even your skin like Third Patriarch of India. Even your skin could be robe. That much you know, freedom we have.

If you really be a Buddhist, you know, then there is no-not necessary to have rules if you wear robes. But I say until you can forget all about what you are wearing, you know, eventually you will not, you know-you will forget all about what you are wearing, you know. If you come to that point, you know, robe is not, you know, always necessary. You see? It is not-after you become real Buddhist and wear robe. That is wrong [laughs]. And before you become real Buddhist, you should wear robe [laughs]. Before you have-you can take care of yourself, you should follow, you know, you should be incubate-incubate [laughs, laughter]. When you are strong enough, you should be-get out of hospital [?], where there is no rules. I don't know when you can do that [laughs]. Do you understand the point? If you have point, you know, it is okay, you know.

Student D: I still don't understand. It seems as-it seems like you say even though we have a rule, if you really understand yourself and sometimes even though the rule says use old material, you can use either old or new material. Doesn't make any difference, which is fine from the point of view of somebody who understands themselves. But from the point of view of somebody who, you know, is trying to follow the rule, let's say. You know, I mean, when I see a rule that says "okesa should be made of old material," then it seems-of course, you know, any-whatever material I get, I'll take, but it seems that if I were going to actually make it on my own, I'd go out and get old material. Otherwise, it just-I can be very lazy, then, with all the precepts. I could say, "Well, uh, there's the precept that says don't kill, or a precept that says don't speak ill of others," let's say. But I say, "Well, in terms of real understanding, of course I can. It doesn't make any difference." So that-that-that-that intellectual understanding of precepts sometimes is just an excuse for my being lazy, you know, and it's very difficult for me to know when I am having a broad mind, you know, when I'm having a big mind, and when I'm just being lazy.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. I-I understand. You are feeling, you know, that something is missing [laughs]. That is, you know, what I want-really what I want to say, you know. You know, I don't want to say-maybe I'm-if I say I will discourage you, so I don't want to say, but if you, you know, really feel in that way, I have to say [laughs]. The point is, you know, in comparison to Buddhist in Japan, you know, you can practice or you can-you can be-you are [in an] easier situation to practice Buddhism. Maybe, you know, we should know this point.

I-I know what kind of difficulty Japanese Buddhist has and what kind of life Zen Center students have, you know. If you compare, you know, Japanese students to Zen Center student, you know, I don't know what to say. It is so different, you know. You may criticize Japanese, you know, young Buddhist. You may criticize them because they do not practice zazen as you do in Zen Center. But maybe Japanese young Buddhist may criticize us, you know, [for] having too easy [a] practice [laughs]. You know, you-you-if you want to-if you want to practice, you can do anything here, you know. You are well supported. You don't have to, you know, worry about anything. And so, you know, maybe for you it is too easy to practice our way.

You say-you said, you know, it is better if we do not try to find old material and make robe. Just buy old [new?] material. But actually it is much more easy to buy something. Under this circumstances, you can also can collect old material. Also it make long, long-it take [laughs] long, long time [but] you can do. But if you must support yourself by working, you know, on the city-in the city, if you are always collecting old materials [laughs] for your robe, you cannot work on the-in the street-in the city. So you lose your income. It is, you know-same thing is true in our management, you know. We-you can sew your okesa, but actually when you live-Japan is not any more poor, but [laughs] if you were born in some poor country where you should work all-always that is not possible. You know, it is much better to buy some material at the store. It is hard-it is very hard even to buy new material, but that will be what you can do. In poor country, even though you want to find out some old material, you cannot find, because they use it [laughs]. You see?

Student C: Actually, Roshi, that-that was-what I meant though was that, like, you just go down to the basement of this building in the laundry room, there is a [one word unclear: "corner"?]-

Suzuki-roshi: There are a lot!

Student C: -where everybody throws away their clothes.

Suzuki-roshi: That is-that happens only in America! [Laughs, laughter.]

Student C: But there's-there's enough material down there for about at least five okesas. And it wouldn't take very long to put it together.

Suzuki-roshi: You do it! [Laughs, laughter.] You just do it, you know? When you can do it, you know, when you know how to exactly-after learning, you know, exactly how to do it, you can do it. You see? But to learn it already very difficult, you know. Unless you don't use new material, you know, it is almost impossible how to teach you, you know. When someone-when you teach how to sew rakusu some other people-there's maybe paper [pattern] is much better-best, you know, when you take pattern, when you learn how to measure. Old-buy old material, it is not possible.

So in some way, your practice is very luxurious. I feel in that way. You are, you know, children who were born in rich family. Whatever you want to do, you can do it. But that doesn't happen [laughs] in some poor country. American cannot be always rich, you know. It is not fair! [Laughs, laughter.] You-you lose; you do not notice this point. So I am afraid, you know, if you could be a real good Buddhist. I am stuck-I am, you know, I am thinking [about] this point a lot. That is my worry.

So maybe [laughs] that is-that is reason why I couldn't support okesa sewing in the practice so much before, you know. It is too luxurious practice. Only in Japan-only [in] Heian Period and people who were born in noble family could do this. They did it before Kamakura Period, but because of that, Buddhists were lost in their practice, because it was too aristocratic practice, you know. Even though you gather old material and spending, you know, a lot of time in each stick-stitch, aft- [partial word: "after"?]-when you make one stitch they bow many times and took up the needle and, you know, sew okesa stitch by stitch in that way. That was good practice, they thought, but because of that, Buddhists were lost. How about that! [Laughter.]

So, after that, you know, in Kamakura Period, Zen-Zen Buddhist, Nichiren, and Shingon was angry about that kind of luxurious practice and stood up and, you know, open new Buddhist way to, you know, city people. That was how new Buddhism arised in Kamakura period, after losing, you know, their practice, in Heian Period. So sometime I feel as if I [laughs] we are practice, you know, [in] Heian Period practice [laughs] instead of Kamakura Period practice.

So you shouldn't be lost in that-that kind of practice, you know. You feel very good. You feel you are very devotional, good student, but that is your feeling. Do you understand? So we must see what we are doing, you know, from various angle, and we must feel the crisis of the world, you know, by your skin. Then you are not Buddhist. Okay? To be, you know, to feel resistance to the old culture is-I can agree with that, but to be lost from this world is terrible mistake.

Anyway, we are born-you are born in this country, and this is your motherland. You shouldn't be-you should not be lost from this motherland. I am not nationalist [laughs]. I feel terrible, you know, if you-if you are lost from this world. Okay [laughs]? That is, you know, my feeling.

Student D [?]: I understand how it applies to the rule about material, but I'm not quite sure how-how it applies to other precepts as given [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Maybe, anyway, you are trying your best, you know. And we are trying our best, so something will result. Don't be too idealistic or too luxurious [laughs], okay?

---

Source: Original tape transcribed by Joe Galewsky (3/26/99) and checked against tape by Bill Redican (12/20/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] SR-71-06-19 (transcript only; no tape).

[2] Probably the fascicle "Kesa-kudoku," in Dogen's Shobogenzo.

[3] nomaki: fascicle.

[4] Also no-e. Eihei Dogen: "The usual method of the buddhas ... is to see rags as the best material" ("Kesa-kudoku," Shobogenzo; G. Nishijima and C. Cross, ed., 1994, Vol. 1, p. 127). From the footnote to that sentence: "'Rags' is ... (FUNZO-E). ... (FUN) means excrement, and ... (SO, pronounced ZO) means 'to sweep' or 'to be swept' [as in soji]. ... (E) means robe or clothes or clothing. ... (FUNZO) represents the Sanskrit pamsu-kula, which means a dust-heap or a collection of rags out of a dust-heap used by Buddhist monks for their robes. ... (FUNZO-E) has been translated either as 'rags' or as 'a robe of rags,' according to the context" (ibid).

[5] Dogen's ten types of rags are: "1) rags chewed on by an ox, 2) rags gnawed by rats, 3) rags scorched by fire, 4) rags [soiled by] menstruation, 5) rags [soiled by] childbirth, 6) rags [offered at] a shrine, 7) rags [left at] a graveyard, 8) rags [offered in] petitional prayer, 9) rags [discarded by] a king's officers [footnote: suggests uniforms discarded by promoted officers], 10) rags brought back from a funeral" ("Kesa-kokudo," Shobogenzo, Nishijima and Cross, Vol. 1, pp. 145-146; see also "Den-e," ibid., p. 163, for a similar list).

[6] Shanavasin, the third Indian Patriarch.

[7] Daijan Huineng (Daikan Eno): 638-713. Sixth Chinese Zen Patriarch.

[8] Mt. Obai (Huangmei) is where the Fifth Chinese Patriarch, Daman Hongren (Daiman Konin), received transmission and established his monastery. In the "Kesa-kudoku," Dogen wrote that the robe was deposited in the Pao-lin-ssu (Baolin, Horin-ji) temple, built in 504 on Mt. Caoxi (Sokei-zan) of Southern China.

[9] Eshun Yoshida-roshi: Teacher of okesa sewing in the lineage of Hashimoto-roshi. Abbess Blanche Hartman and others studied with her at San Francisco Zen Center. The "special robe" is probably the Nyoho-e (True Dharma Robe) style of okesa. Eko Hashimoto-roshi (teacher of Katagiri-roshi) learned the Nyoho-e pattern from Kodo Sawaki-roshi. Sawaki-roshi in turn had studied, at Koki-ji temple, the style of okesa sewn by the 18th-century Shingon and Ritsu master Jiyun Sonja. Jiyun Sonja had reconstructed the traditional pattern for the okesa from the Mahavagga and other Vinaya-pitaka texts. [Source: "Notes on Okesa Lineage at Zen Center," an interview with Shohaku Okumura-roshi, 23 February 1996, recorded by Shosan Victoria Austin.]

[10] Also gojo-gesa. Gojo-e is the five-strip robe; shichijo-e is the seven-strip robe; and kujo-e is the nine-strip robe.

[11] King of Magadha and lay disciple of Shakyamuni Buddha.

[12] The square patch of fabric, sewn onto the uppermost part of the rakusu's neck strap, upon which the pine stitches are made.

[13] Square piece of cloth used for wrapping items such as gifts.

8 - Everyday Life

Tuesday, June 22, 1971

Everyday Life
San Francisco

I don't know where to start, you know, my talk, but anyway what I want to discuss with you tonight is how to, you know, apply our practice in your-to your everyday life. That will be the point of my talk.

Whether you are a layman or priest, you know, we are all bodhisattvas, you know. We are taking bodhisattva vow and we are practicing bodhisattva way. And as you know, bodhisattva way is to help others as you help yourself, or to help others more-before you help yourself. That is, you know, bodhisattva way. We put so much emphasis on helping others. This point is very important when you try to figure out what will be your everyday life, you know, what will be the relationship [between] zazen practice and your everyday life. Because you forget this point, you cannot extend your practice to everyday life.

Because, you know, as a Buddhist we should see things-as-it-is, you know [laughs], to see things-as-it-is, to observe things-as-they-are-that is the most important point. When you practice zazen, you know, actually you don't see anything, you don't think about anything. But even though you do [are] not aware of what you are doing, you are actually one with everything; even though you don't see, but you are actually with everything. So you know everything. You see things, you know, not with our naked eye, but our true eyes, you know. Even though we don't hear, but [laughs] actually we are with everything. We are practicing with everything, you know, actually. When you don't think, when you [are] one with your practice, you know, at that moment, even though you don't see, you are already with everything and you are actually seeing things, you know, and you have perfect understanding of everything. That is our practice. And we feel in that way when we don't think. I said "feel" but [laughs] maybe "to feel" is not correct word. That is, you know, our practice.

In that way, you know-but in your everyday life, you know, you have to see, you have to think, you have to act. But the way you see-you should-but you should know or you should understand the way you-usually way you see things [laughs] is actually whether actually you are seeing things-as-it-is, you know. You may say that "I cannot see things-as-it-is," because of our emotional, you know, because of our pink glasses [laughs]. I see things, you know, "All things are pink," you know. But I say that is because of your glasses. Actually things are not pink. All the things are not pink. But you may say, "That I cannot see, that I have pink glasses is part of [laughs] the way I am," maybe, you know. So in this way, so far as thinking mind goes, there is no point to solve this problem.

But if you, you know, know the point of our practice, you know, you will not be rely[ing] on your thinking mind too much or your eyes too much-naked eye too much. Whether you are seeing it or not seeing it, or hearing it or not hearing it, or thinking about it or not thinking about it [laughs], anyway you are one with everything. That point is more important than your way of feeling, you know. You may, you know, feel various way, but you can ignore, you know, some particular understanding of things, or you can ignore your feeling, you know, the way you feel about things, about your friend, about your teacher [laughs]. You can ignore it. Anyway, whatever I feel, he is my teacher, he is my friend, he is, you know, my husband or my wife or my children.

So actually, you know, what you have, you know, around you is anyway something you should work on, especially when, as a Buddhist, you know, the purpose of life is mostly to help others, you know [laughs]. If so, whatever it is-whatever it is, you have to work on it. That is so-called-it, in Japanese, ichinyo zammai[1]-to be fully involved in the activity you take, moment after moment.

Usually, you know, we feel we have lot of choice in our life, you know. Even your wife you think you can change it [laughs]. You have lot of choice. But I don't know whether that is possible [laughs] or not. You may think in that way-you mind think in that way-you feel in that way, but actually, you know, what you have, you know, is your husband or your wife. You cannot change it. Tomorrow [laughs] maybe you can change it.

Maybe you say-you know, someone said very interesting thing. "Maybe I-I may wait," you know. "Maybe better to wait until I feel to do so." I don't know what does he mean "to do so"-anyway, to do so is quite natural. "I'll wait," you know, he said. That makes sense, I think, but that is too passive, you know, to me or we Buddhists. It is too-not lazy, but too passive. If you have-it is pretty good, you know, to wait until what I want to do is quite natural for me to do. Pretty good, you know. Much better than to change it, you know, to do it immediately. To be patient is pretty good, but, you know, there must be something, you know, to do without being just-instead of being just patient, you know, just wait. Instead of waiting for the chance to do something, it's better to work on it. So moment after moment, if you work faithfully, you know, on it, your true life will start. But if you are waiting, or if you want to change your way, or if you make too much choice, you know-take too much choice-you have no time to live on this world [laughs]. You know, pretty soon you will die. You will be as old as I am now [laughs] very soon. Without changing over your way, when, you know, you are trying to change your circumstances.

You think you are helping, maybe, your wife or your husband only [laughs]. But actually it is not so. You may fail, you know, even though you make best effort to have good family life. You may fail maybe, you know, we don't know. But even though you fail, you know, to help your family, you are helping actually many people around you, you know. "Oh, he is so good," or "She is so very good wife," you know. If you give your friends or your neighbor that kind of warm feeling, actually that is how you help people. Things happens in that way.

Now I have, you know, many students, you know, so if I am helping only one student, it looks like I cannot help the rest of the student [laughs]. But I don't think so, actually. To help one student means to help rest of the students, in its true sense. And if you only let me do so [laughs], I can do it, you know, but most likely you don't allow me to do so, so I have to make an appointment [laughs]. Yvonne [Rand] has very difficult time to arrange my appointment. That is not what I want to do, actually. Whatever you do, you know, if you do it with your warm heart, sincerely, then it means that I can helping-I am helping the rest of the students.

Do you know why we have-we call our-the-we have the Wind Bell,[2] you know? "Wind Bell" means, you know, comes from Dogen-zenji's famous poem, Wind Bell.[3] Whichever-whatever the wind may be, you know: east wind or west wind, south or north wind-it doesn't care. It's just ring, all day long [laughs]. And he doesn't know what he is doing. All day long he is doing something. He is busy. He is helping others always, without being involved in north or south or east or west, good or bad, strong or weak, good sound or bad sound. That is actually our practice, isn't it?

Anyway, when you sit without any idea of discrimination-just sit-then you are you, and your practice include everything, and you are helping every-people. With this, you know-not confidence, but-with this feeling or, you know, in this way you practice zazen, and in this way you, you know, work on what you should do. So if your, you know, bodhisattva mind is not strong enough, you know, you may think I am [you are] not doing something well or good, you know. Better to [do] this or to-better instead of doing this, better to do something else. But when your way-seeking mind or bodhisattva mind is very strong, then you do not discriminate.

So to see things with this bodhisattva mind and to see things just [with] discriminating eyes-there is big difference, you know. So to see things-as-it-is-if you want to see things-as-it-is, you must have good practice and good, strong bodhisattva mind, and ready to accept your surrounding as-it-is. In prosperity or adversity, you know, you should act-you should manage your life maybe as a ship always, you know-as a sailing boat crossing the ocean. Whatever the wind is, you know, they have to [laughs]-you have to manage your boat. So that is some Zen master-I think it was Ummon[4]-"to drive wave-follow waves and drive waves." Follow waves and drive waves. That-he means-when he say so, we have, you know, unusual skill in our-in managing things: driving waves, following waves, and driving waves. Not much idea of driving waves, and yet so negative so passive, you know, to follow-just to follow: Following but driving [laughs]. Driving but following. When you are completely with your surrounding, that kind of activity will appear, will be your own. That kind of power or skill comes from real zazen practice with right spirit.

I think most of you have wrong idea, you know, about freedom or things-as-they-are [laughs]. When you say "freedom" or "things-as-they-are," is not what I mean, at least. You are not, you know, seeing things-as-they-are, because you have some special glasses, and through them you are seeing things. And each person has different glasses, so your opinion will not meet, you know [laughs]. So the more you has to, you know, manage our group, the more you will be get in confusion [laughs], because you stick to your own, you know, eyes, your own understanding. And if, you know, you see things without glasses, things-if the picture you have is things-as-they-are, then, you know, naturally everyone will agree with what you see, and you have to agree with some other person's understanding. But even so-even you cannot agree, you know, because you have on your glasses, you know, even though you cannot agree, sometime, you know, you should take off your glasses. "Oh!" [Laughs.] "But I need this glasses," you know. "As a teacher, I must have this one." [Laughs.] So excuse me. I must wear this. Maybe what you said is right. If you, you know, realize what kind of glasses you wear, then you can easily agree, you know. Without knowing that you have special glasses-as a student, as a teacher, as a officers, as a rokuchiji [5] [laughs], so, you know, it is-things become very difficult. So when, you know, with this understanding, many good virtue will result, you know: humbleness, soft mind, or clear understanding, or sometime sharp judgment, you know.

[Laughs.] By the way, we like bamboo very much. We Japanese like bamboo [laughs]. Someone said, you know, when I came to America, "That is Japanese bamboo bonsai." I couldn't figure out what did he meant, you know. "That is Japanese bamboo bonsai." Anyway, most people knows we Japanese like bamboo. Actually, what he means-Japanese bonsai is very expensive [laughs]. That was what he meant. "Oh, that is Japanese bamboo bonsai." [Laughs.] But for us, bamboo is not something very expensive, you know. Bamboo, first of all, has very good nature. If you want to cut it in two, it will be-you know, if you-before you cut it [completely], you-it will split in two. Ffft! You know. If you want cut it [in] four, it will exactly split in four. And, you know, even though bamboo is ten, maybe thirty feet long, you can split in just-you can split just in two, you know, from the root to the [laughs] top. It will go in that way. No other plant can be spread-split so nicely, you know. That is, you know, nature of bamboo.

But if you have that kind of wisdom, you know, to see things-as-they-are, even though it is not bamboo, you can split right in two, as Nansen [6] cut the cat right in two-Whack! [Laughs.] Students amazed. "Oh!" [Laughs.] They didn't have, you know, they didn't have time to criticize his killing cat or violating the precepts. Whack! It happened in that way, and when they realized, you know, the problem is all gone. [Laughs.] That kind of, you know, activity or wisdom will appear only when you can see things-as-it-is without trying to see, or when you solve the problem without trying to solve the problem. How you can do that is just to sit.

In China, you know, there were a famous scholar. After they studied many things or heard many things, they-he rinse his ears [laughs] to get rid of what he had learned. So when you have, you know, this kind of practice, even, you know, wisdom of-wisdom resulted by studying for long long time, going through many thousands of books, it is, you know, you should, you know, rinse your ears. You don't need it. Because of that you can hear.

That kind of, you know, freedom you will have-how? First of all, you have to have bodhisattva mind. And next, you must be concentrated on what you do. And your life is-must be based on our pure practice, shikantaza. Not so difficult thing, actually, but you make your life difficult because of your glasses. Or because of-because you create, you know, many ideas. And because you have too much choice.

When you have too much choice, even though you think you had-you have good-you made a very good choice [laughs], but it doesn't help so much. It's better to do your best in your adversity, or it's better to spend your time, whether you like it or don't like, in some kind of situation which you may not like. And experience you have through that kind of, you know, situation is pure experience: something you feel you did-something good, you know, may not be so good, you know. But something which you did anyway, whether you like it or not, because you have to do it, I did it-you did it. When you say so, maybe what you did will be very good. And your experience will become-will be with you and helping you, as a part of your blood. Think about this point, you know. If you are sincere-if you are very sincere student-

But most people want to do it because you [they] like it. That is-I don't think that is good way. If you like Zen Center too much, you should go [laughs]. If you don't like it, stay here [laughs, laughter]. But anyway, you have freedom [laughs], so you may not stay. That is trouble [laughs] you have in America. But actually it is very much so. So my way of encouraging people is little bit different, you know. That is why my people say, you know, my students say the more you grow up, the more I become difficult [laughs]. You know, I must be always difficult with you. It is very difficult for me to be difficult with you, but [laughs, laughter] I am trying to be difficult with you [laughs]. I think that is the best way to help you, you know.

I think you have the point, you know, I want to say. Do you have some-do we have some more time? Would you-do you have some question? Hai. Please speak slowly. Uh-huh?

Student A: Did I understand you to say that whatever you want to do or whatever you feel that you should do or want to do, you should do it now or work on it now?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: Does that mean that-say that there's some situation in your life that you want to change, that you should change it now, or that you should work on changing your wanting to change it? Does that make sense to all you ... [2-3 words spoken to other students unclear]? In other words-

Suzuki-roshi: Change? Oh.

Student A: Are you saying that you should work on what you want to-on what your situation is now-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yes. Uh-huh.

Student A: -not work on what you might like your situation to be?

Suzuki-roshi: Whatever the situation may be, you know, at that moment you should work on it. That is, after all, you know, in one words, that is the point. But as it is not so easy thing, you know, so I am talking about many situation you may have with your surrounding, you know, so that kind of things makes my talk long-longer-made my talk longer. But in short, you should, you know, be always with people, and you should make best effort on each moment in the situation you are, without being discouraged or without being arrogant, you know, without having much discrimination, you know. Like you sit, you know, anyway. That is the point. And what is your point of the question?

Student A: Well, the question is, let us say you have a feeling that something is wrong for you. Let us say, you know, you are in school and you feel I shouldn't be in school, or I am in a particular job, but no, this is not the right job. Is your feeling that you should try to work with that job or with that school situation and see what you can do with that?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah.

Student A: I see.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That is, you know, after all that will be better, you know, better than changing your job. But if you have to change, you know, like someone said, you know, "Let's wait." You may say to yourself, "Let's wait until I can," you know, "leave with a good reason." Or situation makes you leave, you know. Maybe even though you try, you know, your best to improve the situation, you know, they may, you know, urge you to leave, maybe. So at that time, the best way for you or only way for you may be to leave. But we must make best effort always. So if you stick too much about your idea, you know, you will lose the point. You may be happy with them to give you some reason to leave [laughs], so are a little bit, you know-you have more freedom than they have.

Student B: The idea of helping others-

Suzuki-roshi: Idea of?

Student B: -can for me sometimes is a problem because although I think about that, sometimes when I actually look [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.] ... it doesn't actually appear that that is actually what I am doing. I guess it's like realizing that my ego is there all the time. And it-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student B: To say it-to say that I'm trying to help others gets to sound silly to me-

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah.

Student B: -and it gets to sound like a lie, when I actually look at what I am doing.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. Looks like you are lying.

Student B: I don't know exactly what my question is, except that I-to tell you that I meet that problem sometimes.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student B: So it seems to me sometimes that actually the way to help others is to forget all about helping others, in a way. To forget about them. It seems like vanity or pride-

Suzuki-roshi: Vanity or-yeah.

Student B: -sometimes to say that.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. You are not honest with yourself, anyway, you know. You feel-you may feel in that way, you know. But if you go through that kind of, you know, difficulty, or, you know, at that-at this moment you may feel in that way. But if you continue to do-to keep that feeling, then you will have pretty big experience, you know, and you can test your spirit. Before you realize how important it is to have that kind of spirit, it looks like, you know, you are not honest enough or you are not strong enough, you know. That is, in another word, lack of confidence in what you do, and you feel as if it is, you know, hypocrisy or something, you know.

Do you have some question? Hai.

Student C: Um, along that line, to help others or to practice with people, um, I guess sometimes you might get angry or just to meet the situation as best you can, you know. I sort of look [?] upon this idea of trying to be a saint [as] sort of ugly, you know, in a way. You know, you've been-I feel this-I don't know, you know. I feel-I get angry. Um. I don't smile sometimes. I do smile sometimes. But I don't know, you know. I just-I just have the same sort of feeling. I can't-to just meet the situation, it seems to me that I can-

Suzuki-roshi: Sometime if-

Student C: -to try to meet with it, but, you know, not to go out and try to be a saint in that [4-5 words unclear] ... the same thing-a carbon copy.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. The thing what I am talking [about] is the fundamental spirit we must have, you know. If the center of your spirit is strong enough, whatever you do will be-will work, you know. You may be angry sometime-that is okay. And if you do not lose the center of the, you know, effort, you can be angry-very angry [laughs], maybe more than usual people be, you know. You could be angry. But you should not lose the spirit. You should not try to escape from it or, you know, you should be-you should try to be with them-with him, you know. Or you should not discriminate him. You should be-you should [laughs]-that is the taste of the work. Ffft. [Laughs.] You know? He may be very angry if I keep work [laughs], but, you know, it is okay. It is much better to smile, you know [laughs], when we-I feel, you know, angry with him, I must be angry completely. Then anger will work, if you do not lose the spirit to live with-to be with him, to practice with him.

Student C: Sort of not to run from him.

Suzuki-roshi: Not to escape, or not to make choice. Hai.

Student D: When you're confronted with the suffering of other people in the world that's caused by things like war and hunger, what kind of responses can a bodhisattva make which are consistent with right practice?

Suzuki-roshi: Bodhisattva? If you, you know, if you are [in] India, you know, for an instance, I haven't been in India yet, but if you are [in] India, your practice will be naturally different from the practice we have here. But it is-or, for an instance, you know-this is, maybe, you know, good example. Right now America has a kind of difficulty, you know, your country. And that kind of problem is our problem, you know, so we-instead of criticizing your policy, how to help them will be, you know-how to help them in its true sense will be-if you, you know, want-if you want to help them but when you cannot help directly, you will have some, you know, urge-you will feel some urge. And that kind of urge should be directed to encourage your practice-stronger, you know-to make yourself stronger, and to be ready to, you know, help your country, you know, or your society. That kind of spirit is-must be always there. Even though you do not join your, you know, peace movement, you should feel some urge, you know, some necessity to work on it. You shouldn't put the problem aside, you know. You should practice our zazen amidst of the problem, feeling the urge of practice. Then through your practice you will grow, you know, and you will have more spirit and more power, and you will be ready to help people.

Student D: Is there a way to combine action with [2-3 words unclear], you know, sitting practice besides personal practice in a way that, for instance, if you join the peace movement, that that would be part of your practice? Or if you worked and lived in a community, you know, doing things in that community, could that be part of your practice, as well as sitting-not excluding sitting but as well as sitting?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, I think so. I think so, but if you-actually, you are right here, you know, so you must have good practice. Your practice should not be weak. Then you will be ashamed of yourself, you know, not to join them.

Student E: Roshi, you said before, Roshi, that, you know, we should-well, in order to see things-as-they-are, you know, we must have the bodhisattva eyes, and in order to have that, we must be able to involved fully with whatever we are doing. But it seems that there's like a problem with that as there is with, one might say, the idea of trying to become a saint, is that you have-

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah, that is very cheap idea, you know, to be trying to be a saint or a sage, you know.

Student E: If, um-

Suzuki-roshi: It is a kind of escape, you know.

Student E: I mean, if-

Suzuki-roshi: Without being sage you can, you know, you can do many things before you become sage. You know, if you are trying to be a sage [laughs], what will you do if you couldn't? You know, in my-when I was young, people worked hard to get some money to help others [laughs]. You know, if he cannot earn money to give somebody, what he will do, you know? Before, even though he has no money, there is-there are many ways of helping people, you know. It is not just after you have money you can help others. Before you, you know, have a lot of money, you can help others. And with this spirit, if you practice continuously, maybe you will be sage, you know, some day, I don't know [laughs].

Student E: Roshi, what I meant was, um-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Oh, excuse me. [Laughter.]

Student E: I mean, well, like, when Cody [?] was talking about, you know, in terms of, you know, like we'd have some idea of being good, or that idea or the idea of being involved fully with what you are doing, you know, that-when you have that idea in your head that can be like a problem too, I mean-especially if you have a lot of trouble being involved in that way, because it seems to me that, you know, when you go about-when you start out to do something, you say, "Here I am, and here is the activity I will do." It was, uh-and then pretty soon you find yourself, you know, your mind has wandered completely from what you are doing, you know. So you bring it back, but if you get attached-at least, you know, it's been my experience-I like kind of get attached to that, you know, it's just, you know, then the mind just becomes like a turmoil, like a stream of muddy water. So, um-you know, on the other hand if I-sometimes I don't try, you know, sometimes I feel like if, you know, I don't make an effort to do something [?], it seems to confuse me, you know, which actually creates confusion. I don't ... [3-4 words unclear], you know. I think maybe I'm not doing enough [2-3 words unclear]. But-I was hoping you could say something about this.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. Uh. You know, anyway, I understand your feeling, but you have to check your feeling more, you know. First of all, you should check, you know, whether that kind of feeling arise from some selfish, you know, idea or arrogancy, or, you know, because of not enough, you know, effort. Maybe sometime it may be because of laziness, you know, lazy idea. So if you don't, you know-if you are not involved-if you cannot do with people [who are] right now with you, then it is a kind of arrogancy, you know. "You people do not know what is most important thing. What you are doing is not so important." You should do things, but you don't have enough courage, you know, to convince them to follow you, you know, or you have not enough courage to be responsible for that, you know-what you will do. And you are thinking, you know, your mind is wandering. That is not so healthy practice. Do you understand?

Student E: I'm not sure I could follow you.

Suzuki-roshi: You know, if you see someone actually acting in that way, you have some feeling, you know. "Oh, that may be how we should help people." So it-you need some good examples, and you need some good friend if you want to do something better, you know. That if-if you act or-without good friend, without someone's real support, you know, and without, you know-that you haven't good support means, you know, your practice is not there. Still somewhere else. That is why people doesn't support you-do not support you. So if you really, you know, feel in that way, immediately people will support you. Some actual fact should follow with your idea, you know. So just to depend on someone who may lead you to some, you know, good way-that is not good way, you know. Don't you think so?

Start [hits cup or stick on floor or other hard surface] right now [laughs], before you think about it [laughs]. Even though you join the group, you should have your friend to go with you immediately. That kind of, you know, element is-when that kind of element is lacking in your activity or movement, you know, you will be led in wrong direction. If someone-if there are many people, you know, who want to do something good by-under some suggestion, you know, it is very easy to lead them wrong way, you know. Anyone can lead them, because you are like a sheep. That is not healthy, you know, structure of our society.

I, you know, I am sorry, but I feel that kind of tendency in our young generation. We are not strong enough, and our feet is not on the ground. You see? So you must be much stronger and thinking about, you know, result of your, you know, result of your movement, or result of your-each one's acting in each one's feeling, you know. Something is missing is very true, you know. What is missing? You should know exactly what is missing. Even though you don't know what to do with this society, but you should exactly know what point is missing. You cannot depend on anything, anyone. You should know. That is why I am talking about, you know, how to apply our practice in our everyday life. I said, "everyday life," but this spirit could be applied in your movement in future. And you will know what kind of practice you must have. It is not just, you know, sitting-sitting in Zen Center is not whole picture of our practice, you know. It is the picture of your movement-your young generation's movement.

Okay? Yeah. Some more effort is necessary. [Strikes cup or stick again. Laughs.]

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Joe Galewsky and Bill Redican (5/1/01).

[1] ichinyo zammai: ichinyo = oneness, non-discrimination, absolute unity; zammai or sanmai (samadhi, Sanskrit) = nondualistic state of meditation.

[2] Wind Bell is the biannual publication of the San Francisco Zen Center.

[3] WIND BELL-by Eihei Dogen

Hanging in space by his mouth

His whole body is his mouth

East, West, South, and North Wind

He does not care

Always, he talks in many ways about Prajñaparamita for others

Tsu Chin Tsun Ryan

Tsu Chin Ryan

The above is Dogen's rewriting of a verse by his master Tiantong Rujing (Tendo Nyojo, 1163-1228). See, e.g., Steven Heine, The Zen Poetry of Dogen (Boston: Tuttle, 1997, p. 141). The translation reproduced here was probably by Suzuki-roshi.

[4] Yunmen Wenyan (Ummon Bun'en): 864-949. Chan master of Tang China.

[5] rokuchiji: by tradition, the six operations officers of a Japanese Zen monastery.

[6] Nanquan Puyuan (Jap. Nansen Fugan): 748-835. Dharma successor of Mazu Daoyi (Jap. Baso Doitsu).

1971 juli (11)

1 - Real Precepts Are Beyond Words

Friday, July 02, 1971

"Real Precepts Are Beyond Words"
City Center

[Today I would like to][1] ... lecture about precepts. I- When I say "precepts," the first thing you will think of is something like Ten Commandment or ten grave prohibitory precepts. But Zen precepts is not like that. The Zen precepts is- To study Zen precepts means to understand zazen. So it is- Another interpretation of zazen is precepts. Using words-word "precepts" we explain what is Zen actually.

The purpose of receiving precepts, observing precepts, is not just to remember what we should do or what we shouldn't do. And how we observe precepts is to practice Zen or to extend our practice to our everyday life. So the idea of precepts is completely different from the usual understanding of precepts.

The precepts, you know, which is - Or foundation of precepts or- True meaning of precept-precepts is various way of understanding of one reality, one reality which is always with you-reality, which cannot- which is not indivisible in three, or in sixteen, or in ten. Tentatively we divide- we explain it from various angle, but that is just words. Real, you know, precept is beyond word. We cannot- If we talk about it, it is not real precepts already. So if you think precept is just to observe some various rules is precepts, it is very different or very far away from the true understanding of the true prac- [incomplete word: "practice"?]-precepts.

So, the first precepts of sixteen precepts we observe is-how can I [laughs] put into English word one reality which is not-which cannot be divided in three or sixteen-one reality, precept of one reality. You may call it "emptiness," or you may call it "the absolute." That is one reality, you know. That is the first precept we receive-we observe. So [as] you may know, this is the most important-maybe most-I cannot say the most important [laughs], but this is the m- [incomplete word: "most"?]-

Anyway, all the precepts start from this precept. Without understanding this precepts, our precepts doesn't make any sense. One reality which we cannot divide [by] three or six or sixteen. It can be understood in great scale; whatever there are in this world or in this universe, or what kind of rule we have, or what kind of truth we can observe in various way, or moral code, or rules, or theory we scientist observe, are all those truths is included in this big scale of the precepts.

We understand the precepts in various ways. Science-scientists understand his own way, and various people understand religious way. There must be various way of understanding of it, but the-what we study, what we observe is the one precept. That is the precept you will receive-when you receive precepts, sixteen precepts. You will understand then, you know, how you receive precepts. How you receive precepts is just practice zazen, just to be yourself. Then you can observe the precepts.

Ahh. It looks like I'm talking about something [laughs] about heaven [laughs], but it is not so. I am talking about each one of you and myself [drinks water], and about the water and about the stuff [laughs]. When, you know, stuff is really stuff, this stuff include everything. When you just practice zazen on your black cushion, your practice include everything. And you practice zazen with Buddha, with various patriarch, and with all sentient beings. That is, you know, what I always repeat over and over.

Whether your practice is good or bad, it doesn't matter. If you accept your practice as your own, then that practice include everything. At that time you have precepts which include everything as the absolute being include everything. We say, you know, something which include everything is the absolute. But it is actually it is more than that. It is beyond our understanding. You may- You may think if you add, you know, all of you and all the being which exist in this universe, then that is the absolute. But it is not so, because that absolute can be understood by your mind, you know. Something which you understand is not already absolute, you know, because your mind limit the real understanding of the absolute. When you understand, it is not so. When you don't understand and when you just sit [laughs], when you become just a stone or stuff, you know, then you include everything. That is, you know, our zazen practice.

This is so important point for us. If we lose this point, you will be easily caught by some idea or some experience in your, you know, practice. "My practice is good, very good. Recently I saw Buddha in zazen. [Laughs.] Various buddhas-all the buddhas came to me [laughs, laughter] and admired my practice." [Laughs, laughter.] You are laughing, but it is actually that kind of practice exists. And they practice this kind of practice very sincerely. But even so, it is good practice- But even so, compare-comparing to the practice "just sit," you know, you can't-it is beyond comparison [laughs]. Just to sit is much better than to see all the buddha in the world [laughs]. Do you [laughs] understand why is it?

That is the point, you know: to know how important practice it is just to be yourself. When I couldn't read Zen book in English, you know, Alan Watts said, you know, "When a stone is completely stone [laughs], that is real stone," he said, you know. That is what he put, you know, our-that-Zen into word. When a stone is really stone, that is, you know, when a stone is stone through-and-through. That is really a stone.

Not only that is really stone, or when it is really stone, the stone include everything. The stone cannot be, you know, picked up by anyone when a stone is really stone. When- Because it is not stone, you know [laughs], so someone may kick it. But when a stone is really stone, you cannot do-you cannot do anything with it. When a stone is really stone, you cannot, you know, pick up. Even though you think you picked up, still, you know, it is a part of the universe. It is you that-who thinks you could picked up, but actually you didn't, you didn't. It is still a part of [laughs] the universe. You cannot pick up whole universe. If you say so, "I picked up whole universe," where are you? [Laughs.] You are ghost. You are outside of the universe. That is just delusion. Nothing exist outside of the universe. All what exist is inside of the universe, you know.

So, that you say you picked up a stone is big delusion. Stone is still stone. You cannot do anything with it. If you understand this point and sit, that is how you receive precepts. This is-

Only one way to observe precepts, perfect precepts. There is no other way to observe precepts. This precept is called- I don't know what, how to interpret-precepts which is-which is not dividable in three. Why we say three is there's two more.

Another point of this precepts is you say, you know-as you know, we say "dharma" and-no, "buddha, dharma, sangha." I am talking about-I have been talking about dharma [buddha] precepts, which cannot be divided in three.

And next one is dharma precept. Dharma. It is, you know, law of the universe. There is- In some way, you know, always things is going. If you throw something, you know, away it will eventually come to the earth because, you know, things, because of the theory of the gravitation. So what- There's some rules, you know, in the way of things exist. So if we say "rule," that law or theory, that theory or rule include everything. There is nothing-nothing exist out of-free from the law or theory. That is dharma.

When we say "freedom" [laughs]-even though you have complete freedom, you say "I have complete freedom from everything." But if you exist outside of the law or theory, you are ghost [laughs]. You are, you know, you are- That is your own delusion. Actually nothing exist outside of the rule. And that is called-the second one is called pure-pure law or pure precepts.

Why- "Pure" means not dualistic. When something is in duality, it is not pure, we say. When we- When things is not dualistic it is pure. Usually, you know, when you say "pure," pure is opposite of impure. And when you say "good," good is opposite of bad-a pair of opposite. Good and bad is pair of opposite. Then there is already pollution. Good air [laughs] or pure air. So, when we say "pure," it means non-duality. Non-duality.

When you sit, you know, if you say, "My practice is good," it is already dualistic. Whether you say "good practice" or "bad practice," you are right there and sitting [laughs]. You cannot say "good practice" or "bad practice." There is some reason why someone's practice is like this or someone cannot sit with her back straight. There's some reason, and you cannot say "good" or "bad." That is how she practice zazen. For her there is no other way to sit for two days' practice. She is making her best effort, and she practice zazen just to, you know, make her effort-complete effort. To be complete being, she is sitting. Not to attain enlightenment or not to keep her from being fall into the hell [laughs]. He is just sitting. She is just sitting. No one can criticize her practice. If she criticize her practice, you know, she is not making her best effort. When she is making her best effort, you know, she cannot criticize. She will not be regret about is-about her practice. That is her own practice, and day after day, if she continue this kind of practice, that is how we exist or how we live as a good Buddhist. That is how we keep our prac [incomplete word]-precepts.

Anyway, there is some rule, you know, some reason why each person exist here. There is some reason why plant is plant and stars are star. So when we say "dharma," dharma include everything. And dharma is another name of the Buddha, the Absolute One.

The third one is sangha. "Sangha" means to keep harmony, to be harmonious. You know, when Buddha and the law of the universe is not two. And when someone who is practicing zazen and Buddha and his law is one, that is complete harmony. It is more than harmony [laughs].

It is actually one.

So, after all, we say, after all, one indivisible ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.] ... the precept which is indivisible in three, or which is indivisible. We say "three precepts," but it is not three. We cannot divide in three. So we say "precepts which is not divisible in three." But we can, you know, explain it in three ways. "My practice is, you know- My zazen is precepts itself." That is one interpretation-one way of understanding the precepts.

There's rules, you know. If I do something good, result will be good. You cannot [laughs], you know, escape from the law of karma. If you understand that way, then that law include-that rule or law-include everything. We say "law of karma," but you cannot escape from karma. Nothing can, you know, escape from the karma. There's some rule-always rule. Rule is following you-not following you, you know. It is how everything exist. So, you know, it is same thing with Buddha himself. When we say "Buddha," Buddha, you know, acts with karma, by karma, or for karma. So karma and Buddha is same. And we, you know, Buddha's disciple, is always one with Buddha. We cannot escape from him. So we say "indivisible" precepts. We cannot divide in three.

Now you are listening to my lecture; or you may, to study Buddhism, you will read many books. The books you read is not Buddhism itself but explanation of this, you know, truth. "Form is emptiness; emptiness is form." If we explain it like this, it is Prajñāparamita groups-study of Prajñāparamita group-sutra of Prajñāparamita group. If we put emphasis on how to be buddha, why we are buddha, then that is study of Lotus Sutra. What is the- If we study koan, what do we study? What you study by koan is what is the relationship between our practice and the reality. How we, you know- Why we- How we have a glance of the truth or enlightenment or Buddha, which is always one, which is not divisible, which cannot be explained in words. That is, you know, how you study koan. Through koan, or through koan practice, you will have a glance of the truth. "Oh, this is reality!" That is koan practice. Whatever you say, whatever you write, it is a kind of way-it is one of the way to put the reality into words. If you are an artist, what you work on is how to, you know, convey your understanding of the truth.

To-so to study Buddhism, of course, include-is included in our study of precepts. Precepts is not just to observe ten prohibitory precepts: Do not kill; do not steal, you know, that is not [laughs]-that is, you know- It is precepts. It is really precepts, but that is not- Even though you observe ten precepts completely, it is not how you observe our real precepts.

So we are not interested in to explain 250, more than 250-a little bit more-I don't know how many more, three or four [hundred] more precepts for [laughs] for a man and for a lady more than 500. I'm sorry to say. Each time I say [laughs], I-some of you maybe may not like it.

But, you know, as I always say, female has more complicated [laughs] spiritually and physically complicated, you know, activity. So the rule should be more complicated. That is, you know, quite natural [laughs]. So man is more simple, and- "Too simple" means, maybe, not so good [laughs]. Simpleton? Simpleton. [Laughs, laughter.] So, you know, I am not proud of, you know, having half of the precepts as a lady has, you know. I'm not proud of it. I'm so simple [laughs]. I'm so foolish, maybe.

But anyway, it is not the point to observe those precepts one by one after another. The point is how to be yourself, how to be a lady-a lady. Then you have precepts. You have complete precepts. When you are just lady, you keep more than five hundred [laughs] precepts. Actually, even though you keep written precepts-five hundreds of written precepts-you may not be completely a lady. But when- The best way is just to be yourself. Then precepts are with you always.

People may ask, "What are you doing," you know, "in Zen Center? What kind of practice you have in Zen Center?" There are many ways, maybe, but, in short, to be one's self is the purpose of our practice. How to be one's self, one's self is our point of practice and how to keep the precepts-Buddha's precepts. And this-those are the three precepts-the three indivisible precepts.

And next one, I'm [laughs]-I'm not continuing my lecture any more [laughs], because you may be hungry-you may be hungry if I continue [laughs, laughter]. The other three is the three collective pure precepts. Collection of all the goodies [laughs, laughter]. That is another three precepts [laughs]. How about it? "Collection of all the goodies precepts." [Laughs, laughter.]

And ten- We have ten more: that is ten [grave] prohibitory precepts. You shouldn't eat too much, you know, even though we have the three collective good [pure] precepts. That is sixteen precepts. And we tentatively, you know, explain the framework of Buddhism by the explanation of the precepts. So it is not just precepts. It is not just rule. It is direct explanation of our life and Buddha's teaching and zazen practice. That is why it is important for you to receive precepts.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Verbatim transcript checked against tape by Sara Hunsaker (4/99) and Bill Redican (2/8/01).

[1] The first part of the sentence was not recorded on tape. The phrase in brackets was added by the transcriber.

2 - Precepts

Tuesday, July 06, 1971

Precepts

San Francisco

I want to continue my talk about precepts-Buddhist precepts. And last time I talked about the indivisible three treasures, which is buddha, and dharma, and sangha. But we have three-we say "three treasures," but the three treasures could be understood by you in three ways. It is indivisible, three precepts, because it is one: buddha, and dharma, and sangha are actually one. It is not three. So we say indivisible three treasures.

The next one is, actually, since we have Shakyamuni Buddha who attained enlightenment, realizing the indivisible three treasures. And what he told was dharma, which was-as he realized what is the indivisible three treasures, he talked about it. That is dharma. And his disciples are sangha. So this is-we call this three treasures, is called "manifested three treasures." And right now we have, you know, temples, and in temple we have buddha, you know, big or small, or bronze or wood, or gold or wood, wooden buddha, bronze buddha, buddha image. That is buddha, you know, for us. And we have scriptures, you know, many scriptures, piled up somewhere [laughs], sometime in library [laughs]. Those are dharma too. We call it dharma. And sangha-sangha is priests and-priests or nun-priests, nuns, and laymen and laywomen. They are, you know, all sangha. Those are, you know, also three treasures. Three treasures, maintaining, which maintains Buddha and Buddhism as a religion. So those are called, maybe, juji sanbo[1] -"maintaining three treasures," the three treasures which maintain or sustain Buddhism, which protect Buddhism.

Tonight I want to talk about Buddha's-excuse me-three treasures, manifested-the manifested three treasures. It is not different, but the difference-difference is, difference between indivisible three treasures[2] and manifested three treasures[3] is-Buddhism which was told by Buddha is the manifested three treasures, manifested buddha. And Buddhism which exist, you know, before Buddha, even before Buddha, that is indivisible three treasures. After Buddha, you can say "he is Buddha," you know; he can say "this is Buddha." And this is the teaching which was told by Buddha. That is dharma. And those are Buddha's sangha, which include priest, and laymen, and laywomen-Buddha's sangha.

So we can tell by our eyes, you know, which is buddha, and which is dharma, and which is sangha. But indivisible three treasures cannot say this is dharma, or this is buddha, or this is sangha. This is the difference. And-and for us it is very important to figure out the difference between Buddhism which was told by Buddha and Buddhism which actually exist, whether Buddha, you know, came out on this world.

But because you don't-most people thinks if Buddhism is the teaching which was started by Buddha. Maybe most people thinks in that way. And some people may say before Buddha there were many sages, and Buddha is one of the sages we have had-we had before. Those sages, you know, in-we have had besides Buddha is also-we include those sages. Where [laughs]-where are they [laughs] now? They are not, you know, they are not indivisible three treasures; they are not included there. And they are not manifested, you know, three treasures, because [laughs] manifested three treasures are Buddha, and the teaching he told us, and his sangha. Those are manifested three treasures [laughs]. Where are they now [laughs]? For an instance, here is Amida Buddha, you know [probably pointing to the statue of Amida Buddha in the buddha hall]. Where is he? We-it looks like they have no place-Buddhism has no place for other sages [laughs]. Very sectarian, maybe, you may say. But we have actually [laughs]-we reserve-they have reserved seat [laughs, laughter]. You must think, you know. That is a koan for you. Where are they?

There are many questions. If you think more, you will have many questions. And as a Buddhist, it is necessary to figure out those questions clearly, and you have to answer for this kind of question [laughs]. What you should study now or tonight after listening to my last lecture is, first of all, to have full understanding of indivisible [pronounces it "indivisible," laughs]-indivisible three treasures. Unless you understand this indivisible three treasures, you cannot be perfect Buddhist. This is very important point for us to understand. Even, you know-of course, to have full understanding of it, it is necessary for us to practice. Actual practice is necessary. You cannot, you know, understand it, you cannot figure out by your mind. Actual practice is necessary. What you understand, you know, will be-if it is not buddha or sangha, it will be law of the Buddhism or law of the universe. Or if it is not the law of the universe, it may be something, you know, which exist in this universe: trees or mountains or river.

And it is almost impossible to know what is dharm- [partial word]-what is buddha. The buddha is so-called-it "emptiness" or "nothingness." That is actually buddha. And if you think you can figure out what is nothingness, what is emptiness [laughs], if you say "I know what is emptiness," that is not emptiness. [It is] somethingness-some idea or something. How you can figure out-how you can tell what is emptiness is to full understanding of mountains or river or each one of us. What is a stone? What is a cat? What is a dog, you know? When you know actually what is a dog, what is a cat, you know yourself, you know. Only when you know yourself you will understand what is mountain, what is a dog, what is a cat. And you will understand cat is not just cat. Cat is you too. You are cat. [Laughs] At the same time, you are a dog too [laughs, laughter]. And if you think it is ridiculous for you to be a dog [laughs, laughter], then that is, you know, usual understanding. It is not indivisible-indivisible truth. That is why, actually, we must have practice. Unless we have practice, we cannot reach this, you know, core of the teaching.

People may say Buddhism is atheism because we do not have any particular, you know, buddha to worship. So they may say Buddhism is atheism. Or they-it is not monotheism. People knows about this point. But many people say Buddhism is pantheism, but it is not so. Atheism or pantheism or monotheism is the religion which you can teach by-by your thinking mind. You can figure out what is, you know, what is god.

But Buddhism is beyond our understanding. It should be so. Every religion actually should be so, but Buddhism puts emphasis on this point. Because-I think Buddhism is very good religion for American people [laughs, laughter] because you like something, you know, you like something which you can figure out, you know. If we say you cannot figure out what is buddha, you will be discouraged: "Oh, Buddhism is no good." [Laughs, laughter.]

At least for you, religion should be some mystical-mystic religion will be pretty good for you, but not exactly [right?]. Religion should be some religion which will give you some advantage in your life. That is most appropriate religion, not only for American people, but for almost all the human nature-human being. Or else no one will not be-no one will [be] interested in religion. But we, you know, we Buddhists [are] concerned about this point very much, because of the weakness we have-weakness, which weakness that we cannot satisfy with nothing. That is the [reason] why we suffer, why we have difficulties in our life. Only when we can [be] satisfied with ourselves and with what we have and with how we are, then we will have complete freedom from everything. And that is how we, you know-how we-how we become completely-how we have complete renunciation.

You may say that is almost impossible, you know, or utterly impossible; but actually it is not so. There is some way. Because you think so, it is not possible. When you say it is not possible, you stick to your gaining idea, and you still continue to play game with things. You are not-you are not serious enough with yourself. You need something, you know, some-something to make [you] feel good. We Buddhist feel very sympathetic with people who cannot [be] satisfied without anything when they are already buddha. Because they need- [partial word-"need"?]-they want something more, they cannot be a buddha. That's all. So it is [a] pity, you know [laughs, laughter], isn't it, you know? Having, you know-being well-qu- [partial word-"qualified"?]-completely qualified buddha-for some completely-for a completely qualified buddha, just because he needs something more, a little bit more, he cannot be a buddha [laughs]. How silly, you know [laughs, laughter], we are if you really know yourself. This point is not, you know-this is the point we do not notice. And this is the point why Buddha appeared in this world.

So Buddha's enlightenment is just to be himself, you know, and when he become he himself, he found everyone to be a buddha, and everything was buddha. When just knows-when just-when he just know who he was, then everyone were buddha. Everyone is buddha. That is how he attained enlightenment. And his teaching was how we, you know, his teaching is actually let everyone know why we are not buddha, why we cannot be a buddha. So actually it is mostly about human nature.

So his teaching is about our human nature. So that is why we say if you study Buddhism, you will be a good human being. And when you are good human being, then you are also-when you know your bad points, means you know you are originally Buddha. Same thing. At least if you listen to his teaching, you will know why you are, you know, you have suffering as a human being, and how-that is how you can [be] free from suffering. The same teaching will work in two ways.

Actually he was talking about himself-about himself as a person who was born at certain time, at certain place. If so, what is Buddhism [laughs]? Where is Buddhism? Buddhism is each one's own nature. In this sense, that each one's own nature is called also "buddha nature," because it is about how we-how Buddha lose himself and how a buddha stays himself. So it is all about each one of us.

So if you say Buddha attained enlightenment or Buddha started Buddhism, it is so. But even though he didn't start, he didn't appear in this world, Buddhism is there as long as we are here. So there is nothing new, you know, for us to study. But Buddha's teaching will give you some light, some light to know yourself. So in this sense we have dharma-the light by which we can see ourselves like a mirror is Buddha's teaching. But all what we will know is about ourselves.

So here in manifested three treasures, same thing is true. Buddha, and sangha, and teaching is one. We are buddha. Or "sangha," we say, but each one of the sangha-member of the sangha is buddha. And his teaching we say, but that is just light, you know, to know ourselves. So actually there is no special teaching which we should remember, which we should recite. There is no need to recite sutra [laughs], in its true sense, but it will help anyway [laughs, laughter]. So if you-if you should respect, you know, pay homage, you should pay homage to yourself, and it means to pay homage to buddha and to the dharma. That is the structure of Buddhism.

So same thing is true with the manifested three treasures as three treasure indivisible-[having trouble pronouncing it; laughs.] In-di-vi- [Students help with pronunciation.] Okay anyway. [Laughs, laughter.] Better not to, to bite my lips. [Laughs, laughter.] Anyway, same, not difference. Not different. But because our mind is not so clear, so we must to give good understanding of Buddhism, we have precepts. So precepts is not something to observe literally. Through precepts we should know the structure of Buddhism, and point of Buddhism, and core of Buddhism, and spirit of Buddhism. That is why we accept precepts.

And the maintaining Buddhism, three treasure of-which maintain Buddhism, like scriptures, or priests, or bronze Buddha. You-if I-you don't, you know, you don't-I think you do not find much meaning in bronze Buddha or scriptures, maybe, you know; especially you don't [aren't] interested in bronze Buddha at all [laughs]. You say it is idol, you know, idol worship. Buddhism is idol worship because all of us, you know, every day bowing to Buddha. Right now we bow to Buddha nine times. It is-Buddhism is nothing but idol worship. [Laughs, laughter.] Yeah, that is maybe your feeling.

But, you know-buddha-in this category of maintaining buddha include various sages who are actually-actually helping people, whether he is Buddhist or not. That is for us also buddha. It is not because we are so generous [laughs], but because we have clear understanding of buddha-who is buddha. Each one of us is already buddha. Why various sages who are, you know, helping people are not buddha? They are all buddha. We say "buddha in other world." "Other world" is-means, you know, not in this society, or not for Buddhists. Other world-other world can be Christian world or some other religious people's world. This point should not be, you know, missed. We really pay homage to those sages.

This is a brief explanation of the triple treasures we have-precepts of triple treasures. Maybe to have-having clear understanding of triple treasures, our triple treasures, and to have right practice, we should make those points very sure, through practice, and through intellectual understanding, and through discussion. If we do not discuss this point fully, we will not have good practice in its true sense, and we will be lost. Even though you, you know, practice hard and you make great effort, you will be lost. So that you may not lose yourself in your practice, in your religion, we should accept those treasures which was transmitted from Buddha to us. Actually, Buddha realized this point, and [it was] carefully discussed by various teachers and patriarchs so that we might not lose our way.

You can criticize, you know, Buddhism from various angle. That is necessary. If it is not necessary for you, it will help someone else, you know, even though [laughs] you end up in your criticism. It will help people-someone else. For your own sake, for other's sake, you should criticize Buddhism. And you can fight with Buddhism, even. If you don't fight with Buddhism strongly enough, all human being will be lost. Only when you fight with Buddhism, then actually you are helping .... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

You should study Buddhism on those points by all means and from various angles. But as long as you are fighting with it, you are not-not yet [laughs] Buddhist-you are outside Buddhism. But from Buddha's viewpoint, he is Buddhist, and even though he feel he is not Buddhist. Buddhism is, you know, this kind of religion. You should know what is Buddhism very clearly. And if you [are] going to be a Buddhist, you should be prepared for this kind of problem which you will have because you became a-only because you became Buddhist. If you, you know, were not Buddhist, you will not have any problem, maybe [laughs]. Only because you became a Buddhist you will have many problem [laughs, laughter]. Fighting, you know-through fighting-this kind of fighting, you can help people in its true sense. If you want to be protected by the Three Treasures, it is not the way to accept the Three Treasures. This is the spirit we receive our precepts. This is why you become a Buddhist. [Sighs.]

Maybe I think better to have a question-and-answer time for, maybe, how many minutes? Twenty minutes? Do you have some question? Hai.

Student A: What do you mean "fight with Buddhism"?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student A: What do you mean "fight with Buddhism"?

Suzuki-roshi: Buddhism. [Laughs.] Buddhism. In its wide sense-

Student B: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: Did you hear, Roshi?

Student A: To fight with Buddhism.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, "fight with Buddhism."

Student B: Fight with Buddha.

Suzuki-roshi: To-to have doubt-you know, to wonder what it is, to have many questions about Buddhism. That is mostly what I meant. We-we do not use any weapons, so it is impossible for you to fight with gun or- [laughs]. Yeah. Hai.

Student C: I've come here off-and-on, but the people that seem to be studying here the longest never seem to ask any questions. [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? Asking-what did he say?

Student B: He said the people here-that practice here the most never ask questions.

Suzuki-roshi: They do. Yeah. [Laughs, laughter.] Will you ask question then? You can ask question. [Laughter.]

Student D [Ed Brown?]: It's because our legs hurt so much where we live [?] [laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: Do you have some question? You have-you must suffer eighteen minutes more. [Laughter.] Do you have some question? Did you have some outline of my talk? Hai.

