

INHOUD

Suzuki Roshi Transcripts

1962 (1)

- 1962 januari (1)
  - 1 - Religious Activity

1963 (7)

- 1963 januari (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #14, #15

- 1963 maart (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #19

- 1963 april (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #20

- 1963 juli (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #25

- 1963 september (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #30

- 1963 november (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #36

- 1963 december (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #40

1964 (8)

- 1964 februari (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #46

- 1964 maart (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #49

- 1964 april (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #52

- 1964 mei (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #53

- 1964 juni (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #51

- 1964 augustus (1)
  - 1 - The Traditional Way

- 1964 november (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #73

- 1964 december (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #75

1965 (7)

- 1965 februari (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #82

- 1965 april (1)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #84

- 1965 juli (4)
  - 1 - Blue Cliff Record #86
  - 2 - Sesshin Lecture
  - 3 - Sesshin Lecture
  - 4 - Sesshin Lecture

- 1965 augustus (1)
  - 1 - One-Day Sesshin Lecture

1966 (17)

- 1966 januari (1)
  - 1 - Shusogi: Sections 11-17

- 1966 februari (1)
  - 1 - KPFA Radio Interview

- 1966 maart (3)
  - 1 - Genjo Koan, Paragraphs 1-3
  - 2 - Shusogi, Section 1
  - 3 - The Way-Seeking Mind

- 1966 mei (2)
  - 1 - Genjo Koan, Paragraphs 1-2
  - 2 - Genjo Koan, Paragraphs 5-13

- 1966 juni (6)
  - 1 - Evening Lecture
  - 2 - Afternoon Lecture
  - 3 - Genjo Koan: Paragraphs 1-11
  - 4 - Genjo Koan: Paragraphs 7-9
  - 5 - Precepts
  - 6 - Genjo Koan: Paragraphs 11-13

- 1966 augustus (4)
  - 1 - Genjo Koan
  - 2 - (kort)
  - 3 - Intellectual Understanding
  - 4 - Sesshin Lecture

1967 (21)

- 1967 april (2)
  - 1 - Sesshin Lecture A
  - 2 - Sesshin Lecture B

- 1967 juni (2)
  - 1 - Sesshin Lecture: Three Treasures
  - 2 - Sunday Lecture

- 1967 augustus (5)
  - 1 - The mind itself is Buddha
  - 2 - Genjo Koan 15-18
  - 3 - Genjo Koan 6 and 9-11
  - 4 - Genjo Koan 12-14
  - 5 - Sesshin Lecture

- 1967 september (2)
  - 1 - The Threefold Body of Buddha
  - 2 - Things-As-It-Is

- 1967 december (10)
  - 1 - Afternoon Sesshin Lecture
  - 2 - Evening Sesshin Lecture
  - 3 - Afternoon Sesshin Lecture
  - 4 - Evening Sesshin Lecture
  - 5 - Sesshin Lecture No. 5
  - 6 - Afternoon Sesshin Lecture
  - 7 - Evening Sesshin Lecture
  - 8 - Afternoon Sesshin Lecture
  - 9 - Evening Sesshin Lecture
  - 10 - First Shosan Ceremony at Tassajara

1968 (25)

- 1968 januari (2)
  - 1 - Ten Buddhas
  - 2 - Samantabhadra

- 1968 april (2)
  - 1 - (sick)
  - 2 - (sick)

- 1968 juni (1)
1 - (sound problem)
- 1968 juli (2)
1 - Buddhist Schools
2 - Non-Sectarianism
- 1968 augustus (1)
1 - The Bodhisattva's Ten Powers
- 1968 oktober (14)
1 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #8
2 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #14
3 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #7
4 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #13
5 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #15
6 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #10
7 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #3
8 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #4
9 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #5
10 - Tenryu's One Finger
11 - The True Dragon
12 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #1
13 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #1
14 - Fourth Lecture of Training Session at Tassajara
- 1968 november (1)
1 - Shosan Ceremony
- 1968 december (2)
1 - True Happiness and Renewal of Practice at Year's End
2 - The End of the Year
- 1969 (54)
- 1969 maart (5)
1 - Blue Cliff Record #3
2 - Nansen's "Everyday Mind Is Dao"
3 - Find Out for Yourself
4 - Selflessness
5 - Ordinary and Holy
- 1969 april (4)
1 - The Only Desire that is Complete is Buddha's Desire
2 - Afternoon Sesshin Lecture
3 - Why We Practice
4 - Bodhisattva's Vow
- 1969 mei (1)
1 - Suzuki-Roshi's 65th Birthday
- 1969 juni (3)
1 - Find Yourself Mentally and Physically
2 - Everyday Zazen
3 - Study with Mind and Body
- 1969 juli (10)
1 - The Meaning of Practice
2 - Rinzai and Soto
3 - Emptiness is Form
4 - Question and Answer Session
5 - Form and Emptiness II
6 - Eulogy for Trudy Dixon
7 - Shikantaza
8 - Trip to the Moon
9 - Blue Cliff Record #43
10 - Question and Answer
- 1969 augustus (8)
1 - Truth and Liberation
2 - Change and Suffering
- 3 - Selflessness
4 - August Sesshin Lecture
5 - August Sesshin Lecture
6 - Question and Answer
7 - Liberation
8 - Question and Answer
- 1969 september (8)
1 - Interviews with Peter Schneider
2 - Summer Sesshin: First Night Lecture
3 - Summer Sesshin: Second Night Lecture
4 - Summer Sesshin: Third Night Lecture
5 - Summer Sesshin: Sixth Night Lecture
6 - Summer Sesshin: Shosan Ceremony
7 - Sharp Iron, Pure Silk
8 - Why I Became a Priest
- 1969 oktober (1)
1 - Question and Answer
- 1969 november (8)
1 - Interview with Peter Schneider
2 - Question and Answer
3 - Form is Emptiness, and Emptiness is Form
4 - Not Priest, Not Lay
5 - American Precepts
6 - Evening Lecture
7 - Way-Seeking Mind, Part I
8 - Way-Seeking Mind, Part II
- 1969 december (6)
1 - Way-Seeking Mind, Part III
2 - Winter Sesshin Lecture #4
3 - Winter Sesshin Lecture #5
4 - Winter Sesshin Lecture #6
5 - True Happiness and Renewal of Practice at Year's End
6 - To Adjust Ourselves to Our Surroundings
- 1970 (65)
- 1970 januari (5)
1 - What is Our Practice?
2 - Ordination Ceremony: Bill Kwong and Silas Hoadley
3 - Rules
4 - Mahayana and Hinayana Buddhism
5 - Effort
- 1970 februari (7)
1 - Morning Sesshin Lecture
2 - Afternoon Sesshin Tea Lecture
3 - Relationship
4 - The Background of Shikantaza
5 - Sesshin Lecture #1
6 - Sesshin Lecture #3
7 - Last Lecture of Sesshin
- 1970 maart (5)
1 - Lecture to Professor Lewis R. Lancaster's Visiting Class
2 - Letters from Emptiness
3 - Our Everyday Life is Like a Movie
4 - March Sesshin: Way-Seeking Mind
5 - Zazen is Like Going to the Restroom
- 1970 april (3)
1 - Buddha's Birthday Lecture
2 - Officially Opening Beginner's Mind Temple
3 - How to Have Sincere Practice

1970 mei (9)

- 1 - Sesshin Lecture #1: on breathing
- 2 - Sesshin Lecture #2: helping others
- 3 - Sesshin Lecture #3: sincere practice
- 4 - Negative View, Positive Practice
- 5 - Zen Center and City Practice
- 6 - How to Observe Precepts
- 7 - Money and Labor
- 8 - Sandokai Lecture #1
- 9 - Sandokai Lecture #2

1970 juni (10)

- 1 - Sandokai Lecture #3
- 2 - Sandokai Lecture #4
- 3 - Sandokai Lecture #5
- 4 - Sandokai Lecture #6
- 5 - Sandokai Lecture #7
- 6 - Sandokai Lecture #8
- 7 - Sandokai Lecture #9
- 8 - Sandokai Lecture #10
- 9 - Sandokai Lecture #11
- 10 - Whole-Body Zazen

1970 juli (12)

- 1 - Sandokai Lecture #12
- 2 - Sandokai Lecture #13
- 3 - Eko Lecture #1
- 4 - Eko Lecture #2
- 5 - Eko Lecture #3
- 6 - Eko Lecture #4
- 7 - Eko Lecture #5
- 8 - Eko Lecture #6
- 9 - Japanese Way, American Way, Buddhist Way
- 10 - Mudra Practice And How To Accept Instructions From Various Teachers
- 11 - How To Understand Rituals And Precepts
- 12 - Sesshin Meeting

1970 augustus (10)

- 1 - Sesshin Lecture #1
- 2 - Sesshin Lecture #2
- 3 - Right Teaching and Right Practice
- 4 - Sesshin Lecture #4
- 5 - Priest Ordination Ceremony: Paul Discoe And Reb Anderson
- 6 - Open Mind
- 7 - Push Yourself Into Some Very Strong Hard Rule
- 8 - Lay Ordination Ceremony
- 9 - Leaving for Japan
- 10 - Lay Ordination: White Bird In The Snow

1970 december (4)

- 1 - Lecture After Trip To Japan: Zazen As Our Foundation
- 2 - What Is Self? What Is Our Practice?
- 3 - Come Back to Emptiness
- 4 - Sickness and True Practice

1971 (49)

1971 januari (5)

- 1 - Universal Self, Individual Experience
- 2 - Right Concentration
- 3 - Lay Ordination Ceremony
- 4 - Gaining Idea
- 5 - Meeting Yourself

1971 februari (9)

- 1 - Sesshin Lecture #1
- 2 - Sesshin Lecture #3

3 - Sesshin Lecture #5

- 4 - Sesshin Lecture, 7th Day: Page Street Apples
- 5 - Sesshin Lecture, 7th Day: Closing Words
- 6 - Calmness of Mind
- 7 - Buddha's Practice
- 8 - Actual Feeling of True Practice
- 9 - Maps and Trips

1971 maart (3)

- 1 - The Idea of Self
- 2 - Admonishing Our Many Wishes
- 3 - Lecture at Reed College, Portland

1971 juni (8)

- 1 - Sesshin Lecture #1
- 2 - Okesa Ceremony
- 3 - Sesshin Lecture #2
- 4 - Sesshin Lecture, Day 5
- 5 - Zen Center Students
- 6 - Sewing and Wearing the Buddhist Robes
- 7 - Sesshin lecture: sewing sesshin
- 8 - Everyday Life

1971 juli (11)

- 1 - Real Precepts Are Beyond Words
- 2 - Precepts
- 3 - Precepts II
- 4 - Non-Mystical Understanding
- 5 - Question and Answer
- 6 - San-Pachi-Nenju
- 7 - Mountains and Rivers
- 8 - Self-Centered Practice
- 9 - Blue Cliff Record #61
- 10 - Ryaku Fusatsu Lecture
- 11 - Fusatsu

1971 augustus (12)

- 1 - Words and Zen Teaching
- 2 - Translation Of Unknown Text
- 3 - Freedom
- 4 - On Bodhidharma's Day
- 5 - Bodhidharma
- 6 - Communication
- 7 - Question and Answer
- 8 - Obon
- 9 - Special and Equal
- 10 - When wind stops, flowers fall
- 11 - Sun-Faced Buddha, Moon-Faced Buddha
- 12 - Stones

1971 oktober (1)

- 1 - Suzuki-Roshi Talking to His Disciples About His Illness

Suzuki Roshi Transcripts

Source: <http://suzukiroshi.sfzc.org/archives/>

1962 (1)

1 - Religious Activity

Saturday, December 01, 1962

Religious Activity

Published December 1962, Wind Bell #12

The more we attempt to manage religious activity, the more we lose our fundamental way. The more we study the teaching of Buddhism as if it were philosophy, the more we lose the original teaching.

The founder of Eihei-ji Monastery, Dogen-zenji, respected students who sincerely practiced zazen (cross-legged meditation) rather than intelligent or learned students. Dogen emphasized organizing everyday life as the practice of Zen. He felt that this was the proper activity for Buddhist. When he spoke of the basic teaching of Buddhism, the transiency of life, he stressed it as an actual fact and not as a teaching of the sutras.

Dogen Zenji lost his father when he was three and his mother when he was eight. His mother was a Fujiwara, the most eminent family of the time. She had full experience of the teaching of transiency, and she wanted Dogen to be a priest of great sincerity. He decided to follow her will. After his mother died and he sat by her cold body; he reached a profound understanding of impermanence, watching a few lines of incense smoke drift. Dogen said, "I can walk on the edge of a white blade. I can do without food and drink, but it is not possible for me to forget my mother's last words."

In Zuimonki it is stated that Dogen said, "In order to have a strong introgressive way-seeking mind, it is necessary to see the transiency of life. This actual fact of life is not something conceivable in our brain or something to be dwelled on as an object of meditation. It is an actual fact. You should not wait even for Buddha's teaching."

In Denki it is stated that Dogen said, "When we are not sincere enough to be Buddhists, there is a difference between the intelligent and the dull .... If you lose your human life (Buddhahood can only be attained, when you have human life) you cannot have your life again." This way is Buddha's true teaching. We should encourage ourselves with great holy desire and devote ourselves to Buddhism under the guidance of a true master."

And again in Zuimonki he says in regard to right activity, "Some people think building a temple or pagoda means that Buddhism is prospering.

This attitude is a great mistake. Even a building of gold and precious stone is not the prosperity of Buddhism. The only prosperity of Buddhism is the practice of Buddhism, without wasting a single moment."

1963 (7)

1963 januari (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #14, #15

Tuesday, January 01, 1963

Ummon Zenji and the Teaching Given by Shakyamuni (Blue Cliff Record #14, #15)

First Question:

A traveling monk asked Ummon-zenji: What is this first teaching? (the Teaching told by Buddha during Buddha's own lifetime).

Ummon replied: The teaching confronts each. (Model Subject No. 14)

Commentary:

The teaching given by Shakyamuni Buddha during his lifetime was accommodated to each disciple's particular temperament, and to each occasion's particular circumstances. For each case there should be a special remedy. According to the circumstances there should even be teaching other than the teachings which were told by Buddha. In the light of this, how is it possible to interpret and pass down an essential teaching which can be applied to every possible occasion and individual temperament?

Second Question:

The same monk asked Ummon a second question: What would Buddha have done if there had been no one to hear the teaching and no occasion on which to apply the teaching?

Ummon replied: Topsy-turvy idea. (Model Subject No. 15)

Background: the Founding of Sects

These questions and answers are quite interesting. This questioning monk had a preconceived idea of Zen Buddhism as an esoteric Dharma transmitted through the Zen Patriarchs which is different from the teachings of other schools of Buddhism based on supposedly "dead" scriptures. Ummon's answer points out the monk's misunderstanding of the real nature of the sects of Buddhism. (Ummon's way of Zen was quite rough, but it was rough and strong enough to support Buddhism during the severe persecutions of his time).

During Ummon's time, so-called "Daruma Zen" (Bodhidharma's Zen) was becoming known as "Soshi Zen" (Patriarchal Zen): an esoteric school claiming special transmission outside the scriptures from Buddha to Mahakasyapa to Bodhidharma and the Zen Patriarchs. The school was popular in South China because of these claims of special transmission and because of the rough and whimsical methods of instruction used by the Zen Masters of the period. Eventually this school slighted scriptures and ignored precepts on the ground of Buddha's reported statement that "words are not the first principle."

All the Sects Are One:

The first principle of Buddhism is called by many names: buddha-nature; dharma-nature; reality; voidness; too; one phrase of the pre-voice; great light; universal-nature; Butathagata; Saddharma: wonderful law or truth as revealed in the Lotus Sutra (Tendai Sect); the one vehicle which contains final complete law (Kegon Sect); True Words (Shingon sect); Anuttarasmyaksambodhi (or Anubodhi): unexcelled, correct, complete, universal wisdom of Buddha (a term often used by Dogen).

However, according to the most authentic tradition, the first principle, Buddha's teaching (as attained by Buddhas) in its pure and formless form, is not expressible by word or idea. Hence, the contribution of each sect to Buddhism is to give system to the scriptures, to set up the true words of the Tathagata (Buddha's highest title) in a consistent way so that people may understand and follow Buddha's way of life. The fundamental philosophy of Mahayana Buddhism affirms the absolute character of all phenomena and the possibility for ordinary people to attain Buddhahood.

The leading two Mahayana schools, Tendai, Kegon, applied Zen practice (Shikan) in order to attain thorough and deep insight into the Dharma. For the Shingon sect, the pure and genuine teaching is in the Dainichi Sutra because it was supposedly told by Buddha in his samadhi to himself and not to an audience. The origin of this sutra is supposed to give it incontestable importance among all the sutras, and thus the Shingon sect used it to authorize their teaching.

For the teaching of the Shingon sect to be authorized should not mean that it is superior to other sects. The Zen practice of dharma Zen transmitted from Bodhidharma may be considered different from the Zen practice of the Tendai and Kegon schools, and the idea of the dharma-nature of samadhi may provide a turning point by which to differentiate the Zen school from other schools, but this does not mean that the Zen Sect or Soshi Zen is superior to other schools. Dharma-zen emphasizes practice instead of teaching, that is all; but this emphasis does not mean to ignore the words of Buddha.

The Nature of the Teaching:

Whatever the teaching may be: the teaching confronts each. In accordance with the circumstances, the teaching has absolute value; and to accord with the circumstances the teaching should have an infinite number of forms.

Buddhism in its pure and formless form is given to us in samadhi or zazen when we are ready to accept Buddhism without expecting anything. Buddhism is not something you will find out when you try. When you are just ready to accept it, everything you see flashes forth the great light, everything you hear is the wondrous Pre-voice. That is why we sit.

Engo-zenji, in his introduction to Main Subject No. 15 mentions the "life-taking sword" in order to clarify Ummon-zenji's answer "topsy-turvy idea." "To kill" means not to expect anything, not to put any object in front of you, and to be one with what is given to you, as if you use your own hands. "To kill Buddha" means just to be ready to be Buddha. To be ready to accept everything as it comes to you, one thing after another, is Buddha's activity. In this way the gist of the teaching does not escape you.

If you have a preconceived idea of the first principle, that idea is topsy-turvy; and as long as you try to find out what is the first principle which can be applied to every occasion, you will have topsy-turvy ideas. Such ideas are not necessary, Buddha's great light shines forth from everything, each moment.

1963 maart (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #19

Friday, March 01, 1963

Gutei's Lifting Up One Finger (Blue Cliff Record #19)

Gutei lived in a small hermitage to be free from the fierce persecution of the first part of the ninth century, A.D. in China.

One day a nun named Jissai came to visit him, entering with her hat on her head and her pilgrim staff in her hand. She looked around the seat where Gutei was sitting and said, "I will take off my pilgrimage hat, if you give me a satisfactory statement." When he could say nothing, she started to leave. He tried to stop her, because it was late and dark out. Then she said, "If you can offer one word good enough to stop me, I will be happy to stay."

When he could not, he became quite ashamed of himself and decided to leave his hermitage on a pilgrimage in order to study Buddhism some more. That night he dreamed a Bodhisattva visited him and said that an incarnate Bodhisattva was coming to teach him.

The next day the famous Zen Master Tenryu came. Gutei told him Jissai's visit and about the dream. Tenryu, in answer, lifted up one finger. Gutei was enlightened at that moment, and he said, "I have acquired Tenryu's 'one finger zen' as an inexhaustible treasure for the rest of my life."

From that time on, he answered innumerable questions by lifting up one finger.

Later to his surprise, he found one of his disciples using the same gesture as an answer to questions. So Gutei asked him a question and when his disciple answered by lifting one finger, Gutei reached out and cut his finger off. As the poor man rushed away, Gutei called him back and held up one finger. The disciple was enlightened.

Commentary by Engo Zenji:

Introducing the subject, Engo Zenji said, "If one grain of dust is lifted up, the great universe is involved. If one blossom opens, the world vibrates."

Commentary by Master Suzuki:

One gains a good understanding by approaching this statement from a scientific viewpoint. Everything in the universe is closely related to every other things and to the whole, and the whole is involved in each separate part.

Yet Engo from another standpoint raises a new problem: What happens before the speck of dust is picked up, or before the flower opens?

Here he is talking about the necessity of practice, if one is to realize the oneness of the subjective and the objective. If one does not practice, he is driven by various impetuses to repeatedly wrong activity. Ignorance causes illusive ideas which encourage wrong intellectualization and discourage right observation. It is impossible to attain Reality without being One with the objective world. When perfect acceptance takes place, there is no subjective or objective world.

In the realm of Reality there is nothing that disturbs perfect acceptance: there are no illusive ideas (which are usually) mistaken for the true nature of things. We cut off the complications caused by self-centered desires in order to allow one's own "home treasure" (oneness) to reveal itself.

Engo refers to an ancient saying: If one snips off one place, the whole reel of thread will be cut through.

Yet here is a great problem: We are always too much concerned with the superiority of enlightenment. This concern is caused by a kind of self-conceit. We should cut off the complications moment after moment, one after another, big or small-including such egotistical ideas.

Gutei's one finger always tells us when and where the thread of complications should be cut off.

Now the chance is right here-in this moment! There is no time for anyone to use his mouth or tongue. Tremendous numbers of blind tortoises in the dark sea are landing on Gutei's one small finger, one after another.[1] There is not time for anybody to lift up another finger.

[1] There was once a tortoise living in the deep sea. It had no eyes in its head, but only one in the middle of its belly underneath. So the poor creature could not look up to see and worship the sun, and it was greatly distressed. But one day, by great good luck, a single board with a hole in it came floating by. The tortoise managed with considerable difficulty to cling onto it from underneath in an upside-down position. Thus he was able to put his eye to the hole in the board and look upwards to see the light. (This old legend of the blind tortoise is found in the Parinirvana Sutra, the Aganas, and other scriptures.)

1963 april (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #20

Monday, April 01, 1963

Blue Cliff Record #20

Zen may be said to be the practice of cultivating our mind to make it deep and open enough to accept the various seeds of ideas and thoughts as they are. When this kind of perfect acceptance takes place, everything will orient itself according to its own nature and the circumstances. We call this activity the Great Activity. Reality can be said to be the bed that is deep and soft enough to accept everything as it is.

When you accept everything, everything is beyond dimensions. The earth is not great nor a grain of sand small. In the realm of Great Activity picking up a grain of sand is the same as taking up the whole universe. To save one sentient being is to save all sentient beings. Your efforts of this moment to save one person is the same as the eternal merit of Buddha.

For a person who wants to understand Buddhism logically, it may be difficult for him to understand why he should study over and over again stories such as are collected in the Hekiganroku (BlueCliff Records). Yet, when a student realizes how difficult it is to incorporate into his daily life what he learns in these stories, he will acknowledge the necessity of practicing zazen and reading. This practice and reading will in turn encourage him to read these stories over and over again. To do this over and over means perfect acceptance. Finding out the significance of everyday activity is the Great Activity.

Today's Problem:

In Japan we call this era civilized life the "instant age" because of the prevalent idea that quick solutions to problems are possible without difficulty. This idea takes many forms-instant coffee, instant Sukiyaki, operations for physical disease, pills for mental illness. In spite of all the benefits from our civilization, it is difficult for people to remain strong enough to be happy physically and mentally. Why? Perhaps because a most important point is missing.

Support from without is sometimes too strong, sometimes too weak, sometimes only partial, and sometimes harmful to other parts. The operation must be successful and in addition the patient must survive.

The important point is to arrange ourselves from inside. Orientation from our inmost nature is wanted. The problem is how to make use of our civilization and not be ruined by it. The solution to this problem is Zazen; by sitting we have to resume to our own nature and by Great Activity we should acquire absolute freedom.

Main Subject:

Attention! Ryuge asked Suibi, "What was Bodhidharma's intention in coming to China?"

Suibi said, "Pass me the meditation chin-rest." (When a Zen monk sleeps in zazen posture, he rests his head on a wooden board called a zenpan or chin-rest.)

Ryuge handed Suibi the chin-rest and then Suibi struck Ryuge with it. Ryuge said, "If you strike me, I will let you. But, after all, that was not the intention of the patriarch coming to China.

Ryuge later visited Rinzai. He asked Rinzai, "What was the intention of Bodhidharma in coming to China."

Rinzai said, "Pass me the meditation mat." No sooner had Rinzai received the mat than he struck Ryuge with it.

Ryuge said, "If you strike me, I will let you do so; but that is not the Patriarch's intention in coming to the west."

Interpretation of the Main Subject:

According to the Appreciatory Word of Setcho, the compiler of these stories, Ryuge was struck because he did not understand why Suibi wanted the chin-rest and Rinzai asked for the meditation mat. Their treatment of Ryuge was in the realm of Great Activity and helped Ryuge understand Bodhidharma's Zen. There are no regulations in the Great Activity. A chin-rest and a meditation mat can be used for scoldings slaps.

This power of Great Activity should be acquired by meditation (sitting quietly). There was no other intention in Bodhidharma, Suibi, and Rinzai; but he knew that these intentions had nothing to do with his own Great Activity. In other words, he was enlightened in Bodhidharma's Zen.

A long time after this event, Ryuge said in his answer to a monk, "I do recognize the Great Activities of those two Zen Masters, but that has nothing to do with Bodhidharma's Zen."

1963 juli (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #25

Monday, July 01, 1963

Blue Cliff Record #25

Introductory word:

Engo introducing the subject said, "If a man comes to a standstill at some stage, feeling spiritual pride in his enlightenment; he will find himself in a sea of poison. If he finds his words unable to astonish men of lofty spirit, then what he says is quite pointless.

If one can discern the relative and the absolute in the spark of a flint stone, and can apply the positive and negative way in right order, then one is said to have acquired the stage that is as stable as fathomless cliffs.

Main Subject:

Attention! The hermit of Lotus Peak took up his staff and said to the crowds, "Look at my old staff, What was the intention of the Patriarchs of former days in using their staffs?"

Since the crowds had no answer, he himself answered, "They did not have to depend on their staffs."

Then asking them what the supreme goal was, he answered for them again, "Carrying my palm-staff on my shoulder, without any compassion, I immediately enter the thousand, ten thousand peaks of the mountains."

Appreciatory Words:

With dusty eyes and dirty ears this strange old hermit did not even want to stay at the top of a lofty peak. Where is he now; in a beautiful garden full of flowers? By a flowing stream?

If you wonder with twinkling eyes, he is already beyond your sight.

Notes:

It was not right for the ancients to be attached to their staffs (practice), or to be the top of a mountain (result of practice-enlightenment). For more than twenty years this hermit gave instruction about non-attachment with his staff.

For those who understand this secret, a life of non-attachment, it may be quite an interesting problem. Yet, for one who does not understand this way of life,; the question may be a difficult one. Even if a student has a good answer for it, the answer may be as difficult for him as gold dust in his eyes.

Therefore, one day, the hermit himself answered for his students, "Because they did not have to depend on their staffs."

In these circumstances, what is non-attachment?

Once upon a time celestial nymphs poured down many kinds of beautiful flowers on Bodhisattvas and other Buddhists who were listening to Yui-ma's lecture. The flowers which fell on the great Bodhisattvas fell from their robes. However, some of the flowers remained on the robes of the other disciples, no matter how hard they tried to remove them.

One of the heavenly beauties asked these disciples why they were annoyed with the kind of gift of flowers. Sharihotsu said to her that beautiful flowers should not be on the robes of disciples who live in simplicity. It is beautiful to put ordinary fragrant flowers on a Japanese Ukata, but it is not so good to have a pink flower on a priest's robe.

At this the heavenly maids became quite angry saying, "Whatever your liking may be, a flower is a flower and is beautiful. If the flower is good or bad, it is because of your discrimination and not because of the flower."

This statement made all the disciples except the great Bodhisattvas feel very ashamed of their narrow view.

When one keeps his pure mind on some object or movement, leaving its true nature to the object itself, the oneness of subjective and objective occur. Here exists one sole independent activity. Flowers should be left to their own colors and their own graceful movement.

The hermit should use care for his staff; yet he should neither depend on it, nor ignore it. He should treat the staff the same way he treats his breath in zazen.

In our Zazen our mind must always be kept on our breathing: the breathing should not be too long, short, heavy, or light. It should be natural. We say our exhale does not come out of the world, and our inhale does not stay in our five skandhas.

This way, when we sit, we become one with one whole world. Here the great activity takes place: the absolute independence comes true. That is why the hermit said they didn't have to depend on their staffs.

Setcho says in his Appreciatory Word on this subject, "In the beautiful garden or by the flowing stream, the hermit does not stay. He is already beyond your sight." This is the way we Buddhist should be.

1963 september (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #30

Sunday, September 01, 1963

Joshu's Large Radishes (Blue Cliff Record #30)

There is no Introductory Word to Model Subject No. 30 from the Blue Cliff Records, but I will apply the following statement from a Buddhist Guide for the Layman by Sita Paulickpulla Renfrew (publisher: Cambridge Buddhist Association, Cambridge, Mass.) as an introduction.

"According to Buddhist ethics, no person or authority can ever impose upon another any code of conduct lower in morality or humanity than the individual himself wishes. Neither can anyone make another act on a higher plane than the individual himself desires. Each individual can act only according to the level of his state of evolution, and he has to live by the consequences thereof."

Main Subject from the Blue Cliff Records:

Attention! A monk asked Joshu, "I hear by rumor that you were at one time closely associated with Nansen. Is that so, or not?" Joshu replied, "Chin-shu produces very large radishes."

Appreciatory Word by Setcho:

Chin-shu produces large radishes. Monks everywhere have taken this as a model for replies. It is obvious from ancient to modern times that one cannot ask a swan why it is white or a crow why it is black.

A rascal, a rascal! He has already twisted the monk's noses.

Notes by Master Suzuki:

A student who is familiar with his own true nature will become familiar with his teacher's true nature as well as the true nature of a radish-the true nature of all existence. It is true that there should be no problem merely because one thing happens to be big and another small, or one person the teacher and another the disciple, if their true nature is the same. But what will happen if a swan is black and a crow white? It is natural for a swan to be white and a crow to be black. This is Buddha Nature.

Do not say there is no need to practice Buddhism because we have Buddha Nature intrinsically. There is Buddha Nature (eventually there is happiness) only when a swan is white, a crow is black, a human being is a human being, and a Buddhist practices Buddha's way of life.

If a Buddhist does not behave like a Buddhist, one cannot say he is a Buddhist, or a Christian. Who is he? There is no composure. Eventually he will be unable to be aware of his true nature.

In Shobogenzo "Raihaitokuzi," Dogen-zenji says, when you meet with a right teacher, who teaches you highest wisdom, you must not consider his caste or race, nor attend to his favorable or unfavorable appearance, nor consider his shortcomings. You should be respectful of him only because of his true wisdom. You should not have a feeling of aversion, but serve him and bow to him truthfully.

If you practice Buddhism without hypocrisy but with truthfulness, this truthfulness penetrates into the innermost nature of all existence and will encourage man and nature; and the true nature of man and nature will encourage your sincere practice.

This sincerity accepts the level to which we have evolved, wakes up our slumbering moral faculties, and extends our true nature beyond the discrimination of good and bad, perfect and imperfect. You will always have a good reaction with continuous Zen practice.

1963 november (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #36

Friday, November 01, 1963

Cho-sha's "Strolling about Mountains and Waters" (Blue Cliff Record # 36)

Attention! One day Cho-sha went for a walk. When he returned to the gate, the gate-keeper asked, "Sir, where have you been walking?" Cho-sha said, "I have been strolling about in the hills." "Where did you go?" asked the gatekeeper. "I have walked through the scent of herbs and wandered by the falling flowers." said Cho-sha. The gatekeeper said, "Very much like a calm Spring feeling." Cho-sha said, "It transcends even the cold Autumn dew falling on the lotus stems."

Setcho, the compiler of the Blue Cliff Records, adds the comment, "I am grateful for Cho-sha's answer."

Commentary by Reverend Shunryu Suzuki, Master of Zen Center:

"Strolling about mountains and waters" means in Zen the stage where there are no Buddhas or Patriarchs to follow and no evil desires to stop. Not only climbing up a mountain or wandering about waters, but all activities of Cho-sha are free from rational prejudices and emotional restrictions. His mental activity is free from any trace of previous activity. His thinking is always clear without the shadows of good and evil desires.

It is important to have a good memory and to be able to go into every detail of activities so that effective decisions can be made. Yet one's mind cannot respond to the coming of new objects into the consciousness if it is full of the traces of former thinking. It is useless to remember everything. There is no point in remembering things just so we can cry, be jealous, or be proud. The mind should be spotless so that everything may be observed as it is. If the mind is free from the traces of past thinking and is always clear, without tainted ideas or desires, then mind will always be calm and natural like the flowers that come out in Springtime or the red leaves that turn in the Autumn. Your mind and your nature will have the same pace.

When you have reached this stage, your everyday life is called the life of yusan gansui-the life of wandering about mountains and waters. Cho-sha's answer, "I had walked through the scent of herbs and wandered about by falling flowers," refers to his well-trained everyday life which surpasses good and bad experiences and is always calm and clear.

The gatekeeper's reply that this is "very much like a calm Spring feeling" suggests Cho-sha is attached to the calm Spring feeling when his mind should always be like a mirror reflecting everything as it is, transcending forms, colors, and feelings. So Cho-sha replied meaning that: the state of mind expressed in my statement that I have walked through the scent of herbs and wandered by the falling flowers transcends the warm Spring feeling and the cold Autumn feeling when icy dew is on withered leaves and stems of the lotus.

Engo's commentary says, "The first arrow is shallow, the second one is deep." Yet we must know the pain by the first arrow (statement). Because the gatekeeper did not appreciate fully Cho-sha's second statement, Setcho in his commentary says, "I am grateful for that answer."

Appreciatory Word by Setcho:

The Great land[1] transcends its small dusts.[2] What man's eyes are not open? Following the herbs and wandering around by falling flowers. [3] The enfeebled stork flutters around a cold withered tree. The mad monkey chatters on a balcony.[4] Oh! Cho-sha's impossible way of putting things into words.

TOTSU! [5]

[1] "Land" can mean a well-trained Zen mind.

[2] "Dusts" are evil desires, anger, ignorance, stagnation, agitation, doubt, remorse, etc.

[3] This remark of Cho-sha' means that his mind is always one with falling flowers and the scent of herbs (outward objects). There is no trace in his mind of former activity.

[4] This is Setcho's or Cho-sha's remark is better.

[5] TOTSU! is a kind of exclamatory word or scolding voice. Sometimes it is the same as KATSU! It is shouted in order to cut off entanglements completely. In this case, Setcho means infinity or endlessness.

1963 december (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #40

Sunday, December 01, 1963

Rikko's "Heaven and Earth are the Same Essence" (Blue Cliff Record # 40)

Rikko is said to have lived from 764-834. He was a high official of the tang government in china. He was a disciple of Nansen Fugan. His writings and biography are in Koji-buntoruko. There were many famous lay Zen Buddhists during the Tang Dynasty. The most famous of these lay Buddhists are:

Ho-Koji (Ho-un)--see Model Subject No. 42

Kak Rakten (Hak-Kyoi)--the most famous writer and poet of the Tang Dynasty.

Haikyū--Highest public official of the time. His teacher was Obaku (Huang Po).

Haykyū--Compiler of Obaku's Denshin Hoyo (a collection of sermons and dialogues).

Riko--a high official and the scholar author of Fukuseisho

Sai Gun--a high official and scholar

Chinso--see Model Subject No. 33

Sojō was one of the four most famous disciples of Kumarajīva, who came to China in 401 from Kucina, near Tibet. Kumarajīva and Genjyō were epoch-making translators of Buddhist scriptures. Kumarajīva translated many of the Vaipulya scriptures and sutras of the Prajñā Paramitā group. The Prajñā Paramitā Hridaya Sūtra (Shingyō), which is said to have been translated seven times, was also translated by Kumarajīva, but his translation is said to be lost.

Nansen Fugan (748-834) was a disciple of Baso. See Model Subjects No. 28, 31, 40, 63, 64, 69.

Introductory Word:

Engho, introducing the subject, said: When complete liberation from the cord of desires takes place, and when there is a perfect cessation of effort motivated by wrong desires, then, even from an iron tree, blossoms might open out. Is it so? Is it so? Even a very artful or clever boy may make a mistake because of his cleverness. Even if one's skill is tactful enough for free activity in seven vertical and eight horizontal, one will still be led by the nose. Think where is the fault? Ponder the following:

Main Subject:

Attention! While conversing with Nansen, the official Rikko said, "Sojō said that heaven and earth and I are the same root--all things and I are of one substance. This is a wonderful statement."

Nansen called Rikko over to him, pointed to a flower in the front garden and said, "People of this time who see this flower are like men in a dream."

Appreciatory Word:

Seeing, hearing, and knowing are not the same. Mountains and rivers do not see a mirror even though they are in a mirror. The frosty sky, the setting moon, and the middle of the night: with whom shall I share the coldness of the clear depths of the reflected shadows?

Commentary by Reverend Shunryu Suzuki, Master of Zen Center:

Sojo's famous statement in his last work that 'Heaven and earth and I are the same root.

All things and I are of one substance is wonderful, when it is not applied to Rikko's own attached view of the oneness of all things being in the realm of the explicable. As long as Rikko clings to the ideal of oneness, he is said to still be making an erroneous effort motivated by wrong desires or craving. This attachment will lead to disappointment, even though the idea of oneness is not wrong.

Rikko should try to know why he clung to a particular idea, and he should try to follow the way to attaining singlemindedness free from points of view. This effort is necessary if he is to have full appreciation of Reality. Because people and Rikko seek for temporal satisfactions from a worldly view-point, cling to their own stand-points, and do not follow the right way practicing zazen with perseverance, they cannot see things as they are. So Nansen pointed at a flower and said, "People of this time who see this flower are like men in their dreams."

Setcho, in his Appreciatory Word, brings each phenomenal existence into the realm of Reality and stresses the independent meaning of things. He said, "Seeing, hearing, (smelling, tasting, etc.), and knowing do not take place in the same realm. Mountains and rivers do not see (depend on) a mirror. (A mountain is a mountain, a river is a river, and a mirror is a mirror). Late at night when frost is everywhere, the moon is setting, everything is sleeping, with whom shall I share the severe coldness of the reflected shadows (each phenomenal existence) in the clear water (in the realm of Reality)?

1964 (8)

1964 februari (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #46

Saturday, February 01, 1964

Blue Cliff Record #46

Attention! Kyo-sei asked a monk, "What is the sound outside the door?" The monk said, "It is the sound of raindrops." Kyo-sei said, "All sentient beings are deluded by the idea of self and by the idea of the world as subjective or objective (as permanent).

Commentary:

Kyo-sei has seen through the monk, who thinks he is not caught by the "objective" sound of the raindrops, but he who actually is caught by the sound of raindrops in his subjective world.

The monk said, "How about yourself?" (In other words, "I have the raindrops in my clear mind. How about you?") Kyo-sei said, "People may say I am not deluded by myself or by the raindrops." (Original text says: "I am almost not deluded myself.")

Commentary:

Kyo-sei is just listening to the sound of raindrops. There is nothing but raindrops.

The monk said, "What do you mean by: you are regarded not to be deluded yourself?" The monk cannot understand why Kyo-sei doesn't say definitely that he is not deluded by himself and that he hears the raindrops clearly in his mind.

Kyo-sei said, "Even though it is not difficult to be free from the objective world (and to make a clear statement) it is difficult to express reality fully on each occasion.

GIVE THE MONK 30 BLOWS!

IT IS DIFFICULT TO EXPRESS REALITY FULLY ON EACH OCCASION!!!!!!!

Commentary:

When my master and I were walking in the rain, he would say, "Do not walk so fast, the rain is everywhere."

Appreciatory Word:

When the voice of the raindrops covers the whole world, even an expert cannot give any answer (because he himself is also the raindrops).

Even though you say the voice of raindrops is nothing but your mind, that is not a perfect answer (of full understanding). Southern and Northern mountains, all over the world, are covered by the heavy rain.

1964 maart (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #49

Sunday, March 01, 1964

San-cho and "The Golden Scales" Escaping from the Net (Blue Cliff Record #49)

Introductory Word:

Engo introducing the subject said: Seven piercings and eight holes, snatching the drums and carrying off the banner (in war-time to pierce the enemy's lines in seven or eight places and to snatch the enemy's drums and banner is metaphorically compared to the great activity of San-cho in the main subject). A hundred ramparts and a thousand entrenchments, watching the front and guarding the rear (comparisons to Sep-po's way of attending to San-cho). Or sitting on the tiger's head and seizing its tail: such is not good enough to compare the great activity of skillful Zen Master (San-cho). Even though an ox-head disappears and a horse-head appears, this would not be miraculous enough (in comparison to the skill of Sep-po). So ponder what you will do, if you come across a man of such surpassingly great activity.

Main Subject:

Attention! San-cho asked Sep-po: "What (Why?) does a mysterious golden-scaled carp escaped from the fishing net cast? " Sep-po said, "I would like to wait for your coming out of the fishing net and then answer you." San-cho said, "You, who have fifteen hundred disciples do not understand what I say." Sep-po said: "this old monk is too busy in managing temple affairs to attend to you."

Appreciatory Word (by Set-cho with notes by Reverend Suzuki)

"Do not say that the golden carp which has jumped out of the fishing net is staying quietly in the water. (He is) loosening the heavens. moving the earth, shaking his fins, opening out its tail." (This refers to San-cho's statement: 'You who have 1500 disciples...etc') "Spouting water to a thousand feet, a great white whale will leap through the flood. After a great thunderstorm, a cool wind came." (This refers to Sep-po's statement: 'This old monk is too busy...etc.')

"Oh this wonderful pure clean wind, who knows the mystery of such tremendous cleansing power!"

Interpretation of Main Subject (A direct translation of Engo's remarks in the 'Hyo-sho', with some notes by Reverend Suzuki).

Sep-po and San-cho--with questions and answers, giving and taking, crossing words with one another--neither won nor lost. Just think what kind of wisdom they have. San-cho had received Rinzai's transmission and had traveled many places. It is no wonder that he was treated as a high monk. Look at the following questions and answers made between Sep-po and him. Perhaps not many people can understand the deep meaning of this dialogue without being in the realm of radical Buddhism.

San-cho asked Sep-po: "What does the mysterious golden carp escaped from a fishing net cast?" Now ponder what he meant. What is the food for the golden-scaled fish? Sep-po, who was also a great master said to San-cho: "I would like to wait for your coming-out from the net and then answer you."

Fun-yo called the kind of question that San-cho asked, "a question presenting one's own understanding," (and in the Soto school they called this kind of question a "metaphorical question.") You may say that San-cho was a great golden-scaled carp escaped from the fishing net with a great incomparable wisdom and activity. However, Sep-po, a skillful master, did not give San-cho full play, saying: 'I will wait for your coming out of the net.'" Look! Those two masters are standing at the top of the ten thousand feet cliff!

However, but for San-cho's next instantaneous statement, the question and answer would not make full sense. San-cho said to Sep-po: "Although you are a teacher of fifteen hundred students, you do not know how to question and answer." To this Sep-po said: "I may have been mistaken to listen to you, because I am very busy in managing temple work." Look! He became very droll!

In the manner of confrontation of the two great masters' skill, there are no restrictions: sometimes grasping, sometimes granting, to the strong with the weak, to the humble with the polite. According to the circumstances, they express themselves at their own will. If you try to understand this subject with the idea of winning or losing, you will never see San-cho, even in your dreams.

"Such is the two well-trained Zen masters' way," said Engo, "at first they are tough and later droll. Do you still ask which has won or lost? The way of confrontation between other Zen masters is not always like this."

In order to make clear what a good Zen master San-cho was, Engo then said: Once San-cho was a head monk of Rin-zai's monastery. When Rin-zai was about to pass away, he gave his students the last sermon and said: "After my Nirvana, you should not destroy the treasury of my right Dharma eye." San-cho came up to him and said: "How dare we destroy it?" Rin-zai said: "If someone asks you about my right dharma eye, what will you say?" San-cho gave a "Katsu!" (a loud shout). Rin-zai then said: "Who would expect that my right Dharma eye is going to vanish into that donkey's belly!" Hereby San-cho made obeisance to Rin-zai (to show his utmost respect to Rin-zai). San-cho was Rin-zai's true successor, and questions and answers between them were like this.

FROM A LECTURE

[The following is the gift of Reverend Suzuki's response to a question from one of his students during the Wednesday evening Lecture, February 26. The question refers to the lines from Engo's appreciatory Word:

"After a great thunderstorm, a cool wind came,

Oh this wonderful pure clean wind, who knows the mystery of such tremendous cleansing power!"]

QUESTION: Is it necessary to go through thunder and storm in order to attain the clear calm healing wind?

ANSWER: Not always. If there is no thunderstorm, you cannot undergo it! Once when I was travelling alone in Northern Japan, I met a man accompanied by a dog held by a great dog chain. The first thing he said to me (we were on a boat going to a small island) was "Be careful, the dog is very dangerous!" We became good friends. He told me that if it was my business to save all common people, then I should know what happened to them. I had to experience what they experienced. He, for instance had women and drank sake. I should practice the same in order to understand him.

If the occasion comes to drink, it may be all right. If you have to do something, if it is inevitable, then there is the possibility of real training. But if I drank sake in order to train myself, then I would not be doing it in the same way as he. It would not work, he agreed.

It is dangerous to undertake something on purpose in order to yourself. We monks go to Eihei-ji monastery for training but it is not always successful! If you go of your own will, often there is wrong motivation. You expect something when you have completed it; you expect to gain enlightenment or improve your character or something.

It is quite dangerous. You must be very careful on your motivation when you do something on purpose. If we have had wrong motivation, then when we come out of the monastery, we become arrogant or conceited. We have spiritual pride in what we have done. That is very dangerous.

There are many ways to train. The monastery is a good one. While you are there, you have to do many things. You know, if you walk through the fog, your garments will become wet, without any effort or being conscious of it, they quite naturally become wet.

That is why we begin training with the basic teaching of transiency: There is no self and all things are changing. If you really understand these two points, and if you just remain faithful to the truth, you will be rid of useless ambitions and one day acquire good character.

Sometimes we want hard training. If you are in discomfort or pain then it might be quite difficult to accept the fact of no self. If your legs hurt you want you want to have the stick on your shoulders. It takes your mind off your legs; it is a very kind thing that stick. Thus, sometimes we want hard training; but if you have the right attitude in all you do, you will be successful in your training of yourself.

But I do not ignore the thunder or the rainstorm. It is quite interesting to walk in the storm and rain.

1964 april (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #52

Wednesday, April 01, 1964

Joshu's "Donkeys Cross, Horses Cross" (Blue Cliff Record #52)

Jo-shu (Personal name: Sramanera) of this subject was a native of Northern China. When he was ordained (at quite a young age), he visited Nan-sen with his master. "Do you know the name of this monastery?" asked Nan-sen, who had been taking a nap in his room. The boy said, "Sacred Elephant Monastery." "Then did you see a sacred elephant?" asked Nan-sen. The boy replied, "I did not see any sacred elephants, but I saw a reclining bodhisattva." Nan-sen raised himself up and said, "Have you your own master now?" "yes, I have, said the boy. "Who is he?" asked Nan-sen. To this the boy Sramanera made a formal obeisance which should be given only to his own master, saying, "Spring cold is still here. Please take good care of yourself." Nan-sen called up Ino-osho (who took care of the monastery) and gave him a seat.

One day Nan-sen allowed Jo-shu to meet him in his room. Jo-shu asked Nan-sen, "What is the true Way?" "Ordinary mind is the true Way," said Nan-sen. "Is it something to be attained or not to be attained?" asked Jo-shu. "To try to attain it is to avert from it." said Nan-sen. "When you do not try to attain it, how do you know the true Way?" asked Jo-shu. To this question, Nan-sen's answer was very polite. "The true way is not a matter to be known or not to be known. To know is to have a limited idea of it, and not to know is just psychological unawareness. If you want to achieve the absolute, where there is no doubt, you should be clear enough and vast enough to be like empty space." Hereby Jo-shu acquired full understanding of the true way of Zen.

When Jo-shu was sixty-one years of age, he heard that his former master in his hometown was not well, and he went all the way back from South China to take care of him. His parents heard about his coming back from the South and wanted to have him home. But as soon as Jo-shu learned of his parents' wishes, he left his old master before they came.

He used to say, "I must ask my way from a child of seven, if he is good enough. But I shall be a teacher of any old man of a hundred years." At the age of eighty he resided at Jo-shu (North China). He appreciated the bare life of ancient patriarchs and used only a broken-legged chair, repaired by a piece of firewood. Throughout the forty years during which he lived the simplest form of life in Jo-shu monastery, he never wrote a single page of a letter, begging for his support.

Main Subject

A monk said to Jo-shu, "The famous stone bridge, I have just seen it; but it was nothing but a simple stepping-stone bridge," and requested his answer. Jo-shu said, "you did see a simple stepping-stone bridge, but did not see the actual bridge." The monk then asked, "What is the stone bridge you mean?" Jo-shu said, "It is that which donkeys cross and horses cross."

Commentary by Reverend Suzuki

This monk came to Jo-shu ignoring the great master's prestige, and said "I did not see anything but a common stepping-stone bridge," and requested his answer. Jo-shu in return gave him an interesting gift problem, saying, "You did not see the real stone bridge, but only a stepping-stone bridge," Now the monk was caught in Jo-shu's gift-box of duality (intellectual problem: right or wrong, this or that, phenomena or noumena, interplay of the subjective and the objective) and asked, "What is the real stone bridge?" Now Jo-shu, wishing to free the monk from the idea of some special stone bridge, answered "Donkeys cross and horses cross."

This usual manner of instruction is not like Toku-san or Rin-zai, who answer by means of sticks or scolding voice, Jo-shu just answered with simple common words. This 'koan' looks quite common, but it does not allow you to become accustomed to it.

Once Jo-shu asked a head monk of the Zendo (Zen practice hall) who it was who had built the stone bridge. The head monk said "Riyo built it." Jo-shu asked again, "When he was building it, on what did he work? (i.e., did he work on subjective bridge or objective bridge or what?)" The head monk could not answer. Jo-shu said, "people talk about this stone bridge, but when asked this kind of simple question, they cannot answer."

One day when Jo-shu was cleaning the main hall a monk came and asked him, "Why is there dust in the hall to clean?" Jo-shu said, "because dust comes in from the outside." The monk said, "I cannot recognize pure clean hall to have dust in it." Jo-shu said, "I see one more piece of dust here." Those were the old Zen master Jo-shu's way.

The Zen master is supposed to be tough enough to remain faithful to the way, but all the better to be not so tough and follow the way.

Appreciatory Word by Set Cho:

Without setting himself up as an isolated peak,

Old Jo-shu's Zen is insurmountably high.

Who knows he is catching giant turtles,

In the vast ocean of Buddhism?

That old scholar Kan-Kei may be compared to Jo-shu

Only to make us all laugh.

Suddenly breaking the arrows was quite futile.

NOTE:

Kan-Kei (895) was a disciple of Rin-zai, and contemporary with Jo-shu. He was asked a question similar to the one Jo-shu asked in the Main Subject. Kan-Kei's question and answer was as follows: A young monk: "I have just come from the famous Kan-Kei Valley, but I saw nothing but a small lake."

Kan-Kei: "But didn't you see the real Kan-Kei Valley?"

The young monk: "What is the Kan-Kei Valley you mean?"

Kan-Kei: "Breaking the arrow suddenly."

1964 mei (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #53

Friday, May 01, 1964

Blue Cliff Record #53

Introductory Word by Engo

Introducing Engo said, "Obtaining the sole existing independent body, the total free activity takes place." (When you become one with an object, your activity is omnipresent, the activity of one existence.) "On each occasion, an enlightened mind is quite free from intercourse with the world." (This is called intuitive free activity.) "Only because he has no idea of self are his words powerful enough to put an end to ordinary mind." (Baso's powerful way in this main-subject.) Think for a while. After all, from what place did the ancients get the ultimate restfulness. Ponder about the following subject.

Main Subject

Attention! Once, when Baso was walking with his disciple Hyakujo, wild ducks were flying over them. Baso, the great teacher, said, "What are they?" Kyakujo said, "They are wild ducks." Baso said, "Where are they going?" Hyakujo said, "They are flying away."

Baso gave Hyakujo's nose a great tweak. Hyakujo cried out with pain. Baso said, "Did they indeed fly off?"

Note by Reverend Suzuki

Baso Doitsu (709-788) was a man of mighty physique. It is said that his eyes were like a tiger's eyes, that he walked like a bull, and that his tongue reached to his nose when he talked. He was the chief disciple of Nan-gaku Ejo (?-755) and spiritual grandson of the Sixth Patriarch, Daikan Eno (638-713). During his life under the patronage of the Tang emperors, Buddhism in China was spreading rapidly.