Student E: Could you say something more about emptiness, or void, or pure nothingness?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. [Laughter.] Who said? To wondering why? [?] [Laughter.] Because I cannot say anything about this, I talked so long time [laughs, laughter]. It is impossible to say something about it, you know, but it is possible. The only way to know what is emptiness is to be you, you know. Then that is emptiness. Do you understand? We have-nothing has its self-nature. So if you-the only way to have it is to be a part of it. It is not good. If I say "part of it," it is already creating some question or [laughs]-a question for you, but to be a part of it, to be one with everything. Then, when you are actually a part of everything-all things, you are all thing. When you think you have your own way, or you have your own self-nature, then you are not part of all things. So you are something. When you are completely a part of everything, you don't exist anymore. [Takes a drink of water.]

When you dip a water by this cup, you know, and when you say, "this is water," you know, this is not water anymore. When you empty it to the river, it is really water. It is flowing endlessly. It doesn't stay anywhere. If it stay someplace, it may not be true water anymore. But actually it is-it cannot stay anywhere that is water. We think it can stay here, but this is just because I think, you know, "here is water in the cup." But it doesn't actually staying here; it is going, you know, away. So when water is really water, it is nothing, you know; no self-nature. There is no water. You cannot catch it. So, in this sense, we can say "nothingness." Water is nothingness. Nothingness-because it is nothing, it is water, true water. When it is true water, it is nothingness. So everything is nothingness, and everything is everything, just everything. Anything can be everything, and everything can be nothing. This is a kind of technique [laughs, laughter] to talk about-nothingness. When you know, when you become familiar with this kind of technique, you may say, "I understand what is nothingness." [Laughs, laughter.] Then you don't understand. So when you don't know anything, you really have Buddhism. So better not to be concerned about nothingness too much. [Laughs, laughter.]

Do you have some-did you understand what I am saying? No?

[Laughter.] That was good. If you say "understand," you understood- maybe you have understood something else. That is your own understanding. Don't ask question about nothingness, you know. You will be- you must surrender, anyway, if you ask question about nothingness. Maybe I have to surrender too [laughs]. Some other question?

Student F: You say it is necessary to have doubt.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student F: What about- is it necessary also to have faith, to be able to try out Buddhism?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, yeah. Yeah.

Student F: So sometimes- sometimes you need faith and sometimes you need doubt?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, but doubt- big doubt should follow, you know, the confidence to try out. But actually we are trying out, you know, even though we die, we are still trying in some way [laughs]. Isn't that true? Even though we have no physical, you know, body, we are still trying. Physical body seems to act quite easily. But, you know, true- my true nature cannot cease to act. It is going. Even though there is no more earth, still something is going on, endlessly [laughs]. If you, you know, if you [are] discouraged by something which may happen to us, it is lack of understanding of our true nature. If you know, really, what we are, we cannot [get] discourage[d]. Even though your small mind may be discouraged, but your big mind is still going [laughs]. It is okay, you know. Some more question?

Student G: Is it possible to study Buddhism without doubt?

Suzuki-roshi: Without-?

Student G: Without doubt.

Suzuki-roshi: Without doubt? Yeah, if possible, that is better.

Student G: Why?

Suzuki-roshi: If that is possible- if you have some- if you are on the track, you know, maybe you can go without doubt. That is why we have various, you know, practice: So that you can go on and on without much difficulty we have, you know, various rules and rituals.

Student H: If you doubt, when you doubt, pretty soon you're doubting so much that- how do you know that you're on the track, if you're doubting all the time? How do you know for sure, you know, when the right thing?

Suzuki-roshi: It is not necessary to be sure. Anyway [laughs, laughter], you will not be lost. That is very true, you know. You think you will be lost. When you think you will be lost, then you have something wrong with you. You know, you may be-you may have very small mind.

Student H: Okay, that's the case with certain people who are called schizophrenic. What happens to them? They go off and then something happens to them, and what, what is it?

Suzuki-roshi: So I think if our society, you know, is supported this kind of big mind and spirit, we will not have so many, you know, mentally disturbed people. The-why they feel they afraid of being lost is, you know, they are not fully supported by big mind. They are, you know, always confronting with his own small mind and some other small mind, like his parents' or his brother or sister, his neighbor. They are all, you know, involved in small mind, so he has to confront with small mind always, so he will be always discouraged. His mind cannot be so broad and big. And when he has big mind he feel as if he was lost, you know, something wrong with himself-with him, when-because everyone has small mind, you know. When everyone has small mind, and he-even though he have big mind, he feels as if he was lost. That is, you know, the trouble-trouble of the society who has not supported with this kind of big mind.

Student I: Why have all this weakness, and desire, and struggle? What is the sense in it?

Suzuki-roshi: Struggle?

Student I: Yeah, why is it-what is the sense in all of this-these-having small mind, having weaknesses and desires? Why?

Suzuki-roshi: Reason why is, you know, not to-actually, we do not have small mind, so-called-it "small mind" to suffer, but to support ourselves we have small mind-to know what actually we are doing, inch by inch. That is small mind. If you call it small mind, but if it doesn't cease to act, you know, going on and on, that is actually big mind. So if you lose the background of the small mind which is big mind, then small mind end up in small mind for you. It is actually going, but you don't feel so, and you are always afraid of something will happen to you. That is fear, you know. That is why we suffer.

Student I: I know; but my question is why was all this created in the first place?

Suzuki-roshi: Which practice?

Student I: Why was all this created, all this-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, that is-Student I: -you're given that, kind of, climb out [?] of small mind. The whole process. Why? What's the sense of this?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Why we have that-why this kind-why we are created in that way?

Student I: Yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. It is something which is difficult to answer [laughs, laughter]. But actually it is, you know-we are-the purpose of Buddhism is not to answer that kind of question, like Christianity. Who created, you know? Your question is something like, "Who is responsible for?" [Laughs, laughter.] What if? But no one is responsible for that. If you say someone should be responsible for that, you should be responsible for that because you change your mind little bit, you know. If you have little bit right understanding, you will be free from that kind of problem and you can and even enjoy the problem. So, actually, you are creating and you are responsible, but we are not talking about whose responsibility it is. But actually things is going in that way. That is nature of Buddhism; that is the nature of Buddha's teaching. He didn't, you know, say anything definitely, and he did not pick up any special cause.

It is impossible to answer when this earth or when this universe started, you know, when we are going, you know, and what is the limit of the universe. Is that possible? Not possible. This is important point also. If there is some limit, you know, or if we think there is some limit, it is not absolute anymore. Because we-there is no limit in universe, and things started [from] beginningless beginning and going to endless end. That is why, you know, we can believe in our destiny. If there is, you know, beginning and end, like Christian teaching, you can believe in God, but you cannot believe in our-each-each one of us. We can believe in our destiny. That is very important point.

And if Buddha have answer to that question, he is not Buddha anymore. He is not Buddha. Because he didn't-he was great because he didn't answer that kind of question. That we don't know anything about it is very important point. That we cannot answer for this is very important [laughs]. When you say "this is very important," it is not important anymore. You can compare, you know, to some other thing, and you can say which is important, then this is not absolutely important. You cannot depend on that kind of thing, which has some limit, which has some beginning and which has some end, because, you know, emptiness, which has no limit and no start-beginning, we can believe in it. Isn't that so?

This is very important. I am not fooling you. [Laughs, laughter.] [Sighs.]

Okay? If you really, you know, understand this, tear will come out. [Makes sound like crying.] You will really, you know, feel happy to be a Buddhist. Just now, we are-this is question and answer, so you don't have this kind of feeling. But if you struggle bad enough [laughs], you will, you know, feel how important point this is. Why-how you can struggle with this struggle is you-you are supported, you know, by something, something you don't know. But as we are human being, there must be that kind of a feeling, you know. You must live in such city or village or community. That is, I think, very important. So whatever community it may be, it is necessary to have community to-which have this kind of spiritual support.

That is why I respect Trungpa Rinpoche. That is a point, you know. He is supporting us. You may criticize him because he drinks like I drink water [laughs, laughter]. That is minor problem. He trust you completely. He knows if he is always supporting you, in its true sense, you will not criticize him, whatever he does. And he doesn't mind whatever you say [laughs]. It's not point, you know. This kind of spirit is necessary for-for human being, without clinging to some special, you know, religion or form of practice. [Sighs.]

[Laughs, laughter.] You have ten minutes more [laughs, laughter]. You have to sit ten minutes more, okay? Some more questions?

Student J: Yes. A change of pace: Why do you carry that wooden appendage?

Suzuki-roshi: This? Yeah. Uh-huh. When you find it difficult to understand me, I whack you! [Laughs, laughter.] Okay, I [probably making gesture; laughs, laughter]-it's much better not to have this, you know. I am very short-tempered [laughs, laughter], so I may rely on this too much, you know. When I cannot express myself-whack! [Laughs, laughter.] If I haven't this, I must try hard to make verbal communication. So it may help without this, but as I am pretty old, I must have-depend on this a little bit.

Student K: Does anyone ever hit you with it?

Suzuki-roshi: [In a whisper.] Don't ask me. [Laughter.] I [am] ashamed of myself [laughs, laughter]. Hai Student L: I know by the way I feel when I come to Zen Center that it's very important to be with people who are practicing zazen-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: -who are practicing kinhin and practicing eating silently.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student L: But I have to spend a lot of time away from Zen Center, and with people who listen to music [3-4 words unclear] who never think that there's anything else but small mind. And while I keep trying to remind myself that I'm a Buddhist, I feel very different from them-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student L: -and it causes me-causes me a lot of problems.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: It's difficult for me to be myself outside of the sangha, outside of the Buddhist community.

Suzuki-roshi: But then you mean that, you know, what you mean is if you are always in city, without knowing Zen Center or some religious group, you know, then you think you will feel good, your life will be good?

Student L: I-I-I don't-

Suzuki-roshi: I think-what I'm saying is if you don't know Zen Center, if you live in the city without knowing Zen Center or religious group, then do think you will be happy?

Student L: No, I [one unintelligible word-"really"?] like Zen Center. But there's a lot that isn't Zen Center. I can't spend all of my time here.

Suzuki-roshi: But that is why we are here and you come here. Even though you have difficulties, it is good to come here, and you shouldn't be so impatient. It takes time. We, we started Zen Center quite recently, not so long time ago, and it is quite natural for us to have various problems. Even though we have problem, the problem we have is very important problems for human being. That is why you come here. I don't think we are-I can help you, you know, I can help you so much. As much as I can, I shall be with you, that's all. And I am-I shall be very glad if you carry on this kind of work-that's all, you know. Don't think you can, because you come here you can solve-you will have very good, you know, everyday life. Whether you have a good everyday life or not is out of question. We should not be concerned about it too much, so much. But we should know what is right and what kind of life we must have. That is more important thing for us to know, you know. To-that much confidence we must have, even though we cannot help people so well.

Okay? I'm sorry I cannot help you, but-but I can help, you know, you to have big confidence in your way of life. And if you have confidence in your life, you will have, you know-the rest of difficulties you may have is not so big problem for you.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Jeffrey Schneider and Bill Redican (9/26/00).

[1] juji: receive or maintain. sanbo (also sambo): three treasures (buddha, dharma, sangha).

[2] ittai sanbo: one, absolute, and non-dual truth (ittai); the three treasures (sanbo) viewed as one.

[3] genzen sanbo: to become manifest, to realize manifestly (genzen); the three treasures (sanbo) as they actually exist(ed) in the world.

3 - Precepts II

Saturday, July 17, 1971

Precepts
San Francisco

[In my last lectures][1] ... I explain about our precepts. As you must have found out, "the precepts," we say, but it is nothing so unusual-it is just about the things as they are and about what we are. And that is precepts. You may wonder why then is it necessary [laughs] to accept precepts. But this is very important point. I want you to understand. It is very very common understanding which you can accept quite easily.

You know, what I say-what I said was there are three-the three kind of precepts. One precept is-first one is indivisible three precepts.[2] Even though we say "three," but that three is one. So it is not possible to-cannot be three. It is actually to repeat one precepts three times from various angle. That is the first one.

There's- In- Where things exist, there is some rules. And rules, we say, but it is nothing but way of-it is nothing but the function of great being which we cannot understand. It is something which is beyond our reach. But that something [is] always doing something, or has some function. So there is some rule in the way of-the function of the great being. But the function and the great being is one, not two, in Buddhism. But in Christianity, God is here, and it gives some rules to everything. That is more Christian understanding. But in Buddhist-according to Buddhism, it is not two. So this point is called "harmony." Harmony does not mean harmony between each being, but harmony between the function and the great being. Those are one.

The Buddhist are very realistic. Buddhism are very realistic. So we do not seek for who does this, when this earth started, who created those things. We don't think in that way. We accept things as it is. And if we cannot, we do not try to think about things just by my mind, but before we think, we accept things. So when you see or accept things as it is, the function and something, great being, is one. When you think, "Who did it?" [laughs] then it become two. But when you just see it as-as scientist see something, you know, observe something, then it cannot be two. Sometime it is great being, its function, and sometime great being is some big being which is-which has always function. You know, they are not two; that is one. This is-this understanding is actually understanding of everything and understanding of universe and understanding of ourselves.

And next-next one was manifested three treasures. Manifested three treasures are-three treasures was found out by-which was realized by Buddha.[3] What Buddha realized was about great being and about the function of the great being. And when Buddha found out the truth, he himself became Buddha. And he realized that he himself is also the function of great being and function-it-the great being itself. Buddha is great being. Buddha himself was great being, and his activity is activity of the great being.

So he became one with great being and one with the function of the great being, and when he talked about it, he had many disciples. And that was the Buddha's group, Buddha's disciples, which is called "sangha." That is manifested three treasures.

And later, we have instead of Buddha himself, we have Buddha image and we have Buddha scriptures, and we have many bodhisattvas and Buddha's disciples-descendant. And here we include various sages who is actually manifesting the truth itself, who is actually talking about the truth, maybe in some other way, not only this world, but some other world. That is another three treasures, which is protecting, which is-which maintains Buddha's teaching.[4] That is another three treasures.

But if you-and relationship between zazen and those three treasures is if you practice zazen actually, you are buddha. Or even though you don't practice zazen, you are buddha. But you, you, you feel or you experience buddha nature, and you-whatever you do after you have this experience, that is buddha's activity. So we ourselves, through practice of pure zazen, is three treasures-various kinds of three treasures: indivisible three treasures, and manifested three treasures, and maintaining three treasures. We ourselves. That is [laughs] what I told you.

It is quite, you know, it is too common, nothing interesting [laughs]. Why is it necessary, then, to accept the three treasures? There is some reason, a big reason. You say it is very common, but to know, you know, to know how important it is to do things very common and to be interested in something very usual and common [laughs].

I'm drinking water now, but it is not sweet. It is very plain: no taste at all. But why I drink it? Because something [is] wrong with me-my, you know, throat is not so good. So when I-or when I am very thirsty, to drink something common is very meaningful. So for-for-for us, you know, human being which is very egoistic [laughs], egoistic, [it is] necessary to have very common-to have very common liquor [liquid] like this. This is Buddhism. Before Buddha, actually, people interested in something unusual-unusual power or magic power or mystic being. And more and more they lost the ground they were standing on. As someone said, "Religion is opium." [Laughs.] It is very true. [Laughs, laughter.]

We Buddhists [are] more interested in zazen practice rather than LSD [laughs]. So as a Buddhist, it is very important to accept the three precepts and not to forget about how important it is- the three precepts which is very common. This is the point.

So we do not call you "Buddhist" if you do not accept precepts [laughs]. If you do not accept precepts- Even though you accept precepts, it doesn't make any difference. Although it doesn't make any difference, it is necessary to remain very common. To remain very common and usual, you accept precepts [laughs]. So that you-you are not involved in-involved in topsy-turvy idea, we say, you know, you should accept precepts. And you-if you are-if you decide not to be uncommon, not to be interested in something unusual. And we must study ourselves. Then that is Buddhist precepts.

And this is, for Buddhists, this is very important. Not only for Buddhists, but also for human being this is very important point. Important thing is not always interesting. Important, even though key is very small and usual, but without key you cannot live. Key is not usually-is not called; but key is very important. Without key, even though you have diamond [laughs], you cannot use diamond. But usually, you know, if you are not-when you are not mature, when you are young children, which is important, which do you like, key or diamond or something, you know, [like] candy? Which do you like? Children may take sweet candy rather than key.

Unless you-you are very sincere about your life, it is rather difficult maybe to be interested-to be interested in Buddhism, which is very common. That is why we have precepts. And this precepts-our precepts include the three treasures. But the three treasures [are] after all about yourself and about your practice-pure practice of zazen. So precepts and zazen practice is not different. It is all about ourselves.

So we say when we give precepts, we say, "Don't be involved in, don't be lost in other practice-other practice of other different, you know, practice of religion-religious practice." [Laughs.] Do you understand? But what we mean is very different. Don't practice; don't be involved in other religion, we say. Literally, if you understand it literally, Buddhism is not different from other religions which is very sectarian. Do you understand the difference? Don't be involved in some other practice. It is so important to be just ourselves, without being involved in something curious, something mystic, something strange. This is very important for us. To be ourselves, to be free from everything is the most important point. If we are strong enough, when you are strong enough not to lose yourself, then you can practice various way, practice. But before-there is something for you to do before you do many things. Without foundation, without strong, you know, without, without establishing your freedom, or if there is some danger in you, danger of being lost in you, then we want you to accept precepts and practice more.

The young people right now are interested in many religion from East. But, you know, I-I feel if you come here, what I advise you is stay here. Why we-I say so is most of you are interested in some new, interesting, mysterious, or powerful religion. And you are, you know, repeating same mistake over and over. That was how we, you know, how human being [became] lost in our curiosity. We have been making wrong effort! You are heading to wrong direction. Difference may be this way or that way, not much.

So that is why I tell you "stay here." I don't want to be, you know, sectarian, and I appreciate various sages' or various people's effort to save, to improve our society. There are many good teachers, but actually there-there are not so many good students [laughs, laughter]. If I say some teacher is very good, maybe many of you will go to that teacher [laughs, laughter]. You know, the danger or, you know, it is not so wise to go to some teacher, even though he is good, you know, if you are not so good. If your attitude to study teaching is not good, it doesn't work. So until you have right attitude of receiving teaching or understanding teaching, I want you to stay here, until you become a good student. So study is not teaching, but practice.

When Dogen-zenji said we are not interested in teaching, we do not say, "This teaching is better than the other teaching," or deep or superficial. We don't say. But we [are] concerned about our practice [laughs]. It is very true. Don't you think so? Very true. There are many good teachers, but not so many good students.

How to be a good student is how to be he him- [partial word]-he himself, and ready to understand the true teaching. That is why we accept precepts-we receive precepts from Buddha. Buddha says in Lotus Sutra, people, you know, talk about something which is very convenient for them always [laughs]. But if-if I say Buddha said in Lotus Sutra "you should not be interested in mixing medicine, seeing stars, by practice of strange power, you should not attract people" [laughs]. Buddha said so. I think you must have underst- [partial word]-you will understand what he meant. Before you are interested in something unusual, you should be usual first, and you should have strong confidence in yourself. And you should always try to be usual.

That is the main point of human practice, because we are always interested in something which is not true and we are not interested in something true. That is very [laughs], you know, accurate description of human nature. If Life magazine or San Francisco Examiner always, you know, tell you-write about something true, no one will buy Life magazine [laughs, laughter]. You know, there is something wrong. It is not true, but it is interesting [laughs, laughter]. So you buy it. That is human nature, and that is how to be successful in our life, in our society [laughs].

To know human nature is good, but we should not abuse the understanding of human nature. So if you, if you know this point, and if you are strong courage or confidence, then you can help people wherever you are, because wherever you go there is lot of mistake and lot of things you should correct. Maybe you need a lot of stick, wherever you go. Or you must talk [to] them: "What are you doing?!" [Laughs, laughter.] If you only have calm, open mind, you will see what we are doing. When you are interested in some special, interesting thing, and when you are lost in it, you cannot see anything. That is why we practice zazen, and that is why we receive precepts-we have to receive precepts from Buddha. After all, precepts is all about ourselves.

I wanted to tell you next-the next three-about next three precepts, but [laughs] before I started, I wanted to make it sure about your, you know, to make sure about your understanding so far I talked about. [Sighs.] Okay? If you have some question, please ask me.

Student A: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student A: [Few unintelligible words said as an aside.] Can we-can we rely on anything?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student A: Can we rely on anything?

Suzuki-roshi: On anything?

Student A: Mm-hmm.

Suzuki-roshi: As Buddha said, why don't you rely on yourself? There is nothing, you know, you can rely on.

Student A: Can you rely on- You can rely on yourself?

Suzuki-roshi: You can- The only thing you can rely on is you yourself. If you try hard to rely on yourself, you will, you know, rely on big self. When you rely on someone else, it means that you are relying on small self. The "someone" is projected small self, you know. When you say "he's bad," you are bad actually [laughing]. If you think more about it, you know, it is very-most of the-not always, but most of time it is you which is bad, not him. So to rely on, in other word, to rely on zazen, rely on nothing! [Laughs.]

Student A: When you feel, you know, when you feel he is bad, should you ever say anything, or should you always not say anything until you feel everything is okay?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah [laughter]. I think so.

Student A: When should you be honest? [Question unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Honest! Yeah. People say maybe I'm dishonest because I don't say so much [laughs], but it is not so. [Laughter.] I try-I'm trying to be honest, so I can not say so easily. I must see myself, you know, first. Uh-oh. [Laughs.]

Student A: Better not say? [Question unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: That's- Yeah, that is- We say if someone ask you, you should answer. If someone don't ask you, you know, don't say. It makes sense, because someone ask you-when someone ask some question, then I have something to talk about. But if no one ask me any question, I have nothing to talk about, because I should accept things as it is, as they are. So it is nothing-it is much more than to talk about. So may be better not to say anything.

This kind of practice is very important-to be silent. To be silent means to be open and calm. That is how to be silent. Like zazen. To be silent does not mean to do this. [Sounds as though he is covering his mouth. Laughs.] To open our mind, and to open our big mind, and to see things as much as we can-that is how to be silent-how to have-how you have-you obtain yourself-true self. Hai.

Student B: Roshi, without the experience, what does it mean to accept precepts or have confidence in usual activity?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Without experience-without experience, you know, without special experience, but usually we have many difficulties in our everyday life. And we have many problems. And how we-why do we have this kind of problem is something you should think [about]. And that kind experience-usual experience of difficulties will help you to have this kind-to accept this kind of precepts.

Student B: Paying attention to our usual difficulties is included in what you mean by accepting precepts?

Suzuki-roshi: Pay- [partial word: "Paying"?]-no.

Student B: Is the word "accept"? I don't-I mean, you accept the precepts on one basis. I would have to accept it on another. And for me, confidence comes from experience-some kind of understanding or something. So without it, I'd have to accept ....

[Sentence not finished. Tape turned over. Original tape case stated that a "student question" was asked as the tape was turned over.]

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yes, that- If a teacher is very good, he will help.

Student B: Apart from a teacher?

Suzuki-roshi: Apart from teacher? Apart from teacher?

Student B: Apart from [?] practice of truth. Accepting the precepts-truth or-Suzuki-roshi: "Truth," you-we say; but truth usually, maybe, usually is one-way, you know, street. "Go! Anyway, go this ways"-that is truth, usually. But the truth-when we say "truth," truth can be, you know, various truths. So if you try to follow, you know, some direction only, or if you always depend on the, you know, sign, you will not find out the-your own way to go. So the best thing is to have eyes to read the sign.

I have this kind of experience when I was in Manchuria at the end of the war. The sign said, "We will not sell ticket. And there is no boat to Japan" [laughs]. That was sign. When I read it, there is ticket, we can buy a ticket [laughs], and there is a boat. [Laughs, laughter.] I understand in that way. [Laughs, laughter.] So I-because I didn't depend on, you know, railway transportation only, or some line or some company only, there is boat. I am quite sure about it. But the boat which does not belong to special line or ... [2 words unclear], or some special line. So whatever it is, it will give you some information. I rather rely on the carpenters' information who is working in harbor. "Is it dangerous to go to Japan right now? And how many-how many ships were, you know, damaged, and how long does it take until it get repaired?" They know much better than officers in station-railway station.

So whatever it is, you know, it will give you good information. But if you depend on something, some special thing only, and depend upon something which usual people may depend on, it means that as long as you, you know, you are not strong enough to go by yourself, you cannot find out your way.

So first of all, to know yourself and to be strong enough to live without any sign, without any information, that is the most important point. Right now, what your question is, you know, about which way you go, but that doesn't help so much.

Student B: When- When I start shutting out the interesting things and the curious things, when I stop reading, and when I stop going to movies, and stop listening to music, I get very restless. If I had a strong desire to, to say, read an interesting book about Buddhism, should I go ahead and read, or should I sit zazen instead?

Suzuki-roshi: You can, if it is, you know, about Buddhism. [Laughs, laughter.] But, you know, some books are very, you know, encouraging-encouraging you to wrong direction, maybe. I think so. But not all the Buddhist book. But if you, you know, know the foundation of Buddhism, you-you-you will have eyes to choose book you read.

Student B: I can get very interested about a book on Buddhism.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: I can become very interested and fascinated about a book on Buddhism.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. [Laughs, laughter.] I don't- [laughs] That is not so good. [Laughs, laughter.] That is why we say you need teacher and you have to practice zazen, even though zazen will not help you [laughs], and your teacher will not help you, you know, so much. But he knows what you should do and what you shouldn't. So that will be the way for you right now. Or you can read any book you want to until you-you experience, you know, something. And you will know eventually what will help you and what will not. If you do not-if you-if you come here once in a while [laughs] to listen to this kind of lecture, I think it will help. I think I am helping you a lot [laughs]. Some other question? Hai.

Student C: Until you have eyes that can see, how will you find out what to do?

Suzuki-roshi: I say-if I say "eyes to see" it looks like, you know, you must have some special eyes. But it is not so.

Student C: Until you can see what to do, how do you know what to do?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Actually, that is not big problem. [Laughter.] It looks like big problem if you-before you, you know, come to the point to choose which way to go. If you go there, there is your way. But before you arrive at that point, that is problem. Or because you are lazy [laughs] and thinking about it, you know, and you are trying to find out some good way to go, you have that kind of problem. I- Yeah. If you actually come to the point to make some choice, it is not so difficult. You can depend on yourself pretty well.

You are raised in, you know, the idea of good or bad, which, you know, by some-some map, you know, to see. Here is your map for your life, so if you follow this map you may be okay. But that is not our way.

Student C: Several weeks ago in your lecture in the evening, you spoke about how the youth of today is not strong.[5] How does one know what to do?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That is my problem too. I don't know what to do with you [laughs]. My stick is not long enough [laughs, laughter]. It is not so difficult thing, actually. If you-if we are with you, it is not so difficult. But if you ask me what to do before you give me some difficulty you have, it is almost impossible. Or we usually do not give any answer. It is impossible. We do not say, "This is bad and this is good," you know. Good or bad is-actually there is nothing good or nothing bad. The situation makes something good or bad. That's all. So we do not say "good" or "bad" in that way. Instead, we-our training is for to see or to have enough power or special power to be ourselves. That is our training-our way. So I cannot tell you how to live as a Christian minister will tell you. That is not our way, you know. Excuse me, but [laughs], do you-did you understand? Actually, it is not so difficult. Most of the people does something knowing that is wrong, yeah. But it is not difficult for him to know which is right and which is wrong under that circumstances.

Student D: Why does a good teacher have to have so many bad students?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student D: Why does a good teacher have to have so many bad students?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Good. Maybe he is so bad [laughs], so he must have bad students. It is so-there is actually-what I want to say is there is no special good teacher or bad teacher. The teacher who is always with you is best teacher. We have no-that-no such idea of good teacher or bad teacher or sage who knows everything [laughs], who tell you exactly what you should do next day or next year. You know, we-we have no, you know-I don't think we-we have good teacher in-in that way. Maybe for-for some time your practice will be [laughs] to be just yourself without being interested in something special. Without relying on me you should, you know, try hard to sit. Okay? We can sit with you. So that is only way. And we need some encouragement. That is someth-[partial word]-that is a kind of thing which I want to tell you about in next two-three lectures.

What is good and what is bad is big problem. For some religion it is not problem, because it is told already by someone, you know, some teacher tell about things which is good and which is bad. So if you follow it that is a way, and your way has been to follow some special sage's words. That is why you became weaker and weaker. That is why I am telling you to be strong in that way.

Okay. Thank you.

-----

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Jeffrey Schneider and Bill Redican (9/26/00).

[1] The opening words were not recorded on tape. The phrase in brackets was inserted by the transcriber. Suzuki-roshi was probably referring to lectures SR-71-07-02 and SR-71-07-06.

[2] ittai sanbo: one, absolute and non-dual truth (ittai); the three treasures (sanbo) viewed as one.

[3] genzen sanbo: to become manifest, to realize manifestly (genzen); the three treasures (sanbo) as they actually exist(ed) in the world.

[4] juji sanbo [?].

[5] Possibly SR-71-06-22.

4 - Non-Mystical Understanding

Tuesday, July 20, 1971

Non-Mystical Understanding
Tassajara

I wanted to see you earlier, but I was too busy so I couldn't come.

Can you hear me? Can you hear me?

Student: Yes.

Oh. Okay.

Anyway, it is very good to see you and Tassajara, which has improved a lot since I left here. Tonight my-I didn't have any idea of giving talk, but I-as, you know, we have many guests and some of you may leave tomorrow, so I decided to talk a little bit-maybe I said ten minutes [laughs]. But it is rather difficult to say something in ten minutes, so I don't know how many minutes my lecture last.

What I want to talk about tonight is something-some idea or some understanding of Buddhist which is not-may not be unfamiliar to you.

We observe things in two ways. We understand things has two-two side. One is phenomenal side; the other is, maybe, more ontological side. Something-some-most of us, you know, understand things from the light of difference, like big or small, black or-black and white, material or spiritual.

Usually, maybe, spiritual- If we say "spiritual," usually it is something which is not material. But, according to Buddhism, even though you say "spiritual" that is, you know, not much different from-different of physical or materialistic side. "Spiritual" or "materialistic" we say, but those are, according to Buddhism, not much different. It belongs to the understanding of phenomenal side of the reality-spiritual too, spiritual understanding too include phenomenal understanding.

The other side is, [as] I said, you know, tentatively ontological side-a noumenal side which we cannot see, you know. Before you [existed], something exist in dharma: big or small, black or white, heavy or light, spiritual or material. Then something, you know-before something looks like-looks like, something looks like spiritual and material. Things looks like spiritual sometime material, looks like, but there is-there is some, you know, something before it can be spiritual or material. Let's think [about] this point more: spiritual and material.

When you think something material is quite different from something which is spiritual, that is not Buddhist understanding. We understand spiritual and material is also, you know, it belongs to one side, you know. There is partition here [laughs], and spiritual and material also belong to this side. The other side is, you know-it doesn't belong to the other side.

So we say spiritual and spiritual things, spiritual being and materialistic being is one, not different. It belongs to this side. [Sighs.] Let us-let's think [about] this very carefully. If you think spiritual being is something different from material, then your life will be split in two [laughs]. One side of you want to be very spiritual [laughs]. The other side of you want to be material or physical or emotional. The other side of you may want to be more calm and good. So there is some separation. That is why you have-you feel that kind of separation. Is-your understanding is not clear enough.

For an instance, while you are alive, you know, you think you-as long as you have body, you are physical being and after, only after you die, you will be a spiritual being, you know. That kind of understanding is very usual understanding. You may understand in that way. That is why you have problem after this, you know. Or, even though you are still alive, if you lose your friend, then you feel very lonely because you think, you know, as-so long as your friend [is] alive, he is with you, which is material or physical. But after your friend die, he changed into spiritual being, leaving physical body behind. People may call it "soul" or "spirit," but that is not our understanding. That is still the understanding you have in your mind-understanding of your mind or brain [laughs] in term of, you know, spiritual or material, because no right or wrong. Something, you know, something understandable and you cannot-you don't know the other side of something which you don't understand, which is not possible to understand. We do not-even though we do not understand what it is, but, you know, it is, you know, you cannot deny things which is not understanding by your small mind. And you will know that to understand things in term of big or small, black or white, man or woman, you know, is to put limitation to actual being. Actually. I am not just physical. I am spiritual too. But even though I say I am spiritual and physical that is also I put myself in limitation of spiritual and physical. But actual "me" is something more than spiritual and more than material.

So as long as you are trying to understand what is actual reality, what is actual "me," you don't-it is not possible to understand who you are. That is our way of understanding. If your- If your understanding can reach this point, there is something, you know, more than spiritual and more than material, more than right or wrong, more than man or woman, and that is reality, and that is actually each one of you. Then you will have renunciation from good or bad, life or death. You will be free from the idea of good or bad, life or death.

Even though you try very hard to be very spiritual, still you exist this side, ignoring the other side of yourself. That is why you suffer. If you really want to be-want to attain enlightenment and realize what is real you, you know, then you have to try to go beyond the idea of good or bad, life or death.

And how we can go beyond the idea of life or death, physical or spiritual, is zazen practice [?]. So in our practice we should not-our practice should not be involved in "good practice" or "bad practice." You should be just you, and you shouldn't think anything. If something come, let it come. But don't, you know, think about it in term of good or bad. Let it come and let it go away [laughs]. Don't say "this is good" or "this is bad." Or don't think "it is not good to think"-to have something in your mind while you are practicing zazen.

That is actually, you know, our zazen practice: to go beyond various ideas and to be just yourself. And that is possible. If you think about yourself or if you think about someone, you or he is not spiritual or physical. You cannot say he is good or he is bad. Even though he looks like [he is] doing something wrong, it looks like so to you or to the people it looks like so. But who say so? People say so, you say so [laughs]. But he is not good or bad.

This, you know, standard of society-this society-our people have some kind of moral standard. Tentatively we have some moral code and say "this is good" and "this is bad." But it may change. If the moral code or standard of judging which is good and which is bad, then someone which was bad may be-may be good, and which-someone who is bad can be good tomorrow [laughs] or in one or two years. It is as you must have experienced. So our world is changing rapidly.

When I was young there were many moral codes, many idea, you know, [of how] we are involved in good and bad, idea of good and bad: "You shouldn't do this or do that." But more and more we have less moral code. As Dogen-zenji said, "There is-actually there is no good or no bad. There is no good and no bad. No good or no bad. No good; or, good is up to the time. Time makes-makes things good or bad; but things itself is-things-things themselves is not good or bad," he said.

It is actually how things go, that's all. And-by some rule, or there is some- It is just matter of cause and effect, you know. Things, you know, goes. Things exist now will result [in] some effect, and that effect will cause another effect. Things going in that way, that's all. Actually there is no good or bad. What is going that way is the point. What is going in that way? Something which is not good or which is not bad is going [laughs]. That is the reality. Things going in that way. Anyway, things is developing itself. By itself it is going. That's all.

So if we notice that who is developing, what is going in that way, something which is not good or bad is going in that way. And we-we say this is good or bad, that's all. We do not realize this point, and we say this is good or this is bad. I'm not talking about something, you know, invisible. I am talking about something actually we are-we have with us always. [Laughs.] Do you understand? But the difference between your understanding and my understanding is you understand things in term of good or bad. You think there is a good person and bad person, but we don't-I don't understand in that way. Things [are] just going in that way. Anyway, things are going in that way, and you call it "good" and "bad," that's all.

If we realize this point, we have already realization [?]. So when you sit in zazen, you are you. You cannot say, you know, "My practice is good." Or you cannot say, "I am bad person." Nor you can say, "You are-I am good person. My practice is perfect." [Laughs.] You cannot say so.

Anyway you are perfect [laughs] from the beginning. It is not necessary for you to say you are perfect. You are perfect, even though you don't realize you are perfect. That is why we say we are all buddhas and we have buddha-nature. And buddha nature [is] developing itself constantly. We understand things in that way. We say, "I am here, and you are there." It is okay, you know, to say so, but actually, you know, without me you don't exist. Without you I don't exist. [Laughs.] It is very true. Since I am here, you are there. Since you are there, I am here. [Laughs.] You may say even though I don't come to, I don't come to, you know, Tassajara you exist here and waiting for me. That is [laughs], you know, maybe so. Maybe so, but that is not perfect. I am at-at-I have been at 300 Page, and you-with everything. I couldn't say goodbye to-to the building which is related to other things: freeway [laughs], and trees, and air, and everything, stars and the moon, the sun. If I was related to the sun and moon as you are related to the sun and moon, how is it possible to say I am there and you are here when we are always related? But just your mind says you are here and I am there, that's all.

So originally we are one with everything. That is very true. And if someone die, you may say he is no more. But is it possible for something to vanish completely? That is not possible. Is it possible for something to appear [laughing] all of a sudden from nothing? Because there were something, you know, it appears in that way. Something which is here cannot vanish completely. It can change its form. That's all.

So we are always one. It is just your superficial feeling to feel you are lonely. So if you are very sincere, and if you really, you know, give your-give up your small mind, then there is no fear and no emotional problem. Your mind is always calm, and your eyes is always open, and you can hear the birds as they sing. You can see the flower as it opens. And then nothing to worry, actually. And if there is, some-something to worry [about], it is a kind of, you know, treatment [laughs]-special treatment for you, as if you see, as if you read some interesting novel; as if some writer, you know, write [2-3 words unclear] about human life. It is interesting maybe, and to read it is very interesting. But it is not something to be afraid of or to be-to feel lonely. So we can enjoy our life fully when we understand things in that way. That is Buddha's-Buddhist way. [Sentence finished. Tape turned.]

[Note.-Side B of the original and master tapes was blank. But the early transcript continued with the rest of the lecture. The following was superficially edited but could not be checked against the tape.]

When I was flying back from the east the other day, I saw beautiful sunset. Sunset lasts pretty long time if you fly from the east. If you leave, for an instance, New York or Boston six o'clock, you will arrive at here nine o'clock, up in the air more than three-you know-13 or 15,000 or more-sometime 30,000 feet high. You know, when people think it is dark and there is no more sun. But still, if you are flying high up in the air, you have still sunset and you can see beautiful clouds. It is wonderful to see. But someone may feel very lonely, you know. But if you think you are-whenever you are, you are one with cloud and one with the sun and one with the stars you see, even though you jump out from the airplane, you don't go anywhere else. You are still with everything. That is very true. More than I say-more true than I say, or more true than you hear.

I am talking about something which is very strange or very mystical. You are mystic and I am not mystic. Your understanding is strange, but my understanding is not strange. Don't you think so? But it is you who feel in that way, just your superficial feeling feel in that way. It means that you are not truthful enough to the truth. Your feeling was not deep enough to feel something true. As Dogen said, people like which is not true-people feel which is not true, but they do not feel something true. [Laughs.] They like something which is not right. And they do not like which is true. That is very-what he said is very true. Don't you think so?

We must be ashamed of-to feel something very superficial. If you [are] ashamed of yourself you should practice hard. You should be sincere enough to be yourself. That is our practice and that is our effort-our direction of effort. We are-our practice heading to that way. But usually your practice is heading to wrong way. Again, Dogen said you shouldn't try to go south heading to the North Pole, heading to the dipper. You see-after lecture when you are going to your cabin you will see dipper. Heading to dipper it is impossible to go south. But people are heading to-trying to go south heading to north. And he says also, if you want to attain renunciation from birth and death, you shouldn't try to be out of birth and death-problem of birth and death. And the birth and death is our equipment for our life. Without birth and death we cannot survive. It is our pleasure to have birth and death. That is how I-we understand truth.

So don't be-in short-don't be involved in making too much home-made cookies [laughs] in term of big and small, good or bad. You should make as much, just as much as you need. Without cookies, without food you cannot survive, so it is good to make home-made cookies, but don't make too much. It is good to have problem, and without problem we cannot survive. So it is good. We must have problem. But not too much. You don't need to create problems for yourself when you have enough problems. You have just enough problems to survive. Any more than you need, you have just enough problem; the problem you have us just enough for you. That is so-called-it "soft-minded practice-soft-minded practice." Because your mind is too ... [Sentence not finished. Transcript says tape turned over here, but that is not correct. Maybe just a gap in the tape.]

After all, you can create you and big problem and for your children and for your wife. If some husband enjoy making home-made cookie, your wife will be upset [laughing]. Don't make so much. But that is not usually what we are doing. So if you really understand your life, it is not necessary to practice zazen even. It is not necessary for me to come or stay in America. If you just make home-made cookie just enough for you. It is okay for me to come back-back to Japan and to eat Japanese cookies. As you make too much cookies I have to eat [laughing]. I have to help you. It is not always so good job to eat home-made cookies. Actually that is what we are doing. If we realize this point and enjoy just enough home-made cookies, that is Buddhist way. And just-that is how to enjoy life and that is why we practice zazen.

We do not practice zazen to attain special enlightenment. Just to be ourselves and just to be free from useless effort or tendency of human nature we practice zazen.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Verbatim transcript checked against tape by Jeffrey Schneider (4/99) and Bill Redican (8/23/99).

5 - Question and Answer

Wednesday, July 21, 1971

Question and Answer
Tassajara

We discussed already last night[1] about what is something which we can experience or which we can understand, and what is something which we cannot understand. I was trying to explain, you know, the difference [between] something which you can understand and something which you cannot understand, and how you, you know, have an approach to something which you cannot understand is by practice.

But it is necessary for us at the same time to have understanding of Buddhism. It is necessary to read, and it is necessary to listen to lecture, and it is necessary to think about what is Buddhism. That is also important. And most important thing will be to have actual, you know, difficulties in our human life. That is very important.

But as I told you, the problem-you have enough problem already [laughs, laughter]. So don't make home-made problems-cookies. That was what I told you last night. We are practicing zazen, so it is a great help. And those things-those points are very difficult and very important for our perfect understanding of Buddhism. If you mix up-mixed up those points, you will never understand what I am saying.

Tonight, again, I want to discuss this point a little bit more. And this side [laughs]-this side is the world of experience, world of study, and world of human problems. And the other side is-this side is [laughs] world of Buddhist practice to have approach to the reality, and let's discuss more about those kind-those points.

But to make your understanding clear before I start next talk, I want you to give me some question. The people who are sitting this side [laughs] give me some question about our practice. And people who are sitting this side, give me some actual problem you have. Do you give me some question? And if you-by mistake-if you give me [laughs] wrong question, you have to come to this side. [Laughs, laughter.] Okay? All right.

Student A: Buddha spent six years sitting under the Bodhi tree. Bodhidharma[2] spent nine years in front of the wall. Huineng[3] spent fifteen. This is-is-is that a necessary part of the process to spend some period of tremendously concentrated zazen for a very deep understanding?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. [Laughs.] You can stay this side. [Laughter.] Her question is-she belongs to this part, and she is practicing zazen to have a good approach to the reality. And is it necessary for all the students who are sitting this side to sit nine years or fifteen years? Is that necessary? Buddha sit for six year. Bodhidharma sit for nine year. Is that necessary? Why is it necessary? That is her question. That is a very good question. Do you have some more question? [Laughter.] I-I will answer [laughs]. I want to save her point, that's all. I don't want to say same thing twice, so that is why I am asking [for] another question. Do you have some question? No? [Laughs.] Okay.

This-this side is, strictly speaking, people who are sitting even though you have buddha-nature. Buddha-nature you have. It is-this side-people who are sitting this side also have buddha-nature, but they think it is possible to, you know, it is-there is-this people who are sitting this side thinks if you read and if you listen to my lecture, you will understand what is Buddhism, you know. And you study Buddhism because you have various problem. So if-you think if you ask me some question, I can help your problem even though you do not actual[ly] approach to reality, it is possible.

Or the people who have-who have no time to practice zazen. That is most people is like that. Even though people who are sitting here thinks if you ask me some question, I will give you some good answer. It is-maybe I can help you [laughs], but if you do not have good practice and good approach to the reality, you cannot attain enlightenment even though you have buddha-nature.

This-the-right now the question is why then is it necessary for you who are sitting this side necessary to practice zazen. And it-this question is for-could be good question for the people who are sitting this side too. Even though we have buddha-nature and what does it mean to have buddha-nature is-? Even though you don't know what is buddha-nature, actually you have it. Actually you have it. But if you do not realize that you have it, it doesn't make any sense. Maybe that is why the people this side is practicing zazen. But if you do not-even though you are practicing zazen, if you think, "If I practice zazen, I will have some special experience, then that is enlightenment and that is purpose of zazen." If you think in that way, you have to come this side [laughs], because you-he has same idea, you know. Even though you-I have-"If I practice zazen and attain enlightenment that will help you."

But enlightenment is not something like that. Enlightenment is something whether you realize it you have it. Whether you realize it or not you have it. But it is necessary for you to realize it, or else you don't know what you are doing. That's all. If you really know the meaning of zazen, that is enlightenment. When you know the meaning of zazen, you will know the meaning of our human life. That is enlightenment.

Enlightenment-even though you attain enlightenment, you have same trouble [laughs]. You cannot flee from your difficulties. The difficulty you have-if you know the meaning of the difficulty for you, the difficulty will help you. If you do not know the meaning of difficulty, it doesn't help. Same thing with zazen. If you do not know the meaning of everyday practice, even though you do not attain enlightenment, that zazen will not help you.

Once [a] disciple[4] of Baso[5] -Baso-when he was asked, "When-when wind is all over, air is all over, why do you use fan?" [Laughs.] You know, "When wind is all over, air is all over, then why do you use your fan?" American people do not use fan, but Japanese-Japanese does, especially when it is so warm. "Why do you use fan?" he was asked by someone.

And what he said-the answer was: "You know that wind is everywhere, but you don't know what is the function of the wind." It is, you know-wind means buddha-nature. Buddha-nature is everywhere. We have-all of us has buddha-nature. But if so, why is it necessary to use fan? Why is it necessary to practice zazen? That was the question. The answer was-you know-you looks like know that everyone has buddha-nature, but you don't know that it is necessary to practice zazen or to know-to realize the meaning of practice and meaning of enlightenment. So it means that even though you-you think you know everyone has buddha-nature, but actually you don't know what is buddha-nature even. That was his answer.

And disciple asked again: "Then what is actual practice?" he asked. And he just used his fan like this [laughs]. That was answer. "Oh, it is very hot." [Laughs.] He used the fan. That was the answer. Do you understand? That was answer. Just to, you know-without any idea that we have buddha-nature, why do we practice zazen? And just-when you just sit, then there is actually buddha-nature. Buddha-nature is there, if you really understand what is zazen. That was answer.

So until [laughs] you realize-you feel it is necessary for you to sit, and I cannot help sitting everyday. If you don't sit you feel funny. If you feel I have to sit anyway-until you feel in that way, you should continue and it may take-for Buddha-it took for Buddha six years. And after Bodhidharma attained enlightenment, he sat nine years. Buddha who attained enlightenment-who was supposed to have enlightenment when he was born-Buddha, who came to this world after attaining enlightenment, needed nine [six] years practice. We should know-we should st- [partial word: "study"?]-know this point. Those who attained enlightenment, it is necessary to continue our practice. Those who do not know what is our practice also necessary to sit. For someone it may take very long time, but for someone it may not take so long time. But that is not problem, you know. Whether it takes one year or six year is not problem. Anyway, we have to continue our practice even though we have buddha-nature.

When we say, "everyone has buddha-nature," that is so-called-it "granting way" or "giving way." And when we say: "You have-you do not have-you do not know what is Zen, what is buddha-nature, you do not know anything about Buddhism." It is convenient-best world. It is-

One is positive way and one is negative way. Positive way is to admit you to have buddha-nature. The negative way is you do not have buddha-nature. You are deluded person. Because of your topsy-turvy [laughs] idea, you do not have buddha-nature. That is negative way of expressing the truth.

But negative way or positive way is based on the same truth-that everyone has buddha-nature. And real Buddhism doesn't stick to negative way or positive way. We are free from negative way and positive way. Then we-I must take off this partition [of the zendo], you know. This people who are sitting this side is-is treated by my negative way. You do not-you don't know what is Buddhism. You looks like [you] know what is Buddhism. You have a lot of knowledge about Buddhism. But you do not practice zazen, so you don't have buddha-nature in its strict sense. That is negative way. Even though I say so, I know that you have buddha-nature. And because you stick to some idea, you-you feel as if you have no buddha-nature and you have problem. That is negative way and taking negative way to you.

The positive way is encouraging way, you know, to encourage people, or any way if you sit you will attain enlightenment. That is positive way. But even though you have buddha-nature, I say you should sit fifteen years, nine years, or six years. People who are sitting this side [of the zendo], what I will say-your reading or discussion about Buddhism will not actually help you. You must sit, and you must have enlightenment. You should be enlightened. You should know the real meaning of practice. Because you don't know what is the meaning of difficulties. And practice-difficulty itself is practice. So that is why you suffer. That is what I will say to the students who are sitting [on] this side [of the zendo]. Anyway it means that you have to sit [laughs]. Then you will understand the meaning of difficulties and meaning of life and meaning of-real meaning of what you have studied by reading. That is our answer for that kind of question.

So Dogen says Buddhism is free from-true Buddhism is not just negative way or positive way. True Buddhism is free from-should be free from negative and positive way.

So flowers-"Even though you want flower to last longer, flower will fall. And even though you do not care for weeds, weeds will grow," [laughs] he says. The problem we have is same. So after attaining enlightenment-after sitting for a long, long time, you cannot be different from each one of us. A is A, B is B, a man is a man and a woman is a woman. It doesn't change. Same thing, same old [laughs] person, even though you attain enlightenment. And if you are satisfied with the same old person, that is enlightenment. And when you feel in that way, you will feel how important it is to practice zazen. That is, maybe, the answer for your question. Do you have some other question?

Student B: [Question is barely audible.] If I want to learn Buddhism and I live in a world that is very busy and stressed, and it doesn't permit me to have like a Buddhist nature-a true Buddhist nature, yet I would like to apply some of the principles of serenity and orderliness-harmony and orderliness to my living, yet I still really don't have that much time everyday to sit zazen in the middle of the street. I wonder if there is any way in the process of living [?] if you could meditate while you're on your way some place without turning your eyes from the car? [Laughter.] No, I am curious. I mean, meditation can be done while in action, if you are in a place where you could be serene [sitting?]-maybe waiting for the doctor? Is that at all-[laughter]. Well seriously!

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, good-good question. Yeah, very serious question. I am thinking about it a lot, you know. So-for us it-it is good question, you know. If we sit-if we think we are good students because we are sitting right here, and people are not-are not so good, you know, because they are involved in money-making [laughs] busy life, if you think in that way that is big mistake. I don't know which is-which is good student, you know.

Even though you are in city life, having a lot of problem, involved in-really involved in busy life, if you-the point-if the point you work on is not to seek for some teaching from us, you know, from Buddhism, but if you forget the idea [of] what is good and what is bad. Usually we stick to some idea only, or we are going [down a] one-way road [laughs]. We don't know the ways. There is another one-way road from different direction. Those who live in one street, they think this is the way car goes [laughs]. They are doing same thing over and over, sticking to one-way road. That is the problem.

So, if you free your mind from that kind of right or wrong, and think about what you are doing more, then you have to find out-you have to try to know what you are doing and you will be-you will feel you are-you are lost, you know. Why you feel you are doing something good? I think because you think you are doing something good, you are doing same thing over and over with same idea. But if you think about your life more, you will realize that that is not actually [what] your way should be. That is necessary. If you realize that point, you will find out time to sit every day for 20 minutes or 30 minutes to think-to forget, you know, all about your old style of life. That is very [laughs] important. Even for Buddhist that is important. We Buddhists have some certain way-our rituals, you know. If we think-if we know that it is okay, you know, then he is walking-I am walking one-way street always.

If we [get] caught by our way of life too much, and if you think-if we think as long as we are observing this way it is-I am good Buddhist [laughs], that is big mistake. So there is-[not?] any concrete way for anyone. What we should do is-moment after moment, we must have very calm, clear mind to know what we are doing. Then, naturally you will know how important it is to have very calm mind. For an instance, you may have [laughs] young boys and girls, maybe, and if you think you-what you think is always right, it doesn't work. You should think with them. You should listen to them sometime with very calm-calmness of your mind. Then, if you listen to them, they will, you know, listen to you. That is actual practice we must have. There is no absolute way for anyone.

So wherever you go, if you come to [laughs] Tassajara, you should observe our way. If you go home, you-if I go to visit your home, I must observe your way of life, you know. That is what we should do. How is it possible to do so is to have calm-to have calmness of mind, and emotionally we should be always calm. That is the main point of practice. So even though-because we are busy, you have to sit [laughs]. That-it is very helpful. Some more question? Hai.

Student C: How is our life to be lived in the face of nothing? Do you seek guideposts or absolute authorities-authorities such as a Christian would think of their [?] Bible, and when you realize nothing is the ultimate reality, and you wished you were living [?] within that nothingness, how do you do it? How do you live with no guideposts?

Suzuki-roshi: That is very good question. And that is a problem. It is difficult, you know, to explain, and it is difficult to understand. But anyway, I think it is good question [laughter] and I want to spend maybe rest of time for that.

Until what time?

Student: Quarter to ten?

Suzuki-roshi: Quarter to ten? Okay. There is, you know, as I told-as we discussed, there is no good or bad in things itself. Good or bad is something which we create. That is already understood. Then, you know, why is it necessary [laughs], you know, why is it possible-that your question is-why is it possible to know which way we should take when there is two ways or more than two ways. Is that something like that-your question?

Student C: Something like that, although it is not a choice-an alternative. I think the alternatives are infinite-as alternatives [?] as nothingness is endless. Yet somehow we all must live day to day, and we all have to find a life style. But unless we make an appeal to discover it [?]-to say that, "Well, I choose my way of life because this is what this other man in this book says." But there comes a time, I think, in some lives that you realize that there is no real authority except yourself, and that there exists nothing at the core of your own being, and when you look within yourself for an answer and you find that there is just nothing.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. The-yourself-you know that you cannot depend on authority. Is it clear to you?

Student C: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. I think that is very true. So what's-and you really think, you know, you shouldn't depend on authority. That is very important point for us, especially for the people who are sitting this side [laughs]. This is very important. Why you should sit [on] this side is, you know, because you depend on authority. When you do not depend on any authority and even care for something good, you know, or even care for enlightenment, then you have-you yourself has authority. Your life will be more stable, and your eyes will be open, and our mind will be clear. Because of this kind of authority, because of your lazy practice to depend on authority ... [Sentence probably not finished. Tape turned.]

... to be thinking the other way because of the authority you have in your mind. And if-when you think you want to go this way, you-if you don't-if you go this way, you feel as if you are doing something wrong. So you [are] always are afraid of authority. That is very big problem for us. First of all, we should try to be free from authority or free from preconceived idea. Then you must be very calm and sincere, or else you feel you cannot survive. Then, more and more, you will have power to go your own way without any trouble. That is actual practice, which will go [on] forever. That is the kind of practice we are actually doing.

So when you feel there is no authority-there is nothing to depend on-there is noth- [partial word: "nothing"?]-no teaching especially for you, then that is the practice-the practice the people who are sitting this side [are] taking. We say "power of-power of not doing bad"-not doing bad-power of maku sa maku rikiryō in Japanese.[6] Not doing: maku sa maku. Rikiryō: power.

Whatever you do, when you have this kind of power, you have power of doing something right without depending on something else. The power you have is the power of not doing anything wrong. I said [laughs] "wrong"; I used the word "wrong," but his own intuition, or his own power, or his own wisdom to know which-what kind of life we should have.

So even though we have buddha-nature, even though we are supposed to know intuitively which way to go or what is, you know, what kind of life we should have, but unless we have actual power of doing something right, it doesn't make any sense. Why it doesn't make any sense is because we have always tried to depend on something. We are always making some excuse to do something selfish. That is the trouble.

It looks like we have no, you know, nothing to depend on, but actually we can depend on ourselves if we stop trying to depend on something else. And that is something, you know, which you will realize by actual practice, you know. It is [laughs] not-not possible to, you know, solve that kind of question by thinking or by reading or by even by discussing. It is everyday problem which we will have. And you-if you see the problem as it is then, and if you are able to see the problem as it is, there is a way to solve the problem.

Maybe my answer does not cover-may not cover the question you gave me, but what I am talking about is what is our practice and what is wrong with-us usually. The important point is to forget all about preconceived idea-all track of all the way of life. It does not mean I am ignoring or I am trying to forget all about our condition. It does not mean so, but personally each one of us has very clear, calm mind. That is what I am talking about. If my answer does not cover all the area, please give me more question.

Student D: How can one be certain that he is right even though he listens to himself?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student D: How can one be certain, even though he listens to himself for an answer, how does he know that what he is doing is right?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That is the question of self. My answer will be concentrated on what is "you" or what is "I." When you have problem, the underlying problem from our viewpoint is the problem of self, which is-which does not exist really. We say "I" or "mine" [laughs], "my body, my mind, my way of life" [laughs]. But what is my mind? It looks like, you know, I have-I have my mind, and that mind sometime looks like real life. But you say, you know, "my mind, my body," but it looks like it is more true to say "This is me." It is, I think, more understandable than to say "my body." What is "me" then? Not this body or not my mind.

We say "my mind," so maybe, you know, "I" owns my mind; "I" own my body. What is "I" [laughs]? Actually, maybe more accurate to say "This is me," "my mind is me." Then it looks like more accurate. And what is this physical body? This is, you know, the result of taking meal each time, a result of exhaling and inhaling. That is my-me-my body. "My mind," we say, "My mind is always changing." "My mind" is always related to something else. Then there is no mind or no physical being which has some self-nature. No self-nature in our body or in our mind.

"My" is delusion, you know. It is no such thing like "my." But it looks like [laughs]-I-we feel like we have "my something" or "me". It is, you know, because of this "me" or "mine" we have-we cannot-we have to know something. The most important thing is to think by clear mind and to keep our physical body strong-strong enough to help others and to be helped [by] others. So then what you should do is very clear. You will find out what you should do. If you eat too much it will hurt you. If you think same thing over and over, you-eventually you hurt yourself mentally. So you will know how to take care of yourself and how to help others and how to have good relationship with someone else. Then there is true "me" or "mine." It is not just delusion but more actual reality which is happening around yourself. That is how you figure out what you should do moment after moment, and that is our practice.

So, the important point of Buddhism is to forget all about "me" or 'mine," and to see our surrounding more clearly. So, if you realize this point your problem will be solved naturally. Okay? [Laughs.] Does it made some sense?

Student D: Not yet.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Who say "Not yet?" [Said in a mock serious tone.] [Laughs.] That is big problem. That problem-only way to solve that problem is practice. If you practice zazen and to some extent you are able to forget self-centered, thinking mind, then your mind is very clear. And what you will say is more adequate [?]. Instead of universality, you-your words have validity. Actually valid. Something universal doesn't help. Something universal like moral code or teaching of Buddha or Christ-very universal, and his-their generation makes-made his words to help people individually-made it universal and forced that universality to all of us who is different from each other. That is the problem we have.

Knowing this point, we are rather interested in validity of the teaching. So each one of-unless each one of us after trying [to] forget self-centered thinking mind, our thinking mind does not work. The direction our thinking mind will go is to have universality-to have authority. That-that is not our way.

I think you-you will-that is what I-that is the unique authority of Buddhism. I am not arguing with you, but I wanted-I rather introduce-I want to introduce our way to you. That's all.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Joe Galewsky and Bill Redican (3/5/01). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] SR-71-07-20.

[2] Bodhidharma: c. 470-543. First Chinese Zen Patriarch.

[3] Daijan Huineng (Daikan Eno): 638-713. Sixth Chinese Zen Patriarch.

[4] The disciple fanning himself was Magu Baoche (Mayoku Hotetsu)-n.d.-dharma successor of Mazu Daoyi. This exchange between an unnamed monk and Magu is recounted at the end of the Genjo Koan.

[5] Jiangxi Mazu Daoyi (Baso Doitsu): 709-788. Chan master of the Tang period.

[6] maku: stop; sa: make; maku (sa + aku): evil.

6 - San-Pachi-Nenju

Thursday, July 22, 1971

San-Pachi-Nenju
Tassajara

This evening I want to explain about san-pachi-nenju[1] which we practice. Can you hear me?

Student: No.

Suzuki-roshi: No. Okay. [Laughs, laughter.] San-pachi. San-pachi-nenju which we practiced this evening. Some of you must have joined the ceremony, and some of you must have seen it. But before I explain about san-pachi-nenju, I want to explain our-what is our practice and what will be each one of yours practice-practice of each one of you should be or will be.

Before everyone-before we become Buddhist, you are lay Buddhist. And before you become lay Buddhist, you are laymen which does not belong to-member of Buddhists. Now can you hear me? Member of Buddhist. So [there are] non-Buddhist people and Buddhists. And Buddhist can be classified in four: lay Buddhist-lay Buddhist man and lay Buddhist woman and maybe layman and laywoman, and nun, and priest. Those are five class-classes of Buddhist group. Four-we have four groups.

And each layman accept Buddhists precepts. If usual person accepts precepts, we become Buddhist. And I have been explaining what is precepts. So tonight I will not speak-talk about it; but if you become Buddhist, what kind of practice you will have is next thing-is the thing I want to talk [about]-to study.

For layman to receive the precepts-precepts it is necessary for you to keep precepts. The most important one is-precepts is the three refuges. I take refuge in the buddha; I take refuge in the dharma; and I take refuge in the sangha. And you repeat this practice in your everyday life. But it is too much [laughs] to explain tonight about it-three refuges.

To, you know, to, in short, to receive the three refuges is to have right understanding of our life. It is same thing, you know, to have right understanding of our life and to receive three refuges is same thing. So if-when you have right understanding of human life as it is, then you are said to be accepted, to have accepted Buddha's precepts. Nothing special-nothing special practice, but usual practice. And you will have right understanding about, you know, our life.

But as you-as long as you remain layman or laywoman, you have, you have to live in more dualistic world: good or bad, right or wrong, or fast or slow, successful or unsuccessful. And sometime, or, I am sorry to say, but most of the time, dualistic life goes first, maybe, and you don't have not much time to have calm, peaceful mind. But the difference between non-Buddhist and Buddhist is you know how our life should be. You know that we have no self-nature, and we don't exist as a person who has self-nature. We cannot be egoistic. We feel as if we could be very egoistic, but actually you know that is not possible. But even though you know, as you are laymen, most of the time you have no time to forget about your dualistic life, so dualistic practice goes first.

So for layman some practice like Rinzai Zen is maybe better for someone. Rinzai practice is very dualistic; so that will give you some strength to encourage non-dualistic side more and to fight with dualistic idea-to forget all about-until you-you can forget all about, you know, dualistic way of life even for a moment. That is so-called-it kensho. But that is, you know, just, even though you have kensho, you-you do not have a Buddhist life completely. You just get a glance of your buddha nature, which is not egoistic. You just experience literally [laughs] about non-egoistic life. But it doesn't last, because you are so busy and you are deeply involved in usual life-usual way of life. That is more-that is layman or laywoman practice.

Soto way-how, then, Soto way help a layman is let you follow non-dualistic way of life like Tassajara. Many laymen participate [in] our practice, which is not dualistic and which put more emphasis on non-dualistic practice. So if you follow Soto way, even though you do not feel you have entered [?] the non-dualistic experience, more and more your life will be non-dualistic because our way of practice-our way we set up-our practice is according to non-dualistic way of Buddha. That is why we Soto school put more emphasis on how to eat, how to drink, how to walk, work, or how to work, how to recite sutras. So those rituals set up by Soto teachers [are] based on non-dualistic idea.

So following non-dualistic way of life in Buddhist school, more and more, you will be familiar with non-dualistic life. The Soto way, as you may have noticed, do not-is not so dualistic, and we do not encourage students so strictly by working or shouting [laughs]. We don't use, you know, stick so much. I have one, but I don't use so much as Rinzai master, maybe, use it. Because we have not much-our practice is based on non-dualistic way.

So teacher thinks-if teacher is very sincere, naturally, you know, students will be sincere. That student is sleeping means teacher is sleeping. Non-dualism, you know, teacher and student one. So when student sleeps, teacher sleeps; when teacher sleeps, student sleeps.

Student [David Chadwick?]: Wake up!

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] When student says "wake up," teacher will wake up. [Laughter.] That is something like Soto way. And that is why we put more emphasis on how to offer incense or how to work or how to eat. How it is so is very difficult to maybe, very difficult to understand for beginners; but when you have some experience you will understand difference between Soto and Rinzai. And both Soto and Rinzai have its own advantage, but both Rinzai and Soto-anyway, main point of practice is not to attain enlightenment but right after you attain enlightenment. You know, like Buddha practiced six years, and like Bodhidharma practiced zazen nine years, even though they have enlightenment. That is good example of Buddhist practice. Not only Soto and Rinzai, but also all the schools of Buddhism put emphasis on everyday life of-or life of Buddhist. As long as Buddhism is for people it should be like that. So difference between Rinzai or Soto or Shin school or Tendai or Shingon-is, you know, the entrance is different; but if you enter the gate of Buddhism, what you-the way of life you have are not different.

Difficult, you know, set of circumstances [?]-I think san-pachi-nenju, that is very-if you see san-pachi-nenju, you will understand what is our practice, especially when Ino says- I have- Do you have the translation of the san-pachi-nenju? Do you have it there?

So after- Oh. Do you have it? [Inaudible response from student.]

Okay. After we clean up zendo and our rooms and everywhere, we observe san-pachi-nenju. San means three; pachi means eight. And every three days-three and eight days: the third, the eighth, thirteenth, eighteenth, twenty-third, twenty eighth before [1-2 words] ... four and nine day. Four and nine day is the day we have no dokusan-my holiday [laughs, laughter].

But if you understand that that four and nine day is-are the day when we have no schedule. But strictly speaking, hosan means no dokusan. San is dokusan-san. No dokusan on four and nine day. Nowadays we do not have not much zazen practice, but we can practice zazen if you like [laughs]. But most people understand four and nine days is the day when we have no schedule; but it is not right understanding. Dokusan means to see-to see a student personal. Doku means personal, or alone, or independent. Doku. San is to visit teacher. Dokusan.

So before- Dogen-zenji, first of all, when he was studying at Rinzai monastery, under Eisai[2] he studied koan practice first and he went to China with Myozen[3], a disciple of Eisai, he went to China. And he attained enlightenment under Eisai-zenji, and after that to have more mature practice he continued his training-his practice until Eisai-zenji passed away. And since he thought there is good-no more good teacher in Japan, so he went to China and continued his practice.

And he was-he-when he met Myozen-zenji, he had great confidence in his practice. And he had great confidence in his non-selfish practice. And he set up how to have non-selfish practice-how to set up non-selfish practice for himself and for his disciples.

Of course, those rules is not set up only by Dogen-zenji. Those rules actually set up [in] maybe eighth century, in China, by Hyakujo-Hyakujo Shingi.[4] Because of the severe persecution we had, unfortunately, his rules were-doesn't exist anymore. But there-there are many rules after, you know, Hyakujo Shingi-Hyakujo-zenji. We can see the quotations from Hyakujo Shingi, so we can know what kind of setup Hyakujo made.

So he [Dogen] gathered-or he followed Hyakujo Shingi carefully. Not only observing the rules [?], you know, studying Buddhist precepts. We have school of precepts, you know-precepts and doctrine [?] of zazen school. They are only studying precepts, so Dogen-zenji studied precepts-various precepts, precepts texts-texts of precepts, and he carefully set up non-dualistic way of life for monks and laymen.

He said as long as you are Buddhist, whether you are layman or monk, it is necessary to observe the first principle first, the next principle-the second principle-next [laughs]. Do you understand? The first principle goes first; and second principle follows. Value [?] of first principle. First principle means non-dualistic way. The second precept-the second principle is-is good means to lead people to the first principle. So it is a little bit more dualistic.

When you don't know which way you should take, which way should be more important, then you should put more emphasis on the first principle, not the second principle-principle of the duality.

[Unfolds paper.] Here is [the text of San-pachi-nenju ]. Oh. [Laughs.]
"Listen carefully everyone... ." Will you read it? [Spoken to a student.]

Student:

"Listen carefully everyone.

Twenty-four centuries, fifty-seven years ago, the great Tathagata entered nirvana.

When this day is gone, also life thereby decreases.[5]

Like a fish in a puddle, what pleasure is there here?

A man needs to practice constantly, as if to save his head from fire.

Mindful of transiency, pursue the path with diligence and care.

Throughout the temple, the dharma safely resides, bringing everyone peace.

All those in ten directions know an increase in joy,
a growth of wisdom.

Thus mindful of [1 word unclear],[6] we chant the names of Buddha."

Suzuki-roshi: Do you understand? It says: "Listen carefully, everyone. Twenty-four centuries, fifty-seven years ago, the great Tathagata entered nirvana. When this day is gone, also life thereby decrease." Our life, therefore, you know, thereby decrease. "Like a fish in a puddle, what pleasure is there here? A man needs to practice constantly as if to save his head from fire. Mindful of transiency, pursue the path with diligence and care."

You know, our-here it says: "When this day is gone, our life thereby decrease. Like a fish in a puddle, what pleasure is there here?" You know, our dualistic life of pleasure, dualistic pleasure, and these students or people who live in the dualistic life is like a fish who lives in a puddle. From Buddhist viewpoint, our ordinary life is so small, like a puddle. In the puddle, you know, we are trying to be successful and seeking for pleasure in puddle. Is there any pleasure in muddy puddle? [Laughs.] [3 words unclear.] And when you, you know, hear it in monastery with your friend who is practicing non-dualistic practice, you will feel that way; but in the city, you know, you may not feel in that way. "What- What- What is he saying? What does it mean? He is living in the puddle, not me." [Laughter.]

But we put emphasis more on first principle, the way of life to follow the first principle, which is forever, which exist everywhere-not only human life but also for all sentient beings. That is the life of the first principle. So day and night-so if our life, if in our life, always first principle goes first, and if we take care of our practice like a man whose head is on fire [laughs]-or, you know, a man whose head on fire should jump into pond [laughs] or stream, you know, and save your head. We should practice so hard as-as a man on his head trying to extinguish the fire.

When we practice the first principle in the monastery, everyone will have complete joy to participate in and to join and-or to see-to see people practicing the first principle which exist forever. That is, you know, good example of Soto practice. But if you do not practice our way like a man whose head is on fire, it does not mean so much. So we must be completely involved in our practice, and we should always put the first principle first. That is, you know, the practice after you have attained enlightenment. And even though you have-you haven't attained enlightenment, if you join the practice of the first principle, more and more you don't know when you attain enlightenment. Eventually you will attain enlightenment.

What is it? For a Soto priest it is okay, not okay, but it is permissible to enter the monastery without attaining enlightenment. Eventually will attain enlightenment. The difference between the people who has attained enlightenment and who haven't is whether you realize your hat [is] on your head or not [laughs]. Sometimes, you know, having his own hat on his head, he will seek for his own hat: "Where is my hat?" [Laughs.] But actually, his-the hat is on his head.[7] Anyway we have buddha nature. But most people do not feel in that way and [are] seeking for buddha nature somewhere else.

Maybe it is like to seek for treasure when you have a lot of jewels and diamonds in each pocket [laughs]. "I must have some valuable jewels inside, in the pocket." But until he knows-he found out-he find out the jewel in his pocket, he may seek for it. That is famous, you know, parable.

So anyway, we will find out our own treasure, and that is our precepts too. With it is nothing but treasures you have. But when you receive it, you receive it as if you receive something special [laughs] from Buddha. But actually, more and more-"Oh! This is a treasure we have had." That is how you feel when you have attained enlightenment.

Before maybe when I was young, maybe thirty or forty years ago, Buddhist didn't-people didn't think Buddhist teaching is so helpful teaching or Zen, because they were involved in the second principle, teaching small dualistic way of life. And they were so interested in materialistic invention [?], so they have no time to study Buddhism. But recently the situation is like this [?]-more and more-many people started to [be] interested in what is ultimate reality. That would be-that should be our life actually. More and more, people put the first principle, put more emphasis on the first principle. If you know what is the first principle, the second principle could be the first principle too. In that way, you know, you can help people without giving any arrogant with him [?] or without giving any fancy talk. If you talk about why things exist, what kind of nature we have, and what is the difficult point in your practice, what kind of effort you should make, then that is the only way to help people in its true sense. [Sentence finished. Tape changed.]

Student A: [Unclear first time. Student repeated.] Well, you said today we should practice as though your head was on fire, and I wonder how can you practice zazen and still maintain a calm attitude in your practice?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughing] That is just parable, you know. You don't have to feel in that way. If your head is on fire, it is terrible [laughs, laughter] but usually we are so lazy so Buddha [laughs] told you in that way. That's all. That is just parable. You don't have to take literally. You have to make effort to obtain calmness of your mind. Okay? Hai.

Student B: What is reality to an enlightened being?

Suzuki-roshi: Reality. Reality is, you know-this is, again, just my explanation, you know, or traditional explanation of the reality-but actually, you have to feel by yourself. But reality, we say, reality has two side, always two side. So, when you think about it, it is contradictory. One side of it is very calm, and the other side is very restless and nervous and dualistic. But strictly speaking, if you have eyes to see something which looks like dualistic, [it] is not actually dualistic. So when you see things in that way, you-it means that you have calmness of your mind, and your mind is not stick to one-sided view, or you are not interested in just one-sided view.

You may listen to someone: "This world is so noisy!" "Oh, yes. It is very noisy [laughs], isn't it?" "It is very hot." "Yes, it is hot [laughs]." Someone may say, "Although it is hot, isn't it nice to have hot weather?" "Oh, yes, it is [laugh]!" You know, it looks like dualistic, but actually for him hot weather is also good. But for someone who like only cool-nice and cool weather, hot weather is, you know, dreadful [laughs]-horrible. The same thing could be, you know, something agreeable and something disagreeable. So when-whether it is dualistic or non-dualistic is up to the person who observe things. So actually, duality means to have calmness of your mind. Some other question? Okay. Some other questions? Hai.

Student C: How can you say some things are dualistic and others are not?

Suzuki-roshi: Well- Again, it is, you know-even though it looks like dualistic, for someone who knows non-dualistic, who are practicing non-dualistic practice, something dualistic is not dualistic. But when you do not know anything about non-duality, it is really dualistic.

Student C: Isn't everything both dualistic and non-dualistic at the same time?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, same time. Or you can say there is nothing can be just dualistic or just non-dualistic. But you make, you know, you think dualistic; your way of observation is dualistic most of the time. So things is not, itself is not dualistic. So to see-when you are able to see things-as-it-is, it is not dualistic. That is why I said it is like a hat which is on your head, you know. Sometime you feel you have a hat; sometime you don't feel so. That is why we must have practice; and even though you have kensho, you-your life still could be dualistic. You cannot, you know [laughs], you cannot be a buddha in one night, in one minute. It is not possible. Your karma doesn't allow you to be so.

Student D: If all life is equal and equally valuable, why do we not eat meat? Why are we vegetarian?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] It is strange. I don't know exactly. [Laughs, laughter.] I think we have to study more. But we are very greedy anyway [laughs]. It may be more important to live, maybe, not to be so greedy. Then, whatever you eat, it will give you strength. But even though you eat something very good, if you become greedy it can hurt you. That is very true. And we-we are very much-we are very much materialistic, you know, so spiritual side is forgotten. Even though you eat something good always, it doesn't help so much. Unless your mind is very calm, and unless your tummy is very strong, calm and strong, it doesn't help so much. Why I say so is, you know-usually, if you eat meat and fish a lot [laughs] they will give you a lot of nourishment; but it is not always so.

When I went to Eihei-ji monastery, food at that time-recently Eihei-ji food is-I had pretty good, you know-but before, it was very poor food. Morning time goma-shio[8] and gruel-rice, white rice, gruel, and pickle. That's all. And at lunch we had rice mixed with meat, you know. That is pretty good food. But no-not much vegetables, but seaweed-seaweed, miso soup, and pickle. And dinner, you know [laughs laughter], what we had was rice soup again and soybeans. That's all. And pickles, sometimes. So most of the time soybean and rice soup. That's all. So we thought-[laughter]-how is it possible to survive with such a poor food? So, what we did is to have a lot of it-it was always, you know, "more, more, more"! And supper generally is a lot of, you know, rice. But meat? Rice soup can be like this [laughs], but as much as possible [1-2 words unclear], you know, to feel more. In my monastery almost all the student went to hospital [laughter]. Almost no exception; it was normal [laughs]. And after that, we gain food-we gain weigh. Much more-we weigh much more than when we were in the city. One more size [?]. So food is not complete.

If your mind is very calm, then food helps you better, I think. So it is a kind of superstition, you know, or kind of delusion [?] to think you can fish-[1-2 words unclear] fish steak, good, will help you. It is a kind of superstition, I think. When I was young, I already-I could go beyond this kind of superstition. I can eat anything, you know, as [that] someone, you know, eat. If someone eat, I can eat anything. It is true [?]. And if you taste it, you know, everything is pretty good, you know. Every food has its own taste. Because you add too much salt or too much seasoning or sugar, it ruins its own flavor and taste. If you just eat it, you know, like a medicine, or more [?], or when you take medicine you-[laughs]-that is the way. [3-4 words unclear]. If you taste it carefully, it is pretty good. And when-I think when you feel it, it is good. It will help you. Maybe that is superstition too [laughs, laughter].

Almost time?

Okay?

Okay.

-----

Source: City Center transcript by Peggy Cramer. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Verbatim transcript checked against tape by Jeffrey Schneider and Bill Redican (2/9/00).

[1] Chanting/cleaning ceremony in a Zen monastery six times per month: on the 3rd, 8th, 13th, 18th, 23rd, and 28th. San (three) + pachi (eight) + nenju (invoking the name of a deity, meditating on the mantra of a deity, reading scriptures dedicated to a deity, etc.).

[2] Also Myoan Eisei (Yosai) or Senko (Zenko) Kokushi (1141-1215): Japanese Zen master of the Oryo lineage of Rinzai Zen.

[3] Myozen Ryonen (1184-1225): Japanese Zen master of the Oryo lineage of Rinzai Zen; student and dharma successor of Eisei-zenji.

[4] Pai-chang Huai-hai (Hyakujo Ekai): 720-814. Chinese master of Ch'an in the T'ang period. Dharma successor of Mazu Daoyi (Baso Doitsu). The Pai-chang-ching-kuei (Hyakujo Shingi) is a written set of rules for monastic life attributed to Hyakujo Ekai.

[5] The version of this line chanted at Tassajara in 1999 is: "When this day is gone, your life also decreases."

[6] The version of this line chanted at Tassajara in 1999 is: "Thankfully we recite the ten names of Buddha."

[7] Suzuki-roshi is probably referring to a story he told on June 12, 1971, about Oka Sotan as a young monk. He was sent into town to buy bean curd for the monks' meal. On the way, he was distracted by a poster for a traveling circus. His daydreaming was interrupted by the sound of the temple's meal bell, which meant he was very late. He dashed into the shop, grabbed the tofu, and headed back toward the temple. But he couldn't find his hat, so he ran back to the store and shouted: "Give me! Give me! Give me!" to the clerk. Eventually he made it understood that he was talking about his hat, at which time the clerk said, "Oh, your hat is on your head! What is the matter with you?" (See SR-71-06-12.)

[8] A table seasoning of ground roasted sesame seeds (goma) and salt (shio).

7 - Mountains and Rivers

Saturday, July 24, 1971

Mountains and Rivers
Tassajara

This evening I want to talk about Buddhist practice. In one of the fascicle of Shobogenzo there is fascicle about virtue of mountain and river.[1] Virtue of mountain and river. This is very interesting and give us a great benefit to understand what is our practice. Virtue of mountain and river.

He [Dogen] says usual people think mountain is solid, mountain does not move and permanent; but river flows. That is usual understanding of mountain and river. Mountain and river. It is exactly the same as- people say Rinzai practice or Soto practice [laughs]. And the Soto practice is such-and-such; and Rinzai practice is such-and-such. And it looks like Soto way is more rigid and Rinzai way is more free. But Soto way is not so strict, but Rinzai way is very strict. They may say many things about Soto or Rinzai because it looks like so. And there must be various arguments about what is Soto and what is Rinzai. But there are- there are not so many arguments [laughs] when we say: "Mountain does not move, but water flows, river flows." And there's not much [laughs] arguing about that.

But Dogen-zenji or-no-no-but Daokai-zenji Master[2] said: "Mountains flow [laughs]; mountains-mountains goes but river doesn't. Mountains flow. Or East Mountain flows over-over the-over the river. Mountain goes and river stays." And about this statement, because it is difficult for us to understand, so people say-people say: "True Zen is beyond words [laughs]. It is not possible for us to say what is Zen practice actually. Zen practice is beyond words." That is why Daokai-zenji said, "Mountain-East Mountain goes over the water."

But I want to explain really what our practice is. And then, maybe, then you may understand what real-what Daokai-zenji, you know, said.

Another-another statement which Dogen-zenji said in Genjo Koan, the first fascicle of Shobogenzo. Maybe that is the first chapter. He started with Genjo Koan to finish one hundred fascicles of Shobogenzo. But he couldn't complete one hundred. But anyway, he started with Genjo Koan when he was thirty-two years old. And in-in Genjo Koan he says, "Over-under enlightenment-let enlightenment-let everything in surrender to it [?] or over-under enlightenment-let everything exist under practice, enlightenment." And-very difficult translate. Maybe I should try to translate it different. What he might means is when we practice zazen, our practice covers everything. And even though you do not have everything in your mind, in your practice, you do not realize, or you do not feel your practice cover everything. But actually, in your practice, when you just sit, there is actually everything.

But you shouldn't stay in the darkness of the enlightenment. Why we say "darkness" [is] because you cannot see things actually. You know, when you sit like this, you know-even though you hear, even though you see something, actually you are not seeing anything [laughs]. But you are seeing. But you hear it-but the way you hear is not to hear something, you know: "What is it? Oh. It's very good music." You do not hear in that way, you know. You do not see-you are not curious to know what it is, you know. "Is it spider or [laughs] cobweb or [2-3 words unclear] legs. Looks like cobweb. But it looks like legs because it moves. "What is it?" [Laughs.] You do not see in that way, you know. Anyway, something that you are frightened with [?]. You are not seeing; you do not attach to anything. You are not curious about anything. But you are just seeing.

Then it looks like- Things exist in dark room. Things actually exist in the room, but it is dark, so you do not see, you know, what-exactly what it is. You do not try to see, or even though you try to see, you cannot see, anyway, in the utter darkness of the room. So you don't see. So what is there is just your practice-your practice; you know, and you are completely free from everything, and yet your-your practice include everything, you know, include everything. In your practice many things exist. And, like a-like a blue sky or blue space, millions of stars, you know, exist and possible to exist. There is big possibility in-in the blue space. You can fly through it. You can sing in it. You can dance in it [laughs]. A lot of possibilities in the sky, but what actually exist is the blue sky.

Whatever you do, you know, it doesn't make-we cannot disturb the stars. Whatever you do, it doesn't make much sense [laughs]. That is, you know, our practice actually. But if you think: "I have a good practice; and I have a great freedom from mundane life. That is-this is enlightenment; this is the standard [laughs]." And if you stick to your practice, you know, it doesn't-it is not utter darkness; it is something already. Your practice is under limitation of good or bad, perfect or imperfect. So it is not already our enlightenment. So-so even if, you know, in zazen-zazen, you know, even, even something happen, you know, if is something wrong with your practice, the practice is not true practice anymore.

If so, should you [laughs]-should you always [be] practicing zazen? Bodhidharma sit nine years. But we shouldn't take it literally, you know. Bodhidharma always-was not always sitting [laughs]. He must have ate something [laughs, laughter]; he must have go to rest room, especially when he is very old like me [laughs]. He was not always sitting. So true practice is not matter whether you are sitting or whether you are not sitting. Whatever you do, you know, that-the activity you have should be practice. But when I say so again you will stick to my words, or you will take my words literally.

So-so Dogen-zenji said that you should not stick to our practice shikantaza. It is utter darkness of the room of the temple [?]. If you stick to-if you think-if you stick, you know, in zazen is only way to obtain perfect enlightenment, then that is again wrong practice; that is not real practice. So you should also forget all about your practice. Or you should practice zazen until zazen practice become your own practice like your own, your eyes, or your eyes, or your nose.

Even though you have it, you don't realize it. You don't feel you have it. But you have it, you know. How you can have this kind of matured practice instead of lazy practice, you know, always sitting on black cushion or always sitting in-with mosquitoes, or false pride [laughs]. You should be, you know-that is not actually real practice. But why we practice so rigidly is to acquire that kind of practice, little by little. While you are doing rigid practice, sometime is fighting with the dragon, you know, and sometimes bothered by many ideas to come.

Anyway, you have-you try to sit. While you are sitting in that way, little by little, without knowing when you acquired the power, you will have, you know, more and more, you will own zazen, or zazen will become your own. And you do not feel you are practicing zazen. Even though you are sitting, you don't feel you are practicing zazen. Even though you are doing something else, you do not feel: "Oh! It is good to do something after zazen." [Laughs.] You do not feel-feel so much difference between zazen practice and everyday activity. The feeling doesn't-different so much, because you are, you know, you are very much familiar with your practice. And zazen become your own power, or not even power, even-because you do not feel you have power. Many people say-old students say: "I have been sitting eight years with you but nothing happen." [Laughs, laughter.] Nothing happens is very good. [Laughs, laughter.]

In Zen, various poems about it, you know. It is translate-translated in English. But, for an instance, there are beautiful, you know, sight-seeing place in China. [1 word unclear.] And in literature, you know, there is many lakes like-like maybe many beautiful, you know, lakes. And when it is-sometime lakes-water, you know-lake have plenty of water-a lot of water. Sometime it-they are not filled, but anyway, it is beautiful. So people want to see, you know-people in-all over the China wants-want to see the lake and worship the beautiful mountain. And that mountain is very beautiful, and mist comes and goes, and mountain appears and disappears. And it is very beautiful. I-I didn't go there, but people say it is very beautiful. But the poem says-I think it was Sakoda's [?] poem: "I at last come to the place; but not much interesting sight I have. The [word?] when-when water come [1 word] is beautiful, and when rainy days, [1 word] is beautiful. That's all. Nothing," you know, "special." That was what he said.

Even though you, you know, are tired, you have str- [partial word: "strength"?]-actual you have strength. Your practice mature. But actually, you gained anything [nothing]. That is real practice. If you think I gain something, it's not, you know, it is not real, you know, practice. Too much, you know, [1-2 words], because, it is-it is not-not enough your feeling that way, or it is too much you feeling that way. So only when you-you think you have enough practice every day, and you-[have] enough problems to exist every day [laughs], then that is real practice.

[In] the first-first two-three pages of Genjo Koan, Dogen-zenji talked about this point, especially-and very famous. They are very famous statement. It is very difficult to understand. Why it is difficult to understand is because you try to understand what he said. But if you have actual experience of zazen practice, he is not saying anything special. But the way he says is too, maybe [1 word] or too-the, you know, extraordinary high [1 word] in expression. So we think because the expression is so beautiful, so we think what he is talking about must be something special. But he is talking about very usual things, meaning very subtle word. At the same time logical thing [?].

So he says people say Zen word is not possible to understand by-by mind-by our minds, but-by our thinking mind-but it is possible, he says. But why you-it is difficult to understand is because of your, you know, one-sided view, like: "Mountain does not flow; but river flow." That is already not true.

Why it is not true is because it looks like so. And you say mountain does not move. But mountain actually moving. The river goes; but actually, if river goes, mountain is also going. And if river stays, actually mountain will stay. It is our thinking mind who thinks mountain is moving and river is-mountain does not move and river is moving. That is our thinking mind. And when we talk about things, we forget our subject and talk about things-objective world only. But objective world is projected objects or projected ideas which we have in our mind.

So when we say mountain moves, moving-we know that, you know, ourselves also moving, you know, [1-2 words]. When we say, "river does not move," it means that our practice, in our practice, we do not move. Move or not move is the virtue of our practice. We have-our practice have various [word?]. Our practice can move everything. And our practice can stop everything from moving, because our practice include everything.

We can, you know- The way I exist here is the way everything exist with me. So actually how you feel, if you feel quite naturally, free from idea of self-for an instance, if you feel your breathing, if you feel your beating of your heart, then it means that you will feel whole world. It is a part of, you know, not even part of- Your breathing is the breathing of the whole universe, which include you yourself. When you do not feel you are counting breathing, you-or following breathing-just follow breathing. That is the breathing of whole universe. So your, you know, breathing include everything. There is nothing but whole activity of your-of the world is-of the universe is nothing but-nothing but your inhaling and exhaling. This is again explained [laughs] what, but actually when you practice zazen, you have it in that way. When you have this kind of zazen there is n- [partial word]-anymore, you are outside world. Or there's no buddha or you. No teacher or disciple. That is complete freedom. That is the proper sort for zazen practice. So our zazen practice should include those points.

Your zazen-when you practice zazen, you are actually utter darkness of the room. You don't see anything; you looks like see anything but, you know, you are thinking include everything. That is another side of the reality. So, there is no need to say "zazen practice" or "everyday activity." Zazen practice could be everyday activity, and everyday activity could be zazen practice. And you will feel same way, but only [laughs]-only when you-your practice matures. Knowing this [1 word] point, you will-when you practice, when you continuously practice zazen, then you will have more and more perfect, well-matured practice. This is our task-whole-life task as a Buddhist. After [at the?] [1 word] it is one source [of] your true nature.

There are many translations- maybe, I don't know how many translations, translation of Genjo Koan, various translation of Genjo Koan you have. But if you read it with this idea, I think you will understand what it means.

This is, you know, just outline of important backbone of our practice, but-but what [?] I gived you-give you not much marrow or meat or blood. So you may-you may-you don't understand why I am talking about this kind of thing. I can give you some questions-some questions and answer probably. That will be more interesting for you and help your understanding. Do you have some question?

By the way, did you- could you hear me? [Laughter.] I am basically, looks like, basically same thing over and over again. Anyway, you will understand [laughs] what I'm saying.

Student A: Roshi, when you see something when it's in a dark room, how come you smile and are unhappy with that?

Suzuki-roshi: Unhappy-?

Student A: -and sad and laughing and different feelings. What-what-what's that? What part [?] is that?

Suzuki-roshi: No. I am talking about, you know, darkness, or enlightenment or the first principle, or emptiness, you know, emptiness. Same thing, you know. First principle or utter darkness of the room or, you know, the [1 word unclear]-there are various expressions for dark. But utter darkness means-why I say so is in utter darkness, when we say "emptiness," we may feel nothingness; or when I say "nothingness" we may feel that is, you know, void: nothing in it-that is nothing. Usually it is so; but what we really mean is there is and there is not. That is nothingness. In-in dark room, there is many things actually; but at the same time, because it is dark, we cannot see. That is darkness. "Nothingness," we say, but actually there is something. There is something but it's-actually, there is nothing. This is very true, isn't it?

I exist here like this, but actually I don't exist like that-like this. Buddhist scripture-scripture says, in one day we will change into various beings-sixty billion, forty-four hundred million, and ninety-nine thousand, and eight hundred, and nine hundred and eighty-four times [laughs, laughter]. How much is that? Maybe the population of America and China, you know, the amount may be something, six million or-in China there is-they-there is supposed to be, you know, four billion. Hmm? No. Four billion?

Student B: Seven hundred million.

Suzuki-roshi: Seven hundred million? Is that all? [Laughs, laughter.] It is still pretty big [laughs] number so I cannot figure out. But-so many times do we changed in one day. So-if so, and if it is actually so, so I don't exist in this way, even for a moment. We say "moment after moment," but more than that it changes like the strips [?] on the characters on the train [?]. Looks like, you know, always in the same way, but it is not. Always changing. It is turning. It is result of countless combustion.

So, you know, we-I exist and I don't exist. That is so true [?]. So from-because we are changing moment after moment, I don't exist. But, at the same time, it looks like, and people understand that I am existing here and you are listening. This is a game and explanation so that you- so that I won't convince you [laughs]. This is just explanation, but it is so. So we say we do not exist. When we say so, we are in utter darkness, all over, in utter darkness. When I say, "I exist here and you exist there," it is light of being. And when we say, "Nothing exists," that is light of non-being. Again, this is just thinking mind. The actual feeling-feeling of reality is beyond our thinking mind. Only ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... or, there is no idea of existence or no existence. It is not necessary to say or not necessary to be bothered by this kind of talking. But only to encourage your practice-my practice-I am explaining it so that you-you give up your superficial understanding of, "My [1 word] doesn't exist, but [1 word] exist." That is very superficial understanding.

Okay. Some more questions? Do you have some question over there? I may feel good if me-if you ask me question; it means you are [laughs] listening to me [laughs]. My voice reach to you. Do you feel strange to be at this kind of lecture? I want to-I want to disturb you [laughs, laughter], disturb your busy thinking mind-destroy your, you know, rigid-rigid-rigidness of your thinking-way of thinking. Do you have some question? Hai.

Student C: I don't know what did you mean by "all activity is zazen."

Suzuki-roshi: "All activity is zazen"?

Student C: Yeah. Could you explain this to us?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. All- It is not something to be explained, but, you know, because-it is the real meaning of, you know, why-it is reason why we practice zazen and reason why we do many things. When we put more emphasis on zazen practice, we say everyday activity is zazen. You see? Every-whatever you do, it is zazen. When we say, so we put more emphasis on zazen. You see? You understand? Everyday activity is zazen. That is why, you know, we-you have some reason in-when you practice zazen.

But actually, everyday practice and zazen practice is not two separate practice. If-if everyday activity is quite different from zazen practice, zazen practice will be dead and everyday practice will just become someone's, you know, blind activity without any reason why you have everyday activity. It is just, you know, agony or struggling, not activity even. When you have some reason-even though you have no reason why you do something, but if you enjoy your activity, or if you have composure in your everyday activity, then you can enjoy your everyday activity. That composure cannot be-cannot be gained by some, for an instance, drugs or wine or [laughs]-or some intoxicant, including various teaching [laughter]. "Buddha said so, so I must do this." That is a kind of intoxicant. But, you know, even though Buddha didn't say anything about it-about what you are doing, when you feel very good and when you have no regret in what you have done, and when you become you yourself, then that is your everyday, you know, life. And it makes sense. And you will grow in that kind of activity or practice.

So zazen practice is, you know- To acquire that kind of composure in everyday activity, we practice zazen. If you-if I say in that way, everyday life is first and zazen is next, to enjoy your life you practice zazen. But if you think, you know, if you think for an instance to enjoy our life we practice zazen, so zazen is a little bit, you know, awkward and hard. So maybe I rather take wine or LSD [laughs] so that you may be better. Then that is not our practice, because you only-without understanding the other side of your life, you stick to the pleasure of life, to enjoy your life. And your main purpose of life is to enjoy your life. So it is very one-sided understanding. So that is wrong.

But to-if Zen-if, for an instance, I think:

I am practicing zazen every day [laughs], so there is no need for me to experience or to be sympathetic with so much difficulty in everyday life. I am practicing zazen. I am priest. I am Buddhist.

So if I practice zazen, that is okay. I have good reason why I do not work.

This is, you know, another mistake.

So, this is zazen only-zazen only. I don't know what we should [?]. We are addicted by the idea of zazen. That is also wrong. So our practice must have both sides, and your everyday life should have both sides. Then our practice perfect [?] and very realistic. And our practice will help people. Our practice which has both-both sides. Okay? It is-it is important to have both sides or else you will-you cannot survive in its true sense. You will be easily be lo- [partial word: "lost"?]-you will be easily lost. Hai.

Student D: Roshi, you [4-6 words unclear] ... difficulties. And what are difficulties? Do they exist outside of what we think are difficulties?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, difficulty is one [?]-must be many difficulties. You know, I-I am confronting with various difficulties every day, and I am confronting with my students' difficulties too [laughs]-actual difficulty, and I'm not saying something special. You understand what-what I mean? Difficulty. Actual difficulty. But actual difficulties-how-why we have actual difficulties, is, you know, lack of understanding of the problem. And that is why we feel confused. But when we-when we are not in confusion, difficulty is not difficulty because we have-we have some hope. But when we do not have any hope, when we are very confused, that is real difficulty.

But when we know why we have difficulty, then it is comparatively good-not so bad. The difficulty-why we have difficulty is because we are involved in just one-sided view. We do not understand things thoroughly or [1 word], you know. One-sided understanding of things makes us difficulty. Or because-because of one-sided view, I do things, we do things. So, naturally [laughs], will-our effort will, end in [?] zazen. We have no freedom. Hai.

Student E: If you're sitting in a dark-dark room, how do you keep from [2 words unclear].

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] I don't-I don't say, you know, utter, you know, without wanting you should sit. I mean, without trying to figure out what it is, you know. Whatever you have in your mind, you shouldn't be curious about it. "What does it mean? I had a wonderful experience in my zazen." Or: "I-I had many images of Buddha in my zazen. What does it mean? Oh! [Laughs, laughter.] Where-where do they come from?" That is not zazen, you know, even though various snakes or, you know, spider-black spider come: "Oh, that is black spider-spider. And that is snake." In that way, if you sit, it means you are sitting in dark room. You see but you don't see. You are not bothered by it. That is to sit in dark room. Even though you see, you don't see. Okay? That is true. Actually such a dragon or snake doesn't exist, you know, doesn't come; but you think it come. It is okay to think, to see various image in your zazen. It's okay. It means that something wrong with your breathing or something. That is why you see some fantasy in your practice. But you shouldn't be curious about it. That is to sit in darkness. It is emptiness, emptiness of your mind. We-we talked about this kind of thing from various way, for an instance Prajñāparamita Sutra: "Form is emptiness; emptiness is form." Emptiness is dark room. And dark room there is form-various form. But at the same time it should be empty. It is tentative color or form of big being.

It looks like I am always talking about some philosophy. But philosophy-it is not philosophy; it is actual practice of each one of us. I am talking about your practice not-not just the philosophy. It may be philosophy, but-it should be-but why we think-observe things in that way is because we have experience of-actual experience of this kind of philosophy. It is not just, you know, talk but actual experience of our practice. So it means that you must practice zazen [laughs], in short, with right understanding. Or else you be lost!

Thank you very much.

1999).

[1] Shobogenzo (Treasury of the Eye of the True Dharma), "Mountains and Rivers Sutra" (Sansui-kyo), 1240.

[2] Daokai of Mt. Furong (Fuyo Dokai): 1043-1118. Buddhist patriarch in Dogen's lineage; 45th patriarch from Shakyamuni Buddha.

8 - Self-Centered Practice

Sunday, July 25, 1971

Self-Centered Practice

Tassajara

Tonight I want to explain the outline of our practice. As a monk and as a layman, without understanding of what is practice, it is rather difficult to make actual progress in your practice. And what I will talk about tonight is a kind of universal practice for laymen and monks both, you know-which could be true for both laymen and priests.

We say, or you say [laughs] whatever you do, that is practice, our practice: to drink tea or to eat or to sleep, to walk, or to sit down. Whatever you do, that is practice, you know, we say. But how you, you know-with-with what kind of understanding you do things is very important point. Actually, whatever you do, if you do not do the point-that is true. But if you miss the point, even though you look like [you are] doing a proper practice, actually it doesn't work. The point is, whether you do it for yourself or for the sake of the truth, or for sake of Buddha, or for sake of people-this point is a very important point.

I-I didn't discuss or argue with you, but my way, you know, if there is many things in the basket, my way is to finish the fruit is-you know, start with-I st- [partial word: "start with"?], eat the worst [laughs] one first. I will make-eat best one first. And why you eat best one first is-according to the people who eat best one first-if you eat best one first always, you will always eat best one [laughs]. The last one, you know, will be also best one [laughs]. If-if-we eat worst one first, you will always eat worst-worst one. Last one is also worst one.

Maybe this is very interesting discussion: which will be the best way. I don't-I-let's not discuss-let's discuss-before we discuss it, we must limit our discussion. I-I want to discuss-just I want to discuss which is more appropriate or which is not, which is waste-wasteful, or which is appropriate. Or to best use of fruits. But that is very difficult to-to know-to discuss, because if we want a discussion [of] this point, we should discuss-we must have discussion each time we have fruits [laughs]. So let's not discuss in that way.

But what I want to say-the point I want to make is to-when you eat best thing first, it means that you discriminate best one from-from not-so-good ones. You choose best one. That is a kind of discrimination. And it means that in your attitude, the idea of self goes first. And eventual-naturally, discrimination will follow. If-if only one person is eating fruits, there will not be any problem. But if many people are eating-suppose many people are eating from the same basket-that kind, that attitude-if you eat in that way, you will be involved in trouble. On the contrary, if you eat worst one first there is [laughs] no-no trouble, even though [you] eat with many people. And if you feel you are doing something foolish, you know, unless you feel you are doing something, you know, foolish for yourself. And this attitude of eating worst thing means non-discrimination. You may say it is a kind of discrimination [laughs], but at least self-centered attitude is not involved in it. So that is not discrimination we usually say [call] discrimination.

In short, the point is in our practice whether you develop your idea of self, you know, or you develop buddha-mind in your practice, in your everyday practice, is the difference and point of whether-which is Buddha's practice. We should always put the self, you know, next [laughs] and buddha-mind first. We should always follow buddha-mind. To follow buddha-mind, it is necessary to realize what is buddha-mind. How to realize buddha-mind is our zazen practice.

Zazen practice has two sides or two virtues. One is: through practice you will, you will know, you will eventually, or you will intuitively know what is buddha-mind because your selfish idea or your small self more and more become small. And another side of, another virtue of our practice is you, you know, you will get accustomed to what you have realized. Even though you realize some truth, if you do not accustom to it and if the realization become your own, even though you realize "this is right" and "this is wrong," but intuitively.

But it is difficult to actualize your intuition in everyday life. So how to actualize your small enlightenment or deep enlightenment to your everyday life is by practice. And more and more you continue our practice, your small self becomes smaller and smaller. And big self will become more and more. Big self take over your small self more and more. Just as you eat a fruits from the basket. If you eat all of the basket, you know, that is buddha. Whether you eat-you start with bad ones or good ones, if you finish everything, there is no problem [laughs]. Anyway, you have eaten. So in its wide sense, you know, it doesn't-if you continue your practice through and through, it is okay. But if you choose bad practice, you will have more difficulties, that's all.

It looks like easier to choose-always choose best ones. It looks like easier-easy practice; but actually, if you have to continue that practice forever or until you finish the fruit, you must think "which is better?" When you eat two or three, it looks like very easy. But when you have to continue to eat through and through until you finished everything, it is not so easy.

Anyway, you will attain enlightenment, like if you-you-if you eat fruits, you know, continue to eat fruits, you will finish, you know, all the fruits. Then after you finish it, there is no problem. When you finish it-before you finish it, you think, you know-you compare which way will be better and you will wonder sometime which way will be better. But if you finish it, you know, what you should do is-what you will know what you have been doing. And if it was not good way and difficult way or it was very difficult way, we should-I shouldn't do in this way. Better to do the worst one first for sake of everyone. That is much easier way.

So, enlightenment you will have after you finish fruits. You will en-[partial word: "enlightened"?]-you will be enlightened about what is bad [laughs]. And, on the contrary, the people who eat the worst one first, after you finish it, what you will realize is-you realize your enlightenment is over something good-what is good. But when the-the enlightenment itself does not different-is not different: same-same enlightenment. When you realize what is bad, and you will realize at the same time what is good-you will-you-when you know what is bad. Naturally you will know what is good. And if you know what is good, then you will know what is bad and what will be the way to follow the truth. To follow the truth is something good. And if you do not follow the truth, that is bad. Anyway, what you will realize is about the truth, and you will realize that it's the truth.

Same thing-could be same thing, but actually, self-centered practice does not last long. You will have time to give up self-centered practice. If-if you could continue that kind of bad practice through and through, that is-it means that you are bodhisattva [laughs]. You are bodhisattva. Unless you are bodhisattva, you cannot continue. So unless you are bodhisattva, or you do not follow Buddhist practice, it is not possible to realize what is true [truth?]. So whatever the practice may be, the practice which is self-centered is not Buddhist practice. Buddhist practice is how to reduce our self-centered practice. How much you can, you know, develop your buddha-mind is the point.

In short, we should op- [partial word]-we should be aware of is-the point we should be aware of is to put first principle first and second principle next. And put the big self first and small self next. So-and try to extend the big self always. That is the point of practice.

So Buddhist practice is called practice of selflessness-selflessness. Whether you are layman or monk, our practice should not be self-centered practice. And usually I think-I think layman is suppo- [partial word: "supposed"?]-layman who is supposed to be very self-centered. Actually, he is not so selfish. But priests are very selfish [laughs]. I-I understand in that way. Generally speaking, it is so. Material-materially, you know, [from a] material viewpoint-materialistic viewpoint, a priest usually are very poor; and their-their life looks like [it is] very unselfish. But from spiritual viewpoint, priests are very selfish. You know, priests may dream always [3-4 words unclear due to microphone noise]. This is Dogen-zenji, Shogaku [?]. Listen carefully [laughs] and often and literally speak about him. Explain it [?]. And if you don't, you know, in that way, even though I do not understand him [it?] fully, if I have a book, then you trust me-you trust us. We cling to something, some teaching, and because Buddha said-because Dogen-zenji said "this is right," that is, you know, big selfish way.

But laymen do not do that. Laymen may say "I don't know [laughs]. I don't know which is true. I don't know what to do." They are very honest. But priests are not so honest. And they think as if they know many things, but actually they do not know so much. They look character [?]. They can be priest role [?]. But actually, they do not understand so much.

And they feel as if they have a lot of treasure. And they usually-they study treasure. They want to accumulate treasures in their own-in their mind. And they-they are happy to count the treasure they have: "How much book I do? How much understanding, you know, I have?" But actually, why do they study so much is to talk about it, to be proud of the knowledge we have-priest have. So, spiritually, usually, priests are more selfish-more self-centered practice-involved in more self-centered practice.

But both-both-both priests and laymen--the most important point is to develop our buddha-mind instead of small self. Know-you know-it is not so difficult to know what is small self and what is big self. If you know that, you should try hard to develop the big self. That is our practice. Until you can intuitively choose the right path, we should continue our practice.

I'm right now-I'm talking about our actual-actual practice as a Buddhist. But we have at the same time many buddhas and patriarchs who attained enlightenment, who finished-who has finished eating everything in the basket-from the basket. They tried very hard, and they finished eating. Those are the patriarchs. Some patriarchs, you know, like the Sixth Patriarch, tried to eat something good as a layman for a long, long time and realized that this was not right path and switched over his path to Buddhist way. Maybe he attained enlightenment when he was a layman. Looks like so-I'm not so sure-it looks like so. But what he realized was this is not right path. That is enlightenment. And he followed Buddha's way.

And after he started to follow Buddha's, way it took many years before he started to preach-to share his enlightenment with people. After he received transmission from the Fifth Patriarch, he escaped from the monastery and [laughs]-and lived with fisherman. And for a long time, no one knows where he had gone. What he was doing at that time was-he was trying to digest his enlightenment or trying to extend his enlightenment to our everyday life-to his everyday life. And he was trying to, you know, express his enlightenment in his everyday activity: way he speaks, way he treat things, or way he treat people. It-it took pretty long time before he could do so.

You may wonder why, you know, you are staying at Tassajara and practicing zazen. It is, you know, that it is to digest the knowledge or experience-zazen experience? To completely and to extend your realization to your everyday life. The rules we follow is set up so that you can extend the Buddhist way of life in usual, everyday life: the way you eat here, the way you recite sutra, is how to extend your realization to your everyday activity. Even though you feel [it is] difficult, actually more and more you will digest [?]. And eventually what you will do will help people even though you do not try to help people. This is very important point in our practice.

When you come to this point, there is no buddha, or there is no layman, there is no priest, there is no teaching. Because you have it, nothing special exist. And you are actually always one with people, one with your friend, one with your buddha. When you, you know, when you could extend your practice fully in your everyday life. So when we say "No Buddha"-sometime Zen master may say "No Buddha [laughs]. Kill Buddha." What does it mean? What it means is to be completely one with Buddha. Doesn't need Buddha any more. He himself is Buddha. How you, you know, attain this kind of attainment is through your practice.

At first, you know, when you fear Buddhism, it looks like there are many precepts to observe; there is many rules to follow; there are many buddhas to worship. It looks like so. But if you worship Buddha, according to Buddhist way, more and more, you yourself will become Buddha and you don't need Buddha. You don't feel you need Buddha. Whenever you come to Buddha, naturally you will bow to Buddha without trying to anything. That is not-that is more than worship. Just bow to Buddha.

When I was young, I didn't like bow, you know. Teachers or monks just bow to Buddha. It look like without any speech [feet?] [laughs] they are doing. It looks like very superficial practice. If you do very visibly, you know, it looks like you-he is doing it if he is fall asleep [?]. But if you-if your back [?] like this, you know, as if he-your front [?] is doing something [laughs, laughter]. You will not feel so good. You will not- And you think that is very superficial practice, that is just habit. And some people may think, you know, especially young [one word unclear] may think that is, you know, a kind of profligate-profligacy. But there is, you know-it looks like so, but after long, long time-difficult practice, you will attain that kind of practice. You will have that kind of practice, but natural, usual practice for you.

So we have to have eyes to see whether-which practice is progressive [?] or sincere, good practice-mature, good practice. It is not so-actually, if you do not have self-selfish criticism or positive [?], it is not difficult to tell which is which. But when you are young, you know, most-we-we hate that kind of authority [?]. And we hate too much and we-we have no chance to see which is real practice. We do not see things actually as it is, as a small children may do. That is why sometime you do not like some formal practice. But formal practice, so-called-it formal practice, and mature, good practice-between them there is big difference. You can tell quite easily because you like, you know, even though you don't like someone who looks like chocolate, but you cannot hate him [laughs]. You will like him anyway because his practice is pure and natural practice.

Even though I understand why you do not like traditional religion from inside Christianity. I understand how you feel; but the feeling you have-if the feeling you have comes from your self-centered-strong self-centered criticism, then you must think more about what you say and how you understand and how you see. So before you say something, before, even before you feel something, you should think, you know, you reflect on yourself. That is zazen practice. Your mind should be very clear so that you can see things as they are. Without practice, if you say something it may be one-sided view. It may be very self-centered statement-feeling. Always what we should do is to extend our buddha-mind.

When you find right teacher, so you are-it is-anyway, important point is to make your mind clear. [Sentence finished. Tape turned.]

I think you must have understood outline of our practice. If you have some questions, please ask-ask me them. Hai.

Student A: When you do the [middle of question unclear] unconscious?

Suzuki-roshi: Unconscious-or what? Excuse me.

Student A: [Repeats question. Many words unclear.] Well say-say, for example, say for example you have a basket of fruit ... very last piece, and I think, well instead of ... I'll take ... fruit next week. And I think, "Oh, how good I am! You know, "I'm so unselfish! You left the last fruit." And then I think because I'm being like a-well, because I'm thinking I won't take this fruit, then ... you know, something special like that.

Suzuki-roshi: That is selfish thought. That is not the practice I mean. When- When- When I was young, my teacher [Gyokujun So-on?] would say, "If you," you know, "do not waste-if you are not wasteful-if you are wasteful, so wasteful, eventually you are," you know, "you will exhaust your practice [purpose?]" you know, "special practice." So you shouldn't be wasteful. Or-if you-you must accumulate virtue, you know, accumulate virtue by doing good things. Then you will have-eventually you will have-you will be a good person or a good priest or something.

That is a kind of selfish practice, you know, to accumulate virtue. Like you save money [laughs]-that is selfish practice. And knowing this practice is good, to do something good, you know, something which is different from usual practice and feel good is actually very selfish practice. We should go beyond that kind of idea of practice. And you should do something good. It takes- Unless you continue that kind of practice, you will not realize, you will not have real unselfish practice. It took you almost maybe six months to go beyond selfish practice.

I have spend- When I was in dormitory, I would get up forty minutes before my friends get up and clean the restroom-our restroom-to make them happy, that's all. But why I do it-why I'm doing some selfish, you know [laughs]-I am involved in selfish practice, and I feel very bad, and I almost stopped my practice because I felt very bad because sometime head of the school-head of the school get up because he was old man-an old man, so he closed the restroom [laughs] before we get up. So when he get up-when I hear him coming to the restroom, I hide myself [laughs]. It is a ridiculous practice, you know (laughs, laughter). I didn't know what I had-what I was doing, you know. Very complicated feeling. When I'm doing something right, you know, there is no need to hide myself. If I do not hide myself, I feel as if, you know, he may like me or something like that. That is also selfish practice.

It is very difficult to escape from selfish practice. Even though you are doing something for the people [laughs], still it is not possible to escape from selfish practice until you give up, you know, your practice and switch over [to] Buddha's practice. Because you do it, you feel selfish practice. But if Buddha did it, then that is not selfish practice. Whether head of the schools see me or not doesn't matter-only Buddha [laughs]-Buddha's practice. Until you have that kind of clear mind, it takes time [?].

Anyway, you know, you cannot have good practice from the beginning. You may ask me how to practice unselfish practice, but I cannot tell you exactly. I cannot help you so much unless you confront with your problem of small self. You see? So anyway, you know, if you try to do something, if you feel good, [you have] some bad feeling first always, because you are involved in selfish practice, and that is your fault [laughs]. So you must have big, you know, confidence. You must have big determination to do-to start Buddha's practice. And you shouldn't stop it, you know-anyway you should go-go on and on and on until you finish your trip. You will have time to reflect on what you have been doing heart and soul [?]. It was good or it was bad. You may say from bottom of your heart. So-so you should [?] depend on another, you know, fix-it [?]. You should go your own way. Okay? Some other question? Hai.

Student B: Is it possible to know when you've finished the fruit or do you just pretend [?]?

Suzuki-roshi: Possible to-Student B: Is it possible for [3-4 words unclear] ... finished eating the fruit, or do you just pretend that there ... [4-8 words unclear].

Suzuki-roshi: We say so, you know, one with something-become one with practice. We usually say so. But actually it is-you can say so, but you-you should not say, "I can do it," you know. "I become one with the practice." That is very [laughs]- Mostly [?], you know, we-we cannot do that. We will be involved in dualistic feeling, anyway. So when we-when we say, "One with everything," it is-it is so-from Buddha's viewpoint it is so. When you have complete enlightenment it is so. [Laughs.] But for us it is not so, actually.

That is why we should follow some path. It is necessary, you know, for us to have to have some guideline, you know, some rules or something. Or else you-it is almost impossible to have clear practice. It is much better to follow some rule rather than to, you know, to go your-by your own feeling. If you go by your fee- [partial word: "feeling"?]-by your own way or by your own choice, you will be involved in very selfish practice. It doesn't work. But if you are very, you know, special person, before you go very far, you will realize [laughs], "Oh, no, this is not good!" [Laughs.]

But here in America, you know, the people who goes in his own way will be admired. [Laughs.] That is another difficulty you have. But it is very silly of you, you know, to do something because people may admire you. It is your practice, not their practice; so you should be very independent. [Laughs.] But there are, they may say, you know, you should go your own way. Your own way is, you know, when you-the way you feel good. That is very clear.

-----

Source: Transcribed from original tape by Jeffrey Schneider (8/6/99) and checked against tape by Bill Redican (8/23/99).

9 - Blue Cliff Record #61

Monday, July 26, 1971

Fuketsu's "One Particle Of Dust" (Blue Cliff Record #61)
Tassajara

[ENGO'S INTRODUCTION

Setting up the Dharma banner and establishing the Dharma teaching-such is the task of the teacher of profound attainment. Distinguishing a dragon from a snake, black from white-that is what the mature master must do. Now let us put aside for a moment how to wield the life-giving sword and the death-dealing blade, and how to administer blows with the stick: tell me, what does the one who lords it over the universe say? See the following.

MAIN SUBJECT

Fuketsu said to the assembled monks, "If one particle of dust is raised, the state will come into being; if no particle of dust is raised, the state will perish."

Setcho [at a later time], holding up his staff, said to his disciples, "Is there anyone among you who will live with him and die with him?"

SETCHO'S VERSE

Let the elders knit their brows as they will;

For the moment, let the state be established.

Where are the wise statesmen, the veteran generals?

The cool breeze blows; I nod to myself.][1]

Last night[2] I talked about our practice as a Zen Buddhist. Whether you are layman or monk, there is some important point which we should make clear. The point was to put more emphasis on big mind rather than small mind. That is the point we should make clear in our practice. In this way, more and more, you will develop your buddha-mind, which is buddha-mi- [partial word]-big mind.

And when you have big mind, when you are involved in some practice, experiencing big mind or expressing the big mind, at first you will feel you are developing big mind. And you feel you have big mind, and you developed your big mind to everything: to your friend, to your food, to your household, or to your monastery. But actually, if you continue to practice, developing the big mind, you eventually do not feel as if you have big mind or you are developing big mind. That is so-called-it "no-mind."

Big mind is, you know, something big, in contrast to the small mind. So it is not real big mind. No-mind is actually the great mind. Same thing will be true for our Tassajara institute or Zen Center. Why we have Zen Center is to develop our big mind, so that we can develop our big mind we have Zen Center. So that we can continue to practice our way and develop our way, we have Zen Center. But if you have the idea of Zen Center too much as an organization-institute, that is still [laughs], you know, something wrong with it. This point should be, at the same time, carefully examined. We should know what we are doing here or in the city zendo.

Here is a koan or Zen story which was told by Fuketsu Ensho[3] who-three or four-fourth generation of Rinzai.[4] And on some occasion, maybe, he mounted-he mounted on the altar and told the students-here is my translation for it: "If you pick up one dust, nation will become prosperous. If you pick up one dust, nation will become prosperous. If you don't, nothing will happen." That is first part [of Case 61]. That is what Fuketsu Ensho said when he mounted on the altar.

And to this, Setcho said-says, taking up one staff. You know, staff is long stick. And Setcho said: "Is there anyone who would go through birth and death with you? Is there anyone who would go through birth and death with you?" And that is the whole story.

Fuketsu said, "If you pick up a speck of dust, nation will become prosperous. If you do not, nothing will happen." That is what Fuketsu Ensho said. Later after Fuketsu died, Setcho-zenji said, taking up his staff: "Is there anyone who would go through birth and death with you? Is there anyone who would go [through] birth and death with you?" That is Setcho, you know, what Setcho said. And there is appreciatory word by same Zen Master Setcho. But I want to explain the first part first.