His posthumous name was Daijaku Zenji. (Zenji means Zen Master). One hundred and thirty nine disciples attained enlightenment under him. Hyakujo Ekai was one of his five most outstanding disciples. (Banzan Hoshaku, Model No. 37; Mayoku Hotetsu, No. 31, Nansen Fugan, No. 28, 31, 40, 63, 64, 69; Taibai Hojo). It has been 1050 years since Hyakujo Ekai Zenji passed away. In Japan this year they held big memorial services for him in many Zen temples.

Hyakujo established for the first time monastic rules in a special monastery for Zen monks in a more suitable and advanced understanding of Vinaya. Before Hyakujo almost all Zen monks practiced zazen at temples of the Vinaya school.

Hyakujo's way of Buddhist life is not altogether the same as the Indian way of devotional life. In China, one of the most important practices for a Zen student was physical labor or to work on building a temple. This kind of work was thought to be wrong activity for monks in India. These Chinese monks must have appreciated a cup of tea after their hard work. It was from this practice and the certain deep way in which their appreciation was expressed that the tea ceremony developed.

Buddhism became more a part of practical life and was expressed as near-at-hand truth in such ways as "have a cup of tea" or "if I do not work one day, I do not eat one day."

Hyakujo had practiced Zen under Baso for 20 years. there is no break in Zen practice. Who but alert Zen Masters, would know that by these wild ducks was meant Buddhatathata. Hyakujo was too truthful to his teacher's question to realize the secret point, and he said, "They are wild ducks." Baso was pleased with his disciple's usual innocent answer; but as an efficient teacher of a good student, he had to be a poison oak. So Baso said, "Where are they going?" This is a so-called old woman's kindness or to go into a donkey's belly. In the realm of Buddhatathata (reality), there is no where to come from for the ducks; but from the standpoint of the relative there are ducks flying away over their heads. For a good Zen Master like Hyakujo, his way should always be free, sometimes relative, sometimes absolute. But instead he always remained in the relative way of observance. Baso wanted him to get over the relative by himself. That is why Baso put to Hyakujo a strong relative question expecting a kind of strong absolute answer. But Hyakujo remained in his pure complete innocence and presented a relative answer, "They have flown away." So at last Baso gave Hyakujo's nose a sharp tweak with his big hand and Hyakujo cured out with pain.

Thereupon Baso said, "Have they indeed flown off?" and enlightened Hyakujo (who acquired the free activity of Baso--see Introductory Word).

Baso and Hyakujo, a teacher and a disciple, had practiced together for twenty years. It was sincere Hyakujo who fulfilled the absolute request of his teacher Baso. It was kind Baso who recognized his disciple's train of relative effort and helped to switch him over to the full awakening of relative and absolute. They are good example of the relationship between a teacher and a disciple.

When we come to a thorough understanding of the oneness of the relative and the absolute, we will realize that what Baso said was right because of Hyakujo's enlightenment. Or it may be said that the wild ducks did not fly away because Hyakujo's true practice. In short, Hyakujo completed this relative conversation provided by Baso. Here is the true sense of the oneness of practice and enlightenment.

Appreciatory Word by Setcho

Oh wild ducks! How many of you understand them? Baso saw them and started the conversation with Hyakujo. His great tongue covers the mountains' clouds and the moon above the vast ocean with a lofty sentiment. But Hyakujo remained unaware of his true nature and said the wild ducks were flying away. Indeed! Except for the tweak and the pain, their true nature would have flown off. What else would you say bit to cry out: Say! Say something!

1964 juni (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #51

Monday, June 01, 1964

Seppo's "What is it?" (Blue Cliff Record #51)

Seppo was a good example of a well-trained Zen Master. "Three times a visitor to Tosu and nine times an attendant to Tozai," became one of the catch-words of Zen practice signifying Seppo's hard discipline.

He was born in 822 and died in 908 near the end of the tang Dynasty. The Emperor was killed by Shuzenchu in 904. The next and last Emperor of the Tang Dynasty, supported by his traitor, lasted for only four years. A dark restless period followed the tang Dynasty. A severe persecution occurred when Seppo was twenty years old (845). Metalware throughout the land was turned into coin, including temple bells and images of Buddha, 4,600 temples were destroyed, 26,500 priests and nuns were cast out of the order along with 2,000 priests of other religions except Taoist.

The other principal character of this model subject, Ganto (828-887), was killed by a mob. He was a good friend of Seppo and they had both been born in the province of Fukien. Both went on long, hard pilgrimages from northeast to southeast China, visiting many famous masters. As stated, they are said to have visited Tosu Daido three times and Tozen Ryokai (Soto School) nine times. You may imagine how hard they practiced.

Later they were handed down Tokusan Senkan's transmission. When Seppo was 44 and Ganto 38, they left Tokusan and started pilgrimages again. At Gosanchin they were caught in a heavy snowstorm. Seppo was sitting all the while Ganto was sleeping. Ganto said to him, "This village is like a fortified town, why don't you sleep?" Seppo, rubbing his breast said, "I do not feel easy in my heart." Ganto answered, "Please tell me one by one what you have acquired."

Seppo told Ganto what he had experienced under Tozan and Tokusan, but Ganto did not agree and said, "the treasures that come from outside are not your family treasures." Seppo was enlightened by this statement. He was 44 years old.

The following year they left with Kinzan Bunsui, their best friend who had become Tozan's disciple, for further study at Rinzai's temple. On the way they heard that Rinzai had died. Ganto went on to Ryuzan near Lake Dotei, Kinzan went back to his temple, and Seppo returned to the south.

When Seppo was 47 he secluded himself at a stone cave which had been the first residence of his old master Reikun. When he was 54 he had his own temple beautifully built on the top of a mountain. At the age of 60 he had 1050 students, one of whom was Ummon, founder of the Ummon School. A purple robe was presented to him by Emperor Kiso. His posthumous name is Shinkaku-daishi (Great Master Shinkaku).

Introductory Word by Engo

Engo introducing the subject said, "If you are caught by the slightest idea of good and bad, your mind (true mind, essence of mind) will be lost in the realm of disorder. If you do not have an idea of the order of stages, there will be no purpose in your practice. Now which do you think is better, to pursue the relative way or to resume to the absolute?"

[Note: The relative form and color that you see now are the conditioned attributes of the unconditioned--constant--absolute. The absolute is the eternal unconditionally that gives rise to the conditioned, relative ways of practice. What you see now is the eternal unconditionality of the absolute and the momentous conditioned relative. Actually the positive or relative way is not different from the negative or absolute way. Even though you follow the order of the stages in your actual practice, if each relative stage, even the first stage, is brought out in full relief against the darkness of the absolute, and if there is no fumbling and groping in your practice under the right teacher, then your practice is already in the realm of Reality. Each relative stage bears the full meaning of the absolute and the absolute reveals its actual meaning in the relative practice. If you wish to understand this secret, you must study under the right teacher not only by words but also by actual conduct on each moment under particular circumstances.]

To continue with Engo's introduction, he said, "If you become attached to some particular way of expressing Zen, captivated by something told in words or verse, attached to some method of instruction (scolding voice, slapping face, seizing by the collar and casting off, drawing a circle, lifting up one finger, etc.) you are nothing better than the parasitic weeds wrapped around dead trees. Even if a man thinks that he is living in the land of Tathagata itself, when he is possessed by the idea of this land or that land, he is said to be watching the moon of his old home which is now ten thousand miles away. Well, have you understood what I am saying? If not, here is an actual koan for you to ponder."

Main Subject

When Seppo was in his hermitage on Mount Seppo, two unnamed monks visited him and bowed to him (what is the bow). Seppo saw them coming, pushed open his gate, jumped out, and said, "What is it?" (An indicative question[1], a question and yet an answer, do you understand the real Seppo? Tell me what it is. "He is an iron flute with no holes," Engo said.) The two monks said, "What is it?" (The two monks did not fail to respond, but Engo says, "They are old sounding-boards covered by velvet." They were chalk and not cheese.) Seppo made a bow to them and went back to his room. Engo said, "This is not a dragon because it has no legs, but it is certainly not a snake because it has no horns." I say, "What is it?"

The two monks later extended their travels to visit Ganto in Ganto Mountain. Ganto said, "Where did you come from?" (Ganto has already caught them). The monks said, "We are from Reinan." (Be quick and give him a right answer.) Ganto said, "Then you must have met Seppo, haven't you?" (It is very kind of him to wait for their right answer.) The monks said, "Yes we have." (He was not asking them yes or no, but whether they had understood the actual Seppo.) Ganto said, "What did he say?" They told him all about what had happened when they visited Seppo. Ganto said, "What did he say after all?" thus requesting their final answer. But they said, "He did not say anything." He bowed and went back to his room. Thereupon Ganto said, "Oh, what have I done? When I was at Tokusan with him, I should have let him know the verse of my dying bed. If only I had told him that, he would not have been thrown into such confusion." (Although Ganto mentioned Seppo's name, he actually meant to give the monks his own last word. Then, what is his last word?)

The two monks were allowed to spend the summer at Ganto's monastery. At the end of the session, the two monks asked Ganto's instruction about the meaning of Seppo's unusual behavior and what Ganto had meant by: How I wish I had told him my last word. Ganto said, "Why did you not ask me before?" They said, "Because we thought your last word too valuable to ask about." Thereupon Ganto said, "Seppo is a fellow countryman of mine. He and I always went on pilgrimages together, yet we will not die together. If you want to know my last word for Seppo and you, I will tell you what it was. It is nothing but: This is it."

Wherever Seppo and Ganto might be, however long they might live as the best friend of each other, what Seppo did is actual Seppo and what Ganto did is actual Ganto. "This is it" should always be the last word for oneself and for others.

Dogen-zenji said, "Breathing in or breathing out, after all, what is it?" No one can tell what it is.

Now, you may not be calm or patient enough to wait for the right answer, but let us ask ourselves if our activity is either subjective or objective. Let me point to this: What do we mean by "it"? Do you mean breathing itself or the idea of breathing. If you mean the idea of breathing it will be another matter. If you mean breathing itself each moment, you have solved the problem already when you breathe in and out on each moment in calmness with Big Mind. Now, you will understand that the right answer to "What is it" should always be "This is it."

Ganto was killed soon after leaving his last word to his friend Seppo.

This translation and commentary are my poor offering to these two great masters.

Appreciatory Words by Setcho

Referring to Ganto's last words to Seppo,

I will ask you, Enlightened Mind,

Is daytime different from nighttime or the same?

Even though they lived fully acquainted with each other

In complete companionship,

They were to die in different places. Yes.

They should die in different ways.

Buddha should have curled hair,

Bodhidharma should be blue-eyed.

From East, West, South, and North let us

Come back to our old home,

In a mid-night sky to see

A plain white

Mountain covered with snow.

[1] Indicative: (gram.) stating a thing as a fact, not as conception, wish, etc., of speaker; suggestive, giving indications. [Oxford English Dictionary.]

1964 augustus (1)

1 - The Traditional Way

Saturday, August 01, 1964

The Traditional Way

Summary of Reverend Suzuki's Sesshin Lectures by Nota bene.-Trudy Dixon

Zen Center's annual week Sesshin (concentrated period of meditation) was held this year from August 10 through August 15th. During the Sesshin, the main theme of the daily lectures given by Master Suzuki was The Traditional Way of Buddhism transmitted from Buddha down through the Patriarchs to the present day. His opening talks concerned the sutras and rituals which are part of the daily zazen practice in the zendo of Soko-ji Temple. The following is a rough paraphrase of some of what Master Suzuki said.

To understand what the "Traditional Way" of Buddhism is and to actualize it in one's own life are the most important points in being a sincere Buddhist. The Traditional Way of Buddhism, although it is dependent upon no particular form for its expression, the sutras and rituals handed down to us from the Patriarchs are a great help to us. A part of the ritual which may be particularly difficult for Americans to understand and accept is the bowing. After zazen (sitting meditation) we bow to the floor nine times in front of Buddha's altar, each time touching the forehead to the floor three times and lifting the palms of the hands. (The story of the origin of his practice is that during Buddha's lifetime, there was a woman who wished to show her respect for Buddha, but who was so poor that she had no gift to give. So she knelt down and touching her forehead to the floor spread out her hair for him to pass over. The deep sincerity of the woman's devotion inspired the practice of bowing to this day). In our American culture there are no traditional forms through which we are accustomed to show respect towards a Buddha--a human being, who was not a god and who nevertheless attained perfection. Lacking such forms, there is a danger of neglecting or forgetting to respect Buddha, the Perfect One. This kind of respect is an essential part of the Traditional way. If we practice zazen just for the sake of our own self-improvement or to attain Enlightenment, our practice will be one-sided, and the true spirit of Buddhism will be lost. Because in America there is particular danger of this one-sidedness, we bow nine times to Buddha after each zazen practice, when in Japan it is customary to bow just three times.

Reverend Suzuki's own master, Ian Kishizawa, greatly stressed the importance of bowing in practice. (He himself developed a visible callus on his forehead from his practice of bowing!) Bowing to Buddha is actually to bow to oneself-to one's true nature. You, yourself, are Buddha. In a later lecture, Master Suzuki said that a common misunderstanding of the practice of bowing arises from our dualistic analyzing of the experience of bowing. We always think, "I bow to Buddha." But actually, when you bow, as Buddha himself did, there is no you and there is no Buddha; there is only the independent act of bowing which covers unlimited time and space.

But to say that you and Buddha are one can lead to another misunderstanding for someone who does not have the experience of zazen practice. It is true that you yourself are Buddha, and yet at the same time you are also Buddha's disciple. In the sutras, this is expressed by the words: "Not one; nor two." You and Buddha are one and at the same time two. If your tendency in practice is to there is no good or bad, right or wrong, then the sutras say to you: "Not one?" (i.e., you are not just Buddha, but also Buddha's disciple; you are taking the lazy way out of practice and not trying hard enough; your understanding of Buddha nature and the deep truth of "no good, no bad" is very superficial). On the other hand, if you are unduly discouraged and self-critical, and dismiss your practice as not very good, then the sutras say to you: "Not two." (i.e., you and Buddha are one; on each moment of your practice, Buddha nature is there, whether you are aware of it or not. It is Buddha himself who is practicing zazen; how can you say that it is not good?) These two aspects of reality--the duality of oneness and the oneness of duality--are essential to a true understanding of our bow based on the experience of zazen.

After bowing, the Prajna Paramita Sutra is recited three times: once to Buddha and his first disciples (Arhat); once to the Patriarchs, and once to our ancestors. The Prajna Paramita Sutra is the teaching which Buddha, after his Enlightenment, gave to his disciple, Sariputra, saying: "Form is emptiness; emptiness is form." One meaning of this sutra is that our ordinary perception and understanding of things is illusory. Usually we do not perceive things as they really are. We mistake for real and permanent what is actually constantly changing. This is true of human beings too when they are caught by the idea of self. This theory of the transiency of all things is one of the basic tenets of Buddhism, and an understanding of it is essential to follow the Traditional Way.

Before breakfast at the weekly Saturday morning meditation practice, and before each meal during sesshin, sutras and gathas are chanted. One of the most important phrases in these chants is: "May I, along with all sentient beings, achieve renunciation of the three attachments." "Renunciation" can also here be translated "emptiness" or "detachment." The three attachments refer to the three aspects of giving and receiving: the giver, the receiver, and the gift which is given. Giving should be a free act, unhindered by calculation of amount or reward. The receiver likewise should not be greedy; he should be grateful for what is given to him, but on the other hand he should not be overly humble. And we should not discriminate the gift itself. The attitude of renunciation or detachment consists in not evaluating the thing as good or bad. (Thus it is helpful in our practice to recite these words before each meal).

After going over the sutras and rituals, Master Suzuki devoted the remaining lectures to general discussions of the Traditional Way to help us understand how we can actualize it in our daily lives. The following is the gist of his talk on Wednesday evening of sesshin.

In the morning we say the Prajna Paramita Sutra the first time to Buddha and the Arhats (the first disciples). Part of the prayer that the priest or leader of zazen says at this time is that we may attain sah-myō roku-tsu. San-myō means the three powers of mind; roku-tsu means the six powers of mind; the former contained in the latter. Power of mind means the power to fully understand sentient beings and our own human nature. The first power of mind is the capacity of sight and the second power is that of hearing. To understand someone we must first see with our own eyes and then hear what they say with our ears. The third power is the cognitive capacity to understand the words that we hear. The fourth power is to understand what is really meant by what was said. (Not just to understand the word, but to understand what the person means to say by them.) The fifth power is to comprehend the mind of the person speaking and to understand why he suffers. Finally, the sixth power is to perceive nature as it really is—as pure Buddha nature itself.

In order to obtain to the sixth power of mind, it is necessary to annihilate all evil desires and all thought of self. The way to its attainment is understood in different ways by the Hinayana and Mahayana Buddhists. For Hinayana Buddhists, the lower powers of mind are hindrances to the attainment of the sixth power of mind. But to the Mahayana Buddhist, when you see or hear or think, it may be done in the sixth way. For the Hinayana the lower faculties are obstacles and the seat of evil desires; they tend to take an annihilistic attitude with regard to them. The Mahayana attitude is more positive and not so strict in the physical sense. But with regard to the idea of self, Mahayana is more strict than Hinayana. The sixth power is emancipation from all ideas of self; to perceive in the sixth way is to see or hear or think, but not from an egoistic or self-centered point of view. To have any idea of self involved in your perception is to be prey to evil desires; what you then perceive is not reality and you can have no true understanding of human nature or sentient beings.

There is an old Chinese story which illustrates the power of mind or understanding when one is truly free from any idea of self. A famous old Zen master, Esan was taking a nap, his face to the wall. His disciple, seeing that he was asleep, passed by very quietly to avoid awakening him. But Esan turned over and soon awoke. His disciple said: "Oh, did I disturb you? Why not sleep some more." But Esan only answered: "I had a wonderful sleep and dream; do you know what it was?" His disciple at these words, left the room without replying and came back with a basin of fresh water and a towel. Esan washed his face saying: "That's wonderful!" The a second disciple came into the room. Esan asked him the same question: "I had a good sleep and a wonderful dream; can you tell me what my dream was?" The second disciple left the room and came back with a cup of fresh tea! Esan was delighted with his two disciples. He said: "Why, my two disciples are even better than Sariputra!" (Sariputra was one of Buddha's first disciples, a disciple of great Mahayana spirit, the one whom Buddha addresses the Prajna Paramita Sutra.)

This story has deep meaning. Most people want to help others and try very hard. But it may be quite difficult to know how to help people. In order to help another it may be necessary truly to understand him. For this, the sixth power of mind, or absence of any idea of self is necessary. Our Traditional Way transmitted from the Patriarchs is the way of the sixth power of mind. When you are one with what you are doing, there is no idea of self. The transmitted way of practice is to become one with what you are doing, and to practice without cessation to express this oneness. To do something is to help others, and at the same time to help yourself. When you sleep you help yourself, and you help others too. When you take a cup of tea, you help others and you help yourself. Even if you sit alone in the zendo (meditation hall, you are helping others. And even if you do something quite different, you are sitting in the meditation hall. Practice is one. It is continuous and uninterrupted; there should be no discrimination of activities. Your attitude when helping yourself should be the same as when you help others. You are all quite sincere when you are helping yourselves; how about when you are helping others? We find it easy to want to help those we like.

So practice is not just to come to the zendo and sit in meditation posture; it is everything you do in your everyday life. It is, for example, to anticipate the wish of someone and bring a bowl of water, if such an activity be done with true zazen spirit (without thought of self). If your attitude is right, when you help another, you help yourself and vice versa. Sitting in zazen is the easiest, safest way to help yourself and others. It may be pretty hard to help others by kind words, by giving some good gift, or in some special way. Trying to help often creates more problems than it solves. But if you sit in zazen you will come to respect yourself and others will then respect you. Then you can help them quite freely and naturally, without imposing any burden or obligation or gratitude. (In Model Subject 39 of the Blue Cliff Records (Hekigan Roku), Ungan asked Dogo: "That great Bodhisattva of Mercy (i.e., Avalokishevara, Kwan Yin or Kwannon, often represented with one thousand arms and one thousand eyes, symbolizing the all pervading-mercy) how does he manage to use those many hands and eyes (in helping sentient beings)? Dogo said: "It is like when, in the dark night, we straighten out our pillow with our hand (though not being able to see with our eyes).

If you think zazen is some particular thing you are doing right here, you are quite mistaken. Practice is each moment every day all year long; over and over we repeat our activity. Our practice is like 10,000 miles of iron road. We run on iron tracks in a straight line, never stopping. The tracks are iron, not gold or silver. There is no special way for sages and another for fools; both are the same train. There is no special person for Buddhism, Buddhism is for everyone; there is no special activity of sitting for Buddhists--everything you do should be practice.

You remember the famous Zen master Joshu, the one who always sat in a broken chair. Once a young monk came to visit him, and Joshu asked: "Have you had breakfast?" Joshu was not talking about rice-gruel (but rather enlightenment)! But this monk was very brave and confident, and he answered: "Yes, I have!" (i.e., I have attained enlightenment and know everything and am quite ready to converse with you on any subject!) Joshu replied: "Well then, wash your bowl!"

That is our way--step by step. After eating, wash your bowl. It is always the same on the same iron road. Sometimes you want to take an airplane, but that is not the right way! You should always stay on the train.

There is an old story about three animals crossing a river: a hare, a fox, and an elephant. The hare skipped across the surface (using stones?); the fox swam across, but the elephant walked slowly steadily across, touching bottom with each step. The Traditional Way of Buddhism is the last, and in our practice we should all be elephants.

1964 november (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #73

Sunday, November 01, 1964

Baso's Four Propositions, One Hundred Negations (Blue Cliff Record # 73)

Enso's Introductory Word

Introducing, he said: The true preaching of Dharma goes beyond preaching or not preaching (true preaching is not preaching). True listening to Dharma is not only a matter of listening or not (true listening is no listening). If the true word is beyond perception (true preaching is no preaching), it may be better not to speak. If true listening is something other than listening or not (true listening is not listening), it may be better not to speak.

However, to speak of Dharma without saying anything about it, and to listen to it without ideas about it are perfect ways to transmit right Dharma. This no-preaching and no-listening is all that is needed.

Well, you are in my monastery and listening to my words. But how can you avoid the difficulties to have perfect understanding of right Dharma by words.?

If you have the wisdom to get through these difficulties, I will introduce you to an example to ponder.

Notes by Reverend Suzuki on the above translation.

1. I gave a free but faithful rendering of the original text according to the instruction of my Master , Kishizawa Ian-roshi.

Usually no is negative, but no at the same time is a stronger affirmative than yes. It means emancipation from yes and no. No word means right word under some circumstances, and at the same time, under other circumstances, it means that the connotation of the word should be denied. Saying no form, no color, should be understood in the same way.

2. Sentences in the parentheses are important parts which I translated literally.

3. At the same time, this no gives new life to dead Buddhist ivory-tower philosophy, and to rigid moral concepts and formal rituals. The constant practice of this no has been the history of Buddhism.

Main Subject

Attention! A monk asked the great teacher Ba-so: "I am not asking you about the Four (negative) Propositions, and the One Hundred Negations (of Nagarjuna). But please point out the intention of Bodhidharma's coming to the West (China).

Ba-so said: Today I am very tired and I cannot explain it to you. Go get an answer from Chi-zo. The monk went to Chi-zo and asked him the same thing. Chi-zo said, "Why did you not ask the Great teacher?" The monk said, "I did, but he told me to come to you." Chi-zo said, "Today I have a headache and cannot explain the matter to you. Go ask E-kai (Hyaku-jo). So the monk asked E-kai who said, "I do not have anything to answer in this realm." The monk went back to Ba-so and told him the whole story. Ba-so said, "Chi-zo had a white head, and Hyaku-jo a black head."

Notes by Reverend Suzuki on the above.

The Four Propositions and One Hundred Negations of Nargajuna are as follows:

1. Everything that is, does not come out from itself. (singularity)
2. Everything that is, does not come from something else. (plurality)
3. Everything that is, does not result from adding one thing to another. (existence)
4. Everything that is, does not come out from nothing. (non-existence)

About these propositions, four types of statements can be made: affirmative, negative, affirmative and negative, and the negation of both affirmative and negative.

$(4 \times 4 = 16)$

About these sixteen, three kinds of statements can be made: past, present, future.  $(16 \times 3 = 48)$

And about these forty-eight, there can be two aspects: the actual (the real), and the potential (the ideal).  $(2 \times 48 = 96)$

Together with the original four propositions there are 100 negative propositions.

$(96 + 4 = 100)$

After all these efforts, still we cannot identify either ontological or phenomenal existence, and we cannot find any reason to be attached to some special metaphysical entity or to the phenomenal world.

However, in Note 1 of the Introductory Word, I have explained the true meaning of Buddhist negation. Negation after negation, we turn over and renew our perception and pre-conceived ideas: in other words, wiping out mirror-like mind in each moment, we can observe everything as it is.

Here everything as-it-is means everything means everything as-it-should-be, because everything as-it-is-in-the-usual-sense always should be negated, one thing after another-even though we are concentrated on one thing. The result of the practice of negating everything-as-it-is-in-the-usual-sense is what we mean by everything-as-it-is. The-way-everything-should-be should be accepted as the-way-everything-is. This acceptance should be the most important point in Nagarjuna's Middle Way.

When we practice zazen in the right way, this acceptance takes place. In the realm of Zen-mind, transmitted from Buddha to Buddha, from patriarch to patriarch, there is no noumena or phenomena, no subjectivity or objectivity, no object to be criticized or subject to be critical. Here we come to the true understanding of the so-called non-attachment or oneness-of-duality. In its true sense the Middle Way, which is beyond the Four Negative Propositions and One Hundred Negations, is not different from the transmitted way of zazen. This is the so-called 'Intention of Bodhidharma's coming to the West' or shobogenzonehanmyoshin.

But En-go presents us-his students-with a problem of whether this monk did understand the true meaning of the One Hundred Negations, when the monk asked his question. If he had had a true understanding of Nagarjuna's One Hundred Negations and had asked about our traditional way of practice., his questions should have been at the same time an answer to his own problem. So En-go says: If I had been the monk, I would have bowed three times, as soon as Ba-so said something.

Taking up again the thread of the subject, the monk who thought he knew what the One Hundred Negations were, did not have a true understanding of them at all. And he asked, "What is Bodhidharma's zazen?" Ba-so who knew that this monk was not prepared to listen to the right Dharma, did not answer the question. He only said, "Today I am very tired so I cannot explain it to you. Go ask Chi-zo."

True expounding of Dharma is not done only by preaching. In everything we do at the monastery we should express the true Dharma. The true study of Buddhism is not studied by mouth and ears. To stay at a monastery without knowing one is always amidst the Dharma is quite useless. To seek for Dharma without knowing one is always exposed in the voiceless voice of Dharma was what the monk was doing. Ba-so and his two disciples Chi-zo and Hyaku-jo wanted him to stay out of this kind of delusive study of Zen. This why Ba-so said, "I don't feel well, go get an answer from Chi-zo."

When Chi-zo found the monk coming from Ba-so, in spite of Ba-so's kind instruction, he must have felt helpless and said: "Today I have a headache and cannot explain it to you. Go ask Hyaku-jo."

So the monk went back to Hyaku-jo who, not liking to expose the true way in useless discussion, said, "No understanding is my understanding in the realm of reality."

The monk then went back to Ba-so, the Great Teacher, and told him the whole story. Ba-so said: Chi-zo the white-headed, and Hyaku-jo the black-headed.

I visited the Cambridge Buddhist Association. In Cambridge there is a Cambridge Buddhist Association; in San Francisco there is Zen Center. There is one and yet two, two and yet one, as they should be, as everything is under some particular situation.

Bodhidharma's intention in coming to the West cannot be understood by people who seek Buddhism without knowing Buddhism is everywhere. Salt is white chemical, nearly the same as sugar in appearance. If we do not know which is which, we try a little on some food. We do not take the salt alone, but always with food, as something other than a white chemical, as, maybe, the most important seasoning in our actual life. It is in oceans, rivers, plants, trees, in everything. It is in every food we take. Without salt nothing exists. We say a pickle is salty and that cake is sweet, but in cake there is salt, it makes the cake more sweet.

This is why Ba-so said, "Chi-zo the white head-gear, and Hyaku-jo the black head-gear."

Without the spirit transmitted from Bodhidharma, there is no blackhatted Chi-zo or white-hatted Hyaku-jo. Chi-zo should be Chi-zo and Hyaku-jo should be Hyaku-jo.

Our traditional way of understanding is not different from being concentrated on the actual fact which we face on each moment.

1964 december (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #75

Tuesday, December 01, 1964

Blue Cliff Record #75

Introductory Word:

The treasure sword always is present (beyond oneness and duality). It is a life-taking sword and yet a life-giving sword. Sometimes it is here (in the teacher's hand) and sometimes there (in the student's hand); but this make no difference. gaining or losing it and its positive and negative use are at each other's disposal. Just consider! How do you make good use of the Treasure Sword without attaching to the idea of host and guest, or integration and disintegration?

Note by Reverend Suzuki:

In the last Wind Bell, in the discussion of Model Subject No. 73, I explained the Middle Way or negative aspect of life, which provides us with the full meaning of life in various circumstances. In this Introductory Word, En-go presents the same aspect under the name of Treasure Sword.

These subjects are koans to which Zen students devote themselves with great effort. It is important to confront yourself with the experiences of the old Zen students by reading these stories over and over again. I shall be very glad if you will give my writing your critical attention.

Main Subject:

Attention! A monk from Jo-shu's temple came to U-kyu's place. U-kyu asked him: "Is there any difference between my way of Zen and that of Jo-shu?" The monk said: "No difference." U-kyu said: "If there is no difference, why don't you go back to Jo-shu?" and then he gave this monk a good slap. The monk said: "If you staff had an eye to see, you could not have delivered such a wanton blow." U-kyu said: "Today I have given a wonderful slap," and he gave the monk three more whacks. The monk went away.

The story to this point is perfect, but it continued in this way: As the monk was leaving, U-kyu said: "Originally a blind staff was something with which to slap someone." The monk turned back and said: "A man with a dipper is handling the situation." (This means U-kyu has taken some leadership in the situation). U-kyu said: "If you want the staff, this jungle monk will let you have it." The monk came up to U-kyu, seized the staff and gave him three blows. U-kyu said: "Oh the blind staff! The blind staff! The monk said: "Here is someone who has been hit." U-kyu said: "This monk was hit without reason." The monk immediately made obeisance to him. U-kyu said: "Well, well! Is this all?" The monk went out with a roar of laughter. U-kyu concluded, saying: "So it is! So it is!"

Note by Reverend Suzuki:

As you know, after an unknown southerner came to the north and received the transmission from the Fifth Chinese Patriarch, Zen divided into two schools: the Southern School and the Northern school. The U-kyu of this subject was a southerner and a disciple of the fifth Patriarch. The difference between the Northern and Southern Schools was as great as that between a dragon and a serpent. The Northern School was called the Gradual School while the Southern School was called the Sudden School.

A monk came to U-kyu's place from Jo-shu's temple hoping to study a different way of Zen. U-kyu gave the monk an unexpected question. He asked if there was any difference between his own way of Zen and the way of Jo-shu. But the monk's answer, that there is no difference, is not at all a common answer, when there is indeed a great difference. This monk might have been an extraordinary one. Only a tactful master like U-kyu, would have been able to manage him. Thus U-kyu acknowledge the strength of the monk and gave him the meaningful slaps. The monk appreciated the meaning of the tactful U-kyu. There is not the slightest gap between these two masters' activities.

However, in the realm of the ultimate integration of the powers of teacher and student, one goes with the other. (Refer to Chan and Zen Teaching, Second Series, p.127, and to my interpretation of Model Subject No. 73 in the last Wind Bell). In this realm, nothing takes its own form. The absolute negative aspect is the opposite of the first part of this subject where a good teacher gave a good slap to a good monk; and in the second part, an aged U-kyu was slapped by a bad student with a blind staff. But nothing is wrong with these tactful masters. Sometimes positive, sometimes negative, sometimes in order and sometimes reversed, their great activity has no special regulation. When such activity of two masters ceases to be curios, you will get the gist of our traditional way. All the mysterious powers and faculties depend upon this secret.

The blind staff in this Model Subject means right Dharma--which can be likened to an invisible wedge for the dualistic world: a wedge which gives rise to good and bad, love and hatred, favorable and adverse: the dualistic conflict of the amicable worldly affairs; and yet which keeps the strict unity of our existence.

In the second part of this subject, the situation between the master and the monk changed under the blind staff. The monk seized the staff and struck U-kyu who had offered his own staff to him. Here U-kyu said: "Oh, the blind staff! the blind staff! the monk said: "Here is someone who was hit by it." U-kyu said: "This fellow (U-kyu) was hit without reason." Here we see the blind staff playing the leading part of the role. U-kyu was at one with this monk, and the monk was at one with the blind staff, the symbol of the traditional way. In En-go's Introductory Word, by the 'Treasure Sword' he meant this blind staff. [See Introductory Word to this subject.]

The monk immediately made obeisance to U-kyu. U-kyu said: Well, well! Is that all?" The monk went out with roaring laughter. U-kyu concluded the subject saying: "So it is! So it is!" This 'So it is' is not simple. Let us see Set-cho's appreciatory word.

Appreciatory Word:

It is easy to attract (a serpent by calling with a flute). It is difficult to turn loose. Look carefully at the well-integrated power (of the two). Even though the kalpa-stone is hard, it may be worn away. Even though the ocean is deep it may be dried up. But U-kyu's way will never cease. Oh aged U-kyu! Aged U-kyu! One after another, how many variations have you in your way; if only you had not given that dipper to the monk. (Set-cho is creating a problem for us students.)

1965 (7)

1965 februari (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #82

Monday, February 01, 1965

Dai-Ryu's Immutable Law-Body (Blue Cliff Record #82)

Introductory Word:

Introducing En-go said; Only a man with open eyes knows the catgut line of the fishing rod. Only an advanced mind catches the true idea of the extraordinary procedure. What is the catgut line of the fishing rod and the extraordinary procedure?

Main Subject:

Attention! A monk asked Dai-ryu, "The physical body is disintegrating, but what about the immutable spiritual body?"

Note:

As you may see, this monk is apparently asking a question based on a dualistic idea: an immutable spiritual body and as a disintegrating physical body. However, not speaking of Zen experience or pure Enlightenment, according to the Buddhist philosophical canon: every existence has the same essential nature which is spiritual and physical, permanent and impermanent.

The constituents of every existence are supposed to be the five aggregates (skandas): matter (rupa), feeling (vedana), ideas (sanja), volition and other faculties (samskara), and pure sensation and consciousness (vijñana). Each existence is spiritual as well as material because these constituent elements are sense data itself or the so-called five doors. These elements are not substantial or idealistic, but are pure momentary flashes (of appearance) in the phenomenal world.

Space and time are the same as each existence, and existence can be viewed in two ways: One is as an endlessly changing continuity (in this sense nothing really exists); and the other view is that the world is an eternal moment: each existence manifested in each moment and manifested again in each successive moment. These two views are two sides of one coin, but for this Model Subject let us concentrate on the second view. From this view each momentary existence seems to be independent and disconnected from existence in successive moments. In each moment each existence is perfect and immutable. Although this is true, each existence arises moment after moment contiguous to the existence which came before it and to the one which will come after it and also concurrent with all existences in each moment. Between each successive manifestation of existence there is no connection and yet there is a connection which is in a realm beyond our intelligibility.

This is an intellectual interpretation of the non-duality of duality. Our intellectual desire for the non-duality of duality is really at the same time an absolute desire for attaining the oneness of duality in the pure experience of Zen practice, and our intellectual desire gives rise to right effort (to improve our true Zen life).

However, when the monk asked Daio-ryu, "The physical body is disintegrating, how about the Immutable spiritual body?" his intellect was content with an external observation of the world. His practice was probably aimed at the attainment of some psychological state, and was probably not based on the inmost claim of the essential nature of all existence (as we have discussed it).

There is a saying that if you want a true answer and true meaning, don't ask a question which is based on a dualism (some aspect of a dualistic conception of the world). You cannot understand the meaning of our existence with dualistic ideas. But when you are through with dualistic conceptions and have attained the non-duality of duality, then you will understand the true meaning of the phenomenal world as well as the immutable Law-Body (Dharma-kaya Buddha).

Dai-ryu knew that if he answered the monk's question in a dualistic form, the monk would not be able to get free dualistic ideas, and so Dai-ryu turned to an immediate fact of phenomenal beauty.

It might have been a chilly Spring morning when some early bird was singing, that Dai-ryu gave the monk his beautiful answer, that on the hillside the wildflowers open up like a piece of brocade and down in the ravine the limpid stream never ceases being violet-blue.

Appreciatory Word of Setcho:

Innocent question of an ignorant monk. An accurate answer is given to the point. The moon is cold and the wind is high. Of the cold cypress trees on the sheer frost-bound cliff. isn't it wonderful not to say anything even though you happen to meet an enlightened master! Dai-ryu held the white jewelled whip in his hand and broke the pure black horse pearl. If he had not broken the pearl, it would have caused as many crimes as there are sentences in the three thousand clauses of the law of the country.

Note:

The monk's mistake was that he didn't know how to raise his question about the true way. He was asking a question only with his intellect. Dai-ryu's answer was so precisely to the point that there would have been no time for even an alert fellow to make a retort. His answer is said to be like moonlight which passes through pure water to the bottom without disturbance.

Do not say I practice zazen for a certain time, in a certain place and posture. If you have no time to spare for Zen practice, if you have no zendo, or if you lose your legs, what will you do? Zen is the practice of all existence with everything else, stars, moon, sun, mountains, rivers, animate and inanimate beings. Sometimes the pain in our legs practices zazen. Sometimes our sleepy mind practices zazen on a black cushion, on a chair, or even in bed.

Zen practice for the purpose of obtaining a sort of psychological tranquility or joy or power is called Shu-zen, and is not our true Zen practice.

Each one of us is an independent existence and yet at the same time not separated from other existences. If you find someone suffering, you will naturally be involved in the suffering. When all sentient beings are in the midst of suffering, how is it possible for you to be free from suffering. However, if only you practice zazen when you are suffering, the suffering mind will practice Zen instead of you. In other words, the suffering you have, will drive and help you to attain the singularity of your mind.

On the other hand, if you practice zazen to overcome your suffering, or to keep suffering away from your self, then suffering or the fear of suffering will prevent you from attaining the singularity of mind. We must know that all the difficulties we have are incitements to right zazen, and not obstacles. Even though you can attain the oneness of your mind, this state of mind may be some special psychological tranquility or joy to which will be attached. Set-cho says such a state of mind is a pure black horse pearl which should be broken by Dai-ryu's white jewelled whip.

Once you attain singularity of Mind, then oneness of mind and body, oneness of the subjective and the objective world, and the oneness of duality is also attained. You accept everything as it is. Everything that exists is your own.

Should you expect some outside help? Should you expect to attain something especially valuable only for you, knowing that it will create anxiety about losing it?

This is why Dai-ryu said, "On the hill mountain flowers are coming out. Down in the ravine indigo pure water is flowing."

In his Appreciatory Word about Dai-ryu's answer, Set-cho quotes Kyo-gen (famous for attaining Enlightenment hearing a stone hit bamboo), "Wonderful not to say anything to an Enlightened master whom you may happen to me!"

1965 april (1)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #84

Thursday, April 01, 1965

Yu-Ma's "The Doctrine of Attaining Non-Duality" (Blue Cliff Record #84)

This Model Subject is about the Yui-ma-kyo (the Vimalakirti-nirdesa Sutra). This sutra is as famous as the Sho-man-gyo (the Srimala-simhanada Sutra). Both sutras relate stories reputed to have taken place during the time of Sakyamuni Buddha, and both have great Mahayanistic spirit. The hero of the Yui-ma-kyo, Yui-ma, was a "ko-ji" (a householder or lay Buddhist), while the heroine of the Sho-man-gyo was a daughter of King Ha-shi-noku (prasenajit) and empress of a king in a neighboring country. She became an adherent of Buddhism and received "juki" (recognition as one who will achieve Buddhahood), and gave her people a sermon about Mahayana Buddhism in the presence of Buddha.

When Yui-ma was ill, Buddha told his disciples and Bodhisattvas to visit him in his sickbed, but no one could accept the order because they had had a bitter experience with the lay Buddhist before. And his illness was a very unusual one: he was suffering the suffering of all sentient beings.

Mon-ju bosatsu (Manjusri), the Bodhisattva of the Zendo (Zen practice hall), at last came to visit him accompanied by thirty-one fellow Bodhisattvas. Mon-ju bosatsu found Yui-ma in a large vacant room. When he asked what Yui-ma's illness was, Yui-ma said that he was suffering from the same illness of all sentient beings and because sentient beings suffer he suffers. He said that he wanted to provide a perfect remedy for all who suffer from ignorance and passion. After asking questions and giving answers to each other, they revealed how to attain a true understanding of the non-duality of phenomena.

To these two typical Mahayana sutras and to Myo-ho-rence-kyo (the Saddharma-Pundarika Sutra), the famous Japanese prince Sho-toku (574-622) who built Ho-ryu-ji, (the oldest wooden temple in the world), wrote a commentary and delivered lectures to the Empress Sui-ko. This is regarded as one of the three best commentaries in India, China, and Japan. The prince set up the constitution of old Japan based for the first time on the spirit of those sutras.

The ninth section of Yui-ma-kyo is entitled "Doctrine of entering into non-duality", and this is also the title of our Model Subject No. 84.

Introductory Words:

Introducing Engo says: There is nothing to be decided upon as right (unattachment) or wrong (non-discrimination). If we get away from right or wrong and forget all about attaining or losing, we will become utterly naked and independent. Now what is in front of us and what is behind us? Some monk may come out say: In front of us there are the Worship Hall and the Temple Gate, and behind us there are the Sleeping Room and Sitting Room of the Head Monk (Ho-jyo). Can you tell me that this monk has open eyes or not? If you can, I will allow you to see men of old (Yui-ma and Mon-ju).

Note:

"Ho-jyo": Literally "ho-jyo" means a ten-foot square room in Chinese or Japanese. It now means the sitting room of the resident monk or priest. Sometimes we address the resident monk or priest himself as "Ho-jyo." The source of this Zen Buddhist custom originated in a very dramatic story about Yui-ma of this subject, a story which likewise can be found in the Vimalakirti Sutra. Yui-ma is said to have been living in a ten-foot square hut in Vaisali and at one time would have accepted 32,000 guests in it! (32,000 means innumerable or all sentient beings; in his room Yui-ma suffered their suffering).

"Oneness of duality": This doctrine is the essential teaching of Buddhism. Oneness and duality are two sides of one reality. Reality has two inseparable sides like a paper-slide picture. Both the reading side for a teacher and the watching side for children are needed. If one side is set apart from the other, it is no longer a paper-slide picture. One side of Reality is diversity, and the other side of it is universality. When universality reveals itself in the diversity phenomena, then we have universal validity which at the same time has the deepest personal meaning. Universal truth is perceived as unique and personal to yourself alone. Enlightenment is the acceptance of all teachings as if they were only for you yourself. From this acceptance springs a great gratitude to all the Buddhas.

Above the earth there is sky, below the sky there is earth. In the light there is darkness, in darkness light. The sun shines on the moon, and the moon reflects the sunshine. The good exists because of the bad; the bad exists because of the good. There is nothing good or bad by itself. If you have understood what is good, you have understood what is bad. The good is something you want to do, and the bad is something you do not want to do. Once having decided to do or not to do something, it is what you actually do that counts. Within this comprehensive understanding of reality, everything that exists will in its true sense be the aim of your activity and will encourage your practice.

Main Subject:

Attention! Yui-ma-kitsu (Vimalakirti) asked Manjusri: "What is Bodhisattva's doctrine of attaining non-duality?"

Manjusri said: "In my comprehension, on each doctrine there should not be any word, any verses, any interpretations or any understandings. This is the true entrance to the doctrine of non-duality, and all discussion about it makes no sense. This is the doctrine of attaining non-duality."

Then Mon-ju asked Yui-ma-kitsu: "Each one of us already has finished giving our interpretations; what is your explanation of this doctrine of the oneness of duality?"

Here Set-cho said: "What did you Yui-ma say? Did you understand?" (Set-cho was the compiler of the Blue Cliff Records).

Each one of the Bodhisattvas had tried their interpretations on the supreme doctrine of non-duality. When Yui-ma was asked to give some interpretation to the doctrine, he did not say anything about it. None of the other interpretations were better than the silence of Yui-ma.

If you understand this Model Subject in this way only it may not be perfect, because Yui-ma's silence was not just to keep his mouth still. Set-cho was very kind to us just to leave this point to our own effort, so that we would not be caught by Yui-ma's powerful silence. Yui-ma's way, including his silence, is a good example of the Bodhisattva's way" to help others before helping himself, through suffering the same suffering with others, in accordance with the circumstances and the temperament of the people.

Appreciatory Word:

Totsu! Foolish aged Yui-ma![1] Grieving for the people who suffer in vain,[2] he helplessly laid himself in the sickbed at Vaisali. His whole body was withered and exhausted. When the teachers of the seven Buddhas came, he tidied[3] up his room thoroughly. earnestly he asked them about the doctrine of obtaining non-duality, but when he was asked back about it, he seems to have collapsed.[4] However, he was not broken down.[5] Even the Golden-Maned Lion (Bodhisattva Mon-ju) could not follow in Yui-ma's track.

[1] An ironical eulogy by Set-cho of Yui-ma, who is a good example of the Bodhisattva.

[2] See the quotation from Dogen's Shobogenzo, below:

After all, Yui-ma's silence and his illness should be understood not just as the "finger to point at the moon," but also as the actual practice of the ultimate teaching of Buddha. This is the Bodhisattva's way which is neither for yourself nor for others, but for Buddhism. Dogen-Zen master says: "When you practice right practice, your inner treasure house will open by itself and the treasures will offer themselves for your free use (Oneness of duality)."

"By the Awakening of the Wisdom-Heart is meant the earnest desire to save all beings, even before we ourselves (laymen and priests) have attained Enlightenment. Anyone who cherishes this desire is the great teacher of all living beings. Even a little girl seven years old may be the teacher of four classes of men. This spirituality has nothing to do with sexes or age in the law of the supreme teaching of Buddha (Duality of oneness)."

"The Buddha Sakyamuni is to be found in one's own mind. Find out what this one mind is, and by so doing you will show your gratitude to the Buddha." (Dogen).

[3] He cleared up his mind of discriminating ideas, of gaining or losing, good or bad, and waited for Buddha's disciples' visit.

[4] When Mon-ju was asked about the doctrine of obtaining non-duality, he said: "No words, no verses, no interpretations." But Yui-ma did not say anything when he was asked back about it, just as if he had collapsed. But his "no answer" in this case was the best relish ever given by any disciple of Buddha to the eternal teaching of non-duality.

[5] However, later, even Zen students became attached to his silence without knowing that we should realize the same truth even in the prattle of an old man. Set-cho is said to be very kind in that he did not say anything about Yui-ma's silence so that his students would not be attached to the practice of silence alone. When Mon-ju was talking about the ultimate teaching, the whole world was nothing but Mon-ju's and there was no Yui-ma; and when Mon-ju and the other disciples of Buddha were listening to Yui-ma, the whole universe was Yui-ma and there were no disciples of Buddha. For this reason, you should say that before Mon-ju disappears Yui-ma appears expressing one whole universe in different connotations. This is called the oneness of the duality or the doctrine of non-duality. The Bodhisattva's way of life is supported by this truth.

1965 juli (4)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #86

Thursday, July 01, 1965

Blue Cliff Record #86

Unmon Bunen (?-949) was a disciple of Seppo and founder of the Unmon School, one of five schools of Chinese Zen Buddhism (Rinzai, Igyo, Unmon, Hogen, and Soto).

During the political confusion at the end of the Tang Dynasty all the major schools of Chinese Buddhism (Tendai, Hosso, Ritsu, and Shingon) were in decline, except Zen, which was strengthened by the persecutions and the difficulty in traveling to escape persecution and to visit and to visit various Zen Masters. The hard practice of Sep-po and Un-mon during that time has been and still is a good example for all Zen students.

Introductory Word:

Introducing, Engo said: To control the world without omitting a single feather, to stop all the streams of passion without losing a single drop, this is the great teacher's activity. If you open your mouth (in a dualistic sense) in his presence, you will fall in error. Hesitate and you will be lost. Who has eyes to penetrate barriers of this kind? Ponder the following.

Commentary by Master Suzuki:

"Control" needs some explanation. The man who has realized the wisdom and virtue of the single-Buddha-mind in which every existence is one, does not think, speak, or act in a dualistic way because his view of things, including himself, is based on the inmost request (the activity of buddha-nature, or the experience of buddha-nature as the inmost request) of the self-sufficient mind.

Things are usually viewed as either positive or negative, material or spiritual, objective or subjective. The positive materialistic way of life may be more common and naive than the so-called negative spiritual way of life, and may involve us in innocent but terrible competition. Eventually this competition requires from itself a restrictive power. At least a person in a summer resort cannot be regarded in the same light as a deer in the mountains. In the negative way of life there may be a resistance to materialistic power or an indefinite feeling of helplessness in the face of materialistic power.

Although amicable and sweet, the more primitive materialistic man is doomed to feel criticized by himself and by others (from inside and outside his heart). Although pure and immaculate, the spiritual man will be condemned completely by material power insensitive to any spiritual subtlety; or he will become lost in a sort of materialistic merry-go-round.

Accommodation of these two opposite aspects will not satisfy our inmost desire. When such accommodation is successful it will result in depravity. When the accommodation is unsuccessful, the friction of the opposites will kindle a formidable destructive fire. It is impossible to ignore these contradictory aspects of our visible world, because they are based on our inmost request for life.

A deeper understanding transcending successful or unsuccessful accommodation of these aspects is needed. Even though everything is observed through sense organs in a necessarily dualistic way, it is possible to not be limited by the duality of the sense world. It may come through hard practice, but the ordinary observation of our world with our sense organs is at the same time holy.

In the realm of real experience beyond intellectual formulation there is no material or spiritual view. The free activity of the mind and the pursuit of material power is our inmost request. The idea of matter and spirit are intellectual formulations which are seen to be non-existent when we resume to the genuine empirical world in which there is no subjective mind or objective material. What really exists is our inmost request-always in incessant activity. In the realm of thinking this inmost request takes the form of mind and its objects. In true living or experience, which is Zen, the activity of thinking and the everyday empirical world is one there, before reflective thinking takes place. The inmost request plus nothing is our true existence. There is nothing to control or nothing to lose.

Main Subject:

Attention! Un-mon introducing the subject said, "Although everyone has the 'Light' within himself, it cannot be seen in one's 'UTTER DARKNESS'. Now what do you think I mean by the 'Light' of everyone. As no one could answer he said, "A temple store house or a gate." Then after a while he said, "It would be better not to say anything, even if it is a good remark."

Note:

By "light" Un-mon meant essential mind or Buddha-mind. Zen Master Dogen said, "Buddha light does not mean blue, yellow, red, or white light. It means the great original light in which plants, trees, and land are perpetually shining. This essential mind cannot be recognized by our five senses or mental faculties. However, all our thoughts and sensations are based on this original vitality. It is because of this vital request (before any empirical thinking) that our mental and physical faculties serve their purpose just as birds know when and where to fly. Because of this innermost request we know what is good and what is bad as a fish knows where to lay its tremendous eggs without knowing why. We want to know when this cosmic world started; but even if we knew the answer to this mystery, we do not know in the same way the answer to why we want to know.

The mystery of why we pursue truth in the spiritual world, or physical pleasure in the material world, should be understood as the vital request of our true nature. Our spiritual and physical pursuit of life is always carried on in the realm of duality and this is the ultimate cause of our suffering in this world (four noble truths). This cause of suffering appears to be dualistic only in the empirical world. But in reality-in Zen practice-beyond intellectual formulation, there is no duality. This freedom does not come from outside nor is it the result of practice. In fact practice is meaningful and joyous because of this freedom. Practice vitalized by our inmost request is self-joyous practice. This practice covers everyday dualistic life. Duality should be realized as oneness, and oneness should be manifested as duality. The joyous continuous effort to realize the oneness of duality is the way to obtain vital religious freedom. Only when we find ourselves actualizing this freedom by practice do we find the incessant shedding forth of Buddha light in our life.

The light should not be sought in the visible objective world in a dualistic way. It is necessary to actualize this light in your everyday life by your perpetual effort.