"If you pick up a dust": What it means-"pick up a dust," means, you know, to do-to do something like to start some monastery or to start some Zen group in everywhere-in somewhere. That is to pick up, actually-what he meant is to have some group or to start some zendo. That is to-but actually, he didn't say so. Just to pick up a dust.

In the great universe, you know, or in great buddha-land, to start zendo is just [laughing] like to pick up a dust, you know. Not so big thing. Even though it is very small thing, you know, but if you don't [do it], nothing will happen. But he says nation will be prosperous. "Nation," he says; but it means "Buddha," or "Zen members," or "Zen students will become prosperous" [laughs]. Many Zen Center students come to Zen Center, for an instance, or come to-go to some other center.

But is this, you know, something very meaningful thing or not? We-we should think about nation become prosperous, or Zen students become prosperous. Is this good thing or bad thing? If something good happens, something bad will happen at the same time. Most likely of one good thing happens, and five or ten or more than [laughs] twenty bad things will happen. So we should think, whether to pick up one dust, to establish something is good thing or bad thing. But if you don't, nothing will happen [laughs]. This is also true. What will you do? Will you pick up one dust or you don't pick up any dust? Leave everything as it is without saying anything?

How many people are suffering? "What is the matter? Let them suffer. Let them go [in the] wrong direction. That is not our problem. Let it go as they go. You-I will not, you know, do anything with you." That is,

"We will not pick up, do, or pick up any dust." But if you want to do something with them, or if you want to help them, at the same time many bad things will follow [laughs]. This is very interesting but very real.

As Dogen-zenji said, "If you-if, because, you-everything is buddha. So, there is enlightenment and defilement, birth and death, Buddha and sentient beings." If you pick up one thing there is birth and death, enlightenment and delusion, and Buddha and sentient beings. And good-something good and something bad. Even though your speech is good, many things will happen just because you picked up one thing. If you say do anything, don't do anything, nothing will happen. But because we do something many things will follow. That is actual fact. So we call it Genjo Koan.[5] That is our koan to solve-actual koan we have.

If you don't pick up anything, it means that if you think-if you understand what is the real teaching of Buddhism, it means what is the purpose of Buddhism. Purpose of Buddhism is not to establish Buddha's teaching, Buddha's groups, but to help people. And to help people going their own way. But because-just because they are not follow their own way. So Buddha gives them some warning: "If you do-if you do not follow the right path, you will be lost." That is only reason why Buddha left his teaching for human being. So he doesn't want to pick up anything. Or there is no need to pick up anything if all sentient beings follow right path. But, you know, most people or some Buddhist will make big mistake. They try to establish something for sake of Buddhism in its wide sense-small, narrow sense. Then that is big mistake

The real purpose of Buddhism is to bring about the time when we do not need Buddha's teaching, when we do not need Zen Center or anything. Without teacher, without Buddhist teacher, we can follow our own way. That is best. That is the goal of Buddhism. The goal of Buddhism is to bring about the life-human life where there is no Buddhism. So not to pick up anything or to bring about a human life where there is no need to pick up anything is why we make our effort.

And personally, because we always try to pick up something and to establish something in its small sense is small mind. That is why, you know-that is why the more we make effort, the more we have trouble [laughs]. That's very silly, you know-about-if we establish something just to have more trouble [laughs], it doesn't make sense.

So, as I said last night, the most important point of our practice is always trying to do something with big mind, not by small mind. If you-when you do something with big mind, if there is no need to do it, you will not do it. Only when you have to do it you will do it. That is big mind.

And Setcho's appreciative word for that is: "Old men may not release [relax] his eyebrows as they might have otherwise." [Laughs.] Old men may not release his eyebrows as they might have otherwise." "Release eyebrows" means, you know, to make faces. Old men [laughs]. "Old men" means-wears [words?], you know, blank [blame?] Zen masters-good Zen masters. They would, you know, they will make face: "Ah! Silly boys [laughs] to start Zen Center at Tassajara. Oh, silly boys! [Laughs. laughter.] They shouldn't do that." The old-old [2 words unclear], Zen masters may say so, you know. Isn't that interesting [?]. [Laughter.] As they might have otherwise [laughs]. If we do not start Zen Center, they will not make face. They-they will release their eyebrow. They will-they may feel good.

That is Setcho's appreciative word. And-and he says: "Tentatively, I will establish the foundation for the nation, but-even though old men may make face, you know. But tentatively, I must say 'Excuse me,' you know, 'My fault. Excuse me. Right now, under this situation, we must do something for-for people. So excuse me,'" you know. "So tentatively I will establish the foundation for the nation. But tactful generals and great shogunate, where are they now? But someday, the day [will] come when we do not need any tactful generals or great shogunate-powerful people. Someday, we will have the time when we don't need any Zen master, or tactful, you know, priest-or priest of great power-someday. But at that time, to have that kind of-to bring about that kind of peacefulness for people, tentatively, you know, we make some foundation. We will pick up a dust."

[Opens a page.]

Think about this Genjo Koan. It is actual fact, you know-[laughing] more than real, you know, koan for us. We are exactly the same thing at Tassajara. We already picked up something. But when Zen master would make face [laughs]-knowing that, we dare-we have to pick up something here.

So again, it is good to fulfill your responsibility in Zen Center and to help Zen Center establish-to help establishing Zen Center, it is good, of course. But if you have slight idea of self in it, if you are involved in small selfish idea, then you cannot see Buddha-Buddha's face again. It is not vision [visible?] any more.

If you want to stay at Zen Center, you will sit-extend your practice with big mind, not small mind. You shouldn't have funny [any?] kind of self-centered idea because whatever you do, whether it is good or bad, what you will do with big mind is Buddha's activity, whether it is good or bad. But if you do it with small mind, that is delusion. That is not Buddha's activity any more. It is demon's activity [laughs], not Buddha's activity. It is [1-3 words unclear].

If you are trying to extend or trying to express your big mind in its true sense in your practice and help Zen Center, even [though] that is not the first principle, Buddha allow us to do it. And if the purpose of establishing something is [to be] ready to go forget all about Zen Center, then we do not need Zen Center-then people will not need Zen Center,

If you like Zen Center too much, you will usually involved in some-a kind of self-centered idea. To think about only to yourself is self-centered idea, of course; but to think about only Zen Center is a kind of small mind-even it is-even Zen Center is a dust-can be a dust-a small dust in comparison to big buddha-land. It is just a speck of dust. But if something [is] a speck of dust, like something like something as small as a speck of dust appears, we will be already dust [?].

As Dogen-zenji says in his "Fukan-zazengi": [6] "If your," you know, "if your purpose of zazen miss the point going [gesturing?], you know, a little bit, you know, then the difference will be heaven and earth." Our zazen doesn't make any sense. Or in our mind, even the slightest taint [?] appears when you lose our way. It is- You will- They will be back. The point is what kind of interest you have in our Zen Center activity is the point. You should not seek [see?] intensively [?] something personal. But you should be ready to give up Zen Center when it is not necessary.

I don't think we can dream about such a peaceful time where is no need to have Buddha's teaching. I don't know when. But we should be ready to resign from Zen Center when, you know, you are not necessary. But, you know, I don't know [laughing] when I can say, you may resign from Zen Center. I cannot say [laughs] so easily. But each one of us should be ready for that.

That is-and we should not be proud of our faculties, or tactfulness, or, you know, bright smart mind, or your good practice. That is also enemy of Buddhism. You should not pursue Buddhist way for sake of fame or personal interest. We should not seek for some advantage in our everyday life. Usually, Buddha's teaching-actually, why we study Buddhism is to have enough courage to do something with it, to do something people will thank you for [preceding 5 words unclear]. Whether people like you [to] do something or not, if it is necessary to do, you should do it.

So it means you pick up some dust [laughs]. People may-even smallest piece of dust- Dust is dust; people may not like it. But if it is-if you think it is necessary, you should do it. That is, you know, our spirit. And we do not do it because people admire you, because you will live good successful life in future. Knowing that what we are doing is not always necessary or not necessary forever. It-it is just tentative good means to help people. Knowing this, to make the best effort in our everyday life is actually Buddhist practice.

So the big mind is-you should extend-the way to extend our big mind is limitlessly big. Actually there is no limit. So we say we establish Buddha's way with defilement-in defilement. Whatever we do, it is delusion-delusion [tapping on lectern or table]. Knowing that this is delusion, to do something, to pick up a dust is bodhisattva's way and at the same time Buddhist way. So we do not expect anything in doing something, because we know what we are doing is not always necessary. Right now it is necessary, but tomorrow we don't know.

We will be very happy if people do not want us [?] [laughs]. We will be very happy. That is real big mind. We wear robes. Why we wear robes, maybe, in short, to take off robes we wear robes. Unless you put on your robe, you have no time to take off [laughs]. If you do not wear robe from the beginning, that also does not make sense. You are not, you know-nothing to do with human life if you do not wear priest robe, Buddhist robe. We must have wear it as we must have pick up [taps], you know, a dust. Even it is dust you must pick up [taps]. So if it is Buddha's robe, you know, there is no reason why we do not wear it.

But Buddha's robe is formless robe. So any time you can take [it] off. When time come and all the sentient beings become buddha, then you can take off the robe. Then your robe makes sense. If you wear it in some idea to keep, you know, wearing it forever as it is, you know, Buddha's robe, that kind of idea doesn't make any sense.

Our practice look-looks like very rigid, very formal. But why we observe such a rigid, formal practice is to acquire the absolute freedom. Until we have great freedom for human beings and should continue our rigid practice. You may say it might be better not to [be] involved in [laughs] such a rigid practice, you know. "It is out of question," if you say so. "I have no time to discuss about Buddhism with such a people." They do not know the Genjo Koan, the koan of our everyday life. They do not-do not know what is our life.

Day after day, moment after moment, we are creating bad karma. I have to accept it. Even [at] Tassajara we ate eggs-eggs, you know. It is living being. Eggs are not dead. Even though you eat grain, that is living being. You are killing them. But you have to eat it, knowing that it is not dead. Because of the big mind we have to do it. Because we do not-we choose big mind rather than small mind to discriminate: "This is good or bad." Whether we are following Buddha's precepts or not, that is, you know-small mind say-say so-but big mind will accept things as it is. If we have to, we will do anything. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.] ... koan.

So whatever it is, according to Dogen-zenji, it is koan-big koan. And he carefully set up great koan of reality, a great koan of our life. He set up a great, you know, stage for human being. Whatever you do on the stage, that is a big story [?]-Buddha's act which will continue forever. And whatever it is, from Dogen's viewpoint it makes sense. If you have good understanding of the great koan, whatever you do it makes sense. But only when you are involved in small mind, it doesn't make sense.

You cannot stay on the stage of the great koan. You are not alive anymore. Just corpse is [laughs] moving; but real human being is not there. That is actually Dogen-zenji's great koan. [Folds up paper.]

So starting from the practice of big mind, the practice, you know, will be developed in our group activity, like Zen Center or like Buddha's sangha. And we will show the good example to the other group when we really follow Buddha's path and when we really-the meaning of life, meaning of what we are doing every day.

In short, we shouldn't be bothered by-we shouldn't be bothered by so much about: "This is good or bad"-the idea of this is good or bad. But we should-we should be concerned about your real practice, whether your practice is sincere practice or not, whether your practice is supported by big mind or not. This is the most important point.

And actually, if you have this kind of practice, your mind will have constant and peaceful. Because you are involved in small mind, sometime you will be discouraged; sometime you will be in ecstasy. After this ecstasy, discouragement will come. No calmness in it; no constancy in your practice. When you continue your practice with calmness of your mind, and with constant effort, appreciating, you know, the feeling of constancy, like, you know, like tai chi or big wave in the ocean goes up and down constantly, sometime high, sometime low. But it has good feeling. It is not like this [gestures?]. But sometime we like some-something [laughs] to go this way, and [laughs] we don't like to go immediately down, but to go this way is pretty good [laughs, laughter].

But we know that after some excitement, some discouragement will follow. So if you know how important it is to have big constant mind, and if you enjoy the constant effort you make, like a cow [laughs]. Even though I al- [partial word] am going to-to be killed, cow may go like this [gestures?] [laughs]. He doesn't afraid of anything. To the last moment he will continue [laughs] that kind of practice because he has big mind. That kind of mind will keep you always young and happy. If you are interested in something, you know, j- [partial word] some junky [?] life [laughs]-up and down, then you will be tired out and you will lose your spirit quite easily and you will become old.

So you shouldn't mind what will happen in the future so much. But we should worry about this moment-what you are doing. Whether you are happy or not happy is the most important point. If you are doing-if you are following right path, then the quality of your life doesn't different from the quality of Buddha's life. Of course, there is some difference in its bigness or in its loftiness [?] or in its maturity-there is difference; but the quality of the practice is the same. Like whether it is big or light, big or small-the flame is flame, you know, even though you may be small, you know; even though I feel cooler [?] in this way [laughter], flame is flame. Same quality. So our practice may not be so good, but the quality of the practice is the same.

And we find we are supported by big mind only when we do not lose our way in small mind, small practice. That is actually Dogen-zenji's Genjo koan-big scale-koan of big scale where anything can be koan and where everyone has great freedom from-usual small activity.

That is again, you know, if I- So the goal of practice again is-again: Mountain is high and river is flowing-that is goal of practice. Where there is no teaching or teacher or sentient beings-that is the goal of practice. Where there is nothing to stick to [laughs, laughter]-you cannot do anything with it, you know, when we say soon [?] [laughs], even though you say "Stop it!" [?] [Microphone appears to have been knocked over. Entire sentence unclear. Parts of following sentences unclear also.] You cannot do anything. Even though you say "Don't!" [3-4 words] next year [2 words]" [laughs], don't do anything. That is the goal of our teaching-where there is no Buddhism and no Buddha.

So we say [2-3 words unclear] as they should, like this. But again, if you think without any training you will have that kind of life, that is great mistake. You do not know what you are doing. When you say you don't need Buddhism, then you are a great fool or you are very selfish person [laughs]. Don't you think so? Maybe, you know, great fool-to be a great fool is better than to be selfish person.

Even though Buddha say same thing, you know, but what Buddha meant and what you mean is-there is great difference-the difference between Buddha's word and your freedom. Don't know what to say-it is out of [beyond?] comparison. You say "freedom" and "nature," but you don't understand what is freedom and what is nature. You say "nature," but your understanding of nature is not true nature. It is something very unnatural nature [laughs], home-made nature [laughs], provided in your kitchen [laughs]. That is nature-looks like nature, but it is not truly nature.

True nature may be, you know, nature which will ignore-almost ignore all living sentient beings. Human being will be ignored, easily be ignored from big great nature. Whether we exist in this earth or not-it is not big problem. Maybe big problem if you realize what is nature; it is actually big problem. But someone who says, you know, whatever you do, that is to follow your nature, and that is freedom-then, with same way, you will be ignored from the sun, from various stars in the space. In the same way you will be ignored.

If you realize that you cannot be ignored from the universe even though you are small, then you realize who you are. And at the same time, you realize that because of some truth being supported by truth you are-you are alive. As long as you are support by some truth you cannot be free. Should follow some truth.

Ahhh. Thank you. Thank you very much.

-----
Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997.
Verbatim transcript checked against tape by Jeffrey Schneider (8/20/99) and Bill Redican (11/17/00).

[1] Quoted from Hekiganroku [The Blue Cliff Record], Case 61, from Katsuki Sekida, trans., Two Zen Classics: Mumonkon and Hekiganroku
(New York, Weatherhill, 1977), p. 314.

[2] SR-71-07-25V.

[3] Feng-hsüeh Yen-chao (Fuketsu Ensho): 896-973. Chinese Rinzai master.

[4] Rinzai Gigen à Koke Zonsho à Nanin Egyo à Fuiketsu Ensho.

[5] "Actualizing the Fundamental Point," a fascicle of Dogen's Shobogenzo.

[6] Dogen-zenji: "If there is a thousandth or a hundredth of a gap, the separation is as great as that between heaven and earth; and if a trace of disagreement arises, we lose the mind in confusion. "Fukan-zazengi (Rufu-bon)," in Shobogenzo, Nishijima and Cross, ed., 1994, p. 279.

10 - Ryaku Fusatsu Lecture

Thursday, July 29, 1971

Ryaku Fusatsu Lecture
Zen Mountain Center

As you know, at Tassajara Ryaku Fusatsu-Ryaku Fusatsu[1] may be observed as we observe it at Eihei-ji. I want to talk about Ryaku Fusatsu tonight and maybe tomorrow night, if I have time. I want to continue the spirit of practice of Ryaku Fusatsu.

Ryaku Fusatsu is one of the most interesting practices at Eihei-ji. I haven't, since I left Eihei-ji it is almost thirty-seven-or seven-maybe almost forty years [laughs]-so-but still, I have the impression now-a feeling of, you know, observing Ryaku Fusatsu.

And the history of Ryaku Fusatsu is very long, even before Buddha. In India, there were same kind of observation. And in Japan too we have still very primitive, you know, custom or annual ceremony or observation in some part of Japan.

In Japan, as I remember, January 14th is the day when we gather the old memorial tablets or old symbols of shrine. And childrens or boys go something holy-some equipment we need to observe something holy. And when it is very smoky, you know, because at that time we burn-we burned firewood, kerosene lamps, or things in [throughout] one year. Things become very dusty and smoky. [Aside:] Smoky? Smoky? No.

And so in January-of course, New Year's Day, we renew all the decorations, so old ones we carry old ones to the shrine, which is always waiting for those things. Old, old small shrines, or just stone-not [2-3 words] but stone deity called-called a doso-jin.[2] Most of the days we do not know even there is doso-jin. But on New Year's Day, or from New Year's Day to January 14th, old-old symbols and ornaments will be there. People, you know, take-take them to the old shrines.

So at that time, we realize that, "Oh, here is shrine." On January 14th [3] we make pretty big shrine, maybe six feet high, with straw. And when it is dark, we set fire on it and burn it. And people-children come with rice, rice balls. Rice ball is made on New Year's Day and it is-we put it-we put it on the branches of the tree-a kind of tree-and we decorate it in front of altar. And on January 14th, children take all the small rice balls dango-dango, and bake it-bake it in that-in that fire we made by the old decoration. Some people knows why we do and some don't.

My mother told me the story of why we do. All the year round, you know, doso-jin-that god go-lived in various part of the village, and [knows] who observe good precepts and who don't. He has-he is supposed to keep the record, as ino also does [laughs], in Tassajara zendo or City zendo [laughing]: who attend zazen and how many times someone didn't come. He has that kind of responsibility. So he is supposed to have all the records, and on January 15th is the day when that-you know, when some god come and check the-his note. And when someone didn't observe, you know, maybe evil deity come-evil spirit come and check the record. And if someone didn't observe good precepts, then that evil spirit will visit his home [laughs].

That was the idea, but doso-jin is very good deity-good god. So before he come he burned, you know, the records. And he may say: "Yesterday evening we had a big fire [laughs], so I have no more records. It was burned away, so I haven't-I am sorry," he may say. So wherever the evil spirits goes, many deities, you know, will say "doso-jin," they say. And "I'm sorry. We have big fire, and we have no records. So [laughs] I am sorry. Next year I will be very careful. Please come next year." [Laughs.] So evil spirits doesn't know where to go, so all the villagers-villagers will be protected from the evil spirit. That is the story.

That kind of, you know, story-legendary stories-were also in India. That story came from India to Japan, and in some part of Japan we are still observing it. It-fourteenth is the, you know, fourteenth some days-sometime fourteenth-sometime the fifteenth; it is according to the moon, you know. Full moon will be sometime fourteenth and sometime fifteenth. Before full moon it is-we call it white-white days, white nights, and after full moon we call it black-black days. Moon is, you know, more and more become black.

Eighth-eighth or fourteenth, fifteenth is the day we observe precepts. Laymen observe the eight precepts, which is-the eight precepts is the same precepts priests observe, but on those days, eighth and fourteenth and fifteenth, is the day lay-layman observe same precepts as priest observe, or Buddha's direct disciple observe. Those precepts are called hachisai-kai. Hachi-hachi-"eight." Sai is-sai means "same"-sai, you know. If this shoulder and this shoulder is, you know-this shoulder and this shoulder is same-sai. Very balanced, hachi-sai-kai. Hachisai-kai. Why we call sai means-sai means "equal," like your left-hand shoulder and right-hand shoulder is equal. Sai means "equal."

So on that day-fourteenth, or eighth or fourteenth or fifteenth-is the day when laymen and monks observe same precepts. Kai is "precepts." Hachi is "eight." And the rokusai,[4] rokusai is-rokusai, it was six-sai-mmm-it is rather complicated.

Sai in America-we use it with precepts-sankai, saikai [?]-so sai is more and more changed-its meaning changed. And sai later, you know, meant-or nowadays means "pure," but original meaning is "same."

We have rokusai. Rokusai is-before fifteenth we have three days, after fifteenth we have three days. So we have six days to observe pure precepts. And in those six days we observe hachisai-kai-eight pure precepts, which is equivalent to arhat precepts, or Buddha's disciples' precepts. And eight precepts-four precepts of eight-eight precepts is the nature of precepts, and other precepts is prohibitory precepts.

In Mahayana precepts, we put emphasis on nature of precepts. But in Hinayana or Theravada, they put emphasis on prohibitory precepts. Before Buddha, it is some-something-some observation to keep themselves from evil spirit by doing something good. Dana precepts was the very old precepts, both for Buddhist and pre-Buddhist people. Dana precepts. If you observe dana precepts, you will be born in some good land after you die-after you die. That is why they observed dana precepts before Buddha. And why Buddhists observe dana precepts is different: not for to have good future life, but to accomplish buddhahood in this life. That is Buddhist way of-or spirit of observing precepts and dana precepts.

Anyway, this kind of observation of-by observation of the precepts, they-before Buddha, they tried to keep themselves from evil spirits, to protect themselves from evil spirits. After Buddha, they also gathered laymen and monks and Buddha's precepts stick [?] together, and recited precepts, Buddha precepts. And those who did not-those who failed to observe the precepts may-may make confession of it. And those who do not say anything is the people who are supposed to observe the precepts. In that way, they recited precepts.

So the most important part of the Fusatsu ceremony is to recite Bommo-kyo,[5] the precepts, you know. Bommo-kyo is the Mahayana-about Mahayana precepts. And when, for an instance, I recite those precepts, you should think about, you know, what you did. And if you didn't observe good precepts, you should say, "I didn't. I am sorry." Then, you know, by the power of confession, you-your-your bad karma will-will be weaker. In that way, to purify our mind and to keep Buddha's way, we will observe Fusatsu. Fusatsu is-fusa-fusa-fusa-da-fu-fu-fusa or [1 word] means to do something good-do something good-to increase good or positive side. Da is to stop-to stop doing bad.

Nature of precepts is to encourage good practice and to stop evil desire, or to-to continue good practice, good precept observation, and to put an end to bad delu- [partial word] deluded observation. That is the idea of precepts. Fusa-fusa-da-fusa: "to do something." Something we have. To continue something good, and to stop something good, something bad, or to stop something bad karma arise. That is the meaning of stop. Fusa-fusatsu. In that way, Buddhists have been observed Fusatsu.

Fusatsu is in Japanese or maybe in Chinese too, but it is-characterdoesn't mean anything, but it is transliteration of "posadha"-Sanskrit. So with this spirit, we should observe Fusatsu. And when your everyday practice is good-when you observe, you know, this Fusatsu, you-you feel real spirit of zendo. Fusatsu.

And Ryaku Fusatsu-Ryaku means "abbreviated observation," not full observation, because we have so many precepts, you know, and so many scriptures. So if we, you know, read all of it, it takes long, long time.

So we, in Japan or in China, instead of observing six times a month, we just observe fifteenth and the last day of the month. And the things we-we-Mahayana school of Buddhism, like Zen or Shin or someone Tendai or Shingon, we-we read Bodhisattva precepts-Bodhisattva precepts, Mahayana precepts only. That is why we say Ryaku. Ryaku. Ryaku is what we say. Not full but a part of it.

If we-if this okesa is, you know-if we wear small okesa that is simplified okesa-ryaku. Spirit is there, but more simple. Why we say so is because we do not read all the precepts, one by one, because it takes too long time. Maybe in comparison to Bodhisattva precepts, we should-I should refer to eight hachisai-kai, eight precepts.

The first one we say, "Don't kill." And don't take which is not given to you-don't steal. "Don't steal" means to take something which is not given to you. And do-do not be, you know-do not cling to the nature of man or woman, or nature or-don't cling to the difference of-difference, you know. If it is different is pretty good [laughs]. You cling to it more than that. Man and woman is-you don't understand in the difference of the nature. It is-if you understand, woman is the form and nature is little different from a man, and then it is [1 word] to understand, nearer to understand. But if you say, you know, man and-nature of man and woman is like water and [laughs] flame, or plus and minus, that is not our understanding. Do you understand the feeling?

When you stick to [1-2 words], it is more than difference. That is why you, you know, you lose your way. If you think, "She is little bit different from me, physically and [laughs] mentally." Anyway, I have no time to discuss [laughs], but think what I mean. Difference? Not opposite-not pair of opposites actually, but different.

Our minds should go, you know-should have freedom from this kind of concepts. Because you are not free from those concepts, you lose, you know, you lose your freedom. You are enslaved by it. Nature is the same, but function is different, and that is, you know, Buddhist understanding about various existing being. There is-we, anyway, we possess everything, you know, possess everything. But difference is something is right, you know, with you. Something is beyond my reach right now. That is the difference. But anyway, by nature, everything belongs to you then. By nature, everything is same. It looks like different from one to the other. This is the third precept: "Don't be sexual." [Laughs.]

Fourth one is, you know-[he says the series to himself out loud in Japanese, then comes to the fourth precept]: "Don't tell a lie." You cannot tell a lie.

First four precepts are the nature of human being. It express how human being-how everything exist. It means that everything has buddha-nature and everything is the same, is one. When your mind is clear, you will understand in that way. When your mind is, you know, confused, you do not understand those men and women, [1-3 words] or other sentient, or something to cure [3-4 words unclear]-someone who cure [2 words], or something true or something which is not true. That kind of duality doesn't exist.

Dualistic understanding is anything, you know-anyway, [1-2 words] is not good understanding. When we-we are free from dualistic understanding of precepts or of being, then you have-you understand what is buddha-nature. So we call it sho-kai-nature of precepts-nature.

And fifth is, "Don't drink sake." [Laughs.] Japanese people like sake a lot. We use sake. Don't sell or drink sake. Don't be intoxicated by liquor or teaching even. When your practice is not good, you will rely on that or you drink [?] sake [?]. It means you are lazy. [2-3 words.] In San-pachi,[6] you know [chants in Japanese]: Ju shin do ho ichijo nan koto nakare. [3-4 words.] You shouldn't be [1 word] to indulge in [2-3 words.] That [2-4 words]. [2-4 words.] You say [1-2 words] good translation. [1-3 words.] [1 word] as we say.

Student: What?

[3-4 words.] Drinking sake. If you drink sake, you have not much worry. [Laughs.] You don't feel you have to practice-you feel good-because you feel good. But that is just temporal [temporary], tentative, you know, relief. So you shouldn't-you shouldn't be involved in sake such a drinking practice. That is destructive.

And the rest of the [precepts]-the rest-we have three more, and the three is not just three-many, many, many. You shouldn't sleep because of high bed or something like, you know-you shouldn't decorate your, you know, your-you shouldn't use something too beautiful [laughs] on your ears, or on your eyebrows, on your lips, or you shouldn't use too strong incense. [5-7 words, laughter.] Incense has [2-3 words] okay.

Many, many precepts, not just there are three. But tentatively we count just three. Four-five-six-seven-eight-six-seven-eight [1 word], you know. Six-seven is something like that: Don't sleep in high bed. I am a Zen priest, you know. We sleep on this way-this part is [?]-my grandfather used to sleep [probably gestures, followed by S.R. and students laughing]. It looked like needles [?] [laughs, laughter]. He [2-3 words]. So the real spirit [3-4 words]. [Laughs, laughter.] Don't sleep [laughs] on such a grand [3-5 words]. That kind of precept-so many precepts, but tentatively we come-they come to "Don't sleep in high bed." That is next one, maybe seventh-sixth-seventh. I don't-I don't remember. Anyway, something like that.

The last one was very important one. "Don't eat after [laughs]-after twelve, afternoon." That is why John and Jisho, you know, at lunchtime while we-while we are eating before the second service start, we come to the Mañjushri and take back his flower to the kitchen because he doesn't [2-4 words]. That is sad. So maybe I shouldn't [1 word], you know. I shouldn't remain like this, but I-I feel it, you know. Mañjushri is a spirit of a body [?] of precepts.

[Laughs, laughter.] Excuse me, I need to ask a [3-6 words]. I was-I am not, you know, [3-5 words].

That-that is very important-that precept. That is independent precept, and before Buddha set up precepts, you know, for Buddhists it is a very important precept are the four precepts which means our Buddha nature. That is our buddha-nature. How to realize buddha-nature. Don't kill; don't steal; don't be-don't act with unchaste acts, -or that is not literal understanding precepts-don't be sexual, don't tell a lie. Those are very important precepts. But don't eat after twelve is-means Buddha's or Buddhist activity or Buddha's everyday life. So as long as we put emphasis on our everyday life-not only, you know, our ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned.]

... our everyday life is very important. So that is one independent precept, especially in Theravada and before Buddhists. Indian people, after finished their household life, they would go to the forest or mountain, and study-religious study, receiving food from people. And as soon as they receive just enough food to eat on that day, came back and eat before noon. And after noon, they didn't eat and practiced hard, and studied pure religious life. That was the Indian people's practice.

But you say do-they say do not eat after twelve o'clock means you should keep up with, you know, religious-pure religious practice. That is the origin of takuhatsu practice. Takuhatsu. In that spirit we, you know, practice takuhatsu. Do you know takuhatsu-what is takuhatsu? With begging bowl, we go out. And in the morning we go out with begging bowl and receive some food-the priests-and recently money too, and come back.

At Tassajara we have guest season. Guest season is a kind of takuhatsu-should be a kind of takuhatsu. We help people by our spiritual practice, and they give us material-money. So it is practice of dana-a practice for them and for us too. We give them spiritual truth to them, and they-they give us material resource to us. That is the spirit of our guest season-the extended practice of takuhatsu. But guest cooperation is more complicated than takuhatsu, you know. Very similar to city practice or worldly practice. Looks like business.

But if you go out, you know, with begging bowl, it is pure Buddhist practice, direct Buddha's practice. Relationship-monks and laymen will be direct practice of dana practice. So you feel as if you are practicing Buddha's way if you are practice takuhatsu. And if you practice, you know, guest season practice, unless your spirit, your understanding is very good and your spirit is very strong, you will be confused, easily confused. And you will-you mixed up-your practice will be mixed up with usual, you know, mundane way of life. But you shouldn't be mixed up.

So the rest one: Don't eat, you know, after noontime is a very good and very important precept. It is a direct expression of Buddha's practice, like takuhatsu. Don't observe takuhatsu. In one word, it means-it include our everyday-Buddhist everyday life. Same thing: don't eat after noon, after twelve o'clock, and don't-and practice takuhatsu, same thing. And this practice has been long, long practice for other Buddhists, even from before Buddha. For spiritual people this is very important practice.

And more and more in Bodhisattva precepts, is buddha-nature precepts became more important, and three refuges, and the Three Collective [Pure] Precepts was added. So we have sixteen precepts, three refuges, three treasures. We take refuge in the three treasures, and the Three Collective Pure Precepts. Is that six?

And Ten Grave Prohibitory Precepts. "Prohibitory precepts," we say, but it is the precepts of buddha-nature. So Bodhidharma's expl- [partial word]-according to Bodhidharma's explanation-explanation of precepts, we-buddha-nature is pure and clear, you know, each, you know, precept have, we say, buddha-nature is clean, pure, and clear. And the other words [?] follows when he explained the Ten Grave Precepts. That is Zen precepts or Mahayana precepts.

I think I want to continue this lecture. I hope I can finish it tomorrow night. If I couldn't I will continue-I will continue to extend it to the next lecture. Okay?

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Joan Amaral and Bill Redican (9/27/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms. Illustrations in Appendix from the Internet.

Appendix:

Doso-jin along a country road in Japan

Bonfiredecorated for the Toasting dango or kagami-mochi

Tondo-yaki (Bonfire Festival) (round glutenous rice cakes)

on the tondo bonfire

[1] Fusatasu: Traditionally, a ceremony held every fifteen days, in which monks in a Zen monastery recite vows and confess transgressions. Ryaku: "abbreviated" or "short."

[2] doso-jin: do: "road"; so: "ancestor"; jin: "deity" or "god." Shinto stone figures of deities placed along roadways and pathways, typically in rural Japan, to protect travelers and villages. The images are invoked for an abundant harvest, for good health, and prosperity of offspring.

[3] In a festival called tondo-yaki (Bonfire Festival), prayers are offered for a healthy and peaceful forthcoming year. New Year's decorations of pine, bamboo, and straw are gathered for a public bonfire. The decorated bonfire (tondo) is carried out to the seashore, purified, and set on fire. People toast and eat dango or kagami-mochi (round glutenous rice cakes) they have brought to the bonfire.

[4] roku: "six"; sai: "same" or "equal."

[5] Bommo-kyo (Bommo-sutra, Brahmajala-sutra, Fan-wang-chin): a sutra containing the ten major and 48 lesser Mahayana precepts.

[6] See SR-71-07-22V.

11 - Fusatsu

Friday, July 30, 1971

Fusatsu

Tassajara Zen Mountain Center

This evening we observed-this evening is called Fusatsu. As I explained last night,[1] this ceremony actually started even before Buddha. And after Buddha, the ceremony more and more include more positive elements: just, you know, to observe-not only just to observe, to keep their life, human life, from evil spirits, observing some good, and acquiring some strength-and throughout [?] protecting themselves from the evil.

That also-to attain the perfection of human practice, Buddha started-observed this ceremony. The form is merely what we must do, and more and more exactly. But must be nearly the same. But meaning changed little by little.

So if we study what kind of [1 word unclear: sutra?] [in] Buddha's time-Buddhists observe, then we will find out various elements. Last night I explained about it. Better to, you know, to see various kinds of flower in a basket, you know. There are-there-there is many kinds of flowers. Some of the flower is about the precepts about-about our human nature, or buddha-nature. And some-some of them is to-to stop doing something bad. And some of them is about life style of Buddhists-like the last one: "Don't eat after twelve o'clock [noon]." This is, you know-it means-it is the life style of Buddhists at that time. And we are still-we Buddhists, even though we eat three times a day, we have this kind of spirit. And when we chant and you read meal chant, you will find out this kind of spirit.

And tonight [unfolds paper], I want to explain Mahayana precepts in comparison to the precepts they observed at [1-2 words unclear] in early days of Buddhism. Here-this is the precepts they observed in sixth day of the month-eighth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and twenty-third, twenty-ninth and thirtieth, or some time-yeah, thirtieth-instead of thirty-first day observed it. Thirtieth or twenty-ninth.

One is "Don't kill." The first one is "Don't kill." This is old precept. If you-you can see it [in] Agama Sutra or Kihara or Daibuddhasara.[2] In old scriptures, [Precept Number] One is not to kill, "Don't kill." Second [is] "Don't steal." Don't take. This is not-it was not given to you. Don't be involved in sexual activity. Don't tell a lie. Those are so-called-it bussho-kai,[3] you know. Something about buddha-nature-precepts about buddha-nature.

The explanation of those precepts is to don't be dualistic-or is the-in one word, don't be dualistic. Because you become dualistic you kill something, you steal something, and you are deeply involved in sexual activity, and you tell a lie. And fuakku[4] is about laziness, lazier, easier practice, like to drink or to take LSD. And [laughter, laughs] lazy [laughing] practice.

And the last one is about the life style. And sixth-sixth-sixth precept-sixth precept is include various [prohibitions] not to, you know, use powder or perfume, you know. Don't play with geisha doll, do you know? [Laughs, laughter.] There are lot of "don't, don't, don't," you know [laughs]. Don't use a beautiful, you know, hair-hair-what do you call it?-comb or hair pin.

Student: Ornament.

Hmm? Ornament. Oh. And don't sleep in big bed [laughs, laughter]. That kind of precept.

So those are-if you kept the, you know, the precepts, they observed it is very interesting. Later, you know, the Buddhist precepts more and more became positive, and they put emphasis on from [precept number] one to four. "Don't be dualistic." Actually, you know, that is the purpose of Buddhism. If you just see the-each precept, it is still very dualistic, but-

In short, if your mind is calm and clear, you will not be involved in dualistic idea too much. And when you follow your buddha-nature, which is always clear, then it is not possible for you to do something bad, you know. If you follow buddha-nature, you cannot do anything bad.

So more and more we started to put emphasis on positive practice-to do something good. So rather than to attain enlightenment for us, or rather than to practice for ourselves, to-to-we started to practice for others-to help others. And underlying thought is to help others is, at the same time, to help ourselves, because if we are involved in-as long as we are involved in some good activity, it is not possible to do something, you know, bad at the same time. That is the secret of not to do something wrong [laughs]-because you cannot do two things at one-at one time. This is, you know, our belief.

You say, "I don't know which way to take." But if you take good way, at the same time, you cannot take bad path. So if you-if you only follow good way, good path, you cannot follow bad path. This is the secret of doing something right.

And in Mahayana sutras we include three refuges, you know: "I take refuge in the Buddha. I take refuge in the dharma. I take refuge in the sangha." And this three refuges is actually basic framework of Buddhist-Buddha's teaching and Buddha's philosophy. If you understand the three refuges, you know, three-Triple Treasure, you will understand Buddhist-what is Buddhism. And you will understand what is Zen. It is so-the meaning of the three refuges is so deep.

So to be a Buddhist means to understand the three refuges and to accept the three refuges. Then you are completely Buddhist. So to explain about the three refuges is to explain whole Buddhism. The understanding of three refuges covers understanding of whole scriptures and koans and everything. It is so wide and so deep. In Zen Buddhism, we tentatively explain the words, but it's the three refuges. And when you receive transmission, you are-you study, or you transmit the true meaning of the three refuges.

Whether you actually-whether you receive the three refuges or not, the three refuges is nothing but the three treasures you have intrinsically. You have already three refuges in-within yourself. So it is again, you know, study of yourself. "To study Buddhism is to study ourself," Dogen-zenji said. The Buddha in the Triple Treasures is fundamental: the absolute first principle or-or you may call it buddha-nature or nothingness or voidness. That is "Buddha" in the three treasures. Buddha treasure.

And how Buddha, you know-nothingness manifests itself-our realization of nothingness happen is daizamma zai [?]-the law of causality. Whole universe-maybe it is not so, but tentatively we can think the voidness is something like whole universe. It has no limit. And which it has no [1-2 words] or no suffer or no hurt-no emotions [laughs]. Do you know? The top of the universe. Which is top and which is bottom? It is-even the earth, it is difficult to know which is top and which is bottom. If America is top, maybe Japan is bottom [laughs]. But-but Japan is not always, you know [laughs], on the bottom-in the bottom. Sometimes Japan is on top and America [laughs] on bottom. It is-no one knows which is top and which is bottom.

The Sixth Patriarch said, "I have something which has no front or no back or no top or no bottom." That is actually emptiness-the absolute being which include everything. And yet it has no form or no color. That is Buddha. And its-whether [4-5 words], it is the law of causality, in-in short. But it can be all the teaching and precept. After Buddha realized the truth, it became a-Buddha wrote about it, and that was a scripture told by Buddha-and who realized the voidness of, you know, Buddha was Buddha later.

And sangha in the original Triple Treasure is in the [1-2 words] of or harmony of the voidness and somethingness-of voidness and truth. Truth covers everything. And where there is something there is truth, and truth and law of causality and voidness [1-2 words] doesn't different. It is always in harmony-in complete harmony. So that is why we call it harmony-harmonious sangha.

If you-after Buddha appeared, the people who followed his way was sangha, because they understand the law of causality in Buddha's teach-or Buddha's teaching. And they could-one-become one with the teaching-Buddha's teaching.

So the people who follow the teaching was called "sangha." But in original "Triple Treasure," sangha is the harmony of the reality. And later, after Buddha passed away, we have Buddha in sutras, you know, Gautama Buddha, wooden Buddha, or bronze Buddha. Or even a stone can be a Buddha for children [?] [laughs]. It is-if there is some-some stone like Buddha, children will think, you know, "This is Buddha." So anything can be, actually, Buddha later.

And the written scripture-teacher, this is dharma. Nowadays it is dharma. And priest-the sangha is someone like you or like me. That is Triple Treasure.

So this is just brief explanation of the Triple Treasures. But you now understand-really understand this Triple Treasure and accept the Triple Treasure. You can be a great Zen master or real [?] teacher of Buddhism if you just understand what is Triple Treasure. And this is one of the triple you accept when you become Buddhist. [3-5 words: "It is understood that you say (?)] "I take refuge in the Buddha. I take refuge in the dharma. I take refuge in the sangha." Words is very simple, but meaning is very deep. And this is the precepts we received first of all.

The next three is the Three Collective Pure Precepts. The first Pure Precept is precept which is the source of all good deed. That is the first. The next-next one is precept which include all good deeds is the next one. And the third one is the precept which include all sentient beings-the third one. It is rather difficult for you to explain it in just, you know, one hour. But some other time I may explain about it.

You must have already noticed that in each, you know, precept [3-5 words] precepts-the three precepts. There were some precepts which you cannot understand by your mind-by your thinking mind. The first one, Buddha, is something voidness. It is beyond your thinking mind.

And the source of the-all the good-all the precepts, next one, is also something you cannot have any approach to. Unless you realize by yourself what it is, not by listening to dharma talk or not by reading, but by yourself through your practice. That is why we practice zazen. Zazen practice is-zazen practice is source of all the precepts. So if you practice zazen, it means that you've got the source of all the precepts.

So to have good practice means to have good precept observation. Why it is so-is better not [1-3 words]. This is something [1-2 words] by your true practice.

Hmm. It is pretty warm, isn't it? [Laughs.] Wet [?].

I am just telling you the framework of the Mahayana precepts. If you really focus [?] strict, I think little by little you will understand what you are [1 word]. But we must have time to know the whole picture of-framework of Dogen-zenji, like you see it, you know, a map of the world. You will make a trip-anyway, you enjoy your trip and enjoy the mountains you see and the ocean you cross. But if you are always making trip, you know, by-even by airplane, it is difficult to have whole picture of the world. That is why I am, you know, giving you a kind of outline [?] with which you can enjoy your trip.

This, you know, map include various trip, too [laughs, laughter]. There is big trip in it [laughs, laughter]. Very big trip. And Dogen-zenji's outline, you know. Very big map.

The best-best map so far we have is Dogen-zenji's Genjo Koan. He explain every corner of the universe [laughs]. It is revealed over and over again. You will not be discouraged in your-whatever experience you have in your everyday life. Anything you experience in your everyday life makes sense, you know, according to his Genjo Koan. If you, you know, don't [2 words]. What I am saying right now is something in Genjo Koan. This is-this kind of study is included in our precepts.

This is-this kind of precepts in this life is very different from the precepts-Prohibitory Precepts. This is Mahayana-so-called-it-Mahayana precepts in comparison to Theravada, you know-the first kind, you know.

And last one-last precept is fulfilling Prohibitory Precepts. That is also explained by Mahayana teachers, especially by Dogen in [title?] explanation of the precepts. How you really understand the prohibitory precepts from the life of buddha-nature we have. So it is-this kind of understanding of precepts is started by Bodhidharma. Bodhidharma's Ju-jukai [?]. [1 word.]

So how you observe precepts is to-to try to be non-dualistic and try to-to extend our pure practice to everyday life. That is why we, you know, give our-that is the way to teach our precepts [1-2 words].

Hmm. Okay? That is, you know, brief explanation of the precepts. Would you give me some questions? Hai.

Student A: I wonder if you could explain a little about [5-8 words] ... men and women?

Suzuki-roshi: I started to explain it last night. I didn't know much bigger than that. [Laughter.] How about you and me [laughter]? We will study very hard. Accident, you know. [2-6 words] what is woman, what is man. You know, don't say: "You are," you know, "woman." Don't say: "You are a man." [Laughs.] It is easy to say so, you know, when you fight. Supposed to be too weak: "You are woman." [Laughs.] "Shut up!" [Laughter.] You are suppo- [partial word]-you are man, and you are suppose to be strong and supposed to help me [laughs, laughter]. "You are man! And I am woman." That is, you know, part of [1-2 words] arise-confusion arise.

If you say, "We are human," it is different-different, that's all. So let's do it [?], you know. Then there is no problem.

Woman thinks they have some privilege, and at the same time men think they have some privilege [laughs] because-just only because she is a woman or he is a man [laughs]. That is not realistic [?], you know, understanding, but that is just idea-idea of mine, and idea of human. In short, that is delusion. There is no such, you know, person as this woman or man.

Some Chinese scholar said, "White horse is not horse" [laughs]. "White horse is not horse." White horse, he say, you know, but is not horse. "Horse" is some idea. White horse is the horse, you know, which was here. [2 words.] "Horse," he said. That horse can be white horse, black horse, and white [?] horse. That is-the whole thing have in our mind. So white-it-there is a white horse. It is quite different [laughs] from the horse we have in our mind. The pony [?] is not [laughs] woman-is not woman, according to Chinese scholar. I am not a man. A man is-can be, you know, better [bigger?] person. But why is can be a woman. [1 word] can be a man, so ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... creating problem. Man which is not actual man. Man which is in-just in our mind without knowing exactly what it is. We think we know, but not quite. So you will lose the complete cause of the confusion. You will-don't have any reason if you-if you involved in dualistic mind-dualistic-your mind.

So in this way we must have general [3-5 words]. That is [2 words]. Hai.

Student B: I don't understand the prohibition on sexual behavior.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: I don't understand the prohibition on sexual behavior. On sexuality.

Suzuki-roshi: Sexuality.

Student B: It seems to me that what it does then is that man alone of all the sentient beings that has not learned to be naked?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] It is up to the-if your understanding is right, that is something which really exists. But most of the time we are, you know, addicted [to that] which is not real. That is sexuality in its bad sense.

Student B: Then why don't we prohibit the habit, not the act?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: Why don't we prohibit the habit, not the act?

Suzuki-roshi: It is- [Appears to speak in an aside for a sentence or so.] We-we don't prohibit. But we, you know-ahhh. [Long audible sigh.] Not-we don't prohibit. But we should know what it is as much as possible [laughs]. As much as possible. Okay?

Student B: Okay.

Suzuki-roshi: Some other question?

If we prohibit, you know, if we try to prohibit it, then again, someone who-who prohibit it [will be] involved in sexuality. So we must be very careful when we read, you know, [2-5 words]. That is why we have comment on things [?].

[Long pause, during which pages are turned. SR then appears to read a quotation.] "Our self-nature is pure and clear. There is dharma of non-attachment. Do not have attachment. Do not cling to anything. There [?] is called not to be sexual." Do you understand? "Self-nature is pure and clear. In dharma world, there is nothing to attach to." Without ar-[partial word: "arising"?]-do not arise. Let it arise cleanly. Mind is-the precept of not to be (difficult [to translate])-or not to be sexual.

When I was making trip-not trip, but takuhatsu,[5] I-I did forty-more than forty days takuhatsu. And I came across with a gentleman. I was alone, and he is alone. And so we talked a long, long time in a small boat [?]. He asked me whether we have some experience of, you know, geisha-geisha-geisha-kai.[6] Geisha-kai means to pay someone to enjoy geisha. That is geisha-kai or prostitution. He asked. So I said, "No, I haven't." He said, "Then you are not qualified teacher." [Laughs, laughter.] "You are not qualified teacher. Why don't you stay," you know, "with me tonight? I will take you some-somewhere, some good place. Why don't you follow me?" I said, "You-you want me to study [laughs] something, but I don't think I can study [it], you know. We study Buddhism, you know. Maybe-maybe good monk, if it is a purpose of going to geisha-kai house is study of Buddhism, it is not geisha-geisha-kai, you know, service-geisha-kai house enjoyment, you know. We can-I cannot enjoy if that is for study of Buddhism." And he said, "Oh, that's right. It is not-that is not my way of going-your way of going. It is different. So maybe better for you not to come with me," he said.

There is some difference. Looks like same. Not exactly the same. And the same is-difference is big-huge difference. One is, you know, to study how-how not cling to, you know. And other is how to enjoy clinging to geisha-kai. [Laughs.] Big difference. Study of non-attachment and who will enjoy attachment: big difference. We don't have to study about those things. Naturally, you will study [2-4 words] okay [laughs]. Instead you should practice zazen. That is much better. Okay? [Laughs.] I don't encourage you to study something-something like that. Hai.

Student C: [Much of question unclear.] Uh, well, if you have a kind of trauma [drama?] and it's not really pertinent to your everyday life, and an idea comes up to eat some fruit or something. [General laughter.] I don't know. [2-4 sentences unclear.] What is the best method of handling it? Chew [?] backwards, [1-2 words] on the food, or- [laughs, laughter]. [1-4 sentences ] ... life style ... life style ... [laughs, laughter] How can I eat that?

Suzuki-roshi: Zo! [General laughter.] Don't study [stir it?] so hard, you know, don't study [stir it?] so hard. Ten minutes, you know. Just, you know, don't be so serious, you know. Just let it come, let it go. If there is something to eat, eat it anyway. And if you think too much, you know, don't eat in the evening, you know, you may eat a lot and enjoy your food. And if you cannot eat [in the] evening time, don't eat it. Next morning you will enjoy your breakfast anyway. There is not much thing to think about. Let it, you know-when you sit zazen, rest something. Let it come and let it go. To do so, you have a kind of strength-not like this [probably gesturing] but big mind or-I don't know what you say. So better not to be so serious. It will be taken care of anyway by Buddha or someone else [?]. Hai.

Student C: Suzuki-roshi, if we break the precepts, what form of suffering will we experience?

Suzuki-roshi: Grave suspicions [?].

Student C: [1-2 sentences.] Will we suffer because of it?

Suzuki-roshi: Well, physically, first of all, you will suffer. That is obvious, you know. That is direct result, and you-if you do so, why you will feel bad is you will lose your reason of life, you know. That is pretty, you know, difficult thing to accept. Maybe especially about women [?] [laughs]. If you lose your original fight [?]. So that is why we have the precepts: Don't eat after noon, you know, after noontime. It is a kind of reason of life. The old, you know, Indian teacher had-it is-reason of life is very important. Why you don't feel so good if you do not come to zazen is because you lose your way of life. That is very [?]-and why you come back to the, you know, more domestic life again is-domestic way of life again is you, you know, you miss everything like that you had.

Student C What about for laymen? Should the precepts be adapted to their way of life, you know, they are involved so heavily in an outside world-very much involved in the-

Suzuki-roshi: For layman-

Student D: -small mind?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Layman-there is precepts, maybe, still. They have, usually, laymen-even laymen observe precepts [that] priest observe and monks observe. And that will give you-give them some-some-not strength, but some release. Even though just once in a while they observe-if they come, you know, monastery, and spend several days having same food and practicing zazen, that will be a great help. Even though their usual-everyday life is not so quiet [?]. Mostly [laughs], layman likes much better [to observe precepts?] than even priest or monks like. I don't know why, but it does not mean that layman's practice is better than monk's practice. But anyway, they feel very good. Much better than monks, you know, maybe.

Student E: Is it possible to become attached to those precepts? Kind of bound to them. [2-4 words.] You can't always say, "No, I won't do that."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yes, but precept is not, you know, set up in that way. That is precepts-why precept is good. If you think something [2-3 words], you will be easily bound by. But it is-no one is bound by-will be bound by precepts. It is difficult to be bound by the precepts. The more you observe precepts, you will-the more you will have freedom from it. Precept is not something which you can stick to [laughs]. And our, you know, [1-2 words] is Zen Center, you know. It is very difficult to stick to the same way as you stick to something worldly-in the same way you stick to something-you stick to some extreme. In China and also in India and in Japan, Buddhists call it "precepts," but layman like Confucius-you know, Confucius-Taoist or Confucian-call it "lay." Lay is the set of some behavior-how-how we should behave. Those kind of behavior is separate so that we will not go the extreme. That is the main point of [1-2 words] chu-yo-chu-yo.[7] Middle Way.

It is different from Buddhist understanding of-little bit different from our understanding of Middle Way, but they also put emphasis on Middle Way or lay behavior.

So it is-it is not possible to be-to go to the-to go-to be dualistic as long as you are observing some precepts or some rule of behavior. And this is, maybe, I don't know Christian, you know, Commandments so well. But Zen [?] or in India or in Japan, we have this kind of culture, but-

If it-if you have time, you can study about those things in comparison to, you know, Western, you know, culture. Okay.

---

Source: Original tape SR-71-07-30 transcribed by Jeffrey Schneider (8/27/99) and checked against tape by Bill Redican (1/3/01). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] SR-71-07-29.

[2] Suzuki-roshi cites three different sutras. The Agama (San., lit. "Source of the Teaching") is the Mahayana name for the Sanskrit canon that correspond essentially to the Pali term Nikaya. Kihara and Daibuddhasara are _____.

[3] bussho = "buddha-nature"; kai = Buddhist rules of moral conduct. Buddha-nature as large as the ocean. (See Shobogenzo "Bussho.")

[4] Japanese name for the fifth precept, which prohibits intoxication and/or malicious speech. Suzuki-roshi may have used the other term for the fifth precept, fuinshu. (Phonetically, it sounded like "fukushan.")

[5] Begging for and living on alms.

[6] Here -kai means to buy or hire.

[7] Chu-yo is a Confucian concept and sutra. Chudo is Japanese for the Middle Way. Suzuki-roshi may have been referring to either term.

1971 augustus (12)

1 - Words and Zen Teaching

Sunday, August 01, 1971

Words and Zen Teaching
Tassajara

At the time of Yakusan-Yakusan Igen-daiosho[1]-we-every morning we recite chant names of Buddha. DaikonEno-daiosho.[2] DaikonEno is the Sixth Patriarch. And SeigenGyoshi-SeigenGyoshi is the Seventh Patriarch. And Eighth Patriarch is Sekito Kisen. And [the Ninth Patriarch is] Yakusan.

At this time, Zen Buddhism was very-became very popular or-and stronger. Every master-there were lots of students. But in Yakusan's monastery there were only twenty, you know. He-he was total [?] strict teacher. And one day, the temple-a monk who is taking care of temple asked him to give a lecture. "You haven't-you haven't given lecture for so long time, so students want to hear you. So please give us some lecture today," he said.[3]

So Yakusan asked ino-sho to hit the bell, so students came to lecture hall. And at the third round, Yakusan appear and mounted the pulpit, and sitting for a while. He without giving anything-saying anything, he went to his room [laughs]. [words] taken care of [Zen master] asked him, "Why didn't you say anything?" Yakusan said, "Because I'm teacher who give lecture and there's some teachers who discuss Buddhism but [words] to give lecture is not my [word]." And his-that was his answer. And then if he doesn't give any lecture. What is his purpose? No one knows but it is difficult to figure out what was his purpose. That there's no reason is actually his teaching.

[words] group [words] you feel good. If your group [words] you feel good. But if your group just [word] you don't feel good. But that is, you know, hmmm, why we're group sometimes. If water has some particular place it is not water. [words] why he didn't say anything. Some true Buddha, you know, he didn't say anything. Maybe because I'm not true teacher I have say to say many things. Actually there is no-not necessary to explain something about Buddhism, what is Zen. And then there is-in appreciating word for the-this story, Zen koan. We should thank, we should thank Yakusan because he appear and [words]. [He] is thankful, thankful. But because he didn't say anything was not so bad, not so bad. But you [shouldn't punish] the monk who is taking care of the monastery students-criticize or punish-not punish-criticize Yakusan for not [giving/speaking] [word/a lecture][words] want to criticize him. He did criticize him because he appeared on the pulpit to sit. That was [appreciating] words for Yakusan. True activity. Let's think about this point more.

Zen Buddhism [in this day]. Zen Buddhism [in this day]. We've got to-It is not something special according to Buddhism [words] if you have eyes to see, if you have ears to listen to, teaches you everything. Whatever it is it is good teaching for you. It is not altogether beautiful. So this is true for Zen master. If you have-If you already have ears to listen why Zen people-Zen master to come to America? Or say something to it [word]? Give you something, yourself, which coming to you so that you can drink it. If you're given to plain water no one will drink it. So Zen is extra. Teaching [word] whatever the teaching maybe if you have ears to listen to, you know, you can understand [words] which [words] and which has good sense before Buddha. And which you [admit] forever. Before some true Zen master like Yakusan, you should [?] able to escape [maybe]. Your life goes on, you know. You appear and the lecture hall is already a mistake. But at his time Buddhism was so popular, Zen was so popular, when some of the people were in the vicinity they visited him. [word] [words] see them. And keep Buddhist way until [words] that is what he did but he needed some good students that is why he have [word] Buddhist students, maybe. We should think about this [word] little more, before you start Zen.

[words] Zen teaching is something special. Our teaching is expression of your true nature which is inward, usually. You know already what is Zen Buddhism. There's no need for you to ask someone else. But why, you know, you don't [word: hope/work] for with what you have is because of your [strong/wrong] mind. Because your eyes are not clear, because you want to [look] for something [better] which is like-as Buddha said, "You are like someone who has high goal on his [word] and is poking around. He seeks for something good. So, naturally having [word] we search over and over. [words] because you want to seek for something, something good, some other places. But if you do realize what you have on your head then there's no need seek for something good. So what we should do is to clear, to have clear mind. To get rid of excessive desire. And that is, you know, what you should do.

[word] for enlightenment-Enlightenment is-If you realize what you are doing that is enlightenment. If you realize what you are doing you will find out how perfect you are, how [words] special you are, and how groovy [does he say 'groovy'?] you are. So according to Buddhism the problem-our problem is the idea of self which you have, already have and it's [word] the source of all activities, quite [selfish/source of] ideas, which is not actually exist. Nothing has its own self nature, including human beings. When you realize that we have ordinary [word] self then what you hear or what you see will be very clear. And will be [true to self] because [your] [ears are hearing and [word] eyes are seeing not- You know. Probably this kind of idea is very unusual to you because our everyday life is deeply involved in idea itself. Actually our life is [nothing but/not result] [word] not our culture is [2words] culture. It is a human culture but it is not even human culture. It is deluded, self-centered culture. I have no [word] how self-centered culture we have. But even if realize how selfish we are this is so-called [word]. And when we get-get rid of idea itself our activity is-is really Buddha's activity itself. That is the point we should know [word] about.

[words] there is nothing to [word]. But you have something to settle that is the [word] of self [word] and practice of selflessness, that is Zen practice. [words] that kind of practice is [words] practice. But it is actually-If you [complain] with your problem of [word] unless you are very strong person you cannot see, even see how perfect you are.