This Un-mon said, "Temple storehouse and temple gate. But in order to prevent all the disciples, the idle seekers, from being attracted by tentative answers and then forgetting themselves in dualistic thinking, he added, "Even an excellent word is not better than saying nothing.

Appreciatory Word of Setcho:

Each one has his own light. But I have toiled to make myself clear to all of you about the ABSOLUTE DARKNESS where there are neither flowers nor the shadows of trees.

However, when anyone wants to see; who will not see? Only when one does not see, does one see.

Note by Master Suzuki:

Before I add my note, you have understood all about it.

2 - Sesshin Lecture

Monday, July 26, 1965

Sesshin Lecture
San Francisco

My talk is always-at the conclusion of my talk is always why we should practice zazen. Now this is not-my talk is not just cordial talk and, basically, my talk is based on Shobogenzo. Fortunately we have a system of-we have complete system-how to understand true religion. The true religion cannot be understood by philosophical way or scientific way. The only way to understand or to realize our true nature is just true practice. Without true practice it is impossible to realize our true nature. Of course, what we do, whether we are aware of it or not, what we do in our everyday life is based on true-our true nature. True nature drive us to do something but if you do not understand, or if you do not realize your true-what is true nature, and if you have no system to know the actual meaning of your true nature, you will get into confusion.

There are many and many scientists who become interested in religion, it is true. Some of them perhaps interested in true religion, but some of them will not have the true understanding of religion. As long as there are just-their understanding is just limited in scientific reality, it is impossible to know what is true religion because religion should be understood by religious way. Religion shou- [partial word]-is not understood by philosophy or science.

And some philosophers, of course, may interested in true religion, but it is impossible for philosophers-it is impossible to reach the complete understanding of religion through philosophical study because in philosophical study the conclusion of philosophy will be different. The authority of Greek philosophy is still powerful in this age. So it is very difficult to understand-to reach the true understanding of religion which everyone will agree with it.

So-but Soto school has pretty deep philosophy, but as I said last night, the Shobogenzo or the philosophy of Zen is just a lid, just a cover of a pan because people may be interested in Zen, but it may be rather difficult for them to know what is true Zen. Without some intellectual understanding, it is difficult to figure out what is Zen. So that is why we have philosophy of Zen. But [laughs] by philosophy you cannot have true understanding of Zen. Zen should be understood by Zen, by practice of Zen, not by philosophy, even by Shobogenzo, even reading-even by reading Shobogenzo, you cannot [laughs] understand what-you cannot realize what it-actually realize what is Zen. So only way is just practice Zen which-right understanding-if you do not have right understanding, the-your practice will be mixed up with some other practice. And that is why, I think, in America there are so many misunderstanding of Zen.

So, by Shobogenzo, we have to polish our practice and we have to keep various misunderstanding-keeps our practice Zen from various misunderstanding. That is why we have Shobogenzo. That is why in sesshin I should talk. This kind of talk is not, you know-the purpose of my talk is not to give you some knowledge, but to-by my talk I want you to-I want to encourage your practice without being interested in philosophical bits of our system. In this point if you make misunderstanding, the result will be pretty serious.

And fortunately, our system of encouraging people is the same-is the same as other schools-philosophy of other schools. So if you understand Shobogenzo, you will understand some other schools, and why there are so many schools in Buddhism. If we do not have this system of various schools in Buddhism is quite different from other schools, and there will not be any connection with each other. With this system, we will-each schools-we will find out the meaning of existence-why Soto Zen like this, why Rinzai Zen like this, why [1 word unclear] school exist, why Tendai school exist, why all those schools are important. Unfortunately, it is rather difficult to translate Shobogenzo in English, but we are making effort to do it. And many scholars had given some interpretation, some modern, some up-to-date interpretation to it. So if we only have time, it is not impossible to give you complete system of our understanding of Buddhism.

We say we have two kinds of knowledge: intuitive knowledge and-and thinking, discriminating knowledge. The scientific knowledge and the philosophical knowledge is the dualistic thinking knowledge. As long as we use word and we think by words, it is impossible to reach the absolute conclusion. When we just resume to our own nature, which is universal to everyone, we can achieve-we can realize our true nature, which is universal to human being and even for animals and plants and everything-existence. And that is why in Zen practice we stop our mind. We do not put any consideration to our sensitive [partial word]-sensitivity or thinking. Whatever image come, you just accept it and let them go out. [Laughs.] And whatever sound you hear, you let them come in and let them go out. When you do not pay any attention to outward objects, you will find out your true nature.

This true nature, when you are healthy and practice zazen in this way, it-it is just calm and some inexplicable thing itself. But when you have some actual problem-when you have pain on your legs, you will have direct experience of [laughs] your true nature. But, you know, don't mistake: that is true nature. That is true nature plus something-plus your painful legs. Something is added on true nature, and true nature takes the form of pain. This relationship is very important and if you understand this relationship-your true nature and your pain-there's a key to solve all the problem of life. Through problem we will realize our nature, true nature. When we-when I am hungry, what I feel is what you will feel when you are hungry [laughs]. There might be some difference, but not much difference. And how you feel when you sit is how everyone feels when you sit. Strictly speaking, that is enough, even though you do not attain enlightenment [laughs]; if everyone sit and find out how you feel when you sit, that's good enough. We will-in this point-we will reach some agreement. But if you are caught by some fancy idea of religion-there may be various religion-and you don't know what religion is yours [laughs]-Buddhism, Christianity or Indian religion or some folk, native religion-you don't know what to choose. Sometimes everyone-every religion looks like same. Sometimes it doesn't look like same. But when religion is studied the most simplest way, the most universal way, [2-3 words unclear] want of sleep or hunger or pain or-we will reach the universal religion-universal religion even to animals. Here we have common playground. Everyone will play in this common playground.

So you shouldn't have-according to Buddha or our patriarchs or founder of various religion-you should not have too fancy idea of religion. Religion should be understood the most foolish [laughs] man, not [one word unclear] wise man. Wise man's religion is compli- [partial word]-very complicated and very fancy. If his [1-2 words unclear] too great, you will-you will be attached to his religion. That is good. If you really want to do it, that's good [laughs]. Just because of the name or, you know, some gaining idea. We should not attach to some particular religion. That is why we say don't study religion with gaining idea-gaining idea. Gaining idea is not-gaining idea is not based on your true nature. That is very superficial desire-not so deep as your hunger. When we give up the various gaining idea, we will find out our true nature. And this true nature is very primitive, of course. And at the same time it could be very, very refined and deep, lofty idea-desire. And this primitive, fundamental desire [two words unclear] true [one word unclear] and various possibility. But if you start from fancy idea of religion, you will be con [partial word]-more confused. So to realize why we study-why we study religion is to find out the meaning of our fundamental desire-how important it is, and how miraculous it is. And how much prosperity it has.

Now when we-all of us is concentrated on this point, there will not be any religious sectarianism. Because we start from some particular philosophy of religion, we have various sectarianism. When we have just one lid, just one cover, which covers various pan and bowls [laughs], there will be no problem. Our cover, our philosophy, is not the same philosophy as usual philosophers will provide for us.

Today, I just gave you some general-general of-idea of our system. But this point-we sh- [partial word]-other sort of student-this point should not be neglected. We should be-when we study Buddhism intellectually, we should be concentrated on this point. And as well as your practice. Just practice is not so good because you may practice zazen for sake of something. You will abuse your Zen practice until you mix pure practice with various country or wrong practice.

In short, Soto way is to use everything in right purpose and to put everything, its own-its own place. What should be put on high place should be put on high place, and what should be put of-on the floor should be on floor. In America, you know, you put scriptures [laughs] on the floor where you walk. We don't, you know. But I don't know how to do it, how to treat those scriptures in your way of life. So until I find out [laughs] some way, I don't say, "Don't put scriptures on the floor." But this is not supposed to be put on-supposed to be treated as-as rubbish, you know-as rubbish. This is not rubbish. Scripture should be put on table or altar or in your hand. Those small things is very important.

And this idea-with this idea, we study science: What is science? What is religion? What is Buddhism? There is the way to study philosophy; there is particular way to study science. There is particular way to study religion. Religion should be studied by religious way, not by science. Scientists cannot criticize [laughs] what religion unless he become religious. But-and religious-religion gives-or give way science and philosophy. Define-to find the meaning of science is religion. To find the meaning of philosophy is religion. But science or philosophy-in science or in philosophy, there is no religion. This relation [partial word]-this relationship is very important. Dogen-zenji says, "Our ordinary way-although you know our ordinary way-in our ordinal [ordinary] life there is no Buddha's way. People understand that. Or-I don't know [laughs]-may not understand it, but he says. They may understand there is no ho- [partial word]-it is impossible to realize-to know what is religion in ordinal [ordinary] way. But from viewpoint of religion, there is no ordinary [?] life. Everything-what we do is religion.

This kind of system is very important for us. I shall be very glad if you find out why this kind of understanding is so necessary for us. It is very important because it is the only way to find out the harmony in various religion we have. When various religious people understand this [one word unclear], this system, then religion will be one. Not Buddhism, not Christianity, not one school of Christianity or Buddhism. The one whole big family of religious people will be established. There is this possibility in his [Dogen's] understanding.

-----

Slight additions made by Bill 1/3/01.

Transcribed by Judith Randall at City Center 12/2000 - 1/2001.

3 - Sesshin Lecture

Tuesday, July 27, 1965

Sesshin Lecture

For a long time after Renaissance, you have forgotten the value of religion. You try to exchange religion for, you know, science and philosophy. You-you are Christian [laughs], but actually what you have been doing is to replace [laughs] science to religion-to exchange science. And you wanted to establish, you know, human culture, which is quite free from [laughs] authority of religion. You have quite good reason [laughs] in your effort to try to exchange or try to reform your culture before it is too dark [laughs]. Now it is too bright [laughs]. You went to the-too extreme, I think [laughs].

But recently, even though you have excellent-very advanced culture, but there is something-there is something which you don't know what to do-or that is your mind [laughs]. You don't know what to do with this mind. You have various tools, but you have no mind to use it [laughs]. That is your problem, I think. And we, you know, we Japanese people studied what is our mind [laughs], but we have enough tools [laughs], so we become attached to your civilization too much and almost forgetting what we have studied [laughing]. That is our problem just now. So combination of the two will create something wonderful, I think.

If I say, "Treat everything in right way," it looks-it will-it looks like very rigid and formal, but it is not so. This secret of Dogen-zenji will work. Someone said Western people failed in creating their culture by ignoring true-ignoring religion. And Oriental people made a great mistake in abusing religion. The Buddhism is-was too handy, so they-we abused religion too much. So now we don't know what is true religion. Oriental religion is mixed up [laughs], you know. In-in India, in China, or in Korea, even in Japan, Buddhism is so handy that they use religion instead of medicine. They use religion instead of education, science, and every-our culture is based on Buddhism. That is too much for us [laughs]. And you abused [laughs] Buddhism-Oriental people abused Buddhism too much. When you abuse something, you know, the true original advantage will be lost. If you cut paper by razor, razor will-will be blunt? What do you say?

Student: Dull.

Dull-will not be sharp enough. So you should not use razor when you cut paper. That is why Dogen-zenji emphasized the purity of the Buddhism-the religion. Religion should be pure and sharp always so that it can serve its original purpose, its own purpose. Leave every-activity for some other people. We religious people should devote ourselves to the pure genuine religion. And we should keep religion always sharp enough to cut various entanglement completely.

This is why Dogen worked so hard. And this is why I came here and why you are studying Buddhism in San Francisco, I think.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Judith Randall. Checked against tape by Bill Redican (1/18/01).

4 - Sesshin Lecture

Friday, July 30, 1965

Sesshin Lecture

San Francisco

Tape Operator: This is the beginning of the 1 pm lecture, Friday.

Suzuki-roshi: If you have a question, please give me. I want to answer about what I told you during sesshin.

Student A: Sensei? I'd like to refer to a question someone else asked a couple of mornings ago, about helping other people. At that time you said that unless a person were enlightened, it wouldn't do much good to help other people. It seems to me that that would mean that probably most people in this room should not do anything for anyone else. I doubt we're all enlightened in this room, and since I have been thinking of [it], I wonder if you could expand on this idea?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. "Enlightened" means, maybe, many things. And in the word "enlightenment" is very wide. So "enlightenment" does not mean to attain perfection, you know. Bodhisattva-for bodhisattva-bodhisattva's way is to help others, even before he save himself. That is bodhisattva's way. So the point is how to help others, you know. Enlightenment-enlightenment, or bodhisattva's mind-I have to go back to my talk about bodhisattva or bodhisattva-mind.

Bodhisattva-mind is, in your philosophy, it is "normative consciousness,"[1] you know. To-to-to do something, to seek for-pursue for good or pursue for truth or pursue for beauty. Those are "bodhisattva's mind" in narrow sense. And-but that was not satisfactory conclusion for the-your philosophers. So at last they-they refer to religion. Of course, here they mean mostly Christian type of religion.

And they refer to holiness. The holiness is when three kinds of pursue-good and truth and good and beauty-get together and work for one thing, that is holy function of our mind. Still they insist [it is] their mind, not [laughs] God-God's mind. But whatever they say, the actual meaning is the same. The word is different. They call it "human holy function" [laughs], but that is actually holy function of God. But they call it "God's function."

So here, even so, it is just entrance of the idea of Eastern-Eastern idea of religious life. In East, it was maybe about two thousand years ago, they-they have same-exactly the same philosophy. And oneness of the three functions is the-they acknowledge those three function. If those three function work together, that is buddha-buddha's mind. But that was two-about two thousand years ago. And after that [laughs], in East and West, many progress was made.

And in Zen, at least, "to help others" means, you know, we do not take it in dualistic sense. "To help others" means to-to think [of] others as a part of you. Not "others"-not-"you, yourself." You think to help others is to help someone-some imperfect person helps people. But when we say, "to help others" in our sense, it means to consider people a part of you or a part-it is like your hands or your body.

So in this sense we help others, you know. Not to help someone else-when you think-understand "to help others" in that way, there is big misunderstanding. And there will be big confusion between worldly activity of helping others-social work-and religious help.

There is some-there is clear distinction between social work and religious work. Do you understand? The social work is based on science and sociology. And sociology is good, you know. Of course it is good. And it-there should be-we should have sociology. And we have full understanding of sociology. But to help others in religious sense is quite different from social work.

So what I mean is, if you want to help others, you know, you may-to work at hospital is, you know, to help others. If he is religious person, to work at hospital is our practice, without changing anything. For us, sociology is-those who understand religious way-for those who understand religious way, there is no sociology. Sociology [laughs] is itself, you know-without changing anything, that is religious activity for a man who knows how to help others. But [for] those who do not understand religious life, sociology [is] just sociology. And he will ignore religious life. So it will not work properly. Some confusion will be created. So that is why we-all of us should believe in-or all of us should have religious life.

But to seek for-but we have various science. We have-we should have science.

Student A: But then for a religious person there's really no such thing as help. Simply any religious person acts in each situation, reacts with each person in a way that's appropriate to that situation. There's no idea of "I am helping you." But it's simply, "This is what is to do now."

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student A: And so there's no-no idea of "I am helping another person."

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student A: Then you just do the right thing at the right time.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, yeah. [Laughs.] That is so. And, you know, he-now, you know in Western philosophy, they-they had to-normative consciousness, you know, in realm of ethics they had. Ethics is normative science. And religion is, you know, nearly-in Western philosophy it is nearly the same, you know. It is based on normative consciousness. And consciousness, you know-later when impressionism become popular, especially-consciousness itself comes from our experience [laughing]. Then there is no place for God, you know. Even the voice of conscience is result of our everyday experience, and then there is no seat for God.

So in this way, more and more, our life become far away from religion. Actually, you believe in Christianity. Many people believe in Christianity. But actually they are far from religion.

Student B: What is there about Buddhism which we don't know but which is always there?

Suzuki-roshi: Why we say "don't know"- "don't know" means [laughs] "beyond science or philosophy." Philosophy is science, but-beyond science. Science is study of act- [partial word]-shadow of actual life [laughs]-study of dead corpse of human being [laughs, laughter]. So we say "beyond." But it is evident-what do you call it in English?-"ultimate truth"- "ultimate," not "truth," but "ultimate," you know, something-some-something which does not want any explanation [laughs]. Right there. That you suffer is, you know-no one can doubt that you have suffering now. As long as there is suffering, "you" is here.

Student B: What is Buddha?

Suzuki-roshi: Buddha?

Student B: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: Buddha-"buddha" has many meanings, you know. Historical Buddha is-Buddha who attained enlightenment is Buddha. But in this case, to attain enlightenment-it does not mean who has-he did not[2] have buddha-nature before he attained enlightenment. He found out what he had. That is enlightenment. And he-this kind of person is enlightened person.

So-and when we do not-when we are confined in scientific world, we have no chance to find out the actual reality. So they are not buddha because they don't know it [laughs]. But when he is-he become aware of true reality beyond science-more actual reality than science, or the man who found out science will not-do not satisfy him, he is buddha. That is enough, you know.

So-so in East-West that was called "normative consciousness." But if you say "normative consciousness," it-it-nearly-it is nearly the same as ethics. So maybe for Christianity [laughs] there is no difference between religion and ethics. I don't know. I must [laughs] say I don't know. But it looks like maybe so, you know. As long as they have absolute dogma, you know, that is: "You should not do so. If you do so, you will be," you know, "punished." This is nearly the same as ethics. As long as when you want to study, you know, you cannot go further. But Buddhism allow to discuss further more. You can criticize more. There is no barrier.

So that is why people are interested in Buddhism, because we have no, you know, borderline for religion.

Student C: Is it ever permissible to help others by killing?

Suzuki-roshi: By killing?

Student C: I mean, would it be possible for a bodhisattva to be a soldier?

Suzuki-roshi: No, I don't think so. Because human life is absolute-has absolute value.

Here there is contradiction between science and bodhisattva-mind. But here you have to deny the-the idea of utility or science. This is very subtle and very interesting. You know, someone asked me-it was last-was it last night?-if you-our law should punish people-a man who-who committed suicide [laughs, laughter]-along with a man [?] who killed-who killed someone else? That is true, you know. To-it is same-crime is the same as, and more serious to kill a person-to kill he himself than to kill some other person. He should protect his [laughs] buddha-nature. To protect his own buddha-nature is to protect others' buddha-nature, because others are a part of you.

So forgetting all about protecting himself [laughs], to protect others means just, you know, just dead rules. Just rules, you know. It means nothing for you-to you. When you want to help others or protect others, you can help others. There is no reason why you protect others. It is same thing to help yourself, you know-to, you know, to protect yourself from danger. That is pure bodhisattva's way.

So forgetting all about [laughs] helping himself, to try to help others is just moral rule-dead rules. And you are bound by the rules because everyone say so because you will be punished by it. So you do it. That's all. You-so you don't kill others. So that is the-and if you kill others you are not human being any more [laughs]. That's the limit.

Student C: What is that person which is not a human being?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student C: What is that person which is not a human being?

Suzuki-roshi: You lose the meaning of "human being."

Student C: [Question mostly obscured by traffic noise.] But you would not live [3-4 words] what is it that changed? I mean, he doesn't physically go though being changed. But if I were to take out a revolver and put a bullet in your head, for example, would that make-it would make me less of a human being?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. You are animal.

Student C: An animal.

Suzuki-roshi: An animal [laughing].

Student C: Ah.

Suzuki-roshi: It is true. But you cannot be an animal [laughs]. But if you can [shoot me?], you are an-you are animal. There is no bottom in heaven and hell. Maybe if we do not-if we cannot be a human being, we may be the worst animal [laughs]. Cats and dogs much better than human animal. There is no bottom. The being having four-working with two legs, using two hands, and thinking something-"good and bad, half and half" [laughs]-if that will protect you as a human-you will be protected as a human being, that is big, big mistake. That is abuse of human body-human being. He abuse human being. He treat human being as a lowest enemy or creature. That's awful.

Student D: Was there enlightenment before the original-I mean, the historical Buddha?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, according to Buddha, there were-there were [laughs, laughter]. He was the seventh patriarch or buddha. Before he himself there were six buddhas.

Student D: How about before the first? Was there enlightenment before him?

Suzuki-roshi: Before him? I-I-I don't know. [Laughs, laughter.] He counts many and many millions of years, but it means he is not only the [not the only] person who will attain enlightenment. Everyone-this is everyone's consciousness. So he-he is not only buddha. There are many-Student D: So "the first" does not have the numerical meaning of being first? Is it just sort of all-pervading? "The first" or "the sixth" doesn't have much meaning?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. First and sixth-it is rather, you know-it-it-he-it was-this kind of story was told by Buddha so that people may not make any mistake about-about him. You know, if he said, "I am the first one," people [laughs] will make big mistake [laughs, laughter]. So he said, "I am not the first one." But at the same time, he said, "This is not the first time for me to attained enlightenment. I attained enlightenment many and many times." It means, you know, his enlightenment is for everyone. Everyone has his enlightenment.

Student E: Why is fair to say [2-3 words] us to be enlightenment? Why-why are so few people enlightened?

Suzuki-roshi: It m- [partial word]-why so few people?

Student E: Or are there lots of people? I mean, it's just-I didn't realize that there were a lot of people who were enlightened. Maybe there are.

Suzuki-roshi: But that is want of right understanding of enlightenment. If you understand enlightenment is something which is difficult to attain, that is wrong understanding. [Laughs.] Did you understand what I said now? In-during sesshin?

Student E: In what?

Suzuki-roshi: No? Did you-did you understand what I said, and do you agree with what I say-what I am saying? Then you are enlightened [laughs, laughter]. I think you are still, you know, thinking [laughs, laughter] or wondering-

Student E: I-I don't think I do understand. I mean, I'm trying to understand.

Suzuki-roshi: You don't understand me [laughs]. Yeah, maybe so.

Student F: In this-in this way of helping each other [4-6 words] with words, and trying to convey meaning is very difficult. And it seems to me the-to be very important to-to be able to communicate with another person. And I'd like to know-I say to myself, "What is preventing the lack of understanding when the words are being correctly used?" What is preventing, what is not listening, or what is the disturbance? What is preventing the penetration of this meaning?

Suzuki-roshi: You yourself prevent it [laughs].

Student F: Obviously, but what can be done to help-how do you get through if there's no understanding-say, right now?

Suzuki-roshi: If you-if you are confronting the problem you have, you will understand it.

Student F: But for the other person, how will he understand [1-2 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student F: How will the other person understand?

Suzuki-roshi: Other person doesn't matter [laughs]. You. [Laughter.]

Student G: But when it does matter-when you have to [1 word]-

Suzuki-roshi: No, no.

Student G: -or feel his innermost need [2-4 words].

Suzuki-roshi: It doesn't matter.

Student G: Does it matter when you want to communicate, when you want to try to help the other person who is obviously [1-2 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: It is-it-most important thing is to understand you yourself is most important thing.

Student F: Fine. And after that?

Suzuki-roshi: After that? After that I don't know! [Laughs, laughter.] You know after that-you will know after that.

Student G: Your answer to that is still confusion in other people, and it is the reason why-

Suzuki-roshi: You are still, you know, thinking. And you are not serious enough.

Student G: Now?

Suzuki-roshi: You are not serious enough.

Student G: Now?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student G: Maybe not, but [?]- Suzuki-roshi: That is-that is, you know, trouble. No other [?] trouble [laughs].

Student G: I wonder if my question is understood.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student G: Huh?

Suzuki-roshi: I understand.

Student G: Ah.

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe [laughs, laughter] I understand your question more than you [laughter].

Student G: Obviously.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughing.] Suffer a little bit more. Then you will understand.

Student H: Can you explain the connection between death or fear of death and zazen?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Yeah. That's very good question. Fear of death, you know, fear of death is in religious-for religious mind there is no fear of death. The fear of death exist in realm of thinking or emotional realm. When you, you know, attach to something, for an instance, you will have-that is the beginning of the fear of death. When you attach to your body, that is fear of death. And when you don't know what you will become of-what will become of you, you will, you know, become very uneasy. That is fear of death.

But for a man who has-who become aware of his inmost request or his inmost nature or his absolute nature, that is more important thing than your physical body. It is so. When you are not serious enough, you know, you-you have fear of death. But when you become very serious about you yourself, you will, you know, you will not afraid of-you will not be afraid of to lose your body. That is what I am [laughs] telling him, you know.

Student I: What relationship does anyone who has studied Buddhism have to organizations that work against killing such as peace organizations or civil rights organizations?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Peace organization or-

Student I: Civil rights-civil rights organizations.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student I: Should one who is studying Buddhism have a relation to the world?

Suzuki-roshi: I think Buddhist should have deep concern about those movement. Buddhist should concern if it is, you know, right. But we should not be mixed up, you know, just-organization itself and our true desire to help others. And the best way may be to allow true spirit of a peace movement for people is the best way, I think-

Student I: How do you-

Suzuki-roshi: -in its true sense. So the most important things is to spread Buddhism-to make them known what is Buddhism is the best way. We cannot do it by number. We cannot use everyone's right-we cannot abuse everyone's right by number.[3] This is very delicate question, I think.

But the most important thing is to realize the oneness of the human being. This problem should not be cut off from other problem. Sometime, you know, people do two opposite things. Some- [partial word]-in one hand [laughing], they work for civil rights, and on the other hand, they are doing something opposite. This kind of mistake is pretty common. So even something good should not be cut off from our life as a whole.

Even enlightenment should not be cut off from "me," you know. "Ten years ago I attained enlightenment. [Laughing, laughter.] But it doesn't work today." It is enlightenment ten years ago. It is impossible to cut off the enlightenment from my life and present the enlightenment to someone else. "This is my enlightenment." This is impossible. Enlightenment should be here, you know, now, in this moment.

So even though some movement is good [laughs], it shouldn't-should not be cut off from our everyday life. As a part of everyday life, we should participate [in] the movement. Then movement will be successful. Only Sunday or [laughing] Saturday to join the movement-to make procession-that's not so good way, I think.

Student J: I'm very curious, Sensei-I mean, the purpose of these questions and the result of these concepts [?], and not that would appear to [4-5 words]. What does it mean to be serious? I mean, not- not just about something, but just to be serious? Is it something that- that we can say that we're familiar with? Or is it something that-Suzuki-roshi: When you are compelled to do something, that is serious.

Student J: Again, please?

Suzuki-roshi: When you are compelled to do something, so that you will become very serious.

Student K: How could we understand our own discipline? That is, how can we-what attitude can we take towards discipline ourselves?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah. Yeah. That's very good question. And it is difficult to know by yourself, actually. So that is why it is better to practice with people. If there is some, you know, some set-up rules or, you know, explanation, it may be easier. But unfortunately, we are not same, you know. So the practice is for you, and you are practicing. So strictly speaking, there is no set-up hope [?] of practice. And there is no rule, strictly speaking, or no standard to say this is good or bad, or right or wrong. That is why we emphasize the buddha-nature. Unless-if you do not have the idea of buddha-nature or inmost request, you have to be concerned [with] some visible rules, and you have to be attached to something. And that will not work so good, you know. So the best thing is to confront with your problem. That is the best way. And to suffer and to struggle [laughs] is the best way. Then you will have more and more-your-you will have deeper and deeper religious experience.

Student L: Was there some distinction between having an idea of buddha-nature, or the word buddha-nature is [?]-and buddha-nature?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Bud- [partial word]-idea of buddha-nature. There is no idea of buddha-nature, you know.

Student L: Well, I seem to [2-3 words]. Until you have an idea of what buddha-nature is-Suzuki-roshi: There is no idea of buddha-nature or for buddha-nature. But there is many idea of many things. Se we count, or we qualify various idea one by one. Then you will-something which is left [laughs] is idea of buddha-nature.

Student L: Yeah, well, when-when-when you have systematically [3-5 words] and gotten closer to the-you've eliminated all the wrong answers and the wrong ideas-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student L: -and are left with-with few possibilities and can-and narrowed the buddha-nature down to-to a smaller area, well then where do you go from there to buddha-nature? I mean-

Suzuki-roshi: So already-concept-in your concept, you know, you will-your concept will be limit- [partial word]-of buddha-nature will be-will become smaller and smaller and smaller, you know. Not smaller, but like this [probably gestures] rather than like this.

Student L: Then it disappears?

Suzuki-roshi: No. [Laughs, laughter.]

Student L: I mean [1-2 words].

Suzuki-roshi: If it disappear, it's wonderful [laughs, laughter]. You know, there-you [the West?] tried for a long, long time to [laughs] take off the idea of holiness, you know, and establish human authority in intellectual realm. And they thought it will disappear [laughs], but fortunately or unfortunately it didn't [laughs]. So the idea of holiness itself still in-not question, but they found out it is impossible to, you know, to give some interpretation to it. It is like this so no way to catch it. If it is on the-some surface, it is easy-may be easy to pick up. But it is like this [probably gestures], so bottomless. And it is too deep to reach. But still we know [laughs, laughter]. We should acknowledge it, but it is impossible to take it up.

In-in that center we exist, you know. So if you try to understand you yourself, there is no way to reach you yourself. Even though you suffer and struggle for-if-even though you spent whole life to reach to yourself, it is impossible. It-so I think someone who attain perfect enlightenment-someone who say-who thinks he attained perfect enlightenment may be crazy [laughs]. The enlightenment is not such a psychological state of mind. Because of his poor understanding of our true nature, he can make such a hasty statement.

Student M: Isn't it true, Sensei, that any idea of the thought of enlightenment is an obstacle? You said about thinking [6-8 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: If there is some obstacle, it may be easy to take it away, but [laughs] actually there is no obstacle. The o- [partial word]-the only obstacle which exist is the obstacle which do not exist.

Student M: All right. Fine. But still, but isn't it so that this-that this concern about the self-about enlightenment-whatever that is-and all that other stuff-isn't it-isn't that an obstacle?

Suzuki-roshi: No, no. It does not-you cannot compare with the enlightenment with some other stuff.

Student M: Well, [1-2 words] it is true, I just object that-that-I meant to say that I think that quite possibly the idea of preconception is a hindrance or is an obstacle to [1-2 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Obstacle-by "obstacle" I don't mean a pre- [partial word]-just preconception, or idea, or, you know-I mean the way-wrong way to try to reach it. The way is not right.

Student M: This is an obstacle, no?

Suzuki-roshi: The-not-not obstacle, but way to reach is not right way. You are finding, you know, a fish on the tree [laughs]. That is obstacle.

Student N: Why-why do we keep dreaming-the dream of the self-why-of the small self? Why do we cling to it and not see it, or why else there would be [1-2 words] selfishness? Why does it seem so important that we can't see past it?

Suzuki-roshi: Dream. I am sorry-I-I have very little knowledge about psychology.

Student N: No, no, but you used the word "dream" yesterday, I think, for the "dream of the small self." It-it's just a dream.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. "Dream" is the dream of small self, you know. But big self is-will admit the dreams comes out, you know. Then-so if you have-if you realize the big self-the dream will not bother you. The-you will welcome dreams. "Oh! That's very interesting!" [Laughs.] But if you, you know, if you have just-if you have no capacity or no-no container to-to accept the dream, you will suffer, that's all. Of course, it will have some meaning. But that is habitual-your habits, you know. It is like drinking or smoking or, you know, telling words-some good and bad habits [laughs]. Good and bad habits. Bad habits [laughs] will makes you dream, you know. The habits, I mean-in-in wide sense, if you-because you are too much to-attached to visible world, you still have vision in your dream. But our visible world is not visible-is not-it-it is important, but-

Becau- [partial word]-when we have, you know-we live in big invisible-invisible world. Visible world is not so big-big enough to be bothered by it. So, you know, to sit is to live in invisible big world. So sooner or later we may die, and we go to the same place when you sit. That is the place where you will go [laughs]. But for someone just to sit in dark room where there is no sound ...

[Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... fear maybe. That is death. So for people who came out from zazen, there is no fear. For the people who is going to the, you know, zazen state, there is fear of zazen because they don't know exactly what it is.

So if you compare zazen experience and your everyday experience, which is important-which is-you cannot compare, you know, which is big or which is great. There is no parallel [?] even [laughs]. Maybe like this [laughs, probably gestures].

When this world is not yours, it is just a daydream, you know, to talk about math or, you know, cosmic existence, or [laughs] everything which exist. This is big, big statement. You may say, "He is crazy" [laughs], but when it is yours, you know, then no wonder to talk about it. The point is if you had your own mind, you will have your body, and you will have everything else. And wherever you go, that is your home.

But when you have-when you do not have your own mind, and your mind is some subject to study, or subject of psychological study, then you have no "you." You haven't your mind. You haven't your body. You have no home. And you have nowhere to live. That is why you suffer. Still you-you act, you exist. This part of [?] is very, very serious.

So just to have your own mind is the point. Then you will have everything. Then you can help others. Whatever you do, it's all right.

So the point is how do you-how you have your own mind is the purpose of zazen.

If you want to accept your mind, you have to accept everything with your mind [laughs]. It is impossible to accept just your mind [laughs]. Your mind always operates with something else [laughs]. It is impossible to accept just the essence of mind. You translate the jisho, or, in Chinese [English?], "essence of mind." But even though it is called "essence of mind," essence of mind cannot be deprived of. It wants always medium. So you have to accept the medium or mean[s]-mean[s] of practice. That is zazen [laughs].

We have to catch a fish with [1 word] [slaps hands together; laughs]-with a net. Without net you cannot catch fish. Our archbishop[4] always talk about salt. Salt-salt itself is bitter [laughs]. No one likes salt. But if you take it with food, it is delicious [laughs]. If you take it with vegetables, it is delicious. That is how we, you know, appreciate salt and how we appreciate buddha-nature with something.

So if you are not alert enough, you have to suffer [laughs]. Then you will know what is buddha-nature. We are usually very dull and dumb. So we want a lot of suffering, maybe.

We are not like historical Buddha. For him it was not so difficult, even though he was in his court with delicious food and beautiful palace, and many servants, and many waitress. Still he was, you know, sensitive enough to realize the true nature of himself. But for us it is not so easy [laughs].

So I think for-for you American people, it is-it may be pretty difficult to understand-to catch the fish. But if you catch it, it will be a big, big fish [laughs, loud laughter]. By long time you will-long time difficulty, you will catch whale. We shall be very glad if you even catch [?] the tail of the fish or some-what do you call it [laughs]? We don't want the meat-the tiny-what do you call it-scale?-scale of the fish is enough.

Thank you very much.

---

---

Source: Transcribed verbatim from original tape by Bill Redican (11/9/00).

[1] Possibly: consciousness as "ordinary awareness" (per philosopher Lyle).

[2] Double negative: "It does not mean he did not have buddha-nature ...."

[3] By force of numbers?

[4] Togen Sumi, who came from Los Angeles for part of the sesshin: Wind Bell, 1965, IV (4), p. 1.

1965 augustus (1)

1 - One-Day Sesshin Lecture

Saturday, August 28, 1965

One-Day Sesshin Lecture
San Francisco

Tape operator: This is the beginning of the-it will be that we missed this morning's lecture at 9, which was a good one, and this lecture is at-will be at one o'clock, and it's the-this is a one-day sesshin, August 28.

Suzuki-roshi: Confucius said the most visible is the something invisible. There are many proverb-Oriental proverb the same kind in Japanese: "A firefly, without voice, burns its body with enthusiasm, rather than cicada, which is noisy." [1] This is the same-same meaning. Firefly burns itself by its enthusiasm, rather than noisy cicada [laughs]. Do you know insect cicada?

This kind of idea is very Oriental. You say Japanese culture-shibui.

Shibui means "not conspicuous," just common, and not colorful. And it express deep taste. I think those idea is originated our practice. Any tradi- [partial word]-if you want to keep the tradition or culture or heritage, this point is very important. We say this kind of effort is to accumulate unknown virtue or unknown merit: to do something where nobody notice it; to do something fundamental; to devote ourselves mostly [to] the fundamental work.

To set up the foundation is the most valuable work, and if you want to devote yourself, choose some fundamental work rather than visible conspicuous work. We-we have to work with far-reaching plan or far-reaching eyes. The far-reaching eyes, we say kenshiki. This is very important word in Japanese. Kenshiki. Kenshiki is to have far-reaching idea, not temporal work.

Even though we compete [complete?] our merit in realm of visible world, your work will be neglected before you die even. So we have to work for our descendant-for future generation. And we must be proud of doing something which people usually do not realize its value. When you work-devote yourself in this kind of work, you have eternal life. But if you are occupied by near-sighted idea, you will lose your value, and you will not find out the composure of yourself.

In Japan, many and many religious heroes devoted themselves [to] this kind of work. So they were confined-they confined-confound themselves in limited work. We say-do you know Japanese barrel-barrel?-or, you know, in which we keep-a container for shoyu sauce, you know, made of wood [laughs] with bamboo ring tied up-wood-piece of-it is made of piece of woods. My-my pronunciation is not good. What is-"barrel"?

Students: "Barrel."

Suzuki-roshi: Huh?

Students: "Barrel."

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] That is very difficult to say for me. Anyway, the piece of wood does not, you know, work as a container without bamboo circle or bamboo ring [hoop]. If-if we have ring, you know, on our head, we can work. But if we have no ring on our head for ourselves, we will lose the meaning of existence. If you are very clever and capable, you can do anything you like, and people will ask you many things. But [laughs] if you do various things-if you try to accomplish many things, you will not accomplish nothing [laughs]. You will be just a tool of people. If-in that way, if you can really help-if you can help others completely, it may be all right. But if you want to help others in its true sense, it is better to devote yourself for some limited thing.

If you help them when you [they] asked, they will feel very helpful [helped] at that moment-at that time. This kind of help is rather superficial help and casual, you know, help. If you want to help people, you have to devote yourself for some particular thing, and you have to help others with full confidence in your work. Then you can help people spiritually and physically.

But if you try to help superficially, that help is-will sometime or most of time spoil people without [laughs] helping them. But you will spoil them-just spoil them. And mutual help of this kind is-will result [in] depravity.

And so it is the same thing with religion, even though you compare various religion and you take good points of-points from various religion. But if you seek for too much honey from various flower, which is not necessary for you, you will be spoiled by honey. A little bit honey is enough for us. There is no need to be greedy. If it is true, a little bit [of] truth-a faint idea of truth is enough. And you should complete-devote yourself to the truth you have-you-you saw, completely. Then you will find out the true meaning of the truth. It is not matter of which is good or bad. It is matter of whether you devote yourself to the truth completely or not.

This kind of idea is very special to Japanese culture or Oriental culture. In Lotus Sutra, Buddha said to light up-or to lit up one-just one corner--one corner, not the whole-all the world. Just to lit up-to make it clear just where you are. Ichigu wo terasu.[2] Ichigu is "one corner." Terasu is "to lit up" or "to shine" one corner. This is very valuable point-important point in our practice.

It does not mean to be, you know, to be negative, or to be narrow-minded, or to be sectarian. It is a way it should be. And everything exist in that way. Bamboo cannot be a pine tree at the same time [laughs]. Bamboo is always bamboo, so bamboo is valuable. Bamboo and-mixture [laughs] of bamboo and pine tree [will not] serve-serve for anything, because bamboo is straight, [and] pine tree is crooked. So bamboo is valuable, and pine tree is valuable.

So there is no need for us to be famous or to be useful. First of all, we should be-each one should be he himself. Then we will find our world very convenient. If we try to be the most famous, and most useful, and most powerful, everyone will lose the true meaning of our existence. So we say, "When you become yourself, Zen become Zen." When you become you [laughs]-when bamboo is bamboo, that is Zen. When a tree is a tree, that is Zen. If so, we have to realize our inmost nature as a being, or inmost request of ourselves. Inmost request works for every existence in the same way, but as each existence [is] different from the other existence, even though the inmost request is the univer- [partial word]-is universal, the way of expression should be different.

The other day, we Soto followers completed a big building[3] at Soji-ji Temple for the memory of the Fifth Patriarch from-in Japan. Dogen is the First Patriarch, and fifth one-fourth one we call-is Keizan-zenji.[4] And the fifth one is Gasan-zenji.[5] Gasan-zenji had many good disciples. Sometime we count twenty-five. Sometime we count ten. Anyway, he has many-he had many disciples.

When Keizan-zenji saw the Fourth Patriarch-Gasan-zenji-the Fifth Patriarch saw the Fourth Patriarch-Gasan-zenji-Gasan-zenji-although Gasan-zenji was very good, but Keizan-zenji did not allow his transmission. But-and he gave him some question: "Have you seen the double moon?" Double moon.

He couldn't [laughs]-he couldn't understand what did he meant. And he studied and studied and studied for many years-many and many years. And he could [not] understand what did his master meant by "double moon." Although our inmost request or nature is the same, our way of expression should be different-it should be double. It is, you know-my-when I devote myself to my inmost request, you will understand how I-how hard I make my effort to express it. Here we have mutual understanding, but the way you express and I express is not the same. Because it is not the same and it cannot be the same, we can respect each other's effort, and at the same time we can feel-we can tell-we can realize how difficult it is. That is mutual understanding. Here we have double moon, not single, not the same moon. You may say the moon we see here in America [and] the moon they will see at-in Japan may be the same-is the same, but it is not the same. It is double [laughs]. Oh, I don't know how much-how many moons we will see, but the feeling of the seeing-observing the moon is the same. Even though sometime when we see the moon, we will see with tear. Sometime we will see the moon with joy. But the moon is the same. Here we see the double moon. It should be double, but the moon is the same.

So as long as you are caught by the single moon which is always same to everybody, we cannot see the true moon. You are seeing the painted moon which is always [laughs] same. There is no meaning to it.

We say, "a white bird-bird-a white bird-a white bird in the snow-in the snow-in snow." [6] You cannot see the white bird in snow, but still bird exist. When we devote ourselves in true practice, our practice is not visible. But this invisible effort-accumulation of those invisible effort will build up your character, and you will obtain the power to be a master of the surrounding. As long as you are chasing after just visible thing, you will never understand the meaning of our life. This is how we devote ourselves to our way. [Break in tape of unknown duration.]

Student A: I still do not have the general idea. I can see that if we look at the moon, projecting our own emotion, we won't see the moon. On the other hand, we must be one with the moon and must be fair to it in a special way so that it has particular meaning to us, and we experience the moon ourselves. Could you clarify?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. I understand your point, you know. To see-if you want to see double moon-the, you know, the power or-of-excu- [partial word]-let me put in this way. When you-unless you have eyes to see the double moon, you cannot see it. As long as you observe the moon [as] just an object-an object of your eyes, you cannot see it. If you want to see the double moon, you must have-you must build up your character and you must have the power to observe the double moon. In other word, you ha- [partial word]-through your practice obtaining your power to observe it, you can see the double moon. As long as you just seek for-just figure out what is double moon-is this moon is-is this moon-is this way of observing moon is right or wrong in this [?]? You cannot see it. When you are quite sure, you know, in observing the moon, you can see the double moon. Even though you say, "That is just [single] moon, not double moon," I may say, "For you it may be the single moon [laughs], but for me it is double," I may say. If someone say, "It is double," I may say, "No, it is single." [Laughs, laughter.]

It doesn't matter to me whether it is double or single, because I am quite sure about my eyes. So when it is-when you are quite sure with yourself, or when you own your eyes as a sense organ-as your sense organ, you can see the double moon. But when-as long as you are enslaved by your eyes, you are-you cannot trust your eyes [laughs]. So if someone says that is a double or single [laughs], you will, you know, wonder. You cannot trust your eyes. Do you understand?

This kind of strength can be attai- [partial word]-acquired by your own effort, not other's effort. Even though I explain it one thousand time, it will not help you unless you yourself make your effort to-to be sure about yourself. Before you believe in yourself you cannot, you know, see the double moon. Actually double or single doesn't matter [laughs]. That is double moon.

So as long as you are proud of your practice-to be proud of your practice is-you are still relying on something, someone. Because you rely on others-rely on the reputation, you [are] proud of [laughs] yourself. If you are quite independent, you know, you are not proud of anything of yourself. So the Fifth Patriarch in Japan [was] rather proud of his deep understanding of Buddhism. So Keizan-zenji said-did not accept him, you know [laughs]. Naturally [?] you have-you are-you cannot see the double moon. When you forget yourself, you have full strength. [Laughs.] Do you understand? You understand this psychology.

But it does not mean to be lazy or to become wood or stone. That is zazen-Zen. You are alive, and your mind is not working. But you are fully-you are in full activity but your activity is not rely on anything too. That is, you know, zazen. Okay? [Laughs.] Did you understand?

Student B: I-I am curious to know-

Suzuki-roshi: Don't say "curious to know." [Laughing.]

Student B: -whether or not you are [6-8 words]. How did the Fifth Patriarch become the patriarch if he cannot see the moon [?]. I think the Christian mystic formative [?] thought, which was similar to Robert Warren-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: -that some disciples and patriarchs and masters have to be certified for their vision.

Suzuki-roshi: Certified?

Student B: Certified-

Suzuki-roshi: By?

Student B: -verified by a higher authority before impersonating [representing?] the temple.

Suzuki-roshi: Before you-you have full, you know, confidence in yourself, you will not be certified by anyone. Even though someone say you are good, it doesn't mean anything. So your confidence is first. So there is no other way to be confidential [confident] in yourself. We are not talking about something very difficult. If we are quite sincere with ourself and- -selves, and if we are conscientious-not conscientious, but if we are aware of our idle practice and ashamed of it, that's the way. Even though we are not perfect, if we are aware of our imperfection, that is good, very good. That is very good.

And after trying to polish ourselves until we think it is-we are allowed-we will be allowed by our patriarchs, by Buddha, and by our teacher, then you are pretty good-not perfect, but pretty good.

Student C: Sensei, what does sashu [sic] mean?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student C: What is sashu? The sign says, "Walk in sashu."

Suzuki-roshi: Sesshin?

Student C: Sha-sha-

Suzuki-roshi: Shashu.

Student C: Shashu.

Suzuki-roshi: This is shashu [probably gestures].

Student C: Is this also a symbol of the cosmic world [1-2 words]?[7]

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, I don't know. I am sorry [laughs, laughter].

Student C: Well, [4-8 words]. And he said it was like the cosmic world, and I was wondering its history [1-2 words]-

Suzuki-roshi: I don't know. Actu- [partial word]-really, I don't know. [Laughs, laughter.] I get accustomed to this way, you know, pretty early in my age. So I didn't think what it was [laughs]. I will-I will find out by dictionary, but there is usually-there is many interpretation to it [laughing]. We may forget.

Student D: Reverend Suzuki, I've noticed that you have it kind of like this, instead of-Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. That's-if I do it like this, it's not good [laughter]. Should be like that.

Student D: I've noticed it's harder to do it like that. I've been trying to do it that way.

Suzuki-roshi: But it should be like this. This is no good. Maybe when I am talking, my fingers may be like this. This is not good. Should be like this.

Student D: Are your forearms on your legs this way?

Suzuki-roshi: Bishop Yamada told us to do like this, but for someone this is better. But for someone [others], I think this is better-not to rest your hands on your side.

Student E: Reverend Suzuki? In the Lankavatara-sutra they described a buddha as one who controls his outflows. Would you say a few words about that? Or they also used the phrase "non-leakage," which was hard to get [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Non-? Non-what?

Student E: Non-leakage, you know.

Suzuki-roshi: Leaky?

Student E: When a bottle leaks, you know, it comes out the cracks- overflows. Would that contribute to the-to the [1 word] around the head-the ring around the barrel that you were talking about?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughing.] I don't know. That is quite Japanese expression: tangawa honryu.[8] Maybe so. We have many ways of-expression for "one truth." I couldn't understand actually what you said just know. What did you mean? One?

Student E: Well, when I am doing zazen, it seems as though sometimes I have this experience of-of immed- [partial word]-of my-of a non-outflowing, you know, that I'm-it's all staying right within me-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Oh, "outflowing." I see.

Student E: Yeah. Instead of, you know-when you see-when I see-I feel like I'm looking outward, and I feel-oh, like-so when I'm doing zazen, though, that will drop back inside.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student E: And I thought perhaps this is what they meant by "non-outflowing": being able to control the-the outflow of your energy or-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. "Outflow." It is-that is opposite, you know, to our way. Outflow. Comes out-your energy from your-whatever it is, body or mind. You should be one thought [?] or existence when you sit. There is no outside or no inside when you sit. Can you-do you accept this expression?

Student E: Yes. Mm-hmm.

Suzuki-roshi: So outflowing or-it is not even to see inward. It is just to sit. No inside or no outside. Just one existence.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (1/17/01). An edited version of most of this lecture was printed in Wind Bell, September 1965, IV (No. 6), pp. 3-5.

[1] The Wind Bell version reads "The silent firefly, unlike the noisy cicada, glows with light" [1965, IV (6), p. 3].

[2] See also SR-69-12-01.

[3] The original transcript and Wind Bell version added "Taisodo," which should have read "Daisodo" ("Great Monks' Hall"). It is the largest building at Soji-ji.

[4] Keizan Jokin (1268-1325).

[5] Gasan Joseki (1276-1325).

[6] Possibly a reference to Dogen-zenji's poem Raihai ("Worship"): "A white heron hiding itself in the snowy field, where even the winter grass cannot be seen." (Steven Heine, The Zen Poetry of Dogen, 1997, p. 117.)

[7] The student appears to shift from discussing the mudra of the hands during shashu to the cosmic mudra (the position of the hands during zazen).

[8] Phonetic only. Suzuki-roshi did not understand the question, so the translation may not correspond to the question (e.g., it may be a translation of "one truth").

1966 (17)

1966 januari (1)

1 - Shusogi: Sections 11-17

Friday, January 21, 1966

Sesshin Lecture: Shusogi: Sections 11-17
Soko-ji Temple, San Francisco

Tape operator: Sesshin lecture in January 20th-21st, I think, one o'clock.

Suzuki-roshi: The next chapter[1] which we will learn is about precepts. And this is pretty difficult one, so before we study how to recite it, and I want to explain it beforehand.

The precept observation is very important for Zen practice. If we eat too much, we cannot sit. If we do not have enough sleep, we cannot sit. So your-physically and mentally, you have to adjust your life so that you can sit. This is very important point. Zen or Buddhism is actually the way of life, and way of life is the precepts. [Possible gap in recording.] To live is how to observe precepts. It is not some rules of 16 or 250 or 500. There must be innumerable number of precepts. And-so it is necessary for us to have full understanding of precepts and to make effort to observe precepts. So whenever a great Zen master or religious hero appears, precepts observation is emphasized by him. Or before someone appears-some great teacher appears, precepts observation always have been emphasized by many precedent masters. Before Dogen, there were several famous masters who emphasized precepts.

[Section 11] Next we should deeply respect the three treasures: the Buddha, the teaching, and the Buddhist community. In fair way or adversity, they deserve our respect.

Excuse me, maybe they have to put in this way:

We should yearn to respect them and make offering to them in fair way or adversity.

This is literal translation. But here it says: [2]

They deserve our respect and offering no matter where we wander from life to life.

This is more maybe advanced, maybe-not literal but it takes-this express the meaning what he meant.

We should yearn to respect them and make offering to them in fair way or adversity. It was respect for Buddha-for the Buddha, the teaching, and the Buddhist community that was truly transmitted from India to China by the Buddhas and patriarchs.

Buddha and sangha-the Buddha and the sangha, and then Buddhist community is also precepts observation, you know. Those are how we practice Buddhism. So how we practice Buddhism is to keep our precepts. It is-precepts is not just prohibitory precepts. We have three refuges, and three corrective precepts, and ten prohibitory precepts. This is three of the sixteen of Soto precepts or [1 word] precepts.

The three treasures is-has-should be-will be understood in three ways: the manifested three treasures, the supreme one [?], his dharma, and his sangha. This is manifested treasures-manifested three treasures. And maintaining three treasures-Buddha's images, sutras, and precept-priests. Those are meant-those are called "maintaining three treasures." And one body, three treasures. Essentially Buddha. No body of Buddha. The harmonious body of Buddha. This is more philosophical understanding of three treasures.

Anyway, we have to take refuges in three treasures as long as we are Buddhist. And-and then it says:

[Section 12] If the unfortunate and virtueless cannot even hear to [of] the Three Treasures, how can they make refuge in them? Do not take refuge in the spirits of the mountains or the ghosts of the dead, and worship not at heretical shrines. Such refuge-seeking lead us away from salvation. Let us instead quickly take refuge in the Buddha, the teaching, and the Buddhist community, seeking three-seeking there not only release from pain but complete enlightenment.

When we take-when we observe our precepts, may I ask you with what mind [laughs] do you observe precepts? This kind of, you know, story is everywhere in Zen koan. "With what mind do you [laughs] observe those precepts?" This is a kind of tricky [laughs] question. With what mind? If you say, "With this mind-with this kind of mind I-we observe precepts," then it means your mind is separated from the observation of the precepts. Precepts is there, and you are here-your mind is here. That is dualistic understanding. It is same thing when we-will happen if you practice zazen with your mind. Same misunderstanding will happen to you.

Zen practice is a practice which happens within your mind [laughs]- within your big mind. Precepts observation is the-how our life goes in its true sense. That is precepts observation. Precepts-your life goes in that way automatically. That is precepts observation. So if you think the precepts is some particular rules which was set by Buddha, that is wrong understanding. Precepts is the way of life recorded by tape recorder [laughs, laughter] or printed by film [laughs]. That is precepts, you know. If you take a record someone-someone's speech, it will say something, you know, moment after moment. That is precepts.

So if you say, "Printed," you know, "[film] negative is precepts," that is wrong understanding. "Recorded voice is precepts." That is wrong understanding. What I am saying, what I am doing, whatever it is [laughs], that is precepts. So as a Buddhist, it is quite natural for them to observe-to respect Buddha or take refuge in Buddha and dharma and his sangha. In this way, precepts should be observed. In other word, it is sincere effort to-effort to make your life meaningful. This is precepts observation in its true sense.

Do not take refuge in the spirits of mountains or ghosts of the dead, and worship not the heretical shrines.

Because heretical understanding-according to heretical understanding, we take refuge in something, you know, which is different from your-yourself. That is heretical understanding. That is not our understanding. According to our understanding, everything is within our mind. Our mind include everything, and in our mind many things will take place. So when we do not lose this mind, whatever happen to us, that is precept observation. When we are caught by dualistic or something objective existence or idea-objective existence and worship them, that is heretical understanding. So the spirit of the mountain or ghost of the dead and to worship heretical shrines is not our way of observing precepts.

Such refuge-seeking lead us away from salvation. Let us instead quickly take refuge in the Buddha, the teaching, and the Buddhist community, seeking there not only release from pain but complete enlightenment-to complete enlightenment.

When we have enlightenment, many things happen within enlightenment, within big mind. In this case, we call it-we call our activity "precepts observation."

[Section 13] To take refuge in the Three Treasures, we must come with pure heart or faith. To take refuge in the Three Treasure, we must come with pure faith. No matter when-or whether at the time of the Buddha's appearance in the world or after his disappearance-we repeat with clasped hands and bow head-bowed head: "I take refuge in the Buddha. I take refuge in the teaching. I take refuge in the Buddhist community." I take refuge in the Buddha because he is our great teacher. I take refuge in the teaching because of its curative effect. I take refuge in the Buddhist community because here we find wisdom and warmth-warmth-warmth. To become followers of Buddhism, we must uphold the Three Treasures. We must lay his foundation before receiving the moral precepts.

We-before we-before the observation of moral precepts, we have take-we have to take three refuges. And this is those observation of taking refuge in the Buddha, and the teaching-and his teaching, and his community is included in the sixteen precepts.

[Section 14] The merit of Triple Refuge will always ripen when responsible [responsive] communion take place between the trainee and the Buddha. Those who experience this communion-whether deva, dwellers in hell, and animals-or animals-will take this refuge. The embodied merit increase-increases through the various stage of existence and ultimately leads to the highest right enlightenment. Buddha himself confirmed the merit of the Triple Treasures as supremely valuable and inconceivably profound-profound. All living beings should therefore take this refuge.

[Section 15] The next we should accept the three collective pure precepts-that embracing good behavior, and embracing good deeds, and that embracing all being and salvation-saving them. We should then accept the ten grave prohibitions:

Do not kill.

Do not steal.

Do not commit adultery.

Do not lie.

Do not sell liquors.

Do not bring up the faults of others.

Do not boast and blame others.

Do not withhold material and spiritual possession.

Do not become angry.

Do not debase-debase the Triple Treasures.

Those are ten prohibitory precepts. "Do not kill."

It is not-those rules is not manmade-is not supposed to be manmade precepts like social rules, or custom, or rules of some special countries. It is something more than that. It is not manmade one, but based on the truth-a universal truth of universe. If so, it does just mean not to kill. Strictly speaking, we cannot kill anything [laughs]. You think you can do it, but it is impossible. When we realize this, we will not kill anything. We will not try to kill anything because it is impossible. This is one way of observation-observing the precepts "Do not kill." So "Do not kill" is not just matter of-matter of forcing something to others or-or empower a person to do something, or formality observation. It is not-it is something more than that. If you realize this fact, that you cannot kill anything, then you will be free from dualistic activity of killing or not killing.

So "Do not kill" means ex- [partial word]-to extend our life activity or our life. "Do not kill" means [refers to?] sometime lazy attitude, you know, lazy way of life. If you-when you are lazy, or when you are not sincere enough in your practice you are killing [laughs] Buddha. Buddha will not manifest itself. You are keeping Buddha within yourself without doing anything [laughs]. That is actually to kill Buddha or to kill something. "Not to kill" means to do something with sincerity. That is fundamental way of observing precepts. So precepts observation is to do something with your utmost effort. That is how you observe those ten prohibitory precepts.

So negative precepts and positive precepts observation is not different. This is the most important precept.

"Do not steal." When you find out you cannot kill anything, how is it possible to steal something from others? When you have everything, there is no need to steal something from others. When you have no idea of others, when you understand your life [is?] something which is happened-which happens is in your mind, it is not possible to steal anything. That is actually a practice of zazen. When you practice zazen, you practice zazen with big mind-the mind which is not matter of big or small [laughs] [and] with your true mind. That is our practice of zazen. So the practice of zazen is not different from-to-from observation of the precepts.

"Do no steal. Do not commit adultery." You will not attach to what will be within your, you know, capacity. When you think-when you have some object of adultery, you think you can-you will become-you commit adultery. But when-when you do it as if you-as if you-as if your eyes breaks [laughs], that is not adultery. This-there is no need to be caught by some unchaste act.

"Do not lie." You cannot tell lie, you know. Whatever you do, it express your true nature. So you cannot tell lie.

"Do not sell liquors," or, you may say, "drugs." "Liquor" means something, you know, some intoxicating medicine or intoxicating teaching. Those are liquors. Even the Buddha's teaching-even Buddha's teaching, if you sell it [laughs], that is liquor. If you are caught by it, that is liquor. So not only wine or drugs, but also you should not sell anything [laughs]. Do you understand? You should not sell. It should be your life in its true sense. This is very important precepts for us, and subtle understanding is necessary.

We call-Japanese people call sake-do you know sake? Japanese wine made from rice. We make Japanese wine from rice. That is-another name for sake is "best medicine of all the medicine" [laughs]. If you do not intoxicated by it-if you take not-if you do not take too much, that is the medicine of all [laughs]. But when you are intoxicated, that is sake which you should not take or sell.

We say "sell." This is very subtle. "Don't take" is not, you know, adequate enough. "Don't sell" mean-when you yourself [are] intoxicated by something, you know, by-by some gaining idea to make profit from it, or-or you are-when you are caught by something, you will try to sell it to others. "Buddhism is so wonderful teaching! [Laughs.] Why don't you join us?" At that time you are already somehow intoxicated by it. So "don't sell" is very subtle expression. But it means also "do not take it."

But even though-you can take it if you do not [get] caught by it. You can do it. But precepts observation-why we emphasize precepts observation is it will protect yourself from bad habits. Precepts will protect yourself, as our human nature is-has some weak points-so many weak points we have. So it is necessary for Buddha to protect us from evil habits by setting up some rules for us.

But if we are alert enough, we should-wise enough, we should take care of ourselves with alert-with alertness. Not to fell into the pitfall of human nature. We have many danger in our life, and sometime we know it and sometimes we do not know it. So it is necessary for us to have some rules to protect ourselves. And actually, precepts observation is difficult way, but actually it is easy way, you know. Not-difficult way is to-to be-to behave like Buddhist without precept, without any rules. This is very difficult. But if we have some precepts, it is easy for us to observe our way. How do you think [laughs]? Do you think this is just, you know, some-some good explanation of precepts? It is not so.

When I was young, I wanted to remain celibacy. You know, I wanted to-I didn't want to get married, because I know myself so much, I know-I knew what will happen to me if I get married. So I thought I'm not so, you know, good. I know pretty well. So I thought it may be easier to remain alone-to be a Buddhist. This is easy way. But some people may think to get married, to remain Buddhist, may be easier because his life will help him [laughs]. So it may be easier. Yes, in some way it is easier, but it makes-us-makes him more difficult-more difficult to be a good priest.

So precepts observation is very-we should be very-we should be very grateful to the precepts. It is mercy of the Buddha. If you think the precepts will be a bandage for your life, or precept is the rules of your life, that is big misunderstanding. It means your effort is not-you are not sincere enough. You don't know yourself, and you do not make your effort enough to be a Buddhist. When you become Buddhist, you will find the true meaning of those precepts.

And so, the Buddhism is not some knowledge or some philosophy-something to talk about. Buddhism is for yourself. And to study Buddhism is to help you yourself in its true sense. So all the teaching is just within yourselves, not without. The spirit that started Buddhism is the spirit to solve everything as your own problem. That is how to study Buddhism, as Dogen-zenji says: "To study Buddhism is to study yourself." It-from beginning to end, it is study of our life. No one help you. If you expect someone's help, it means you have-you lost your step, and you lost your true mind.

[Section 15, cont.] The Buddha have received and kept the Triple Refuge, the three collective pure precepts, and the ten grave prohibitions. [Repeats.] The Buddha have received-the Buddhas-excuse me-the Buddhas has-have received and kept the Triple Refuge, and the three collective pure precepts, and then the ten grave prohibitions.

To transmit Buddhism is-to receive transmission means to become successor of a Buddhist, you know. So succession of Buddhist life is to receive transmission. So, of course, to receive transmission is to receive Triple Refuge, the three collective pure precepts, and the ten grave prohibitions.

[Section 16] By accepting the precepts, you will attain supreme enlightenment-the indestructible Buddhahood realized or to be realized by the Buddhas of the past, present, and future. Would any wise man reject this goal? To all living beings, the Buddhas have shown that when they accept the moral precepts, they attain Buddhahood-the rank equal to the Great Enlightenment -that-and that they are truly the children of the Buddha.

When you become successor of Buddha's life, you are children of Buddha.

[Section 17] All the buddhas dwell here and embrace everything in their infinite wisdom. All the buddhas dwell here and embrace everything in their infinite wisdom.

All the buddhas is in your life, you know, in its true sense-should be within your life. If so, within your life there should be precepts. And that is, at the same time, practice of zazen.

[Section 17, cont.] When all beings dwell here and embrace everything in their infinite views see no distinction between subject and object-when this happens, all things-whether earth, vegetation, fence post, brick or pebbles-take grace of the Buddhas. The resulting wind and fire, fanned by the profound influence of the Buddhas, drive us to intimate enlightenment. This is the merit of non-doing and non-striving-the awakening of the wisdom mind.

This is, you know, description of our life as a Buddhist.

[Repeats.] All the Buddhas dwell here and embrace everything in their infinite views. When all things dwell here and embrace everything in their infinite views, see no distinction between subject and object-when this happens, all things-whether earth, vegetation, fence post, brick or pebbles, take grace of the Buddha. The resulting wind and fire, fanned by the profound influence of the Buddha, drive us to the intimate enlightenment. This is the merit of non-doing and non-striving-and the awakening of the wisdom mind.

-awakening of perfect wisdom which has no within or without. We call it limitless wisdom-activity of one mind. Here he said "intimate enlightenment." This is something new, you know. You-always you say "great enlightenment" or "highest enlightenment," but Dogen-zenji says "intimate enlightenment"- "intimate enlightenment." Most intimate one is enlightenment. Most intimate one to you is enlightenment. Do you understand? Enlightenment is something within you, or-you cannot say "within you." If I say "within you," it is not intimate enough to you. It is [laughs] hiding within yourself. So-if so, it is not intimate. Of course, if it is something beyond you, that is not intimate. Even-if it is something to attain it, it is not intimate one. He says "intimate enlightenment." This intimacy to the enlightenment is our practice.

When you sit, just sit, you know, with big mind. That is intimate enlightenment. It is so intimate that you do not realize [laughs, laughter] enlightenment. That is what he means. Shitashii-shitashii-in Japanese, shitashii. Shitashii-"friend, good friend." We say "good friend." Shitashii-shito-shitashii-person who is intimate to-to you is shitashii-shito. It means, you know, "intimate friend."

And we say also, Shitashii nakani mo rei ni ya, you know. Even though man and wife is intimate, you know, but there must be some rules between them. That is our way. You may say if it is intimate relationship, there is no need to have some rules [laughs]. That is wrong understanding, because relationship between them is so intimate that it is necessary to set up some rules. So our rules is based on intimate relationship-not to make some harmony between us, but to make-to make our life more meaningful we set up some rules. It is-to observe rules is to be appreciative of the intimate relationship. That is rules, you know. If there is no rules [laughs]-there is no-to enjoy within-within our relationship. If we want to feel something, then we should have some rules, or at least we should be appreciative to the intimacy. Do you understand? This is precepts.

So within our relationship between man and man, or man and woman, or man and nature, there is rules based on the intimate relationship. So in observing rules, there is no trace of a rule. Even though there is rules, there is no need to be caught by it, because it is the expression of the intimate relationship. It is expression of it. It is not something to-necessary to set up because of some unharmonious relationship.

So when-in our practice, there is no trace of practice, and there is no shadow of the rules. No trace of the rules and no shadow of rules. To have shadow of rules means, "I must do this." That is shadow [laughs]. Sometime [laughs] you [are] scared of the shadow of yourself [laughs]. That is shadow. We should not have shadow of the rules. Until you do it, that is not rule. When you do it, that is rule. When Buddha did something, that is rule. There is no shadow for the Buddha, or there is no obligation for Buddha. So we should not shadow of the rules or trace of rules. If you do it, that's all. That is the real Buddha. We sh- [partial word]-we should not be caught by what we did, even though it is right. We shouldn't say, "What I did was right [laughs]." We should do in the same way. That is-that means you leave the trace of the teaching or trace of the precepts.

So Dogen-zenji said, "Fish swim like a fish [laughs]. Bird flies like a bird [laughs]." That is Buddhist life. Fish swims, but there is no trace. Birds fly, but there is no trace of bird. There is no setup, you know, or trace for birds.

In original Japanese, "this bird" is beautiful sentence [laughs]. This translation is very good, but-and at the same time it is rather difficult to understand.

But in your practice, we, you know, repeat lecture after lecture, you know, talking [about] some advantage of zazen practice [laughs]. So naturally you will be-naturally it means I am selling some [laughing] drugs or sake to you, and you are buying it, and you are taking it [laughter]. This is not so good. So, you know, actually it is better to do it, you know, without listening [to] anything-just by the suggestion of the teacher. That is best way. And you should just stick to the teacher [laughs] with patience.

So pure mind is-interpretation of pure mind is purity of the mind and patient mind-patient mind. It should be, when you study Buddhism, the patience, you know-endurance is absolutely necessary, because we do not talk about-too much about the advantage of Buddhism. Until you find out [laughs], we-we will wait. If so, both for the teacher and student, the most important thing is endurance-to wait for the chance to-which will become between us. If you give up, you will have no chance to understand it in its true sense because Buddhism is not something-some knowledge or intellectual understanding. That is why we say do not sell [laughs] Buddhism. Do not sell anything. Do not take anything. Cover your ears and eyes and mouth [laughs, laughter], and wait for the chance which will come to you [laughs]. Do you understand?

I cannot talk [said as he was covering his mouth with his hand] [laughs, laughter]. You cannot listen [laughs, laughter]. You cannot smell, even. That is how you study Buddhism. That is observation of precepts. So whatever the religion is, the most important thing is a kind of austerity. This element is very important for every religion. I don't know other religion, but the austerity is very important. "Let alone" [?] is not good. When you limit your life to certain extent, it is easier to find out the truth. If you do too many things [laughs], you will be lost in your activity. But if you limit your activity, you know, you can see. That is why we observe precepts. The precepts observation is very important.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (5/8/01).

[1] Suzuki-roshi is commenting on Shushogi, by Takia Takishu and Azegami Baisen (1890)-a summary of Dogen's Shobogenzo. Suzuki-roshi discussed Section 1 in SR-66-03-13-B.

[2] This second version appears to be Reiho Masunaga's translation, in either: (1) "Shushogi: True Meaning of Training and Enlightenment," in Zen for Daily Living, Tokyo: Shunju-sha Publishing Co., Nov. 1964, p. 50; or (2) ibid., in The Soto Approach to Zen, Layman Buddhist Society Press, Tokyo, 1958, p. 174. The source of the first quotation read by Suzuki-roshi is unknown. For the rest of the lecture, Suzuki-roshi follows Masunaga with only minor changes.

1966 februari (1)

1 - KPFA Radio Interview

Friday, February 18, 1966

KPFA Radio Interview with Elsa Knight Thompson
KPFA/KPFB Studio, Pacifica Radio, Berkeley, CA

Elsa Knight Thompson: [1] ... by telling us something more about our guest, Suzuki-roshi.

Richard Baker: Shunryu Suzuki-roshi came to America about six years ago, and he was only going to stay for a year or two and [2 words]. Many Americans came to meditate with him. He kept postponing leaving and finally there was such a large group meditating with him in San Francisco [1 word] no more room and there wasn't an opportunity to study with him as well as if we had a place in the mountains. And we found Tassajara hot springs which is this beautiful, old, historical hot springs and historical sight in the San Lucia mountains.

Elsa Knight Thompson: Now, we're-we're still talking about Suzuki-roshi. Didn't he have a congregation in Japan prior to coming to this country?

Richard Baker: Yes, he-as I understand, now I-

Elsa Knight Thompson: We can ask him at what-prior to coming to United States-

Suzuki-roshi: I was appointed by our headquarters to Soko-ji temple. And when-while I was there, I sit every morning and many Caucasians started to join my practice. That is why I started sitting with them-with Caucasian. Mostly-

Elsa Knight Thompson: You were a Zen priest-

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Elsa Knight Thompson: Who translated into American? Is that-in Japan you were a Zen priest. Attached to a monastery or a center? What would the proper explanation be?

Suzuki-roshi: I was the head priest of Rinso-in, which is pretty big temple, and I was always helping the monastery near there.

Elsa Knight Thompson: I see. You were attached to a temple and you worked also with the Zen monks there [?]. And you came to this country for a visit and acquired so many people who wish to study with you that there was first a congregation in San Francisco was there not? And then this whole situation expanded suddenly into something which is now the Zen Mountain Center. And perhaps Richard you could tell us how the Zen Mountain Center came about? Where it is and so on as you started to do a while ago, but I wanted the audience to have a little better acquaintance with Suzuki-roshi before we began on the center.

Richard Baker: It's in the San Lucia mountains down inland from the big coast about ten miles. Do you-should I say something more about his background in Japan or anything like that? I mean, it wasn't exactly clear. Let me say that Soko-ji, which he mentioned, is the name Soko-ji. Soko stands as Japanese shortening for San Francisco-ji temple is the Japanese congregation in San Francisco which he was asked to come to because he knew English. And there are very few Zen masters in the- there's two major sects. There's Soto and Rinzai, and there's only about 20 Zen masters in-or less, maybe 10 in Soto. And we were lucky to have him come here, and he was only going to come for about two years and then he was going to go back to Japan. And then he-because of so many people needed him to stay, he stayed.

The San Lucia Mountains are part of the Los Padres National Forest which stretches from about Carmel Valley down to the Hearst Castle. It's about 350,000 acres of-much of it is a wilderness area. And right in the middle of it, the northern middle of it, there's a-there's Tassajara hot springs, and there's a 20-mile dirt road that passes from Carmel Valley up through the mountains over a 5,000-foot pass and down into this narrow valley where the hot springs are. And we bought the 160 acres surrounding where we're still in the process of paying two payments, about $90,000 on it. We still have $220,000 to go or something over the next two years. And we purchased it and-because so many people gave us money, we really weren't prepared to and helped us, we really weren't prepared to start a training and monastery operation right away. We felt obligated to do so and this summer we ran our first practice period with about-well, more than 200 students, probably, all together participated but 70 students at a time staying for a month or two months to a year.

Thompson: Well are there buildings and things of that sort that were connected with its previous use so that you have been able simply to move in and, for the time being at least, make do with the physical facilities there.

Baker: Right. The facilities are-are beautiful old buildings built along-the road itself was built which is rather-in Buddhism you talk about the dao or the way, well, the road itself was built by Chinese who'd worked on the railroad. And it's a road that couldn't be built now-it's too complicated and expensive. It's rather precipitous mountain country. And they built the road by handling stones up and then packing dirt on it, which the road still exists, and they built these buildings about 100 years ago. Quarrying the rocks themselves.

And we've-we've changed the buildings. Put a large zendo or meditation hall in the largest building. Made a guest dining hall in one of the other buildings so the people who have been coming there for years for the hot baths would continue to come. And made a dormitory and equipped all the cabins for the students. And have done an enormous amount of work making it-the students do all the work themselves. We cook for ourselves and take care of ourselves and grow food.

Thompson: Well, now you say about 200 people were there this-this summer. Do they-is it simply a cooperative effort or do they come there for specific training and-do they have to-is there fee for courses? How do you, you know, how physically do we go about all this before we get on to its significance?

Baker: In a Zen monastery, monastery is not such a good translation of the word that's used in Japan, because monastery in America usually means monastic life, and exclusion from outside society, and a place where you live maybe all your life. In Zen, if we call it-it would be better to translate it as practice center or something. It's a place where you go for an intensive study of-intensive meditation study and practice with other people and with your Zen master or your Roshi for a period of time. This may be three months, or four months, or a year, but it's not for a lifetime and your expected to go back into ordinary society. Generally, you stay two or three months and then go back into ordinary society and then back two or three months. Over a period of several years, you might [?] do this to develop your practice.

And students pay two dollars, if they stay a short time, a day or they stay-pay a dollar if they stay a longer time, and a few students don't pay anything if they're staying a year or something like that.

Thompson: Well, now another thing that monastic means is that it's all male.

Baker: This is men and woman.

Thompson: This is men and woman. [Laughs] I want to be clear about that. Well, now that explains more or less the physical aspects of the situation. I take it that Suzuki-roshi will in fact be in residence at the Zen Mountain Center most of the times so that the students will come and go, but you will remain more or less stationary. Is that-[1/2 words] Suzuki-roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: I was moving there so much so at first I didn't have that-that idea of staying there all the time. But recently, Japanese congregation agreed my stay-with my in Tassajara most of the time. Recently we had meeting and they agreed with it. So I can stay most of the time at the center or the monastery.

Baker: The Japanese congregation has been very reluctant to give him up.

Thompson: This is the Japanese congregation in San Francisco? Yes.

Baker: But they've helped us a great deal and we have two other priests, both younger Zen priests, one who's in charge in San Francisco named Katagiri-sensei, and a new, young, brilliant priest we brought from Japan, for Tassajara, who's in-who's in Tassajara at the mountain center when Suzuki-roshi is not there. And he's there all the time and his name is Chino-sensei.

Thompson: Well, let me ask you questions which may seem to be completely beside the point. There have been a number of people who have lectured on, among them Alan Watts whom I believe is concerned with this center also. There are places where, in general, the problems of the mind and the spirit and psychology are discussed at length, like the Esalen situation. What would you say distinguishes what you are trying to do from the other things which appear to be in some way related? Now don't both of you sit there and ask the other one the answer. I will ask you to both answer in succession.

Baker: Who's first?

Thompson: I don't care which one of you goes first, but I want an answer from both of you.

Baker: Okay. I think there's a underlying, if you look at it sociologically or something like that, there's an underlying similarity between-or some change in orientation going on in society which is at the basis for people when they first get interested in Zen or when they go to an Esalen encounter program or the other things of that interest. But once your into the practice of Zen, it's quite different because we so thoroughly emphasize the identity of body and mind and though you practice-in some sense the practice is-you can practice from a mental point of view or a physical point of view but both really are one. We emphasize the directness of this kind of practice, really, that goes beyond mental or emotional or physical. And in order to practice, we emphasize sitting as calmly as possible so that your-you know your mind and body before it takes any activity. In other words, if you sit as calmly as possible in a meditation posture, it doesn't necessarily have to be lotus posture or anything like that it can be in a chair. But-with-and with a certain way of thinking about things, it frees you from conceptual ways of thinking about things, your mind and body become-you become to know your mind and body before they take any activity. And out of that they balance or almost a kind of silence, you take your activity. And this strong orientation in this direction is different from the others, I think.

Thompson: And your answer?

Suzuki-roshi: Please, continue.

Thompson: No, he said what he wanted to say for the time being I think. And we'd-I'd like to know from you. You would come into the American society at a certain very turbulent period in America's development in every way, when this country is, without doubt, the most powerful country in the world and in the minds of many the most dangerous. You came for a purpose. You are attempting to fulfill that purpose. What purpose in the context of this society, which you have now had as an opportunity to observe for some time, where do you feel what you are doing-what contribution, what roll you-does your approach and the approach that presumably the people who will study with you have in-in the general context? Because we're talking to an audience which includes, not only many people who for years have heard Zen lectures about, but also many people whose views are largely political rather than spiritual in direction, but who have a great interest in. So, I would like to know from you what you feel the role of this group and this activity or lack of activity, since you are about engage in [1 word].

Suzuki-roshi: First of all, I think it is necessary for everyone, not only American people or Japanese people. It [?] for everyone the most important thing is to have more flexible mind, you know, which you can observe things as it is and accept things as it is without any prejudice or one-sided idea. This is-when I say like this [1 word] looks like quite easy, but actually it is not so easy. In this point, without directing our practice or our human life, in this point whatever you do will not be successful because you will create problems with each other, you know. Someone-when someone is successful, it means for some other person. It means it may be the difficulty. So, in this way we have various problem in this world and in this society-even in our family. So, first of all we should be-our life should be concentrated on each moment. Not without much-with much prejudiced or not much one-sided, rigid-

Thompson: What your talking about is a total awareness all the time.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Total awareness and to know our situation always. To be aware of.

Thompson: Yes. Now tell me, supposing one were-does train for total awareness, which is after all not exclusively a Zen concept-

Suzuki-roshi: No.

Thompson: But has been the concept of all great mystics throughout time, I believe. Doesn't that mean also being aware of-of what's wrong? Meaning, others words, so many times it seems to me, let me try to put it another way. So many times as soon as people become involved in this kind of idea and they grasp the idea intellectually, they begin to assume that they achieved purity rather than the beginnings of consciousness. And this, it seems to me, causes more difficulty with some of the practitioners and talkers about what everybody should be doing. Then the person quite frankly admits that they are-that they know that such a thing exists and might be possible, but that they are also infinitely aware that they have not yet arrived there. And this has always seemed to me to be the great problem with the promulgation-with getting people to understand this because they hear people talk about it and then they say but that person is not this and this and this and this and they are not. I want you to talk about this please.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Intellectual understanding of something may be sometime, if it is about future it will be-it will create some-it will be-it will bound our activity or it will restrict our activity. If it is about something you have done already, it is the limitation of the actual experience which should be forget, you know. And-but without forgetting about forgetting the previous intellectual understanding of something, that means you are bound by something which is not real. This attitude will create some other difficulties. So, in this way we are bound by future and past without knowing the-Thompson: Without knowing the future or understanding the past.

Suzuki-roshi: Without knowing which is real-without any real understanding of anything [laughs, laughter]. Sacrificing most valuable present [1 word]. This is what we are doing and-not only we lose the true meaning of our life, we are creating problems for ourselves which exist only in present moment. This is [1 word] problems for human being.

Thompson: What if you know what you're doing at the present moment, you know, supposing-you-a person beginning with this idea knows that at the present moment he is aware of something, but he discovers that what he is aware of in himself is evil and he knows it. Isn't this part of the process? In other words, your becoming aware of something and you realize that you are covering your real motivations with good intentions, or pretending to yourself that you are doing something for one reason when actually you are about to do something for quite another reason. Isn't there a great deal of, well, I won't say suffering, but isn't there a great deal that might be discovered that would not be too easy to accept for people who attempt this path? Why don't you talk about that Richard because you, I understand, are doing just that.

Baker: When you-of course the experience of the person who's beginning to sit-to do meditation, to do zazen-meditation, again, is not too good a translation because you don't meditate on anything; you sit there ready for whatever happened [?]. You find that it uncovers many things, many things which ordinarily wouldn't happen in psychoanalysis or something like that happen to you, and many other things happen to you to. None of them do you give much importance one way or the other except as sort of occurrences. But, your-you find that the sitting-the process of meditation has a deep wisdom in it somehow, so that as it uncovers it strengthens you at the same time to be able to accept what it uncovers. And you begin by sitting so that you don't twitch and scratch your nose and move just cause you're restless. That imperturbability, which you begin to get physically and then mentally, helps you when visions or monsters or some very disturbing part of yourself comes to your awareness. You have a kind of imperturbability which just lets you let it happen and find out what's going on.

Now the earlier thing which you said-which you were trying to relate this kind of practice to the political situation and also to-does the person practicing feel he's achieved some purity or some special state which means that he doesn't have to do much maybe or something like that. I think to feel that you arrive at something is a completely mistaken idea. I mean Zen is completely against the idea that you ever arrive. There's only this moment. There can't be any achievement because there's nothing to compare that achievement with.

So Suzuki-roshi often says that the best way is to have a beginner's mind-just the beginner, who's just starting who takes everything from a fresh and spontaneous point of view because the expert mind is only capable of one or two things. The beginner's mind is open to everything. And then it's much better to say that Zen is something which makes you ready for any activity. So that if you, you know, are confronted with a world in which there are many problems, that your activity may be-in some way your-who you are is defined by your situation moment after moment. Right now I'm a person talking on a microphone. That's who I am. I'm not Dick Baker or something like that. I'm a person talking on a microphone. When I get in the car, I'll be a person driving a car.

So if I'm marching in a peace march, I'm a person marching in a peace march because that's the situation that's presented to me and I'm taking that. If I'm more for individual freedom in some way, then that's the kind of person I am at that moment. I-the Zen person becomes a person who responds and is at one with his situation moment after moment. So, if he's in an evil society, he should-society isn't really evil or good but there are many problems which occur in society. I think that your response will be, moment after moment, to bring things-yourself in tune with it and at the same time it in tune with the natural order of mind and you can almost say cosmic naturalness that you experience.

Thompson: Well, I was also sort of headed toward the idea of the difference between knowing that a thing can be done and being able to do it. I mean, I can accept as a fact that you or you may be able to be totally aware-mentally, emotionally, and spiritually from moment to moment, but the fact that I know that it's a fact doesn't suddenly put me in the same position, and I think that frequently when people have studied with their minds a great deal about any religious process, and I'm using the word religious in its broadest sense, they tend to confuse the desire for virtue with the achievement of virtue. And I-does it not take a long time for the achievement or is it-well, for example, when you're meditating-certainly if you're meditating, and again I'm trying to use it in the widest sense that you have referred to, and particularly in a beautiful place surrounded by people who love you in the biblical sense of that word, in the religious sense of that word, you might be able to be aware of everything from moment to moment. It might be a great experience, but is not the purpose so that you can in the market place be that same person.

Suzuki-roshi: Here, in your question, I think something-ach-you put emphasis on intellectual understanding or your point is intellectual understanding is not achievement itself. Here you put emphasis on achievement. But, actually we do not achieve anything, you know, in our practice. But just to be ourselves on that moment is the way. So, when-when you have-when you have some idea of achievement, just achievement is already something which you will achieve. So, that is not what you have right now. Achievement should be something you already have, and how to have it to forget all about the idea of self or to be one with the surroundings. That is how to achieve our goal. Our goal is [?] right here not some place [?] or in the future.

Thompson: And right now?

Baker: Your question or-are really-real expression of yourself in some way, I feel. It's quite interesting. It's so fully packed with ideas that it's hard to answer or respond to any of them almost. But one thing you said, and I'm not sure how it fits in but, one things you said is about take-can you know if-you may want to achieve something but can you know you can achieve it or that's not the same as achieving it. When [?] the emphasis on the nowness [?], which is sounds-everyone says the now, there are even rock-n-roll groups named the ever present now, but to really physically and emotionally be totally in this nowness, which is a rather radical-you really perceive first that you have a change to a perceiving space rather than time, and then almost where you don't perceive time or space. Past and future are totally in this moment, so that you'd act on the future only in the realistic sense in which what you do now has effectiveness-now as the future is present in this moment. So you don't sort of speculate or get yourself involved in situations which there's no-you don't find your mind putting yourself in situations which you actually physically and emotionally can't be effective in [end of tape side A]. In other words, if something-if you find yourself taking action on something, it's something which that future is present in this moment and that you can totally mentally, physically, and intellectually be involved in. Now, the other thing is, we don't-I don't think, at least from my own practice I've been sitting every day or every twice a day or longer for about six or seven years now, my experience is not one of having achieved anything or any special total awareness or something. I suppose it is-I notice some differences in the way I used to be. It's more-what I mean to say is-that's not quite right-it's not a freedom from problems, perhaps the sting [?] is gone from the problems, but life is still a constant series of inadequacies and problems and things you cope with. The change is the immediacy and spontaneity with which you cope with them more than that there are no problems.

Thompson: Well, I wouldn't certainly that, even if the problems weren't yours, that the world is far from free of problems.

Baker: Sometimes when you read the teachings though, it says things like you have to realize that the world is perfect as it is. That it is nir-that samsara and nirvana in the-there's the something called the Majumika [?] school and out of this they had the idea which Zen is part of that school. Samsara-the world of delusion is the same as nirvana. The world of complete-

Thompson: Are one.

Baker: Enlightenment are one. So you can get the idea that well everything's okay. It's all nirvana, you know, we're all perfect, but on some way that's true but that doesn't mean that in the practicalities every day you still don't brush your teeth and take care of things and worry about the world's problems-least for me anyway [laughs, laughter].

Thompson: Go [?] on. You see to the average-let me try to put it in another way. To many people listening to talk about this sort of thing, is purely an intellectual thing, you know, they hear about it. The same as hear about [1 word] that there's been a demonstration in Oakland or anything else that they haven't been involved in, you see. But, I think that also people are very much interested-these ideas and ideas related are very current in our society today. I think that many of the younger people, without even knowing it, are withdrawing in many ways from what we call the establishment for reasons that in some way are related to these reasons. And therefore the relationship between what you in western parlance believe and your conduct, your ability to live in a society surrounded with violence, surrounded with poverty, surrounded with human suffering, and to do so from moment to moment with love and clarity is quite a project as to be envisaged by the average person, you see. And I wanted in this interview, if I could, to shed some light from your standpoint on those problems to the person who might be interested in involving themselves and to the-from the people who are already involved as Richard here is. Is there any comment you would-either one like to make?

Baker: It's pretty easy for the average person, maybe, if he practices something like zazen. That kind of practice is really a kind of shortcut, though even if your in it you have to be so-you have to really practice fully with your whole mind and body in order to make it work, if there's some idea of it working. But it's course, I don't think, you can't say that that kind of awareness is impossible for other people, but it's-it does seem, if you don't have some ideas and way of going about thinking and moving your body and life toward that orientation, then it seems impossible. But if you have some suggestion, like Zen Buddhism which is-in a way it doesn't exist, because ultimately it's a-it's a way of freeing you from all conceptions, all frameworks, all body or mind hindrances. So, whence [?] you really-when you really do it, Zen Buddhism doesn't exist, but it's certainly helpful to feel it exists for a while.

Thompson: Is there anything else you would like to say?

Suzuki-roshi: How to help people is very-not very difficult thing but it is rather difficult to explain how to, you know. To help people, in its true sense, is just to join [?] their life and [1 word] their life as they do and to be always friend of others. That is only way. And if they find me something different from them even though we are in same condition and living same way. This is, I think, how to help them and how to teach them real practice of Zen.

Baker: Can-can-we're ending soon I think.

Thompson: Yes.

Baker: I'd like to say one thing, is that the possibility of all of this occurring and the opportunity for many people to come in contact with Suzuki-roshi and with other teachers, is really only for the first time possible in America through Zen Mountain Center for any-on any-otherwise there's a few places where you meditate two or three times a week, that kind of thing. But with a real Zen master and with the situation of being able to live there for months or a year or something like that is [?] possible.

Thompson: Thank you both very much for being here.

---

Source: Copy of a commercially available tape. The original tape is believed to be in the possession of KPFA/Pacifica. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham (3/04/01).

[1] Opening words were not recorded. Presumed to be "Why don't you start ...".

1966 maart (3)

1 - Genjo Koan, Paragraphs 1-3

Sunday, March 13, 1966

Sesshin Lecture: Genjo Koan, Paragraphs 1-3
Soko-ji Temple, San Francisco

Good morning. This lecture is for advanced student in his practice, but I think this lecture will help you even though you haven't advanced practice. And at least some day you will understand this lecture. This is the gist of Dogen's teaching, and various offshoot are the 95 fascicle of-fascicles of his work. This is basic teaching-basic teaching of Dogen.

And we have finished the first paragraph, anyway: [1]

When all things are Buddhist ... [gap in tape of 21 sec.]

Tape Operator: Testing. [Blows on microphone.]

Suzuki-roshi: [phenomena, we have enlightenment and ignorance, studies, life and death, buddhas and people. When all things are without self, we have no ignorance, no enlightenment-][2] ... no buddhas, no people, no life and [no] death. The Buddhist way ... [gap in tape of 18 sec.]

[Operator blows and taps on the microphone.]

Suzuki-roshi: [is beyond being and non-being. Therefore we have life and death, ignorance and enlightenment, people and buddhas. However, flowers-] ... fall with our attachment, and weeds grows-grow with our detachment.

I can visualize Dogen-zenji, you know, who is just standing watching some flowers. He liked plum blossom very much. [Gap in tape of 15 sec. See SR-66-08-15-A, p. 4, for a similar comment.]

[Operator blows and taps on the microphone.]

Tape operator: One, one, two, three, four, five, one six seven eight nine ten eleven twelve.

Suzuki-roshi: ... in wheat, which is strong enough to come out through frost and snow. He is just watching it. And he is-this statement covers all of our life, and all of our history-human history, and Buddhist philosophy. This fascicle, from beginning to end, [is] based on this paragraph, so this is the most important point-the point of whole fascicle.

What I noticed here, you know, in observing your practice, you are not completely involved in practice-our practice. Your practice is part of [laughs] you-just a small part of your life. One hour or two hours in 12-24 hours [laughs]. That is your practice. So instead of practicing zazen here two hours, you think you can do something-if there is something good, better-it may be better to do something [laughs]-something else instead of practicing zazen. This is-I think you [laughs]-still you have this kind of attitude.

But Buddhism is not-our practice is not like that. Our practice-if we are not completely involved in our practice, that is not our practice. It is not one hour of 24 hours. So if you-if I scold you, you may [laughs]-you may go out. If I give you some candy, you will stay here [laughs, laughter]. I dare say you are impossible [laughs, laughter]. You are just like child [laughs], because, you know, you lack in-you lack in your confidence to study it as a whole life study. Actually, you cannot get out of Buddhism. It is impossible to get out of it, but still you think you can, you know, go out from Buddhism, go out from Zen-from this zendo. Actually, once you enter, that's all [laughs, laughter]. Some day you'll have to come back. I know that [laughs]. I myself tried to get out of it many times [laughs], but I couldn't.

So sometime I may say, "You are bad now" [laughs]. But what is bad? Who is bad? Someone who is good is bad now [laughs]. Sometime I say, "You are very good." But someone is not good enough is good enough [laughs]. Same thing, isn't it? Doesn't make any sense-"good or bad."

You-in Japan, young people say, "This is absolutely good." It just emphasize-adjective [adverb] emphasizing good. But when we say "absolutely good," it is same thing as "absolutely bad" [laughs]. If it is absolutely good, that is absolutely bad. And if-when we say "absolutely good," it is-it does not mean good or bad. It is something more than good or bad. So in this sense, absolutely good is absolutely bad.

But sometime we say, comparatively, "This is good, this is bad." This is necessary-this two way of understanding of life is necessary. We have-sometime we have to compare something to the other, and we should say this is comparatively good. Or there will not be-no need to say "comparatively" always [laughs], but in this sense, we say, most of us-most of time, we say "comparatively good or bad." This is very important, but this comparatively good or bad life is created a lot of difficulties now. This comparison is the basic attitude towards science and philosophy and intellectualizing our life. When you intellectualize our life, eventually it will end in dead end. That is why we have difficulties in our time. Moreover, originally it is just comparatively good. We are comparatively good than some people. That's all. But nowadays we say, "Absolutely good. This is absolutely good." Here is the big mistake, you know. When you say [so], even by-even emotionally, that is big, big mistake. Nothing is absolutely good.

When you say "absolutely good," it does not mean good anymore. It is same thing as bad. If you understand-if you use it, or if you feel it in this way, when you say "absolutely good," that is all right. But when you say, "absolutely good" emphasizing something comparatively good, that is big mistake. You are forcing your way to others. You are deprived of freedom from others. This is big, big mistake. But, in this-in next paragraph, Dogen-zenji says:

What we move-that we move ourselves and understand all things is ignorance. That things advance and understand themselves is enlightenment.

Here he is talking in the complete understanding of life. What is good? What is ignorance and what is enlightenment? What is good and what is bad?

We say "ignorance" or "enlightenment" without knowing what is ignorance and what is enlightenment. But when we say "ignorance" or "enlightenment," we should know what is ignorance in its true sense and what is enlightenment in its true sense. If you think what is ignorance in its true sense, when we-we say criticizing something that is-move ourselves toward something, you know, and criticize something, good or bad, that is ignorance. "That things advance and understand themselves is enlightenment." But when you-we have no particular concrete idea of good and bad-good or bad, and leave-and expose ourselves to their criticism and accept their criticism, that is enlightenment.

We may do many things intellectually, or intentionally, or in realm of consciousness, but those activity-most of those activity is more unconscious activity rather than conscious activity. And what is-which is true expression of yourself-conscious one or unconscious one [laughs]? Of course, 99 percent of your activity is unconsciously, and that is true expression of yourself. If you say, "I am right," that is, you know, a small part of your expression-just small part of your expression. So you cannot, you know, force yourself to someone else. As you understand yourself, we don't know what we are exactly. "We don't know" is right.

So if you understand in this way, that is enlightenment. Those two statement-ignorance-about ignorance and enlightenment, is-are based on one big understanding of life. Enlightenment is something which will happen to us sometime, and ignorance is something which will come over to us sometime [laughs], but we are big box [laughs] including enlightenment and ignorance.

So in our everyday life, there is enlightenment and ignorance. You cannot [laughs] escape from ignorance [laughs] to attain enlightenment, because enlightenment is not somewhere else within yourself. So actually enlightenment is, as he says, to be-to know what is ignorance is enlightenment. And ignorance is to-to be ignorant about enlightenment is ignorance [laughs]. Something good is something bad. If something bad-if I say something is good, that something should be bad [laughs]. Because-it is same thing if I say, "Good morning. You came in time this morning [laughs]. That's very good [laughs]." That means he does not come [laughs, laughter] on time usually [laughs, laughter]. If I scold him, "Why didn't [laughs, laughter] you come on time?" It means he comes every-almost every morning on time [laughs]. So it's same thing [laughs]. Maybe sometime opposite [laughs]? So we should not be disturbed by the word [?] of ignorance or enlightenment. Anyway, if we understand ourselves completely, there is no special thing as enlightenment or ignorance. Ignorance is enlightenment [laughs], enlightenment is ignorance.

It is buddhas who understand ignorance.

You see, he says, "It is buddhas who understand ignorance"-his own ignorance [laughs]. He is buddha when he understand-when he enlightened about his ignorance, and it is people who are ignorant of enlightenment. So there is no difference between buddha and people-same thing, same human being. But buddha is someone who understand our ignorance, and we are ignorant of enlightenment. But, if we-I say in this way, then there will not be no need to practice zazen [laughs]. If we are buddha-if we are same as buddha, why we should practice zazen? This is-when you understand this philosophy or statement, just intellectually, you will have this problem.

But anyway he says:

It is people who are ignorant of enlightenment. Further, there are those who are enlightened about enl- [partial word]-above enlightenment, and those who are ignorant-ignorant of ignorance.

"Enlightenment above enlightenment." If you retain the idea-consciousness of enlightenment, you know, that is not good enough. So you should, you know, go beyond enlightenment. So if you attain enlightenment, that enlightenment means enlightenment about-above enlightenment of ignorance, you know. So eventually you will go towards ignorance, you know. When you say, "I have attained enlightenment consciously," that consciousness is delusion. About what you attained enlightenment? You attained enlightenment about ignorance. What you, you know, grasp is ignorance [laughs], not enlightenment. There is nothing to understand, you know, but ignorance for enlightened person. There is nowhere to go-enlightenment or ignorance [laughs]. So if you attain enlightenment, you have to, you know, go back to ignorance because there is no other way to-for you to go [laughs]. So if you attain enlightenment, you have to go back to ignorance.

So "enlightenment above enlightenment": conscious enlightenment is not good enough. So you have to give up enlightenment. If-when at the moment you attain enlightenment, or when you actually attain enlightenment, what you grasp is ignorance-is your ignorance or our own ignorance. When you understand the ignorance of yourself-how ignorant you have been [laughs]-that is enlightenment.

So it is impossible for enlightened person to forget about enlightenment. It is impossible because you have found something which you had-you have had [laughs]. So how can you forget about enlightenment? You should remember. You should abide in enlightenment forever with people who have same nature as his own.

So someone who thinks "I attained enlightenment," although most of them haven't enlightenment-attain enlightenment yet, "I am only person who attained enlightenment" [laughs]. That is big mistake. That is just delusion. He has nothing-he didn't grasp anything but delusion. It will soon vanished away from his memory-from his experience.

So even though we looks like doing same thing with people, there is some difference between the people who attain enlightenment and who haven't. But for enlightened one, constant-constant effort will be continued with people wherever he is.

And those who are ignorant of ignorance.

"Ignorant of ignorance" means people eventually will attain enlightenment. Those people ignorant-who are ignorant of his ignorance is-just now-is just ignorance-ignorant of his own ignorance. So he doesn't feel that he has same quality or same nature with-as enlightened person. That's all, but eventually, as long as his-he has same nature as enlightened person, he will-once he become enlightened of his ignorance, he will be saved.

When buddhas are truly buddhas, they are not necessarily aware of themselves as buddhas.

You see? So when it is-if so-if there is someone who attained enlightenment and go back to ignorance, and if there are someone, although he is ignorant of ignorance, eventually he will become enlightened of his ignorance. Then it is not-they are not necessarily-it is not necessarily aware of their-themselves as buddha. If so, you know, it is not necessary, even, to become aware of his buddha-nature. Anyway, we have it. The difference is those who attained enlight- [partial word]- who is awakened by his true nature, or he is ignorant of ignorance. That is the difference.

So strictly speaking, it is not always necessary to be aware of ourselves to be buddha. Same thing [laughs]. That is why I say you have come back to here [laughs]. Even though you are thousand miles away from this zendo, you are included [laughs] in this zendo. As our understanding is like this, whether you are here or not is not the point. Do you understand?

However, you may ask me what is the purpose of practice? Anyway, you, you know, I think you are relieved. You have forgotten all what you had on your shoulders now. Actually, there is nothing to do for you. There is nothing especially to do for you. But then why Dogen-zenji strived for this point, for many and many years, until he attained enlightenment in China and dropped off his idea of mind and body? It is so, you know, but, as he says, flowers fall with our attachment, and weeds grows with our detachment. In spite of-in spite of detachment [attachment], flower will go-will fall.

So-this is life, actually. And if you do not try to understand this point fully, those, you know, profound teaching is nothing to-for us. So actually, even though he says in this way, actually it is necessary to-to practice-to continue our practice in realm of duality as unenlightened people. We are-we should be all unenlightened people, and we should strive for enlightenment. We should do that. While you are striving for it, you will really understand what he meant. Intellectually you have understood it already. Intellectually. But then you-you can remain doing nothing [laughs] in sunny place eating something which you want? Can you do that? Or can you always lie down in your bed [laughs] reading some interesting stories? Can you do that? No, we cannot. For a while you can do something, you know. That is [what] most people are doing. For a while I can read something. And if we [are] tired of reading, we will go out, or we will work. And if we earn some money to be lazy [laughs], we will come back from work. So continue your life in this way. You will have no result. You will not find out any meaning of life.

Someday or sometime you will have deep regret with what you did-you have been doing, and sometime you will be disgusted with yourself [laughs]. And you feel disable to help people, or disabled to love anyone. You know, you will be isolate-completely isolated from this world.

So you may care for something good-something which is absolutely true [laughs], and try to escape from this world, or commit suicide. This is what we will do [with] our life. But there is the way to resume this kind of deep-deeper understanding of life and work with people without any prejudice, without any discrimination, and help with each other with mutual understanding. The only way is to be cooperated-to share our joy of deeper understanding of life with people, and to participate worldly life more sincere effort. Then you will have-you will be a perfect human being as well as perfect Buddha's disciple.

When I went to Palo Alto-some new student who was studying Orient-Indian philosophy by Doctor McKarr [?]: "I read many books about Zen, and I know the term they use-'oneness of the duality.'" But actually, what is [laughs] 'oneness of the duality'?" he said-he asked me. I had no time to [laughs] discuss about the oneness of the duality [laughs] [with someone] who understand intellectually pretty well what is [laughs] oneness of the duality.

But-I wanted to help him, you know, but I s- [partial word]-I knew that it is impossible to help him immediately. Until he suffer, until he try to find out what is oneness of the duality, it may take pretty long time. By long effort, his understanding will, you know, be better and better [laughs, laughter] until, "Oh, this is oneness of the duality." [Laughs.] How you reach this kind of understanding is to suffer in the realm of, you know, actual life, or to think more about our life, or to practice zazen. One of the two.

So to practice Zen in noisy place itself is a way-this is very dualistic way, you know [laughs]-a way of the noisy-noisiness of the outside [laughs] [loud traffic noises can be heard]. Try to be calm. This is most extremely dualistic way, but in this effort, there is, you know, big hint [?].

So after all those sharp, profound teaching, he [Dogen] just-he put some words like this:

However, flowers fall with our attachment, and weeds grows with our detachment.

He comes back to our actual life [?] without any thinking, and where we should make our effort.

When we see things and hear things with our whole body and mind, our understanding is not like a mirror with reflections, nor like water under the moon. If we understand one side, the other side is dark.

[Laughs.] This, you know, three lines is impossible [laughs]. You cannot do anything with those three lines. This is impossible word-statement [laughs], and it takes pretty long time to understand this. "When we see things and hear things with our whole body and mind"-without any idea of enlightenment or like idea of ignorance-when we do something and go beyond ourselves is to be enlightened by it-oh, no, no-"Our understanding is not like a mirror with reflections." You say the moon is a-the reflection is on the water or in the water, but it is not like that. When you watch the beautiful moon on the breaks of water, or waves of water, or calm silent still water, that is the moon. So when you see the moon, in the water that is the moon. When you see the moon in the sky, that is the moon. You don't see the moon on the water. It is impossible to see [laughs] the moon in the water and the moon in the sky at the same time.

So only way [is] to, you know, to appreciate the beauty of the moon in the water or the moon in the sky. But intellectually we say "enlightenment" or "ignorance." It means you are [laughs]-you are very busy [laughs, laughter] watching [?]. What shall I do? If you sit here, you have many [laughs], you know, disturbance in your mind [laughs]. If you are at home, you want to sit [laughs]. When you sit, you have-your mind is there. When you are there, your mind is here. And you are going back and forth [laughing, laughter]-or moon! Beautiful moon. Very busy moon.

So he says it is not like [laughs]-it is not like a mirror with reflection, nor like water under the moon. If we understand one side-sky or the water-or some images on the mirror, or some object, you cannot see both side at once. If we understand one side, the other side is dark. That is two. But usually you want to see the one side only [laughs], having some idea or some [laughs]-some desire for the other side. So you cannot accept what you are doing. You are always, you know, have something-something else in your mind [laughs]. You see some-one side, but the perfect way is just to watch one side. That is enough. This is pretty strict, you know. Before you understand that, you will say this is perfectly-perfect teaching. It will take time because you will have some-something else, you know, something opposite in your mind always-always.

So Zen is something more than just practice. Actually, Zen is something more than just cross-legged position. But if you understand something more, you have to, you know, practice in-practice it in cross-legged position. There is no other way. One side is enough.

You may say, just to sit on your black cushion will not do anything for you. You cannot solve the problems of our life by just sitting. You may say so [laughs]. You may say so, but it means you are trying to watch both side-up and down. Pretty busy. In that way, your practice will not work. If you say, "I have to sit. That's all. Period." There is no need for you to think the meaning of zazen, even, if you would just sit. That will work out beautifully. This is our zazen.