[word] , you know, [words]if you realize, actually realize there is actually no self you would, you know, cover your ears or eyes. when you -If you are told by your doctor you have a cancer here, cancer here, what will you do? [word] [words] your cancer. Because you are so self-centered really [words]. It's a invitation that you [word] cancer [words]. can be tried [words] But even if you can see-If you can - If you do not [lose] even though you know you have cancer; even though you know your body is [word]. You may be pretty strong person. What kind of strength is your real strength? If it's easy to fight, to win something but if it's difficult to [word] when you [word] it is, you know, easy to go ahead. But it is difficult to be-to remain [ words] your group. It is easy to be first person, always but it is difficult to remain last person, always. Not so easy. [words] can be last person in our society and the world. So if you are always trying to be the first, you know, you will become weaker and weaker. You will lose real, special part. [Word] you have materialistic path which doesn't work so well.

However, if all of us try to be the first we create confusion. But if you always ...

[Master tape changed over and is too difficult to transcribe--for me. Sorry. I'd like to hear the original to see if it is better. Sara]

[There is a question being asked and the sound is terribly muffled. Suzuki-roshi laughs.] Well, I don't think there's a [word] in that sense, you know. ....

Sara Hunsaker, 8-18-99

[1] YaoshanWeiyan (YakusanIgen; also Kodo Daishi): 745-828. Ch'an master. Dharma successor of Sekito Kisen.

[2] DajianHuineng (DaikanEno): 638-713.

[3] From Book of Serenity, Case 7: "Yaoshan Ascends the Seat."

2 - Translation Of Unknown Text

Sunday, August 01, 1971

Translation Of Unknown Text
San Francisco

Assistant: [1] ... to make it record [verb].

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

[Gap, scattered fragments of words and sentences.]

Assistant: ... like that.

[Gap, scattered fragments of words and sentences.]

Assistant: ... push it hard enough so the buttons stay down.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

[Long silent gap in tape.]

Suzuki-roshi dictating as he translates a text:

"Therefore, no buddha attained enlightenment without the form of shaving head-not in the form of a shaved head. No patriarch-no patriarch-is in the-no patriarch is not in the form of shaved head. So the most virtuous things is the virtue of shaved head.

Even though you built a stupa, which-stupa adorned by seven jewels to reach the thirty-the thirty-third heaven, the virtue is great, but in comparison to the merit of shaved head, it is not so good as even one hundredth. And any [1 word unclear] cannot be-cannot describe. Stupa could be destroyed, and once it destroyed, it-the shape cannot be-the form cannot be seen. But merit of shaved head will increase more and more until it reach to the Buddha foot. And its merit will not be lost.

Therefore, without changing our body we are beyond the commoner. Even though we do not attain buddhahood, we are already a son of Buddha. We are the most valuable being-being in the three world, and our life is best of the life-lives in the six conditions of life.

Think carefully now. You change your karmic body and mind, attain enlightenment, and will born in Buddha land. The beginningless karma-beginningless karmic attachment instantaneously stopped, and innate virtue will result. Therefore, after you shave your head, heaven and earth cannot cover you. You cannot be mixed with the rest of being in the six worlds.

A shaved head has nothing to cover, and square-sleeved robe is a symbol of-symbol of emancipation. People who see it will have great at-[partial word]-great encouragement, and your close relative will have good affinity. Your being is the highest in the three world, and your virtue is highest in ten direction-in the world in ten directions.

Kings are not higher than you. Your parents is not-respectable than you. If they are not your teachers you shouldn't bow to them; if they are not your patriarchs-if you-if they are not patriarchs-buddha and patriarchs-patriarchs, there is no one to bow to. Therefore we say the karmic life of three worlds.

It is impossible to cut-cut off love and affection of the family-to cut off. When we go beyond family relationship of love and passion, that is a way to return the benevolence of-benevolence-the benevolence you receive from them. Thinking about how great it is-how great the benevolence you received from your parents, with sincerity you should refuse it. Thinking about how great it is-the benevolence of the water and the earth-we should return the benevolence by-through real way of returning it. This is real practice of renunciation and the most-the highest way-the most lofty and highest way to live."

-----

Source: City Center tape transcribed by Sara Hunsaker (8/8/99) and checked by Bill Redican (3/23/00).

[1] Thought to be Yvonne Rand.

3 - Freedom

Tuesday, August 03, 1971

Freedom
Zen Mountain Center

I want to explain why we become Buddhist [laughs] or why I myself became a Buddhist. Perhaps here in America, because you have some wish, you know, hope in your future life-future life of a-future-personally your own future life. and sociologically you're concerned about your future society. But to tell the truth, we Buddhists do not have any hope [laughs]. We do not have any hope for our human, you know, life because we understand this life is originally full of suffering. That is, you know, how we understand our society. From the beginning we understand that our world is world of suffering. And we understand why we suffer, you know, is because we expect too much. We always expect something more than you will obtain or acquire.

For an instance, everyone knows that we cannot stay young, but we want to be always young [laughs]. Once in a while, you know, when-even though you are young, once in a while you may feel, "Oh gee, I am twenty-five now [laughs]. Oh, I am not anymore young." [Laughs, laughter.] You may feel in that way. That is, you know, good evidence that you want to be always young. But that is not possible, you know. We want to experience what you have, but that is not also possible.

Things are changing always, so nothing can be yours. So whatever you want-you want to be or you want to have, nothing can be possible for you to obtain or to have it. That is actually how our human world is. Actually it is so. But still, we want to be fooled by [laughs] something. That is maybe why we say human beings do not like something real. But human being like something unreal. That is very true. You don't like anything real. So after, you know, give up all the hopes you have in mundane world, we become Buddhist.

Then what will become of you if you become Buddhist? If you resign from this world, what will become of you is maybe next question. Why you become Buddhist is to resign from this, you know, world of suffering, to have perpetual, you know, joy we become Buddhist. If you become Buddhist, even though you have no, you know, hope-mundane wishes. But instead you will have the freedom from various restriction which you had in your mundane world. You will be free from restriction.

Actually, because of our many desires, we do not have freedom. We, you know-we restrict ourselves by ourselves. No one want to be-want to restrict you. But you yourself restrict yourself. And sometime you feel someone else is, you know, restricting yourself, but actually it is you who is restrict yourself. Because of your wishes you restrict yourself. Because of your wishes you feel as if someone, you know, [is] making you unhappy [laughing]. And that is not so. You have too much desires. So your society will not allow your family or your friends-will not allow you to fulfill your wishes. Everyone want to fulfill, you know, each one's own wishes so we have, naturally, trouble. And we feel because of your friend-because of your society you suffer. But it is not so actually. Because of your too much-too many desires you suffer.

So purpose of our practice as a Buddhist [is] to be free from yourself, your small self, to be free from your small wishes. That is purpose our practice. This is, you know, Buddhist trip [laughs, laughter]. Our trip is very different from yours-maybe opposite. We are not interested in something we can see, you know. We are not interested in sightseeing trip or space trip or anything, you know, you can enjoy in its ordinary sense.

And here I have-speaking of trip or some koan or Zen story[1]-famous Zen master, Changsha.[2] He was called "Big Lion." [3] People called him Big Lion because he was so powerful teacher. One day he went out of the monastery and [went] strolling about the mountain. And when he came back, shusa[4]-do you know shusa? Shusa means leader of the monast- [partial word]-monastic training-asked him, "Where have you been? What kind of trip did you make? [Laughs.] Where have you been?" he asked.

And he said, "I have been strolling around the mountain." This is already-he is speaking about his own practice. "Strolling over" means, you know, as you know, when you stroll over you have no particular intention of going some special place-anywhere you want. If you see something and you want [to] find out something interesting you will be [?] go that way, and passing many beautiful places. When you want to come back, you may come back. But there is no particular purpose of the walking. That is [what the] story [is] about.

It means, you know, the life free-free from various attachment or worldly interests. Anyway, he enjoys his life. And why he can enjoy his life is he has-he doesn't-he is not restricted. He is not under restriction. He is free-always free. His mind is always free from himself and from others, and from objective world. That is why, you know, he said, "I am strolling around," he said.

But shusa was a very good fellow, you know, very plain fellow himself. But then "You were strolling about. What-where did you go?" [Laughs.] He asked like that. He, you know, he tried to catch his master, you know. He feel if his master has some special interest, you know, in something he can catch him. If he-if you like good food, you know, he would say, "Oh! I like noodle." [Laughs.] Or "I like sake." [Laughs.] There he can catch him. "Oh! You-you like noodle. Then next, you know, next-next [1 word unclear: sounds like Japanese sukuji], you know, we will make some noodle for you." "Oh good." If he say so, he was caught [laughs] by-by his disciple. "I know-I know your weak point. That is your," you know, "weak point." So whenever, you know, his-he became mean, he may say, "I make noodle for you [laughs, laughter] tomorrow. How about it?" In that way, you know, his disciple caught him.

But he-but what he said was, "I have been gone. I-I saw many beautiful flowers," he said. So shusa, his disciple [thought], "Oh, he likes flowers. He is really quiet as flower, anyway. So if I make beautiful garden-a flower garden, I think he will be happy." In that way he wanted to catch him.

So he thought he caught him. And what he said was, "It is-you look very happy," you know. "You have spring-you feel as if it is-do you feel as if it is springtime?" [Laughs.] "Do you see the flowers and beautiful garden-beautiful flowers?" he said.

But his teacher said, "No, not always so. I felt as if I was strolling about in the autumn," you know, "period-for their last dead leaves-and cold. I had that kind of feeling." That is what his teacher said. It means that he is not caught by spring flowers. Nor he is not caught by beautiful foliage. It is already, you know, frosty late autumn. So he couldn't go-disciple couldn't catch him. If he said, "You are strolling-you looks like strolling about spring field. But now you said you are strolling-walking through the late autumn field."

That is, you know, our trip. We should not be caught by anything. Until you have that kind of strength or freedom, you should, you know, practice hard. Purpose of practice is not to chase after worldly freedom, but it is to have freedom from our small desires or fame or success in our mundane world, and if possible to help people-to make-to release them from that kind of mundane wishes and restrictions. That is, you know, Buddhist way of life: join you in your path, in your ordinary life, and then you will have freedom from ordinary life. There big difference.

So when you have real freedom from everything, you may be very sympathetic with people who are involved in small, personal desires and-to be involved in competitive world. So naturally you want to help people to be free from-free from this kind of life. To share the, you know, to share the joy of freedom with people is our purpose of life. Usual-usually, you know, people are deeply involved in city life and so they stay in city. But Buddhist, you know, remain in city and live in city to help people who are involved in that kind of confusion. The way upward is to, you know, to-to make ourselves free from the small self of desires. And the way downward is after we have that kind of freedom to help people and to go back to the city is the way downward.

So-and after you, you know, you have freedom you do not-you do not enjoy the freedom around because you-you feel their suffering in your heart. And you-you cannot help going back to city to help people. That is the way downward-way upward. You should go down one flight again. That is Buddhist life. Whether you are priest or layman, you should-you should start our practice from actual experience of suffering of this life.

Buddha, you know, after experiencing many, you know, luxurious life as a priest, and he found out that there is no real pleasure of life in this kind of life. And he gave back his life and escaped from the castle and started to practice to gain freedom from this kind of worldly life. And after he attained enlightenment, he again came back to his castle, and before he came back to his castle he met five of his men who escaped the castle with him. And he preached for the five of these men. And they were-those five people were the first disciple of the Buddha-disciples of Buddha. And he at last came back to his house. And his mother-in-law became a priest, his son became a-not priest, but [laughs] Buddha's follower, you know. At that time there is no such a people like priest. They-their relatives and family became his followers. That is good example of Buddhist life.

So [laughs] if-if you come to Tassajara with some mundane hope, you know, to make a good home at Tassajara it will be big mistake. Tassajara is not some place, you know, where you can stay forever. If you want to stay here that is fine. It means that you will, you know, spend rest of your life help people here. We will have various-many-various kinds of children, you know, we will have. All of them-not all of them want to be a priest or want to be a Buddhist in its true sense. Tassajara has hot spring, and for students and away from the city life it is good place to stay. So it may be [seem like] a good idea to spend rest of the time here. That is big mistake. That is not the nature of this community. This community is for the students who want to-to have some power to be free from our small wishes-small desires. We have many desires. Even though you do not realize it, you have it.

To be free from all those desires and willing [?] to acquire-acquiring big freedom-great freedom from yourself and from mundane world, and always, you know, free from suffering, and always, you know, being happy with people and friendly with people, and without any expectation to help people in Tassajara is, you know, why we-you stay at Tassajara if you want to stay here.

Wherever you are, there is something to do. Even though you are in such a remoted mountain there is something for you to do to help people. So it is okay for you to stay here, but you cannot stay here just to enjoy yourself, your life. If you, you know, have this kind of idea and stay here, people from outside will not feel so good. I think, you know, way many people like Tassajara-the reason why they like Tassajara, I think-mmm.

Actually, excuse me, I was-I became a good friend of hummingbird [laughs], you know. The hummingbird-relationship between me and the hummingbird [laughs]-not much relationship, actually [laughs, laughter], but whenever I come out they come-sometime two. And they won't to be disturbed by me [laughter]. What unusual birds. "Here-he is always here, and he don't makes me-makes me any harm," you know. "There is no need to be afraid of him, but whenever he come out, I feel uneasy-it is [2-3 words] what he will do. Let's go and he will come."

And, you know, I sometime moves on purpose, like this [probably gesturing], so that they can go away. But they won't go away! They are much more interested in what he-what his friend do, you know. If his friend come, you know, immediately he will go. Until his friend come, even though I move [claps hands three times], he doesn't go. It means that he has his own life. It is very different from mine. But there is some connection, you know, because whenever I come out they-they come. There must be come connection, but not much connection. I think this is very good relationship, you know. I do not give, actually, honey to them. Someone else-I don't know who-give the honey to them. Someone else give them honey treat. So actually I have not much relationship with them, but there is, you know, very close relationship. It is difficult to explain what is my relationship to the hummingbirds. And I think our students and our guests-the relationship between them is something like that, you know [laughs]. We are practicing zazen here. You come to enjoy your life here, or you are vacationing here. So completely different, you know, life-not-not at all same.

But I don't know why but our students like our guests very much, like hummingbird, you know, come to-come out whenever I go out. Not much reason, but we will do it anyway-that's all. I think that kind of relationship is good, the perfect relationship. Usually, you know, what we try to is to have complete relationship-to feel, you know, possessive of something, you know, someone, or to, you know, to make them follow our rule or [1 word] way. That is, you know-that kind of relationship is not based on the real Buddhist way.

You may know, in Dhammapada,[5] Buddha said, "You should be like a bee," you know, "collecting honey from flower to flower-flying from flower to flower, without destroying the flower, without disturbing the beauty of the flower." That is, you know, Buddhist way of helping people. We do not disturb hummingbird; the hummingbird does not disturb us. And hummingbird is not, you know, bothered by-does not want you to do anything. It's just he want to-to come and see what is going [laughs]-"What is he doing?" [Laughs.] Very, you know-and I f- [partial word: feel?]-day by day I feel very good relationship between the hummingbird and me. It makes, you know, very soft sound. And he can stop, you know, in the air whenever he want to: rrrh, you know [laughs]. He-maybe he could-he could stop in front of me like this: brrr. "What are you doing?" [Laughs, laughter.] He doesn't say so-just, you know, brrr. And he-brrr-he makes, you know, one soft sound.

Relationship between Buddhist and usual people should be like this. How is it possible for you to be like a hummingbird is? First of all, you must have strong practice. You must train yourself so that you can have always big mind-big strong mind. Or else, you know, you cannot be like-you cannot be like a hummingbird. It is easy for the-for the bird to be like that. But it is not so easy for human being to be like that: so innocent, so little bit [?] desires, having great freedom from everything.

First of all, if we want to be like that you should be able to reform your small desires. Even though you have desires, you shouldn't-you shouldn't be caught by them completely. It is okay to have desire, but you should not be enslaved by it. And that is why we practice hard-because we human being is very hard, you know, creature-very difficult-difficult creature. So accordingly we must have difficult practice. So for human being, if you ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

When you have too much desires, why is it-is it necessary to have more desires? If it is too much, you should release your burden. That is, you know, what we should do to have more freedom. If you continue to extend your small desires, more and more your life will be confused and your suffering increase endlessly, and you will be lost in suffering. As our human world is very individual, personal world that, even though you make great effort to help people, it doesn't work. When you have enough money to give, you know, you will be a good person. But if you have no more money, no one will give it to you. No one will say even "Good morning" [laughs]. That is an actual how this world is going. As long as you have money, you have many friends. As long as you are young and beautiful, you have many friends. But if you become 50 or 60 you don't have much-so much friends, and you would be very lonely.

But if you-if your mind is always young, being free from various desires, then, you know, you will have always your friends even though you have not a penny of money. That is actually what will happen to you. How you, you know, have always hope in your old age, how you create, you know, yourself after 50 or 60 is the main purpose of our practice. So that you may not feel sorry when you become old, you practice hard.

When we-we-when-because I want-we want to be always happy, you know, we practice hard. But as Buddha said, "If too much-too many trees [probably meant "birds"], you know, come to small tree, eventually tree-the tree will be dead." If we have too much desire, we will die. So if you want the tree always green and alive and strong, you must protect the tree from too many birds. Birds likes-like the tree, and tree like birds, so it is okay to have some, but if you have too much [laughs] the tree will die. And bird will be-will be unhappy if tree die.

We do not encourage people so much, you know. We do not propagate Buddhism, you know, so intensely. But what we are doing is, as much as possible, to make people happy is our purpose. As much as possible, we should help people. And "as much as possible" is, you know, important point. Not too much: as much as possible. Little by little.

Even though something is very good-maybe health food is good for you-but if you want all the people to have health food, you know [laughs], that is not possible. And if you try to do so, you will be exhausted [laughs]. Not much people-most people are interested in something sweet or meat or fish, which taste good [laughs]. No one interested in brown rice or miso soup or bean curds. Not much people are interested in it. So if you want to-even in Tassajara, you know, there is some problem-not much-because we-most of us like strong healthy food, not much problem. But still, you know, there is some problem, and each one must try pretty hard [laughs] sometime, because sometime we have many desires. Knowing that this is not so good, but we want to taste it once in a while. That is the trouble.

So if you convince, you know, people through and through in some way it is very difficult. It is almost impossible. It is very difficult. As someone said, "A man can lead a horse to the water, you know, but it is almost impossible to make them drink." You-you may think if you lead a horse to the water: "Now! He came to the stream." [SR hits table three times.] "He may drink, you know, water from it." But if he is not hungry or thirsty he will not drink immediately [?]. If you make them drink, it is a great job. [Laughter.] You need many helpers. And between helpers there will be trouble [laughs]. "No! Not this way!" [Laughing]. "Do more! Do more! You are lazy! Why don't you-? You are afraid of horse!" [SR makes frightened little mocking sounds.] [Laughs, laughter.] "Do it right now! He is trouble!"

Same thing will happen, you know, if you-even though something is good, you cannot, you know, convince them completely. That is human nature. If you do it little by little, you know, as much as you can, that is the best policy. And we will have always good feeling between us. How we bring out-begin about this kind of life in our human life is, you know, too hard. Strong practice is in ourselves-for ourselves, not for others. Without forcing our way on others, but to practice to force the truth on us-each one of us, then naturally people follow your example. And they will share-you can share the joy with people. Because-again, because you expect too much, you cannot share your complete freedom. And you don't have freedom. Even though you have it you cannot share [it] with people.

The other day I talked about Ummon's[6] the Sun-Faced Buddha and the Moon-Faced Buddha.[7] Sometime we are sick and sometime we are healthy. But to be sick and to be healthy is our practice. Sometime we are healthy and sometime we are sick. Sometime it is hot, and sometime it is cold. When it is cold you should be cold buddha. When it is hot you should be hot buddha. There's no secret. That's all. That is Buddhism. When it is cold, you should be cold buddha. When you are sick, you should be sick buddha. That's all. No secret.

But you may find-find out how difficult practice it is to be just sick. To be just healthy, to be just hot, or to be just cold. If it is cold, you may want to go to somewhere it is not so cold. When you are sick, you want to be recovered. Even though, you know, you want to be recovered if-before time come, you cannot be recovered. So it is better just to stay in bed-just to enjoy the life in the hospital. That is much better. When time come, if your doctor is taking care of yourself, you will be recovered.

Sometime we may feel so sorry for someone who is in agitation, you know: "Oh, I have stayed [in] hospital already one month, but my doctor says 'You should stay ten more days.' Terrible!" And sometime I feel very sorry to-to leave hospital before someone leave, you know. If possible I want to stay more, but they don't allow you to stay. And I don't [1-3 words] with them-with my friend always, whenever I go to hospital.

So the secret is when you are sick, you should be sick. That's all. No secret. Then Buddha will take care of your health. Wherever you go, you will enjoy your life. And you will be needed [?] wherever you go.

If your tendency is, you know, to-I don't know how to say but-if your tendency is to be too much helpful to someone-others, then even though you want to help them, they may not like it if it is too much. You should help them as much as they need you. Unless you are not completely from your ego, that is not possible, maybe. That is the way we help people. That is how we-you can do it is because of the true enlightenment. When you know you yourself, you have enlightenment.

When you have not much, you know, desires or wishes, you have chance to see things as it is. You have chance to have enlightened eyes. That is our practice, actually. So you should know the point of practice, you know, what is practice actually. Our practice is something different from usual practice-from usual training.

I wish I have some more time to-to have your questions about these points. Some more question? Some question?

Anyway, if you find out the difference-if you have some misunderstanding about our practice, you know, or if you find out some misunderstanding about the practice, I shall be very happy. You know, if you find out-if you find out that your understanding was wrong about our practice, I shall be very happy. I want to collect your misunderstanding. Hai.

Student A: Could you clarify if you're just being and allow yourself to be where you are-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student A: -if you're sick you're sick. If you're-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student A: -whatever. And if you're lazy then you're lazy-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student A: -how can you get into practice? [SR laughs, laughter.] Can you, without negating that? [SR continues to laugh].

Suzuki-roshi: You know, when you ask that question already you want to be-escape from it, you know. Before you try to escape from it, you know, you should accept your laziness, and your foolishness, and your agitation, you know. "Okay, I am very lazy now." [Laughs.] You know, that is first. Try not to escape from it before you accept it. Okay? If you really think you are lazy [laughs]-sleeping in bed, you know: "Oh! Oh, I am so lazy!" [Laughs, laughter.] Then for ten times you should repeat, "Oh, I am lazy, lazy, lazy." [Laughs, laughter.] And get up! [Laughter.] That is way, you know. Usually, you know, when you feel yourself lazy, you may say, "Get up! Get up!" [Laughs.] You may call up your children-wake up your children and your husband. You see? That is-that-it doesn't work. You should accept yourself to be lazy. If you are lazy, your husband may be lazy, you know. Children will be lazy. You are all lazy! [Laughs.] "Oh, what has she done!" [Laughs, laughter.] It may work, if you really think in that way. Hai.

Student B: What about sleepiness? That's [1-3 words].

Suzuki-roshi: That's worst enemy! You cannot do anything about it. But [laughs] the-the only thing it may help is to have good sleep. And to have good sleep, it is necessary to have some-to organize your life. That is very important. So that-that you can practice good-you have good zazen means you have-it is well-organized in your life [?]. It's [1-2 words]-it's-maybe it's one of your, you know, conditions. When-when something is wrong with your, you know, health you will be very sleepy. But it is difficult to know what is wrong with yourself. But when-as Buddha said, if dragon or snake or sleepiness come, don't fight with it.

If real snake or dragon or snake appears, we should sleep, you know. Don't fight with it. It is too late to fight with it. Before it appears, you must do something with it. Hai.

Student C [David Chadwick]: As work leader, the biggest problem I have almost is trying to balance and juggle everybody's desires.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

David: And I don't feel-

Suzuki-roshi: "Juggle?" What do you mean? Oh. Oh. [David is probably imitating juggling.]

David: I'm-I feel sort of incompetent, you know. I-it's-I don't feel like being too much of an authority. But all the time, all day long, people tell me what they want and what they don't want. And I don't really get so angry. I try to do what they want as much as possible. But what-I don't feel like a teacher, you know?

Suzuki-roshi: No. [Laughs.]

David: And I-I-I don't know what to do. It's such a problem. What should I do when, you know-when I could just put people where I wanted them instead of where they want, it would be very easy. What do I do when I hear all day what people want?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. When they ask you something, mostly they are, you know, they are escaping from their [2-3 words]. So if possible, let-let them think about it. Let them decide, if possible. But that is not always possible. It is, you know-so that is a good practice, anyway. And if you have strong practice, you yourself, you know, strong practice-you cannot [2-3 words]. It is-again, it is matter of your practice. And how student-it is their own problem, not yours. Cannot be yours originally. But something like that happens doesn't-[it] means, you know, Tassajara practice is not so good. They are escaping, trying to escape from their, you know, own duty-putting the responsibility on work leader. It is no good.

Not so easy thing, but we should work on this point. This happens to all of us. So that is why we must be-each one of us should be-should have good practice, or else it doesn't work.

Student D: How can I best practice borrowing from Rinzai?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe pretty difficult [laughs], yeah. I think so. The other day someone talked about group practice, you know. But actually we need someone, you know, someone's help. If you do not have anyone to help, you should read. What kind of book is helpful is some Zen story, you know, with commentary is best. Actual story is best, not your-some philosophy or, you know, something like Japanese culture or something-not something like that.

Some actual story is best. And best, you know, story will be the story you have in your everyday life. That is best koan [laughs]. Why you cannot work on your everyday life as a Zen story is because you understand your own life, you-your own convenience. You don't, maybe-for an instance, you know, if you like diary, you know. It is difficult to describe what you have done on that day, you know. If you-if you write down, you may write down as if you are doing something very good everyday [laughs]. And you will be ashamed of it, you know: "Oh, I am not so good," you know. "I am bad." But actually I cannot write as if-I cannot write as I am, you know. If you are-if able to describe your life exactly as it is, you may be a great teacher. You are solving koan, but that is not so easy. If you write something about you, and if your husband read it, you know, he won't accept it. [Laughs.] But still you think, "I am right! He is wrong! He doesn't understand me!" That is not so. If you, you know, write about you so that everyone of your family understand, then you will be a great, great Zen master. That is good practice [laughs]. To describe yourself as you are, to say something as you are-that is good practice. And if you find it difficult, you should [2-3 words: practice right around?]. Okay? That is good practice.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center partial transcript (approximately 1 page) entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997, plus original transcription of remainder by Sara Hunsaker. Checked against tape by Bill Redican, March 13, 2000.

[1] From The Blue Cliff Record, Case 36: "Changsha Wandering in the Mountains."

[2] Changsha Jingcen Zhaoxien(Jap. Chosha Keishin): d. 868. Ch'an master.

[3] Shin Daichu (lit., "Chin, the Big Tiger.")

[4] Suzuki-roshi said "shusa" throughout, not "shuso."

[5] Verse 49, literally: "As a bee without harming the flower, its colour or scent, flies away, collecting only the honey, even so should the sage wander in the village" [Dhammapada, Narada Thera Vajirarama, 1963, p. 53].

[6] SR may have meant to say Baso Doitsu (Master Ma, Mazu Daoyi: 709-788), the Ch'an master who answered "Sun-Faced Buddha, Moon-Faced Buddha."

[7] Third case of The Blue Cliff Record, "Master Ma Is Unwell."

4 - On Bodhidharma's Day

Wednesday, August 04, 1971

On Bodhidharma's Day
Zen Mountain Center

Tomorrow is the Bodhidharma's Day. We will have-we have special ceremony this evening, and tomorrow also we will have special ceremony for him. As you know, he is the twenty-eighth patriarch from Buddha, [not] counting Buddha as the first, and he is twenty-eighth patriarch. I should like to introduce how he became a successor of Hannyatara, [1] the twenty-seventh patriarch, and then I want you [to] ask some questions. I will briefly introduce you [3-8 words unclear] twenty-eighth patriarch.

Hannyatara-sonja, [2] the twenty-seventh patriarch, asked Bodhidharma, "There are many things." [3] "Things" here means various things we see: stones, or mountains, or rivers, or ocean-everything we see and everything we think about. It include our various ideas we have. Those are "things."

"And what will be the thing which has no form-formless being-what will be the formless one?" Bodhidharma said, Fuki muso. [4] Fuki muso is rather difficult to [explain]-I must explain about it. But it is a kind of technical term. Fuki muso. Fuki is no-, non-arising. Muso is formless.

So it means that before things happen, you know, how it-no one knows how things happen, and how we started to think about things, no one knows. Before nothing arise, that stage is fuki muso. That was his [Bodhidharma's] answer. [Puts away paper.]

But my interpretation is still enough. And-and twenty-seventh patriarch asked him, "What is then the most great thing?" The-and Bodhidharma asked [answered], "The dharma nature is the most great thing." That is question and answer between twenty-seventh patriarch and Bodhidharma. It is rather difficult [laughs], to, maybe to understand. It is not something to talk about, actually, or to understand. But tentatively I have to give you some suggestion, you know. Even though I cannot explain it, as much as possible I have to explain.

Why is it necessary, you know, to-to have this kind of understanding of the situation where nothing happens here-nothing happens? It is almost, maybe impossible to, you know, think about. We don't know when this earth even, this earth started, actually, when the sun started or the various stars started. No one knows exactly when, but there must be-there are various scientists who knows various things, but that is not correct. No one knows correctly what-how this earth happens, how everything happens. But before it happens, things happen.

But it is possible, you know, for us to think about the stage [?], even though we don't know exactly how, but there must be some way things happen, and if so, there must be some stage [?] where nothing happens.

We Oriental people, you know, start to think about things, one big, you know, one big thing before everything happens. It is, in other word, one. We, you know, our understanding is based on the idea of one-one which is, you know, something. It is something. Our thinking mind start based on idea of some [?]. And your, you know, thinking mind start with many-the relation of many experiences and many forms, and accumulation of those many things is some big being like universe.

But our [Buddhist] way of thinking is opposite. We start from nothing-nothingness or emptiness or one. One will be from which things happen. For you, everything is some concrete entity existing, but for us, everything is at least a part of one big being. The difference is [that] for us nothing is existent. It is just a part of big being. That is Buddhist understanding of things. Do you understand the difference? We infer various idea from one, and you-you accumulate various experiences and scientific fact, and, you know, [you] try to understand one big being-what is, you know, this universe? That is what you call it [?].

And-so Bodhidharma here-Bodhidharma's answer is pointing at that one being which is origin of various existence. And this is also some big, great, great being. You cannot compare that great, great being to anything else. That great being include everything, and it is origin of everything. Everything start from that big being-comes out from the great being. So nothing is greater than that. That is the Bodhidharma's answer.

And actually, you know, how we have-we are able to have the approach to it-it doesn't make sense, you know, even though I talk about [it] this way, you know, it doesn't make any sense to you and to me too [laughs]. As long as we are interested in each existence which we can see-usually we stick to the things we see. So as long as our main interest is something you can see, you know, it doesn't make much sense, you know, to talk about something which you cannot understand or which you cannot see. If you stick-if I say how-how this universe started or how is it possible to make universe-even it is not universe-if I explain how human being can be buddha [laughs], then, an aggregate [?] up [of] many element, then you will be interested [in] what I'm talking about.

But we talk about something which you cannot experience, or which you cannot think about, doesn't, you know, make much sense for us. But here we have [1-2 words] in our understanding about things. And that is why we practice zazen: to have direct approach to this reality duality which is beyond our thinking. And when you are-when you experience, or when you have approach to this great being, that is enlightenment. And-and then, actually, every existence makes sense, even though it is not constant. It is not, you know-everything do not have any constant form or color. Itself it makes sense.

If each being comes first, then naturally you will stick to it, and the thing you see is each independent being. So, it is difficult to understand the relationship between one thing to the other. But if we understand each being is related being, or part of big being, then it is easier to understand the relationship between things-each existence, and easier to accept the teaching of non-duality and teaching of everything is changing.

Everything is a part of big being, you know, and that big being is not dead. It is always by itself automatically, you know, changing or going or moving. So we are a part of it. So if big being is always changing and moving, then we should, you know, we should move or change in the realm of big being. So it is easier to accept how we, you know, the way how we exist. It is easier to accept things-as-it-is. If you understand, you know, each being is independent, then it is very difficult to understand why, you know, we must have good relationship with each other. If possible, you know, you want to be independent. If possible, you want to cut off various relationship from [with] another being. That is quite natural tendency.

The understanding of each being [as] a part of big being, and understanding of each being goes first. But accumulation of various being in the great being is the two ways of, you know, thinking mind. Thinking mind goes two ways. It is possible to think both way. Mostly, you know, Oriental people think-think [1 word] way you think. For-for us, you know, it is-this is completely different, you know, and I started to talk about something about our practice now. Right now, I explained the way of thinking mind goes.

Your way of thinking is little bit, you know, inadequate to accept Buddhist way of thinking, actually. And to understand why you practice zazen, it is rather inadequate. And even though we will put emphasis on something, you know, some big being which goes first. Even so, it is inadequate to understand why we must practice zazen. It makes sense-zazen makes sense [laughs], but, you know, you-you will understand why we should have group practice, or why we should have good relationship between teacher and disciple, and why it is necessary to have [dharma] transmission. It is easier to understand, but not complete because it is, again, a kind of, you know, way of thinking. The nature of thinking mind is to limit the reality and to understand-to make reality easier to understand. That is the nature of thinking mind.

So what we think about is not real; it is a shadow of reality. So how we catch the shadow is, you know, through zazen practice. In other word, when we do not depend on thinking mind, then we will have real understanding of-about things, about yourself, and about things around you. That is zazen practice.

So, when we talk about Buddhism, there is two ways of, you know, two ways: One is-maybe three ways-it is by thinking mind, first of all. The next thing is to talk about something, you know, goes before our thinking mind happen. And the third one is to talk about our practice: How it is possible to have approach to the right-the three ways? And we put best emphasis on practice rather than thinking mind. We can understand in that way, briefly. This is outline of, you know-this is how you-how you have-how you can-everything [?] have approach to the reality.

To some other religion, reality can be a god or deity, but for us, you know, we have no special deity to worship, or no idea of god-independent god which controls every being. Each being-each being or-[SR rejects "being" for "reality."] Reality is how things exist. How things are going is understanding of the god for us.

What is god? Maybe it's you. If I ask you what is god, maybe, if you are Buddhist and because you are-you are not Oriental thinker, maybe everything is god-accumulation of everything: If you add up everything, that is god. You may answer in that way, you know. If you-if I ask some Chinese or Indian or Japanese, they may say, god is something which exist before each being exist. That is god, they may say. But if you ask really, you know, what is god, [they may answer], "You yourself is god-god."

But only when you practice zazen, you are god. And when you extend your understanding of you to everyday life, you are god. You may understand-and you may answer in that way. So we put great emphasis on the practice, because thinking mind does not make much sense.

Mmm. Okay, you know, I will stop [laughs]. To talk about [laughs] this kind of, you know-even though I talk about [it] over and over, it may be same thing. If you have tape, you can hear it again [laughs, laughter]. It is same thing, you know. And so that is why I want you to ask me questions. Then, you know, it may be easier to understand what I mean. Hai.

Student A: Is the world of the mind ... then I also hear you saying ... [1-2 sentences.] ... there's an actuality of the potential? [2-3 words] one is not differentiated.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. No. Uh-huh.

Student A: -then there are many [1-2 words] that its manifestation.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Manifestation, yeah. You-you-yeah. Manifestation of one big [1 word], you know.

Student A: Does it matter that one is on-on the [1 word] of the [1 word]?

Suzuki-roshi: One of-? "One of," we say, but actually it is one, you know. We-it looks like many-looks like many, actually, but it is one. They are one.

Student A: But does the memory at any given moment a-a totally-are they equal to the one? Isn't there more to the true potential than the one that is not manifest?

Suzuki-roshi: More potential-?

Student A: -at any given moment.

Suzuki-roshi: At any given moment-at some moment, you know, one-me, you know, has big potential, you know, because I-it is not possible to separate me from many being, you know-rest of the being.

Student A: What about those that aren't manifest?

Suzuki-roshi: It include which was manifested and which is-which will be manifested.

Student A: All of them.

Suzuki-roshi: All of them. One include, you know, things this way and this way [may be gesturing]-time span and space span. One include everything. That is right understanding. In that way we exist-each being exist. So it is not accumulation of many things.

You know, if you pick up something, this include everything. Before, you know-I don't know, there is no limit, you know, you cannot figure out how big it is. It looks like small. It looks like a cat. "Only a cat," you may say [laughs], but actually it include many things which exist in this moment and which existed before and which will exist in future.

That is true, isn't it?

So thinking mind goes, when, you know, you have no trouble in your thinking mind, it goes sssht!-in one moment from various directions. You may have heard Dogen-zenji [say] "thinking about non-thinking" and [3-6 words] [laughs]. If you, you know-if there is no trouble to understand in that way, your thinking mind goes to Buddha directly-ssst!-in one moment, when you say so, and it include, you know, Buddha and even before Buddha.

If you think, you know, many times, then, you know, each time you think will include everything. So times goes-usually we think time-time go this way, from past to future, but it is not so. From present to past. You are center of, you know, time and space. So time goes this way and that way. That is real, you know. You are real. If you cannot think in that way, why is because you stick to some-some idea of time and space which actually doesn't exist. It is convenient, you know-for convenience sake we say "time and space," but it is just idea and just, you know, way of thinking which doesn't exist. But it will help you understand it, you know, that's all. Then you shouldn't stick to the idea of time and space. That is enlightened mind. Okay?

Student B: How would you define "memory"? I don't understand that.

Suzuki-roshi: Memory-when you think about it, that is "memory," you know. So you include the memory. Memory-you think memory is something which existed long long time ago. So if you-if you have-if you stick to the idea of time, you know, what you will have in your mind about past is something which doesn't exist, but something you can keep it in memory. That is memory, isn't it?

Student B: [1-2 sentences intermittently unclear.] What about ...'s memory? The memory of a ... seems to be confused ... ?

Suzuki-roshi: That is-that is, you know, Buddhist [2-3 words]. That is not true, you know, quality said heresy of thinking mind. There is no [1-2 words].

Student B: [1-2 sentences unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: What?

Student B: [1-2 sentences unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Again, that is, you know, not Buddhist way of thinking. We have no soul, you know [laughs]. Your-our body, according to you-your science, our body is accumulation of cells, but that-that doesn't exist, actually. Modern, you know, physicists may-may not accept that kind of idea of-it is a kind of opposite [?], not actual being. Tentatively you can call it cell, but no such thing exist. That is maybe difficult for you to accept.

Student B: That's what it seems [?] to say.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah. Maybe so.

Student B: That's just a saying.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Nowadays that is what they say. More and more, you know, if you think more and more and more nothing [laughs]-just nature, you know. That is hossho,[5] we say. That is the greatest being, and it is-ultimate [?] dharma-nature-dharma-nature which covers everything, which can be a nature of various phenomenal being.

Student B: [2-4 sentences unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, yeah.

Student B: Then how does the experience [2-4 words] when you talk about how [2-4 words] practice.

Suzuki-roshi: The third one, third, not stream [?] but third way, you know-

Student B: Is this like-what I'm curious about is-is this what the Orientals call the Pure Land? Or is it something else?

Suzuki-roshi: Pure Land is-Student B: -a phenomenon [?]-an interacting [?] phenomenon [?] and-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. That is more like it, you know. That is so-called-it "Buddha-land." Buddha-land is big, you know, something, in which everything exist in harmony, you know, and we are a part of it, you know. We are ornament of the Buddha-land [laughs, laughter].

Student C: I was going to ask if the thought of it exists, what does exist?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? Nothing exist.

Student C: Nothing exists.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Nothing, you know-you think something exist, this exist, but not always in that way-changing moment after moment. That is dharma-nature, you know, which goes on and on and on. Hai.

Student D: Change exists.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student D: Change exists.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Change-something changes is-no, not "something"-but change exists, that's right [laughs]. I cannot do some things, you know-if I say so, it is already some emptiness which doesn't exist [laughs]. So it is-actually, you know, if we talk about [it] this way, this is very funny discussion. It doesn't exist at all [laughter].

Far better to invite some teachers [?] [laughs]. But if you make such a question to him, he may give up [laughs]. Hai.

Student E: [Long question-all unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: No. No. [Laughs, laughter.] That is, you know, is the difference between-between Buddhist and non-Buddhist, you know. In case of no change, you know, there is no need to-to have practice or no need to, you know, think about or no need to make effort, you know. Whether you are [1-2 words] or late [laughs], it doesn't matter. You may say, you can say so, but actually our practice-this, you know-our practice start from that point-actual problem we have. When we talk about it, there is no problem, but when ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

Why we have-no one give you any problem, but still we have problem because we cannot accept the reality as it-as it is. We don't know why, so our-something, some delusion-that is, we say, because of ignorance. Bec- [partial word]-if we know the reality as-it-is, no problem, as we said. But we cannot accept the reality as-it-is, unfortunately. But, you know, that we cannot accept as-it-is, is important. Because of it, human being exist, you know. Because human being doesn't care anything about ourselves, human being will not exist. Because of our delusion, you know, deluded mind or attachment, our ignorance will exist in that way. So "ignorance," we say, but it is again because we think-we discuss something in some light, in some special standpoint [?]. So ignorance it is-so actually ignorance itself is a part of buddha-nature. So if we [are], you know, enlightened of ignorance we are buddha. If we are not enlightened of ignorance, we are ignorant. [2-4 words, possibly in Japanese.]

Student E: Whenever you make it to enlightenment, [do] you still exist as human beings?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student E: If you're enlightened, do you physically exist as a human being?

Suzuki-roshi: If you-?

Student E: -exist as a human being?

Suzuki-roshi: If you enlightened, you will exist as a human being in one way; on the other hand, you will exist as a [1-2 words] of many being. Same thing, you know. We are, you know-we-each being has same value, in one way, but each one has different function and different form, you know, way it goes. But even though each being is different, but it is same-same being, you know. So ignorance and enlightened mind-if you [are] enlightened of ignorance, you are enlightened. If you are ignorant about enlightenment, you are ignorant.

So if you really understand how we exist, it include, you know, morality, our practice, our many, you know, human culture. It include not as a special culture only, but also, understanding of our being [?] as one of the beings of many beings. That is right understanding of real human being; but if your understanding is limited-limited understanding or human-centered understanding, or if you are-if our human culture is human-centered culture only, it doesn't make sense. We will be human culture more and more separated from the nature. That is what is happening to us now because we are-our way of thinking, our culture is too much human-centered culture. Our unders- [partial word]-our mind doesn't go beyond, you know, human culture.

Student F: Roshi, reincarnation is [3-6 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Incarnation?

Student F: Reincarnation. What do Buddhists believe?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, that is-it has been Buddhist belief, and no one can deny it, you know. It is difficult to say it doesn't exist. It is very difficult to say. [To say,] "It does exist" is easy [laughs], but we cannot-if you want to deny something,[6] it is very difficult, you know [laughs]. It is easy to say, "I am not enlightened." This is easy. But it is very difficult to say, "I have no easy [?] desires"-I have no such easy desire as you have. Can you [laughs] clearly declare in that way, you know?

Maybe, you know, your idea-the thought of reincarnation-someone may say it is-it is superstition. It is easy-it is not so easy to say that is superstition. You have to prove, you know, everything from every angle if you want to say that is-reincarnation does not exist. It is almost impossible to deny something, some idea which you have. So maybe we shouldn't [laughs]. It is better not [to].

And actually, some of you may say that is superstition. Some of you may say so, but he himself, you know, what exactly what he does, actually, is based on that kind of idea-idea of reincarnation. That is how he is-how human nature is going. I may die tomorrow, you know, but I-until I die, I think I will live tomorrow too. When I go to bed I think I am quite sure [laughs] that I can get up tomorrow at five o'clock. I am quite sure. But we cannot be so sure [laughs]. You see, we-I believe in my future life always. That is actually what we are doing. So it is more than belief, you know. [It is] actual life we have. Okay?

Student G: [Most of question unclear: 4-6 sentences.] Roshi, when you say that women ... say that ... I consider it in some way that it's like ... and I can't help but hear that you are not ....

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, but that is-[laughs, laughter]. [Unclear brief exchange among SR and students who are apparently reacting to the question.] Is that democratic [?]. Are you proud of that understanding [laughs]? Are you very proud of your understanding of us [?]. You know, you must be very sorry that you cannot understand in that way [laughs]. That is a very important point, which you miss-always missing, that point is always missing in our practice. You know, very important, but I have to ignore big, you know, hole you have in your-in your practice. You know, it is too much to say so.

It-it is, you know-our practice is-if we put the emphasis on that point [laughs], you-you will not stay here, I am quite sure. More and more, you know, as you understand the Buddhist teaching, our philosophy, more and more you will pay more attention, and, you know, less think [?]. You think you are something [1-2 words], but something is bound to-bound to [1-2 words] our thinking. That is human-centered way of life. That is very important point, you know.

Student G: [Partially unclear.] I think I've heard .... But as a ... female I ignore it because it's too much. I think, you know, that takes care of itself. I'll ... I think ... But it means I start to-to feel that [1-3 words] I just get upset. ...

Suzuki-roshi: Upset-

Student G: -it just can't mean anything [2-4 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Upset-you shouldn't be upset [laughs]. You should-should-you should enjoy instead of being upset. So you should do it step by step, a little by little. That is how you will [1-2 words: "treat it"?], you know, even though you feel you take care of it so that I than live [to] one hundred and fifty. "I am not so happy" [laughs]. If you take care of [1-2 words] or take care of migraine [?] or something else. I feel much happier if you, first of all, if you take care of yourself, you know. That is how you actually think [?]. That is Buddhist practice. I don't want to, you know, explain too much [laughs] or [1-2 words], you know. You understand? That is the main point: how to be Buddha.

Student H: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student H: Is there an ideal that you are aware of-is there any definition of masculinity and femininity [3-6 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Similarity?

Student H: Yeah. What's the ideal? [3-6 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: From-where it from? Where does it come from, you mean?

Student H: -in the Oriental mind.

Suzuki-roshi: Oriental mind.

Student H: -would there be any ideal of masculinity or femininity in [1-2 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Oriental-Oriental culture is very much, as you say, it looks like, you know. Hmm? [Responding to something said by a student.] [Laughs, laughter.] There are many reasons, you know. It is-there is, maybe-there are many reasons. One I can point to or more, but, maybe two-important point is-Buddhism or Indian thought is based on religious life of people who entered religious life after finishing their household life. Okay? That is one [1 word]. And in Mahayana Buddhism we put more emphasis on how to help people-how to help people. It is easier for-for-for us to help others when you are single. In Mahayana school, to help others goes first, and to help thems- [partial word]-ourselves is next-especially [for a] Mahayana priest.

Those two reasons I can, you know, give to you, I can count. And there are many something like-must be some like, you know, background which exist wherever you go-still exist-some discrimination man and woman-about man and woman, or some discrimination about sexual activity, you know. There are many reasons for it.

But there is no reason why we should [1-3 words] a man from-a woman from man or [4-6 words]. You know, that is, you know-when we-when we talk about the teaching from the reality, no discrimination, but when we talk about our practice, you know, there is some difference. It is actually easier for a man-for a single man to practice our way. It is easier, you know. And it is much harder for couple to practice our way. That's all. We-we have, you know, more special rules. Hai.

Student I: On that same talk [?], you talk of change, and you-everywhere changes always. And everything changes. But some things don't change because man can [8-12 words] everything else that changes.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, that-"everything changes" is a kind of, you know, law. That is why Buddha is called, you know, the teacher of the teacher. He is teacher of everything-demon [?], even, you know. Even though you go to heaven, things [are] changing.

Student I: I want to avoid the [1-2 words] I'm thinking of change and everything is still changing. And the way that I hear you is that there is change and there is everything else but change. But change does not change.

Suzuki-roshi: Change does not change, you know. No, it doesn't [laughs]. It is-it is not possible to deny the teaching [of] things changing. This is not possible.

Student I: Everything changes but change.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Everything change but change-change. Yeah. Yeah. That is very much so, and that is very important point. That is why we call dharma-nature, you know, nature. We don't say "dharma." If we say dharma it looks like something which does not change exists, you know. So we say dharma-nature-because it is nature it goes, it is nature's thing. Hai. Hai.

Student J: [Question unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: I think you understand. You are not [1-2 words], but nowadays [4-8 words]. You know, if you think so, you will have big trouble. You will be confused, you know. You cannot be honest with yourself. If you have children, you must face it. Or someone must face it. Your country at least must face it. Then we should pay tax [laughs, laughter]. And if you let other people, you know, raise your children, you don't feel good. Do you feel good? If you feel good, that is, you know, okay, but I don't think [3-6 words] Next time someone [4-7 words]. Anyway, to have children and to have family is one step to the problem [laughs, laughter]. You will have to know that, you know. Without, you know, being prepared for that, you know, if you get married that is big mistake. Hai.

Student K: Where there's a single person [1-2 words] freedom that a single person might practice. Maybe they go to a monastery and accept limitations-a very restricted situation. Why couldn't the couples use the limited situation of their family life that restricts them in certain ways-use that as a situation for practice? They [1-2 words] not use it in a monastic limitation.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughing as the latter part of the question is asked.] You know, it looks like possible, you know-it looks like possible, [but] actually [it is] very difficult. Well, that is actually what we are trying, isn't it? And we are doing pretty well, I think, even though we have, you know, problem. And still I think we need some single monk, you know, single monk or nun here, you know. And it-that is not so easy for single person or a married couple here. But if you understand our life, if you are mature enough, maybe it is possible. More and more, even though you are young, you are pretty mature.

So I-I hope you can manage it, you know. I hope, but still I see many difficulties. But it is good to have difficulties, you know, and if you don't have any difficulties, it is not fair [laughs] when everyone in the world having difficulties. To, you know, to exist without difficulties is not fair. You don't feel so good, you know. So I think we are doing pretty well, and I agree [with] what you say.

Student K: [1-2 words] most of our monks are married, and maybe it is a stabilizing factor in their lives. [2-4 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. Yeah. I think so. Normally it is so. But, you know, still when you become very idealistic, you know-some of us are very idealistic, so idealistics should stick to single life [laughter] because they feel good. So you shouldn't compare, you know, single life to married life, and we shouldn't say which is better or, you know-that is something which-which we shouldn't discuss so much. We should-if we-if we have good understanding, then we can live together-married couple and single together. Married monk and monk together.

Student L (David Chadwick): Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

David: I don't think that single men and women can exist any more themselves [6-8 words].

Suzuki-roshi: [1-2 words] imperfect?

David: How do think single men and single women live together and stay single?

Suzuki-roshi: With? With what?

David: How do single men and single women live together and be single men and single women? What-what magic do you have? [SR laughs, laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Give me one more kalpa [3-4 words]. I will tell you my magic. Many people still doing, you know, and many people, you know, have been doing, you know, have been doing pretty well. There must be some magic. And magic is [2 words] zazen practice. If you sit hard enough, you know, you can be single. Zazen practice is a kind of magic. That is true. I am not single, so I can-I cannot prove it. But many teachers have proved how to remain single, how to be authentic monk-Buddhist monk. The magic is zazen practice, that's all. If you say so, there is no magic. You have, you know, when your foundation or when your foundation of life is based on individualism, you know, that is not possible. When we-you believe in the oneness of man and woman, and non-duality, then that is possible. And how to actualize non-duality in our physical life is zazen practice. So, you know, zazen practice is something more than you think about. Hai.

Student M: [3-4 words] that when you say something that I don't fully [?] expect-

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student M: When you say something that I don't expect you to say, I can't believe that you don't exist when you say that you don't exist for me. I think, well, am I making you up? And then how can you say something that I don't expect? It's-what [2-4 words]. I don't understand who is talking when you are talking, and I don't really understand who is listening when I'm listening.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That is true. That must be so. You know, it is not you or me who is talking, and actually we are not talking about anything [laughs, laughter]. That is very true. So, you know, we say Buddha didn't say anything for nine-forty-nine years he didn't say anything, or we say "tongueless speech," you know. He has no tongue. It looks like he is talking about something.

That is very good, you know-it was big koan for well-trained Zen master. Me or you is not qualified enough not to talk about this kind of, you know, koan because this kind of koan could be discussed when we have no attachment [to] what I say or what you listen to. It is actually, you know, same thing. Mountain speak, river speak, insect speak, you know, Buddha's teaching. Whatever you see, that is Buddha's teaching. Right understanding of it is not to have special, you know, eyes or ears to see, but it means just to listen to it, you know. That which exist is not mountain or not-not you, but, you know, something which result between you two. A sound-not insect or not you, but sound. That is more true, you see? So actually I'm talking about [that] which you can understand, you know. I am not fooling about-fooling around either. I am talking about some ultimate truth which I can accept and which you can accept, that's all. Nothing special. But you feel I am talking about something special because your way of thinking is very special, that's all.

Oh. [Probably sees how late the hour is.]

-----

Source: City Center transcripttranscribed by Barry Eisenberg. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape by and made verbatim by Bill Redican (10/19/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Japanese for Prajñadhara (Prajñatara), "Pearl of Wisdom," the 27th Indian Patriarch.

[2] -sonja: An honorific title for Hannyatara, roughly corresponding to the Japanese -daiocho or -soshi (the latter used for Bodhidharma).

[3] Suzuki-roshi is translating the traditional transmission exchange between Prajñadhara and Bodhidharma: "The Buddhist master Prajnatara asked Bodhidharma, 'What among things is formless?' Bodhidharma said, 'Nonorigination is formless.' Prajnatara asked, 'What among things is greatest?' Bodhidharma said, 'The nature of reality is greatest.'" (Transmission of Light, Keizan Jokin's Denko-roku, translated by Thomas Cleary, San Francisco, North Point Press, 1990, p. 118.)

[4] fuki muso: fu ("no"); ki ("away") [?]; mu ("no"); so ("form").

[5] Hossho: The real nature of the phenomenal world; the original state of phenomena.

[6] Perhaps "to prove a negative."

5 - Bodhidharma

Thursday, August 05, 1971

Bodhidharma
Zen Mountain Center

If you want to practice in its true sense so that you may not regret what you have been doing, it is necessary for you to have good confidence in your practice. This is very important, or else it is not possible for [you to] practice true way. There may be many great teachers in various countries, but even though there are great teachers, if your way-seeking mind is not strong enough you cannot study. Even though you meet him, you don't know who he is.

Tonight I want to introduce the story between Bodhidharma and Butei in China.[1] Bodhidharma went to-arrived at China [in] 520, according to traditional record, and he lived with the King of the Liang. And he-the king, who was a great supporter of Buddhism, he built many temples, and he studied himself-by himself-you know, he studied Buddhism and a great teacher-daishi.[2]

He himself was already good scholar, and at the same time a great scholar-supporter of the Buddhism. As soon as Bodhidharma arrived at China he visited the king. And this is a very famous story, as you may know.

The king asked him, "What is Buddhism? What is Buddhism?" Bodhidharma's answer was [6-8 words unclear][3] is like a clear sky. And "there is no sage"-it means that also "no sage or no common people." That was his answer. And so Butei asked him again: "You say there is no sage or no common people, then who is you-who is sitting on front of you-who is you?" he asked, you know, and his answer was, "I don't know." [Laughs.] That was Bodhidharma's answer. This is very famous question and answer between Bodhidharma and the king.

Last night I told you something about usual understanding of our life and Buddhist understanding of life and Oriental, you know, way of thinking in comparison to your way of thinking. The difference- Although the king knew Buddhism very well, but his understanding, his way of thinking, his way of supporting Buddhism was something like, you know, materialistic. He supported many, you know, priests, and he himself studied Buddhism and built a temple and set up-helped setting up various ceremonies too. And in Japan and in China, still we are observing the ceremony he set up-he, you know, helped setting up the way of observing ceremonies.

So apparently he is a great supporter of Buddhism, but the way he support is, you know, in one word, materialistic, which is, you know, based on accumulating the merit, accumulating, you know, visual materialistic practice and observation of ceremonies, and more intellectual understanding of Buddhism, or philosophical understanding of Buddhism. That was his way.

So, in short, many goes first, you know, accumulation of many goes first, while Bodhidharma's way is-start from nothing, start from one, you know. "One is everything. Everything is one." That is what we always say. Form is emptiness and emptiness is form. But for-for us, emptiness comes first. Or one comes first, and many comes next. One and many.

The king's way was-the king's way is, "Many comes first." Many is more materialistic, more substantial. Many, you know. And accumulation of many will eventually become great-that is more or less his way. And so to his, you know-and knowing Bodhidharma's way-(ah-excuse me) [may have dropped mike]-the king's way, Bodhidharma said "no merit" [laughs]. No sage or no common people because this-because he must-they must have talked more about it, according to the record. He told him-told Bodhidharma about what he did and what will be the merit of building temples or helping students or teachers-what will be the merit? Bodhidharma says no merit [laughs]-no merit comes first, while king's way is many comes first. In short, emptiness comes first. One big great empty being comes first. It's opposite.

But if you understand-if the king understand what Bodhidharma says, then his, you know, merit will make sense. But he couldn't understand what he says. No merit or no sage or no common people. If the king understand, you know-

Why it is so important for us to understand what Bodhidharma said is a growing [?] of your practice is in the realm of duality or accumulation of many merit. Like "I have [2-4 words] for three years, four years, ten years," you know. "How many years" comes first. It doesn't make sense. And you will be regret[ful] later. "I have been practicing zazen so many years," [laughs] "but, you know, nothing happen." That will be, you know, how you feel after accumulating your practice-its merit of practice. And actually, it is just, you know, from great [?] Buddhist viewpoint, it is just, you know, a speck of dust. Even though you say, "[For my] whole life I have been practicing zazen." But whole life just a speck of, you know, just one moment.

So when you are-maybe when you become old or when you are dying, you know, you are one-your one life [?]-you are sixty or seventy or one hundred years of life is just one moment. So accumulation of many doesn't make sense.

When everyday practice- Only when everyday practice makes sense, you are-you will not regret of your practice later. This is very important point. Why it is so is-it is-it may-may be, even though I say so, you may think it may be difficult for you to accept it. But anyway, I have to explain it. If every day of your many days' practice is directly related to the somethingness or emptiness which exist forever, then everyday practice makes sense.

I'm not talking about something very unusual. I know some of our students [are] practicing very hard, sacrificing without doing something he should do [?]. He will stay here, you know, without helping his mother or his father because he think it is necessary for him to stay here and practice our way. So naturally his practice will be very sincere. But if his practice is based on the idea of accumulation of many [1 word] practice or accumulation of merit-it doesn't make sense.

And some of you may think "I want to practice, true practice. And I ... want to see some great teacher and practice with him," but, you know, it is difficult for you to know who is a great teacher and who is not, unless you have eyes to see or eyes to tell who is great and who is not. Maybe you feel "I know if I see him-I may know who is great and who is not," [laughs] but I wonder.

Why do I wonder who is-because of his eyes, his way of thinking. His eyes is not clear enough. His way of understanding is not clear. For him, you know, if someone looks-looks like [laughs] a great teacher, you know, he is a great teacher. But if you have eyes to see, even-even a common, you know, teacher who doesn't know not much about Buddhism could be a great teacher. And actually there is that kind of really good teacher, but you cannot see them-how good they are.