So one thing is enough. One practice is enough.

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (4/30/01).

[1] Suzuki-roshi is reading and commenting on Shobogenzo "Genjo-koan."

[2] The missing segments quoted here are from Eihei Dogen's Shobogenzo "Genjo Koan," following the translation by Kazuaki Tanahashi with Robert Aitken that appeared in: (1) Shobogenzo Genjo Koan: An Analytic Study (unpublished manuscript, San Francisco Zen Center); (2) Wind Bell, 1967, VI (2-4), pp. 60-62, and (3) the [Honolulu] Diamond Sangha [Newsletter]. In the fragments that are audible on the tape of this lecture, Suzuki-roshi is clearly following the Tanahashi/Aitken version.

2 - Shusogi, Section 1

Sunday, March 13, 1966

Sesshin Lecture: Shusogi, Section 1
Lecture B[1]

Soko-ji, San Francisco

Tape operator: Recorded March-March 13, 1966, Soko-ji Zen Temple, a lecture by Reverend Suzuki on the Shoshoji [sic]. Huh?

Second voice: Shushogi.

Tape operator: Is it? A lecture on the Shushogi. [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: We started to recite Lotus Sutra-Shushogi. Shushogi is the-consist of various teachings from Shobogenzo written by Dogen-zenji. From 95 fascicle of his work, we compiled various teaching in a handy way so that you can recite it. This is Shushogi.

I want to explain Shushogi-the meaning of Shushogi little by little. Shushogi. This is translate-translation by Doctor [Reiho] Masunaga, Page 48.[2]

To arrive at thorough understanding of birth and death-this is a crucial problem for all Buddhists. If the Buddha dwells in birth and death, birth and death disappear. Understand only that birth-and-death is itself nirvana; there is nothing to avoid as birth-death and nothing to seek as nirvana. You then slough off the chain that bind you to birth-death. This-the supreme problem in Buddhism-must be thoroughly penetrated.

The problem of birth and death-this is actually the big problem. The problem of-when we say problem of birth and death, we mean suffering of this world-birth and death. You may say birth is not suffering, but birth is suffering, and death is suffering too [2 words unclear]. When we say birth and death, we mean birth and death, not just physical pain or fear of-mental fear of death or birth. But this problem is vital problem for human being-not just physical or mental problem. Because of this suffering, we can live in this world. And because of this suffering, we have to study more. And because of this suffering-result of this suffering, sometime we fight [laughs]. This is fundamental problem of human life. So this suffering is not just suffering of human being-mental or physical suffering.

Mental suffering or physical suffering is-we say one of the-we say ju[3]-one of the five skandhas. But this suffering is not suffering. This suffering include all human suffering, including mental and physical suffering. The Sanskrit-in Sanskrit, we say dukkha. Dukkha means it-it wouldn't go-it doesn't go away. Why our life does not go away, or why human being has various problem is because of this suffering. And why we suffer is because we have attachment or love. But [by] "love" here we mean some attachment. We always attach to something. Because of this attachment, we fight. Because of this attachment, we find this world very disagreeable-because we feel some restriction. We want to do something, but there is many restriction. Because we attach to freedom too much, so we cannot act as we want. We cannot live exactly [as] we want. This is fundamental cause of suffering.

So we say "thirsty love." Thirsty love is to, you know, to crave for something and to attach to something. And we feel as if we cannot live without some attachment to some special thing. Sometime you may say it's much better to die if I lose this valuable thing. That is suffering. This suffering is more than-more deeper than problem of just physical or mental death-birth or-and death. But people do not know why we have so much trouble in this world. And instead of reflecting on our life, we want to-to establish some perfect world where there is no suffering-perfect world. This is also, you know, from Buddhist viewpoint, wrong-wrong way. It is because there is no perfection in this world. This is just attachment to the idea of perfection, and this is actually the cause of suffering-cause of world [word?]. And you may feel very pessimistic or sad, as I felt when I was young, when you hear this world is not constant.

In Japan, when I was young, they were striving for-to their descendant to save some money to build some beautiful, strong house for their descendant. But if they are fortunate-if they are lucky, they will be successful in building beautiful house, having big property, and a lot of money. But this fortune he build up will not last long. We say "third generation." They will put notice on their house-house to [laughs] sell or rent. "House to rent" for third generation [laughs]. "House to rent" for third generation. And my member[4] used to say to me that, "You are third generation from [laughs]-from your master. So you have to be careful." [Laughs.]

And their warning at last came to true [laughs], and I came to America [laughs, laughter]. My temple is now house to-temple to rent [laughs, laughter]. And my boy is striving for to take over [laughs] notice "House to rent." This is our life, but when you are young, this is not so, you know, so critical or some cold observation of the-our life.

So in this truth there is no exception-no exception [laughs]. We should know that. No exception. All of us-all of human being should be prepared for this truth. All the cultures-all the human cultures must suffer this suffering without exception. So from this point of view, our human history is the succession of suffering-human suffering. How we suffered-we have had suffered is our human history. Do you say Rome-Rome is not-do not last long? We-that is true. For everything that is true. If you ignore this point and attach or seize the prosperity you have, you will make big mistake. And you should be always prepared for next act or next stage.

When you are prepared for next step, then your culture is quite sound and strong. But when you just attach to the prosperity you have, this is very dangerous stage. It is not matter of-of power or wealth. There is strict controlling power-strict truth to everything. That is powerful enough to deny all the human power and wealth. No spiritual power doesn't work on this point. This is Buddha's teaching. And how we live in this world is Buddha's teaching.

This kind of suffering we mean is very deep and has been very critical to-to the people who has too much self-centered idea. So to appear means to disappear. That something disappear-only something that disappears is true existence. Something which does not disappear is illusion. Don't you think so? It is illusion because everything disappears [laughs] without any exception. So if you say this one-this flower does not disappear or die, that is illusion. When you think this flower will die pretty soon, that is real flower.

So something which does not disappear from this world is illusion for ourselves. So if you want to live-if you want to enjoy your prosperity, you should be prepared for the next step. If something you attach [to] disappear, what you will do next is a problem [laughs]. You should be prepared for next step. Something which is going should go [laughs], and we should work on something new. It is foolish to, you know, to try to bring back something which is going. This is very silly way of life. Something which comes should be welcome. As soon as it come, it will go [laughs, laughter].

So we have to be prepared for this situation-this kind of situation. And to have to face-to be prepared to face this kind of situation is our spirit, and to have this spirit is true spirit to live in this world. So to know [that] this world is world of suffering is wisdom. And to accept this kind of suffering is our true nature. If so, our history of human being from Buddha to us-the history of unfolding of true nature-true nature revealing-revealed itself through our human life. This strict truth and strict way of earth [?] unfolded itself from Buddha to us. This is another, you know, interpretation of human history. So our history of human being is history of suffering. And for Buddhist, it is history of true spirit-unfolding of true spirit.

So here we have the perfect understanding of birth and death. If so, this true understanding of birth and death-in other word, true understanding of suffering is nirvana itself-the unfolding of nirvana or unfolding of buddha-nature.

I don't want to be too-too critical [laughs] to our civilization, but most of you-most of us are already pretty critical to our civilization, and this is the time where we should let our civilization go [laughs] and try to establish new civilization. Something which is going should go [laughs]. There is no way to take them back. The sun is going there, so how can you pull the sun back to east again? The sun is just going; no one is responsible for that. No particular person is not responsible for that. It is just going, by nature [laughs].

So in this sense to live in this world is actually the suffering itself. But this suffering-if you prepare to accept the suffering and create it enough-vigorous enough to create new civilization, then you are following the truth. If you reflect on ourselves, what kind of effort we are making, you will find out how Buddhism is necessary for us to believe in.

This century, especially from Second World War or even before the Second World War, we came-our civilization reached some point where we have to think more. And if you-if people still making the same effort, you have to be [laughs] rather critical to [laughs]-to their effort, because you know what kind of effort they are making-the useless effort.

We cannot be-we cannot help being critical. It is the effort some people are making is too ridiculous. But at the same time, we should be-we should not forget this point, what we make-what makes us critical? On what ground you become critical is-should be at the same time reflected-to be reflected. Some people become critical and their criticism is based on some-also some perfection-to, you know, to favor [?] some perfect social framework. This is also mistake. They will repeat same error because of their perfectionism. There is nothing perfect in this world. Where we live, nothing perfect. And we-we have nothing to worthwhile to attach because there is nothing perfect.

So even though it is not perfect, something-some effort should be done. Even though it is not perfect, something new must be welcome. But it does not mean that is perfect [laughs]. So at the same time we have no excuse to force your way. You may call it collectivism-collectivism: to do something by group. This is not [laughs]-that is forcing your way on someone else. For an instance, Communistic way may be good, but the big mistake is the idea of the perfect, last framework of society. There is no last framework of society in this world. The-our social framework should be renewed and renewed and renewed. Their idea is not perfect at all. So here they have big mistake. What they are thinking is maybe good, but when they try to force their way to others by number, by strength, by material, or political power, that is big mistake.

So in short, we have our spiritual kingdom within ourselves. No one can invade into our spiritual kingdom. Our spiritual effort will provide better-better framework for our society, and this effort should be continued forever as long as human being exist. There is no time where-there is no-there is not necessary to make any effort, relying on some social structure. So everyone should have spiritual kingdom within ourselves. If this point is ignored, there is no human being in this world. We will become good pet [laughs]-pet of some social pet in or animal in the zoo [laughs]. Even though we may have good-something good to eat [laughs], temperature of the-our room may be perfect [laughs] for us. But we cannot-as long as we are human being, we will not be satisfied with perfect zoo. This point is very important for us. So some suffering is indispensable element for human being. Because we have some problem, to work on it we are human being. If there is no problem to work on it, we become animal in the zoo [laughs].

So to realize that we are in the world of suffering is to realize that we are in nirvana. That is oneness of birth and death and nirvana.

[Aside in Japanese.]

So we want to repeat his translation again:

To arrive at a subtle understanding of birth and death is-birth and death-this is the crucial problem for all Buddhist. If Buddha dwells in birth and death, birth and death

3 - The Way-Seeking Mind

Saturday, March 26, 1966

The Way-Seeking Mind

When we feel the evanescence of life, or when we have problems for ourselves, and direct feeling of the problems-of the fact you have to face-is how you arise the way-seeking mind.

Usually when we set ourselves to studying something, we put our everyday problems aside, concentrating our attention for a time on something of particular interest. That is how we study generally. On Sunday you may go to church, but to you going to church and your everyday life are two completely different activities. Eventually, however, you will feel some contradiction in your everyday life, and some uneasiness, feeling you have nothing to rely on. It is this feeling which gives rise to the way-seeking mind.

When you are young, young enough to act as you want, you can choose something good, ignoring something bad, and by working on something good, you may feel good enough to spend your early life. But some uneasiness, some dark feeling will follow in your life. Even though you try to appease your conscience by working hard and exhausting yourself on what you are doing, this kind of effort will not give you any conviction. Jumping around in this world without conviction may be the pitiful life. You will be pitied by someone who has strong conviction and deep wisdom concerning our life. Thus we should be ashamed of doing something proudly, vigorously, with some ecstasy even, ignoring the other side of the world, the dark side of our life.

By nature human beings have good and bad sides, half and half. When you want to do something good, at the same time you don't want to do something good. [Laughing.] If you want to get up early, at the same time you say, "I will stay in bed five more minutes. It is too early!" At the same time you want to get up, you will say to yourself, "No, yes, no!" "Yes" is fifty percent; "no" is fifty percent ... or more! Bad things sixty percent; good, forty percent."

The more you reflect on yourself, however, the more conscientious you become. Because you become more and more conscientious, you feel as if you are doing ninety-nine percent bad things! That is actually human nature. It is not a matter of what is good and what is bad. It is a matter of our human nature. When you realize this fact in your everyday life, you have to wonder what we should do. If you realize this fact, you will not be fooled by anyone. You may take some pleasure in entertainments, but you cannot fool yourself completely. You cannot deceive yourself when you realize the true state of our human nature.

Some people say, "If we have a perfect social construction, we will not have these difficulties." But as long as there is human nature, nothing will help us. On the contrary, the more human culture advances, the more difficulties we will have in our life. The advancement of civilization will accelerate this contradiction in our nature. When we realize the absolute presence of our contradictory nature, the way-seeking mind arises, and we begin to work on ourselves instead of the material world. Most people who are interested in Buddhism are more or less critical of our social condition, expecting a better social framework. Some people have become disgusted with our human life. We cannot approve of these criticisms fully, however, because they do not rest on the full understanding of our human nature.

Human nature is always the same. Some people may say our spiritual culture will progress when our material civilization progresses. Strictly speaking, however, as long as we have human nature, it is impossible to obtain a perfect idealistic spiritual culture in our human world. We should fully realized this point. Because of our uneasiness, we are too anxious to achieve something perfect in our spiritual life. Here we have some danger. Our spiritual life cannot be regarded as we have come to regard our material life. You cannot work on your spiritual life as you do your materialistic life. Even though you talk about our spiritual life thousands of times, it will not help you. It is necessary to know actually what is our human world, or what is our human nature. This is a very important point. If you fail to observe our human nature fully, even though you study Buddhism, what you acquire is not what Buddha meant.

For many years we have been practicing zazen here at Zen Center. And we think it is time we made some progress. I think so. You think so as well. But when we feel in this way, we should be careful not to mistake our way. We should know what is the way-seeking mind, what is human nature.

Some people may say, if human nature is always the same, then it is useless [laughing] to practice zazen, to study Buddhism. But our study is based on this fact. Our study is not to improve upon the actual fact that we have good and bad, half and half, as our human nature. We should not try to improve upon this actual fact. Even Buddha accepted this truth ... he started Buddhism based on this fact. He accepted this truth. If you try to change this truth, you are no longer a Buddhist.

Buddha said our human life is a life of suffering. This is a fundamental truth. Knowing this fact, having this deep understanding of human nature, we may continue our life step by step helping each other. Because we have good and bad, half and half, we can help. If all of us (laughing) were good, it would be impossible to help one another. It is a good thing that we have good nature and bad nature ... we are able to feel the improvement, however slightly we may change. It would be wonderful if we could help another even by a hair's breadth. It makes no difference what sort of problems or situation in life we have. If we have something to work on, it is enough. Because we have good and bad, half and half, because we can find some way to help others, if only by the width of a sheet of paper, by a few words, we can enjoy our life.

The way-seeking mind should be realized in our actual world, which includes flowers and stones, and stars and moon. The true way-seeking mind can only be actualized in full scale. Where there are human beings, there is the sun and stars, land and ocean, fish and grass and birds. Without this vast area to live in, where we can have our various problems, we cannot survive in this world. But forgetting this vast realm where we have absolute freedom, we seek for something merely for the sake of ourselves, just for human beings. Thus we have to suffer our nature, which has good and bad, fifty-fifty. When we become aware of this big realm, which includes everything, then we have big, big mind and big, big trust. We have perfect eternal freedom within this big realm.

Actually the way-seeking mind is the conviction to fly as a bird that flies in the air, to enjoy our being in this vast world of freedom. Enjoying our nature as a part of this vast world, we have no uncertainty because we don't know there is nowhere to go. Life and death is not our problem anymore. We attain enlightenment in this big realm. We suffer in this big realm. We are ignorant of the limit of the world. Here we don't have even the problem of attaining enlightenment. Ignorance is good, enlightenment is good; zazen is good, to stay at home is good. Every activity will take place in this big realm. Our human effort, our human culture should be based on this kind of imperturbable conviction. Our effort should not be limited to ourselves. That is what I mean by the way-seeking mind.

When Dogen-zenji attained enlightenment, he said he forgot all about his body and mind. This means he found himself in this big world. So our activity should be limitlessly small and at the same time should be limitlessly great. There is no difference in the greatness of our activity, and what may seem a trivial small activity. They have the same value. Our pleasure and conscience will be fully supported by this big, big realm. In this way we practice zazen. We should strive for enlightenment, of course. We should try to calm down our mind. But it is impossible to obtain enlightenment or to calm down your mind without realizing the fact of this big realm which supports us. If you don't realize this fact, trying to calm your mind is the same as arguing which came first, the chicken or the egg. The moment you say the hen came first, the egg is already there as her mother. There is no end to the argument.

That we appear in this world means we should disappear from this world [laughing]. If you were not born in this world, there would be no need to die. To be born in this world is to die, to disappear. That we can do something good means that we can do

1966 mei (2)

1 - Genjo Koan, Paragraphs 1-2

Wednesday, May 25, 1966

Sesshin Lecture: Genjo Koan, Paragraphs 1-2
Soko-ji Temple, San Francisco[1]

The secret of all the teaching of Buddhism is how to live on each moment. Moment after moment we have to obtain the absolute freedom. And moment after moment, we exist in interdependency to past and future and other existence. So in short, to practice-if you practice zazen, concentrating yourself on your breathing moment after moment, that is how to keep precepts, how to have the actual understanding of Buddhist teaching, and how to help others, and how to help yourself, how to attain liberation. Why we call true Zen the capital city of religion is we have actually m- [partial word]-gist of teaching and secret of practice-to understand various religion and various way of practice through and through.

As I said this morning, we do not aim for or emphasize some particular state of mind or some particular teaching. Even though it is perfect and profound teaching, we do not emphasize the teaching only. We rather emphasize how we understand it, how we bring the truth into practice. And this practice also does not-does not mean some particular practice. When we say "Zen," Zen include all the activity of our life.

This morning, Reverend Katagiri explained our monastic rules. And Dogen-zenji said, our practice-we are like a water and milk. When we, each one of us practice-are concentrated on this practice of Zen, we are not anymore each separated being. Oneness of the all the students or monks is there. When you live in each moment, each one of you are independent being. And at the same time, each one of you [is] obtaining absolute independency. You attain the same buddhahood that Buddha attained, that various patriarchs attained. So having-living in each one's absolute freedom, we attain same attainment.

So we are-each one of us is independent in the same realm. When this realm is understood, there are student, there are teacher, there are someone who serve tea, there are someone who drink tea, and there are independent being. And we are practicing the practice which was started by Buddha-buddha-sangha. In this way, Buddhism was carried out by Buddhist.

So although Buddha was born 2,500 years ago, but Buddha is right here when we practice his practice. Buddha lives in our age with us. But Buddha is Buddha, and we are a student. So you may say there is student and teacher, but we are all the same-we are all practicing the same practice exactly the same way as he did-as they did at their time. Actually, we are practicing same practice with them. If so, whatever we do, that is Buddha's practice, and this is how we kept practice-precepts.

In Buddha's day, there were-their way of life-in China there was Chinese way of life, in Japan there is Japanese way of life. But when we live in that day, in that age, in this way, although the way of living is different, but actually what we do does not differ from what Buddha did because we-there we express absolute freedom. There is no two absolute freedom.

So when in China-when they are too much interested in Buddha's-Buddhist philosophy, they ignored how to live in Buddha's way. In other word, they ignored how to keep precepts. To keep precepts is not to keep Indian way of life. When you eat here, you should eat here. You cannot [laughs] eat in India all the time [laughs]. Strictly speaking, if you want to keep precepts literally, you have to go to India [laughs]. Then you can keep the-keep precepts completely.

Eisai-zenji[2] referred to very interesting story in his work. There was some Chine- [partial word]-some monk from India [laughs]. When he came to India-China, he could not observe Indian precepts because the custom is different. So he returned to India because he was very much afraid of breaking Indian precepts [laughs].

So if you-misu- [partial word]-do not know how to observe precepts, or if you emphasize just written precepts without knowing how to keep it [laughs], then Buddhism will die immediately [laughs, laughter]. But if you know how to keep our precepts, Buddhism will continue and will develop as Zen developed in China. Various Mahayana school was lost in China except Zen because, you know, they-they were too much interested in the philosophy of Buddhism without knowing how to actualize the teaching. So eventually they ignored precepts, but they may say they did not ignore. "Zen student ignored it," they may say, because Zen student did not observe it literally. But Mahayana schools observed it as Indian Buddhist did. And they thought this is Buddha's way. So Buddha's way eventually separated from their everyday life. But Zen student understood precepts as a-as their way of life. So they do not mind the formal way of life-formality. And they were so sure that their way of practice was how to actualize Buddha's teaching. And how to actualize Buddha's teaching is, in short, to live on each moment. And that is the conclusion of Mahayana philosophy-how to live in this moment, how to attain enlightenment. How to be Buddha is how to attain perfect freedom. How to attain perfect freedom is how to live in-in this moment.

So in China they established Buddhist-Zen Buddhist established new precepts, which is called pure rules. New precepts for themselves. For other Buddhist, precepts is some rules Buddha observed, but for them precepts is their own way of life: how to live on this-in this moment in that place. When we are not so sincere about our practice or about our way of life-about ourselves, you may say there is teaching. "I am priest," you know, "but they are layman" [laughs]. "I am priest, and Buddhist teaching is written in the book-in some particular book."

So if you understand Buddhism in this way, they can ignore the precepts. Precepts is written in the book, and precepts is for some particular person. But if you realize the religion is for everyone and should be our way of life, you know, the some certain precepts, which is written in some particular book, cannot be actualized-cannot be bring into practice-everyday practice. So when we become sincere about our everyday life and the meaning of religion, we cannot live in old precepts which was set up for some other person. We should have our own precepts.

So in this way, Hyakujo-zenji established Mahayana precepts for the first time in eighth century. Mahayana Buddhism introduced in China in, maybe, four[th] century. For many years, they observed Indian precepts. It is impossible, you know. They say they observed it [laughs] but no one can believe [laughs]-no one can trust them. It is impossible for Chinese people to observe Indian precepts [laughs]. It is ridiculous. If they think they observed it, they are very selfish people. They observed it just for himself, for priest only, ignoring how-what kind of life usual, ordinal [ordinary] people have.

Excuse me, if you-if your car is in front of the door, will you [laughs] move it [laughs, laughter]?

So Zen Buddhist was very serious about their way of life and people's way of life, so they established-they renewed precepts-Indian precepts. So in India, you know, they practice zazen to attain-maybe they could practice zazen all day long if-it-it was possible as a group, even, because the monks were supported entirely by people. After they finish their household life, they became monks. And their boys and girls supported them. So [laughs] for them it was possible. But for Chinese monks who must support themselves, by themselves, cannot sit all day long. And whatever they do, it should be Zen. So they developed the practice more to everyday life. So Chinese Zen was more practical. They knew how to apply the-apply Zen in everyday life.

And how to apply in everyday life is not difficult, because if we live on each moment, that is Zen. Whether you are sitting or working, when you live on each moment as you practice Zen, that is how to practice Zen. So Zen is in our everyday life. So you may say Indian way was rather lazy way [laughs], not active enough. So eventually-naturally

Indian Zen emphasized some state of-some mysterious state of mind, but in China they emphasized more the attitude or way to have direct experience of various experience.

In this way, the Buddhist philosophy actualized in Zen practice. And oneness of the practice-zazen practice and everyday activity was brought to our society. So Zen is the source of the philosophy, and source of art, and source of various religious life.

In-in Genjo Koan, at-in first paragraph he-Dogen-zenji gives us the whole pattern of Buddhist way: [3]

When all things are Buddhist phenomena-

-when all things are Buddhist teaching, you may say-we have enlightenment and ignorance-

-something to study or something to observe-precepts, or sutras, or problem of philosophical discussion of life and death, or enlightened one, or the ignorance-ignorance.

When all things are without self, we have no ignorance, no enlightenment, no buddhas, no people, no life, and no-no death.

When all things are without self-when all things-all what we do is done in realm of selflessness, like milk and water, there is no water or no milk. When the whole textile is woven completely in various colorful thread, you know, what you see is not piece of thread, what you see is one whole textile. Do you understand? So [laughs] there is no need to say "this is water" when you drink milk. Do you say this is water and this is milk [laughs]? You drink just milk, and there is no water or no milk.

So he says:

When all things are without self, we have no ignorance, no enlightenment, no Buddha, no people, no life and death.

Buddhist way is beyond being and non-being. Buddhist way-we know each colorful thread, and we know also the one whole woven textile. We know both side-both way-we observe things in two ways without any contradiction. But when we are not sincere enough, you may say, "This is Buddhism [laughs], and this is other religion. We are monks, and they are layman, that's all." So they don't understand the whole beautiful textile.

But Buddhist way is beyond being a thread or a textile-beyond thread or textile. Therefore we have life and death, ignorance and enlightenment. Still we see the various color in the woven textile, and we appreciate the color of the-the textile.

So he says:

We have life and death, ignorance and enlightenment, people and buddhas.

-and so many interesting colors on the piece of-one whole piece of cross-cloth.

However, flowers fall with our attachment and weeds grow with our detachment.

However, even though we are Buddhist, we live with people seeing the flower fade-fading away day by day. With our attachment, the thing that we-bring out the weeds day after day with our detachment.

That we move ourselves-

-he explained more about it. Here in the second paragraph, there are many-various idea and various practice, not only Zen but also Pure Land school-way of Pure Land school and various way of religion. But those are, for him, one beautiful textile. So it is-so that is why his teaching is called the source of all religion-not "source," but [laughs]-not source but, you know-each religion makes sense, you know. Thread does not-a piece of thread is not useful. When you make beautiful cloth with it-it, you know, it is-it become useful-it become perfect religion.

So each schools of Buddhism and various religion find its own meaning in big religious-human religious life. It makes sense. It means to weave a beautiful cloth with thread. Each religion is just a piece of thread. Maybe it is colorful, you know, maybe it is beautiful, but if you weave something with it, you can use it as your beautiful dress. In this sense, his teaching is called-not "source," but [laughs]-sometime we say capital city-not "cap-" [partial word]-because various road come to the center.

Anyway, in this sense our way has two faces. One is as a secret of the religion: how to find the meaning-true meaning of religion. And, on the other hand, we remain as one of the school of Buddhism or one of the various-one of the many ways of practice.

So we have two face [?]. We are actually-we-I belong to Soto school. I am a just a-I am just a piece of thread [laughs]. But we know how to, you know, how to make ourselves a piece of useful material. This is Soto way. Without knowing how to make ourselves useful, to observe some lofty way of acting [?] does not make much sense, you know.

So in the second paragraph he says:

That we move ourselves and understand all things is ignorance.

He give the definition of various thread-this is red thread, this is pink, this is blue-like this. "That we move ourselves and understand all things is ignorance." Then what is enlightenment? Enlightenment is:

That things advance and understand themselves-that is enlightenment. It is buddhas who understand ignorance.

Who is Buddha? Buddha is someone who understands ignorance. Who is people? People are ignorant of enlightenment. So he says:

It is people who are ignorant of enlightenment. Further, there are those who are enlightened about-above enlightenment-

-like Soto school-

and those who are ignorant of ignorance-

-like Pure Land school.

When buddhas are truly buddhas, they are not necessarily aware of themselves as buddhas. But they are enlightened ones and advance in enlightenment.

I-we are not necessary-necessarily be just Soto priests, you know. We are one of the Buddhist [laughs]. But we cannot practice all the ways of practice. Although we practice just Soto way, but we are-nevertheless, we are Buddhist [laughs]. That's all.

So here you will find out how important it is to live in each moment. This-our way to live-to live on each moment makes everything possible-makes precept observation possible, makes attaining enlightenment possible, makes to attain absolute freedom from various sectarianism possible. And, first of all, this practice makes us possible to attain perfect, complete satisfaction in our life.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (5/4/01).

The dates of various lectures for the Genjo Koan series at Soko-ji are inaccurate. Based on the sequence of paragraphs Suzuki-roshi commented upon, as well as comments such as, "We have already finished the first paragraph," the following sequence is suggested:

1. SR-66-05-25V (¶¶ 1-2)
2. SR-66-05-26V (¶¶ 5-13)
3. SR-66-03-13-A (¶¶ 1-3)
4. SR-66-06-19-B (¶¶ 7-9)
5. SR-66-06-19-D (¶¶ 11-13)
6. SR-66-06-19-A (¶¶ 1-11, recapitulation).

These and other paragraphs were discussed in the later series of lectures on the Genjo Koan that Suzuki-roshi gave at Tassajara in 1967 (for which no tapes are currently available):

1. SR-67-08-21 (¶¶ 6 and 9-11)
2. SR-67-08-23 (¶¶ 12-14)
3. SR-67-08-20-A (¶¶ 15-18).

[1] The date is highly suspect. On the original tape it was listed as Saturday, 5/25/66. But 5/25/66 was a Wednesday. The date of 5/25/66 was arbitrarily retained and the day was changed to Wednesday. No sesshins were listed in Wind Bell for May 1966. This is probably the first lecture in Suzuki-roshi's 1966 series of lectures on Genjo Koan given at Soko-ji. For the probable sequence, please see the end of this lecture.

[2] Myoan Eisai, Yosai, Senko (Zenko) -kokushi: 1141-1215. Japanese Zen master of the Oryo lineage. Dogen practiced at his monastery, Kennin-ji.

[3] Suzuki-roshi is commenting on Eihei Dogen's Shobogenzo "Genjo Koan," following the translation by Kazuaki Tanahashi with Robert Aitken that appeared in: (1) Shobogenzo Genjo Koan: An Analytic Study (unpublished manuscript, San Francisco Zen Center); (2) Wind Bell, 1967, VI (2-4), pp. 60-62, and (3) the [Honolulu] Diamond Sangha [Newsletter].

2 - Genjo Koan, Paragraphs 5-13

Thursday, May 26, 1966

Sesshin Lecture: Genjo Koan, Paragraphs 5-13
Thursday, May 26, 1966[1]

Sunday Morning

Firewood turns into ash, and it does not turn into firewood again. But do not suppose that the ash is after and the firewood before. We must understand that firewood is at the stage of firewood, and there must- and there we find-there we find its before and after. And yet with this past and future, its present is independent of them. Ash is at the stage of ash, and there we find its before and after. Just as firewood does not become firewood again after it's-after it is ash, so does not ret- [partial word]-so a-so man does not return to life after his death.

In this paragraph, he [Dogen-zenji] taught us the absolute independent-independency of our various existence, which covers everything. Because it include everything, it is independent being. So here we find the absolute liberation. When we practice zazen, concentrating ourselves on each breathing, we are absolute independent being.

When Ummon[3] said, "follow waves and drive waves"- "follow waves and drive waves," when we completely follow the waves, waves of being, we are completely-when we are one with waves, we are absolutely independent being.

So "follow waves." "To follow waves is to drive waves." When Dogen-zenji talks about time-time, he didn't say so, but time drive being-time follow the being, and time drive being. When time-time is originally one with being. Twelve hours is the duration of the time. When the sun rise and set in east is same thing. Twelve hours means the sun-for the sun is duration of time. It is the activity of the sun, rising from the east, setting in east [west]. So it is same thing.

So "drive"-you may say, "drive being-follow being and drive being." That is Ummon's practice. When you follow your, you know-when your mind follows your breathing, it means your mind drives your breathing-follows breathing and drives your breathing. So your breathing and-your being and your mind is one. So here we have absolute freedom. Here we become one independent being. We obtain absolute freedom.

So we should not say "firewood became ash." Ash is ash [laughs], firewood is firewood. Firewood is independent being. Ash is also independent being. But ash include the firewood, and firewood includes the ash with everything. Not only include-not only ash include firewood, but also it include everything. So firewood is independent being, and ash is also independent being. So one breathing after another, you obtain the absolute freedom when you practice-when you are concentrated on each breathing: exhaling and inhaling.

In Gakudo-yojin-shu[4]-Gakudo-yojin-shu is the important-ten important instruction for practice of zazen-ten instruct. And in-in the first instruction, Dogen-zenji talks about evanescence of life. And in-in it, when he talks about the evanescence of life he says, "Exhaling-what is your exhaling and inhaling? After all, what is the inhaling and exhaling?" There is no self. When you are completely absorbed in your breathing, there is no self. What is it, you know-what is your breathing? That breathing is not you or air. [Laughs.] What is it? That is not self at all. When you are completely involved in breathing, there is no self. When there is no self, you have absolute freedom. Because you have, you know, silly idea of self [laughing], you have a lot of problems. So he said, "Your problem are home-made problem" [laughs, laughter]. Maybe very recent [?]. That is why you like it, on the other hand. If you like it-as long as you like it, it's all right [laughs, laughter].

Now it is specifically taught in Buddhism that life does not become death. For this reason, life is called "no-life." It is specifically taught in Buddhism that death does not become life. Therefore, death is called "no-death."

It is not matter of life or death. When death is accepted as death through-and-through, it is not death any more. Because you compare death [laughs] with life, it is something. But when death is understood, completely, as death, death is not death any more. Life is not life any more when life is life through-and-through [laughs].

Nishida[5]-the outstanding philosopher in Japan, says, "Stone is-people say stone is-looks like frog or mountain, but stone is not-is not valuable because it looks like frogs or mountain. Stone is valuable when the stone is stone through-and-through." [Laughs.] Do you understand? When we are ignorant through-and-through, we are not ignorant any more.

So in the last page [of the Genjo Koan handout], I think, he [Dogen-zenji] says:

When we first seek the truth, we are far away from its environs. When we discover that the truth was already being correctly transmitted to us, we [are] ourselves at the moment-at that moment. If we watch the shore from a boat, it seems that the shore is moving. But when you watch the boat directly, we know that it is the boat that moves. If we examine all things with a confused body and mind, we will suppose that our selves is permanent. But we are-but if we practice closely and return to our present place, it will be clear that nothing at all is permanent.

Now the one [counting]-two-three-the four-fourth-four-fourth paragraph [of that page]:

Life is period of itself, and death is period of itself. They are like winter and spring. We do not call winter the future spring, nor spring the future summer.

We finished up to this paragraph.[6]

We gain enlightenment like the moon reflecting in the water. The moon does not get wet, nor is the water broken. Although its light is wide and great, the moon is reflected even in the puddle an inch wide. The whole moon and the whole sky are reflected in a drop of dew in the grass.

So even for a moment, when you practice zazen, whole universe is within you as the moon is in the drop of dew in the grass. This is what he meant.

Enlightenment does not destroy the man, just as the moon does not break the water. Man does not hinder enlightenment, just as a drop of dew does not hinder the moon in the sky. The depth of the drop is the height of the moon. The period of the reflection, long or short, will prove the vastness of the dewdrop, and the vastness of the moonlight sky-moonlit sky-moonlit sky.

[Repeats last two sentences:]

The depth of the drop is the height-height of the moon. The period of the reflection, long or short, will prove the vastness of the dewdrop, and the vastness of the moonlit sky.

It is-he is repeating same thing by another parable.

When the truth does not fill our body and mind, we think that we have enough. When the truth fill-fills our body and mind, we know that something is missing. For an example-for example, when we g- [partial word]-when we view the world from a boat on the ocean, it looks-it looks circular and nothing else. But the ocean is neither round nor square, and its features are infinite in variety. It is like a palace. It is like a jewel. It seems circular as far as our eyes can reach at the time. All things are so. Though there are many features in the dusty life and the pure life, we only understand what our study can reach. And in our study of all things we must appreciate that although they may look round or square, the other feature of oceans or mountains are infinite in variety, and universe lies in all quarters. It is so not only around ourselves, but also directly here-even in a drop of water.

You say you attained some stage in your practice, but, you know, that is just a trivial event in your long life. It is like-it is like to say the ocean is round, or ocean is like a jewel, or ocean is like a palace for a dragon-ocean is a palace for a fish-ocean is big house-home. For a human being, the ocean is water [laughs]. So there must be various understanding.

When ocean is palace, it is palace [laughs]. You sh- [partial word]-you cannot say it is not palace. For a dragon it is actually a palace. If you laugh at a fish who say that is palace, Buddha will laugh at you when you say it is two o'clock-three o'clock [laughs, laughter]. It is same thing [laughs]. So if we know this fact, we cannot laugh at fish. So when we do not know the truth, we think we found out something [laughs]. But when we think so-think in that way, we are far from the enlightenment.

If we know the truth, we think something is missing-not "missing"- "something"-not "something is missing"-we-we think that is not all. In Japanese, you know, famous writer Fumiko Hayashi,[7] you know, she always said, "This-this is not all my ability. This work is not all my ability." [Laughs.] This is very interesting statement. He wrote-she wrote and wrote and wrote. And at last she became a very famous writer. But she al- [partial word]-people say she is a good writer, but, "This is not all my ability. This is not what I want to write." [Laughs.] People say he is-she is good, but she says, "I am not good writer. I-I cannot express my feelings yet. This is more what I want to express [explain?]." "Something is missing" in this sense, you know. When you are ignorant through-and-through, when you are-when you are unable to explain yourself through-and-through, it is good, you know. When [s] he says, "This is exactly what I [laughs], wanted to say," she-she may not be so good one [writer].

When-when a fish swims in the ocean, there is no end to the water, no matter how far it swims. When a bird flies in the sky, there is no end to the air, no matter how far it flies. However, the fish and the bird do not leave their elements.

Elements being water or sky.

The bird-the fish and the bird do not leave their elements. When the use is large, it is used largely. When the use is small, it is used in a small way. Though it flies everywhere, if the bird leaves the air, it will die at once. Water makes life, and air makes life. The bird makes life, and the fish makes life. Life makes the bird, and life makes the fish. There are the further analogies possible to illustrate, in this way, practice, enlightenment, mortality, and eternity.

Mortality or eternity or practice or enlightenment or ignorance should be understood in this way. But before you understand the true meaning of mortality or eternity or enlightenment or ignorance just by intellectual, without having a deep understanding, mortality is something which is different from eternity. Enlightenment is something which is different from ignorance. Practice is something to attain enlightenment, and practice and enlightenment are two completely different things. After you attain enlightenment, there is no ignorance, but if you understand what is enlightenment in its true sense, enlightenment is ignorance too. When he is not aware of his own ignorance, that is not enlightenment.

Do you know Asahina Sogen?[8] He is the abbot of Rinzai-Engaku. After his long practice-after-long after he attained enlightenment, he get married [laughs]. And his followers, I think, must have been disappointed [laughs]-very much sad, I think. But what he says, recently, is very very meaningful and interesting. And he knows that people may [be] disappointed with him [laughs]. But he has, you know, some confidence or some faith in it. He did not get married just to [because], you know, he wanted his friend-his particular friend. But he felt, you know, "something is missing" [laughs] with his [1 word]. So he wanted to be that ignorant, ordinal [ordinary] feeling [fellow?] after he attained enlightenment. He wanted to know-he acknowledged his humanity. I think that is true enlightenment. He does not say so, actually. He is laughing at himself [laughs]. This is very very meaningful.

Once he secluded-once he retired in remoted mountain with his good friend. That friend was Soto priest [laughs]. He secluded himself with Soto priest in remoted mountain. They practiced in the mountain because they could not satisfied with their practice. That-the house they built was-I don't know how many miles in your counting-but very very far away from the last house in the village. And they raised their own food in the mountain and supported themselves. His practice was so hard, and after hard practice [laughs] like that, he got married with some lady [laughs, laughter]-he married his boy- [partial word]-girlfriend. The usual people, you know, who understand mortality and eternity-enlightenment ignorance, in something different way will be disappointed [laughs] with him.

But eternity is in mortality. When we are a mortal being, through-and-through, we are-we will acquire the immortal life. When we are absorbed in the fear [pure?] ignorant practice [laughs], you have enlightenment. So after all, how to be the true Buddhist is to find the meaning of life in your limited activity. There is no need for you to be a great [person]. In your limited activity, you should find out true meaning of yourself. If you pick up a small-even a small stone, you have whole universe. But if you try to pick up pebbles of the gallon [?], you will be crazy, and you will be sympathized with [laughs] people.

When a fish swims in the ocean, there is no end to the water.

This is a very interesting point. There is no end-there is no end in our practice. Because there is no end in our practice, our practice is good. Don't you think so? But usually, you expect our practice could be effective enough [laughs] to put an end in your hard practice. If-if I say, "Practice hard just two years" [laughs, laughter], then you will be interested in our practice. If I say, "You have to practice whole life" [laughs, laughter], then you will be disappointed. "Oh, Zen is not good. Zen is not for me." But if you understand what is practice, and if you [are] interested in practice, the reason why you interested in-you are interested in practice is the practice is endless. That is why I am interested in Buddhism. There is no end. If there is some end, I don't think Buddhism is so good. There is no end. Even [if] human being vanish from this earth, Buddhism exist. That is why I am interested in Buddhism. Buddhism is not always perfect. It is not perfect at all. Because it is not perfect, I like it. If it is perfect, someone will be-many people will be interested in it, so there is no need for me to work on it. Because people are very much discouraged [laughs] with Buddhism, so I feel someone must practice Buddhism.

The other day, when we had wake-up service in the first [2-3 words], I thought it might be better to bow in our way. But they said if you bow in that way, people may be discouraged [laughs, laughter]. It is true-very true. I know people will be discouraged. I know we are giving a lot of discouragement. For a long time-when-in Japan they bow to each other [laughs, laughter]. I know that very well. So I bow nine times. I will not practice zazen so hard as I do in America [laughs, laughter]. So same thing will be understood in completely different way, you know. And I know how they feel-exactly how they feel. But why I am interested in Buddhism is it is not complete at all. And Buddhism wants our effort always. Eternally it wants our [laughs] constant effort. That is why I like Buddhism.

So until you are interested in this point, you cannot understand Buddhism. In this way, practice, enlightenment, morality, and eternity: morality-normal- [partial word]-mortality makes eternity. Eternity makes mortality. Enlightenment makes practice. Practice makes enlightenment. In this way, there is-"further analogy is possible to illustrate our practice." Bird makes sky, sky makes bird. Fish makes bird, bird makes fish [laughs]. In this way, there must be further analogies possible-further possible illustration of our practice. So, in short, it is enough if you do one thing with sincerity. That is enough, after all. There is no need to try to know the vastness of the sky or depth of the sea.

Now if a bird or a fish tries to reach the end of its element before moving in it, this bird or this fish will not find its way or its place. When we find our place at this moment-when we find our way at-at this moment-

[Aside:] Might mean this is [1-2 words].

-when we find our place at this place, when we find our way-

[Aside:] -oh, no, no-it's all right- [Sounds like he is talking to a student and declining an offer of something-not rejecting the translation.]

-when we find our place at this moment-when we find our way at this moment, then practice follows, and this is the realization of the truth.

"When we find our place at this moment-when we find our way"-when we do something at some moment, at some place, in some way, that is the realization of truth.

For the place and for the way are neither large nor small-

It is not matter of big or small, good or bad.

-neither subjective nor objective-or-neither subject nor object. They have not exist from the beginning, and they are not in process of realization.

"They have not existed from the beginning." The realization of the truth did not-was not existent from the beginning, or before we realize it-before realization, you know. You may say now realization of the truth take place through my activity. But it is not so. Or you may say it is the process of the realization. It is not so. The-each realization of the truth is one absolute realization of the truth. It is not happened in-on this moment, or it is not-it will happen in some other time again. For you, the realization of the truth is-realization of the truth you have now is the absolute realization of the truth. You cannot compare your realization of the truth with some other realization of the truth. Each one who realize this fact and who practice your way with sincerity has absolute freedom.

So he says:

It is not-they have not existed from the beginning, and they are not in the process of the realization.

Your realization is-does not become other's realization. Not at all. But we-all the realization of the truth is exactly the same. Your realization of the truth is same as Buddha's realization of the truth. There is no difference at all. So it is not just happen to you at this moment or it has happened three thousand years ago. So this is not mortality or not eternity.

Fundamental truth-excuse me [laughter]-some [?] piece of paper.[9]
Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Bill Redican (5/4/01).

[1] The two dates do not agree. The original transcript stated "Sunday morning," but 5/26/66 was a Thursday. Both of these dates are questionable.

[2] Suzuki-roshi is commenting on Eihei Dogen's Shobogenzo "Genjo Koan," following the translation by Kazuaki Tanahashi with Robert Aitken that appeared in: (1) Shobogenzo Genjo Koan: An Analytic Study (unpublished manuscript, San Francisco Zen Center); (2) Wind Bell, 1967, VI (2-4), pp. 60-62, and (3) the [Honolulu] Diamond Sangha [Newsletter]. "Page 2" here refers to a reproduced handout of the koan distributed to the students.

[3] Yunmen Wenyan (Ummon Bun'en): 864-949. Chan master of Tang China.

[4] Eihei Dogen, Gakudo-yojin-shu: Collection of Concerns in Learning the Truth (1 fascicle), 1234.

[5] Nishida Kitaro (1870-1945): an important 20th-century Japanese philosopher. Suzuki-roshi entered Komazawa University, Tokyo, in 1926, at a time when Nishida Kitaro was probably widely discussed.

[6] In SR-66-05-25, Suzuki-roshi discussed only Paragraphs 1 and 2, which is further evidence that the dates of this series are generally quite wrong.

[7] Fumiko Hayashi (1903-1951): Japanese novelist and short-story writer.

[8] Asahina Sogen: Primate of the Rinzai school and abbot of Enkaku-ji Temple, Kamakura, Japan.

[9] Suzuki-roshi appears to be borrowing or returning one of the pages of the koan.

1966 juni (6)

1 - Evening Lecture

Wednesday, June 01, 1966

Evening Lecture, Summer 1966
Soko-ji Temple, San Francisco

Buddhism has many annual layers like a big tree. It is our tradition to respect those efforts which our patriarchs have made for more than 2000 years. There has been a great effort, we have made a great effort to develop Buddha's way. This is a very important point for Buddhism as a religion. Without appreciation for the efforts of our patriarchs it is difficult to have a religious feeling in Buddhism.

This temple was founded in 1934. At that time there were not many priests in America and the founder made a great effort to collect the donations to buy this building. He was able to raise only part of the cost and the Japanese members year after year paid on the mortgage. Even when they were in detention camps during the war they collected money for the mortgage. This was an important effort they made in the camps, but it is nothing compared to the effort and devotion of our ancestors and patriarchs in India, in China, and in Japan in preserving and developing Buddhism. Even one line of a gatha or scripture is the result of their actual effort. That is not just teaching. We should continue these efforts generation after generation forever. Our responsibility as a Buddhist is to continue this effort wherever they are.

As I said this afternoon, it is necessary to have an aim in our life. The most important aim of a Buddhist is to be a successor of the patriarchs. If you do not understand this aim you are studying Buddhism from the outside. For outsiders Buddhism is nothing. When you accept Buddhism as your own and try to develop it as your own, then Buddhism will have tremendous meaning to us.

Intellectual study of Buddhism is of course necessary, but you should not stay at the edge of Buddhism. Intellectually, Patriarchs made a great effort. Even though they were often treated as heretics, they studied from a pure intellectual point of view and tried not to ignore the smallest illogical point of Buddhism. Historically there is some doubt about our lineage especially before Bodhidharma. Today everyone knows that the names and connections are not historically perfect, but we also know that Buddhism has been transmitted from warm hand to warm hand from Buddha's time until our own day. The fact and spirit of the teaching have been transmitted. Historical or scientific studies are not perfect. There is a limit to scientific truth.

The artistic expression of Buddhism is also not perfect. But that which is painted may be more real to us. It is the same with our teaching which is more human than actual human nature. The precepts which are most difficult to follow are the ones which appeal more directly to us, encourage us more, and help us more, than worldly rules which it is possible to observe.

The usual meaning of rules and law is that we observe them to protect citizens for the benefit of society. But Buddhist precepts are for each one of us and not for some one else. The precepts which look unreal and idealistic are really more practical for each human being and better satisfy our inmost request.

It looks like a very impractical waste of time to sit here all day on your cushion; but if you understand yourself you will understand why we practice zazen. The necessity of zazen and the precepts is within yourself and not outside.

I am a priest and you are laymen. You may say that Buddhism written in a book is for some particular persons; and you as laymen can ignore the precepts. But if you realize that religion is for everyone and should be observed as our way of life, you will know that book-precepts that cannot be actualized, cannot be part of our everyday practice.

When we are sincere about our everyday life and about the meaning of religion, we will not be able to live with precepts which were set up for some other people. We should have our own precepts. In this way Hyakujo-zenji [720-814] established Mahayana precepts for the first time for Mahayana Buddhists. Mahayana was introduced into China in the beginning of the first century; and over many hundreds of years they observed the Hinayana Indian precepts. Probably just the priests observed the Hinayana precepts ignoring the life of the ordinary Chinese people. The Zen Buddhists were very serious about their own and the people's way of life and they renewed the Indian Hinayana precepts. In India the monks were supported entirely by the people, while in China the monks had to support themselves and so could not sit all day long. Whatever they did the felt should be Zen. So Chinese Zen was more practical.

A single piece of thread is not useful until we make a beautiful cloth with it. So each single school of Buddhism is meaningful as part of the overall religious life. In this sense our way has two faces. One is how to find the true meaning of religion through our own way, and the other is how we remain one of the schools of Buddhism. I belong to the Soto School. I am just a piece of thread, but we know how to make ourselves a useful piece of material. This is the Soto way.

Without knowing how to make ourselves useful, to observe some lofty way of practice does not make much sense. So as Dogen says, "That we move ourselves and understand all things is ignorance." He gives the definition of ignorance. This is red, this is pink, this is blue. Then what is enlightenment? Enlightenment is, "that things advance and understand themselves." The whole cloth. Who is buddha? Someone who understands ignorance. Who are the people? Those who are ignorant of enlightenment. "When buddhas are truly buddha, they are not necessarily aware of themselves as buddhas. But they are enlightened ones. They advance in enlightenment." We are not necessarily just Soto priests, we are Buddhists. We cannot practice all the ways of practice. Although we practice just the Soto way we are nevertheless Buddhists.

Everyone knows zazen is very difficult. You cannot practice it completely. But we should not give up. There are enough reasons why we should continue. Zen was developed in this way; and in a busy country like America there must be some time to spare for zazen. We should have more composure in our life and we should respect our tradition, both Buddhist and Christian.

Thank you very much.

Will you just stand up and bow to Buddha from your standing posture.

-----

Formatted 8/28/00.

2 - Afternoon Lecture

Wednesday, June 01, 1966

Afternoon Lecture, Summer 1966

Most of you are beginners, so it may be rather difficult for you to understand why we practice zazen or meditation in this way. We always say "just to sit." And if you do, you will find out that Zen practice-just to sit-is not easy. Just to sit may be the most difficult thing. To work on something is not difficult; how to not work on anything is rather difficult. When we have the idea of "self," we want some reason why we work on something. But if you do not have the idea of self, you can remain silent and calm whether or not you work on something. You will not lose your composure. So to remain silent and calm is a kind of test we receive. If you can do it, it means you have no idea of self. If your life is based on the usual idea of self, what you will do will not be successful in its true sense. There will be success in one way, but in another you are digging your own grave. So to work without the idea of self, is a very, very important point. It is much more important than making a good decision. Even a good decision based on a one-sided idea of self will create difficulties for yourself and others.

So for students of Zen, to work on something or to help others is to do things with our single mind. Our effort is concentrated within ourselves. This is the activity of our essence of mind, according to the Sixth Patriarch. He said that in the realm of our essence of mind, we do not do things outside of mind. All that we do is the activity of our essence of mind which is not dualistic. By essence of mind he means the Big-Mind and not the selfish mind. Of course there is dualistic activity, but it takes place within the big mind. This kind of single-minded activity is distinguished from ordinary dualistic activity.

When you practice zazen you will of course have physical pain in your legs and mentally you will have some difficulty. You will find it difficult to be concentrated on your breathing. One after another images will come into your mind. Or your mind will go out for a walk and wander about. I have many difficulties in my practice, so I think you, too, will find it very difficult to sit in good zazen.

All the difficulties you have in zazen should not take place outside your mind. Your efforts should be kept within your mind. In other words you have to accept the difficulty as not being other than what you are. You should not try to make some tentative particular effort based on your small mind like, "my practice should be better." My practice you say, but zazen is not your practice, it is buddha's practice. Your effort is based on big mind which cannot get out of. If your small self begins to act without the care of big mind, that is not Zen. What you do should be well taken care of by big mind. Our practice should be based on mind or original way-seeking mind which works on and on continuously.

The secret of practice is also true in observation of Buddhist precepts. The dualistic idea of whether to observe or not observe the precepts takes place within your mind when you practice Zen. There are no precepts to break and there is no one who is violating the precepts. To make up your mind to make the very best effort to observe the precepts constantly, forever, whether your effort is complete or not, is Buddha's-Buddha-Mind's effort. But if you put yourself outside the precepts or Buddha-Mind then there is no time to observe them completely. If your activity is involved in Buddha's activity, whatever you do is Buddha's effort. The even if it is not perfect, you are manifesting Buddha's mercy and activity.

Dogen-zenji was enlightened when he heard his master strike and say to the disciple sitting next to Dogen, "What are you doing? You have to make a hard effort. What are you doing?" That effort is Zen.

That effort is to observe the precepts. If we make our best effort on each moment with confidence, that is enlightenment. When you ask whether your way is perfect or not, there is an insidious idea of self. When you do your best to observe the precepts, to practice Zen, within the Big Mind then there is enlightenment. There is no special way to attain enlightenment. Enlightenment is not some certain stage. Enlightenment is everywhere. Wherever you are, enlightenment is there. Whenever you do with best effort enlightenment follows. This is very important for our Zen practice and our everyday life. We should make our effort in our everyday as well as in practice of Zen.

In order to have this kind of practice in everyday life, you want your friend, you want your master, you want the precepts we have. Some form is necessary because it is not possible to be concentrated on an uncertain way. There must be strict rules to observe. Because of the rules, of the way of sitting, of the way of practice, it is possible to be concentrated. It is the same thing in your everyday life. Without purpose or aim you cannot organize your life.

My master Kishizawa-roshi used to say that we had to have a vow or aim to accomplish. The aim we have may not be perfect in its strict sense, but even so it is necessary for us to have it. It is like the precepts. Even though it is almost impossible to observe them, we must have them. Without an aim in our life and the precepts we cannot be a good Buddhist, we cannot actualize our way.

We should be very grateful to the rigid formal way of practicing Zen and Zen precepts. You may think these precepts are useless if we cannot observe them perfectly. But they are the traces of human efforts based on the great mercy of Buddha. The life we have now is the result of such useless effort. From one-celled animals to monkeys. I do not know how long, but we wasted much time, many efforts until we came to this human life. The giant redwood trees of Muir Woods have annual rings or layers and we have these annual layers in our human life too, I think. That is precepts in its wide sense. You say we don't want them, but you have them. As long as you do, you should sit, and thus you have to know how to continue your effort to have another annual ring. In this way we will develop Buddhism more and more forever.

Strictly speaking we must have more precepts in America. You think two-hundred and fifty precepts for men and 500 for women is awful and that it should be made simpler. But I think you have to add some more to the precepts we have in Japan. Actually, I think you will have more difficulty in practicing zazen in America than we do in Japan. This kind of difficulty should be continued forever or we will not have peace in our world. Without the precepts there can be no congenial life for human beings. By reflecting on our human life and by respecting the precepts and rules of humanity, we will know the direction in which to make an effort and we will have the right orientation in our life. This is how we practice Zen and how Buddhism has been developed.

Do you have any questions?

Student A: You think we may need more precepts in the United States. Can you suggest some.

Suzuki-roshi: No, not now. I do not want to disturb your practice.

Student B: What is the basic difference between Rinzai and Soto Zen?

Suzuki-roshi: Each has some characteristic differences. We are concentrated on a fundamental way or traditional way originating with Buddha. Rinzai emphasizes more its own characteristic way or "family" way. Soto does not emphasize our family way so much. We treat Zen as Buddhism itself-Zen and Buddhism are the same.

Student C: What does it say over the door at the zendo?

Suzuki-roshi: That was written by Takashina-zenji, [1] the present Archbishop of Soto Zen. It says, "To take refuge in the Buddha."

-----

Formatted 8/28/00.

[1] Rosen Takashina, former abbot of Eihei-ji.

3 - Genjo Koan: Paragraphs 1-11

Sunday, June 19, 1966

Genjo Koan: Paragraphs 1-11

Soko-ji Temple, San Francisco

Suzuki-roshi: Someone has my-my paper.[1]

Student: [4-6 words unclear.] Wednesday night-[6-8 words]-
Wednesday night.

Suzuki-roshi: Wednesday?

Student: Yeah. Finish the whole thing.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student: Wednesday night we finish the whole thing.

Suzuki-roshi: No, Wednesday we do Shushogi.[2] Do you finish until the bottom part of Page 3?

Student: No, I think we finished the whole thing.

Suzuki-roshi: Whole thing.

Student: Wednesday night we did it.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. [Laughs.] Wednesday night? Oh. [Laughs, laughter.]
Oh. Big mistake. Okay.

Student: Maybe there are some here Sunday morning that weren't here
Wednesday night.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. All right. Then-paragraph-in each paragraph, I-
I think you want some brief comment so that you can understand-

Aside by Suzuki-roshi: It's all right.

-so that you can understand all the-whole part of-whole [laughter] fascicle.

The first paragraph is the framework of whole Buddhism. First paragraph:

All-when all things are in Buddhist way or Buddhist phenomena, we are enlightenment and ignorance, something to study, life and death, buddha, and people. When all things are without self, we have no ignorance, no enlightenment, no doubt, no buddha, no people, and no life and no death. The Buddhist way is beyond being and non-being.
Therefore we have life and death, ignorance and enlightenment, people and buddha. However, flowers fall with our attachment, and weeds grow with our detachment.

This is, you know, the most basic understanding of-of Buddhism or Soto Zen, which include all the teaching of Buddhism. The teaching is- Hinayana Buddhism is based on when all things are Buddhist phenomena, we have enlightenment and ignorance, something to study, life and death, buddha and people. The teaching about ignorance or enlightenment, or something to study, or problem of life and death, buddha and people, is actually written in scriptures and actually which was told by Buddha. But although Buddha told various teaching, it is just appropriate medicine for the-for patients. So it is not absolute teaching. It is just temporal [temporary?] remedy for the people.

So from this standpoint, the Buddha's teaching is something more than that-more than which was just told by him. It is based on his [1 word] great mind. And that mind is not just Buddha's mind, but that mind-the mind include everything, or big mercy, or big mind, or-not only it is big, but also it is very subtle and intuitive mind.

So from this viewpoint there is no particular teaching. Particular teaching is just remedy for the people. So from this viewpoint there is no teaching. Some particular teaching is not fundamental teaching. So from this viewpoint there is no teaching. This is actually means Prajñāparamita-sutra group, like Hannya-shin-gyo[3]-this one [probably holding up sutra card]. "No five skandha or no-no death or no word [?], no people or no buddha." This kind of statement is-belongs to Prajñāparamita group. But those two groups is not-fundamentally it is not different. When we understand those two groups is not different-taking su- [partial word]-taking superior viewpoint, that viewpoint is called middle way or superior way-the viewpoint of Tendai school.

From this viewpoint, there is flower, there is weeds, and flowers and weeds is not different. And flowers and weeds comes out in spite of our discrimination. And our discrimination is good sometime, but when we attach to it, it is not good. So everything is, in one hand, it is good, on the other, it is bad. So both is right and both is not right. This is the third viewpoint. This is framework of whole Buddhism.

And second paragraph is in short-what is his talking about-what is ignorance and what is enlightenment from the standpoint of the third superior aspect. From the-so this is the terminology of enlightenment and practice from the viewpoint of superior aspect.

And it looks-and the third paragraph is very important because third-here he says:

When we understand one side, the other side is dark.

This understanding bring our-brings our practice into everyday life. "When we understand one side, the other side is dark." So for us the most important thing is to carry our activity on with sincerity. That is the only way to attain enlightenment. Because when we absorb in our activity, there is enlightenment whether or not we realize it. So this point is very important.

It is necessary for you, I think, in-when you study Zen, it is necessary to think more by yourself, you know. Not to-not just to rely on my [laughs] talk. You have to have some question, you know, or doubt, we say. Here in his, you know, statement, if you just read it you will have various question, I think. For an instance, here he says:

When the truth-

-the bottom part Page 2, bottom part-

-when the truth does not fill our body and mind, we think that we have enough. When the truth fill our body and mind, we know that something is missing.

And he says:

For an example, when we view the world from a boat on the ocean, it looks like circular and nothing else. But the ocean is neither round nor square; it is-and its feature are infinite in variety. It is like a palace. It is like a jewel. It seems circular as far as our eyes can reach at the time. All things are so.

And he says at the end of the paragraph:

It is so not only around ourselves, but also directly here-even in a drop of water.

This statement, you know-when you-he says, "When the truth does not fill our body and mind, we think that we have enough. When the truth fills our body and mind, we know that something is missing" [laughs]. This statement and I said just now when you do something you should be completely absorbed in it [laughs]. This is contradiction isn't it? [Laughs.] When you feel something is missing in what you do, you cannot be absorbed in what you are doing [laughs]. This is contradiction. Don't you think so? I think you have-here you have one question at least [laughs].

When, you know, whatever you do, that is-if you absorb in your activity, that is enlightenment-I say and he says [laughs]. But here in this paragraph he says, when the truth is not fill-filled, you feel you have enough. When you are filled with truth, you feel something is missing [laughs]. If you take it literally, you know, you have this kind of contradiction. But what he means by, "When the truth fills our body and mind we know that something is missing," something is missing-it is, you know, this translation is maybe [laughs]-

Student A: Something is missing [laughs, laughter].

Maybe [laughs, laughter]. [2-3 words] at least. He mea- [partial word]- what he means is actual truth is not be understood completely. Here he means: you think when you see the world on the boat you think that is square-world is square. When you study Buddhism and when you have some understanding, you may think that is Buddhism. Buddhism is wonderful [laughs], you may say. But that is not Buddhism. Here he said-here he criticizing our intellectual understanding here.

So "something is missing" actually means something-the understanding is not perfect. That is what he meant. In his understanding-his understanding is not perfect. That is actually what he means. Or his understanding is just-or if he thinks his understanding is perfect, that is not right. What-that-that is what he means. We say this-so intellectual understanding is not perfect. That is what he means. If intellectual understanding is not perfect, what kind of understanding is perfect? The perfect understanding is the direct experience in your activity. That is perfect understanding. So there is no contradiction.

So the third paragraph:

When we see things and hear things with our whole body and mind, our understanding is not like a mirror with reflection, nor like water under the moon. If we understand one side, the other side is dark.

This-this is not just intellectual understanding. By intellectual understanding you-your understanding is the moon on the water or things on the mirror. But true understanding or direct experience is not like water under the moon or mirror with reflection. That is what he is saying.

And so:

To study Buddhism is to study ourselves. To study ourselves is to go beyond ourselves. To go beyond ourselves is to be enlightened by all things. To be enlightened by all things is to free our body and mind, [and] to free-free our body and bodies-the bodies and minds of others. No trace of enlightenment remains, and this no-trace continues endlessly.

Here he says, direct understand-explains direct understanding in realm of subjective and objective-objectivity. There is no subjective understanding or objective understanding in-in the direct experience there is no subjectivity or objectivity. So to study ourselves is to study everything. That is study of Buddhism.

To study ourselves is to go beyond ourselves. To go beyond ourselves is to be enlightened by all things.

So enlightenment comes from all things to us. And when we attain enlightenment, everything comes, you know-enlightenment comes from all things. You may say enlightenment. "They [laughs] made me enlightened," or "I attained enlightenment." That is same thing in direct experience, but in intellectual understanding it is not same. I understand something. But in direct experience, "I understand something" means a truth came to me, although I didn't expect to-I didn't try to understand it [laughs], but they made me understand.

So:

To study ourselves is-to go beyond ourselves is to be enlightened by all things. To be enlightened by all things is to free our body and mind, and to free our body-bodies and minds of others.

So no trace of enlightenment remains because there is no subjectivity or objectivity in our enlightenment. So, "There is no trace of enlightenment, and this no-trace continues endlessly."

So:

When first we seek the truth, we are far away from its environs.

When you say, you know, "I attained enlightenment," that-you are far away from the direct experience of enlightenment.

When we discover the truth is already being correctly [inherently] transmitted to us, we are ourselves at the moment of enlightenment.

It is not, you know, matter of effort or practice anymore. Our practice is not just effort or [laughs]-our practice is-should I say?-you know, you-you-you come here and study or practice zazen so that you understand what is Buddhism, I think so [laughs]. And I [laughs]-I'm making effort to give you some understanding of Zen. That is true. That is actually what we are doing here [laughs]. But until-I shall be very much disappointed if you do not come when you think, "I know what is-now I know what is Buddhism." [Laughs.] So there will not be no need to [laughs]-to practice zazen, to study Zen. That is, you know, I shall be very disappointed. I want you to come here even though you understand what is Buddhism [laughs]. I am not selling you something [laughs, laughter], you know, but I want you to be my customer [laughs, laughter]. And I want to live with [laughs] your support, and I think I shall be very glad if you have some joy in practicing with us here. That is actually Buddhism. It is not matter of [laughs] enlightenment or understanding.

And why we are continuing this kind of practice-we will-what should I say?-we will be a perfect, you know, character, we say. The character-building is-we cannot force anything, you know, to others. But it is necessary for everyone to do things over and over again until the-you acquire some acquisition-perfect acquisition which will-which will not vanish from you. It is like a to-like to press your dress, you know, trousers. It is-you want iron, you know. Just to fold your trousers is not good enough. You [laughs] should press. If possible you should put something on it, you know, after-even after you put iron. This kind of effort is necessary, but this effort is-when this kind of effort is forced on you, that does not work [laughs]. That kind of effort should be continued without effort, with mutual encouragement. In this way, our practice will be continued.

So when we-when we know-when we think we know what is truth, that is not enough, and that is "far away from its environs. When we discover that the truth has already been correctly or-correctly transmitted to us, we are ourselves at the moment." When we find our true nature or our way of life as the most suitable way to our inherent nature, that is enlightenment.

At first it looks like, you know, you are trying to do something, but when you understand what is the purpose of practice, you will understand that that was my nature but I didn't know. I feel someone is always [laughs] mean to us, and someone is forcing his-the practice to us. Or you may think, "I practice for a long time. It may be [laughs] enough for me. And it doesn't look like I made any progress" [laughs]. So that may be not, or if you go to Eihei-ji, you may say, "I have been Eihei-ji for one year [laughs]. I cannot speak any Japanese, and intellectually I don't," you know, "I cannot study anything here. Just what we are doing is eat and work and recite sutra and practice zazen in the same way always [laughs]. What does it mean? I know everything already, quite well." [Laughing, laughter.] That is what you may say.

But he says, when you say so it is "far away from its environs." When you discover that the truth has been transmitted to us inherently long before, and now I have found it. That is true understanding. You have to continue it until you find your true nature in your practice.

That is realization of the truth. What you study is, as he says, what-"to study Buddhism is to study yourself"-ourselves, you know. When we find out ourselves in our study, in our practice, that is realization of the truth.

So as long as you try to find out your true nature by practice, you know, you cannot find out. But if you find out your true nature in practice, or if you think the practice itself is your true nature, that is enlightenment. And our past sages found out their true nature in our practice. So-so we should find out our true nature in the same practice. That is true realization.

The practice is not something-some means to attain enlightenment. In-in practice, you should find out your true nature. Before you attain enlightenment, you are just ordinary [ordinary] people. After you attain enlightenment, you are sage [laughs]. Before-so he says-he says, "That we move ourselves and understand all things is ignorance." You know, when we try to attain enlightenment by practice, we are ignorant. But things-when things come to us and understanding themselves, including us, that is enlightenment. So ev- [partial word]-truth will come by itself, and we will find ourselves in the truth, in the practice. That is enlightenment.

So practice is first, enlightenment is second [laughs]. Next. So we- anyway, we should be absorbed in practice until you become one with practice, until you build up your character by practice, you-until you become Zen itself-Zen practice itself. Like a rock [laughs]. That is enlightenment. A rock doesn't know who he is [laughs].

"When we discover that the truth has been transmitted inherently," even before we are born [laughs], that is true enlightenment. And we find ourselves in transmitted, inherent buddha-nature in our practice. That is enlightenment. So, "When we discover that the truth has already been inherently-correctly-"inherently" is better. Correctly, you know, is not strong enough. Inherently is better. "Inherently transmitted to us" before-before-even before we are born, it was transmitted to us, and when we realize that true nature in our practice, that is enlightenment. "We [are] ourselves at the moment." The moment we practice our practice with our utmost-utmost effort, that is enlightenment.

If we watch the shore from a boat, it seems that the shore is moving. But when we watch the boat [directly]-

This is just parable.

-we know that it is the boat that moves. If we examine all things with a confused body and mind, we will suppose that our self is permanent. But if we practice closely and return to our present place, it will be clear that nothing at all is permanent.

We are caught by some ideas-some permanent or impermanent or ourselves or others. As long as we practice our practice in this way, we cannot realize what is true. Just when we do it, we will understand what is our true nature.

And here the second paragraph on Page 2:

Firewood turns into ash, and it does not turn into firewood again. But do not suppose that ash is after and the firewood before. We must understand that firewood is at the stage of firewood, and there we find its before and past.

Its own past and future.

And yet with its own past and future, its present is independent of others-of other. Ash is at the stage of ash, and there we have-we find its before and after. Just [as] firewood does not become firewood again after it's-it is ash, so man does not return to life after his death.

We say we attain enlightenment-we ordinal [ordinary] people attain enlightenment, just as-just like firewood become ash. But this is mistake, he says. We cannot suppose-we cannot-we should not think in that way. You say, "I attained-I will attain enlightenment tomorrow." And ordinal [ordinary] people become [laughs] sage, like firewood become ash. But he says, ordinal [ordinary] people is ordinal [ordinary] people [laughs]. Ash is-sage is sage, and ash is ash, and firewood is firewood. Firewood has its own past and future, and ash has its own past and future. So ordinal [ordinary] people has its own past and future. Future will be a sage [laughs], and sage has also its own past and future. In past, he is ordinal [ordinary] person [laughs]. What is the difference [laughs]? The same thing. So we should not say fire-we should not say ordinal [ordinary] people become-became a sage, as we shouldn't say firewood become ash. What-that is what he says.

So when you practice it, that is it. Don't say, "By practice I shall be buddha [laughs] tomorrow." That is what he-he said. So when you just practice it, you are at the moment a buddha. That is true [laughs]. Don't you think so? You are buddha anyway [laughs, laughter]. You cannot escape from it [laughs]. But you make some excuse [laughs] why you are not buddha [laughs, laughter], that's all. Maybe it is convenient for you [laughs, laughter]. But because you are actually buddha, you do not feel so good when you make some excuse [laughs]. That is what he is-what he says here.

So:

Now it is specifically taught in Buddhism that life does not become death.

Ordinal [ordinary] people does not become sage.

For this reason, life is called "no-life."

For this reason, ordinal [ordinary] people called no-ordinal [ordinary] people [laughs].

It is specifically taught in Buddhism that death does not become life.

Sage does not come back to ordinal [ordinary] people.

Therefore, the death is called "no-death."

Therefore, sage is called "no-sage" [laughs]. Ordinal [ordinary] people [laughs], no difference. When we practice in this hall, there is no teacher or no student. We are all sage [laughs]. Even though your practice is not good enough, we cannot say your practice is not good enough. It is good anyway. You have your own past and future. You have future-bright future to be a sage [laughs]. Don't worry [laughs, laughter].

Life is a period of itself; death is period of itself. They are like winter and spring. We do not call winter the future spring, nor the spring the future summer.

"Life is a period of itself." Enlightenment-sage is a period of itself, and ordinal [ordinary] people are-they are like winter and spring. We do not call winter the father [future?] of spring. We do not call ourselves-so we shouldn't call ourselves future sage [laughs]. You are sage, not future sage. "Nor spring the future summer." You are sage.

We gain enlightenment like the moon reflecting in the water. The moon does not get wet, nor is the water broken.

If you practice it by yourself without any aid, you are sage. Even though you are sage, you do not lose your nature or form or character.

We gain enlightenment like the moon reflecting in the water.

Even though your practice is not good enough, you may say-

The moon does not get wet-

The moon itself in your practice no-nor the-

-nor is the water broken.

You will not broken. You are just as you are. And when you are just as you are, through and through, there is enlightenment.

Although its light is wide and great-

Although enlightenment is-truth is wide and great-

-the moon is reflected-reflected even in a puddle in-one inch wide. The whole moon and the whole sky are reflect-reflected in a drop of dew in the grass.

So in your practice there is enlightenment.

And he continues:

Enlightenment does not destroy the man just as the moon does not break the water. Man does hinder enlightenment, just as a drop of dew does not hinder the moon in the sky. The depth of the drop is the height of the moon. The period of the reflection, long or short, will prove the vastness of the dewdrop and the vastness of the moonlight [moonlit] sky.

And here he emphasize oneness of the practice and enlightenment from various viewpoint.

And next paragraph I already explained. This is-in next paragraph, he emphasized you should not think enlightenment is some state of mind or some intellectual understanding. It is beyond our consciousness, or it is-enlightenment is there before you become conscience of it. He emphasize this in next paragraph.

Will you please, you know, read the next paragraph from the-yeah, after-from the-Student: Second paragraph.

Suzuki-roshi: Ah. From the second paragraph. "When the fish swims in the ocean"-what does he mean with it? If you think over and over, you know, you will find various meaning in it.

Thank you very much.

Student: Sensei [?], do you want us to keep these this time, or do you want to collect them now?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. Yeah. Yes. If you come next time, please take it and read it at home, before you come for next Sunday service.

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (4/30/01).

[1] Suzuki-roshi is commenting on Eihei Dogen's Shobogenzo "Genjo Koan," following the translation by Kazuaki Tanahashi with Robert Aitken that appeared in: (1) Shobogenzo Genjo Koan: An Analytic Study (unpublished manuscript, San Francisco Zen Center); (2) Wind Bell, 1967, VI (2-4), pp. 60-62, and (3) the [Honolulu] Diamond Sangha [Newsletter].

[2] See Lecture SR-66-03-13B. However, 13 March 66 is probably the wrong date.

[3] The Heart Sutra.

4 - Genjo Koan: Paragraphs 7-9

Sunday, June 19, 1966

Genjo Koan: Paragraphs 7-9
Soko-ji Temple, San Francisco[1]

[Now it is specifically taught in Buddhism that life does not become death.] [2] For this reason, life [is] called "no-life." It is specifically taught in Buddhism that death does not become life. Therefore, death is called "no-death."

Life is a period of itself; death is a period of itself. They are like winter and spring. We do not call winter the future spring, nor spring the future summer.

Here he talks about life and death. But this life and death does not just mean the problem of life and death. By "life and death" he means understanding of existence and non-existence, or unconditionality and conditionality. When you practice Zen, our purpose of religion or goal of the religion is not in-to attain some state of mind non- -called non-existence. We want to attain enlightenment in realm of-both in realm of non-existent and existent. This is a Buddhist way of understanding-Buddhist way of practice.

So nirvana is both existent and non-existent, and both not-existent [laughs] and non-existent. This is nirvana. If I say in this way, you may feel [it is a] very unusual statement, but it is not so. For an instance, he says here it is not like-in next paragraph he says:

We gain enlightenment like the moon reflecting in the water. The moon does not get wet, nor is the water broken.

The moon-what do-does he mean by the moon, and what does he mean by water? The water-you say "the moon reflect on water." It is not only the moon that reflect on water. Everything will reflect on water. And what is the water, and what is the moon or some other object which will reflect on water? Usually we think if you see-as long as you see something on water-on the water-as long as you see something on the water, you do not realize that there is water there. But when everything vanished, you will realize that there is water. When you are alive in this way, you know, what you see, what you feel, what you hear is you-according to understanding that is your life.

But when you do not see anything anymore or do not hear anything anymore, you may say that is end of all [laughs]-end of you. Nothing exist after you do not see anything or do not hear anything. That is usual understanding of life, maybe. That is why you become very anxious [laughs]. You become very uneasy when you think of your death because you think you cannot-there is nothing exist after your death. That is quite usual understanding. And some people may think if you-that is quite ordinal [ordinary] understanding, but when you believe in some God or some heaven, you will not have this kind of anxiety. After death you will go to heaven [laughs]. Even though you are various problem just-in this world, if you attain enlightenment by your practice, you will find out where you go after your death. That is enlightenment, you may say. But this kind of understanding is not our understanding at all.

Our understanding-according to our understanding, that the moon-that the moon exist, it means that the water exist. Because water exist, you can see the moon on it. If there is no water, you cannot see anything. That water exist means that the moon exist. If the moon does not exist, you cannot see water. In this parable we say "water," but by water we mean unconditionality, and by the moon we mean conditionality. Our life is conditionality of-succession of conditionality of unconditioned-unconditionality. Conditionality-conditional experience of life is uncon- [partial word]-unconditioned state of-conditioned state of unconditionality [laughs]. Do you understand [laughs, laughter]? If there is no unconditionality, there is conditional-there is no conditionality. When we-that we exist here means something, you know, which is unconditional. That we are unconditional being-because we are unconditional being, we change [laughs]. According to the condition, our life may change. So on the water many things will appear. The same-it is same thing with your life. Various experience will come out in your life because your life is originally unconditional being. You are unconditional being. That is why you have various exis- [partial word]-experience, including death.

So when you see nothing, what will exist is-the original unconditionality will exist-still exist. It is the same thing, even though projector stops. When-even though you cannot see any picture on film-on screen, when the projector stops [laughs], but film exist. By "film" I mean unconditional being. Film is unconditional. That is white. Film is just white being. So on-it is possible-because it is white-pure white, it is possible to reflect various color on it, and various form on it. But usually after projector stop projecting the picture, you think there is no more picture [laughs]. You say no more picture, but film exist. By "film" we mean the unconditional-unconditional eternal being. And you cannot-but you cannot obtain-acquire a perfect renunciation or perfect composure by just understanding-by just idea of unconditional being. Even though I say you are unconditional being, it does not make much sense [laughs]. It is obvious that-logically it is obvious that we are unconditional being. Not only each one of us, but also various existence is unconditional being just like a picture on the film. That which exist is the screen, but no one [is] interested in the just white picture. But if I say that unconditionality is eternal present or now, you may be surprised. By "unconditionality" Dogen-zenji means, now, this moment. So this unconditionality is the eternal being in which Buddha live [?]-in which we live. But that is one eternal being and one eternal succession of present or now.

This "now," this moment is where we should go after you are dead [laughs]. You go to this eternal present, and you appear from this eternal-not "from"-you appear on this eternal present. And to obtain this eternal present actually is to practice Zen. So in your practice if you find out, this nothingness-this not "vacuity," but this eternal present, you will be-you have no more anxiety. But when-when you just thinking about it, you have still emotional anxiety. But if you actually feel or emotionally feel this present moment in your practice, you have no more intellectual anxiety and emotional anxiety. So you have perfectly free from the problem of birth and death.

So when you reach this point in Buddhism:

How-now it is specifically taught in Buddhism that life does not become death.

Life is, you know, one conditioned period. Life is conditional expression of unconditionality. Death is conditional expression of unconditionality that is unconditionality itself. So we do not say "life become death." Life and death is the same.

For this reason, life is called "no-life."

Life-what is life? Life is conditioned-conditionality of unconditionality. So death is unconditionality of-death is conditionality of unconditionality, and life is also conditionality of unconditionality. So there is no difference.

So in Buddhism we do not say "life become death."

It is specifically taught in Buddhism that death does not become life.

Death does not become life because death is not something different from life. Death is conditionality of unconditionality, and life is conditionality of unconditionality [laughs]. So it is the same thing. So we do not say "death become life."

Therefore death is called "no-death."

Death-this "no" means emancipation or liberation. Why we put "no" means to point out the thing itself. It does not mean-it is not negative. It is emancipation or to point out thing itself. Death is death. Life is life, you know. When we point out something directly, we say "no." Because when you say "death," you are comparing death is to-death to life. We do not-when we reach this understanding, death is death, life is life. And death and life is same. Both are conditionality of unconditionality.

So based on unconditional being. Life is based on unconditional being. Death is also based on unconditional being. If you see death through and through-if you understand what is death through and through, there is no more death which life result. When we say "death," period. That's all [laughs]. No more life. When we say "life," that is period. No more death. Death and life is same thing. It is the -just picture on the film-no, on screen. But when you see the picture, there is screen, you know [laughs]. You do not just realize-you do not just see it, but without screen there is no picture.

So this "no" means emancipation or direct experience-direct experience of death, [and] direct experience of life. Life is period of itself, death is period of itself. Death is death, and life is life. They are like winter and spring. When we-winter-winter is the unconditionality of the climate-conditionality of unconditional climate. And summer is also some special season based on our various-based on one universal weather [?]. So:

We do not call winter the future spring, nor spring the future summer.

When we say spring, you know, when-there is no need-why we call it spring is we want to know whether it is warm or cold, you know. When we say spring-"Oh, that's wonderful!" [winter?] [laughs]. If you-if you-I say, "This is future summer," you will feel [laughs] funny. Future summer or future winter [laughs]. You-you feel as if you are going back winter [laughs]. So when spring come, you should feel very warm [laughs], and you should feel very happy. That is why we say it is spring now. So it is ridiculous to say this is future [laughs] winter. It is ridiculous to say life is future death [laughs]. You may say death is future life. This is-this statement gives you some [laughs] hope, but not exactly. Still you have some, you know, anxiety until you see it [laughs].

So as your religion is based on this kind of understanding, it will not work [laughs]. Even though you die, by re- [partial word]-by reincarnation you will appear in this world, but someone will want to stop [laughs] reincarnation. It's awful to be born to come back in such a nasty, uncomfortable world again. It's much better to stay in heaven [laughs, laughter] indefinitely. This kind of understanding will not help you at all.

So perfect composure or unperturbable compatibility of your life should be attained in-on each moment without just [being] caught by conditioned state of life. Actually conditioned state of life-why we have many conditions is because we stop our think-because we have some particular understanding of life. You cannot stop your life, you know. You are always changing into something else. Always. Incessantly.

So there is, strictly speaking, there is no-nothing called "now." Now is always going. To live in now means to live in eternal-eternity. So strict-in our practice, we do not think anything. Just let ourselves go as we go [laughs]. That is our way.

You know, the atom has no-no weight or no size [?], as you know. It has no weight and no size [?]. It is same thing with time: Time has no length. It is smallest particle imaginable-imaginable. So we can imagine how small it is, but [laughs] there is no such thing exist. You say the atom is smallest particle of material imaginable [laughs]. That imaginable. That is just theory. There is no such thing exist. If so, we do not exist. What exist is unconditional being. "Is" exist. One unconditional being exist. If you want to attain liberation in realm of time or space, there is no other way to explain in this way. But at the same time, it means we should not try to attain liberation by the idea of good or bad, long or short. How-the only way is to understand our life in term of being or non-being. Good or bad. In term of just we understand the material by the idea of atom. That-that is just idea. That is just some way to-of understanding of life. But actually those way is just way. It does not mean-it means something but that-this understanding means is one big unconditional being. Not particular trivial event.

It is same thing to divide big thing in various way. You can cut one radish in various way [laughs]. How to-according to the skill of the person who cut the radish it, you know, looks very beautiful. But actually what exist is one big radish [laughs]. When we reach this kind of understanding, I think we have understood what Dogen-zenji meant by Genjo Koan. All the koan is to mean-means of explaining our life. Even though we say "attainment," or we say "like" [life?], we should not be [1 word] [laughs]. Even though we say "ignorance" or "death," we should not be disappointed. That is just, you know, explanation of our life. Life does not change.

We gain enlightenment like the moon reflecting in the water. The moon does not get wet, nor is the water broken. Although its light is wide and great, the moon is reflected even in a puddle an inch wide. The whole moon and whole sky are reflected in drop of dew in the grass.

This kind of, you know, wonderful composure-absolute meaning of our life will be realized when we reach this understanding. There is no more big-or matter of no more problem of big or small. Each moment of our life is one expression of conditionality of one unconditional being. It is not matter of long or short. According to some psychologist, the moment of our-one moment for us is three or six seconds. Three or six second in-is for us one moment. When we say, "I see something," you know, that means that image will stay in your mind-imbedded state three or six minutes [seconds?]. That's all. After three or six minutes [seconds], it will turn [into] to some idea. So direct experience stay three to six minutes [seconds] only-oh, not "minutes," "seconds" only [laughs]. But three or second-we cannot say three or second, you know, strictly speaking. In that three or six second, the moment you see, you know-I-we don't know the-there is no length, you know, the moment [laughs]. When you see something, there is no length of time. It is not even one second. But in that moment, it-the object you see will be clear and genuine. But in next moment, it will, you know, change into something which is not so actual-accurate to you.

So "this moment" or "this world," we say, but what is this world? So it is silly to-to try to find out something in our-just in our conscious world. So here he says there is no more problem of good or bad, long or short:

The moon is reflected even in puddle an inch wide. The moon-the whole moon and the whole sky are reflected in a drop of dew in the grass.

We cannot say the moon is bigger than drop of dew. It is the same. It is one period of our life, long or short. Three or six minutes is one period of our life. And seventy or eighty years of our life is also one period of life. Which is long and which is short [laughs]? You cannot compare. The way of understanding is different. But the life you understand [is] originally the same. There is no particular life for us. We are just expressing our unconditional being, which is universal to everyone.

So that is why we say even though you are eating, there is Zen. There is unconditional being. When you sit, of course [laughs], you are unconditionality itself. But before you have some experience of unconditional-unconditionality of the being, you cannot, you know, accept it. Even though you do not have the experience, it is better not to try to attain enlightenment somewhere else [laughs]. You will be lost.

And it is obvious that you cannot attain absolute composure by comparing this world to other world. It is useless. It means nothing [laughs]. If you find out there is no other way to attain enlightenment, even though it is hard, we should attain the absolute attainment by right practice. If you do so, sooner or later you will attain it. Even though you do not attain it, you can practice your way with conviction. Do you understand? If you practice it with conviction, that practice works. Even though it does not work, it's all right [laughs]. It is working, actually, but you do not think [laughs]-you yourself do not think that is not working. But actually it is working. That is our practice. So there is no problem in our practice.

So whether you attain enlightenment or not is secondary problem. The first of all you should stop comparing this world to the other world, this moment to the next moment. We should live in eternal present. Here we have eternal life in its true sense. No one can deny this eternal life we mean. And no one can ignore it. If you-if they ignore it, they will be sympathized by us: "Oh, he-[laughs]-he is wondering about-he is just caught by one side of the view of life. Existence-or existent or non-existent, when life is existent and non-existent, conditional and unconditional. That's all."

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (4/30/01).

[1] This date is almost certainly wrong: Four lectures on one reel-to-reel tape had been assigned the same date.

[2] Suzuki-roshi is commenting on Eihei Dogen's Shobogenzo "Genjo Koan," following the translation by Kazuaki Tanahashi with Robert Aitken that appeared in: (1) Shobogenzo Genjo Koan: An Analytic Study (unpublished manuscript, San Francisco Zen Center); (2) Wind Bell, 1967, VI (2-4), pp. 60-62, and (3) the [Honolulu] Diamond Sangha [Newsletter]. The tape for this lecture appears to lack the opening sentence(s) read by Suzuki-roshi, so the single sentence in brackets has been restored here.

5 - Precepts

Sunday, June 19, 1966

Precepts

Soko-ji Temple, San Francisco[1]

Last time I explained the ten prohibitory precepts:

Do not kill.

Do not steal.

Do not be immoral.

Do not lie.

Do not sell intoxicating liquor.

Do not speak of other's shortcomings.

Do not praise yourself or blame others.

Do not grudge giving to charities material or spiritual.

Do not be angry.

Do not speak ill of the Triple Treasures.

Those precepts looks like quite common precepts and nothing-nothing special. It is not [laughs] quite usual, and almost all the people know it. But this is pretty difficult to observe it. This is well-known fact. It is quite simple, but it is quite [laughs] difficult to observe it.

So in this point there is some reason why we have to emphasize those ten precepts. And those precepts is in Buddhism-have special meaning because our precepts is not to attain some special achievement mentally or spiritually. To be a good citizen [laughs] is just why we have to be a Buddhist, you know. There will not be no need for us-for all of us to be a-to be sages [laughs]. If we are good enough to be a good citizen, that's enough. If we are quite good as a citizen of America, then I think we will [not?] have any more war [laughs] because we are too good. That is why I think we have to fight. If we are just good, common citizen, there will not be no need to fight. This point is very important for us. Our precepts should be so very common and should be very usual.

And those ten precepts may be, you know, well-understood custom among human being. And it will be unwritten rules, but sometime those ten commandments [are] set up as a law. Here-here we have-because it is difficult for us to observe it, we have law. So when it become-when those precepts is-are understand as a law of the country, someone may think it may be permissible to some extent to do something wrong-will be permissible if some attorney will say you can do as much as is [laughs]-to some extent it is good. That is precepts when they are understood as a law. And sometime it may be understood as a moral rules. In morality-it is some rules which we should observe. So it-in morality we emphasize the negative sense of the precepts. We-"You should do this; you should not do this" is morality.

But this understanding of the rules of human being does not work properly, because under the moral rules we feel some-we do not feel freedom-we have no freedom in moral realm. But in religious realm, we have two side of the interpretation of the-our rules. One is prohibitory meaning. One is more positive meaning-we have to do it or we want to do it instead of we should do it. When we say we should do it, that is moral precepts. But when we say I cannot help doing so, or I have to, you know-no, no-I want to refrain from doing something bad, that is religious understanding of our rules.

So in this realm, we have freedom. But here religious faith is wanted. Without faith or without finding out your inmost request, you cannot obtain this kind of freedom. Because you-when you find out your inmost nature or buddha-nature, you don't want to do something wrong, and you want to do something good. Here you have negative sense-you understand precepts in negative and positive sense. This is why we have to have precepts.

So here precepts is not just contact between people or between countries, or it is not the law of the country or law of the society. It is-this contact will be-bring into the relationship between Buddha and sentient being. So there we have no chance [laughs] to break it, you know, because we want to do it. When you want to do it, there is no chance to break it.

So here, again, you come back to the-to animal stage. Animals do not [do] anything wrong. What he-what they do is always right. But human beings have some ability or [laughs]-I don't know what to say-freedom to do something good and bad. So in human realm, we have to have some conduct between us. So that we might not get into confusion [laughs] there is some rules. And we have two chances: to do something good and to do something bad. Morality is for human being.

So, as Buddha said, human being has some destiny to, you know, fight or-not "fight," but to struggle with himself and with others. That is the nature of human culture. But when our human culture is emancipated to the stage of religious culture, we have perfect freedom. In this sense, we emphasize precepts. Even though we-the difference between asceticism and Buddhism is this point: We acknowledge our human nature one hundred percent [laughs]. We are one hundred percent good. We accept it. Whether someone say good or bad, we have human nature. We have to accept it, and as long as we are human nature, we cannot be a god in-in Christian sense. We cannot be a god. We are human being through and through. When we are human being through and through, we are, you know, buddha. But how to be buddha-buddha must not have-must be-must obtain perfect freedom. So when we find out our true nature, we are buddha. And for us there is no chance to do anything wrong. That is why we should observe our precepts.

So we do not observe our precepts by any gaining idea. Just to be human being is the purpose of observing precepts. There is no other purpose. Just to observe the precepts because we want to do it. That's all. That is the precepts. Ten prohibitory precepts.

So ten prohibitory precepts may be the Three Refuges-or no-three corrective precepts, "the precepts which enjoin us to complete good behavior-the precepts which enjoin us to complete good deeds. The precepts which enjoin the completion of benevolence or loving kindness to all beings." [2] Here we emphasize positive side of-side of the precept-precepts. And here, in three corrective pure precepts, we emphasize both negative side and positive side. So when we-oneness of the positive and negative side is attained, we-we say pure. By "pure" we mean oneness of the duality always.

When the Sixth Patriarch [3]-as the Sixth Patriarch said, there are-it is not-there is no practice and enlightenment. There is practice and enlightenment, and enlightenment is enlightenment, and practice is practice [laughs]. But you-he said, you should not think after you practice it you will attain enlightenment. So our practice is a mean[s] need to attain enlightenment. That is not right understanding, the Sixth Patriarch said. And when he say so, he say you should not have a polluted idea of practice and enlightenment: stained idea. Stained idea means dualistic idea. Practice-if you think practice and enlightenment is two different things, that is stained idea. If you understand the practice and enlightenment is one, that is pure, you know, unstained idea of practice. So he said, although there is practice and enlightenment, you should not have tainted idea: zenna in Chinese or Japanese.[4] Zenna. Zenna sinko torii zai.[5] "You should not have tainted idea." That means you should not have-you should have pure understanding. By pure understanding, we means understanding which is more that just intellectual dualistic understanding.

So here it is-here we say the "three corrective pure precepts" because this precepts express the oneness of the negative and positive attitude of observing precepts. And whether those positive and negative attitude of observing precepts will be attained when we realize our true nature and take refuges in Buddha and law-Buddha, law, and sangha. That is why we have sixteen precepts.

The first Triple Treasures means our fundamental nature to take refuge in Buddha, or the truth, or the sangha. And this-when we realize our true nature, that-it means we have the-both negative and positive way of observing precepts in everyday life.

But as we have some human nature which is special to human nature, we have to emphasize more-more negative, prohibitive side of the precepts, you know. It is more, you know, suitable for human being to emphasize the negative side. When we realize our true nature, we-naturally we will emphasize-we will have some-not [2 words] but negative understanding of life. Because when we realize our true nature-before we realize our true nature, we emphasize rather positive [laughs] side until you are completely caught by [laughs]-caught by your positive side of the activity: ignoring not to kill, not to steal, or not to be immoral, not to lie, you know.

It is quite true when Dogen-zenji says human being like something wrong [laughs]. That is quite true. And ignoring something true [laughs]. We are not so interested in something right, something true. If we start to [be] interested in something true-always all of us [are] interested in something which is completely right, then all the social activity will be stopped [laughing]. There will be no newspaper, no magazine, no movie, no traffic, no airplane, no trip to the moon [laughter]. Our world-human world will be completely blocked up. That is true [laughs]. We-we should know that.

So it is quite-Buddha was quite wise to accept both [laughs] sides [laughs]. Half and half. And for-for his-because of his mercy, he emphasized the negative side with little more-more than positive side [laughs]. There is no need for us to emphasize the positive side. We are quite positive anyway. This is the structures of the precepts.

So precepts eventually goes so far as the formality or behavior or demeanor which no moral rules or law of the country cannot reach, you know. Whatever you do you have, to some extent, you have freedom. Even though you do not behave like a good citizen, you should not be put in jail [laughs]. So you have to have-you have some-to some extent, you have freedom.

But in religion, religion goes deeper than that. So it bound you so far as it goes to the demeanor of-not only behavior, but will go how to smile or how to blink [laughs] eyes. It should go so far, you know, because what will happen to you if your boyfriend makes [laughs] his eyes triangle [laughs, laughter]. That is, before you say anything, that is the end of the [laughs] friendship. Religion goes so far. It is-religion is deeper and it is more, you know [laughs], real to us. That is religion. So it goes very deep.

But when you take-when you understand religion as you understand some social contact, or rules, or law of the country, you know, religion is very bad, you know. It is terrible [laughs]. When a religion lose its faith and lose its freedom to believe in, religion is worst, you know, [laughs] thing which you will have. So when-if you believe in religion, you should believe in [it] from the bottom of your heart, or else religion is worst thing to observe or believe in.

So anyway we should have a complete freedom in religious faith.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (5/9/01).

[1] This date is probably wrong: Four lectures on one reel-to-reel tape were assigned the same date. The previous recorded lecture in which Suzuki-roshi commented on the ten prohibitory precepts was given on 21 January 1966, so this lecture may have been given shortly thereafter. (See SR-66-01-21-A.)

[2] It sounds like Suzuki-roshi is quoting someone, but the source is unknown.

[3] Daijan Huineng (Daikan Eno): 638-713. Sixth Chinese Patriarch of Zen.

[4] zenna or zenma (Jap.): to defile a pure mind with a delusory one; to be attached to a dualistic view.

[5] Phonetic guess only. Transcriber is assuming the next sentence is the English translation of the Japanese phrase.

6 - Genjo Koan: Paragraphs 11-13

Sunday, June 19, 1966

Genjo Koan: Paragraphs 11-13
Soko-ji Temple, San Francisco[1]

When the truth-

-the last paragraph in Page 2.[2]

When the truth does not fill our body and mind, we think that-we think that we have enough. When the truth fill our body and mind, we know that something is missing. For an example, when we view the world from a boat on the ocean, it looks circular and nothing else. But the ocean is neither round nor square, and its features are infinite in variety. It is like a place-it is palace-it is like a palace. It is like a jewel. It seems circular as far as our eyes can reach at the time. All things are so. Though there may-there are many features in the dusty life and the pure life, we only understand what our study can reach. And in our study of all things we must appreciate that although they may look round or square, the other features of oceans or mountains are infinite in variety, and universes lies in all squares [quarters]. It is so not only around ourselves, but also directly here-even in a drop of water.

In the-in the last part we have studied, he said:

Enlightenment does not destroy the man, just as the moon does not break the water. When-a man does not hinder enlightenment, just as a drop of dew does not hinder the moon in the sky. The depth of drop is the height of the moon. The period of reflection, long or short, will prove the vastness of the dewdrop, and the vastness of the moonlight sky.

Here he says, even though we are not aware of enlightenment, enlightenment is there when we practice zazen and when we do everything in our everyday life as you practice zazen. If we say so-if so, you may say, there will be no need to take some special consideration in your everyday life or practice. And there is no need to study Buddhism, you know.

But-so he tried to correct our misunderstanding in this paragraph. "When the truth does not fill our body and mind, we think that we have enough," because you do not know what is the truth. So that is why you say there is-there will not be no need to practice anymore [laughs] or from the beginning because you think you have-anyway you have truth. You obtain truth, and everything obtain truth. And everything talks about Buddha's teaching. If so, there will not be no need even to listen to [laughs] because we know that. That is quite usual mistake for us. But it is not so. That is-why you make such understanding is because you do not know what is truth.

When we-when the truth does not fill our body and mind, we think that we have enough. When the truth fill our body and mind, we know that something is missing.

When truth is actually fill your body, you think that something is missing [laughs]. Do you understand what does he mean? Something is missing-"something is missing" means if you understand truth, you know, actual truth, truth is not-truth is-truth reveal itself in eternal present. Not only this moment, but also eternally it will continuously reveal itself through our activity. So what we do just now is not enough. We have to take another, you know, activity in next moment. So what we-just what we do is not enough.

That is why-that is true meaning of "to drop off our body and mind," or, for me, "nothing to grasp," or Bodhidharma's "I don't know" [laughs]. "I don't know" means there is many things to know. Because I don't know, I have to know many things. That is true meaning of truth. Truth is not some particular, you know, thing. If I say truth you think some special theory [laughs] or-theory-mathematical theory or scientific theory. But we don't mean such concrete, static logic by "truth." Truth is unconditionality or eternal reality. Reality does not take any form. That is why we call it reality. There is no other word for that. So sometime we say unconditionality. Because it is unconditionality, you know, it takes various condition. It accept various condition. If so, there should be various-there should be innumerable variety in its form and color. Then:

When truth fills our body and mind, we know that something is missing.

When we become one with truth, we start to take various activity according to the circumstances because we feel something is missing. So we will start continuous study, continuous practice, because we feel we should study more. When you think truth is some particular theory or teaching, you think that is enough. I know that that is enough. So you don't want to study. But when you realize what is truth actually, and you feel what you should do, you should-you will start continuous truth-true practice.

For example, when we view the world from a boat on the ocean, it looks circular and nothing else. But the ocean is neither round nor circular [square], and its features are infinite in variety.

You think the truth is some particular thing-some particular, concrete theory. So you think this is truth. But it-that is exactly the same as you saying ocean is round or square. It is not. Like it is not square or round, there should be various infinite feature. "It is like a palace. It is like a jewel." For a fish it is. For dragon, it may be like a palace. For fish, it may be a jewel. "It seems circular as far as our eyes can reach at the time." It seems circular as far as our-our eye can reach at the time.

He had pretty hard time [laughs] when he went to China across the ocean-across the ocean.[3] So he is referring to the voyage here. "As far as our eye can reach, the ocean is circular." But at-that is only at that time. When storms come [laughs], black and dark cloud, there is no ocean. So at-he says at that time, we don't what kind of ocean we will have tomorrow. "All things are so." Everything is like this. Though there are many futures in the dirty life and pure life-so-called-it "our dirty life" or "our pure life," there are many futures. We only understand that our study can reach. We say "this is awful" or "this is wonderful," but we-only that is our particular understanding-one of the many understanding of life at that time. And in our study of all things, we must appreciate that although they may look round or square, the other future of ocean or mountains are infinite in variety, and universe lie in all squares.[4]

So if we understand actually what is truth, we will have this kind of feeling. So what we do is not enough. This feeling should follow when you realize the truth. "I am not so good," you may say. Why you say so [is] because the truth is within yourself. The truth, you know, says "I am not so good" [laughs]. But you-but-but if you think, "I feel I am not so good," that is self-centered idea [laughs]. Truth says [laughs], "You are not enough" [laughs]. Like some-like Fumiko Hayashi,[5] the famous writer-famous Japanese writer said, "This is not my best work" [laughs]. "This is not my best work." That is so. This is not only my work. There should be various work for-for her.

"It is so not only around ourselves, but also directly here." "It is not so around ourselves but also directly here." If we say so, you know, you may look around and-and say the truth is infinite variety. "We have to watch" [laughs]-or that's what you may [laughs] say. But that is not, you know, right even. The truth is directly here on this moment right here. Don't look around [laughs, laughter]. You are-when we say something, you know, we are caught by the statement [laughs]. So he, you may say, not just around yourselves but right here. When you are standing up, you are standing on the truth [taps the table several times] right now. "Don't look around," he said.

It is so not only around ourselves, but also directly here-even in a drop of water.

Here we have come back to the last part [?] is of study-last paragraph: the moon is even in a drop of water. If someone ask you what is truth, you know, you may say, "I don't know"-you can say, "I don't know," or you can say, "What is it?" [Laughs.] What is it? "What is it?" means you stop and think, or you appreciate life in that moment. We are-we live in eternal present, but we even know that we do not aware of present even-present time even. We are just doing-continuously doing things one after another.

So you don't know-you are not aware of your life even. But if someone ask you what it is, you may say, "Oh, what will it be?" [Laughs.] That is the answer, you know. "Oh-oh, I am doing something [laughs]. What am I doing [laughs]? This is the answer. What are you doing? "Oh my! I am watching the fish!" [Laughs, laughter.] That is the answer. Do you understand? "What am I doing? Oh, I'm practicing zazen." That is true practice. That is true answer. "What is it?" is the answer, you know. "Oh, I don't know" is also. "What are you doing? "Oh, oh my-I don't know!" [Laughs, laughter.]

When you are actually one with truth, things happens on your life in that way. That is true life. When you discuss about the truth, what it is [laughs]-the more you discuss, the more [laughs] you will be separated from the truth. But when you know that, it's all right-if you are answering to the question-someone's question who do not know what is the truth. So you are trying to answer. Just you say, "Don't be silly, I am just eating." [Laughs.]

When a fish swims in the ocean, there is no end to the water, no matter how far it swims. When a bird flies in the sky, there is no end to the air, no matter how far it flies. However, the fish and the bird do not live-leave their elements.

It just fly. It just swim. And there is no end to-to the-for the fish. There is no end of the water or sky for the fish or bird. And fish does not realize it's swimming. A bird does not realize it's flying. But where the fish swims, where the bird fly, there are water or sky.

When the use is large, it is used largely. When the use is small, it is used in a small way. Though it flies everywhere, if the bird leaves the air, it will die at once.

So that you practice Zen is that you practice enlightenment. So enlightenment and practice is not different. So he says, "Use-when use is large, it is used largely. When the use is small, it is used in small way." But you cannot compare which is large what-which is small, which is good and which is bad. So each practice is absolutely-each practice is enlightenment itself, as when a bird flies there is sky.

Anyway, it is impossible to be diverted [?] from the enlightenment for us. "When the use is small, it is used in a small way." It follows anyway. And how it follows-it follows in the same way, with the same value. There is even-there is no two-two kinds of water for small and big fish. Water is same.

Though it flies everywhere, if the bird leaves the air, it will die at once.

"Though it flies everywhere"-though some big bird like eagle flies-will fly everywhere, but even-even so, if a eagle said, "I can fly anyway now. I am big enough to fly. So I don't want any more sky." [Laughs.] If he say so, the eagle will-may die at once [laughs]. So in this sense, there is no big eagle or no small sparrow. Sparrow and eagle is the same-are the same. Not different at all. Anyway, they must fly in the air.

Water makes life and air makes life. The bird makes life and the fish make life.

Water and-water and-water and fish, sky and bird, you may say [are] different, but actually it is not different. So he says:

Life makes bird and life makes the fish. There are further analogies possible to illustrate, in this way, practice, enlightenment, mortality and eternity.

There may be various dualistic ideas in our thinking, but practice and enlightenment, mortality and eternity are the same in its true sense. So is the other dualistic-dualistic thinking.

Now-

Here is problem:

-if a bird or a fish tries to reach the end of its element before moving in it, this bird or this fish will not find its way or its place.