So as long as you have arrogancy [?], it is impossible to have good practice and it is impossible to have a kind of life you will not regret later about what you have-what you have been doing.

Why do I give lecture every night like this is to help you to have, you know, good eyes and good understanding and good confidence in your eyes to say [see?] what is teacher, what is the-what is Buddhism. If Buddhism is something, you know, written up, you know, in a book like this [probably holds up a book], Buddhism is already waiting for you.

But actually it is not so. The most important point is to have good confidence in your eyes-dharma eyes. When you trust your eyes' understanding of Buddhism, then that, you know, that will eventually bring you good practice-good confidence in you-and you, more and more, your dharma eye will open. Dharma eyes is not something which someone will give you, you know. You should-you yourself should open your dharma eyes, you know. Actually, I am talking about how to open your dharma eyes, and how you can practice your way in its true sense wherever you go. That is, you know, what I am trying to [do].

I a- [partial word]-I [am] always telling you that intellectual understanding doesn't take so much-intellectual understanding of real and real [?] practice. The difference between them is very great, you know. Intellectual understanding cannot be actual, you know, enlightenment. But we can open, you know, our dharma eyes even though it is impossible to attain enlightenment by some other-some other [1 word]-you-unless you yourself attain enlightenment, no one can, you know-maybe [someone] can help you, but no one can give you real attainment.

So you yourself should attain enlightenment. But if you want to attain enlightenment, you will not have right practice, and you will not have right dharma eyes. That is why I am continuing this kind of lecture.

As it is-as Bodhidharma said, I think I must explain some more about his question-question and answer between Bodhidharma and the king. As I said, Bodhidharma-the king asked him, "What is the first principle?" Bodhidharma said, "In the realm of clear"-it doesn't say dharma world, but-"In realm of clear dharma world, there is no sage or no common people." That is Bodhidharma's answer. And the king asked him again, "Who is you in front of me?" And Bodhidharma said, "I don't know." And so-but the king couldn't understand what he meant by "no sage or no common people," or "I don't know who-who I am." He couldn't understand.

So Bodhidharma crossed the river-Yangtse River, and went to northern country. And he stayed [at] Shao-lin Mountain[4]-Suzan-Shao-lin Mountain in Suzan and practiced hard for nine years, facing to the wall [laughs]. That was the old story. The vast dharma world of no sage or no common people is the world of emptiness-the world of first principle. That is first principle. That is answer, you know, no sage, and no mountain, and no river. Nothing exist. All those things exist, but nothing exist. It is the actual, you know, reality of the world or-of dharma world.

It looks like the mountains and rivers and animals and human beings and everything-it looks like so, but actually-it looks like so, but nothing exist in its true sense because, as I explained intellectually, everything is changing.

Tentatively I exist here, but-they say, everything is changing. Six million [laughs]-six million-more than six million Buddhist scripture says. So six million and it is-nine million, or six million nine hundred and sixty-oh-ninety-six hundred thousand-oh, I don't know how to count [laughs]. I am already lost [laughs, laughter]. And nine hundred eighty thousand [laughs] in one day can change so many times, scripture says. So if we change so many times in just in one day, you know, we cannot exist in the same way. We haven't exist in the same way.

But anyway, it looks like I am here. But in its strict sense, it is changing rapidly like a electric-electric light bulb, you know. In it, you know, electric current going back and forth like this. I don't know how many times, you know, it goes. It looks like one place, but it not so actually.

And same is true with us. So it looks like there is sage and there is common people, but in reality, nothing exist. But something is changing, we say, you know-changing to, you know, [2-3 words]. Change- Change exist, but nothing exist. If we can say is [1 word: "really"?] is not existent. That is what you said, you know.

[Bodhidharma said:] "It looks like I am here and you are there. You are king and I am a, you know, priest or monk or Zen master. But it is not actually so. You are very proud of your merit of building temples and, you know, observing various ceremonies and help be [?] instructed in zazen. It looks like so, but actually what-what did you do? No sage, no [1-2 words], or no priest. That was what he said.

It is-it is so, but that is not all. Even so, even if it so, as we discussed last night, even it is so, you know, if you-if you not-as long as you are here, if you do not get up for zazen, you don't feel good, [1 word: "knowing"?] there is no practice, or no Tassajara, or no monk [?]. Whatever you it is nothing but [1-2 words]. Even though you understand in that way, actually what you feel is different. How we can change our feeling from this kind of confusion-confused mind or suffering to joy of practice is the point.

So purpose of practice, actually, to change this kind of ignorance to the wisdom, or to-to be enlightened of those ignorance is our purpose of practice. Unless you reach Bodhidharma already [2-3 words]. So he [2-3 words]. But if I say so, you know, it is-I-I help [?] you. Crazy [laughs] crazy monk. I cannot say so. I cannot open such a big mouth [?]. I can explain it, but I myself do not feel in that way.

But I am very much encouraged about this kind of understand- [partial word]-way of thinking and way of practice that is-that is for us [?] and continuing this kind of practice. When you open this kind of dharma eyes, then wherever you go and you will see your teacher. You will have eyes to see your teacher. And even though you find a good teacher you will not, you know, stick to the teacher. You will not rely on your teacher completely. And you will continue your own practice by aid of the teacher. Then what you will find out through teacher-there is some possibility for you to find good teacher.

If you think there must be some good teacher somewhere [laughs], that is-the idea of-already idea of existence which is not Buddhist way of thinking. No teacher-no true teacher exist as long as your dharma eyes is, you know, stick to the idea of existence.

And there is two heresy to misunderstand it. One is idea of non-existence, and the other is idea of existence. If you say "I exist," that is idea of existence. And if you say, "I don't exist, actually, because things are changing," that is also heresy. That is idea of non-existence. What is real understanding is the understanding which goes beyond existence and non-existence. That is real understanding.

So real understanding is, you know-if you ask what is real understanding, I may say existence-idea of existence. And sometime someone ask me again what is, you know, your-what is Buddhist idea of life? And I say "non-existence." [Laughs.] My emphasis is sometime existence and sometime non-existence. And there is no contradiction if you, you know, if you-even if you intellectualize, if you understand what is reality.

Idea of existence and idea of non-existence. Joken[5] and danken. [Next sentence essentially sung by Suzuki-roshi in Japanese.] Danjo no niken gyonen to shite shozu.[6] That is, you know, a way of our life. Danjo. We don't stick to idea of existence or idea of non-existence. Our mind is very clear. No cloud. Cloud is-idea of existence or non-existence is cloud. No cloud whatsoever. It is like a clear sky. That is Buddhist way of understanding. I already repeated this point over and over again-idea of contradiction. The reality is always, you know, in contradiction.

Maybe it is better to talk-to have question and answer so that you can fully participate in this kind of, you know, discussion. Hai.

Student A: You're left with ... whereas if you ... another ... in fact ... encouraging ... The practice is an inheritance. The difficult thing is what do you do with the form [?]. Or how do you the practice ...?

Suzuki-roshi: How you-how-yeah. Yes. How you use is you can-how I try to encourage you is, you know, to encourage you to have confidence in your practice, you know. Every night you come zazen you repeat some words [?]: Nanzo gikano gassho bozatsushite. Nakokono jinsho [all phonetic]-I am try [?], you know. "How can I give up my rakusu and [go] wandering about?" That is, you know, how I encourage you. It does not mean you should stay here, you know. But wherever you go, you must have full spirit in your practice, because if you cannot practice right now, here, there is no time for you to practice true way. If you think, "If I go somewhere else, then there will be some good teacher." That is already, "I'm afraid. I'm afraid." You are, you know-your thinking-way of thinking is idea-involved in idea of existence, which is not-which is one-sided view which is not true. Why good teacher is ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: Will one's teacher appear when one is ready? Will this happen or must one seek a teacher?

Suzuki-roshi: Look for teacher? Excuse me, I-I am very-

Student B: When-when the student is ready to be taught, will the teacher appear, or must the student go and seek a teacher?

Suzuki-roshi: Student-

Student B: When the student is ready-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student B: -the teacher is-

Suzuki-roshi: I-I-I understand, you know. When, you know, you say "when student is ready." When-it means that when your practice is-you are-when you have-when you are ready, you-you can tell, you know, whether your teacher is, you know, right teacher or not because of your dharma eyes. If he, you know, is involved in one-sided view of existence or non-existence, he is not right teacher.

And another point is, you know, whether what he says and what he actually does, you know, to some extent, you know, it should be well-balanced. Not completely-it is impossible to have complete balance, you know, as we are human being. But to some extent, you know, there must be some balance. That is another point.

It is, you know, from dharma eyes-dharma eyes can tell whether his understanding is right or wrong, you know. And another point is whether his practice is really good or bad. You can't-I'm sorry to criticize. You can see, you know, easily can see what he says and what he does. If you-if you-there must be some balance-understandable balance.

So, you cannot tell by a book who you love [?], you know. You cannot tell by-by his speech. Or you cannot tell just by his zazen practice. The point is whether his zazen practice is extended in his everyday life. That is very important. So you, you know, your dharma eyes, you know, like-like-like your eyes to see which way to go, you know, which teacher you should teach cheese-choose.

And your practice, you know, understanding of practice is another, you know, something like your foot, you know. You should walk by your foot. So it is necessary to-to have two points: this and this [presumably points to two things]. Actual, you know, some actual cut [?]: not just eyes or knowledge or intellectual understanding or philosophy. Even though he knows he has a big knowledge about Buddhism, he cannot be always good teacher for you. If you want to be the same kind of teacher, it is okay. But if you are-if you want to practice our way as a part of your life, then, you know, you cannot follow that kind of teacher. Okay? Hai.

Student C: ... thinking mind and ... if you don't know what to do and you don't feel that the behavior ... let you know, is it because you don't really know ... or is the viewing [being?] not necessarily the same as the knowing?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Being [and] knowing should be same, but [it is] difficult, you know, to be same. Knowing is something different than doing [laughs]. I am sorry. [Laughter.] Yeah. That is very-very much so-very much so, but even though many people-many Buddhist teachers are like that, but there is no reason why you should follow their example [laughs]. You cannot criticize them, you know, as they are also-they have karmic life too, you know, because it is difficult to be free from its own karmic life, you know. It is difficult. So we cannot criticize.

But you should know that it is his karmic life and that is his practice and that is his understanding. That is [what it means to have] dharma eyes, you know. If you have that-that kind of eyes, you know, then your teacher, you know-your teacher cannot be-could be anyone. But you will-the point is you will receive little encouragement [laughs] if his [1 word: "style"?] of practice is not so strong, you know, he will, you know, he will not help you so much. But he is good teacher, even though he has, you know, not much, you know, encouragement for you. But if you, you know, if your situation of practicing Zen is very, you know, immediate, difficult situation, then that difficulty will help your practice-your-that difficulty will encourage your practice.

Difficulty exist when, you know, when you want to do-for an instance, Tozan-daishi[7] was one of the maybe greatest scholars in Chinese Buddhist history. He-he is-his mother was-his family-his parents was very-were very poor, and he was-he had-six [?] elder brothers. But he was not so good. So he-his mother couldn't depend on him so much, so it was he who could help his mother. But Tozan-for Tozan, Buddhism is everything, and who-and he had great confidence in study of-in practice of Buddha's way.

So eventually he became a great Zen master after all. And he became a master of Sozan.[8] So hearing about this, his mother, you know, wanted to visit him, but he was-she was so fevered and so old and so poor, and he-she became a-she became blind. She couldn't eat so much. Blind-she became a blind beggar, but before-she thought before she die, she must see her son who became a great Zen master already.

But Tozan-his students said your mother came. But Tozan said she cannot enter. It's not- You should stay- She should stay out! [Laughs.] And, you know, you may think he is very vicious. But everyone thinks Tozan will be the most kind-kind-hearted man for his mother. He wrote many letters to her about Buddhism and how to practice Buddhism and how to help her [1 word] by practice of Buddhism. He may did [?] every way-every possible way to help his mother. There is no such Zen master to have-so kind Zen master for mother.

But he didn't see [1 word] and at last his mother died outside-outside the monastery. And so he told, you know, children to have funeral for her. And when he saw her, he found out little rice on her back, so he pulled out the rice and said, "This-this rice is less [of an] orphan, you know, than my mother."

So he took it for breakfast-he said so-[as] next morning's breakfast. He asked his student, you know, this is her last offering for us. Please accept it. What is big [?] is very simple. And way he helped her is very simple-write, just write letter. But he couldn't help his blind mother even. But everyone acknowledged that he will be the most kind-kindhearted Zen master we ever had in China or in Japan.

Student D: ... my theory that ... that relationship ... and the relationship ... they always have ... a part of the message. And it seems to me that whatever else she could do for them she already did.

Suzuki-roshi: What-what-what in that story-some of them are just story; some [laughs]-some of them is real stories-not stories [laughs]. And there is some meaning, you know, you know, each-Student D: .... And it seems to me that-Suzuki-roshi: It is not truthful. Again, you know, that is your way of thinking. Youthful [truthful?] or thinking mind does not solve this kind of, you know, problem-you know, problem in our heart. If your way-seeking mind-if you are confidence in your teaching is very strong, that will happen, I [1-3 words].

But that doesn't, you know, happen to everyone [laughs]. It didn't happen to me-only for, you know, one or two lay people. The mind will [1 word] our teaching. It shows us the depth of the teaching, that's all. He [Tozan?] cannot be your example, and there is no need for you to follow his example. I am not, you know, encouraging you to follow his example.

Student D: [2-4 words] why you [2-4 words] why do you [1-2 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: You don't understand the depth of wisdom [?] and real practice of Zen, that's all. And you will say "Why? Why? Why?" [Laughs.] That makes-doesn't make sense. And after you understand what is Buddhism, and after you practice very hard, you know, then that kind of thing could you understand, you know, after a long long practice or great great teacher. I cannot understand, actually.

Student E: Why do you call it [1 word]?

Suzuki-roshi: Why do I-?

Student E: [Entire question unclear.] [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: [2 words.] That is your way. Most people are like that. So your practice, you know, easily like this. If it is necessary, if it-if it is good I listen to you, and if it is something which I cannot understand, it is-it is waste of time to listen to that kind of lecture. That kind of question is the most discouraging question for me, you know. Instead of being encouraged by Zen story, you, you know, you think it is not-[you say] "I cannot understand." Something you cannot understand is no good-no use. That is [1 word: "pragmatist"?]. That is the most materialistic attitude toward the truth. Do you understand? [3-4 words.]

So your way-even though your way of life looks like maybe [?] Buddhist life, but in its true sense, you have no backbone! How can you find yourself something which is different you don't take? You don't grow in that way. Your practice is not strong enough, and you do not have spine, you know. So wherever you go, even though you meet great teacher, it doesn't make sense to you. Great teacher has-all the good-great teacher has that kind of spine [?]. In one way, he is very gentle, but on the other hand he is very strict with [1 word]. And his backbone is always straight [laughs]. That is, you know, that is Buddhism. That is the difference between city [?] way and Zen way [laughs]. Don't you think so? Doesn't work. Only [1 word] way doesn't work. You will need, you know-I don't say you will [laughs], but-you will need some backbone.

Because Tozan had that kind of backbone, he could, you know, be a good example. He could support Zen Buddhism in China. We don't need such a great teacher-so many. But one is enough. If he really, you know, if he was really kindhearted person, on the other-on the other hand, which is-which has been devoted himself completely to the Buddha [?].

What he is saying is "nothing whatsoever [2 words]." He completed the teaching of mujo seppo.[9] Mujo seppo means [1-2 words: "welcome"?] teacher of mountain and river. It-many good teachers discuss about it, and think about it, practice about it. That was not enough. But he completed that practice. When he has no, you know, tainted mind. When his mind become very clear, even free from-even, you know, when his mind is like a mirror, without any doubt [?], then he can talk about-he can listen to the-[1-2 words] speech of mountain and river. We say, "Wherever you go if you see flower, that is the teaching." If you go to the mountain, that is teaching. That is not mujo seppo-teaching of mountain and river. Only when your mind become like a mirror, you know. Everything reflect on the mirror is teaching. As long as your mind is self-centered mind: "This is good. This is bad. Human beings should be like this or like that." Then, you know, you cannot listen to the voice of nature.

It is possible, you know, to listen to the mountain or river. When your way of life is so selfish, so self-centered, so idle, that is big mistake for us. How long time it takes to accomplish-to listen to the teaching of mountain and river? There were disciple of the Sixth Patriarch named-excuse me-his name [1 word] Echu-Nanyo Echu.[10] He started to talk about the teaching of mountain and river-mujo seppo. And it took almost-more than hundred years before he-Tozan completed that study. Not many teachers can accomplish that kind of study.

But in America, how many people talking about teaching of nature? The meaning is completely different. But I am interested-interested in what you say, you know, because it makes some sense. But if you think this is Buddhist way-that leads to mistake [?]. If you think [thumps table with each of the next six words for emphasis] this is-should be-human way, then it means that all [thumps table for rest of sentence] the [2 words] way is human way. I cannot accept [?]. But how you feel is good [?]. And try to free from-try to be free from our framework of society is-makes sense. Maybe one step toward the real practice.

If you-if all the students in Tassajara stick to this idea and having Tassajara, you know, [thumps table five times] we have Zen Center here. If you say so, I couldn't stay here. If you do not say so, I am trying to listen, to welcome teachers and mountains and rivers at Tassajara. I can accept it [2-3 words]. But if you say [thumps for each word] I am hearing every day, I am [1-2 words], and nature helps you, and we are helping you-that is Buddhist way. If you say so, without [laughs] knowing what kind of effort you are making, I cannot accept it.

In human life we have enough difficulty. It is big mistake [to think?] if you can escape from our human difficulty unless we make big effort to establish real way-real non-human-centric culture. That is our duty. If you are really involved in this kind of big duty, your mother will be actually, you know, happy to have that-that kind of boy who is strong enough and good enough to support all the human being. And without this kind of confidence, you cannot understand what is Buddhism. If you understand something which is good only, avoiding which is not difficult-which is difficult [corrects self], then , you know, you cannot enter from Tassajara gate, you know [laughs]-you will be [1-2 words] the gate we have [laughs]. But you cannot enter, even though you think you are-you are inside of the gate, but you are not. And so you are a little bit [laughs] angry [1 word] you.

But I am very happy to be angry with you [laughs]-to be able to be angry with you, because I feel some support from you. So I can, you know, I am able to be angry with you. I think if I say this much, some of you will agree with me. And some of you will accept the real spirit of Buddhist. Do you understand how difficult thing it is to talk about-even to talk about Buddhism?

I know several student who are, you know, practicing hard. So as long as we have some students, I am happy to stay here. Okay? [Laughs.] Still, you know, you don't have to explain what is Buddhist to your friend in this way. "Buddhism is, you know, some teaching." Another example of Buddhist is to get [?] serious [?] guy out the monastery [laughs, laughter]. Maybe that is very bad example [laughs, laughter], but that kind of thing is possible to happen here [laughs]. Okay?

You have got much fever [?], you know. That much possibility in your practice. So you don't have to be always good or, you know, a good son. If you are really, you know, trying to be a good Buddhist, you don't have to be confined in the framework of usual society. You have big freedom [laughs]. Bigger is waiting for you. You will be-you will have very good. Don't cry, you know, even though teacher didn't understand you. "It's okay, come here," Buddha may say, you know. That is what-I think you have big, you know, advantage in your practice because of this.

When I was, you know, young, my master was very strong person [laughs]. So wherever, you know-as long as I am in [2 words] I could do anything I like, you know. I could say anything I want to say. Whatever they say, it was okay with me because strong master is there-was there. And if I do something wrong, my master will scold me, but not my neighbors. If I am wrong-"Tell my master what I did," I said. "My master will scold me if I am wrong. And tell my master exactly what I did." You see? Exact-exactly what I did. You don't have to protect him. If I am wrong, my master will scold me. I am quite sure about it.

So as long as I say something from bottom of my heart, it was authentic [?]. It was [2 words] because he is responsible for what I did-what I do. And if I am wrong, I should say "excuse me," you know. And I should say, "Excuse me" to-to him-to him. That's all.

So Zen master should be very strong in one hand [?]. Without this kind of spirit-truthful spirit to the truth or strong confidence in our mind-pure mind, we cannot practice [1 word: "here"?]. That is why you have big freedom, you know [laughs]. You should [1-2 words] to be a Zen monk. That is true. But we shouldn't mix up usual Zen [2-3 words] with true mark of master.

I wanted to have new [?] questions [4-6 words]. I continued thanks to ask good question [laughs]. I am very sorry [?]. But now is, you know, not much schedule [?] for us, so we give [get?] up.

Thank you very much.

-----
Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Bill Redican (2/23/01). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Suzuki-roshi is referring to Case 1 in The Blue Cliff Records or Case 2 in The Book of Serenity:

Emperor Wu: "What is the highest meaning of the holy truths?"

Bodhidharma: "Empty, without holiness."

Emperor Wu: "Who is facing me?"

Bodhidharma: "I don't know."

Butei: Chinese Bu + -tei, emperor. Also Emperor Wu or Liang Wudi (502-550). Butei founded the Liang (Ryo) Dynasty in southern China. One of the first Buddhist emperors, he built many temples, translated sutras, and lectured on Buddhism.

[2] daishi: Japanese dai, great; + shi, teacher or master. Hence, posthumous honorific title meaning "great master" or "great teacher."

[3] On Page 4, Suzuki-roshi said Bodhidharma's answer was: "In the realm of clear dharma world, there is no sage or no common people." So this unclear passage may be similar.

[4] Shao-lin Monastery was founded on Sung Mountain, Henan Province, in 477 by Emperor Hsiao-wen of the Northern Wei dynasty. Sung Mountain is the central peak of China's Five Peaks.

[5] jo (eternal); dan (stop); ken (style of looking at the world; view; philosophical school). Joken: the doctrine that the world is eternal. Danken: the doctrine that nothing survives death.

[6] danjo (danjo-niken: the two extreme views of joken and danken); no (as); ni (two); ken (views); gyonen (concentrate); to shite (become); shozu (appear). That is, "It is easy for us to formulate danken or joken, but it is difficult to keep to the middle way and avoid the two wrong views." Or "It is easy for danken and joken to appear as opposite extremes."

[7] Tozan Ryokai (Dongshan Liangjie), 807-869. The story of Tozan's mother can be found in Transmission of Light (Denko-roku), translated by Thomas Cleary, San Francisco: North Point Press, 1990, p. 165.

[8] Sozan Honjaku (Caoshan Benji), 840-901.

[9] mujo: insentient beings; seppo: to preach orally or by other means. "Mujo Seppo" is the 53rd fascicle of Dogen-zenji's Shobogenzo: "Insentient Beings Speak Dharma."

[10] Japanese name for Nanyang Huizhong (675?-775?), early Chinese Chan master and student of Huineng, the Sixth Patriarch. Also known as Chu-kokushi (Jap.).

6 - Communication

Saturday, August 07, 1971

Communication
Zen Mountain Center

I want to discuss with you about, you know, how you study Zen. Zen is actually, in short, maybe, communication-communication-communication between your friend, and communication between your teacher and disciple-

Can you hear me? Oh.

-communication between teacher and disciple, and communication between we human being and our surrounding-communication between man and nature. This is, in short, Zen. To have perfect communication-wherever you are-to have perfect communication and you and the outside world.

Communication-if we say "communication," it looks like there is subject and object, but true-if you understand real relationship between each existence, it is originally one, and tentatively we understand in two ways-two duality-dualistic way, so it is quite natural for us to have perfect communication between each being, and why it is difficult to communicate with each other is because our mind is always in duality.

That is why it is difficult to communicate. So perfect communication-there is actually nothing to say, even, and when there is nothing to say, that is zazen practice [laughs]. You don't have to say anything when you sit. And yet you have perfect communication with everything. So when you understand-if you want to study Zen, first of all you should know how to study Zen. How to study Zen is to-to be acquainted always, you know, to your surroundings, and that is how you have, for an instance, dokusan with your teacher. Perhaps when you come to dokusan you feel as if you want-you must have some question to ask [laughs], you know, but it is not necessary so. It is not always so. When you are very attentive, then even though you have no question to ask, if you enter the room and see your teacher, then-and you should be very alert-alert enough to see what is the mood of the teacher today [laughs]. Is he happy or unhappy [laughs], you know, is-is-is he busy or not so busy, or is he ready to accept you or not? You should be very attentive. And that is how you practice Zen.

Actually, if you are a Zen student, then you should be very-or you should be always alert. How to be alert is-alert is, as much as possible to-to be attentive to your surrounding, without having personal preference, or without being involved in your own feeling. That is very important point.

If you come to Zen Center, maybe, I hope you feel as if you are, you know, students. We say "Zen student," and so you must be a kind of student, but you are students who study Zen. You are not students who are studying something, you know, mathematics or geology or science or physics. You-you are studying who are you, and who is your teacher, and what kind of relationship we have between us. And it is more like community, because we are always trying to understand with each other and trying to help each other. So how to help each other is how to-first of all you should understand your friend first. Unless you understand your friend, it is difficult to help. Even though you know your friend pretty well, as we are human beings, sometime you will [be] sun-faced Buddha. Your friend will be sun-faced Buddha. And sometime moon-faced Buddha [laughs]. Sometime he will be sick, and sometime he will be emotional.

So you should know how he is today [laughs]. You should say always, "How are you? How are you?" [Laughs.] It is not just greeting. It means-it is very important to know how is your friend, how is [1 word] your teacher. And if it-and you should understand exactly what your friend means and what your teacher means when he says something. That is pretty difficult. You cannot always take words-your teacher's words literally. When he says something-he does not say only to make you happy, you know. He may say sometime to make you unhappy. [Laughs.] It is true. Teacher may say according-knowing what kind of mood you are in-in what mood you are, and say something. And if he understand something very well, you know, he may say something-something to discourage your understanding [laughs]-to discourage your intellectual understanding. Because if your teacher says, "Oh, your understanding is very good," then you may stick to it. That is a flaw.

So to-not to stick to some understanding: Teacher may say that is not true-that is not always true. Although your understanding is-is right, but on the other hand you became arrogant because of your understanding. In this way, back and forth, your teacher will be taking care of you, so that you are-so that you can develop your practice in its true sense.

So student must be alert enough to understand that. If you take his words literally, you know, it is difficult for you to study with your teacher. There are-there are many koans, but those koans is, you know, the story between teacher and disciple-communication between teacher and disciples. So if you-when you read it, just read it, you cannot understand at all, you know, maybe. Even [if] it is very simple story, it is pretty hard to understand.

When I was young-maybe I was fifteen or sixteen-I-I came back from memorial service of our member with my teacher and his-several of his disciple. It was already almost dark. Until you-until we go back to my temple, there were-there were not one mile but pretty long-we had to walk through the woods and through the trees, and it was a kind of slope. And at this time of the year there are poisonous snakes sometimes apt to appears. And waiting for us-not waiting for us, but they come out because it is too hot. They have to cool themselves and come out from the tree, and roadside they are waiting. It is rather dangerous sometime. When we came to the bad [?] tree-trees, my master said: "You guys are wearing tabi," [laughs] "so why don't you go first. I will follow you." [Laughter.]

So we-we-we thought we are pretty brave monks to go first, and moreover we are wearing tabi. So do what he say, we thought [laughs, laughter]. And we said "Hai!"-and leaving teacher behind, we went first, and we came home. And teacher, as soon as we sit down [said], "Oh, why don't you sit here-sit there? I have something to tell you." [Laughs, laughter.]

We realized something is happening [laughs] because he said-sit, he says, sit down, you know. When he says "sit down," something, you know, happens. We know that. So [laughs] what will it be? Anyway, we sat down. He said, "I know you-you boys are not so alert, but I didn't know you are so dull boys," he says, first of all. This is what-what he said. Still we couldn't understand, you know, why he is so angry. We did exactly what he told us: wearing tabi and came back. We walked fast [first?] and came back to the temple. That is what we did. He said, "When I am not wearing tabi, why did you wear tabi?" [Laughter.] That is something which we didn't, you know, notice. Our teacher didn't wear tabi.

Long long time ago he, you know, took off his tabi-tabi and put-put them in sleeve and walked, but we didn't notice them [laughs]. We carried a lot of goodies. We-we happily came back wearing tabi. It is very-I was-we were very-very much ashamed [laughs]. What we do? We couldn't-we didn't notice that he didn't, you know, wear tabi. Moreover, when he said, you know, go ahead, he didn't say, "I am not wearing tabi." He was very [laughs]-you know, I don't know how to say, but he didn't [1 word] us he didn't say, "I am [not] wearing tabi, but you are wearing tabi so go ahead." Then we must have noticed, you know, but because he didn't say anything about his own tabi, so we couldn't notice. We-we could have-we should have noticed that-at that time we should have noticed that he didn't wear tabi. This, you know, kind of communication is pretty important in practice of Zen. Zen is not just intellectual understanding, you know.

To polish up our mind, to be alert enough to communicate with others always, you should be very-not careful, but you should be attentive always. Even though you are sleeping, you know [laughs], you should be attentive. That is Zen student's way. My teacher would talk about one good ino. He-he was-because they get up so early every morning, in daytime he-they became sleepy. So he-they, so they -when they start chanting, even when they are chanting, they [laughs] become drowsy. And that ino always-even though he was ino, he was sometimes sleepy. But when you should strike the bell, he wake up: gong [laughs]. You know, chin, chin, gong [laughs, laughter]. He-he doesn't miss. He never miss. That kind of alertness is something-not only-that is not only he knows very well but also a kind of alertness. There are many stories like that, even, you know, nowadays. I don't know nowadays, but when I was young, or when I was in monastery, there are many interesting stories something like that.

So we have no time to stick to our own problem. [Laughs.] It is so, because everyone is very alert. So we have no-not much time to stick to our own personal problem. In this way we will be-we will continue our practice. Here there is [2-4 words]. If you do not know what is Zen practice, it is maybe rather difficult to understand.

Hofuku-Hofuku[1] [was] the name of the-one of the students-a disciple of Seppo[2]-I think Seppo, yeah, disciple of Seppo-and Chokei[3] also, brother disciple of Seppo, went out. And Hofuku pointing out mountain and said, "This mountain is the famous mountain, Myoho." [4] Myoho mountain-Myoho is the famous mountain which appears in KegonSutra.

You know Zenzai-doji.[5] Zenzai-doji is the lay Buddhist who visited five-fifty-three masters in southern India, but even Zenzai-doji couldn't, you know, visit the Mount Myoho. So because of that, Mount-Mount Myoho is very famous mountain. The first [?] pointed at some mountain and said, "That is the," you know, "famous Mount Myoho," he said. And his brother, Chokei, said, "Well said, but it is pity-it is pity that you said so." That was the question and-and answer between them.

Actually, it is not Mount Myoho, but what pointed at [?] the mountain that is the Mount Myoho. And Chokei, his brother, said, "Well said-it was said [?]-but it was pity that you said so." That is the question and answer.

And in this kind of question and answer, you have no time to think about it. You should understand it immediately. The moment, you know, Hofuku said, "That is the Mount Myoho," then, you know, immediately his brother should understand what he means. Actually he understood immediately, "Yes, well said, but it is pity that you said so." [Laughs.] This kind of question and answer.

Usually, as this is koan, after thinking, you know, about this story over and over and over again, and find out the meaning of it, but you-that is not good enough. You should understand immediately.

When we read some Zen book, it is better to read just question and answer, whether you can understand it or not, whether you are alert enough to understand it or not. Maybe sometime, to stop your, you know, confusion-confused mind, it is good to think about Zen stories. That will give you some encouragement. But that is not good enough. Actually, before I give you lecture, I spend some time to read something short [?]: Shobogenzo, or Hekigan-roku,[6]or Shoyo-roku,[7] you know, to-to break something, to warm up my Zen mind [laughs]. So, when you want to listen to lecture, it is-if you just come and listen to the lecture, which, you know-that is enough.

But when I ask-ask you to give us-give you some question, you know, whatever the question may be, you should-you may think-sometime you may give me wrong question, sometime you may be scolded [laughs] because of it. But you should be ready [laughs] for that, you know. If it is wrong, you know, that is, you know, communication. If it is-even though it is wrong, I don't say it is good question, I don't say so. That is perfect communication. We should be-the question and answer should be very honest.

So it is quite okay to say-if you-if you cannot accept what I say-"I don't understand, I cannot accept it," you know. Then, sometime I shall be angry, like brother do, but that is okay. And to give wrong question, and to be angry about the students is a part of practice, you know. In that way, prac- [partial word]-real practice, you know, should go on and on and on.

There is many, you know, simple koan or Zen story like this. Since I give you a story, since you may not understand what-what does it mean, you know. Myoho-Myoho is supposed to be a mountain where Zenzai-Zenzai-doji couldn't visit, couldn't-couldn't climb up. Why was it not possible to climb up? Because that mountain is the mountain which covered-covered all the mountain in the world. Wherever you go, that is the Mount Myoho.

So before you climb up, before you visit that mountain, you are on the mountain. So if you try to find out where the mountain is [laughs], there is no wonder that you cannot find out where is the mountain. Actually, you know, in reality, each existence covers whole world, whole universe. So actually it is not possible to see, even though you think you saw it, but you-actually the mountain or river you saw is not the true mountain or true river. That is, you know, true mountain or river. So when Hofuku said, this-that is Mount Myoho, when he-he said so, it is so-actually it is so, but we should-Chokei should understand the other side of it. Although that is Mount Myoho, or that mountain-Mount Myoho can be any mountain, or can be a river. So what he said is right-because he knows that when he say so, Hofuku didn't say-Hofuku didn't mean that is some special mountain. That mountain covers everything. Not just mountain. It-it is something more than that.

Because he understand what kind of truth is [1-2 words], you understanding what is the real-what is Mount Myoho. People say Mount Myoho, Zenzai-doji couldn't go to Mount Myoho. Maybe that is true, but on the other hand Mount Myoho could be any mountain, and that is actually-must be Mount Myoho. [1-2 words], that is what his brother meant. But when he says that it is pity that you said so-if you-if you do not say so, your understanding is perfect, but it is pity that you said so. Because you said so, someone may misunderstand you or think, "Oh"-someone may think that is Mount Myoho. If someone think that particular mountain is Mount Myoho, which you will find out in Kegon Sutra. That is his [1 word]. That kind of, you know, understanding-perfect understanding of the mountain is communicated between them.

Sometime when some disciple doesn't-is not-does not notice-do not have perfect understanding of reality, then maybe he will be scolded by his master. So it is necessary, of course, to have some understanding of reality. In- [partial word]-intellectually we have-we must have some understanding [of] what is reality. But even though you have understanding of it, if you-you are not alert enough, or you are not ready to experience that kind of perfect reality ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

You may-you may think, you know, Zen practice is, you know, a kind of training. Yes, it is training, but our training is very different from usual training. Your training, first of all, [is] based on zazen practice. That is one point. And your training should be-purpose of the training should be how to experience unselfish practice. That is another point. Whether your practice is selfish practice or unselfish practice will be pointed out by your teacher. Your teacher knows whether your practice is, you know, selfish one or right practice. Your teacher can easily tell.

And you should not stick to same old question or same old problem. The problem will help your practice when it arise, but if you stick to same old problem [laughs], you know, that-that will make your practice worse. It is necessary, when you feel you have to stick to same old problem, you should reflect on your practice: whether that practice is selfish practice or unselfish practice. If it is selfish practice, you know, you shouldn't stick to it. You should find out another topic to think about. You should choose right material, you know, to think about. And if you, you know, have to-or if you are always involved in same old problem, then you should ask someone's help, with humble-humble-humbleness of your mind-that is important-without thinking whether your understanding is right or wrong. That is another matter.

Even though your understanding of the problem or way of solving problem is right, if you have to stick to same old problem, then it is bad enough. Even though you think your way of solving problem is right, but it is not-it is bad enough for Zen practice. As a Zen student, we must be ashamed of thinking same thing over and over. But you may think if you, you know, come to your teacher, your teacher will help you. Maybe so [laughs], but way he help you will not be same way, same old way. We-we don't help you same old way. Something positive, something negative: according to the situation he may take many different ways.

Sometime he may agree with you; sometime he may not agree with you. If-he may give you some suggestion how to solve the problem, not by words, but give you some measure [?] or medicine. That medicine sometime may be sweet and sometime may be bitter. But when it is bitter, what you may think: "Oh no, this medicine doesn't work [laughs], not for me. I need some-I need some sweet medicine-sweet water, not bitter water like this." And, you know, when you think in that way-your feeling, when you feel in that way, that is, you know, how your teacher help you. If you-if your teacher give you always sweet, you know, answer it doesn't help at all. You will be involved in same old problem again and again.

And if you always confront with your actual problem and work on it to improve your practice, then you will have power to help others. Because you treat your problem as your own problem, and to solve your-solve the problem as your own to feel better. So even though you have good chance to practice, to improve your practice, you cannot. This is very important point: How to, you know, solve-what kind of attitude-with-with what kind of attitude you solve the problem is very important. Actually it is not your problem-it should not be your problem, although it will give you chance to develop your practice.

Maybe-do you have some question? [Laughs, laughter.] If there is some in your brain? [Laughs, laughter.]

Student A: [10-15 sentences unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: To me that is good, you know [laughter], because, you know, you-you-you are-you wanted to come here, you [were] eager to come here, and your mind is, maybe, fully devoted to your practice here. So I think that is good. Fear-fear you say, that is not just fear, you know. You see? There is some-when you are very-your mind is very alert, you know. You feel that kind of feeling too. That is how you felt, how you felt, but there-you may feel some other way, you know. At that time you felt it. Sometime you will feel great joy instead of fear-some unusual feeling, you know, in your heart [?]. If you really want to do something, you know, you will feel a kind of excited. When your mind is excited something unusual will happen to you, but that is not bad. You-you-you shouldn't feel-you shouldn't have negative understanding about it. Okay. Hai. Oh, no? Question? Hai.

Student B: What part does emotion [1-2 words]-what part does it play in [1-2 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Emotion-emotion. Emotion-emotional, you know, activity-or emotion-emotion will-if you-if you refine the emotion it is good, but if you take let-alone policy [laughs] for emotion, it is not so good. It needs some effort [?] to refine or to-I don't know. Emotion itself, you know, cannot be always acceptable, or they will train it. But that kind of element is necessary. It will, you know, push your practice.

For an instance, putting various problems aside, if you practice zazen, you know, still you will have-emotionally you will be involved in some particular problem even though you are sitting. But in that-in such case, the emotion you have-for an instance you have girlfriend, you know, and came to Tassajara and practicing zazen. The emotion you have about her will help your practice, will encourage your practice. And how you feel, maybe, "Since I came here saying-convincing myself that I have to practice zazen anyway. So I came here. If I don't practice zazen, you know, here, I am fooling-I am just making excuse for her." And you will feel very bad if you do not have good practice here. In that way your emotion-same emotion will-will result [in] some different effect on you. So to have problem is good. Without problem, it is very difficult to practice.

For an instance, here we have not much mosquito, you know. In Japan, while we are sitting, mosquito will bite us. But still we-we cannot move as long as we are sitting. Mosquito will help our practice a lot [laughs]. It is, of course, disturbance, but because of that disturbance we will have good strong practice [laughs]. That is pain, or a kind of an emotion. You may not like, you know [laughs], that kind of practice, but actually it helps.

So it is not emotion which is bad, but you-because you make it bad, emotion is bad. Because you are spoiled by it, emotion is bad. If you are not spoiled by it, emotion is good. Instead of being helped by-instead of receiving emotional help, trying to help others with-instead of helping yourself emotionally, you help others, you know, with same old emotion. But-emotion is same, but if you-if it is directed in right direction, it will help our practice.

So when our emotion follows buddha-nature it is good, and when our emotion spoil our practice or [are] against our practice it is bad. But emotion is not different. Emotion itself is same. That is how, you know, I feel about emotion, but emotion could be treated various-many-various way. As you are an American, you must have some other way of treating your emotion, I think. I don't force-I don't ask you to follow our way of treating emotion, but there is many ways of treating it. But usually people do not know how to treat our emotion. We always treat our emotion by same old way [laughs]. That is why, you know, we should-we should say something about emotion practice. Does it make sense? Some other questions? Hai.

Student C: Roshi, I [4-8 words] want to make the most of it.

Suzuki-roshi: It is okay.

Student C: What's wrong with me [?]? I don't understand [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, we don't understand-is okay. Don't try to understand things. It is a kind of small-minded practice. You need something to sit on, you know. Actually that is not necessary. When you are you, that is okay. Before you understand who, you know, you understand things much better. But if you feel you understand things, then you feel better, that's all. And if you don't feel good, you are not so happy, maybe. That is not so good.

Whether you feel good or bad, you know, you should be-you are you, and you should accept yourself. The feeling is just superficial, you know, problem, not real problem. Our understanding is just excuse. Most of the time, that is, you say, "help." But it is not actual help. If I have-if I have a book when I give lecture, I feel good [laughs]-something like that. You see?

So it is good to have books. It is good-just to have some understanding is good, but if you stick to it then you cannot do anything. You will burned-you will be burned by it. You cannot open your mouth. You cannot do anything. When you do something, you should forget your small understanding, and you should listen to others, again and again forgetting your own viewpoint and your own understanding, and try to understand again and again the situation you are [in]. That is, you know, right practice [?]. So you don't have to have any question when you come to Zen Center. You should expose yourself. Hai! [Laughs.] I am here. Maybe-is there something wrong [laughs]? That is [4-8 words unclear]. Hai.

Student D: [10-12 words unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Literally-sometime literally. But why you have to observe is, you know-you-that is more-more-more important than understanding of rules. Or else you cannot-the rule will be dead. Even though you observe it, sometime you will be-you are violating it. Rules is not for master [?]-for the monastery, but for yourself, you know. To help your practice we have rules.

Student E: [4-8 sentences.]

Suzuki-roshi: If you are in individual practice, of course.

Student E: How?

Suzuki-roshi: How? [Laughs.] Because you don't know why. [Laughter, laughs.] Do you understand? [Laughter, laughs.] First you burn [?].

Student E: My problem is, Roshi, sometimes I follow the rules and sometimes I don't, because I wanted to see what would happen [laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. I see. You can, you know-you can find out what will happen without observing our rules. There are many chances to-to-to test yourself. But what you-you mean is whether I become angry or you will be criticized or something like that or? Maybe-it may not be so-some other things, perhaps. Perhaps I know, but that is too much curious-curious-curiosity, you know. You are very-very curious about your practice. Not-it is not main road, you know. Your practice is not following main street or main freeway. You are kind of making trip by bicycle or something. [Laughter, laughs.]

Student E: Maybe more and more if I ride the bicycle [2-3 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Then-then maybe you better try some other place, you know, not main freeway like this [laughing].

Student E: [3 words unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: That will be better. Hai.

Student F: Why do we bother at all?

Suzuki-roshi: Huh?

Student F: Why do we bother to do it?

Suzuki-roshi: Bother to do it? [Sighs.] There is many reasons. The reason why-I cannot give you all the reasons, you know. But it may be better for you-for your practice, if I am just usual person and usual teacher of zazen [in] some usual way. Like a river or mountain, I exist in that way. That will be better. If I give some reason why mountain is a mountain is like so. Why river runs slow in that way? That is too much, you know. If you come to the river, you can bathe or drink from it. That is maybe better. I-I-I don't want to give, you know, I don't want to talk about reason why I am here or something like that. Hai.

Student G: Why is it so difficult to get up in the morning?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student G: Why is it so difficult to get up in the morning?

Suzuki-roshi: Because of your, you know [laughs]-if you get up, you know, very easily it means that you have pretty good practice. Practice I mean-you-natural-you are [2-3 words], and you are very much one with the practice. Without trying to be something good you can do something good. Without trying to be free from various desires you are free from desires. We say if you-if you can eat anything offered, then already your practice is very good. It's the same thing, you know-to eat which was given to you, without, you know, discrimination.

So if you cannot get up right-the moment you hear the shinrei[8] bell, it means that it is difficult for you to die. You know, if you-if you can get up quite easily, you know, it means that when you have time to die you can die quite easily. Big problem and small problem does not [make] much difference. To die is big problem [laughs], people think. To get up at the moment you woke-wake up is small problem. But it is not so.

So to get up is very important practice. So-so even though you are sleepy, you should get up anyway, you know, [at?] once. And if it is necessary to go back to your bed, then you can go back. But anyway you should-you should get up. Same thing is true to observe our way. Anything-you-you should say YES!-or if you are Japanese, HAI!-say to yourself, with very strong, sharp, you know, clear practice. That is correct [?]. If you are able to say so, it means that you have not much attachment to things, you are pretty free from your clinging. Very important practice and very important point. Okay?

One more question. Hai.

Student H: In the [1 word] it says that how [1 word] is everywhere. I was wondering [2-3 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Oyo? [?]

Student H: [3-4 words] nyoho.

Student H: Yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: Nyoho.[9] Nyoho is "things-as-it-is." Is it-in Japanese-are you-nyoho-do you mean nyoho?

Student H: Nyoho, yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Everywhere, everywhere, everywhere-yeah-everywhere, everywhere-it-when [we say] everywhere it means here and here, here, here-everywhere. But that one-one thing shall include everything. It means that. That things, you know-this is the [1 word] of [4-6 words]. It include various possibilities of the great being. Nyoho. So it is very personal. It is about everything, and it is about a great being which include us. That is everywhere, they say.

So nyoho means when you get up you should get up, you know. When you go to bed you should go to bed. That you-you can get up when you should get up means that you can die when you die. Same thing. So one practice-if you understand one practice, one activity, if you can do one activity with good spirit, then you can do everything in the same way. If you are good friend of Tassajara student, you will be, wherever you go, in the same way, you will be a good-good friend of people. That is nyoho. Okay?

Anyway, tomorrow morning we will have just one zazen [laughs, laughter]. Five past ten, so one more question please. [Laughter, laughs.] Hai.

Student I: Roshi, you were speaking about death. What-what should the awareness of death be in our karma?

Suzuki-roshi: Awareness-it he- [partial word]-it will-it is not possible to experience death, to think about death even. But some time I think you may think about it. Most people have some experience of thinking about their death. Most people has. But that is not actually death. But I don't think it is necessary to have actual picture of death in your mind. But it is pretty big problem-must be pretty big problem, and we should be ready for death.

Why I say so is, if you think about it always it will be a big-great encouragement for your everyday practice because it is the most big problem for-for everyone. There is no bigger problem for us, so it is very good practice to be ready for death.

Student I: [Question (6-8 words) unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Not thinking. You know, you cannot-you can think about it, but why you think about it is to-to have some good feeling about it. That is why you think about it, maybe, you know. The point is emotional problem. It is problem of desire or defining. Thinking mind may accept our death quite easily. What is death? You may explain what is death quite easily, but emotionally [laughs] it is not so easy to think about. After our death is not so easy to accept. To have actual feeling about it is very difficult.

So some people say it is like to go another way from this way-open the door and go on the [2-4 words]. If you go to the next one, that is death. But even, you know, [if] someone explain about death in that way, still you have-it is big problem for you.

So if you accept your food properly, if you get up, you know, when you should get up, then it is not so difficult for you to accept your death. It is really so, and that is only way of helping your practice in its true sense.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript by Barry Eisenberg. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Joan Amaral and Bill Redican (10/19/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Hofuku Juten (Baofu Congzhan): d. 928. Dharma successor of Seppo Gison.

[2] Seppo Gison (Xuefeng Yieun): 822-908. Dharma successor of Tokusan Senkan.

[3] Chokey Eryo (Changqing Huileng): 854-932. Dharma successor of Seppo Gison.

[4] Literally, "wonderful dharma" (Denkoroku, Chap. 4).

[5] Zenzai-doji: A bodhisattva in the Avataüsaka (Kegon) Sutra.

[6] Pi-yen-lu (W.G.), The Blue Cliff Record: A collection of 100 koans compiled by Setcho Juken (Hsueh-tou Ch'ung-hsien [W.G.]).

[7] Ts'ung-jung-lu (W.G.), The Book of Equanimity: A collection of 100 koans compiled by Wanshi Shogaku (Hung-chih Cheng-chueh [W.G.]).

[8] shinrei: shin ("swing"); rei ("bell"). The wake-up bell.

[9] nyoho ni: nyo: "splendid"; ho: dharma. A dharma term with wide application: "in accord with suchness"; "just as it is"; "Buddha's great teaching," or "truth itself is dharma."

7 - Question and Answer

Sunday, August 08, 1971

Question and Answer
Zen Mountain Center

Tonight I have nothing to talk about [laughs]. Empty hand. No book. I just appeared here [laughter]. But as Yakusan-zenji[1] did, I wouldn't go back to my room without saying anything. If you ask some questions, I will answer. In that way, I want to spend just one hour with you. Okay? If you have some questions, please ask me. Ask. Okay. Hai.

Student A: Roshi, I notice that often when I wake up in the morning the first minute or so my mind is sort of unclear. [Remaining 3-6 sentences unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: It is because you are [at] Tassajara pretty long time, and you have not much problem to follow our schedule. So you have, maybe-you have time to think [about] something else, you know [laughs]. That is, maybe, the reason. At first, as we-as it is difficult to follow our schedule and to know exactly what we do in zendo. First of all you think about [how?] to go to zendo anyway, you know. That will be the first thing you think about. But more and more, you feel as if you can do pretty well. I think that is main reason. I think that is not so good, but that is-anyway that will be the problem for the student who stay pretty long time here. So if it is so, I must give you a big slap [laughs], but now I-I want to ask you-I have a question, you know. Why do I give you a slap-because your practice is not so good? [Taps stick several times.] What will be the reason for-reason of the slap?

Student A: It seems [1-2 words] to my mind, to-to wake me up right now.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: And I [4-8 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. When you just wake up, you know, you have-you don't have, you know, so many things in your mind. Your mind is clear. And when your mind is clear, you have to come to zendo. And our practice should be continuous view [?] of practice, but that is actually not so easy. So-but if-if something appears already, it can't be helped, you know. You shouldn't fight with it. Even so, even [if] you have problem, [and] your mind is not clear, you should come. That is what you should do. To encourage that kind of practice, I give you slap or doan or ino will, if you are still in bed, you know, for an instance. Someone will go to-to bring you to the zendo.

That is-usually it is, you know, we understand it is not so good, but once it happen in that way it can't be helped, you know. And even though we go and [on?] catching, but it is not because your practice is bad. Don't understand in that way. Something already happened. We should not criticize it. But we should encourage him to have good practice, that's all. Do you have some other question? Hai. Be careful. [Laughter.]

Student B: Each one of us has [1-2 sentences unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Colors. Uh-huh. Colors. What do- I don't.

Student B: What does [1 word] mean when we see colors? There's no [1 word]. It's entirely blue, with [4-5 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Do you see something or-

Student B: Sometimes color.

Suzuki-roshi: Color?

Student B: Green and blue.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: Blue and green, maybe.

Suzuki-roshi: When-even though you open your eyes? Ahh. [Laughs, laughter.] Blue and yellow. Something like, you know, something like trip. Maybe-maybe-did you-do you have some experience of drugs?

Student B: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe that is you think of something like that-association with it. I don't know exactly why, because I don't see any color [when I meditate] [laughs, laughter]. My enemy is drowsiness, that's all. Do you see some color?

Student B: Only in the back of the [1-2 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Drowsiness or color?

Student B: Drowsiness.

Suzuki-roshi: Drowsiness [laughs]. You have same experience-you see the color?

Student B: Not really [8-10 words.] [Laughter.] I thought green [3-6 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: Green- [Severe coughing episode.] Blue-do I look like blue? [3-4 words.] Hai.

Student B: [3-4 sentences unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: But I don't think that that is big problem. If you see the color always, it will be problem sometime. You know, many things happen. We say another name of delusion is ganka, [2] you know, flower of-flower-flower of eye-some, you know, color or some vision. That is another name of delusion, so you don't have to worry so-so much about it. Hai.

Student C: Last night in your lecture, you were discussing how it's possible to make a journey on the path of communication. I was thinking afterwards that it seems like the idea of communication involves communication between two things.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: And it seems to me that what you [4-6 words] you reduced these two things to one. And I think that communication, maybe, is a bad word from the point of view of [1 word]. At a certain point, you're no longer communicating. You're-something beyond that-something-I-I couldn't think of a better word for that.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Communication. Communication is usually something which happens between two, but that is one-one-sided understanding of communication. Yeah-why we can communicate is, you know, there is-between two there is some oneness [?] that is there. That is why we-we can communicate. You see? Communication is-is something which happen between two, and at the same time, communication will be unders- [partial word]-a same understanding, you know, through words. To reach same understanding, we communicate. So it is actually based on same understanding, which doesn't happen. Looks like happen; does not happen before you communicate.

But there is potentiality or, you know, possibility before you communicate. So it is not actually two. It is just two-two ways of understanding. Do you understand? That I can speak to you is because there is possibility, for you and for me, to reach same understanding. So if-if we try to communicate without sticking to one's own view too much, communication is possible. But if you do not give up one-sided view of yours, communication is not possible. Only when one of the two person give up his own viewpoint and take same viewpoint, communication is possible. [When] both of them in turn take the other's viewpoint, the communication is possible. Isn't that so?

So problem of communication is problem of viewpoint or ego. If you stick to your ego, communication is not possible. Or it takes long, long time. Maybe waste of time sometime. So one of the two should give up his own viewpoint and feel sympathy-sympathetic to-to others. That is only way to communicate. Hai.

Student D: Roshi, often when I'm chanting [2-4 words] I'm sitting zazen, when it [6-8 words] particularly the Heart Sutra in English. And it started out different-the meaning of the words. Is this thinking of the meaning of the words [6-8 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Meaning of the words-yeah, if you chant in English, naturally, you know, you will think of-think about the meaning too. But it is not actually-it is something which-which we-appears or which come to your mind immediately. You see the characters, or immediately you say something. It is not just sound.

The Prajñāparamita Sutra is-the meaning of the sutra is about emptiness, you know. So each word suggest [to] you the reality of the emptiness. So, especially when you chant Prajñāparamita Sutra, it is just words which suggest [to] you the emptiness. It is like you cross your legs, and to have your mudra, and you take breathing. Same thing.

Maybe before you understand the meaning of the sutra, you know, then you may be wondering in your mind, "What does it mean?" Then that is not, you know, zazen. That is reading. Do you understand? The chanting sutra is something which you can do after you know the meaning. It is not reading. It is expressing your understanding through words. Do you understand the difference?

Student E: [2-4 sentences unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Difference? Difference between reading and chanting is- chanting is something, you know, you do after you know the meaning, after you have some confidence, you know, in your understanding of the sutra, so your mind does not-do not wander. The chanting encourage your chanting [understanding?], and if you chant, it-chanting encourage your spirit or understanding-actualize your understanding with-with your voice. That is chanting. Reading is to think about it: "What does it mean? I don't understand." That is reading. Do you understand?

Student E: I guess [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Hai.

Student F: Roshi, I don't know-the first time I listened to [1-2 words] zazen, and I usually-when I'm in the zendo there is a struggle in my mind. [6-8 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: You come to struggle [laughs] with your resistance, you know. That is okay with you [?], or else you will not stay here. Why you stay here is to struggle with your resistance. That is okay, isn't it? That is why you are here. The struggle makes sense, you know. You know, zazen is not some-zazen is-Dogen-zenji says zazen is the most comfortable and easy practice [laughing], he said- but it is not so for us. For us, zazen is something difficult.

But anyway, we think we have to continue, for-while you are con- [partial word]-if you sit you feel better, you know, even though your sit-your zazen is not so calm. But much better than not to sit. It is, you know-you feel some resistance to zazen, you know, but if you do something else you may feel in the same way, I think. That is not problem of not-problem-not problem of zazen, but problem of you, you know. Problem is always with you.

So if you feel in that way, you should think more, and you should try to solve that problem. That is, you know, why you think. So zazen will be the shortcut to solve that problem which you have-which human being have.

Actually, you know, because, you-your-it is not because there is Tassajara or Zen Center, you know, that you sit. It is something we should do, whether there is Zen or not. Wherever you-you are, that is a problem we have, actually. And that is the problem we should confront with. Okay? Not a, you know-it is not problem of-of Zen. Do you understand? [Laughs.]

You may feel, you know, your parents, you know, encourage you to go to Tassajara. And that is why you came to Tassajara. You-you may-I don't know-something-that kind of feeling you have, in-in some corner of your heart [thought?] [laughs]. Don't you think so? But actually the problem you have is not your parents' problem or my problem or Zen Center's problem. The problem-we all human being has similar problem. That problem-big problem is [1-2 words]. Okay? Hai.

Student G: I'm looking at a koan which uses the [1 word] word of "transmigration." Can you say something about how it might be a [3-4 words].

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Transmigration. It is-did you have koan mu?

Student G: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: And do you-did you get through the koan?

Student G: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: And next one is transmigration?

Student G: No.

Suzuki-roshi: No?

Student G: This is-this is a long [1 word] many people [4-6 words]. And this is one.

Suzuki-roshi: One of the-one part of-huh?

Student G: It is one [2-3 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Who is-who is your teacher?

Student G: Many different ones. You know, [2-3 sentences. Names 3-4 "roshis."]

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] Yeah. But all the teachers are different, but same thing.

Student G: I thought maybe there was one [6-8 words] it.

Suzuki-roshi: Why, you know? You know, trans- [partial word]-why we say transmigration, when we say transmigration, underlying thought is each individual being, you know, each being. Isn't that so?

Student G: I [3-6 words]. I'm sorry. I wouldn't think that.

Suzuki-roshi: Transmigration happens, you know, because there is many things. And is there-does-do they exist? Transmigration. Because many things exist, you know, so usually one change to the other. That is transmigration, isn't it?

Student G: That is one way. There's another way [1-2 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Many ways, yes [laughs]. So, what is that? So, we don't exist-transmigration doesn't exist [laughs, laughter]. And still it exists. So it is something, you know, beyond words. So you should, you know, point out actual fact, you know. That is how you pass koan. If you drink a cup of tea [takes sip], this is transmigration [laughs], without, you know, saying-explaining it by logic. You shouldn't get, you know, caught by words anyway, but you should catch the actual fact which include various koans. That is koan study.

Student G: Well, I'm starting to get the feeling, you know-it sounds good. But then sometimes one teacher will say, like, "Don't be stuck by the words," and another one will say, "What's the word [6-8 words]."

Suzuki-roshi: Because you-your answer is not actual, you know, you-you stick to words. As you ask me the explanation of it, you know, you may-you may be thinking in the same way. So that is why they say-they do not say yes.

Even so, intellectual understanding is necessary, and it will help. But that is not-that is just help, you know. The actual koan cannot be like that. It is direct experience. But this kind of philosophy will help [you] to have direct experience. And this kind of logic will lead you-lead your practice and will show you the right path, instead of wandering about. Hai.

Student H: Roshi, we do our best to assume all of our responsibilities all the time. And [1 word] would be encouraged. [1-2 sentences.]