So he says true practice will be established in defilement [?]. Before we attain enlightenment-before we [are] aware of enlightenment, we attained enlightenment. Because if a bird or a fish tries-it is impossible for a bird or a fish to know what is air or water before they move in it. So enlightenment should be attained before we [are] aware of it. [Laughs.] Do you understand? True practice should be established before we attain enlightenment-before we know what is enlightenment. Do you understand? If you move in the practice, you cannot, you know [laughs], know the end of air or water. As you cannot know what is enlightenment or what is defilement before you move in-before you practice it, when you practice it, you know, enlightenment is there. If you doubt it, you are trying to know what is enlightenment-if you are a fish [laughs] or a bird who wants to know-who wants to practice, who wants to move in it after you realize the end of the water or sky.

If a bird or a fish or a fish tries to reach the end of its element before moving in it, this bird or this fish will not find its way or its place. When we find our place at this moment-when we find our way at this moment, the practice follows, and this is the realization of truth.

-in its true sense.

Pretty difficult [laughs] to accept it. Pretty difficult to be a fish [laughs] or a bird who is just move in water or sky. Because we are not a fish or sky, we, you know, try to know the end of the sky or water before we move in it [laughs]. May be quite natural for you to want to know what is enlightenment, what is water or sky before you practice or before you move in. That is why I'm trying to, you know, explain what is enlightenment, and Dogen-zenji worked so hard to explain what is enlightenment. But before he write so many works, he said so [laughs]-he said this way-he said this way. He worked-he will-he worked so hard to let you know what is water, what is sky. But yet he says, you should not, you know, try to-if you say after I understand Buddhism intellectually, quite well, I will study Buddhism. Don't say so, he says. That is like a bird who try to move in-move in the sky after he knows the end of the sky.

Of course, we do not ignore the intellectual understanding of Buddhism, and especially someone who have-who have time to explain it intellectually. It is their duty to explain it intellectually. But we students for-for the students, it is necessary to start practice you understand completely what is Buddhism. You will have no time [laughs] to realize what is Buddhism.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (4/30/01).

[1] This date is almost certainly wrong: Four lectures on one reel-to-reel tape had been assigned the same date.

[2] Suzuki-roshi is commenting on Eihei Dogen's Shobogenzo "Genjo Koan," following the translation by Kazuaki Tanahashi with Robert Aitken that appeared in: (1) Shobogenzo Genjo Koan: An Analytic Study (unpublished manuscript, San Francisco Zen Center); (2) Wind Bell, 1967, VI (2-4), pp. 60-62, and (3) the [Honolulu] Diamond Sangha [Newsletter]. According to Kaz, Suzuki-roshi handed out a printed version of the translation to students.

[3] In 1223, Dogen (age 23) made the hazardous journey with Myozen by ship to Sung China across the Sea of Japan: "through a voyage of countless miles, entrusting my transient body to the billowing waves" (Eihei Dogen, Record of the Baoqing Era).

[4] The Kazuaki/Aitken version has "quarters."

[5] Fumiko Hayashi (1903-1951): Japanese novelist and short-story writer.

1966 augustus (4)

1 - Genjo Koan

Monday, August 15, 1966

Genjo Koan
Soko-ji Temple, San Francisco

Suzuki-roshi: The second paragraph [of the Genjo Koan]:

That we move ourselves and understand all things is ignorance. That things advance and understand themselves is enlightenment. It is Buddha who understand ignorance. It is people who are ignorant of ignor- [partial word]-enlightenment. Further, there are those who are enlightened about enlightenment, and those who are ignorant of ignorance. [Recording stops.][1]

Tape operator: Uh, what would you like me to say into the microphone?
[Recording stops.]

Suzuki-roshi: ... trace of enlightenment-enlightenment- ... trace of enlightenment-enlightenment- [Fragments only.]

[2]... among many instructions about how to sit: to keep your back straight, pull your chin, and about mudra in your hand. The most important thing is, we say, to stop thinking or to keep your mind on your breathing. Dogen-zenji says, "Think non-thinking. Think non-thinking." This is a very important point, and at the same time this is very difficult practice because your mind will be easily carried away. Sometime I-when you feel very good, but as soon as you feel you reached a certain stage, your mind will be carried away because you felt something [laughs], and your mind is not on your breathing any more [laughs]. So if you want to concentrated on your breathing, you should not mind even the state of mind you are in your practice.

So as Hinayana Buddhist-in Hinayana Buddhist practice, the best stage is the stage where you have no mental joy and physical joy even. The mental attachment or consciousness or joy is not so difficult to overcome, but it is the physical consciousness which is difficult to be free from it. Why we emphasize this point is because we have to live on each moment. We have to be ready. We-our mind should be absolutely free from everything spiritual and-spiritually and physically. And we should be ready for-we should be ready for responding to mental and physical stimulation which may come. And we should be-we should have power to react to everything which may come. When your mind is fortified with something, you feel-you yourself feel very safe [laughs], but actually it is not safe. Some stronger-you cannot protect yourself by preparing something. When you are ready to adjust yourself, you are-you have immense strength. But usually we always-by nature we try to fortify ourselves spiritually and mentally and-or physically. That is why we lose our freedom from our surrounding.

So in our practice, we sh- [partial word]-we open our mind and we just follow our living nature. We say, "Stop your mind." Why we say stop your mind is your mind stops your living activity. So [laughs] to stop your mind is to let your mind work. To stop, you know-your thinking faculty is usually stops your actual living faculties. So if you stop the faculty which stops your living faculty or nature, [it] means to let your mind work. Do you understand? When you think you stop or you limit your activity, when you do not think, or when you do not fortify yourself by your thinking faculty or rational faculty, your true nature will obtain the perfect freedom.

The clock is always moving: Short hand and long hand are all constantly, you know, moving. But when you think, "It is two o'clock" [laughs], clock stops. And when you prepare something in your-by your thinking, that-it means you fortify or you fortify yourself two or three miles ahead [laughs]. You think, "Now I'm all right [laughs]. I can sleep [laughs]." But that is not-that makes you uneasy more, you know. You try to be, you know-you try to feel safe, but actually at the same time you have a fear-fear of being destroyed the fortified front. So that makes you more [laughs] uneasy.

So thinking-you think so that you find out some conclusion and rest on that conclusion, but actually by thinking you make yourself more uneasy. But if you do not fortify yourself, you have no fear of being invaded. You are always welcome [welcoming] [laughs] your enemy. Whatever come you are ready. "Please come." [Laughs.] Then you have no fear. That is to stop thinking.

So not only to stop thinking but also we stop some emotional contrivance. When we sit we just sit, keeping our mind on breathing. We have to live, so we have to take breathing. So this is absolutely necessary for us. So we just sit and keeping our mind on our breathing. We do not prepare anything. We just sit. And here the important thing is to have conviction, to have selflessness. This is most important thing. Without this conviction, you cannot stop your thinking, or you cannot stop your emotional activity. If you want to stop your emotional activity and thinking activity, you remain in your selflessness.

It is not attained, this selflessness, after you attain enlightenment. Before you practiced zazen, you fixed your mind in this truth which no one can deny it. We think we have self, but actually, as you know, there is no such thing as self. You think-usually people thinks, "I am here," but actually we do not exist here. This is the truth Buddha found out. Not by just-for his own truth, but as the truth for everyone. It is absolutely true. If you cannot deny it, you have to accept it [laughs]. If you cannot accept it, it's better not to practice zazen [laughs]. This much conviction is necessary. If you have some doubt in his teaching, you may study it until you accept it completely. But it will not take so long time before you accept his teaching: his teaching is so true.

So when you practice zazen, you have to be prepared to accept the truth as truth, and stop useless thinking and useless emotional activities which will not help you, and to live on each moment is how to practice zazen. On each moment we have to renew ourselves as the clock goes. We say in-in San- [partial word]-I am not-I don't know Sanskrit so well, but to attain-how to attain detachment is to watch or to gaze at something-upeksha, they say. Upeksha means to watch. To watch means to follow the reality-to follow the reality-to follow reality like clock goes. It does not go so fast, but it does not-it is not stopping. It is moving, but it doesn't go so fast.

But our mind [laughs]-in your practice because we are so accustomed to preparing something or making some useless effort to protect ourselves, so sometime our hand moves very fast and waiting [laughs]. You know, it is-I think you set your clock-alarm, and you think this is all right. It means you-you move your-you move the hand of the clock fast-six hours fast or ahead, or seven hour ahead [laughs], and you-you will feel very good. That is-that is all right, but usually we do something like this: You save a lot of money, and you feel very good. It is the-you want money when you want it. When you hungry, you have to buy something. That is why you have to have money. But you save a lot of money, and-and after all you become interested in saving money. It means you are, you know, moving your hands of the clock, and you feel very good. But actually it means you stop your clock. Clock is necessary because it goes as the sun goes.

If we want to live in its true sense, we have to live one moment after another moment. One breathing after another. This is exactly how we should live. Forgetting all about breathing and thinking something wonderful [laughs] when you are practicing, its [it does not] make any sense. It is not how to live in this world. This kind of useless effort will be completely forgotten when we get accustomed to our practice in its true sense. It is very difficult for anyone to give others instructions one event-one thing after another. But if you know this secret, this secret will help in whatever you do. If you know-if you see what they do, you will find out how important it is to live on each moment.

In monastery, the most important teaching is Dojo daishuni ichini.[3] It means: Do is "movement." Jo is "calmness" or "to stop activity." "Our activity should be with people." That is the most important teaching in monastery. You may think in big monastery there must be some rules to control people [laughs]. I thought, when I saw the notice in the monastery, "Oh, of course it is necessary to do things with people at the same time, or else they cannot control us," but the more you think about it, the more you will find out the mean-true meaning of it. It means selflessness. It means not to move your watch, your clock ahead of the time.

Dogen-zenji, early in the spring, would watch the plum coming out in cold winter-cold morning. In Japan, you know, plum comes up in end of the January or February. Even the cold wind blowing over the icy field, it comes out. And Dogen-zenji liked plum-Japanese plum very much. And he watched-he gazed at it, appreciating its beauty. He just, you know, watch it. That is upeksha. That is detachment.

Detachment means to live with people, with everything, with the beauty of the plum. That is detachment. It doesn't look like-the flower does not looks like [it is] moving, but actually it is moving like a clock. It's moving. So it may fade away in two or three days. He may watch-he would watch every morning the same flower, and his mind follows as the plum goes. This is detachment. This is at the same time to appreciate flower, while attachment is to stop the plum. To attach to flower and stop its beauty it means to appreciate dead flower. If you want to appreciate living flower, you cannot be selfish. Your mind should be instead in the state of selflessness. You should be prepare for discouragement when the flower fade away.

This is how we stop our thinking in our practice. So "think non-thinking." Usually you will think "think thinking" [laughs]. Think thinking means "think-stopping." Think non-thinking means "think something actual, something real." But usually when we think, we think something which is dead. Nothing thinks. Everything just alike [alive?]. Only human being thinks without knowing what he is doing. Human being is ac- [partial word]-really human being when he understand what is his thinking. Then thinking will work. But when we think without knowing what is thinking, we will be completely separated from reality. This is why we say stop your mind.

So in your practice, don't try to attain some particular stage in your practice. Of course, in your practice you will have many experiences, but those experiences is valuable-is not valuable-is valuable because it is some special experience. It is valuable because-it is valuable when you follow-when you catch the experience in its true sense with detachment, with full appreciation.

Experience is not valuable. When you catch it, appreciate it in its true sense, it is valuable. Do you understand? So you should not say I attained this stage [laughs]. This stage-some particular stage is not important. That you have attained that particular stage also is not important. The way you attained-the way you had that experience is important. That way may be the same way when you suffer, when you have disagreeable experience. Same way. So you may realize that. Which is valuable is not some stage or some particular experience, but the way how you have had that experience. According to Dogen-zenji, we do not mind the loftiness of the teaching or beauty of the experience. But we should mind the way to attain the experience.

When you have zazen, zazen become zazen. When you have zazen, zazen makes sense. So when you become you yourself, zazen become true zazen. When you are omitted from zazen, zazen does not become zazen. Zazen is not to polish a tile [laughs]. Zazen is-excuse me, zazen is not some way to make tile a jewel. When you polish a tile, that is zazen. So your-how you polish it is the most important point. Whether it is tile or jewel is not the point. What kind of, you know, attainment you will have is not the point. Have you faced-confront the problem is the point. How to confront the problem in our practice is to open up ourselves and to see-to accept-accept things as it is, is the fundamental way. Do you understand?

So to think is very silly-silly [laughs]. It is as silly as to hitch a wagon to a star [laughs]. It is useless for a star to have stick [laughs]. But you feel very good when you have some stick. Brush [laughs] star, but it doesn't work. It's much better not to have anything, and just watch the star. It's very beautiful if you watch stars without anything. But when you start to brush the star [laughs], they are not beautiful anymore. But you may feel very good if you brush star [laughs]. It may be more-it-for you, you think it become more bright. But everyone will become sympathetic with you. "He is [1-3 words] [laughs, laughter]. What is he doing? Look very silly." So when you sit, you just sit. That's all. Don't forget the story [?]. Whatever you do, this attitude is very, very important.

Then without attaining enlightenment, enlightenment will come to you. This is why we emphasize to stop thinking, and why we emphasize the way-seeking mind. Dogen-zenji says you should attain enlightenment before you attain enlightenment [laughs]. Do you understand? Before you attain enlightenment [laughs]. It means way-conviction.

[Sighs.]

I think you have understood [laughs] why we say stop your mind. Think this point over and over and find out its true meaning.

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (5/10/01).

Operator's Recorded Contemporaneous Commentary

for Tape No. SR-66-08-15-A-D

This is a rather mixed-up lecture, with this lecture, which I've called on the back of the box "Number D"[4]-"Letter D"-starting on tape No. 1, marked tape No. 1, and ending on tape No. 2, starting on the end of Track 2 of tape No. 1 and ending on the end of Track 2 of tape No. 1-of-ending on the track-Track 2 of-excuse me-ending on Track 1-soo it's very complicated because the plastic reel is numbered 2, and it should be really Track 1. It's actually Track 1. Maybe I'll rewind it and leave it on-and then there'll be 1 on the other side-uhh-let's call it track Side 2, Track-or then that would be same as Track 2.

Well anyway, D ends on Track 2 of tape No. 2-begins on Track 2 of tape No. 1 (near the middle). Uhh. The first words of Lecture D were-are missing. Uhh. Just the sentence, "There are many ways to study Buddhism"-approximately that sentence-which is the beginning sentence of the lecture, which begins on Track 1, Lecture D.

The transition between tape No. 1 and tape No. 2-uhh, several minutes were lost: Four, three-four minutes, two-three minutes-in which he described how, when you turn your hands forward, or turn your hands so that there's a-thumb and forefinger are a parallel line-this turns your arm, and your arms are out from your body. This turns your arms out a little and opens your chest up at the top. And for the beginner-so the upper part of your lungs, right, and your shoulders are used-for the beginner this is important because he finds it difficult both to maintain good posture and to breathe deeply with the diaphragm, pushing everything down to make more room for your lungs. Later, he can both deep-breathe with the diaphragm pushing down to make more room for the lung and maintain good posture, which keeps the upper parts of his lungs functioning so the hand position isn't very important.

He does say, and I don't know if this was missed or not, that the little finger should touch the stomach if possible. And then the thumb and forefinger should be in a parallel line-parallel vertical line. However, for more extrovert-type people, and I don't think this was lost-it may be all right to turn it in so both little finger and even thumb more turned up somewhat touch the stomach, or toward the stomach so it's not a vertical parallel but at an angle-of course, still in line but not vertical. And for more introvert people it should be more open out.

Umm. I think that's the gist of what was missed between the two.

Sorry. Thank you. Goodbye.

[1] It sounds like the tape was re-recorded, at a later date, from this point onward with a different lecture. That is, the tape for a lecture originally on Genjo Koan Paragraph 2 was later recorded over again with a different lecture. (Or the first part of the "... among many instructions" lecture was recorded over with Paragraph 2 of Genjo Koan.)

[2] This is the earliest surviving part of the lecture, although the opening words are missing. In a contemporaneous recorded explanation, the tape operator stated that the opening sentence was approximately: "There are many ways to study Buddhism." That commentary is appended to the end of this lecture.

[3] Japanese: dojo: "temple, meditation hall"; daishuni: possibly from daishu, "all the monks in a temple," + ni; ichini: possibly from ichi, "one," + ni. See also lecture SR-69-08-18.

[4] This is probably Lecture A in the current numbering.

2 - (kort)

Monday, August 15, 1966

Lunch Lecture

[mic noise}-cannot appreciate our teaching in its true sense. When you listen to the teaching, our teaching, we should accept it, but if you have some prejudice, you cannot accept the teaching. So do

sound problem

3 - Intellectual Understanding

Monday, August 15, 1966

Intellectual Understanding

For us to think everything out or else we-we find it pretty difficult to have firm conviction in our understanding and practice Zen. Originally Zen is not some practice based on some particular intellectual teaching or understanding. But Buddhism is one of the religions which is highly intellectualized. So for us, especially for us who are much intellectualized, even though each one of us is not so highly intellectualized, but you read and what you hear is based on some highly intellectualized thought.

So what we talk about, what we read is based on some intellectual-intellectual, deep understanding of-of our life and everything. So it is necessary for us to-to have some intellectual understanding of Buddhism. Before we read Shobogenzo, intellectual understanding is necessary because his teaching is very, very intellectual. It is pretty hard for us to understand without any intellectual understanding. That is why-I have to continue this kind of talk.

Yesterday I talked about Buddhist psychology of eight consciousness. What is five sense organs and sense data and sensation? And what is mind? And what is mind-what is the faculty of the mind which makes-makes us make many mistakes? And what is the innermost mind which is universal to everyone. And this eight consciousness is not just what we see or what we hear or what we understand. It is the innermost origin of every existence-physical and spiritual, subjective and objective. But I did not talk about the inner most origin of the existence-every existence. And next was the holy nature in ordinary sense. The holy nature is something which is always constant and eternal existence which is completely different from usual existence which we see or which we hear or which we think. It is a kind of thinking faculty based on our holy nature. This is the usual understanding of divine nature.

And I talked about our function of our mind in different way. The most subtle, delicate function of our mind. And more vivid function of mind. The subtle function of mind is-are the-there are three subtle function of mind: First one is so-called it slightest movement of the mind which is called sometimes ignorance. When our mind makes slightest movement, at the same time we will have subjective-subjectivity or objectivity of the mind. Those are the subtle function of our mind. Usually we do not aware of those three functions.

The more vivid function is to like or dislike. And we-we will have idea of continuity of mind. This mind will create the idea of self-I exist here. This is actually the continuity-the idea of continuity of mind. If the continuity of the mind take place, we will be attached to what we see. This is the attachment. The third one of the latter six. The fourth one is chronological [?] conceptions. We will put many labels on our ideas-this is Buddhism, this is [1 word], this is communism, this is capitalism [laughs]. Those are our labels. But those ideas-although-although the ideas-conceptions supposed to be a pure conception-conceptions but actually those conception is firmly rooted in continuity of mind or attachment. It is almost impossible to separate the [1 word] conception from attachment or continuity of mind which is selfish mind or faculty of the mind-dualistic faculty of mind which is-which is like or dislike or good or bad write or wrong.

So actually we-we can talk about pure conception but actually there is no pure conception. And furthermore we will put those conceptions firmly rooted in selfish attachment, put into actual action. That is why we have suffering, we have confusion in our world. So the fifth one is karma-karmic action. The last one is suffering. Why we suffer is because our structure of the mind-mind function is consistent-consists of those elements. This is another interpretation of our life.

And today I want to talk about-this is-I want to talk about cause and effect-theory of cause and effect or causation. The Buddhism is-the most important teaching of Buddhism is causation. This is very important. If you do something good, you will have good result, you know. This is-this kind of idea or teaching is pretty important for us. But if you carelessly accept this teaching, your understanding will not be our understanding because this is the same-you will make same mistake as some heretics do. When you say, if you do something good you will have bad result, you know, it means, you know, you-the idea of you is here, you know. If you do something good, you will receive you, you know-you will receive some bad result. So what you do-there is what you do and you yourself. And you is always constant and what you do is different and not bound. So you have permanency of the mind-idea of permanency of the mind and idea of impermanency of the objective world. This is-for us this is not right understanding. This is so-called it [1 word] view of life.

So when you believe in-when you accept this teaching of causation, it is necessary for you to have deeper understanding of what is time and what is various existence and how everything exist in this world. Things forms, you know, this world. In this world [laughs]-I'm sorry this is so, [laughs] so sober [laughs]. Not so interesting but please listen to me [laughs, laughter]. Things forming one world by acting each other-you are acting each other. It means, you know, you say you are things acting with each other, but if you carefully think [?] this acting with each other-things which is acting with each other, it means there is no more you or [laughs] others it-when you area acting with each other, you know. By acting with each other-acting on each other, you will lose your character and others will lose their character too. You cannot replay same character when you acting with each other. This is-this point is very important. You say when you do something good result will be good, you know. When you do something good, it means acting with each other. You are acting on something else. And something actually acting on yourself too. Then what will happen to you. There is no more constant you and there is no more constant others. Others may change and you will change. This is the fundamental teaching of Buddhism.

Everything changes moment after moment. Everything changes from formed to the phony [?], you know. Something formed is next moment something formed will change into something phony [?] [laughs]. This is fundamental teaching of Buddhism. When you believe in the causality, you have to-you should not forget this point. Then you will have perfect understanding of causality.

And next point, which is very important for you in believing in causality, the causality takes place on, you know, on some particular life. Moral, good action will create-will result moral, good result. Material good will result material good result. If you save money, you will have a lot of money [laughs, laughter]. But even though you save money, you cannot be wiser [laughs]. But sometime you make this kind of mistake. If you offer, you know, $100 to church [laughs], what will happen to you? You know, you will lose $100 [laughs, laughter]. Church will get $100. That is material cause and effect. But the mentality or your spirit who donate-that donate $100 will result religious good.

So this kind of understanding, clear understanding is very important. If you are not sure about-about this point, you will make many mistakes in believing in religion. You will mixed-up religion and some other way of life-religious life and ordinary life. Religious life is religious life and ordinary life is ordinary life. You should not mixed-up. But unfortunately, we mix up religious life with something else. But as I shall tell you, religious life through and through will result various result in various field.

A Japanese philosopher condensed this-condensed this kind of way of thinking in this way, "Things forming one world by acting each other means that they are thought as part of one world, but things acting on each other in space means that things have no special character. When it comes to space in exact sense of physics, forces are [1 word] in changes in space." When things-when things acting each other, it means it is not no more each existence. It is replaced by force which changes-which is changing always. This is, you know, science of-strict science-modern science will tell you this truth. And even atom is not material. It is force. It is energy, just energy. It has no weight or no-it occupy no space. It is just force. But when things are thought as parts of whole-one whole, it means that when things are thought as parts of one whole, when many things are supposed to be a part of one whole, it means that concept of acting each other is lost. When you definitely say, here is many things, it means that the concept of acting each other is lost, you know. When you say I am here and you are there definitely, the concept of relationship [end of tape side A] is lost-concept of acting each other is lost.

Second, the world becomes static. Three, reality is lost. It is not reality anymore if you have a definite idea of each existence. There is no more reality. That is not real. Actually everything is acting on each other. The world on reality is essentially a world of mutual determination of single [?] being [?]. Mutual determination of a single being. Such world essentially moves from the formed to the [1 word]. This philosopher is the-the most famous philosopher-philosophers-philosopher in contemporal Japanese philosopher. Nishida [?], do you know Nishida-Nishida? His name is Nishida. And he always sit in meditation and think, and think, and think. And sometime he just practice shikantaza-just to sit in shikantaza and created those marvelous philosophy. This-his philosophy of course accord with the Buddhist philosophy completely. Of course he must have studied Shobogenzo and other Buddhist philosophy. This kind of understanding is necessary when you understand-when you try to understand what Dogen-zenji said.

In Rinzai school, some-always students work on koans-koan. Those are actually koan [?] for you. The purpose of koan is to work all koan out, you know. Work it out. It is not just to concentrate the part-it is not just for concentration. It is not just means of concentration. So if you pass one koan, it means you have passed the rest of the koan. So it takes pretty long time to pass one koan. There is-you know the enlightenment means many things, you know. I attained enlightenment you may say. But enlightenment is-perfect enlightenment is quite different. There is great different in-between kensho and perfect enlightenment. Just you-just you see your true nature when you understand something more-little bit more than your usual understanding. That is so-called it kensho. You took glance at your true nature. That's [laughs]-so this experience is the experience of-experience in term of consciousness. It is not [1 word]. You know what it is. You saw something. You experienced- experienced something and you believe in something, you know, that is true. That is true experience. But the experience is just-you just experienced for few moments [laughs]. That is not perfect enlightenment. When you attain perfect enlightenment, after attain enlightenment, you will have work [?] on it for many years or sometime maybe rest of your life. This is how you study Buddhism.

Here is many-interesting words. To put a head upon a head, you know, to put head upon a head-mistake over mistakes. [4 words] over [4 words]. To put a head upon a head-what exactly [?] you think it means? It is a kind of riddle [laughs]. To put head upon a head [laughs]. You try to understand something, you know. It means you are trying to put one more head upon your head. There is no need for you to study anything because you have-you exist in the way you should exist always. But you forget all about your head [laughs]. So the moment you see some good head-oh, that is my head [laughs, laughter]-you put-you try to put [laughs] some good beautiful head upon your head. But that is not possible, you know. The way is-the two, you know, to find out your head is our way. Intellectual understanding of Buddhism is to put a head over-upon your head [laughs]. But this kind of teaching we study is not to put a head upon a head. It looks like intellectual understanding, but if you study those teaching, you will forget-you will find out how useless it is to put a head upon your head. But for the people who do not realize that you have your own head always, it is necessary to tell them you have your head [laughs]. This is, you know, why we study those teachings or Shobogenzo.

And Dogen-zenji disgusted [?]-discussed it [?] with the people who have many heads [laughs]-not only one head-not only one head but also many and many heads-fame, profit, [1 word], and [1 word], and popularity, health, wealth [laughs]. They want many heads. So he was disgusted with people. So he told them you have this kind of head-you are trying to have this kind of head and another kind of head. But it is useless. The best way is to find your head-own head which you have. This is why Dogen-zenji left Shobogenzo for us. But the people who-who is so busy in finding their many heads, it is almost impossible to find out their own head. So he thought it may be better-it may be better not to try too hard to tell them you have your own head because they are too busy.

So some-some day, someone will understand my teaching. And someone will find his own head. But this is not the appropriate time for people to find out their head if you study Japanese history-what kind of life Japanese people had at that time. So I want you to-just to understand-my talk is just to make you realize how useless it is to be-to devote yourself in material-material life-just material life. Or to devote yourself to strive-to build-up some big ego. This is quite useless for us. When we find out what we have within ourselves all the rest of the treasure is ours.

Mistake over mistakes. Mistakes-mistake over mistake-mistakes means to-means that we are always making mistake and we are striving for-we are developing our mistakes without knowing what we are doing. [1 word] and vein over [1 word] and vein, you know. This is also to find out various useless understanding of religion. But he used those words in the opposite sense. Where he used this was, for an instance, to put a head upon a head means to use one head in various way [laughs]. Although he-you don't put head upon a head but you use your head in various way. If you have-if you realize what is your head, you can use it as if you have many heads. So to put a head upon a head for him means, to use your original head. Mistakes over mistakes is to express true way in various way. Why we call it mistake is because we do not attach to some-something which you do. Tentatively it is right but next moment it may be mistake. So after you did it or that was my mistake, excuse me [laughs]. I'll do it better next time. And you may say, "Oh, that was mistake too. This time I'll make it right."

So this is the way we should be, you know, we should do [?]. Mistake over mistake is right. Right thing after right thing is wrong. You are forcing something to others. "This is right. You should obey [laughs]. What I-you should obey me," you know, this is not completely, you know, right. Tentatively, "Excuse me I want you to-I have a favor to ask you. Please help me." That is alright. But it is not-it should not be complete anyway. When you say this is right, that is wrong [laughs].

So he is said mistake over mistakes. This is right. They-[1 word] and [1 word] over [1 word] and [1 word]. This is how we help-how we act on each other. It is not so simple. We should be prepared for the hard work we will have. We should not-we should be always prepared for-we should have firm conviction to work it out. But the way should little by little, step by step. If you want to do it with hasty mind, you cannot do anything. So to find out [1 word] over [1 word] is right way, right observation. But usually we prefer easy way-simple way. But that is-it means you are not sincere enough.

So we should be always prepared for those fact-ultimate fact. Whatever you say this is true. So Dogen-zenji always used this [2 words] in opposite way. So he said you should find out [1 word] over [1 word] when usually people say don't find [?] out [1 word] over [1 word]. When people say do-do things correctly [?], Dogen-zenji says you should do-you should do mistake over mistake [laughs]. That is right. You should-to put a head over-upon a head means to turn one's own face to his own [?] [1 word]. This is maybe-in English it is quite different but in Japanese both way is possible. To turn your face-your [2 words]. You have to do right thing. This is-it means to-to have two or three or more heads [laughs]. Sometime you [1 word], sometime you [1 word]. This is-should be the way. You should not attach to some holy expression of yourself [?] [laughs]. This is not right.

This kind of preparation is necessary when you try to understand what Dogen-zenji said in the fascicle of [2 words]. [2 words] is Buddha-mind itself is Buddha. This is maybe rather hard-this is maybe pretty unfamiliar way of thinking, but we have-we have too much concrete ideas. So our mind does not work properly. So it is necessary to cut off those concrete idea when you want to study-when you work out or when you think out. But proper way of practice is just to practice and teaching is mixed [?]. Practice is past, teaching is mixed. Instruction or lecture is [1 word] [laughs] but some accommodation [laughs] may be necessary. I have to accommodate [3 words] as Dogen-zenji did. But his way of accommodation is quite strict [laughs]. So we have to be prepared for his strict understanding of things.

Thank you very much.

---

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham (5/8/01).

4 - Sesshin Lecture

Monday, August 15, 1966

Sesshin: Lecture

The first day of the sesshin is almost finished. In the first day, I wanted you to establish a good posture. It is rather-it was not appropriate to give you some-something to work on intellectually, but as you have been physically worked so hard, so for change I'll give you some intellectual problems in Buddhism.

We are now coping with the problem of causality. This-I think [2 words] must have told you something about this, I think. But this problem is very big problem. So big that it covers all the area of Buddhist philosophy. The one of the philosophy which suggest us right understanding of causation is [1 word] sutra. In [1 word] we have a famous statement in Japanese [Japanese phrase]. Things [?] are-things are one of many-things exist one of many or many of one-as one of many or many of one. The one-the understanding of one of many is rather mechanical understanding of existence. And many of one understanding of many-existent as many of one is theological [?] understanding of existence. But both understanding will reduce to the one understanding which is eternal present.

Things as one of many, which is mechanical understanding, is possible when you ignore-not ignore but when you-when you do not take the-when you do not take the truth of changing-dynamic changing of things out of [1 word]. Then things exist as in one of many. You are a part of it. But actually it is not so but ignoring that you are acting on each other and you have actually no-you have no time to hold [?] special character when you are acting with each other. Actually you change-you changes-you change and other things changes. But in the smallest particle of time you exist mechanically as one of many. You are a part of many or one of the many.

But as I pointed out last time-no, no yesterday, it is not true because dynamic-as long as dynamic change is going on, on and on, we have no time [laughs] to exist in one of many. You are included-you are involved in-always involved in dynamic change of the world. So when you have full understanding of the one of many then you will find out really what you-what-how you exist is in eternal present. You are-you exist in eternal present. On this present-on this present you have future and-past and future connected with present. In this present, you have future and you have past. Future is the time which does not come yet but it showed itself in present. The past is the time which passed already but it doesn't-it hasn't passed yet, you know-some connection is in present. So in this moment we have past and future.

So in static logic it is possible to say present include past and future or past and future is connected with present. This is possible to say. But this point will be more clear to you when you apply the [1 word] logic. Past-past is-past and future is one pair of opposites, you know. Past-past conform-confront future. Future confront past. So in [1 word] logic past and future is completely different idea. Past and future is confront with each other. But at the-at the same time it conform with each other. Because-because of the idea of past we-we will have idea of future. So it-actually past conforms future. Future conforms past. When this conformation take place, the actual meaning of past and future will be transcended. When this take place, past is not past anymore, future is not future anymore. And past and future will be involved in dynamic change of the world.

So anyway, Buddha's teaching that things changes or his understanding of things in this world is-this world is the world of dynamic change is always true. And this truth is a key to solve those problems we-intellectual problems. Without this key, this contradiction cannot be solved. Whether there will be eternal dispute whether this world is world of-this world is going to some particular result or this world-in this world many things just exist mechanically. But because of his teaching, the world is the world of transiency. The world-and world of dynamic change. We can solve this problem. And conclusion is we live in eternal present. We can touch the eternal-the eternity-eternal life or else we have no time to touch the immortal life. Even though we are mortal-even though we are mechanical existence in one way, it is possible for us to touch to the eternal truth-eternal eternity-eternal being. And we find ourselves as a immortal being. And we live in eternal present.

When we live in this eternal present, we have absolute freedom. Actually, when you understand this truth, your past cannot determine your present. Your future [1 word] cannot determine your present. So you are-your way of life is quite free from [1 word] understanding and materialistic understanding of our life. This is how you achieve the absolute freedom or [1 word] freedom. This is how we acquire religious life in its true sense.

The teaching of causality, if you do something wrong the result will be bad, it is [1 word] understanding of life. But if you understand [1 word] understanding in Buddhist way-applying the truth this world is the world of dynamic change-you will not be caught by just future result. You have freedom from future life. And you will be free from your past life. But it does not mean to ignore the truth of causality. Believing in causality, we will be free from our past and future. This is [1 word] one and many. Things-one is one of many. Many is many of one. One is-one of many is mechanical understanding. The many is many of one is [1 word] understanding. Understanding of many is-many of one is, you know, to believe in causality and to start our activity expecting some result. So result comes first and our present will be, not sacrificed, but comes next. This is the weak point of the teaching of causality, you know. If you believe in causality, you have no freedom as determinism teach us-teaches us. You have no freedom because you will-your present will be determined by your past and as long as you have some future idea you will-you have no freedom. You have to sacrifice present for [1 word] future. But this is not a completely right understanding. So essence of Buddhist teaching is the teaching everything changes and everything is-this world is world of dynamic change.

This morning we-I talked about several stuck [?] word of Buddhism and difference between Dogen-zenji's way-way of using it and usual way of using it to put head upon a head or mistake over mistakes or [3 words] over [3 words]. To put head on a head means to exist in this world as a one of many, you know, there is many things [laughs], so we have to see many things. So we want many heads. One head is not enough [laughs]. But usually to put over-upon a head is most ridiculous [laughs] thing. But for Dogen it is not ridiculous because he has deeper understanding of life. We say one or many heads but one or many is-fundamentally is not difference. You say sometime one and you say sometime many but one-one head you have is result of many [laughs]. Many [1 word] one head like this. You have-you have many heads. Many things and many things result in one head. And one head-this one head will-you may understand this one head is many because this head will-this one head, according to the [1 word] understanding of our life, this one head is mechanical understanding. This one head is result of many. But [1 word] understanding, this one head will be sacrificed for one. It means you go back to past from present [laughs]. Do you understand? It is rather difficult. Mechanically, you know, your head is result of many-many factors result one head. But [1 word] understanding of head is, you know, opposite because the result come first and cause comes later, second. So this one head will result-will work-will be sacrificed as one of many and will result one. It goes back to past. As Dogen-zenji says, times go from future to past and sometime from past to future he says, [laughs] which is ridiculous you may say [laughs] but it is quite true. It is the difference of your viewpoint you take.

Mechanically, you know, Buddha passed away 3,000 years ago attaining oneness of the one truth. But when we strive for Buddhism, Buddha's teachings-teaching come first and our effort comes next. It means Buddha is here and our, you know, effort comes later. So it means time goes back to Buddha from present to past because, you know, his attainment is-his teaching is here now. And to attain his teaching-his enlightenment we strive for in various way. So our effort comes later. And teaching comes first. It means time comes-time pass from present to past. But if you have deeper understanding of the truth, you will not surprised even though Dogen-zenji said times elapse from present to past [laughs]. It is quite natural for us. And we are doing-some of us Buddhist doing this kind of thing-teaching first-Buddha first and our effort is next. This is not right way of studying Buddhism.

We should find out Buddha right here. [end of tape side A] But it does not mean to sacrifice our life which we have present-which we have now. It means to live in eternal present without sacrificing anything, without appreciating this moment as an eternal present. In this way we can believe-firmly believe in our teaching no matter whatever viewpoint you take, no matter what kind of view of life you had. As long as you have this truth, there is nothing to be astonished. When you just understand teachings, many teachings intellectually, you will be astonished. You will be-you will have many difficulties in understanding-in accepting teachings. But if you have deeper understanding of reality, whatever they may say it is all right. You will-you can accept it.

So according to Buddhism or especially Zen, this world is world of contradiction and in contradiction we will find out-we will directly experience identity of the contradiction. We can identify, we can accept the contradiction of the teaching and we can appreciate the contradiction. Instead of confronting with each other, we-we will conform with each other as man and woman, you know [laughs]. We can, you know-if you confront-if man confront with or if a woman confront with a man, you know, it is rather [laughs]-you will waste-your life is waste of time. But if you conform yourself with man or with woman, you can identify yourself with-with another. This is how we live in this world. By conforming with each other we can study Buddhism. There is no need to be critical, you know. If someone says something opposite to your understanding, it is-it will be the confirmation of your understanding. "Oh that is-that is your understanding. I can understand why you understand the reality in that way." In this way, the life of confrontation will become life of conformation and you will have absolute composure in your life. In difficulty, in problems, in various vein and [laughs] ivy [?] of thought. The more the thought is complicated the more you are composed-you will acquire the [1 word] conformation-composure of your mind. This is the secret of Buddhism. This is not just understanding. If you hear me, I think you will understand why we have man and woman, and why we have past and future, why we have freedom-we should have freedom and we should have a tradition, and many framework of society.

It is rather early but I want to-I think I have finished what I wanted to talk about for this morning-this evening.

Thank you very much.

Do you have something to announce? Tomorrow Bishop Sumi[1] is coming, so I want all of you to attend his lecture and sesshin.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham (5/9/01).

[1] Bishop Togen Sumi.

1967 (21)

1967 april (2)

1 - Sesshin Lecture A

Saturday, April 22, 1967

Sesshin Lecture A
San Francisco

[1] ... -students. I want to give some important points. First of all, when you want to study Buddhism or Zen, you must give up worldly desires or you must realize that it is useless to seek for worldly desires. But it may be rather difficult to realize that it is foolish to seek for worldly desires.

Sometime, people mix up religious way-seeking mind and worldly desires. They think they are-there is-are seeking for a truth or a religious truth, but actually they are seeking for the worldly desires by name of religion. The religious sentiment is quite different from worldly desires. By "worldly desires" I mean to seek for-to seek for fame or profit. To seek for fame or profit, this kind of desire is very much like, in some point, religious desires.

If you understand something about Buddhist philosophy or deep teaching of Buddhism, you may be very much proud of it. To have some profound unusual understanding of life or view of life, while others foolishly study something which is not so deep or profound, you may say: "You are wrong. My understanding is right. Look here, Buddha says so-and-so. This is true understanding of life." But reflect on your mind when you say it-say so. In your mind there is just pride, and no mercy, or no kindness in your mind. You are just proud of something, that's all. Whatever you say, that is out of question. You should reflect on your mind. So in this case you mix up, you know, study of Buddhism and worldly attainment.

If you study Buddhism people naturally respect you. And if you say something unusual, people may say, "He is very great." And if you practice Zen quite well, people will respect you. But in this case, in this situation, what kind of feeling you have is the point, you know. If you are very much proud of yourself, that is wrong. You are not studying Buddhism. And even though you have sometime-if you are too much proud of your understanding or your practice, eventually people will get tired of seeing you [laughs, laughter]. Then you will be very much discouraged. "But I am studying [laughs] Zen [laughs]." That's very, you know, foolish.

So without knowing how to study Buddhism you cannot prac- [partial word]-study Buddhism. This is why we practice zazen with group in this way. If you practice-you can practice zazen alone pretty well, but there are many danger, and there are many pit [pot?] hole in your practice. And you will be-you will easily fall into the pit hole of the practice. But if you practice in this way, it is very difficult to be lost. Everyone watching you beside yourself. Of course in our practice we are very careful with ourselves. And so, this is pretty good. But even though you are-you think you are very careful, but actually people knows you more than yourself. If you want to know about yourself ask people what they will say. You will find out quite easily what kind of person you are.

You may say people has misunderstanding [laughs], you may say, but that is just excuse. You think people misunderstand you, but we are-we exist in the world of interdependency. So we cannot separate it from the meaning of our existence-cannot be found out-cannot be understood [as] something separated from others. So we have to study ourselves by the mirror of the people. And if your understanding of yourself and others' understanding of yourself does not accord with-you have to think.

In short, it is more safe to have very little desires in your study. Don't try to achieve something great. Don't try to study something profound. Just study about yourself in your everyday life. Then you will not make not much mistake in your study. When you intend something great, you will be-your practice will be-will not be so good. In your desperate-desparatory condition, you have to study. You have to accept the situation you are [in], and you should think this is the best occasion to practice-to study yourself or to study Buddhism.

So when you practice zazen with people-I mean by "practice" not only zazen practice but also cleaning or work-we call it samu.[2] In samu, or in your zazen practice, or observation of rituals you should try to work on something difficult and something hard, or something which people do not like to do it. Usually, you know, if you are in the position of teacher, you will be very happy. But to study Buddhism as a disciple always will [laughs] not be so good. But you should think which is better: to be a teacher or to be a disciple? When you feel something good, you know, there is some danger. Or you will be lost in your practice. So if you want to practice, or if you realize how difficult it is to practice Zen in its true sense, you should rather prefer something-try to work [on] something which people will ignore or will not like it.

Dogen-zenji established Kosho temple near Kyoto when he was thirty-thirty-four. He says:

Only the people who already gave up fame and profit can enter this monastery. The people-students who has no sincere way-seeking mind cannot enter this monastery. If you enter this monastery with the idea of name and profit by mistake, [you] should go out. If you have true way-seeking mind, you will not have any idea of name and profit.

In the world-in the various world, there is not many true teachers. In this country from ancient time-this is-this temple may be the source of the true Buddhism. Because of-because I am pitiful for my descendent so I will practice-I will emphasize this point especially. The student in this monastery should be like milk and water-should be harmonious, should be friendly like milk and water. And you should practice our way. For a while we are master and disciple. But we are friends forever. And we are-you are Buddha and patriarchs. We are all Buddha and patriarchs. And we are practicing their way of Buddhism, and we are meeting with the true dharma.

You should not forget true way-seeking mind. True [way]-seeking mind is Buddha's mind and body. And with it you will be Buddha. You renounced your home and your village, and you are with cloud and water. Who is help-who helps you? Usually your parents is the most great helper, but the more helpful one is Buddha. More help is-more helpful one is your friend and friend of Buddhism.

Don't like to-to [go] wandering about or to sightseeing. If it is necessary, once a month will be allowed. Ancient people lived in the mountain or remoted wood and practiced our way, giving up all the worldly affairs and giving up his learning and his virtues. And now-and they are sincerely strive for the extinguish-extinguishing the fire on his-in their head. Recollecting those things, we should not be involved in worldly affairs. If we-if we are involved in it, we should be very ashamed of it. The evanescence of life-in this evanescence of life, we don't know when our life drops on the roadside of-like a dew on the roadside.

This three points are the most important points. He wrote some more points, but those points are very important. But we-I don't say we should observe those words of Dogen literally right now, but why we study Buddhism will be understood by those instructions.

This-those points are the most difficult points for you American people. You know, you are very ambitious, and you are trying to do something good always, and try to be successful [laughs] always, you know, without knowing the true meaning of it. So even though you come here and study Buddhism, you know, to me, you know, you are going the other direction [laughs]. It looks like so. I hope this is my misunderstanding, but I am very sorry, more and more [laughs] I found you going [in] the other direction.

For an American it is, you know-maybe it is not bad, but for a Buddhist it is not so good. So that is why I say you should know what you are doing. You know, you are trying, you know-your idea of Buddhism is something in the cloud, you know [laughs], where you cannot reach. And still you [are] ambitious people with big stick [laughs, laughter], and reach for that. But that is not our way.

Our way is just to stand on the ground [laughs] and step by step to go forward is our way. Sometime we may go sideways [laughs], but as long as your, you know, feet are on the ground it may be pretty good.

So we, you know, admire a cow, you know, which cannot even run. They are very slow [laughs]. Cow is our good example. Do you know the picture of-instruction of ten cows, you know, cow? Because it goes very slow on the ground. You shouldn't try to be a dragon [that] flies in the sky. If you want to be a hero [laughs], you know, hero of the most-hero of the commonest people, not to be, you know, not to try to control people or to give some big influence to others.

Here in this country some other kinds of hero is necessary. We are, you know, going-we have too much heroes-same kinds, same kinds of-too much heroes, so we don't-I don't think you want heroes like Napoleon or like some statesman. You should be a pioneer, you know, in-to the other direction. You should be a pioneer of true, you know-in its true sense. If you have some cheer [?], you know, the cheer [?] should be directed toward right direction.

Before many ambitious people took a world trip, but now who is taking world trip, spending much money? [Laughs.] This is ridiculous, you know. In this-under this situation, to stay [in] one place always is same thing to make world trip. Not much difference. If you stay one place always, you will meet, you know, if you stay [in] San Francisco you will meet various people without going anywhere because they will come, they will pass San Francisco. Whenever they come to San Francisco airport, they may come and visit you [laughs, laughter]. There is no need for you to going around, you know. We are-all of us is going, you know, another direction.

My father's-my father was a priest. And his friend-my father passed away long, long time ago. But his friend who was a priest stayed only [at] one temple, but he had many good friends. But he is a kind of exception, but there is some truth in his way. So try not [to] study Buddhism in your pleasure. And choose something-choose your way in some common and plain world. There there is true pleasures of life, and eternal truth is there.

In your sitting, if you have this kind of confidence you will understand many things which is quite different from the understanding you will have by some other way of study. You can do many things, but without realizing this point, to do it means nothing. That is why we practice zazen. What I mean is to change your direction of study. I do not say, "Don't do this," or "Don't do that." But we have to study Buddhism for [?] a different way from your ordinal [ordinary] way of studying, or else Buddhism is-will be just a interesting philosophy.

[SR appears to be responding to question not heard on the recording, which had been stopped for an indeterminate period.]

Hmm? Oh. Love of another person? Worldly desires? Yeah, sometime. Or most of time it may be so [laughs]. But true love is not, you know. But true love is, you know, it is same thing with Buddha's teaching, you know. Something which is very exciting is not, you know-there is-many things will be involved in it, so you have to know which is the most important element, you know-basic element of the love. It is like love may be a-like a beautiful building, you know, very beautiful. But if the foundation is not good it will not last long. So we sh- [partial word]-you should find out what kind of foundation is necessary for the building of love.

Did you-you know, you have to study, you know, about love, you know, just, you know-usually, you know, your way of-you study love in comparing [comparison to] something, some other thing-or hatred, you know. And to-to be-to feel resistance is, you know, to build resistance to war or something, you know, is love. You may understand this way. This is very realistic understanding, and it will not reach to the bottom of the meaning. So forget all about it, and intuitively, you know, study it.

So to attain liberation from-even from yourself is important. This is why we sit, you know, with firm conviction. Some of, you know-whatever people may say, you know, don't be bothered by it. And watch yourself, whether you have true love or not. That is, you know, how to study what is love. So if-usually if someone say "white," you know, you may say "black" [laughs]. This is quite usual thing. If someone say, "white" you may say "black," you know. We have this kind of tendency. And we have this kind of understanding always. It is-it means you will have no freedom from it. To imitate or to follow others is-may be foolish. But to feel resistance is also foolish. So don't be caught by words. And rely on your intuitive direct experience. That is the important thing.

Worldly desires-all the desires is not worldly desires if you have this point. But if you do not have the foundation, you know, the-even the beautiful building is not true love. Don't be caught by fancy-fanciness of the world or technique of the world. We have various, you know, nature, so psychologist or religious leaders studying our nature and organizing big [laughs] organization-and you will be captivated by it if you are not wise enough to know yourselves.

The hero in the Meiji Period, Saigo Nanshu,[3] said: "It is difficult to manage someone who do not want fame or profit." [Laughs.] It is very difficult to manage people like that. But, "The most trustworthy person is the person who has nothing to do with name or profit." He is the most trustworthy person, he said. That is very true. All right? [Laughs.]

Zen master may say: "What you said is right, but what you mean is not right" [laughs]. What you say is right, but what you mean is not right [laughs]. So, you know, "Under-under many scolding slap, you should study." [Laughs.] What, you know, do they meant-did-do they mean [laughs]?

As we are pretty-we are big group now, so [laughs] it is-we must, you know, be very strict with ourselves. Okay? We have not much candy [laughs]. You are too many, so [laughs] instead of candy we have to give you some salt so that [laughs, laughter] we have not much, you know, problem-difficulties. If we serving just salt, not much people will come [laughs, laughter]. We have no-no more candy. Now let's sit without candy [laughs, laughter].

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Transcribed by Diana Bartle and Bill Redican (3/26/01).

[1] The opening words were not recorded on tape.

[2] samu (Jap.): Physical labor around a temple: sweeping the grounds, gathering firewood, etc.

[3] Saigo Takamori (literary name Nanshu): 1827-1877. A popular leader in the overthrow of the Tokugawa Shogunate and in the restoration of the Emperor Meiji. He was trained in both Zen Buddhism and Neo-Confucianism.

2 - Sesshin Lecture B

Saturday, April 22, 1967

Sesshin Lecture B
San Francisco[1]

[2] ... you have many things to do for yourself and for Zen Center. You-this sesshin was wonderfully done. This is, I think, very unusual. By usual mind this kind of thing cannot be fulfilled. I think this is because-it is because of your bodhisattva-mind, which is to do things for others or for your future descendant rather than for yourself. What you have in your mind is what should be done for your-for others or for your descendant. Although you are quite young, but still you have this mind.

I think that is why everything is going so well. But as I said in previous lecture, the most important thing to do for others is not to-is not to build something beautiful for others or to help them in some materialistic way or formal way, but to help others by giving true spirit of how to live in this world and true understanding of our life.

If we have true spirit of-true spirit to live in this world, there is no problem. But because of our superficial understanding of life, we have many problems and suffering. Of course, as long as we live or as long as we have this body, it is not possible to get out of suffering. So the point is how to change our suffering into joy of life-true joy of life. This is how to help others. Without this point we cannot help others in its true sense. If you have this understanding, whatever you do- alms giving, or kind words, or loving words-will work. And this is why we practice zazen too. So zazen is not some particular practice to attain something for ourselves, but [it is] to have true understanding of life and true spirit of- to acquire true spirit of life.

So we have to practice zazen just to practice zazen, as we live in this world without any particular reason why we live in this world. But if we understand that each one of us is a tentative form of the absolute being, and whatever we do is the activity of the absolute being which is not possible to be known by us completely, but something which we cannot doubt its existence. It exist but we do not know what it is completely. And this is the origin of our life or source of life. And it is also the life to which we resume after cessation of our activity. If there is something which we should believe in, this kind of absolute unknown being is the only one. There are many names-we call it by many names, but the "unknown absolute being" is one.

So purpose of our practice is to get accustomed to live without being attached to many things but this unknown being. When we find our meaning in this way-meaning of life in this way, naturally we can help with each other. We will love with each other without forcing anything to others, keeping a harmonious way between us, and between other beings-animate and inanimate beings. We are all friends.

So true love should be based on this understanding, or else your love will become-will be selfish love. True love should not be selfish. Actually there is no selfish love. It looks like selfish, but it is not-there is no such love as selfish love. Even though love is not selfish, but when you have the idea of selfish-self which is not real, the love will become blind love without any understanding. So before we talk about love, or before we love others, we should make this point clear, and we should have the direct experience of zazen which is beyond thinking. When you can sit, when you can just sit, you have [are] in the position to love others in its true sense.

But on the other hand, idea of self-we cannot feel anything without idea-without feeling of self. When we feel something, there that feeling is the feeling of self. But true [1 word] having feeling of self or feeling of love, you will feel at the same time the absolute unknown being which is the other side of the feeling of self. So it looks like same, but actually it is not the same. The one selfish feeling is just selfish feeling without any possibility of being free from it. The other is although we have same feeling we have freedom from it at the same time. This is the difference, and this is actually how we live in this world.