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] I think that is pretty good, you know. You will-you should be, I think, exhaust your energy. You should-you should, you know, be always in complete combustion [laughs]. You see? That is practice. That is, I think, pretty good, you know. That is why we do not take so very strong food, you know, and we do not take too much sleep. You will-you will be always little bit-little bit [1 word], but still you must sit [laughs]. That will, you know-this kind of practice will help your actual practice. You will not-this is how we put a snake into bamboo [laughs]. If a snake is too strong it wouldn't go into the bamboo. So limiting your sleep and [laughs] food when snake is eating [laughs]-it grewed [laughs, laughter].

Student I: [4-6 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: No-suppose [laughs]-suppose not. Hai.

Student J: Roshi, you said something about factors [6-8 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: Out-outside of Center.

Student J: Yeah. Out.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. As-even though you are outside of the Center, you know, I-I want you to sit one period a day. May be pretty difficult. Morning time is best. Wake up earlier than usual, and beside your clothes [?]-where you sit and everyday if you sit with this kind of cushion, that is [1 word].

And in everyday activity, you should be concentrated on what you do, or, in other word, you should greet people or [1 word] as if you recite sutra, or it become usual [?] careful feeling [?] of respect-thinking those are all buddhas. And sometime your boss or your friend may not understand what you are doing, but even though they don't understand, you should practice in your own way, with big mind. In city life-in this-in this world-it is big world, you know-wherever you go, people need you. If you have right spirit, people need you. Without you, their life doesn't make sense. We say to shine one corner of the world-one corner, just one corner. So if you, you know, shine one corner, then people around you will be-will feel better.

You should be always, you know-you should feel as if you are carrying umbrella, you know, for the people [laughs] to-to stay away from the heat or rain. It is rather difficult, you know, to take hold of an umbrella, but still that is Buddhist giving. And without umbrella, they don't feel good, actually. It is not arrogant-arrogancy, but it is-actually it is so, because we are too much involved in self-centered practice, self-centered life.

For an instance, you know, Buddhists sometime go-go out for takuhatsu. At war-time, sometime I went to takuhatsu. And if they are making ditch-you know, ditch?-for shelter from the bomb, I helped them [laughs]. I am not so strong, but I could help them. And I transplanted cucumber or eggplants [laughs] around the ditch, because we get, you know, good dirt from the, you know, from the trench, and planted cucumber around the trench. So sometime I helped in that way. If you do not need ditch-even though you do not-you may not use the trench, you may-you can eat cucumber [laughs]. So I-I prepared, you know, cucumber-vegetable garden and trench. I dug this [probably gesturing] and here was [laughs] vegetables above.

So wherever you go, you will-if you have this kind of attitude or this kind of feeling, you know, you can help people quite easily. And sometime people are, you know, sleeping, exposing their belly in the sun-many people [laughs]. So sometime I help them to cover their belly. And they are very happy, you know, to see you, and they will help you too. If you have that kind of feeling, you have no trouble. And you can help people quite easily, without anything. With-with empty hand you can help people, and there is no need to give lecture like this [laughs]. That will be how you can help. Some question? Hai.

Student K: What is laziness? Could you [2-3 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student K: What is laziness?

Suzuki-roshi: Laziness.

Student K: [3-4 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: Laziness is big enemy-as big as large [1 word], yeah. So when you feel lazy ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... someplace like this. People in the city are working hard, very hard. And our practice looks like very difficult, but actually I don't know which is more difficult: our life at Tassajara or city life. I don't know which.

In many ways we are supported by city people. And if we are lazy students-uh-oh. And on the other hand, you may say we are Zen students. People may think we are doing something good here, but if you are lazy, and if you are not doing actually something, in some way, people may expect this is a kind of deceptive practice. So we should not be lazy, especially when you are at Tassajara. When you are [in the] city, maybe, you know, you'll be okay-allowable. But if you are monk or if you are [at] Zen Center, you cannot be lazy. Hai.

Student L: How do you overcome our laziness?

Suzuki-roshi: Huh?

Student L: How do you overcome our laziness?

Suzuki-roshi: Overcome? If you-if you know exactly what you are doing and what people are doing, then you will make your best effort. That's all, you know-there is no other way. But maybe because you think-you feel-you think you are doing something good here, that is why you become lazy. Don't you think so? Anyway, you must make best effort. Hai.

Student M: [3-4 sentences.] Is there ever [2-3 words] that we should know?

Suzuki-roshi: Should. "Should" means, you know, maybe it is so, because we will know how things are going-we know dharma, you know. Dharma is, maybe, the idea of "should." Or actually "things are going" is dharma. And we human being thinks-one-thinks [of] dharma in two ways. So we must say "should." "Be" and "should" is always [laughs]-make one pair. When you-dharma is way things are, so it-it is the word of "to be." But for human being who is selfish, you know, who have choice, you know-because we have choice, "to be" equals "should."

So hummingbird, you know, will be always "to be" [laughs]. Or cats-"to be" is enough; they don't need "should," you know. But [laughing] unfortunately, we have choice, you know. So if we want to follow dharma, you know, we have to say "should." So if the teaching doesn't sound like "should," it is not true teaching. That will be the word you remember, isn't it? It looks like so. Because of our ego-centered practice, because of our idleness, you know, to use fire, to use airplane is actually idleness-idle practice. And we-we human being create many things to be idle, and we have many choice. So "should"-you-you have word "should." But "should" equal "to be." "To be" is more strict word for us. "Should" is, you know, not so strict as "to be" for human being. There is, you know, some way to escape from it. "To be" [laughs] is very strict, very cold-coldness from which you cannot escape.

But you think "should" is awful; "to be" is much better than "should." That is opposite, isn't it? So "to be"-before you attain the stage of "to be," you have-you must practice very hard, so that you can just follow the dharma. You know, to follow our schedule is a kind of practice to follow, so that we can follow the truth. One more question, please. Hai.

Student N: I was [2-4 words], and I was wondering if you could say something about practice [1 word].

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Where-where?

Student N: [1-2 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Wilderness. Wilderness. Uh-huh. And-

Student N: I was wondering if you could say anything about practice in the wilderness.

Suzuki-roshi: Wilderness. How many people are there?

Student N: [1 sentence.]

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, I see. Have you ever practiced in wilderness before?

Student N: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Many times?

Student N: Not so many.

Suzuki-roshi: May I ask you the-why you are going to the wilderness?
Why or-

Student N: Why I'm going to that [2-4 words] going to the wilderness is [6-8 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Easy to-to be yourself, or something like that?

Student N: Yeah, I think so. Probably to [2-4 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah. [Laughs.] I think if you are going, there must be some purpose, you know, because you-to solve a koan or to think about some particular teaching, you know, that you [are] bothered by people or something, or to change your old, you know, same way or habit, or to stop smoking [laughs, laughter], to, you know, to experience hunger or something, you know-you must have some purpose, I think, you know. So if you are going, it's better to be concentrated on some-some point, you know. Having some purpose of practice, you should be concentrated-your practice should be concentrated on it. So-if so, you have not much disturbance, so you can confront with the problem, I think. So each time you go, you will achieve something, you know.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript by Barry Eisenberg. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican, 12/7/00. Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Yaoshan Weiyan (Yakusan Igen): 751-834. Dharma successor of Sekito Kisen. Master of Ungan, Sensu, and Dogo.

[2] gan = eye; ka = flower. A disease of the eye. Hence, delusion.

8 - Obon

Thursday, August 12, 1971

Obon
Zen Mountain Center

Tomorrow-tomorrow is the thirteenth, is it? In Japan tomorrow is-tomorrow-13th, 14th, 15th, 16th-is Obon[1]-Obon days. We say Obon. At some place, we observe it July 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th. Thirteenth is the-thirteenth-[on the] evening of the thirteenth, old souls are supposed to visit their family-old family. And 16th is the day old souls leave their old family.

Why we observe two months? Before we observe it in the moon-by the moon calendar [July], but recently we observe it by your calendar [August]. That is why we observe, you know, sometime-in some place, July. Somewhere-in some place, August.

This is-this kind of observation started even before Buddha. Before Buddha-in India, they were-people were concerned about their future generation. And if they do not have their children, they worried very much. And they-they thought they are not faithful enough to their ancestors.

This kind of, you know, idea is also true in China, and maybe after Buddhism [was] introduced to Japan. Japan [was] also concerned about their generation-future generation. It is Chinese custom. And after Chinese, you know, culture were introduced to Japan, they started to write Japanese history, something like China. Nihon-shoki.[2] Before Nihon-shoki we have Kojiki.[3] Kojiki was written by Japanese, purely, of course, by Japanese, but only-mostly Japanese-according to Japanese custom and thought. But Kojiki was written after Chinese culture was introduced, and Kojiki was written something like Chinese history.

But anyway, Japanese families [2-4 words] were very much concerned about their future generation. So even Brahmin-after finishing their duty as a Brahmin-Brahmin, as you know, is the highest class of four classes in India-after Brahmin finished their duty as a Brahmin, as a leader of-religious leader of Indian people, they started-some people started-started family life, household life again. Mostly Indian people started religious life after finishing household life. To finish their household life means, maybe, to have children and to raise children, and they left their home-home.

But Buddhist, you know-when Buddha-Buddha's disciple-after Buddha's disciples became-came to Buddha, they didn't have their children, of course. So they may be, you know, con- [partial word]-still they may be concerned about their children, and according to Indian old custom, it is, you know-if they do-they do not have their children, their ancestors will suffer in-in-in their future life. So this kind of-I think, this kind of cultural background-because of this kind of cultural background, Obon festival started.

As you know, Obon festival-

As you know, there were two leading, famous disciple of Buddha. One is Shariputra,[4] and the other is Maudgalyayana: [5] Mokuren-Sharihotsu and Mokuren[6] in Japanese. Shariputra and Mokuren is good friend from their young age. Maybe came from same district of India.

Shariputra was a kind of alert, learned philosopher.[7] And his father Vanganta[8]-his father Vanganta was a ronji.[9] Ronji means-scholar-anyway scholar, who argued-who make an argument with other-argument with learned fellows. So every king had ronji, and Vanganta was one of them.

And Bimbi- [partial word]-King Bimbisara gave one village to him for his learning. But he [Vanganta] was defeated by Desa [or Desha], who came from another country-who visited Bimbisara's country, and Vanganta [was] defeated by him in discussion or, you know, argument-philosophical dispute. And he lost his village-and he had to leave his village. And instead, Desa became ronji of the Bimbisara-King Bimbisara. And Desa gave his daughter to him, and that was Shariputra's mother.[10]

Do you know some sparrows [?]? We have many sparrows here. I-I haven't seen the bird who-who comes in autumn. And he-he eat mostly frogs and some insects. Very strong bird, and his-his eye is very sharp-sharp, and he is singing something like ki-ki-ki-ki-ki-ki-ki-ki [laughs]. Do you know that bird? Do you have those-that kind of bird? And he imitate various kinds of birds. He sing in various way to attract other bird, to catch him-to catch other bird. So attracting bird by singing, they catch small birds. Not big birds-maybe as big as this [probably gestures]. That is shari. And his mother was like a-has sharp eyes like shari. So after that bird, her [his] mother was called Shari. And because Shariputra is daughter-a boy of Shari, they-people called him Shariputra. But his proper name is after Desa. Upadesa is proper name. [11]

But anyway, he was-at-when he became sixteen, he was already a very learned scholar, and his father's disciples became his disciples. And Mokuren was-was his good friend, and both Shariputra and Mokuren studied more under Sañjaya Velaññhiputra.[12] He was one of the six Indian scholars.[13] At that time there were six outstanding scholars, and he was one of them.

And [after] six week of studying under him, they become a leader of [the disciples of] Sañjaya Velaññhiputra. They were so alert. And-but they didn't [weren't] satisfied with their teacher. And he-they promised that if one of the two find out some good teacher, they will inform each other and study under the better teacher.

At that time, Buddha was [at] Rajagaha, and one day Shariputra went out of the-went to the Rajagaha and saw one of his-one of Buddha's disciples, Assaji. Assaji [was] wearing, you know, at that-Assaji [was] wearing robe neatly, and walk slowly and calmly, and with-full of dignity. So Shariputra was very much interested-impressed by him.

He asked, "Who is your teacher?" And Assaji said, "My teacher was," you know, "Gautama Buddha." And so they become Buddha's disciples. But pretty soon they become also one of the leading disciples of Buddha too.

Mokuren is noted for his power of walking-power of walking fast.[14]

In old time, someone who-who has strong foot-they were very much, you know, respected. [In] my father's days, in Japan there were no train. Yest- [partial word]-my father's-[in] my grandfather's day they have no train. So mostly they walked. I was told many interesting stories how fast someone walked [laughs]. Do you-do you have that kind of story in America? Back and forth, they visit-went to some mountain and chanted on the mountain and came back-come back to the home-to their home-something like that. Some-some monks-do you know I-you may not know the Hakone Mountain. It is maybe fifteen-fifteen miles, you know. To go up to the mountain it takes more than seven miles. And to come down, it is seven miles. So [it is] maybe nearly the same distance to-or from here to-from here to-what was the name of the-one by here-what do you call it-oh, I thought that someone may know-last village.

Student: Jamesburg.

Hmm? Jamesburg. Maybe same distance-maybe fifteen miles? Oh. Everyday, you know, Yoki-zenji[15]-Nishiari-zenji,[16] from-oh, more than that-from that mountain-Hakone Mountain is already fifteen miles. And from Mishima to-Mishima is the town where Ryutaku-ji[17] is, where Nakagawa Soēn-roshi[18] is. From Mishima to Hakone it may be-it is five miles or more, maybe. And so maybe almost twenty miles-more than twenty miles.

Nishiari-zenji, you know, getting up early, and left Odawara[19] and went to-oh, no, no [corrects self]-get up early and left Mishima and studied-went to Odawara, and chanted sutra-morning-attended morning sutra-morning chant, and attended lecture, and came back in the same day in the evening-walking fifteen miles walk-back and forth, maybe. I don't know if everyday, but they say-they said every day. And there are many stories like that.

So, in India, at Buddha's time, there must be some strong fellow, you know, who could walk so fast. Mokuren was famous for his strong walk-walk, and he appeared at various places all of a sudden [laughs], like, you know, as if he fly through the sky to the other place. He was famous for that. But, of course, he was very famous scholar too.

And origin of the story [of] Obon is, one day he [Mokuren] went to-because of his strong, mysterious power of flying or walking, he could see [see] his mother in hell. And his mother was almost skin and meat-and bone: the strong suffering of the hell. And he was very-very much stricken [stricken] by the sight of his mother's suffering. He came back to Buddha and asked him how to save him-save her. And Buddha said, "As people do, it is good idea to make offering to" Buddha-not to Buddha, but to [laughs]-he himself is Buddha-"to make some offering to priests or monks." On the day of-the last day of the training period, it is fifteenth of-July fifteenth. So giving various-offering various fruit and vegetables-fresh vegetables, and many other things like something to sleep on, or some medicine, and beautiful flowers, and some-some-something which is-which give good smell or a fragrance, and candle, incense. Maybe those offering, they had a kind of festival, and priests-monks and priests chant sutra or give some sermon to the people. That was what they did-in that way, [1-3 words], old way of-old custom-old usual custom. But idea is different but what they did is nearly the same.

And in China when, you know-Liang-Liang Dynasty-maybe it is 500-Bodhidharma went to- Bodhidharma went to China [in] 520. Just-I think just before Bodhidharma went to China, that king, Butei, [20] started this Obon holiday. And in Japan it was-we started maybe 1263, the time of Fuko emperor. [21] Since then we-we are observing Obon [1 word: Foyo?] each year.

This morning I-we talked about Obon [1 word: Foyo?] in Japan and [1 word]. And they say if you observe it, it may be very dangerous [laughs], because we have to fire-you have to have fire for the souls-old souls, you know. In Japan, we invite-we make our gate bright-burning-burning pitch-cut pine pitch as long as this [gestures?]. And we welcome old souls. So we cannot observe it anyway. We just say, "Maybe so." [Laughs.] But it is a kind of Buddhist, you know, tradition to observe Obon [1 word: Foyo?].

Since I came to America, I noticed many Japanese customs, you know, which is very different from American way. When I was [in] Japan, I think that [those customs] was quite usual, but if you see Japanese custom from America, it is-what they are doing in Japan is very, you know, special and maybe interesting, you know. But it is, maybe-it is very difficult to apply it.

Anyway, we have Obon festival. We start from-from [for] tomorrow I start-I studied little bit about Obon. When-in China it was started [in the] fourth year of Emperor Wu or Butei, and in Japan [in] 1266 it was started.

And [it is] about, you know, Indian old custom, to be very much concerned about future generation. There is, you know, famous Mahabharata-Mahabharata. [22] It is old old-Indian-Indian verses. In Mahabharata, explaining the meaning of putra-putra like "Shariputra." Putra means-putra-the root word of putra is Put. [23] Put is a kind of hell, where their father or their mother is, maybe. A kind of hell. So it is their duty to save their mother-their parents. How they save their parents is to have children. If you have children, they will be, you know, saved from the hell. That is the root word of-of putra. Shariputra, you know, putra. And there-in dictionary there are many similar stories, which is-which is-which are found in old Buddhist-Buddhist scriptures. So most likely those festival started before-even before Buddha. Buddha tried this kind of custom.

Do you have some question? Hai.

Student A: Roshi, how do the parents-how do you-how do Buddhists learn how to celebrate Obon or to save the suffering of their parents?

Suzuki-roshi: In-in Japan?

Student A: Yeah. I am thinking also-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Yeah.

Student A: -about their not taking up the [2-4 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Buddhist are ordained-if you become or if you receive ordination, that is the best, you know, way to help their parents. We have that kind of idea: not only your parents, but nine-nine ancestors. If you-one-your father is one, you know, your grandparents is two-in that way nine ancestors will be saved. If one become a priest, that is [1 word]. So for-we have Buddhist-a priest visit their fa- [partial word]-members' family-family shrine and chant sutras. And in-in each family, they offer many things. And in some family they will make special altar for the family ghosts [laughs], who may-who may come with their-with many souls.

So we help-help people to observe Obon festival-Obon service. That is what we do-what priest does, you know.

Suzuki-roshi: Some more questions? Hai.

Student B: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student B: I think it's in Buddhism we have the [3-4 sentences unclear].

Suzuki-roshi: You know, you say so, but if you have two parents, you know-you have two parents, and you have four grandparents, you see? Two have two, and eight, sixteen [laughs]. Soon it will be a big, you know, a great number of people. You may think, you know, we human beings started by two, you know [laughs]. I don't know which is true. If you think more about it, you know, you cannot say that is explanation or to-to have special idea of-about our parents. So we have-we are-we-anyway, we are one in [1-3 words]. Even it is so, you know, if you-if you pick up one, it included, you know. That is proper understanding.

So it looks like we pick up just my parents, you know-I pick up just my parents. But it is not-our true understanding is not so. And so we say that is-Buddhists do not have idea of soul as usual people understand what is soul. Our understanding of soul is different. It is a kind of big mind. But even though it is big mind, it is at the same time our-each one's own ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... mind, you know. If you think each one's mind does not exist at all, that is one of the heresy. If you ignore each one's own mind. And if you ignore the big mind that is also the heresy-heresy. So we must have, you know, complete understanding of the reality. Do you understand?

Usually, you know, you will fell [fall] into, you know, danken or joken.
Joken means to believe in something which exist forever, constantly, like emptiness or something. Danken means to believe in each existence. It looks like-to him it looks like separate, independent being.
So dan is, you know, "cut." Dan is "to cut." So each one will be cut from the rest of the being. That is why we call it danken.

Joken means to understand things [are] just one, which exists forever.
That is joken-idea of constancy. They do not-really want change of things. They do not realize things which change. Do you understand?
That is Buddhist understanding. So if you think Buddhists do not have any idea of small mind, you know, it is one-one of the two heresies-heretic understanding.

Buddhism go-should go over this kind of one-sided understanding. And Buddhist understanding should include both side. Did you understand this point? This is very important point-a good question. But most Buddhist, may, you know, some Buddhist stick to the idea of oneness, and the other will stick to the idea of many things which changes. And they do not-they do-they do ignore the what is changed. If they do not ignore the fact things change, they cannot ignore the idea of oneness.

Student C: Experiencing another person is the same thing as [1-2 words]. If there is no "I" to experience small mind, how can we experience anybody else's small mind?

Suzuki-roshi: Huh?

Student C: If there is no "I" to experience small mind, then how can-then how can there be any-

Suzuki-roshi: No eyes?

Student C: I-you know, I-ego?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, "I."

Student C: "I" in that sense. [2-3 sentences.] I mean, can there be any experience of anybody's small mind?

Suzuki-roshi: Through-through-only way to experience big mind is through, you know, small mind. Do you understand? There is no approach to the big mind. When you understand-when you, you know, have a cup of water which is same as all the water, you know, then you will know what is water, which is same as water in the stream. It is like to-to put the water of ocean in-in small cup. We cannot experience how great that water is, but if you dip it in a small cup and have it, then that experience is experience of great ocean. It is [4-8 words]-something like that.

So because you try to understand it just by thinking, you cannot understand it. This kind of thing should be accepted by actual zazen practice, shikantaza, or experience of enlightenment. Do you understand? [Student laughs.] Maybe you don't. [Laughs, laughter.]

If you can, you know-I am just explaining it, you know, so that is-you have that kind of criticism. I am explaining it, bringing the truth to the words. What I am talking about is words. But you will understand what I am talking about, maybe. Okay? Good.

So purpose of-most important point of practice is to experience things directly, one by one. And one experience should be whole universe. To experience one-one right now-to experience one right now on this moment is to experience whole world. So this is the only approach to the emptiness. This is very important point. That is why we practice. This is the point of practice. Okay? Very important point. Maybe you-you must think about it over and over, you know, over again [laughs]. It is comparatively easy to realize things are one. It is comparatively easy, or easy to accept, you know.

Maybe I-when I was maybe about twenty-six- -seven years old, you know, I had some discussion with my master about this point. At that time, I could accept that things are one. But it is, for me, it is very difficult for me to treat everything different [laughs]. That was very difficult practice for me. To treat things one by one, and to-to treat one thing means to treat everything-all the rest of things. That much care should be paid when you treat one thing.

So even though you realize things are one, that is very, you know, very, you know-kindergarten [laughs, laughter] understanding. And then you start how to treat things one by one, each different way, with full care. That is, maybe, I think your practice, you know.

Shinku-we say-shinku-myou.[24] Have you heard of-this is very important technical term-shinku-myō? Shinku is "emptiness," you know, "real emptiness." And myō is "every existence"-in emptiness, shinku-myō.

Unless you get through the idea of emptiness, you are not Buddhist. But if you stick to the emptiness, you know, if you cannot realize things happen in sheer emptiness, you are not Buddhist yet. Shinku-myō. Things, we say, should be something which arise from emptiness.

I didn't expect you to ask that kind of question [laughs, laughter] after my talk.

So even though you sit, you know, and watching something like sunflower [laughs]-someone was looking, you know, in front of sunflower-watching the sunflower in hot sun, and I tried. It was wonderful, you know. I feel whole universe in the sunflower. That is my, you know, experience, but I don't know how someone [else] experienced sunflower meditation. [Laughs.] Whole universe is there in the sunflower. It is not so simple [laughs]-very, you know, wonderful, wonderful complicated feeling. You can see whole universe in a small flower. If you say, "Oh, this is sunflower which doesn't really exist" [laughing], that is not our zazen practice.

-----

Source: City Center transcript by Barry Eisenberg. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (10/19/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] Also Bon, O-bon, or Urabon (Japanese Festival of Lanterns or Festival of Souls). People clean their houses and offer a variety of food, such as vegetables and fruit, to the spirits of ancestors in front of the family altar. The altar is decorated with flowers and paper lanterns. On the 13th, lanterns are lit at home, and people go to their family's gravesite to call their ancestors' spirits back home. On the 16th, people guide the ancestor's spirits back to their graves with lanterns or fires.

[2] Chronicles of Japan: With Kojiki, one of two national chronicles that record the origins of the Japanese islands, the births and lives of its gods, the foundation of its imperial household, and the history of its empire up to 701.

[3] Record of Ancient Matters.

[4] Shariputra (Upatissa): 6th Century B.C.E.

[5] Maudgalyayana (also Moggallana, Mahamaudgalyayana, and Kolita):

6th Century B.C.E.

[6] Also Mokkenren or Makamokkenren.

[7] His father was a Brahmin teacher.

[8] Throughout, S.R. pronounces the word as "Magra" or "Magada," which may refer to the North Indian kingdom of Magadha, of which Bimbisara was king.

[9] ronji (Jap.): master of discourses.

[10] Rupasari (hence Shariputra).

[11] His personal name in Pali (and possibly Sanskrit) was Upatissa. Shariputra was the oldest son of the leading family of the village where he was born (Upatissa, near the capital Rajagaha), and some commentators believe that he was named after it. Upadesa is probably the Japanese transliteration or pronunciation of Upatissa.

[12] Also Sañjaya Velaññhiputta or Sañjaya Belaññhaputta (Sañjaya of the Belañña clan), a skeptic who taught in the area of Rajagaha.

[13] Sañjaya is known as one of the Rokushi gedo, "the six teachers outside the [Buddha's] path," or six non-Buddhist teachers.

[14] Possibly the power of astral travel. Maudgalyayana was known for his supernatural powers, just as Shariputra was known for his wisdom. Maudgalyayana used astral travel to find where his deceased mother had been reborn in order to thank her for her care in raising him.

[15] Suzuki-roshi probably corrected himself: i.e., probably did not mean to say Yoki-zenji.

[16] Nishiari Bokusan-zenji: the most prominent Meiji scholar of the Shobogenzo. He was a teacher of Oka Sotan-roshi and Kishizawa Ian-roshi. He served as abbot of Soji-ji and head of Soto-shu, and he was author of Shobogenzo keiteki, a highly respected commentary on Dogen's Shobogenzo.

[17] A Rinzai temple near Mishima, Japan. Nakagawa Soen-roshi was its abbot.

[18] Nakagawa Soen-roshi (1908-1983): Japanese Rinzai master.

[19] Odawara is a city approximately 16 miles NE of Mishima, Japan. Located at Odawara is a large Soto temple named Saijo-ji, which is where Nishiari-zenji may have walked to and from.

[20] Emperor Wu (Liang Wudi, Butai) (502-550) founded the Liang

(Ryo) Dynasty in southern China.

[21] Possibly Japanese Emperor (Go-) Fukakusa (-tenno), who reigned 1247-1259.

[22] Mahabharata (San.): "The Great War." The great epic poem of India.

[23] The etymology of putra (San.) is said to be uncertain, but it may be a compound of put-tra, "preserving from the hell called Put": i.e., by means of a son or child (Monier-Williams, p. 632).

[24] shinku-myou (Jap.): shinku = absolute void or true non-existence; myou = wondrous or mysterious existence.

9 - Special and Equal

Friday, August 13, 1971

Special and Equal
Zen Mountain Center

Last night,[1] when we have question and answer, we came across the very important point. In the-in Japanese, we say [phonetic] sabetsu-soku-byodo, or shinku-myou.[2] Sabetbu-soku byodo. This is-sabetsu means "speciality," and byodo means "equality." Speciality means, you know-speciality means various being which is special. Each being are special, and each being has its own meaning of existence. When something exist, there is some reason why something exist. That is speciality. And equality is even though things is different-different, but strictly speaking each things does not exist in that way, because they are changing, constantly changing.

So if it is changing, we cannot say something really exist, you know, something we see [laughs] does not exist. You think you exist here, but it is not so. And which is easier for you to understand is, you know-maybe intellectually it is easier for you to understand things does not exist. Equality is easier to understand, and speciality is difficult to understand.

When you say "freedom," the meaning of freedom or feeling of freedom is more like equality. We are, you know, each-"We are equal, so we must have freedom." [Laughs.] That is what you say, but to us it is absurd. You know, if-if-if you want to be special, then it is not possible [laughs] to have freedom at the same time. When you are special, there is-you have some special reason to exist, you know. So, for an instance, a woman should be a woman, you know, and a man should be a man [laughs].

So there is-when we put emphasis on the reason why you exist as a man, why you exist as a woman, you know, then woman is valuable. Because she is a woman, she has, you know, her own reason why she exist as a woman. And he has his own reason, which is a different reason from woman exist. That is why a man is a man and a woman is woman.

So when you want to have equality, woman should be woman, and a man should be a man. When a man is a man, and woman is a woman, and a stone is a stone, cucumber is cucumber, eggplant is eggplant, then [laughs] they are equal. No one can change their value. Each cucumber is valuable as a cucumber-cucumber. But as human being is very selfish, so someone who do not like eggplant may say cucumber is better [laughs]. But actually cucumber and eggplant is the same. And so is man and woman, because each being has each own reason to exist. And each being cannot be replaced by some-something else. So we say each being has same value-equal value. So equality we mean is not equality [that] you mean, maybe.

So when we understand this point, we say because it is-everything is different, everything is equal value. That, you know-how we can obtain equal value is to have their own reason to exist, their own way to exist. And it is same-same with-with one person. Today I should be different, you know, and next day I should be different again. If I am always same, there is no reason why I should live. Day after day because I change from one being to the other it is-our life make sense.

So equality is-at the same time should be speciality-speciality at the same time, you know, equality. So if you put emphasis on just equality, that is-we call [you] "tamban-kan" [laughs].[3] Tamban-kan means-tam is carry. Ban is board. "Carrying board fellow." [Laughing.] He is carrying board, so he cannot see the other side. He can see this side only because there is partition. If it is very high I cannot see this side [probably gestures]. If I carry a big board here [probably gestures] I cannot see the other side.

So if you stick to equality or freedom only-freedom is at the same time restriction. Restriction is freedom, you know. If you just stick to restriction or rules or freedom, you know, that is, you know-you are carrying a board on your shoulder. So you cannot-you can see just freedom or just restriction, or speciality or equality, emptiness or form, you know.

"Form is emptiness and emptiness is form." That is, you know, our understanding. To see form is to see emptiness. To understand form or color means to understand something more than that-something more than color or form-something which makes form form and color color, you know-something which give you color, something which give you form. You have-each one of us has some form, given by the emptiness. You-you call it "God" or something, but we call it emptiness. If you say

"God," God could be someone who may create many things. But our God is not someone who create something-who create everything. If you are a Christian, you may be scolded if you say [ask], "If God created earth then who created God?" [Laughs.] You may be scolded. But will-immediately we ask, you know, who created God? If, you know, God is created by someone-some-someone else, then God is also, you know, not different from us, because they are created as we are-as our form and nature is given by emptiness. Actually we came out of emptiness.

Maybe if I say so I am already-already creating some trouble or misunderstanding, because form itself is emptiness, and emptiness itself is form. We cannot say "create" or "to give form" or anything like that. But so that, you know, you can understand what I am saying easier, I am saying this way. And this kind of thing which could be understood by practice, by zazen practice, you cannot accept this kind of truth by thinking mind.

Anyway, I want to introduce you [to] some saying: Tamban-kan. Tam-ban-kan [S.R. says each syllable separately].

And how to, you know, how to get rid of stickiness of our mind is our practice. Our mind is very sticky. We easily stick to something-some idea, or speciality or equality, or man or woman, teacher or disciple, you know. We easily stick to some idea. I am disciple, you know. But you are not always disciple. Teacher is not always a teacher. Teacher could be sometime student. So we shouldn't stick to the idea of teacher or disciple. That is real freedom.

So-so that we can [be] free from sticky, you know-stickiness of our thinking mind or emotional feeling, we practice zazen. And if you will practice zazen, your character will be more and more clear and simple. Your-if someone say, "You are student." "Yes, I am student." [Laughs.] And if someone say, "You are teacher." "Yes, I am teacher." No stickiness, you know. "You are like a man." "Yes, maybe so." [Laughs.] "You are like a woman." "Yes, it is so." No stickiness in accepting various idea. So you have freedom, you know. That is how you attain freedom. That is the point of practice.

And many teachers or many people have pretty difficult time to get rid of this kind of stickiness of human mind. So you should remember this point, and you shouldn't lose the point of practice or study. So whatever you do it is study. If you eat something, you know-if you don't say "I like this" or "I don't like it," then that is freedom. If you eat something, you know, well-cooked, you should, you know, appreciate the taste of it. If it is raw, it is also good [laughs, laughter]. That is how to get out of stickiness-stickiness of our feeling. "Everything is good." Then you are free-you have freedom.

So you shouldn't be concerned about what people may say about you.

You know, it is okay. Whatever they say it may be so [laughs, laughter]. As they say so, maybe so [laughs]. But because of your sticky mind, you say, "No, I am not so." [Laughs.] Then you will lose your freedom. You make your world narrow-small for you. Wherever you go you have freedom if you are free from the idea of sticky mind, if you do not carry a board on your shoulder. It is very heavy-actually very heavy. Because of this board you will suffer a lot [laughs]. Tamban-kan. Kan means "fellow," you know. Exact translation is "fellow." Tam-ban-kan. Tamban-kan.

And we-we have this kind of technical term: aku-byodo.[4] "Wrong," you know-"wrong equality." Wrong-when you stick to the idea of equality, that is wrong equality. If you stick to the idea of equality, you want everyone the same size. You will be too high. Chuck Hoy is extra high. So we must cut their head [laughs, laughter] to make them equal. That is, you know, wrong equality.

Our equality is-because Chuck is high he is equal, and we need him. When I cannot reach for something he may help out [laughs, laughter]. That is why he is, you know, he has his own virtue. [Laughing.] If we make you-if you-if I make you same size, you know, you will be-all of you will be dead, you know. There is no reason why we have so many people. Maybe one is enough. If you are same size, and same-and your hand and feet and face are same, you know, one person will suffice. We don't need so many people. That is so-called-it, you know, wrong equality, aku-byodo.

So something should be equal-only one thing should be equal, but rest of things should be different. And to understand how important it is to be different is actual practice. This is the practice [to which] many teachers devoted themselves. Practice of difference is very difficult. That was the, you know, point we came across [in last night's lecture].

Here is a Zen story about Hyakujo-Hyakujo. Do you know Hyakujo?[5] Hyakujo is a great Zen master in China who established Zen precepts. And what we are observing at Tassajara or in Japan is mostly Hyakujo's way. How we live in [leaving? leave the?] zendo and how we-what kind of sitting we have is almost [completely] set up by Hyakujo. And we are still following his way. It is difficult to, you know, to go out of his way.

Hyakujo once mounted the pulpit-the altar like-like this, you know, and koan says whenever he appears on the altar, the old-an old man also appear at the rear of the row-in the corner of the lecture hall. And when-when people leave, you know, when students leave, that old man also left. One day-one day, all the-almost all the students left, but that old man did not leave. He was still sitting. That is trouble [laughs]. Anyway, I have to explain. [Laughs.] That is already trouble.

And Hyakujo asked him. "Why don't you leave?" And the old man said, "At-at-in the day of seven buddhas"-you know, before Shakyamuni Buddha we count several [seven?] Buddhas-and Buddha-Shikin[6] Buddha-"when the time of Shikin Buddha, I, you know, I was a teacher." And someone asked him-wise man-if-if wise man will fall into the teaching of cause and effect or law of cause and effect. And I said to him, "Well-trained teacher or enlightened man will not fall into the rule of-law of cause and effect. Because I said so, since then I became a fox-wild fox. And actually-I am actually an old fox who live in the mountain." And the fox or the old man asked him, "What will be the right answer," you know, "for that question?" And Hyakujo said, "Enlightened person will fall into the law of karma-even an enlightened person cannot get out of the law of karma. That is my answer." And old fox attained enlightenment and vanished. That was the story.

What do we mean by-by a fox? Fox is not fox. It is actually emptiness, or absolute, or source of all being, or forms and colors is the old fox. So it-it appears-when people appear, it is okay. When, you know, an idea of emptiness or absolute is in our mind, it is: trouble because we are already-our mind is already stick to the idea of an old fox, or idea of emptiness. That is trouble-already trouble.

So when people, you know, or everyone leaves zendo or leaves lecture hall, there should not be any idea of the first principle or idea of form or emptiness, because each being, each student in zendo is the absolute itself-emptiness itself. When each one of you feel you have the absolute value, you are embodiment of the absolute truth. So when you leave, everything should leave. When you leave, mountain and river should leave. Everything should leave. Then there is no trouble.

Because you stick to the idea of, you know, form or the absolute, there is trouble. And the question and answer here they made back and forth, "to fall-the law of karma-to fall into the law of karma" means to stick to the, you know, law of karma, cause and effect-to lose freedom from the law of karma. So that is, you know, to fall into the idea of karma. Not to fall-the idea of karma or law of karma means not to stick to it, and stick to-not to fall. The idea of karma is to ignore the law of karma. You cannot ignore the law of karma. And we cannot-cannot stick to-we shouldn't stick to the law of karma. There is two, you know, [of?] our attitudes.

Sometime, even though you follow the teaching of karma, it does not mean you lose your freedom from the law of karma. Do you [laughs] understand? So when at first-when he [the soon-to-be old fox] said so, because he thought he understood equality of various being, he said, "Wise man will not," you know, "stick to the idea of karma." But when stick-he does not stick to the idea of karma meant for him, you know, no, there is no such, you know, thing like law of karma because each being does not exist [laughs] originally, you know. We are empty because we are changing. So I-when I don't exist-when everything doesn't exist in its strict sense, how is it possible to live? To-for everything to follow the law of karma, that was what-how he understood. It is-he was tamban-kan. Because of his one-sided understanding of the truth he became a fox.

But when Hyakujo said you will-you must follow the law of karma, even though enlightened person, as long as he has-he is human being, he has physical body, it is not possible for him to be-not to follow the law of karma. So he could understand the reality he felt from both sides. That is why he [the old fox] could vanish from the zendo. That kind of fox shouldn't exist in zendo. In zendo there must be, you know, only student, and teacher and student. Teacher or student is each being, you know, in the realm of speciality. So what you can see is each student; you cannot see the absolute or old fox. When you have, you know, real understanding of the reality-old fox, does it exist? That was the parable-manifestation of [1-2 words] Hyakujo [1-2 words].

Do you have some question? Hai.

Student A: If [4-6 words] in the beginning you said that if you're not in the zendo, then you don't have any [1 word], and then you don't have to go, well-everybody is centered [?] in the zendo [1 word]-at least they are now.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, yeah.

Student A: Then the fact that we're in freedom resumes that center [?], and I think [3-6 words] what we have.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. Uh-huh. That is real freedom, you know. But whether we feel, at the same time, you know, specialness-so you cannot be arrogant, you know, even though you have some special talent, you know [laughs]. That is your speciality. And someone else may have, you know, his own speciality. And so that is why everyone is same. And you cannot be arrogant about it, you know. And at the same time there is another danger-danger, you know. "This is my speciality," you know [laughs]. So you will be very much individualistic-selfish, sometime, which actually does not exist. Self doesn't exist. At the-at that moment, you know, when you say, "This is my speciality," speciality exist. But it doesn't exist in-in the same way always. If you stick to your own speciality always, in the same way, you will be dead [laughs]. No one will be interested in you if your-if you are saying same thing over and over again like a fake record. What you say should be changed, and your feelings should-should change.

So speciality exist, and at the same time it doesn't exist, so both, you know. Exist and doesn't exist. So double-edged, you know, sword. Exist/not exist. It is not so easy, you know [laughs], this practice. You have no time to rest. "This is my speciality. All I have to talk [about] is in this book." [Laughs.] That is, you know, [1-2 words]. Even though you become buddha, you know, buddha cannot stay always as a buddha. [Sentence probably finished. Tape turned over.]

... buddha must be someone else. Buddha should be a friend of people, or else buddha cannot help people. That is why Jesus is, you know, a messenger or son of a god. God himself cannot do anything with people [laughs]. Only, you know, buddha is not buddha [god?]-he can help people. The same thing is true with everyone. We cannot be same way always.

Student B: Would you say that equality cannot exist with differences?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: Would you say that equality cannot exist even with differences?

Suzuki-roshi: Ahh. Cannot exist in the same way, you know. At that time, right here, in this moment, it exist, actually. But I don't know next moment-I don't know. Next moment you will exist, you know, in some other way. Like Dogen-zenji said, firewood-when firewood is firewood, you know, firewood has its own past and future. And when firewood become ash, you know, ash has its own past and future. Firewood is firewood, and ash is ash [laughs]. So, you know, I am here right now, but tomorrow I-I shall be ash, not firewood. Looks like same, but actually it is not, strictly speaking. That is why, when you understand the-all things in its strict sense, we cannot stick to any idea. But right here, at this moment, everything exist. I'm-looks like arguing [laughs] something, but it is so, isn't it?

Student B: So the things are constantly in change-

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, constantly.

Student B: -[1-2 words] the young ones-

Suzuki-roshi: Everyone.

Student B: -[4-6 word] when I was growing up that things can be constantly in change, and change can be different. [1-2 words] you know, you have a tall man and-you have a tall man and a short man. But they can be the same [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: Anyway-anyway, thank you. Abstract things can be rhetorical.

Suzuki-roshi: Rhetorical? Abstract? Abstract? [Laughs.] Yeah. There is, you know, some difference between your understanding and my understanding, you know. The equality is not-for-to me it is not abstract thing; it is very real. But to you, because you have no experience of the abstract, you know, to you it is some idea. So idea doesn't change, you know-has no validity. It is equality, you know, because-ahh-[laughs]-it is rather difficult to say. Maybe you understand, you know.

Equality, if it doesn't-doesn't have any power or, you know, any meaning-for an instance, everything has, you know, salt. In each plant has salt, you know. But salt for you is something, you know-salt is salt-salt for you. When you eat vegetable, you don't feel there is salt in it, you know. But once you know, you know, the real taste of salt, then you will find out the salt in each vegetable, you know. So for you, salt is, you know, something in-in-in some container, and white stuff is salt. There is not much difference, you know.

Salt for me is-even though actually I don't feel salty when I eat apple or some other vegetable, I don't feel salty. But imagine if there is no salt-no salt in vegetable [laughs], what kind of taste you taste? You cannot imagine, you know. May be very-it may be terrible taste. Because of salt, apple tastes like apple, eggplants like-taste like eggplant, cucumber taste like cucumber. Do you understand? That kind of difference.

That is why-why we practice zazen, and we start our life from nothing. After you sit, you know, especially in morning, instead of lecture, you stand up, you feel, you know-your feeling will be indescribable. It is-that feeling is something quite different from feeling you have in your ordinary practice. That is the feeling you have when you come out from empty-emptiness. That is the taste of the real vegetable.

Okay? Maybe [laughs], I think-does it make some sense to you?

Student B: [2-3 words] I can see the idea that [4-6 words]- Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah. That is enough.

Student B: -the idea of a vacuum-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student B: [1-2 words] the fact that I am even telling you about it-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Uh-huh. Yes.

Student B: -it would take a lot of discussion, first of all. I don't know if [1-2 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, I know. Anyway, old fox appeared [laughs], right here. So we have to discuss about the old fox. It appeared last time and still, you know, almost vanished [laughs]-almost. If you practice zazen tomorrow evening, it will go [laughs, laughter]. Something like that, okay? It is impossible to, you know, to explain it fully. It is not something which is possible to explain from the beginning.

Some-some question? Hai.

Student C: Roshi [4-6 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: -and in my mind I get some pictures and they're [4-6 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: -and I try to get rid of them so that I don't have any picture of what it is.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: Then I don't feel that I have any understanding of what it means when you say "emptiness."

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student C: So both ways it seems like there is not right or not left. Is there some other way?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. [Laughs.] Some other way, you know, is practice. You have to, you know, you have to be trying to figure out intellectually what it is from various points, you know, comparing one understanding of emptiness to another understanding of emptiness, because we use many words, you know: symbolic words, first principle, buddha-nature, or emptiness. Each time, why we apply that various words is to destroy various idea of, you know-special idea of emptiness. So real understanding of emptiness is-you should be-you should experience what is emptiness rather than idea, you know. That is, you know, in Rinzai that is kensho. Even though it is not so big, once you have kensho, you know, you have taste of it, which is not words.

And shikantaza-in shikantaza you have also taste of emptiness by actual-through actual experience, or else it doesn't makes much sense, you know. If I talk about it, it is already a kind of philosophy. Our teaching should be philosophical, but philosophy doesn't reach to the reality; it is still words, and result of thinking mind. But if you understand this kind of thought-Buddhist thought, your practice will be more and more concentrated on important point, or else you-your practice will be, you know, lost in various direction. You will go round and round same place, or you will go in wrong direction. And there are so many directions, so you will be lost.

So, in that way, for long, long time-long, long time ago, Indian philosophers, teachers, you know, discussed about our religious experience: What is real religious experience? And those people were called ronji.[7] So Zen priests or teachers of various schools of Buddhism were at the same time a kind of ronji-a kind of philosopher who can discuss-who can discuss the truth with various schools of teacher-teachers of-of various schools. And they tried to-to be concentrated on some important core of religious experience.

That is something what I am trying here with you. Okay? You may be confused, I know, because maybe you are trying to understand-trying to-maybe you are-instead of thinking, you know, by yourself, you try-you depend on, or you are trying to understand what I mean. But what I am trying is to destroy your, you know, various wrong idea of practice. That is the difference.

I know you-you have various, you know, obstacles. So to get rid of those obstacles from your mind is my purpose of lecture. Do you understand? Because you may have so many ideas, you know, so that is not what I mean-that is not what I mean. This is-this is wrong, and you take off, you know, various obstacles from your mind, so that we can [be] concentrated [on] more-most important point, so that you can trust yourself, trust your buddha-nature which you have. Okay? I am not trying to give you any idea, but I-I am explaining something by your words [laughs]-not my words, by your words. I am using your words, but what I mean is something more than that.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript by Barry Eisenberg. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican 9/27/00. Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] SR-71-08-12, p. 9.

[2] sabetsu or shabetsu (speciality, separateness, or discrimination); -soku (immediately; is); -byodo (equality; all the same; non-discrimination); shinku (absolute void or true non-existence); myou (wondrous or mysterious existence).

[3] See also SR-69-03-30: "We call someone who understand things from just one side, we call him 'tamban-kan.' Tamban-kan in Chinese or Japanese means 'a man who carry a board on his shoulder.'"

[4] aku (wrong); byodo (equality).

[5] Hyakujo Ekai (Baizhang Huaihai): 720-814. Ch'an master of T'ang period. Student of Baso Doitsu, master of Isan Reiyu.

[6] One of the six buddhas who preceded Shakyamuni Buddha.

[7] ronji (Jap.): master of discourses.

10 - When wind stops, flowers fall

Sunday, August 15, 1971

"When-when wind stops, flowers fall"

Zen Mountain Center

When-when wind stops, flowers fall.

When a bird sings, mountain become more calm.

That is a kind of Zen poem. My translation is not so good. [He recites the poem in Japanese, saying each line twice.]

Kaze yande hana mae otsu.

Kaze [Tori] naitei yama sarani yunari.[1]

Kaze yande: When wind stops, but still flower falls. No-there is no wind. If there is no wind, flower should stay, but flower-after, you know, there is no wind, still flower falls. If a bird sings, it is not calm. But if you hear a bird sing in the remoted mountain, you feel the calmness of the mountain more. Kaze-Tori naitei yama sarani yunari.

This is again-this poem again refers to the feeling of "there is" and "there is not." There is, and sometimes there is not. And there is not, sometimes there is [laughs]. When a flower falls, why flower falls is because there is wind. But when there is no wind, flowers still fall. And when you see a flower fall, you feel the wind, more than wind is up [?]. When a bird sings, you feel the calmness of the mountain more than you-more than when you did not hear any sound. That is true. Isn't-isn't that true?

That is real feeling of "there is" and "there is not." That is actual feeling. But usually we are involved in the idea of "there is" or "there is not." "There is not" means there is no wind. "There is not" means there is no wind. "There is no sound" means, you know, you don't hear anything-that is, there is no sound. But actually, when you hear sound you do not feel of actual feeling of no sound. It is paradoxical, you may say, but that is much more true than your, you know, usual understanding of "there is" or "there is not." Much more true. Kaze yande hana mae otsu. Kaze [Tori] naitei yama sarani yunari. You cannot, you know-this is-you cannot say this is just poem. This is actual reality.

When you, you know, have various things you eat, you become more hungry [laughs]. That is also true. "There is," for us, there is not. "There is not," for us, actually means there is. When there-there is not much food, whatever you eat you will be satisfied with what you eat. Actually, you know, you feel satisfaction of the things you have, when there is not so much. "There is not" is for us "there is," and "there is" for us "there is not much" [laughs] often.

That is very true for us. When that is very true for us, our thinking mind goes [in] another direction. That is why our practice is always confused [laughs]. On one hand, you know, your-your feeling is very realistic and actual; on the other hand, your feeling is just logical. And it is ignoring actual feeling you have in our everyday life. No one knows which it is true. Both is true. There is something we should think about, right here.

Ummon[2] one day asked our students: "I don't ask about-I don't ask about fifteen days before. But how about fifteen days ahead?" That was his question. I don't ask you what has happened, you know, what has happened, actually, fifteen days before, or what has been-what has happened for fifteen days, but I am asking you what will happen from now? That was Ummon's question. No one could answer for that-for that question.

So Ummon said: "Every day is good day" [laughs]. That was his answer. Every day is a good day. Fifteen days, you know, it has been good days-we have had good days for fifteen days, and we will have good days from now on. Every day is good day. That was Ummon's answer.

And that-what he means is-"Every day good day" means every day-actual-his life of every day include "is not"-include both "there is" and "there is not." And he is satisfied with the idea of "there is" and the idea of "there is not." "There is something" is good; "there is no-nothing" is also good. But "there is," at the same time, does not mean there is noth- [partial word]-actually there is something. But even though there is nothing for him, that is "there is." Even though "there is," you know, for him that is-"there is not" sometime.

Anyway, every day is good day for him. "There is" or "there is not," he doesn't care. "There is"-good. "There is" is good. And "there is not"-also good. Every day is good day. When you, you know, understand exactly what is "there is" and what is "there is not," then you have complete freedom from everything, and you can appreciate things in its true sense.

When there is no wind, still something-some flower like camellia falls. In the deep mountain, when you hear a bird, then you feel, all of a sudden, you feel, "Oh, how quiet mountain it is." Every day is a good day. Whatever happen to him, it is not just happening of something, or it is not just nothing happened. "Nothing happened," you say, but many things is happening. When something happens, you feel nothing. The feeling of nothing is happening in the great universe, including sun and the moon and bright stars you see in Tassajara valley. That you see many stars-actually when you see many stars, you will feel the vast emptiness of the sky. You are not just watching stars, but you are-you are feeling, actually, you feel the vastness of the sky.

In short, if you are always involved in the life of "there is" or "there is not," or enough or not enough, good or bad, right or wrong, you don't feel anything in its true sense. But when your mind is very calm, calm enough to see things which you do not actually see, when your mind is calmness, even though you see many things, you see-you can appreciate the vastness of the being covered by something you see. Then you can appreciate things as it is. That is Ummon's "Every day is good day." "Every day is good day."

I put more emphasis on intellectual, you know, interpretation of our-intellectual interpretation of our framework of Buddhist teaching, but more important thing is to have real feeling of practice.

Every day we practice zazen. In-in summer, morning zazen is good, very good, but evening zazen is also good. It is little bit hot, but after, you know, sitting, when you feel cool wind from outside, you may feel indescribable, you know, feeling of practice. Night zazen in this time of the year is supposed to be very hot because it is hot. But actual feeling you have in zazen in such a warm days-hot days-you have indescribable good feeling, which you cannot appreciate in spring or autumn. Coolness of the-feeling of the coolness is something more than you think about. Even though you know how good evening zazen is, but each time you sit you will feel, "Oh, good." [Laughs.] Every time you sit, your feeling will be refreshed because, I think, because it is hot. "It is hot" is not "it is hot," actually.

In monastery we do not have so good food [laughs] usually, and at Tassajara, as food is pretty strong and good, but not so, you know, not so tasty or it is very plain, I think of [?]. If you chew it-when you chew it-when you eat, you will feel real taste of the vegetables. If you cook by sugar and with many-too much spices [laughs], you cannot appreciate real taste of the food.

If the way of accepting things is simple, you can appreciate the things more. So we say:

Jiki ni oite to naru mono wa,

ho ni oitemo mata to nari.[3]

Jiki-jiki is food.

If you-if you can appreciate food, you can appreciate dharma.

Jiki ni oite to naru. To-do you know? To means "absolute." Jiki ni oite to naru mono wa.

If you appreciate the real value of the absolute in food, you can appreciate dharma food: Jiki ni oite to naru mono wa, ho ni oitemo mata to nari. When your practice come to this stage, you are said to be a good monk or a good student [laughs]. We say:

Chojo wa chohosshin;

tanjo wa tanhosshin.[4]

Someone like Chuck is-is long buddha [laughs]. Someone like me is short buddha. Chojo wa chohosshin, tanjo wa tanhosshin. Short or long, good or bad, we say, we can appreciate things as it is, and we appreciate the value of each being [thing?]. That is something what I referred to in last-last lecture.[5]

But so far, at Tassajara, we have been discussing, we have had discussion after discussion [laughs]: discussing about, you know, food, or rules, or many things-position. But why we did so is we cannot ignore idea of good and bad, long and short, but more and more as our students grew up, we can-we must be able to appreciate things as they are. Bamboo is good, pine tree is good, oak tree is good, grass is good, darkness at night is good [laughs], frog is good. Everything should be good. That is "Every day is good day." And nothing is good-bare field [?] is good. Dark vast sky is good. That is, you know, our actual feeling we should reach [teach?].

Maybe next have question and answer if you have-for fifteen minutes or so. Do you have some question? [Asides; laughter.] No question?

Student A (Dan Welch?): Roshi, sometimes it seems easy to accept your words. But you often tell us that words are pointing at the moon [?]. How [3-4 words].

Suzuki-roshi: What I say-

Student A: Sometimes it seems that we can accept quite easily what you say. But maybe you don't live that long [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Yeah. Maybe so. [Laughs, laughter.]

Student A: But seriously, I don't know what to say-

Suzuki-roshi: That is why I could [laughs, laughter]. Yeah-because I say so, you accept it. When you say so, you die [?], you know. It means that if you really, you know, if you really have that kind of feeling, you know, it is al- [partial word: "always"?]- what I say is always true. But because-actual practice-your actual practice is not always in-in that way. Maybe it takes time, you know, to understand what I am saying.

But if my talk is end up in a kind of discussion, it doesn't make sense. We can have discussion any time-but-discussion is good, but discussion will not solve the problem completely. What I am talking right now is something you cannot reach by your mind, thinking mind, but something-it is something you can feel through practice-through real practice.

What is real practice and what is not? The point is, when you forget-when you can forget yourself, then you have real practice. When your mind is always occupied by your small thinking mind or emotional mind or feeling or concepts, you cannot have real practice. Do you have some question-some more question? Hai.

Student B: [1-2 words] situation [2-3 words]. Today I was working [3-4 words], and a big fly was landing on my face. A fly. Sometimes I brushed it off. And today I got angry [3-4 words]. And so I [12-16 words] ... so I didn't feel bad. It was a good day, but it wasn't [4-6 words]. In that kind of situation, maybe you have-give me some advice on what I could [10-14 words] sometimes [4-6 words] at other times [4-6 words]. Sometimes if I [4-6 words] it turns warm-very hot.

Suzuki-roshi: When you are not patient, you know, when you become impatient, as you feel [reply from student; laughs], you don't feel so good. No-not always so. When you become impatient [laughs], of course you may make face. How about, you know, painting? Drawing-make some drawing of your impatient face on a paper, you know, when you have time. [Laughs, laughter.] [Student probably makes a face or draws one. SR is reacting to something with laughter.] Pretty good. May be very good Zen-Zen picture-Zen painting-if you-if you do it-if you are able to do it. And if you cannot do it, maybe Dan [Welch?] will do it [laughs]. Pretty good-not so bad.

But that you-you do not like your impatient face, that was not so good. If you are patient enough, you know, to work in the garden, then why don't you do more-little bit more patient-a little bit. It is too soon to say this is good or bad. This is "My practice is good or bad." You cannot say so easily because your practice will continue, you know.

Student C: Getting upset with yourself-getting annoyed with yourself- [1-2 words] if anything happens-Suzuki-roshi: Dualistic.

Student C: Its true it's dualistic, but if I face it I [2-3 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, and because you say "dualistic," that is not so, actually. When it is happening it is not so. After you, yeah, think about it, you feel dualistic.

Student C: [1-2 sentences unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: After. Yeah, that is not so good [laughs]. That is not so good. Your practice should continue and develop, you know, moment after moment. Your firewood does not become ash. Ash is ash, and firewood is firewood. And that you-hot-that you work in the garden, even though there are many flies, even though sun is strong, that is your practice at that time, and that practice actually extended to the practice of this evening: our practice of shikantaza. That is why you have good feeling when you appear in zendo with white tabi, with people, and recite, you know, sutra and make bow. You see? Your practice is going on and on and on.

Student C: When I started in the garden [?] this spring I thought-if-if-if my understanding-I think I understand what you're saying. However, for some reason my mind is blank about what the ... of what happened. Sometimes it-sometimes I feel bad about what happened. But because I feel bad about what happened, I may be tongue-tied [?] and [1 word]-not to do bad, whatever that is.

Suzuki-roshi: That is, you know, another practice, you know. To reflect on what you do is quite different practice [than] you had before in-in the garden. Refreshed practice. There is-of course there is some connection, but you are not actually continuing same practice. Same practice but, you know, renewed practice. Not same-not same but not different, we say. So you should understand in that way.

You should think about it, but you shouldn't stick to it. Why you shouldn't stick to it is it is renewed practice already, and that you feel bad is good. Who feels bad about it? Not your small mind, which was disturbed by flies, but it is by big mind-big mind thinks that was not good. So you have your practice at that time, you know: practice of big mind. When you are annoyed by, you know, by flies, that was small-minded practice, but ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

We say, if you fell down by [on] the ground, you will stand up, you know, by the ground. Do you understand? If you fell-if you, you know, lose your practice because of the annoyance you have with flies, you will stand up [by the] same annoyance. Because when you say "I was annoyed by flies and that was not good practice," then already you stand-stood up, because you have big mind already. Do you understand?

So it is okay, even [laughs] you don't have to be concerned about it so much-about your bad practice so much. But to-to be concerned about it is good, because it is a practice of big mind. So [loud mike noise] those who-you cannot say this has [6-8 words unclear]. If you fell on the ground you will stand up by the same old ground. If you say "My practice is not good," [5-6 words], you are not standing already like this. So that-because of this, you know, same old problem, you can stand up.

So if you enlighten with delusion-about delusion, you are enlightened person, you know. If you are deluded as your enlightened mind, that is delusion. Do you understand? If you say "My practice was not good," then that is enlightenment. It is not problem of what you did is good or bad, but problem of actual practice you have right now-actual mind you have right now. If the actual mind you have right now is big mind, that is enlightenment. Okay? You-you don't have to [be] concerned about what you did before, but you have to [laughs] because you have to stand up. But when you think that was wrong, that is already cleared up. You could cut off the delusion you have. You have not delusion any more. You are not deluded any more. Ahhh. Does it make sense? Okay? Hai.

Student D: If you're being bitten-

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student D: If you're being bitten, say, by a fly or whatever it is, and you smack that fly you just think that-you don't think about it-the fly is on the ground dead [laughter]. [2 words] the way you are.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student D: Don't think about it. Go right on with whatever you're doing. You don't inflict upon it the anguish of something [?]. [4-5 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: Different?

Student D: You don't think about it any way at all.

Suzuki-roshi: You will think-you will feel [in] some way, you know. It is not possible not to feel-not to have any feeling about it. But what kind of feeling you have is the point.

Student D: Well, when I-when I did this I didn't-[3-4 words]-whatever it was just died, and afterwards I thought, well maybe it just died that way [1-2 words] [laughter, comments by other students].

Suzuki-roshi: Is it true with almost everyone? Do you agree [laughs] with his way [?]?

Student E: Let's kill Alan.[6] [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Huh?

Student F: Suzuki-roshi, what if we smack him and then stomp on him?
[7] [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: What kind of reaction do you have? [Laughter.]

Student F: Like a blade of grass to become a buddha.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student F: Grass-blade of grass to become a buddha.

Suzuki-roshi: Ohh. [Laughs.] Even though, you know, at last- This is famous statement of Dogen: Even though you do not like grass, grass will grow quite easily. Even though you like flower, life will-flower will fall [laughs]. That is actual reality. Even though it is so, if-if some-you are stinged by-by mosquito or horse-horsefly, you know, you will do this [gesturing?] [laughs]. You will do this, maybe. But when you are involved in very serious practice, you wouldn't, you know. Even though mosquito comes, you will be sitting, and until you-you may have many mosquitoes, you know, like small [1-2 words] [laughs]-big [1-2 words]. They, you know, they will [3-4 words] sting us, but not only sting, but also they suck blood, you know, from us. More and more they will become like small, you know, fruits or something [laughs, laughter]. They cannot fly any more [laughs, laughter-maybe gesturing]. But you will still-you will be still sitting. And then you have to be careful when you-you stand up, not-not to step on mosquitoes [laughs].

So you feel calm to [1 word]. "Oh, he came." And as soon as he came with his legs [1 word] and his-what do you call it-his pipe or something [laughs, laughter]-needle [laughs]-

Student: Straw.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student: Straw.

Suzuki-roshi: Straw. [Laughs, laughter.] -you-you feel his straw, you know, coming. Straw. Mouth. Straw. First, you know, legs; next straw; and straw, you know, [laughs] come in and come out like this [probably gestures], and while they are continue this for several moments, they stop and start to suck, until they become like this [probably gestures]. And they cannot fly because they are so heavy.

So you don't-when your practice is completely involved in bad [?]-big mind, you don't care. But, you know, but usually, for an instance, when a bug or big horsefly come [slaps self], I will-I will do [?] like this. But what I feel is different. But whatever feeling I have, if something has happened already, you know, you cannot do anything. Even though it was bad-it is not okay, but [laughs] we cannot do anything about it, so you have to think on it [?]-you have-you were-how do you say?-you have to make reflection.

How you feel is the point. If you feel bad, that is good. And it is not always possible-it is not impossible not to feel good or bad if you-unless you make some excuse. But to-to make some excuse is very small mind. So don't make any excuse. Don't try to make any excuse [for] what you have done. If it is wrong, "I am sorry." If it is good, then you will say "maybe so," but you shouldn't feel completely satisfied with your practice. You should go on and on. Hai.

Student G: What about if you know it's wrong and you do it anyway?

Suzuki-roshi: Huh?

Student G: What about if you know it's wrong and you do it anyway?

Suzuki-roshi: When you do it anyway?

Student G: Yeah. You did so in a way that you know it in a minute [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student G: But you-

Suzuki-roshi: You did it anyway.

Student G: -you do it anyway.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Do you mean you did it because you have to-had to?

Student G: I don't live in [1-2 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: Anyway, it is very-very difficult to understand exactly. Without thinking, do you mean? Anyway-

Student G: No, with thinking.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student G: -with thinking.

Suzuki-roshi: With thinking-

Student G: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: -and not completely. "Anyway, I will do it." That is not so serious. That is, I don't think, serious if-not serious now. In your practice, yeah, we shouldn't do things just anyway, you know. "Okay, I will do it anyway." Sometime it is good, you know. Without giving responsibility of doing to some-somebody, taking resp- [partial word]-the responsibility of doing to-for yourself. "I will do it anyway," you know. You don't have to say this way or that way. If it is bad, "that is my, you know, fault"; if it is good, you know, "because you helped me, I did it." "But anyway I did it." This kind of "anyway" is very good [?]. "But I don't know what we should do. Anyway I will do it"-that is not so good [?]. But when you-you are in some situation where you should do something, you know, then you will do it anyway. "Whether it is good or bad, someone must do it. So anyway I will do it." That is also "anyway." "I don't know what will happen to-to us, but anyway I will go and find out." That is also "anyway." There must be many "anyways." [Laughs, laughter.]

As you are mostly young, so I think you-your practice should not be old man's practice. You should be confront with problem-problems you have, you know, for you.

Do you have some questions, some more question? One more please. Hai.

Student H: [6-10 sentences unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm. Actually, you know, that is not-cannot be, you know, serious question [laughs]. You know, you know, the answer already, perhaps, but you don't know what to do. That is why you ask me, isn't that so? You know, you know.

Student H: Well, I know-I know thatI [1-2 sentences unclear], but I [rest of sentence unclear].

Suzuki-roshi: I-I maybe-I have some good answer? [Laughs, laughter.] No, I am sorry I haven't [laughs]. I don't have so good answer for that. But my answer will be, you know, if it's good chance for you to have that kind of problem. You know, because of that kind of problem, we can practice our way. It is good to have some problem. If it, you know-this-this is too much to say, but if we are cats or dog we have no problem, so we don't have to practice [laughs] [1 word]. We are happy in our problem. So that is not problem just for you. Everyone has same problems, actually. So as-as long as you are-you live in this land of Shakyamuni Buddha you have that problem-or [living in the] human world, you have that problem.

In Buddhist traditionally [?], land of-this world is Nansenbushu,[8] the south side of the Mount Sumeru. On the opposite side there is Hokkuroshu,[9] where there is no problem [laughs]. There is enough water to drink, and no cold and similar things, and enough juice [?] and various foods you enjoy; there is no problem. People [live] long time-people do not die. If you are born in that kind of place, you know, you have more pleasure, and we have no Buddhism or no practice. That is very, you know- But it suggest some truth.

So your question is based on the idea of understanding of our life. "If our life is full of happiness and joy, that is good life; if our life is full of suffering and problem, that is not good life." That is a very superficial understanding of life. And most people-people's view of life is based on that kind of idea of good or bad, which is not deep enough, which is not real enough.

So when you have that kind of problem, you should think of, you know, why you have-when you have problem [?], you know, when you are able to think about it. When you are angry you cannot think, of course. But when you are not-when your mind is calm, you should think about the foundation of your-of your view of life-understanding of life. And it is good to listen to some teaching like Buddhism. We do not talk about sin, but we talk about suffering and problem of life. And it is not possible to leave-to get out of suffering and to, you know, to have life of no problem, according to our understanding of-of human life.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript by Barry Eisenberg. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Checked against tape by Bill Redican, 9/25/00. Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms, particularly the verses on Pages 1 and 3-4.

[1] Suzuki-roshi is quoting two different (probably originally Chinese) poems, two verses from each poem in each of these two lines. The sound and tone of both poems is similar, which may be why Suzuki-roshi recited both verses together. Line 1: Implied: (when); Kaze (wind); yande (stop); hana (flower); mae (before or already); otsu (dropped). Line 2: Tori (bird); naite (sing); yama (mountain); sarani (more); yunari (calm). In Line 2, Suzuki-roshi inadvertently said "Kaze" instead of "Tori" as the first word of the line. He corrected "Kaze" to "Tori" at the end of the next (fourth) paragraph.

[2] Ummon Bun'en (Yunmen Wenyan): 864-949. Ch'an master. Ummon's statement is from Case 6 of the Pi-yen-lu (Blue Cliff Record).

[3] Jiki (food); ni oite (about); to (absolute or equality); naru (become); mono wa (person), ho (dharma); ni oitemo (about); mata (also); to (absolute or equality); nari (end-of-sentence marker). Suzuki-roshi is referring to Dogen-zenji's "Fushuku-hanpo" ("The Dharma for Taking Food"), from Eihei (Dai)Shingi, Line 1. See T. D. Leighton and S.

Okumura, Dogen's Pure Standards for the Zen Community, Albany: SUNY, 1996, p. 83. [See also SR-70-08-04.]

[4] Cho (long) jo (meditating); wa (is or equals); cho(long) hosshin (buddha or dharmakaya); tan (short) jo (meditating); wa (is or equals); tan (short) hosshin (buddha or dharmakaya). Literally, "Long-sitting is long buddha; short-sitting is short buddha." Figuratively, "Sitting a long or short time, you can realize buddha-mind," or "Sitting is most important, even for a short time."

[5] SR-71-08-13.

[6] Possibly Alan Marlowe, suggesting that Student D was Alan.

[7] Probably referring to the way insects were treated in the student's (largely inaudible) questions.

[8] Nan (Jap.) = "south." Also Nan'enbudai, the "Jumbu (San. Jumbudvipa) continent in the south." According to Hindu/Buddhist cosmology, four continents (shishu) lie at the bottom of the ocean in the four cardinal directions arranged around Mt. Sumeru (Meru), the "world mountain" at the center of the universe. Nansenbushu is the continent lying to the south.

[9] Hoku (Jap.) = "north." Also Uttarakuru (San.). Hokkuru lies to the north of Mt. Sumeru. Its occupants live for 1000 years amidst a variety of pleasures.

11 - Sun-Faced Buddha, Moon-Faced Buddha

Tuesday, August 17, 1971

Sun-Faced Buddha, Moon-Faced Buddha
Zen Mountain Center

In-in my lecture, sometime I say everyone has buddha-nature, and whatever you do, that is, you know, Buddha's activity, I say. But on the other hand, I say you must follow the rule, and when you practice zazen you should practice in some certain way: Keep your spine straight, cross your legs, and pull your neck as if you are supporting something. And pull in your chin. There are many, you know, instructions.

So you will be confused when I say, you know-it looks like contradiction to say to rule-to put emphasis on rules and to follow our schedule. If it is-if whatever you do that is, you know, Buddha's activity, then why we must have rule? This kind of, you know, question you may have.

The other-the other day, I said long bamboo is Buddha-long Buddha. Short bamboo is short Buddha [laughs]. And my statement discouraged [laughs] some sincere students, didn't it? As if I am talking about something-as if I am encouraging some, you know, easy way. And-for an instance, you know the Sun-Faced Buddha and the Moon-Faced Buddha. When he is sick, he is Moon-Faced Buddha. When he is healthy he is the Sun-Faced Buddha. And when it is hot, we are hot-we should be hot Buddha. When it is cold, we should be cold Buddha. This kind of statement invite many misunderstanding.

When we talk like this, you know, "Sun-Faced Buddha," "the Moon-Faced Buddha," or "everyday is good day," or "everyone has buddha-nature," or "in our great activity, whatever we do, that is our great activity," or "nothing is too long or nothing is too short" [laughs]. Even though you recite, you know, sutra with long, long voice [laughs]-it cannot be too long. It is-even though we say something, we hope it is not too short. If you say so, maybe someone who is practicing have to hit mokugyo-how to hit bell-will be discouraged. "Oh, Suzuki-roshi doesn't care [laughs] how we hit mokugyo. Even though we hit it fast, he doesn't care." But it-it is not so.

From viewpoint-there is two completely different viewpoint. One is, you know, when we say everyone-everything has buddha-nature, nothing is great or nothing is small-too small. To lift up a [speck of] dust means to lift up whole universe. When we say in that way, it means that we-we are talking about our original nature from standpoint of the first principle. When we, you know, put emphasis on strict rule, at that time we put emphasis on actual practice. Practice is the way to attain to have direct experience of the first principle. Only when you prac- [partial word]-you put emphasis on your practice you will, you know, experience-you will have the direct experience of the first principle. But when, you know, we talk about by words, we cannot say both sides at once. When we talk about, you know, the first principle, we-everything has buddha-nature period [laughs]. No words follow "Everything has buddha-nature."

But when you hear that, you know, you will understand-when-if everything has buddha-nature, "then" or "but"- "but" or "then" does not follow when we talk about the first principle. When you say "then" or "but," therefore your understanding of the first-the first principle is not anymore the first principle. If that is the first principle [then it is correct to say], "Everything has buddha-nature." Period.

Do-do you know the difference? You cannot say "therefore." If you say "therefore," that is not-it is, you know, the condition-"therefore"-a reason or excuse, you know, or something-for your lazy [laughs] practice. So it is not first principle any more. Everything has buddha-nature, period. No idea follows. No[t] any kind of idea comes up by that statement. So, "Everything has buddha-nature," someone say [thumps table]. Yes! When-only when you could say so, that is the first principle. You-you shouldn't say "therefore" [or] "but." That is the first principle.

But when we talk about actual practice you can say "therefore," [or] "that is why," you know, "even it is so," you can say so. That is the difference between first principle and the second principle. And if you confuse the first principle and second principle, you don't understand anything. You are always going, you know, round and round: no end [to] your confusion. You will be always confused. So when you practice you should be strictly involved in the rules. There there is the first principle, actually. Moment after moment there is first principle.

So even so, you know-I explained the other night, if we, you know, if we realize that our practice is lazy practice, then you-you may feel it-feel-you don't feel good. And this kind of mistake is happening every day, and we-we cannot enjoy our practice. What should we do? And what I said was that you realize your practice is not good. What mind, you know, found out your lazy practice? Your big mind found out your mistake. So if you find out the big mind which is working on your lazy practice-small-minded practice-then, at that point, at least your practice is good. So before you make some complaint, you should appreciate the big mind which appear in your mind. That was, you know, my answer.

It looks like [I said], "Whatever you do it is okay," but I don't mean that. Important point is, you know, only when big mind appear, the small mind, you know, will vanish-should vanish. You should not compare a big mind to a small mind. What I'm-what I mean is don't worry about your small mind when you have big mind.

How to continue your true practice based on the big mind is the point. That is the point. But I didn't-I did not mean even though you have lazy practice it is okay. That is big misunderstanding. It is not okay. But if I say so, it is not okay. You will be discouraged if it is not-if I say it is not okay, so [laughs] your practice of-will be the continuous, you know, practice of "not okay." One after another, "not okay practice" will continue [laughs]. You feel in that way, but if you carefully, you know, think about it, the continuous, you know, practice of wrong practice is big-minded practice-continuous activity of big mind. If you understand in that way, that is, you know, true understanding of your practice.

In your big mind, small mind has some position-some place. Good and bad also has some place, some seat. We cannot ignore the small mind of wrong practice completely. There is some seat. That is big mind. The small mind-even though the mind is good, small mind does not allow for-for wrong mind or small mind to sit together. Even though it is good, you know, good practice, but small-minded good practice is not real practice. Big-minded good practice is really, really good practice. And it gives a seat for the good practice and bad practice. And you don't feel so bad about your bad practice. And you will not be arrogant with your good practice.

You don't like mostly sermon or lecture. Why you don't like is-when you-when someone give lecture, you know, someone will convince [you of] something, you know-convince you [of] something-something special. But Buddhist lecture do not, you know, force anything on you. What we want is to have, you know, big mind-to acknowledge things as they are, to clear your mind from various one-sided wrong understanding of things. That is, you know, the purpose of lecture.

Sometime, you know, we slap you or are angry with you. Someone may talk, but why they-someone become angry is to correct-to cut off your delusion, or to empty your mind. If someone stick to some one-sided view, it is pretty difficult to get rid of it for humans and for the creature [s] too. So [laughs] there must be, you know-we try various way. The purpose of why, you know, we do so is because we want to get rid of the wrong concrete idea in your mind-that's all. Do you understand? That is what I wanted to tell you tonight specially.

After making many lectures, almost every evening, I found out that you didn't-some of you didn't understand what I meant. Most people like Zen because Zen has no idea of things or no idea of good or bad, you know. That is why people like it [laughs]. But we are pretty strict with our practice-maybe very strict. Even though, you know, we are very strict, we do not seriously cope [?] with the problem in our practice-actual practice, which-we have always smile, you know, even though the way we practice is hard. You know that that is the second principle. It is something to help us. Even though, you know, your teacher is angry, you do not take it so seriously [laughing]. That is trouble [speaking more quietly] [laughter]. You know that that is the second principle, not first principle. So when I say something, mostly about rules, I say it with smiling, so you don't take it so seriously [laughs].

Do you have some questions? There must be many questions. Hai.

Student A: Roshi, I thought that our eyes are focused [2-4 words unclear].

Suzuki-roshi: I-I am sorry I couldn't follow it.

Student A: Shotaku [?] said our eyes should focus.

Suzuki-roshi: Eyes? Close?

Student B: Shotaku [?] said that we focus.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, focus. Not [1 word unclear], you know, you are not gazing at anything. "Focus," we say, but it is-not to gaze but to, you know-focus some, maybe four feet ahead. At first it is difficult just to, you know, put focus on some area. Unless you see something, some beginner may put something four-three-four feet ahead. If there is nothing, they pick up, you know [laughs], edge of the tatami. That is easy, maybe, but that is not the best way. If you have something to watch it is easy, you know, to be concentrated, but you are-you should be-should be able to have [half?] focus, you know. Best for-maybe for you four feet or more feet ahead. Do you understand? Hai.

Student B: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student B: When you-can you say something about-about [1 word] or for us to [2-3 words] in our practice? How we can help each other?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Hmm. Best way to help others is, you know, to have good practice. If you have good practice, that is the best way to help others. That is very true. To help others is not different from to help themselves. But original, you know, this is again-again, you know, the first principle. There is no-you and others is not two. One. You see? That is the first principle. You should-even intellectually, this is the reality we should accept-ultimate reality.

You cannot-this kind of-the first principle is something which you cannot, you know, ignore. It is very true. But [laughs] it is true, but if I talk about for students who listen to me, looks like I am talking about something, you know, which you-something [that has] nothing to do with you. You may feel in that way.

Everything is one, you know. Even though I say so, it doesn't help you [laughs]. Even though I talk about Buddhist philosophy, it doesn't help. Your actual problem is always with you, and just philosophy-philosophical understanding of Buddhism doesn't help. But the philosophy-Buddhist philosophy is so true that you cannot deny it. And it is so, you know, universal and so common, so it is not so interesting either. Maybe when you discuss something, when you have argument with some other people, it may be interesting [?], you know, because your philosophy is graceful [?]-graceful [?] philosophy. So you will win anyway. So it maybe graceful [?] [laughing].

But it-it doesn't help you at all. So-but you cannot deny it, that's all. If that is so true, if that is the ultimate truth, why you have problem, you know? The actual questions start from that point. If we are Buddha-all Buddha-then why we hate each other? Why we have to kill animals? Real problem will start from that point.

So Buddhism, on the other hand, is the teaching of or about human-human nature. What is human being is Buddhist teaching. In comparison to, you know-when we have buddha-nature, why human being is like this is the first, you know, problem or question you will have. So to study Buddhism is to study ourselves. To study ourselves is to forget ourselves, like Dogen-zenji says. To study Buddhism is-or to study the first principle is to study the second principle. To study the second principle is to-to practice second principle until you forget all about it, until you don't feel you have, you know, rules.

How you help others is-there is no special way to help others. Let them know our human nature, and let them know how we have problem. And to-to encourage people by your own practice, that is the best way to help people. You know, learning will not help. Almsgiving will not help. But when you follow, when you understand what is human being and what is the way for human beings to follow Buddhist way is, you know, how to help people. We should be concentrated on that point, and we shouldn't try to help people by giving something or by some special way. Okay? [Laughs.] Some question?

Student C: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student C: What does the woodworking mean above your door? "The Mahabodhisattva Zendo"?[1]

Suzuki-roshi: Mahabodhisattva Zendo?

Student C: The calligraphy above the-above the door?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Did you see it? Oh. Mahabodhisattva Zendo. Bodhisattva is the, you know-bodhisattva-you know "bodhisattva."

Student C: I mean the-the calligraphy above your door-your apartment door-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: -the framed calligraphy there?

Suzuki-roshi: No, not [1-2 words]. Mahabodhisattva. I asked, you know, I send it to Japan-

Student C: No. I mean the-above your door.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh!

Student C: Above the door.

Suzuki-roshi: Above the door.[2] Oh, that is not "Mahabodhisattva Zendo." [Laughter.] That is-I am sorry-that is two characters, which is Jo un-"to glide cloud" or "to ride on cloud." Jo un, you know, is-it comes-it-Dogen-zenji-in Dogen-zenji's "Sansui-kyo"- "Sutra of Mountain and River"-he says the water has life of riding cloud [laughs].[3] Jo un no kudoku ari.[4]

People thinks water is running, you know, flowing in the stream, but "Water has also," you know, "the merit of driving cloud." Cloud itself, it may be water [laughs]. It is-that is again his-when he says so it means also the first principle.

So if you-if you understand what is first principle, that will be a good help, you know, to release your body in our life. Even though we are like a water, always running in-only in valley or stream, but we should not complain. Water has also the virtue of being cloud, and water is everywhere. But when we are in the stream, when they in the stream, water may feel, you know, "Why you are running such a, you know-go by our stream? I wish I could be like a cloud." That is, you know, our complaint. But actually, water can be a cloud. If we don't limit our power, our power is [1-2 words unclear; said in a whisper]. So, that will be the [1 word].

Do you know Lotus Sutra-how Lotus Sutra started, do you know? Lotus Sutra was recited by many people. We don't know exactly-no one knows exactly who compiled the sutra, but while people, Buddhists, were reciting the sutra, the sutra became more and more famous. And they get together and recited that sutra. At that time, temples were, you know, some place for the priests [to] practice their way-for the priests to study Buddhism. But for layman there is not much good place to have meeting. And people get together in cemetery, or in the temple yard they recited the sutra.

The group of the people [were] making pilgrimage through-all through Indian villages. Once in a while, I don't know how many times a year, they visited some certain place, but they were-people were waiting for the group who recite sutra to come. In that way Lotus Sutra became very popular. That is-and that sutra encouraged people ... [Sentence was probably finished. First tape (of two) turned over here.]

The more you know about human nature, the more you will be interested in the first principle. In this way you can, you know, encourage your practice. But if you confuse the first principle with the second principle, then-or if you rely on our teaching, you know, it doesn't help you so much. Hai.

Student D: Roshi, what does it mean in practice when [6-10 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Include what?

Student D: That sometimes we include both [2-4 words] in practice [2-3 words] between thought and [1-2 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Practice-zazen practice, first of all-zazen practice for us-what is the purpose of zazen practice? That is something I am talking about so many times. Perhaps, you know, why it is difficult for you to improve your understanding is you listen to our lecture day by day without learning-remembering what I said before, you know, without accepting clearly what I mean. So mind is always, you know-and moreover, I [laughs]-you don't have to remember what I say. It means [1-3 words]. But what I mean is, you know, if you, you know, when you listen to my lecture, and when you say "yes," that is the point. When you say yes, you accept it-"That's okay." And it means that your mind is open and your ears are open. Then, more and more, you will be able to understand the teaching. But you are much better than usual, you know, Japanese people. Japanese people, you know, when some teacher come and give lecture, he may say-they may say, "Oh, he is very good," you know, "he is very good lecturer. His sermon is so interesting." [Laughs.] So someone like me has very difficult time [laughs], because I cannot give any interesting lecture [laughs, laughter]. [Someone boos from audience. S.R. laughs.] Hai.

Student E: Roshi, in the last lecture you talked about communication, and how it creates a better image for those people. Could you talk some more about how we create a better image of ourselves?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm.

Student E: In part to let it go.

Suzuki-roshi: Communication is-start by understanding-your own understanding about people. Even though you want them to understand you, you know, it is-unless you understand people, it is almost impossible. Don't you think so? Only when you understand people, they may understand you. So even though you do not say anything, if you understand people there is some communication. Winks [Blinks?] of your eyes-it is [laughing, laughter]. It is very difficult for me to do this. You-you see? That is, maybe, perfect communication.

Student E: I was asking-what I wanted to ask is how can we communicate better with ourselves? Not with other people.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh.

Student E: Sometimes we have difficulty defeating problems in ourselves, and we know that [4-6].

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Oh, okay.

Student E: And-and the question is how we, you know, we cultivate these bad feelings-not to push them aside, but sort of cultivate them like, you know, [2-4 words] to other people-like we cultivate that relationship with people. But it seems that zazen is-I'm having the feeling that it helps somehow if I have bad feelings about myself [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That is because of your hasty, you know-or, you know, you are not patient enough, you know. Anyway, it is impossible to have perfect understanding, to feel good about yourself. Whether you feel good or bad, you know, that is the communication. That is you. We cannot improve, you know, improve you instantaneously. Even though you stay at Tassajara three-four years, you will-it is difficult to accept your practice here. And it should be so. And if you try to accept yourself so easily, then there is something wrong with-with your practice.

In such case, you should, you know, think about the first principle. It is you that-you-it is you who feels bad, but you yourself is not bad, and your practice is not bad. But because you have to-because of your desire you feel bad-that's all [?]. Desire means, you know, to expect something which you cannot [have]-that is desire, the terminology of desire.

You have that kind of desire. As long as we know completely about this kind of desire-about this kind of desire, you cannot be patient enough to accept-your mind cannot be wide enough to accept your bad practice. I feel as if, you know, as if you are always trying to feel good, you know [laughs], always. But I am not, you know. I rather feel better when I don't feel good [laughter, laughs]. If I feel good, I-I think, "Oh, I must be careful." [Laughs, laughter.] "I shouldn't feel so good. It is a kind of idea-some selfish," you know, "selfishness in me," you know. "Oh no." You feel more-much more stable when you are not so happy [laughs].

Student F: [1 word] in another lecture you said we should try and be happy.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Happy, you know, happy, but, you know, happiness is not, you know, that kind of happiness. My happiness is to suffer with people or to enjoy with people. Maybe to suffer more than people and to enjoy less than people is real happiness. Even though we- I feel in that way, you know, as we are very selfish, you know, actually, maybe if I hope-if I try-if I am trying to feel less happy, then maybe they are equal.

If I, you know, if I think I divided watermelon-just I cut watermelon just, you know, quarters, you know-it is very difficult to be fair. And even though I think I took-I didn't take best one, maybe I-I have best one in my hand [laughs]. That is human nature. So only when we try, you know, not to take best one, maybe you can-you will be pretty fair with people.

So to know our human nature is very important. Without knowing what is hunger, what is selfishness, it is almost impossible to help others. When you know what is hunger, you know, what is thirst, what is love, how difficult it is to love some people, then, you know, you can help people. That is how we study the first principle. That is approach to the first principle. Even though you can explain about the first principle, like the great philosophers [laughs], you cannot help people. You will be a scholar, but you cannot help people.

Student G [Niels Holm]: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Niels Holm: What do you mean when you say "help people"? What kind of help do you mean? Define the word.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That is, maybe, good question. If you know what is help, then you will know how you will help people. It is rather difficult to explain. But you may-you may understand, you know, how do you feel when you're helped by people. "Help people," I say, but strictly speaking to-or we say, "to save sentient beings, to save others." "To save" means to give perfect understanding of the problem of birth and death, or true meaning of our life, is, you know, how you help people. After knowing many things, you know, you will come to difficult things [?]. So unless you don't have good understanding or good experience of our human life, meaning of life, you cannot help people. I say "help people," but "save people." Why we say "save people" is they are suffering; they are amidst [?] of the problem. That is true. Some other question? Could you say? Hai.

Student H: Roshi, is the meaning of Buddhist practice to continually develop [?] our small mind? [4-6 words] the big mind continues in small mind.

Suzuki-roshi: You can say so. It is possible to say so when-because we are always involved in small mind. But big mind-without knowing what is big mind, it is suffering, you know. But if you know what is big mind, then even though your life is continuous practice of-continuous small-minded practice, and you feel in that way, but it will be-it will be quite different from usual suffering you may have. But right now, when-right now you understood what I am saying, you know. Maybe for the first time I-I used this kind of statement, you know, "continuous [laughs] practice-continuous small-minded practice." So it looks like in our practice there is no true joy or something like that. But if you know what is big mind-yesterday was it yesterday or Sunday?[5]-yeah-when you hear the bird, you know, you-you will find the mountain calmer than before. That kind of feeling. Continuous hearing of the bird is big mind-is our practice. If you understand what I mean, background is calmness of the deep, deep mountain. And you hear the bird, you know, and for the deep remoted mountain, bird is not-bird cannot disturb the mountain. But we hear the bird. Before, you feel as if bird is disturbing the calmness of the mountain. That is usual feeling we have. If small problem happen to your life, you will be very much, you know, discouraged or disturbed, but if you know the vastness of the big mind or buddha-mind, you know, that kind of problem is not problem. But we see the problem. There is big difference. Feeling your skin [?] accept the problem. Do you understand?

So anyway, you must have some feeling about-if possible you must have even a branch of the big mind. And on the-on the other hand you should be faithful to things happens in your life. Then you will not disturbed by the problem you have, and you will be encouraged-your practice will be encouraged-practice to appreciate the big mind will be encouraged. Okay?

Some questions? [2-3 words] is too late. [Laughter, laughs.] No question? Hai.

Student I: Roshi, cutting apples in the kitchen is [4-6 words] or particularly zazen is that sometimes it's hard to [1-2 words] to acknowledge that a [2-4 words] isn't really bad, but they're really [1 word] a lot. Or-or-I can't understand what-what-what the practice means. I [3-4 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? [Laughs.] Pleasure is-pleasure is [1-2 words]- Will you please say it again?

Student I: If I'm cutting apples in the kitchen and eating-if I eat them, is-is that bad dharma? I mean, I think I ate [3-6 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, you did. [1 words] bad. [Laughs.] Again, you know, when you realize it-as-as Buddha said, "I found out the carpenter who is making the house." [Laughs.] Do you understand what does it mean? I will find out the carpenter who is making the house-who found out-the carpenter who is making the house-who found out someone picking up, you know, small piece of apple-who found out someone eating apples. [Laughs.] Buddha found out a carpenter who is building your house. Did you understand?

Student I: [She may have responded, but it was not audible.]

Suzuki-roshi: To feel in that way is good, but I cannot say to-to eat, you know, apples while you are cutting is good, but I agree with you. But, you know, on the other hand, you should know that who found out. Big mind found out. Buddha found out. [Laughs.] That-oh!-you are [4-6 words as S.R. thumps on or with microphone]. Buddha is still alive in [laughs]-in your mind. He will help you. He will always help you.

So that is-I cannot say bad practice, but I am not-again, you know, I am not encouraging you to eat apples in the kitchen. This is the point, you know-some-something I want you to be very careful when you listen to my lecture. I may say "that is good," you know-that you have, you know, big mind always to see your self, basically, but sometime I-I just say, "That is good; that is not bad practice," I may say briefly instead of explaining, you know, carefully in that way. So you may think it is okay for us to eat, you know, in the kitchen while we are cooking, as many people do. It is okay, you know. "Before he said it is not okay, but this time he said okay." [Laughs.] So I want you to be very careful because it-it takes time if I explain, you know, things in such way. Hai.

Student I: [4-6 words] about if the Buddha knows [4-6 words] if the Buddha knew that one of the people did something wrong, but is it really something wrong? Is it-I mean, is it a true confession of something being wrong, or is it just something imposed by Buddha where we have [1-2 words] a rule. If the rule was you should eat in the kitchen while we're cooking, then we would feel bad if we didn't eat while we were cooking. [Laughter.] And is the-Suzuki-roshi: [Talks over student, who continues asking question.] That is just, you know, argument [laughs, laughter]. It doesn't make sense.

Student I: What doesn't make sense?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? No-there could be any rules like that, you know. [Laughs.] You can create, for one or two days you can, you know, [1-2 words]. "If you work in kitchen you should eat." It will-that will last one hour or two hours. But that is not-cannot be rule, you know.

Student I: The reason I'm asking and what I don't understand to some extent is in this procession of rules [8-10 words] we have this idea of rules. If we didn't have an idea of rules-a rule about not eating-Suzuki-roshi: [Speaks over student.] You know, when you say so, that is already, you know, idea of absolute. In realm of absolute there is no rules. There could-not be any rules. You see? There is confusion: You confuse absolute and second [principle?]-second. Do you understand?

Student I: No.

Suzuki-roshi: No [as if he is echoing student].

Student I: I can understand why there is a rule about food, but-

Suzuki-roshi: You see-

Student I: -I don't understand how you separate-

Suzuki-roshi: No.

Student I: -[4-6 words].

Suzuki-roshi: The-when we talk about things-as-it is, you know, like a scientist, that is the rule which belongs to-it is observation of the first principle. And when we accept our human nature and how to apply, how to have more organized life as a human being, you know, that rules is for-just for human being, not for trees or water or, you know, some chemical happening, but just for human being, which is so selfish. That is secondary rule-the rules for human being. So you shouldn't co-[partial word: compare?]-you shouldn't like-you shouldn't talk like you are like a cat or dog. You are worse than cat or dog. [Laughter.] Do you understand? [Laughs.] No.

Student I: [2-3 sentences.]

Suzuki-roshi: For an instance, in the city, you know?

Student I: You know, some place other than here, yes. [6-10 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, that kind of life will not last. That is just bubbles [laughs]-you know, tentative bubble which cannot last. When our rules, our way of life is not based on our human nature, it doesn't last, you know. As long as you are young it is maybe okay, but everyone is growing, you know, and world is changing day by day, and we cannot exist unless we know our human nature. I am not, you know-I have no special, you know, superimposed idea. That is what I am talking [about?], you know. I am not forcing you-on you anything. Just to understand what is human being, what is things-as-it-is. You see? That is the point of my talk. If we do not have so many students at Tassajara, we don't have to rules-have to have rules like this. As we must, you know, practice our way with many people here, so we must have some rules. Okay?

Rules is not something which we create, which someone-some special person create for sake of Buddhism or for sake of Zen or for sake of the leader to have, but something which we need. That is rule. So we can-we can change if it is not right, so we are improving our rules. Maybe we are spending too much time, you know, in discussion about our rules, you know. I feel in that way. But still, I appreciate your effort to establish some rules for us. You try to be very fair to everyone. So, on the other hand, our rules become more and more strict, you know, because we spent so much time in establishing your rules. After establishing some rules, you cannot [laughs]-cannot, you know, change it so soon. That is the nature of, you know, nature of precepts. Buddha didn't establish precepts. Disciples established precepts, in some [3-4 words] monastery [unclear]. Buddha said you shouldn't run away from the temple [1 word] when you are listening lecture. That is one precept. [Laughs, laughter.] For very good students there is no rule. Rule is necessary, but students make so many rules. That is, you know, projected, you know, rules, projected human nature. We need it, you know, not buddhas, or not universe, or not [1 word]. Whether this earth vanish from the universe, it is not big problem [laughs]. It is okay for the universe. If we want to protect this earth, maybe we should study more about how flying [?] planes [?] are going [laughs]. Then, you know, maybe our planet is just one of them. That kind of study is, you know, our study.

Before, I don't know why, you-you do not like rules, you know. There must be some good reason why you don't like it. But here I don't think so, because it is you who are creating rules, not me. Buddhist rules is not like that.

So that is why you have to have good understanding of the first principle compared-comparing to the second principle or human principle-human rules. Then-then, you know, you will find out why you have to have this kind of practice-the meaning of practice. Okay? Okay. Five more minutes. Hai.

Student J: [3-4 sentences.] Or tentatively, what can we rely on in ourselves-anything?

Suzuki-roshi: You-you should rely on your spirit of practice, you know. Before you rules-break rules, why don't you follow the rules? That is the point. After breaking rules, it is too late to discuss about that. It belongs to the past. So it can't be helped. Why don't you try not [to] break rules again? That is the point, you know. So to reflect upon what you have done is not so good way-not so good idea. I-even to think about what you are doing right now is not so good too. [Sentence probably finished. Tape changed to second tape.]

... Mm-hmm.

Student K: You say that creating some kind of rule or schedule for yourself or some [4-6 words] will not work. I'm asking you essentially how-how do you find out [3-4 words] adopt rules that we live with at Tassajara, or do we rely more on our good feeling about things?

Suzuki-roshi: You are still relying on rules, you know. When I came to San Francisco I had no rules for you to observe. I-I sit and practice zazen and recite sutra when I wanted to, you know. People came. That's all. One after another they come, and [laughs] as you are so many-we have so many people now, and, you know, I must have rules. That's all. So it is too soon to worry about it [laughs]. Buddha will take care of everything. And if Buddhist rule is good, it will help, you know. This is why I became angry, you know [laughs], you know, to see someone who talk about Japanese way or Buddhist way or, you know- Actually, if you don't want Buddhist way, you know, why don't you have some other rules? You know, I think Buddhist way is pretty good, because they- from-if-after Buddha's time, Buddha-idea of Buddha's precepts is way of life, and the rules belongs to human being, not Buddha. Buddha has the first principle, but human being has second principle for themselves. So this kind of understanding is, you know, very suitable idea of rules.

So I want you to be very sincere, you know, with yourself, about your future too. You shouldn't depend on anything. Only thing you depend on is your zazen practice. Without saying anything, if you practice every day, then you will have students, you will have friends. That you may need some rules. "What time do you start zazen?" or something like that. That is enough. You don't have to worry about so many rules which we need at Tassajara. Okay?

So each-I want each student to practice our zazen wherever you are. That is-will be the best help for the people. And some more things happens, then case by case you should think about it, that's all. You will find out how to help-help people, especially when you have experience of practice at Tassajara. It will be a great, great help for you when you have your self. You shouldn't depend on Tassajara too much. All the, you know, confusion comes from that point, because you depend on Tassajara too much. Buddha said, you know, without depending on yourself, you know, how is it possible to depend [on] something else-or only thing you can depend on is you yourself. That is very true. Only when you can depend on yourself you will be very kind. Something flowing over, you know, from you will help people, without trying to help people. If you depend on something special, then nothing will come out from you. If people ask question, "Read [3-4 words]," and if someone ask you what to do, "Oh, we have rules here, so why don't you read." In that way you cannot-you will not have any friends [laughter]. To me, you are trying to do so [laughs], you know, always trying to do so whenever you ask me question. I feel that you may be trying to establish something like Tassajara [laughs]. I have no idea of such, you know, estab- [partial word]-I have no such idea for you to establish anything like this. If Tassajara practice is good enough to be a good example of other group, maybe they may follow us, but we should not have any idea of to be a good example of others. Anyway we should make our best, that's all, you know. It cannot be more than that. If it is more than that, Tassajara is involved in wrong practice. It is not Buddhist practice.

[Sighs.] Tomorrow? What time? [Laughs.] [1 word] person? Not one person [?], right?

Thank you very much.

-----
Source: City Center transcript by Barry Eisenberg. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (9/26/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] In the early years of San Francisco Zen Center, the zendo itself was informally known as the "Mahabodhisattva Zendo."

[2] The framed calligraphy of two Japanese characters hanging over the door to Suzuki-roshi's former rooms on the second floor of City Center, San Francisco.

[3] "When human beings look at water, the only way we see it is as flowing ceaselessly. The flowing takes many forms ... ." Water "rises up to form clouds, and it comes down to form pools" (Eihei Dogen, "Sansui-kyo," Shobogenzo; Nishijima and Cross, trans., Book 1, p. 174).

[4] Jo (ride); un (cloud); no (as-indicating that jo un and kudoku are the same); kudoku (merit); ari (there is). This is not an exact quote from the Shobogenzo; Suzuki-roshi may be interpreting or simplifying the phrase.

[5] It was Sunday: SR-71-08-15.

12 - Stones

Saturday, August 21, 1971

Stones
San Francisco

Excuse me. [Laughs.] I feel rather stiff. Maybe I worked too hard.

Since we have Tassajara and the city zendo, we are-our practice is rather concentrated on city practice or Tassajara practice. But the most important point is to know what is Zen practice, which is not only city practice, but also Tassajara practice, and city zendo practice. Wherever you are, we have Zen way of practice. No matter where you are, you must have proper understanding of our practice.

In Shobogenzo "Genjo-koan," Dogen-zenji says, referring to this point:

"When all things are Buddhism, there are birth and death-there are defilement, practice, birth and death, buddhas, and sentient beings. When all things has no self, there is no delusion, no buddha, no sentient beings, no birth, no death. Buddhism originally is beyond the all positive or neg- [partial word]-positivity or negativity, so there are birth and death, defilement and enlightenment, and sentient beings and buddha."

There, you know, our-this is our fundamental practice. It is better now, I think, for us to follow more original way of Zen practice, which is go beyond Tassajara practice, or city zendo practice, or practice in-in city life. Wherever you are, this is the fundamental way of practice for us or else we will be too much, you know, involved in city practice or monastic practice and we will lose the point of practice, I am afraid.

"When all things are Buddhism-all things are Buddhism, there are defilement, practice-defilement, practice, birth and death, buddhas and sentient beings." The point is they are-they are. All things are Buddhism. Whatever you do, that is Buddhism. But there is some danger in your understanding of this kind of words-statement. "Whatever you do, that is Buddhism." You know, whatever you do in Tassajara, or in city zendo, or in city life, that is Buddhism. It looks like-it sound like this: "Whatever we do, it doesn't matter. Anyway [laughs], that is a practice of Buddhism." If it is so, there is-it is not necessary for you to study Buddhism, whatever-if whatever you do, that is Buddhism.

But actually, what Dogen-zenji meant is not-is not like that. So there-there is, maybe, in-in-when you understand this statement, "Whatever you do, that is," you know, "Buddhism." There may be two ways of understanding it. One is, whatever you do [laughs], you know, if you understand-you take this statement literally, from your non-Buddhist-non-Buddhistic understanding. That is one, you know.

There is-another is real Buddhist understanding of this statement. Like, you know, in Lotus Sutra we say "shoho-jisso." Shoho means things we see; jisso is truth, true way it exist-way they exist-real way things exist. So everything exist in the way they exist.

So usually when we understand, "Whatever you do, that is Buddhism," means even though you do not behave [laughs], even though you do not, you know, live the way you should live, it is Buddhism. You know, there is big difference [laughs].

"Way things exist." Here is, maybe, the problem of "to be" and "should be." "To be" and "should be." You know, recently people may not-do not like the words "should be" [laughs]-"should be"-and you like "to be," maybe. "Should be" is-looks some rules, and "to be" is, you know, freedom: Whatever you do, that is good-that is "to be."

But-but it is-it will be the opposite. "Should be" is "to be" [laughs], and "should be" is "to be." You know, when you behave according to the circumstances, appropriately, then that is "should be" and that is "to be." "To be" and "should be" is same. But when your selfish, you know, idea arise and rejects "should be," reject the way you exist, then that is-that is not way "to be." You are involved in delusion-delusion of self.

And in its strict sense, you cannot survive in that way. You think you can, but actually you cannot. Or you-you want to be in that-you want to survive in that way, but actually it is not possible. If you want to go to Los Angeles, you should take Freeway 101 [laughs]. You cannot go that way, even though you-you want to go opposite way. "Many people are going that way, take 101, so I will go to the opposite way." Eventually you will go to-reach to Los Angeles [laughs, laughter]. But that is a kind of-the way you choose.

So to think it is-about-about it-about a kind of freedom is good, but actually that is not possible. So knowing that that is not possible, to think about it is another matter, you know. But if you sit seriously-try to do whatever you want to do, that is delusion. You-it is-it means that you are completely involved in delusion. It is not actual. It is not possible to survive in that way. So "should be" and "to be" is-is not different.

So real freedom is in "should be" and in-in its true sense "to be." That "should be" is for-the way for beginners, and that "to be" which is one with "should be" is the advanced student. So first stage should [laughs]-should be "should be." [Laughs, laughter.] And "should be," "should be," "should be" [laughs]-an endless, you know, continuous practice of

"should be" [laughs]. You have no, you know, chance to get out of "should be" [laughs]. That is okay, you know. Pretty soon "should be" will be "to be." "Should be" or "to be"-you don't care. "Should be" is okay. "To be" is okay, for you. That is the goal of practice, you know.

So Dogen-zenji says, "Buddhism originally is beyond all positivity and negativity." Buddhism originally is beyond the all "to be" and-or "should be," you know. Real way is not only-only "to be," but also "should be." Or not only "should be," but also "to be." That is real way. That is the stage you will acquire after following teaching.

Ahh. This is rather discouraging [laughs]. Maybe if I say so from the beginning, you will not, you know-you may say, "Oh, I wish I-I wish I didn't start practice Buddhism. [Laughs.] It is too difficult." You may say, but it is-Buddhism is not any special teaching. Actually, Buddhism is our human way.

Here we-we have many things to think about. First of all, we should know how, you know-we should know that this world for human being-for human being, not for birds or cat, you know, but for human being-this world is world of suffering [laughs]. Originally, you know-not originally, but-for human being, as long as we are, you know, human nature, which is very selfish, which care for something which you, you know, you cannot acquire or you cannot expect. That is human nature, you know. We care for something which we cannot reach, you know. Or because you cannot reach you want to-you want it. Because, you know, we do not stay young forever, we want to be, you know, young always [laughs]. Something which we cannot expect is something we like. That is our human nature. So human life is, at the, you know, same time, a life of suffering. That is very true.

We should know many things about our human being. When you know about human nature deep enough, then you will start, you know, Buddhism-you will start to practice Buddhism. It is like operation, you know. When the pain is, you know, strong enough to accept operation, you will go to the doctor [laughs]. But it is almost impossible to, you know, to have your-to have operation when you have no pain. Because you have a great pain, because you know human nature well enough, you start Buddhism like you go to the doctor to have operation. This is nature of Buddhism. That is why you practice zazen.

At first when you sit, many things will come up, you know, many ideas-many wrong ideas and many things you did before. We don't do so much good things in comparison to bad things [laughs]. Most of the things we do is bad [laughs] or things you feel regretful. Something you-when you do, you feel very good, but after you did it, how do you feel? [Laughs.] "Oh. I thought it was very good, but it was not so good." [Laughs.] That is something, you know-feeling you have. And that kind of feeling come up, you know, constantly when your mind is very calm, like a bubble, you know, comes up-comes up from the bottom of the water. When the water is, you know, rough-not smooth enough, then no bubbles comes out. Even though it comes out, you don't notice it. You have-as soon as your mind become calm, you may realize how much bubbles you have in your bottom of your heart. The real practice, you know, start from that kind of practice.

You may say Zen practice should be calm-to have calmness of your mind is real practice. "I have been practicing zazen for so many years-two years, three years, or more than that. Still I don't have calmness [laughs] of your mind at all. What shall I do?" That will be your question.

In zazen-in zazen practice, we say if something, you know, arise in your mind, let it arise, let it come. Then it-they will not stay so long, so let it go away. In zazen that works pretty well. If you let it come, and if you do not entertain them, they will go away. But in actual life, that-it is not so easy, you know. You may suffer. Then what will you do? When you suffer, what-what you will do? The suffering is very strong. What will you do? Here is, you know, something you should think about.

The one point is, you know, your practice is in the first, you know, stage, and you have next stage and the third stage. In the next stage, you will, you know, like in-like when you have good zazen practice, nothing arise in your mind. Your mind will be, even for a while, in complete calmness, where there is no image or no feeling. Your mind is complete calmness. That is the next stage you will have in your zazen practice. And the third stage will be the stage you come back to the stage-something like the first stage where there is many problems, where there is many weeds, and where there is many flowers. But way you see-see the flowers, the way you weed the weed, is different, but nearly the same stage. Looks like same stage, but big difference.

So you don't have to solve that problem. The point is you should continue that practice of difficulty. That is the point. So you should know that is, you know, only the first stage of your practice. So you-you cannot solve the problem at-only at the first stage. If you struggle at the first stage, you will lose your practice. That is why we say, you know, "Great patience is the best of virtues. [Laughs.] To continue it is most important practice. Without struggling with it, just continue it. Then you will have chance to-to have the second stage or the third stage." It means that. It means-I-I forget where I, you know, found out that statement.

Someone who-who-who fell on the earth-on the earth, maybe by stumbling [on a] stone or something, you know-fell on the earth will stand up [laughs] by the earth-same-by the same earth. Because of the earth you stumble, you fell, you know. Earth is the problem. Because of the problem, you hurt, you know, you hit against the earth. But because [laughing] of the earth, you can support yourself again, and you can stand up.

So you complain-you have complained because you think because of the earth you fell [laughs], but without earth you will not fell. And at the same time, you cannot stand up. So because you have problem, you know, you feel as if because of the problem, you, you know, you fell. A fell or stand up is, you know, a help, you know-great help which was given to you by earth.

So problem itself is your mother, you know. Because of the mother of earth, you can continue your practice. You are practicing, you know, so zendo of the earth-great earth, which is the problems. Problems are actually your zendo. That is very true.

So what is delusion, what is enlightenment? When you, you know, deluded of truth, that is delusion. When you are deluded of-of earth, that is delusion. When you enlightened of the earth, that is enlightenment. When you stand up by the earth, that is enlightenment. When you fell, you know, because of the earth-you feel in that way-that is delusion. So you have chance to attain a great enlightenment when you have problem.

Usually you talk about your surrounding. You talk about Tassajara practice and city practice. That is, I think, very good. [Laughs.] But that is not the point of practice. The point of practice is-the problem you have here or city or Tassajara is the earth. So if Tassajara is monastery, city zendo is monastery, and city is also monastery in its wide sense.

Our way is not to get rid of all the stones from the earth which could be a stumbling [laughs] stone for you. It is good to have many stones on the earth which could be, you know, stumbling stone. It is good. And when you stand up, if you have a high, big stone, it-it may be easier to stand up. But more people will [laughs]-will hit against it. But it is very good for your practice to have big stones everywhere. This is, for an instance, a big stone. If you understand it, that is, you know, enlightenment. If you don't understand it, it is big slap-painful slap. This is a big stone. So if there is not much stone for you to help your practice, we have to bring many stones from Tassajara to city zendo [laughs, laughter]. You are not so interested in this kind of stuff, you know. So if you understand our life, our problem in this way, then will you have-you will get through the first stage.

I don't think I have time to explain the next stage. But you may feel, you know, if you understood our problems of our life in this way, then that is, you know, end of the whole picture, you know. But it is just a first series of the movie. Why it is so is, you know, something we should think about.

The-in the first stage, you are-very interesting stage, so you may want to stay the first stage [laughs] a little bit longer. That is-but again, that is too selfish, you know [laughs]. Buddhism is very strict, you know, very strict. You may enjoy the first stage very much, actually. In-in the city, in zendo, you know, when you come to zendo, you have, you know, a good Zen practice. When you go to city, you will enjoy city life, you know, with a kind of-what do you?-leisurely mind, you know. You-you have some space or some room to accept the difficulty-difficulties of the city life. Because of the wisdom of understanding of our human nature, you know, we can-we have time, or we have room for accepting the problems, you know. We are ready to accept problems. Like you sit zazen, you know, in zazen, many, many things come: "Okay. [Laughs.] I have enough room here or here or here for you to come. Please come." [Laughs, laughter.] But, you know, it is interesting to-to see how they go away. "Oh, nothing to see, nothing to eat," so they may go out [laughs]. It-it is very interesting.

But, you know, Zen is not something to play, you know, to play with-to play game with-with our prac- [partial word]-we shouldn't play game with it. If you practice zazen because you enjoy your practice, that is not Buddha's practice. He is very strict. Buddha's mercy is so deep, so clear, and so wide. When we selfish human being always want something good to eat, something good to hear, something good to see. So if someone give you something to hear, or something to eat, most human being will stay. Knowing this fact, Buddha became-become more and more strict with us [laughs]. Yeah, it's-it's something, you know, which you must think about. And when you, you know, study or when you want to learn religion, you know, you must learn something more than this. Just to solve our everyday problem is not purpose of studying Buddhism. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

Yesterday I saw Soen Nakagawa-roshi.[1] And he was going to-I-I thought he is going back to Japan, but he was going to-what-the place-Elsahem?-what do you-how you pronounce, you know, when-where Christ was born? Hmm? [Answers from students: "Bethlehem."] Yeah. He was going to that place. Why is he going to there [laughs]? I think that is buddha-mind, you know, something more than this, something more than to enjoy his enlightenment. He is going somewhere else again. He looks like very much interested in helping people. Maybe so. But that is not, you know-helping people-without helping people he may not feel so good, so that is why he is going. But his going is not just to satisfy his personal feeling. He is mo- [partial word]-

You know, at the end of the sesshin [laughs] we bow maybe more than thirty times, calling many buddhas' name. Among the buddhas, they, you know, they call some special names: Nam- [partial word]-Sunshine-Sunshine Buddha, or Moonlight Buddha, or Dead Sea Buddha [laughs]. I don't know-because he-he has his disciple who started zendo at Dead Sea. That is why he bowed-he called the name of Dead Sea Buddha. And Good Practice Buddha. Many buddhas appeared. And [we] bowed and bowed and bowed [laughs]. That is something, you know, which is beyond our understanding. And he also bow-when he bow to all those buddha, the buddha he bowed to is something beyond his own understanding. Again and again he did it.

And he gave us, you know, macha[2] he made himself, you know, and gave us macha. What he was doing, I don't know, and he doesn't know, maybe [laughs]. Anyway, he did it, and he offered. And he-he didn't-he looks very happy, but that happiness is very different from the happiness we usual people have.

Our practice should go, you know, that level, where there is no human problem, or no buddha problem, where there is nothing. And to have tea, and to have cake, and to make a trip from one place the another-that was his, you know, practice. And he has no idea of helping people. What he is doing, he is helping, but he himself has no idea of helping people. So to solve [?] our human problem is not all the-doesn't cover all our practice-Buddhist practice. Hmm.

We don't know how long it takes for us to make, you know, buddha trip. [Laughs.] We have many trips: work trips, you know, various trips-space trips [laughs]-various trip we must have. Buddha trip is very, you know, very long trip. That is Buddhism.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript by Barry Eisenberg and B. Fikes. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (11/15/00).

[1] Soen Nakagawa-roshi (1908-1983): Rinzai master. Dharma successor of Yamamoto Gempo and abbot of Ryutaku-ji Monastery near Mishima. The words "Yesterday I saw Soen Nakagawa" are from a note written on the back of the original tape's case. The passage was not recorded on tape.

[2] Powdered green tea.

1971 oktober (1)

1 - Suzuki-Roshi Talking to His Disciples About His Illness

Saturday, October 09, 1971

Suzuki-Roshi Talking to His Disciples About His Illness

In His Room, City Center, San Francisco

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student: Francis sent this-

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student: Francis-

Suzuki-roshi: Francis. Yeah.

Student: -sent this to you and a card.

Suzuki-roshi: Lazy master. [Laughter.] I am sorry.

[Scattered exchange among Suzuki-roshi, students, and Okusan-approximately 30 seconds.]

Suzuki-roshi: My arm hurts, you know. Just a moment. [Okusan speaks in Japanese.] Don't be so serious, you know. [Okusan speaks in Japanese.]

My doctor Makura [?]-[Okusan speaks in Japanese.] Hmm? Oh.

Student: He's coming.

Suzuki-roshi: Hai. Good morning.

Okusan: Dozo ....

Suzuki-roshi: I am so sorry to be so lazy monk [laughs], but-because my doctor, Makura, you know, thought I was hepatitis, but for hepatitis it took me, my symptom didn't change in so long time, so he thought it may not be hepatitis, maybe cancer.

So they started to check me, when, what day was it, two, three days ago, and I hospitalized, Mount Zion again, Mount Zion hospital again, and they took basalt [?] pictures of my liver and chest and took some blood from here and every doctor discussed about my illness, and the next day they had vacation, and the day before yesterday Makura came and told me you are cancer, you know. So you can eat whatever you like, you can drink whatever you want to. So he told me exactly what is happening here. So I am telling you. That was what has happened to me the day before yesterday, and yesterday I came back here.

So it was a big, it is big relief to me, that I can eat whatever I like. Before, so that, you know, I can live longer, I have to eat. And there are many-I had a list of things which I cannot eat. But now I have no restriction. So it is very-I myself, selfishly feel good, but on the other hand I am very sorry for you, you know. But I think Buddha will take care of everything, so I shouldn't worry too much.

How long I live I don't know. No one knows actually. I asked him, two years? At most [laughs]-he said-what he said. What he said. I am not so sure about it. So I want you to be prepared for it, you know. If I live longer, it is better, of course, for me and for you, I think. But if I-I think I can live one more year for sure, I feel in that way. I don't feel so discouraged or so weak.

So, maybe, I want you allow me to be a lazy monk, that's all what I want you-that's all, you know. I shall be very bad example, but [laughing] instead, you should be a good example. Okay? That's all what I want you to do or to know, to be prepared.

Most of things you can decide between you, you know, discussing. If necessary, I can join your discussion. Physically, I get tired quite easily.

Thank you very much for coming.

And do you think [1 word] tape is okay?

Yvonne: I think so. We can take it out and try it.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Yvonne: Let's try it, okay?

[Recording stopped. Gap in tape. Recording resumed.]

Suzuki-roshi: ... and drink here, you know. Cancer is not infectious.

[Laughs.]

Yvonne: We can eat off your plate now. [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. You take some. [Laughter.]

Yvonne: Better be careful.

Suzuki-roshi: It's quite okay. I do not live so long, you know that.

[Laughs.]

[A brief exchange in Japanese with male visitor.]

Claude, I want you to stay here, even though I have no more. Okay? Please. [Laughs.] Thank you. [Two claps.] [Laughs.] Okay.

I have been doing-I wanted to do, so you shouldn't feel to do, you know, exactly what I did, you know. So you may be free, to do, to develop our way, you know, exactly people want you to do. That is Bodhisattva idea. If they want you to be beggar, you should beg [laughs]. That is the spirit I mean. I want you to-that is the main point. If you do not lose that point, the bodhisattvas, all the bodhisattvas will be with you.

[Question in Japanese from male visitor. Suzuki-roshi answers in English.]

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe, yeah. I didn't ask exactly where it is. Maybe so, you know, not stomach, and gall bladder is no more, so liver, or tumors [1 word unclear] another one here. So. Maybe liver.

Do you have some question, about immediate something, you know, you want to know [1 word unclear] now? [Laughs.]

Silas: Would you like a bed that goes up and down? [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: It may be too-but-

Students: [Question/comment.]

Suzuki-roshi: If you come [laughter-Suzuki-roshi is apparently pantomiming something], if you go out- It's very good, you know.

Yvonne: Instead of learning to drive a car, you learn to drive your bed.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh huh. But I was very lucky you know, to live this much, until I have good confidence in you. Okay. Hai. [Laughs.] Just in time [referring to a drink brought to him?]. Thank you.

Mel: Can we visit you?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm?

[Gap in tape.]

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

[Question from male visitor in Japanese. Suzuki-roshi replied in Japanese.]

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

-----

Source: City Center transcript by Barry Eisenberg. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (2/9/01).