Children does not know anything about Buddhism, but the way they live is exactly the same as Buddhist live in this world. They may be crying at some moment, next moment they are laughing [laughing]. We cannot do that. It is rather difficult for us, but for children it is not difficult at all-quite natural for them. But as a-we find it pretty difficult, but if you have, you know, some training like this, that is possible [laughs, laughter]. People may call you [1-2 words] [laughs, laughter], but actually he is not. That is his, you know, the-attainment. There is big difference. In-between master and disciple we have this kind of training all the time.

My teacher-Kishizawa Ian's[3] teacher, Nishiari Bokusan[4]-oh, before I tell you this story, I must [laughs] say something about his life when he was quite young or before he become a priest. [He was] my teacher's teacher's teacher [laughs]-teacher's teacher's teacher. Grand, no-no-grandteacher. Grandteacher. He was a, you know, a kind of rascal [laughter] when he was young. He left Tokyo for Kyoto because he had nothing to eat, or nowhere to stay. So he stayed [at] Kaizo-ji[5] in Odarawa near Hakone Mountain. There, there was famous Geitan-zenji, and he invited the rascal to [go] upstairs. "Come and sleep here," he said. So, you know, he [was] rather surprised-unusual treatment or entertainment. For-so he thought it may be good idea to stay one or two days.

[Aside in Japanese, but not by Suzuki-roshi:] Oh. Ireshitan.[6] Oh.

So he stayed, but even when he wanted to go out, he didn't allow him to go out. "You should stay here." [Laughs.] So he-at last he became a priest [laughs, laughter]. The rascal change into a priest.

That priest was my master's-my teacher's teacher. When-before he [Nishiari Bokusan] passed away-five years before he passed away, when he wanted to make-give his disciples some lecture, he couldn't find out some paper [with a] commentary on it. So he called my teacher, "Where did you put my paper?" So he tried to find out and seek for it, but he couldn't find out. So my teacher's teacher was very angry with him. "You must have lost it! You must have thought that is just paper. Learned one as you, that commentary may be no good, just a paper-maybe just paper. But for me, that paper is very important. How I want it you may not understand it because you have too much [laughs, laughter] knowledge here. You may not understand it, but I want it badly." [Laughs, laughter.]

So, you know, not only my teacher, many disciples tried to find out, but no one could find out. But someone who were working in the kitchen said it was in box [laughs]. So my teacher took it and-took it to the teacher. And the teacher became more angry, you know. "You must have-where was it?" he asked. "It was in the box" [laughing, laughter ongoing]. "Who-who allowed you," you know, "to open that box?!" So, he-my teacher said, "I am sorry." "You always say, 'I am sorry.' Even though you say 'I am sorry,' you don't mean it."

And several months later, my teacher's teacher was, you know, crying. And so my teacher asked, "Why are you so sad?" You know, he said, "I am so short-tempered! [Laughs, laughter.] I am very sorry for myself and for you too." So since then, you know, my teacher almost, you know, forgot about his, you know, ego-centered attitude. So you may say this is just anger, but it is not so. They are very-their practice is always concentrated on selfish idea, ego. Until we can get rid of ego, we will have pretty difficult time. But after that, how you feel is-maybe you cannot imagine.

Today Arch-Bishop Sumi-roshi[7]-Bishop Sumi-roshi already arrived, and he may be waiting there. But he will not meet you today. But as it is impossible to enter Tassajara tomorrow, he will give us lecture in Sunday service from nine o'clock. So if you have time, please attend his lecture.

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Transcribed by Diana Bartle and Bill Redican (3/27/01).

[1] The date is approximate. This lecture appears to be the last or one of the last of the sesshin, and it followed SR-67-04-22A on the original reel tape.

[2] The opening words were not recorded on tape.

[3] Kishizawa Minpo Ian-zenji (1865-1955): Soto Zen master, leading interpreter of Dogen's Shobogenzo, and third abbot of Antai-ji. He received dharma transmission from Nishiari Bokusan and succeeded Oka Sotan and Genpo Kitano as official lecturer on the Shobogenzo at Eihei-ji. Suzuki-roshi attended him at Eihei-ji monastery and later studied with him for many years.

[4] Nishiari Bokusan (1821-1910): the most prominent Meiji scholar of the Shobogenzo. He was a teacher of both Oka Sotan and Kishizawa Ian, eventually becoming abbot of Soji-ji and head of the Soto-shu.

[5] Possibly also known as Saijo-ji temple (Doryosan) in Odawara, one of the largest Soto temples in Japan.

[6] Phonetic guess only.

[7] Sumi Togen: formerly an instructor of monks at Soji-ji, he succeeded Yamada Reirin in 1965 as head of the Soto Zen School in America.

1967 juni (2)

1 - Sesshin Lecture: Three Treasures

Sunday, June 11, 1967

Sesshin Lecture: Three Treasures

[Roshi seems to be commenting on Shi Sho Ku of Dogen.

When this is evident, Dogen's words are in quotation marks.]

Today I will explain Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha. Originally, Buddha is, of course, the one who attained enlightenment under the Bodhi tree and became a teacher of all the teachers. Dharma is the teaching which was told by Buddha, and Sangha is the group who studied under Buddha. This way of understanding Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha is called the "manifested three treasures," or as we say in Japanese, Genzen Sambo. Genzen is to appear. Of course, whether Buddha appeared or not, there is truth. But if there is no one who realizes the truth, the truth means nothing to us. So In this sense we say the manifest a tion of truth: the manifestation of truth is Sangha.

People who join the practice with harmony and unity are called Sangha. So Sangha means not only his group, but also the state of harmony or unity. Also truth itself is Dharma, and the truth which is not divided into various forms is called Buddha, which is another interpretation of the three treasures. That kind of understanding is called "one body/three treasures." Although there are three treasures, it is an interpretation of the one reality. So we call this kind of interpretation, "one body/three treasures," ittai sambo. Ittai: ichi is "one"; itai is "body"; sambo is "three treasures." Ittai sambo.

But within the social framework of culture we have Buddhist culture. That culture consists of Buddha and his teaching, and the priests or followers of Buddhism. So, this understanding of three treasures in Japanese is called juji sambo. Juji actually means cultural sambo. Existing sambo is what exists in society or within cultural framework. So, beautiful buildings and Buddhist art or Buddha's image are, perhaps, Buddha. Scriptures in beautiful design and literature are Dharma.

And priests in robes are maybe sangha. Juji sambo, or cultural sambo, is closely related to society. The Buddhist organization is also Sangha. So there are three ways of understanding the three treasures, but actually the three are not different. It is one and it is three. This is a very old way of oriental thinking, even before Buddha. Buddha applied this interpretation to our framework of teaching. I think Christianity has the idea of trinity. This is the universal framework of religion. But in Buddhism there are many sects, so Buddhism does not combine many ways of understanding in one school.

Each school is based on some particular understanding or some standpoint. We do not take many standpoints in one school. In Japan, especially, we emphasize this point. This is not sectarianism. Once we take a stand point, we should develop that standpoint through and through until we can understand various standpoints. At first, each way of understanding has its own insight. But if your understanding becomes higher and higher, you can see other standpoints with understanding at the same time.

This is how we establish various schools in Buddhism. The Nichiren school takes the standpoint of Dharma. Dharma includes the other two, Buddha and Sangha. So their object of worship is the Lotus Sutra, and they repeat nam myo ho renge kyo. Myo ho ren ge kyo is the Lotus Sutra. Nam is scripture. Nam myo ho ren ge kyo is the title of the Lotus Scripture. The Shin School repeats Amida Buddha's name: namu Amida Butsu, namu Amida Butsu, namu Amida Butsu. The Zen school repeats Buddha's name, but the emphasis is on Sangha, and they are not so concerned about the intellectual viewpoint or understanding. So we just repeat the founder's name and say namu Shakyamuni Butsu. When we say namu shakyamuni Butsu, his scripture is included and his Sangha is also included; and we are a part of the Sangha. And even though we members of the Sangha are not direct disciples of Buddha, we are the descendants of Buddha.

We are successors of Buddha. So, because we emphasize the practice of attaining enlightenment as Buddha did, we naturally put emphasis also on Sangha. By practice we will build our character as Buddha did. So that is why we call Shakyamuni Buddha's name. For us it is natural to repeat Shakyamuni Buddha's name rather than Amida Buddha's name or the name of a scripture. If you repeat the name of some scripture, you are liable to be bound by some teaching which was told by Buddha. But actually, it is impossible to authorize some teaching as the absolute teaching because something which is told by some particular person could not be absolute, even though it was told by Buddha. It may be impossible to authorize the teaching for human beings.

You may say that, if it is impossible to authorize even the teaching told by Buddha, then how is it possible to authorize some person as a Buddha [laughs]. This is the point we are studying. This is why we emphasize our practice. And we have a particular understanding of practice. The practice of other schools, for instance the Nichiren School or the Shin School, is quite different from how we need to understand our practice.

This practice is called practice based on original enlightenment. It may look quite unusual to authorize Buddha's Sangha, but this is more adequate and understandable. I'm not trying to explain this point today because I repeat it over and over. So Soto Zen emphasizes transmission from Buddha to us, and we emphasize Sangha, those who have transmission and who are disciples of Buddha.

What I have talked about up to now is, in short, about the three ways of understanding the three treasures. The first is the manifested three treasures. The next is one body/three treasures, or philosophical understanding of the oneness of the three treasures. It is necessary to be concentrated on one thing. If we have three objects of worship, it is difficult to be concentrated; so we have to have some philosophical or intellectual understanding. But, in fact, what exists here is the actual activity of Buddha. Therefore we emphasize the Sangha. So the third one is the understanding of our daily activity. That is the traditional three treasures or cultural three treasures. But the cultural three treasures are supported by philosophy and Buddha's teaching and Buddha's character. So the cultural three treasures cannot be separated from the other two. When understanding those three treasures, each one will complement the other two and make our understanding complete. This is the Soto way of understanding the three treasures. We have the three treasures and what we do is practice zazen; that is our way. So, our understanding of practice is very different from that of other schools.

Each school has its own particular understanding of the three treasures. If you study each school's understanding of the three treasures, you will have perfect understanding. And you will find out that even though there are many schools, actually what each one means is the same. It must be so because religious life is the expression of our inmost nature which is universal to everybody. So, as Buddha attained enlightenment, we will attain enlightenment. What Buddha was striving for is the same thing we are striving for because we have the same inmost nature as a human being.

When we project our inmost nature into the objective world as Buddha, Dharma, or Sangha, it is nothing but our inmost desire to want to be someone whom you can accept. You strive for something acceptable in its true sense. So it is the same thing. You create God, and you strive for God. It means you are striving for yourself. And as we have the same human nature, your understanding of it must be the same. But if the standpoint is different, the way of explanation should be different, that's all.

Tentatively, I am giving you some explanation of the three treasures. It may be necessary to explain it more, but as we have no time, I will explain the next paragraph.

We should revere the three treasures and make offerings to them. Veneration of the Buddha, the law and the priesthood is in accordance with a precept handed down from the Lord Buddha in India to the patriarchs of China. These are the most important precepts handed down from Buddha to us. We should not worship a Genie of the mountains, or call upon the spirit of death for any reason whatsoever, nor should we pay homage to any heretical religion or religious edifice. Such worship does not lead to emancipation. The Three Treasures are not just an idea invented by someone. They are the universal framework of all the advanced religions, not just the framework of the Buddhist religion. But some hasty person, who usually does not pay any attention to religion, finding himself in some difficulty, may worship something like the god of fire, or god of water or some powerful natural spirit without any idea of what the teaching is, what god is, or true practice.

It is quite easy to know our inmost nature if it is related to the right way. And if we express that inmost nature in an appropriate way, it will develop. But if our inmost nature is misled by a hasty idea, a person may go astray and even destroy himself. That is why he says you should not worship the Genie of the mountains or call upon the spirit of death for any reason whatsoever. This is too simple.

Nor should we pay homage to any heretical...here it says heretical, but heretical is not an adequate translation. I don't know if you have an appropriate word for this. We say gedo. Gedo is "outer way." "Outer way" is just a classification. We call Buddhist scripture "inner scripture," and other, non-Buddhist literature is called "outer." Whether inner or outer, it is the same thing; inside and outside. Outside does not mean bad, and inside is not always good; inside, outside. Gedo means outer religion while Buddhists call our way or our scriptures nai ten.

So, as Buddhists, we should not take absolute refuge in outer religious scriptures or organizations. It is not because they are bad, but because we should not mix up our viewpoint. If you try to discover something good, like a monkey in a cage, you will not find out anything. All you will find is radishes. And your stomach will be hurt [laugh]. That is not our way. We should make some human effort always. That is why he says we should not pay homage to outer religious edifices. Such worship does not lead to emancipation. If we have only an idea of the Three Treasures, the Three Treasures will be the goal. If you just have an idea of God without a teaching of the way to God, you will be lost. You will be discouraged. If there is a God, there should be a way to God. But God is the absolute one. So it is a perpetual idea we have which cannot be attained. This point should be understood by people.

It is necessary to have some way to enjoy Buddhahood. Someone who enjoys or rejoices in Buddha nature is the perfect one, or Buddha. This kind of frame work is very important. And there must be some practice. There must be some understanding of life. For us, our everyday life is practice itself. So in our everyday life we have religion, if you understand Buddhism. Of course, you will reach Buddhahood through your activity in everyday life. But if you worship some god just because of fear, in what way can you appeal to your inmost request? You will be lost. You will not be lead to emancipation.

Before Buddhism became popular in Japan, Prince Shotaku set up our Constitution for the Japanese people. In the second chapter he said, "Respect the Three Treasures." He said that to follow the Three Treasures is the supreme way of attaining liberation for everyone. Because we use the terminology of Buddhism, it looks like what we are talking about is just Buddhism, but it is not actually so. That is why he says that if you worship some immature religion you will not attain enlightenment. To take refuge in the Triple Treasure it is necessary to have a pure faith. Whether it be at the time of the Tathagata or after his disappearance from the world, we should repeat his formula with clasped hands and bowed head: I take refuge in the Buddha. I take refuge in the Dharma. I take refuge in the Sangha.

Pure faith includes our mental, physical and verbal effort. It is not enough to just think something or say something superficial. So pure faith means, not just faith in something, but real action, reality, realized action. It is necessary to have real practice.

You should take refuge in the Triple Treasure with real effort, not false effort. And it doesn't matter whether it is in the time of the Buddha Tathagata or not. In Dogen's time, almost everyone believed in the Three Periods of Buddhism. They said that in the last period the people will not believe in him and Buddhism will fade away into some other religion. But Dogen did not believe in it. So there is no difference in our practice, whether Buddha is here or not. This was his belief.

We take refuge in the Buddha because he is the great teacher. We take refuge in the Law because it is our medicine and points the way. We take refuge in the Sangha because the members are our wise friends. Although the Three Treasures are one, the understanding, or the way they help us is different. It is through this triple adoration that we become the disciples of Buddha. Without the Triple Treasure, or if one of them is missing, we cannot be a disciple of the Buddha. It is on the basis of this adoration that all the moral precepts of Buddhism rest.

We say "adoration", but just to adore Buddha is like a dream. It means nothing. So adoration should follow some actual practice or guidance. Without guidance, God means nothing. Even though you believe in a God, it will not help you, actually, if your everyday life is cut off from God. In that way God means nothing. So all the great religions have their teachings and followers. And where there are followers, there should be a way to attain enlightenment. Not in the next life, but in this moment. This is Buddhism.

To take refuge in the Triple Treasure it is necessary to have pure faith, whether it be in the time of the Tathagata or after his disappearance from the world. We should repeat this formula with clasped hands and bowed head. D. T. Suzuki's translation is: "I take refuge in the Buddha, the incomparable honored one. I take refuge in the Dharma, honorable for its purity. I take refuge in the Sangha, honorable for its harmonious life. I have finished taking refuge in the Buddha. I have finished taking refuge in the Dharma. I have finished taking refuge in the Sangha."

In Japanese it is simpler:

Namu kie Butsu, namu kie Ho,

namu kie So.

Kie Butsu myo sam,

kie Ho rijin sam,

kie So wago som.

Kie Bu kyo, kie Ho kyo, kie So kyo.

But if we translate it into English, we cannot arrange the words in this way. Anyway, whether in English or Japanese, we have to repeat those precepts.

Buddha is said to be the supreme world honored one. There are many names for him. We have ten names for Buddha. By Buddha we do not mean just Shakyamuni Buddha. At the same time we mean various Buddhas. So sometimes we say the Buddhas in the three periods of time: past, future and present. Namu sanze sho Butsu, we say: I take refuge in all Buddhas in the three worlds, Namu is to take refuge. Sanze means the three worlds. Shobutsu means all the Buddhas, or we say, Ji ho san shi i shi hu. Ji ho means ten directions. San shi means three worlds. I shi means all. Hu means Buddha. Ji ho san shi i shi hu, shi son bu sa mo ko sa means: Shi san is the supreme one, bu sa is Bosatsu, that's bodhisattva. Mo ko sa is great Bodhisattvas. That is actually Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha. Dharma is mo ko ho ja ho ro mi. Moko is maha or moka: great. Ho ja ho ro mi is Prajna Paramita. That is the teaching. So when we say ji ho san shi i shi hu, shi son bu sa mo ko sa, mo ko ho ja ho ro mi, that means that we are taking refuge in Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha. That is why we say: Ji ho san shi i shi hu. That is the old Chinese pronunciation, but the meaning is the same.

The Buddha is supposed to be the supreme one. The Dharma is called Dharma because it is truth itself. It is impersonal so it is pure. There is no dust on it [laughing]. If there is any dust on the law, you will be put in jail, rules or Dharma should always be clean. So Dharma is something which is honored for its purity. I take refuge in the Sangha which is honored for its harmonious life.

You know, we human beings should be always harmonious and we should work in unity. So we call a Buddhist group "harmonious Sangha." Sangha means Sang or so gya in Japanese. So means priest and ga is plural; so sangha means priest group, or group of followers.

Here he says, "We take refuge in the Buddha because he is the great teacher. We take refuge in the Law because it is our medicine and points the way. It is law or rule. We take refuge in the priesthood because its members are our wise friends. It is through this triple adoration that we become disciples of Buddha. We should respect the Three Treasures before we receive any further precepts. This is the fundamental precept, since it is on the basis of this adoration that all the moral precepts of Buddhism rest, from beginning to end. Buddhism starts from these three refuges and ends with these three refuges.

"A responsive communication between the refugee and the preceptor makes the maturity of the merit of the triple refuges." "Responsive communication" is the translation of kan no do ko. This is a very difficult work to translate. Kanno means to respond to each other. And Do ko means true relationship. Do is dao. Ko is inter-relationship. Here we say Kan no Do ko. In terms of consciousness it happens in this way to us: we feel some coherence, or interrelationship, or correspondence between Buddha and us. But, originally, there is no difference between Buddha nature and human nature. So this is more than responsive communication or relationship. But it happens in this way, so "a responsive communion between the refugee and the preceptor," or "protector" (not "protector," ok, maybe "Buddha") "marks the maturity of the merit of the triple treasure."

When we become one with Buddha, it means the Triple Treasure, or refuge, is completed. So, to take refuge in Buddha means to become one with Buddha or to find our true nature which is not different from Buddha. "Be he a devil or man, dwell in the lower regions, demon or animal; whoever experiences the responsive communion is sure to take refuge in the Triple Treasure." By nature, everything has Buddha nature. So when beings have this experience, they can attain the perfection and they can take the Triple Treasure. "The merit of having taken the three refuges continually increases through the various stages of existence and ultimately calls forth the highest right universal enlightenment." "Highest right universal enlightenment" is Buddhahood. If you repeat this experience, you will attain the highest Buddhahood. "This excellent and inconceivably deep merit has been proved by the Tathagata himself; therefore, all living beings should take this refuge."

Buddha himself experienced it and Buddha has the same nature that we have. This means it is possible to have the same experience.

This is not some particular experience when we realize our true nature on some occasion. So here we emphasize the universality of the three refuges. Here he just emphasizes the precepts, but precepts and Zen are not different. Both Zen and precepts are the expression of our true nature; the experience of finding or realizing our true nature. In this sense there is no difference. So the way to practice Zen is the way we take refuge in the precepts.

So, by mutual communion, or kan no do ko, we mean the true experience of Zen. It is not some ecstasy or some mysterious state of mind, but it is a deep joy that is even more than joy. You may have this true experience through some change in your mental state. But a change of mental state is not, strictly speaking, enlightenment. Enlightenment is more than that. That comes with it, but it is more than that. What we experience is joy or mysterious experience, but something follows. That something which follows, besides this experience, is true enlightenment. So we should not suppose that enlightenment will always be experienced in terms of consciousness. Even though you don't know, you know, that enlightenment is there. And by repeating various activities with this subtle caution, the experience becomes deeper and your consciousness will become more and more mature and smooth. So you may say that enlightenment is the maturity of your experience of everyday life. When enlightenment does not follow, your experience is black and white. But when true experience follows your conscious activity or conscious experience, the way you accept it is more natural, smooth, and deep.

It is not just joy. It is something more than joy. It may not be possible to experience enlightenment just in terms of consciousness. But what you do experience is much deeper. This point should always be remembered. If you remember this point, all the precepts are there. You will not be attached to some particular experience; you will not be caught by the dualistic experience of good or bad, or myself or others. When we violate the precepts, we attach to some particular experience.

When you have something, you will have some joy of possession. To do that is, you know, to break the precept of not stealing, (laughs) or not being greedy about giving either spiritual or material help to others. So when those three precepts are kept in the right way, all the precepts will be kept. In short, when you do everything as you do zazen, then all the precepts will be there. We say that we have to just sit. Our mind is clear. You have no experience whatsoever. Maybe the only experience you will have is sleepiness or pain in your legs [laughs]. No particular experience.

But when you attain enlightenment, when some sudden change of mental state comes to you-happens to you-even that experience is not true enlightenment. You will see something, or realize something, in terms of consciousness, but that means you saw something, that's all. It may not be yours. You saw something there, something beautiful. That is the experience, that's all. It is a true experience, but that is not enough. We should obtain the truth. We should become one with the truth. That is taking refuge in Buddha or Truth. When we become one with it, there is no communion or interrelationship because it is just one. That is completely taking refuge in its true sense. That is the experience we have in our practice.

Namu in Japanese means "to plunge into something." We say, "you cannot skim over the water in a basket." But if you dip the basket in it, the basket will be full of water. That is the way. As long as you are making (laugh ter) a dualistic effort, you cannot do anything because you are a basket. You are full of holes. Holes are you. We say, muro-chi. Muro-chi means "no-hole wisdom." [Laughter.] Our wisdom is hole wisdom. Wisdom with holes. Muro-chi means "no-holes wisdom." But for us, no holes wisdom is just dipping a basket in the water. Then there is no hole [laughter]. That is taking refuge, and that is how we practice zazen. This is the interpretation of precepts and the understanding of our zazen.

Thank you very much.

-----

[This section was transferred from the start of SR-67-06-12. It appears to have been the source for the edited conclusion of lecture SR-67-06-11 above.]

... [Laughter] ... So he said, _____ said, quickly or immediately, immediately is not ... [Laughter.] When we say immediately, we are not good enough. [Laughter]. I will go immediately. [Laughter.] I will come over immediately. [Laughter.] But but he-he, you know, repeat immediately or deeply. But by deeply or immediately he means, always means oneness.

Namu, in Japanese means, you know, to plunge into something. We say if you-if-if you-cannot scoop water by basket. But if you dip the basket in it, the basket will be full of water. That is the way. As long as you are making [laughter] dualistic effort you cannot do anything because you [laughter] are basket. You have-you are full of holes. Hole-hole is you. We say muro-chi.[1] Muro-chi means "no-hole wisdom" [laughter]. Our wisdom is hole wisdom. Wisdom with holes. Muro-chi means "no holes wisdom" but for us no hole wisdom is to-just to dip it in the water. Then there is no hole. [Laughter.] That is to take refuge and that is how we practice zazen. Pause. This is the-relationship-this is the interpretation of precepts and inter- [partial word]-understanding of our zazen.

Thank you very much.

---

End of lecture was transferred from SR-67-06-12 to this lecture on 11/1/00 by Bill Redican. No tape is available.

[1] muro-chi (Jap.): muro ("non-delusion") + chi ("wisdom of enlightenment"); wisdom of non-delusion; great wisdom of prajña; opposite of uro-chi ("wisdom covered with illusion").

2 - Sunday Lecture

Monday, June 12, 1967

Sunday Lecture

Transcript Not Verbatim

From now on, on each Sunday service I want to continue the lecture about-Shi-sho-ku [?]. This is our text [by Dogen-zenji].

We explained-we studied about already the three-the three refuges which is fundamental precepts for Buddhist and we have sixteen precepts, three refuges, triple treasures and ten commandments or ten prohibitive-prohibitive precepts. And the three refuges and the three, the triple treasures are basic precepts. And before we take triple treasures, we take repentance.

So repentance and triple treasures and the three corrective precepts and ten commandments. This is our rules to take refuge or in Buddha or Dharma or Sangha. As we briefly studied the three triple treasures, so, today we will study about the three corrective precepts. Next-next we should accept the three corrective pure precepts: that embracing good behavior, that embracing good deeds and that embracing all being and saving them. We should then ... we should then accept the 10 grave prohibitions.

So before we take 10 prohibitive precepts we take three corrective pure precepts. The precepts embracing good behavior, the precepts embracing good deeds and that embracing all beings and saving them. Those are the three corrective pure precepts. Our life is based on, of course, based on our instincts, instincts and desires and usually religious life is based on some pure mind which is completely different from those worldly desires, that is usual understanding.

That is why before Buddha they practiced-practiced asceticism. To limit physical needs and to attain liberation of our pure mind, or pure spirit. That is their idea of religion. But Buddhism is completely different from that. And Buddha's time at the same time there were various thought like hedonism or materialism, there were many thoughts. Of course, leading religious thought supposed to be Hinduism. But at his time people started to think by themselves and that is why there were so many thought.

Briefly, major thought was supposed to be six, including materials and hedonism and-or accidentalism-accidentalism. There is no cause and effect, there is no maternal love or parents, parent is just-parents are-there is no relationship, spiritual relationship between parents and his children. And there is no instinct like maternal love. Recently, you know, people started to think in the same way, you know.

Some social-under some structure, you know-we have been-we have had the feeling of or-not something like instinct in some similar maternal love as an instinct but strictly speaking it is not our original instinct, that is the habit created by so-under some social structure. Some scholars emphasize this point. So if the social structure changes we will have no maternal life, love anymore [laugh]. That is a kind of, you know, something like someone's thought in Buddha's time. Sange Beritputra [?] thought in this way. But it-he does-he-he himself was very sincere and he was so sincere that he couldn't be-he couldn't support some dignified or some hypocritic thought so he thought, he thought he is very, you know, straightforward, [Laughter]. He was very honest to himself. That is why he supported this kind of thought. So it is not just we cannot say he was not sincere. He must be pretty sincere person but he was-he was not-his self is not deep enough, that's all. Buddhism-Buddhist-our way is not those two extremes. We-another extreme for maybe for asceticism is asceticism. To limit our physical needs to the extreme and attain freedom of our pure mind or spiritual power.

But in Buddhism we accept our instincts or our desires we have actually, we cannot deny that we have various desires. Whether it is good or bad, anyway we have it [Laughter]. We cannot say we don't have it. And as long as we have actually, you know, this we have to accept it. And it is a part of true which-truth which we should accept. And we think that to say that is bad is a self-centered idea. If we-if we are-our thought is pure enough to see things as it is we have to accept it. That is our way. But, even though we have various desires, whether it is good or bad, we cannot leave it as it goes. So, it is necessary to work on it so that we can appreciate our original nature.

If we do not take care of those desires we will be-eventually we will be disgusted with our true nature, with our instincts and with our desires. As-as-ascetic religion say sooner or later, if we do not take care of those desires we will be left in depravity or we will left [?] some destruction or fight. Nothing good will result from it.

But it does not-even so-so, it does not mean our original nature is bad. It is good, but that-but that we don't take care of it, that is our fault and that is our lack of consideration. This is why we have this three precepts. So with our original desires or instincts we have, we should have desires to take care of it and to take care of myself-ourselves and we have to take care of others. That is our vow as a Buddhist. To take care of myself, to take care of our desires and instincts and to take care of other's life. This fundamental meaning of the three corrective pure precepts. That embracing good behavior. That embracing good deeds. That embracing all beings and saving them.

We have four vows of Mahayana Buddhism. Even though our-even though sentient being is innumerable, we vow to save them. That is one. Even though our desires is-evil desires is innumerable, we should take care of them. Even though teaching-to-teaching is innumerable, we should study. Even-even though Buddhism is study of Buddhism is limitless study we should accomplish to study Buddhism. That is our four vow.

So, as our-if desires or people are innumerable and their desires is limitless, we should keep our effort to save them and to take care of them. So, as long as this human life goes our effort should go with it. Buddhism is not some teaching which should be accomplished by someone. Buddhism-it is necessary to study Buddhism forever. There is no complete Buddhism. So, Buddhism is some teaching which needs limitless study. That is nature of Buddhism.

If our desires are innumerable, the teaching for it-for it-for them should be innumerable. If the people are bad in Buddhism, as long as, you know, we are not so good we should strive for it. So, anyway, out-this world is world of _____, world of suffering, we say. World of suffering means world of pleasure or world of happiness or joy. World of pure joy-so-called-it pure joy beyond our world is delusion. There is no such rejoice, actually there is no such grace for us. But usually we adore for it; that is kind of adoration but not our adoration. So that is why the Buddhism is called middle way.

Buddhism is always in this world and it wants to-we want some balance always. In this sense we respect Sangha which keeps harmony in their society. And the balance should be in person should not be like this or like that, it should be always level. It is-it should be always pure, pure truth. So, that is why we take refuge in Truth or Dharma. And the truth should be manifested in this actual world, that is why we take refuge in Buddha who manifested the truth who-in this world who realized the truth as a human being. Pause. Next we should accept the three corrective pure precepts that embracing good behavior, that embracing good deeds, that embracing all being and saving them. This is not, you know, prohibitive precepts. This is vow rather than precept.

And we should-and then we should accept the ten great prohibits. And more in detail, more accurately speaking, this is-those three corrective pure precepts will be briefly set up in ten commandments. One, do not kill. Do not steal. Do not commit adultery. Those are the precepts about our body, body activity. Do not kill. Do not steal. Do not commit adultery. Do not lie. Do not sell liquor. Do not bring up the faults of others. Do not boast and blame others. Do not boast yourself and blame others. Those are about our word or mouth. Do not withhold material and spiritual possessions. Do not become angry. Do not debase the triple treasures. Those are about our minds-mind.

"Do not kill" means, in another word-do not kill means do-do realize our true nature. It doesn't mean just to kill some insects or it does not mean just to have mercy. It is deeper than that. Of course, do not kill is, we should not kill even an insect pr any. But that is not the real meaning of do not kill. Do not steal.

Steal-when we do not realize we possess everything we want to steal, but everything in the world is-belongs to us anyway. So, there is no need to steal. Someone should take care of it [Laughter]. So, there is no need to steal it, that is do not steal.

Do not commit adultery [laughs]. Do not commit adultery. It-it means attachment, you know, some extreme-this precept emphasize especially our attachment to some particular thing. But it does not mean to-not to attach to other sex [laughs]. But we attach to things-to some particular thing as we attach to the other sex. As you attach to girlfriend or boyfriend. That is very true. So, if you, you know, if you keep yourself from being attached to-if you are able to do it when it is necessary it means you are able to refrain from various attachment. Do not commit adultery.

I was scolded by my master many times: "You are committing adultery!"[2] [Laughter.] In my temple, Zoun-in, there was no female. But still he said, "Don't commit adultery!" [Laughter.] He was right, I think [laughter]. Do not lie. This precept belongs to, you know, world, but, he said, even though I don't say anything, don't lie [Laughter]. Your eyes telling lie, your countenance telling lie. It is true, very true.

Do not sell liquor. Do not-this is very important precept [Laughter]. Do not sell liquor. Nowadays you should add one more here, something, do not sell liquor-"do not sell" means, you know, to boast or, you know, to take some advantage of liquor, you know. This is medicine. If you take it in the right way it will be benefit. This is kind of, you know, breaking precept because we have nature, you know. Our nature is very weak to the temptation. We should, you know, count this point when we take liquor.

So "do not sell" means, very-meaning is very deep, sell. Do not sell liquor. If you boast about the profundity of Buddhist teaching you are selling a kind of liquor to the people. If some religion, if you say this-the religion is wonderful you are selling some liquor. So, not only, intoxicating liquor but also all the, you know, teaching-spiritual teaching or material by which we will be intoxicated is liquor. So, if you take those precepts literally, you know, it is a kind of selling liquor.

We should have always freedom to the teaching and precept. We should take them in consideration always. We should not forget it. But we should not, you know, be bound by the teaching or precepts. That is how we keep our precepts. That is why we have the fifth. The fifth one means absolutely-absolute freedom from all the teaching. Do not sell liquor, this is very deep. Do not bring up the fault of others. When we talk about someone's faults, it means you are talking about your own fault. Almost all the time it is so. A mother who have-in Japan, this is in Japan, not in America-I don't know in America-but in Japan if he, if a mother has-when a mother has his own son who has-who start to have some concubine, you know, some secret relationship with some, you know, girlfriend having his wife, the mother talks about concubine-talk-talks about someone who has a concubine. So, what-when some old lady start to talk about concubine, I thought something must have happened to her baby. [Laughter.] That is very true.

When you talk about someone's faults, it means you have same faults, and you are aware of it. So it is good thing to talk about it [laughter]. But if there is no need to talk about it, it is much better. Do not bring up the faults of others. Do not boast and blame others. Do not boast yourself and blame others. When you boast yourself and blame others it means you are very, you have very small self.

Do not withhold-withhold material and spiritual possessions. People talks about material or spiritual possessions especially but to talk about it-If you want to keep this precepts in its true sense, it is necessary for you to talk about possession. Whose possession? It doesn't matter for you who has how much money, doesn't matter. So we should not be concerned about others' property or money. We should not count others'. It is busy enough to count your money [laughs]. So, we should not concerned about others' possessions. This is actually what we mean, do not withhold material and spiritual possessions-possession-possession-possession.

Do not become angry. This is very difficult. Nearly all the Zen masters-Zen masters are very short-tempered but we-we couldn't say do not become angry to our masters. [Laughter.] So it may be better to recite this part-"do not become angry"-before our master. If he-if he say do not become angry we should say DO NOT BECOME ANGRY.

Do not debase the triple treasures. I thought this is very, you know, funny precept for Buddhist to set up this precept. They are protecting-it looks like Buddhist, Buddhist protecting themselves by setting up this precept. And this one supposed to be the most fatal, important precept. If you break it [laugh] you will be expelled. I thought so this is rather, you know, unfair to set up this kind of precept. "Don't kill" is good, "don't be angry is very good" [laughter], but don't be blasphemous with triple treasures is very selfish precept.

Moreover, if you commit this precept, you know, you are supposed to go down to the bottom of the hell [laughter]. If you kill someone ... [laughter] you will ... you will _____ you will _____ even you kill someone. This is very funny. This is our system [laughter]. Very good system. Very good system to me but not to you [laughter]. But those who commit those-ten-the last commandment or precept is supposed to be-supposed to be very intelligent one, he is very hopeful. That is why we put very strict and heavy duty to them. The system of hell is not punishment, you know, it is training [Laughter].

So if he is strong, that is quite understandable, you know. If he is good we should, he should have, anyway, those who kill people or those who steal something is not so, you know, intelligent. Usually they are not so good. Anyway, if they are not so good it is no use to put strict-strict teaching, it might be better to treat them just in appropriate way, in tentative way. That is why we do not put so heavy duty to them.

But the people who are angry supposed to be very honest and very good and who have very strong will and sincere person. So, we should put heavy burden to them. That is why we put them heavy duty. So, if you see the order this is most, this is most intelligent, good one.

The ninth is next good. Do not withdraw material and spiritual possessions, you know, the scholars and good teachers maybe classified in this group. Material or spiritual possessions. "I invented this," or "I know this." This is, you know, awareness-strong awareness of spiritual possession. I don't boast-do not boast and blame others. They are pretty good, you know. To boast, who can boast, they say. Not so bad.

Do not bring up the fault of others-faults of others. Do not sell liquor. Do not lie. Do not commit adultery-adultery. Do not steal. Do not kill. Those are the ten commandments.

Thank you very much.

[Laughter] means students and Roshi both laughing.

[Laughs] means mainly or only Roshi is laughing.

Transcribed 8/28/69-Steve Weintraub.

---

Source: Original transcript by Steve Weintraub. City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Slight copy-editing by Bill Redican (11/1/00). The audio tape is thought no longer to be available.

[1] Sunday was derived from the original transcript and is mentioned by Suzuki-roshi in the lecture. But the transcript had a date of June 12, 1967, which was a Monday.

[2] From D. Chadwick, Crooked Cucumber, p. 28: "Don't commit adultery, Crooked Cucumber!" Shunryu had been admiring an old tea bowl, and that is how So-on told him not to be so attached to fine things. He used that metaphor a lot with the boy, who had good taste in antiques and craftsmanship. Shunryu found it funny, because there were no women living in the temple, but that wasn't the point. It was not that Shunryu shouldn't appreciate beauty, just that he shouldn't be caught by it."

1967 augustus (5)

1 - The mind itself is Buddha

Monday, August 14, 1967

"The mind itself is Buddha"
San Francisco [?]

Transcript Not Verbatim

Our study will be concentrated for a while on the statement: "The mind itself is Buddha." [1] It is pretty difficult to study, to listen to our lectures or our teachings. Usually when you study something, and even when you are listening to our lecture, I think that what you understand will be an echo of yourself. You think you are listening to me, but actually you are listening to yourself, so no progress will result. You always understand our lecture in your own way. Your understanding is always based on your way of thinking. So I think that you hear my voice and see my face, but actually you see yourself, and what you hear is nothing but an echo of yourself.

My study was like that for a long time. I think this is often the case when we study Buddhism. If you want to study Buddhism, you have to clear your mind. You should not have any prejudice. You should forget all you have learned before.

You say, "Speak up." "Speak up" is to speak up to here. We say, "Talk out." We do not talk in the realm of reasoning or thinking. We talk out, we get out of our talk. When you hear our lecture, you should not hear my voice or what I say. You should understand what I "talk out." Do you understand? It is rather difficult to express. Not up to here. You should understand something more than what I say in terms of reasoning or logic. That is how you study Buddhism and how to talk about Buddhism.

As you know, the teaching is, as we say, a finger pointing at the moon. You should not see the finger, you should see the moon. But usually your understanding of what I say and your questions are always in the realm of your thinking or conscious understanding. That is not the purpose of the study of Buddhism.

In "Sokushin-zebutsu," one of the important fascicles of the Shobogenzo, Dogen-zenji emphasizes this point. Although this is a very brief fascicle, what he talks about in this small fascicle is very deep and very wide. So I want to talk about it now. For a while my talk will be concentrated on verbal understanding. So now you have to listen very little, but later you should know what you have studied.

When we talk about Buddhism, it is liable to be a strained application of our teaching. You know we have certain faults of teaching and logic, so our talk is liable to be a strained application of Buddhist logic. This means a little, but it doesn't help so much. So we have to destroy the logic, and we should feel what we say, or we should have some intuition to grasp the teaching.

I think most of you have studied the five sense organs and mind. We call them the six sense organs, including the mind. Mostly our study will be limited to the six consciousnesses: eyes, nose, tongue, body, ears, and mind. The mind controls various senses, produces some ideas, and thinks. So our understanding will be limited to those six consciousnesses. But you have one more, in actuality. The reason you make so many mistakes--the reason your understanding of life does not accord with the truth--is because you have one more faculty, the egoistic faculty.

According to Buddhism, you do not make mistakes without any reason. You know, there is a reason why you make mistakes--there is a big reason. You cannot see things as they are, although you have a mind and your five sense organs are perfect. Your eye is good, your taste and tongue are complete, but nevertheless you always make a big mistake. Why is this? There is a good reason. Do you know what it is? It is because of your ego-centered faculty, something which should not be mind. I don't know where this faculty is, whether it is in the faculty of your brain or not. I'm sure our brain does not make any mistakes, but something makes a mistake. What is it?

According to Buddhism, that is the ego-centered or seventh faculty, mana-shiki, in Japanese.[2] This one always makes our judgement wrong. When your understanding is ego-centered, that is not right understanding. Your understanding is not universal. Your understanding is always ego-centered and partial. This is quite true with human beings. Without knowing that you are always making a mistake, you insist on yourself, your feeling, and you project your ego-centered ideas. That is why you make so many mistakes and we get into confusion.

But that is not all. According to Buddhism, there is an eighth consciousness that will correct the mistakes of the seventh consciousness. "You are mistaken," you may say. "You always make a mistake. Why is it?" it says. That is the eighth one.

So if we want to study Buddhism, we should not study it in the realm of the five sense organs or the mind. When you realize that we are always making a mistake, we say you have entered one step into the teaching of Buddhism. And when you understand what the eighth consciousness is, that is enlightenment-enlightened mind.

But usually almost all the teaching is limited to the realm of the first five or six faculties. This is what Dogen-zenji talks about in this fascicle. He says the mere stage of a little bit more than good and bad, right or wrong, agreeable or disagreeable to your six senses may be mysticism. A little bit more than the six senses is mysticism, but not much more than that. What he says is very brief, but I have to explain it in this way: I want to explain what holy mind or divine nature is.

Dogen-zenji referred to that heretical understanding, which I read to you in the last lecture. They understand that holy mind is always clear, independent of our surroundings, and eternal. The things the mind sees or understands are not eternal, but mind itself is eternal and has limitless faculties. It reaches as far as it thinks, and there is no limit to the faculty of mind. It will reach to the moon or to various stars in space, and it reaches them immediately. It doesn't take much time, or any time. So in this way the mind has a great faculty, and mind itself has a divine nature. The mind sometimes is called atman or "big mind" or "great mind," in comparison to our small mind. This mind is limitless; that is why it is called divine mind. This kind of understanding is called the understanding of immortality. We have a similar word, but we do not mean by immortality something that is immortal. Our understanding of immortality cannot be understood by your thinking.

You may ask, then, how should I understand what immortality is? That is wrong too. "How" also belongs to your mind faculty. You wonder how, your eyes wonder, your ears wonder. "Why is it?" you think. That is not the way to understand what it is. By the time we finish this series of lectures, you will understand what I mean, but I don't think I should strive to make you understand right now.

He also talks about Buddhist philosophy in this fascicle. According to Buddhism, the origin of suffering is very deep. Originally, we understand that there is some unconditioned being. But when unconditioned being is conditioned, something happens. I don't know what it is, but something happens. When this unconditioned being makes some movement, it is the beginning of ignorance. When an unconditioned being remains unconditioned, that is wisdom. But when that unconditioned being takes some form or color or movement, that is the beginning of ignorance. Accordingly, that movement will result in suffering or problems. This is quite understandable, I think.

This stage is called the stage of ignorance, or as we say in Japanese, mumyo.[3] Mumyo means "not clear." Anyway, this word is not appropriate, and "ignorance" is not appropriate, but conditionality is what we mean by "ignorance." By "movement," we mean that unconditioned being is conditioned in terms of color or form. As soon as it takes color or form, it will create some problem. This is the subtle beginning of the problem.

As soon as this conditionality takes place, we have subjectivity of mind, and, at the same time, we have objectivity. Subjective and objective: something that sees and something that is seen. Here we have three stages already. In the first stage, conditionality takes place. The second stage is subjectivity. And the third is objectivity. This kind of functioning of our mind is very subtle. You do not usually realize it.

But the faculties of your mind become more and more clear as they become rough instead of subtle. When the activity of your mind is more vivid, "This is desirable, and that is not desirable," or "I like this one, but I don't like that one." The faculty of your mind is more vivid. And as soon as this kind of dualistic functioning takes place, we will have the idea of the continuity of our mind. That is the first stage of attachment. Actually, your mind is not continuous, but you want what you see to be continuous if it is pretty, if it is good. But if it is bad, you don't want it to be continuous. If you think what you see is not continuous, that is right. But usually we think our mind is working very well when we have some attachment to something. Actually you are already making a big mistake because you misunderstand your mind as something which is continuous. Our mind is not continuous at all-or it is more than continuous or discontinuous.

As soon as you have the idea of continuity of your mind, you will have some attachment to what you observe, and then you will have terminology-terminological conception. You will start to think in terms of concepts. You put labels on the many conceptions you create, but those conceptions are involved in attachment.

When you study logic, you think you have no attachment. But it is like mathematics. When you actually apply the mathematics in your everyday life, attachment is always involved. Big or small, good or bad, heavy or light-this is not pure mathematics. Pure mathematics is very abstract and doesn't actually exist. But this is a shadow of your attachment, a shadow of your mistake. This is actually true. But you are quite sure about the logical conceptions you have, so your study will create a bigger and bigger ego. Now our ego is pretty big. And as soon as you have some terminological conception, you will put it into action. Now you have to fight with each other. We call this karmic action. "Oh my! What I think should be right. But see what has happened to me. This is awful," you may say. You are creating suffering in this process, according to Buddhism.

This is the third subject Dogen-zenji talks about in this fascicle. First of all, he talks about our eight consciousness, and next about the usual understanding of holy mind or our divine nature, and then he talks about how we make mistakes in our everyday life, starting from ignorance or the subtle movement of our mind.

We say there are three subtle functions and six rough faculties of our mind. The delicate movement of our mind (ignorance), [4] subjectivity, and objectivity are the subtle functions. The rougher functions are dualistic feeling (desirable or undesirable), continuity of our mind, attachment, terminological conception, karmic action, and suffering.

When we suffer, our mind becomes very rough. All the subtle functions of our mind will be lost. This is the last suffering, you know. Next will be peace. We will not survive the next one, so we have no taste of this as the last suffering, the last one. You should not be lost in suffering. That is why we study Buddhism.

So anyway, we have to know that we are turning our face to our own call. You should understand it is all right to listen to me, but you should not turn your ear to your own talk. [You should not be hearing an echo of yourself when you listen to me.][5] Okay?

---

Source: City Center transcript edited by Brian Fikes. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Slight copy-editing by Bill Redican (11/1/00). The audio tape is thought no longer to be available. Another earlier and more verbatim transcript is available.

[1] From the first sentence of Shobogenzo "Sokushin-zebutsu."

[2] Sanskrit mano-vijñana. Fikes transcript had manas.

[3] mumyo: mu (Jap. "no"); myo (Jap. "to be clear"); ignorance in a deep sense; ignorance of the true nature of existence (cf. SR-70-07-10).

[4] Words in parentheses are from Fikes version. Some of the parenthetical terms were said by Suzuki-roshi; others were added by Brian Fikes.

[5] Sentence in brackets was added by Brian Fikes. It is similar to a sentence by Suzuki-roshi in Paragraph 1.

2 - Genjo Koan 15-18

Sunday, August 20, 1967

Genjo Koan

This lecture is not verbatim. The tape is no longer available. Suzuki-roshi is commenting on ¶¶ 15-18 of Genjo Koan.

Morning Sesshin

Zen Mountain Center, Tassajara

Edited by Brian Fikes

(Note from Brian Fikes: The first portion of this lecture was not recorded. This is the first [sic][1] in a series of [three] lectures on the Genjokoan given during the sesshin ending the first training period at Tassajara.)

There are four ways of understanding the relationship of form and emptiness: form is emptiness, emptiness is form, form is form, and emptiness is emptiness. "Form is emptiness" may not be so difficult to understand, but it will be misunderstood by some advanced, hasty people. "Yes, form is emptiness. There is no need for us to attach to some particular thing. Form is emptiness." This looks very clear, and this view of life is better than attaching to some particular form or color, because in it there are actually many, many views of life. And this view of non-existence is deeper than the view of seeing many things which actually look permanent and which look like they have some self-nature. But as we explained already, and as you have already understood, there is no special self-nature for anything, and everything is changing. As long as everything is changing, nothing is permanent. So this [form is emptiness] may be a more advanced view of life.

But "emptiness is form" is rather difficult to understand. The emptiness which is the absolute goal we will attain, which is enlightenment itself, is form. So whatever you do is enlightenment itself. This is rather difficult to understand, or to accept, because you think emptiness is some unusual thing. Something unusual is something very common. This is rather difficult to understand, especially when you practice zazen. Even though your practice is not perfect, that is enlightenment. This statement is very difficult to accept. "No, my practice is not perfect." But when we understand form is emptiness, and emptiness is form, back and forth in this way, and form is form, and emptiness is emptiness, when emptiness comes, everything is emptiness, and when form comes, form is form, and we accept things as it is.

So when we come to the understanding of "Form is form and emptiness is emptiness," there is no problem. This stage, or this understanding, is what Dogen Zenji means by, "When the moon is in the water, the water will not be broken, nor will the moon be wet." Moon is moon, and water is water. This is "form is form, emptiness is emptiness." But here there is the possibility of the misunderstanding that there is no need to practice Zen. "Form is form, and emptiness is emptiness. If this is true, why do we practice zazen?" You will have this kind of misunderstanding. But each of the four statements also includes the other three, so there are four ways of understanding each statement. If it is not so, it is not true understanding. So all four statements are actually the same. Whether you say form is form or emptiness is emptiness, or form is emptiness, or emptiness is form, one statement is enough for you. This is true understanding of prajna paramita.

Here Dogen Zenji referred to the koan of Zen Master Hotetsu (Pao-ch'e) of Mount Myoho (Mayu) [sic: Mayoku] fanning himself. He was a disciple of the famous Hyakujo Zenji, and he was a very good Zen master. "Hotetsu Zenji of Mt. Myoho was fanning himself. A monk approached and said, 'Sir, the nature of wind is permanent, and there is no place it does not reach. Why then must you fan yourself?'" If the wind is everywhere, why do you fan yourself? Do you understand? If everyone has Buddha nature, and form is emptiness and emptiness is form, why then must you fan yourself?" Although you understand that the nature of wind is permanent,' the master replied, 'you do not understand the meaning of its reaching everywhere.'" Even though you understand form is emptiness, you do not understand that emptiness is form, in other words. "'What is the meaning?' asked the monk. The master just fanned himself." He did not answer, but just fanned himself. There is a very great difference between a man who fans himself and one who does not fan himself. One will be very hot, one will be very cool, even though wind is everywhere. "The master just fanned himself. The monk bowed with great respect."

This is an experience of the correct transmission of Buddhism. Dogen Zenji said, "Those who say we should not use a fan because there is wind know neither permanency nor the nature of wind. The nature of wind is permanent. The wind of Buddhism actualizes the gold of the earth and ripens the cheese of the Long River." "...ripens the cheese of the Long River"-this is a quotation from the Gandavyuha [sic: Bandavyuha] Sutra. The water of the Long River is supposed to be pure milk. But even though the water of the Long River is pure milk, if it doesn't go through the right process, it cannot be cheese, you know. Milk is milk, and cheese is cheese. So if you want to ripen cheese, you should work on it. Even though there is wind, if you do not use your fan, it will not make you cool. Even though there is a lot of gold on the earth, if you do not pick it up, you cannot get gold. This is a very important point.

People may think Zen is a wonderful teaching. "If you study Zen, you will acquire complete freedom. Whatever you do, if you are in a Zen Buddhist robe, it is alright. If you wear a black robe like this, whatever you do is alright. We have that much freedom in our teaching." This kind of understanding looks like observing the teaching that form is emptiness, but what I mean by "form is emptiness" is quite different. Back and forth we practice, we train our mind and our emotions and our body. And after that process, you will acquire the perfect freedom.

And perfect freedom will only be acquired under some limitation. When you are in one position, realization of the truth will be there, will happen to you. But if you do not work on any position, wandering about from one place to another without knowing where you are, without knowing the place on which you work, then there will be no chance for you to realize your true nature. Even though you use something to make yourself cool, even though you have a Japanese round fan and a Chinese fan and a big electric fan, if you are always changing from one to the other as you wish, then you will spend your time just changing your equipment to make yourself cool. And you will have no time to appreciate the cool wind. That is what most people are doing. If you are not in some condition, you cannot experience reality. Reality will be experienced only when you are in some particular condition. [A line is missing here, so I'm not sure if this is right-B.F.] That is why we say emptiness is form. Emptiness will be very good, but it can only be appreciated in some form or color or under some limitation.

But we cannot be attached to it. Even though it is very wonderful to use a big fan in Tassajara, if you use it in San Francisco, what will happen to you? You cannot use such a big electric fan in San Francisco. So you cannot be attached to anything.

But you should appreciate, moment after moment, what you are doing right now under some condition. First of all, you must know under which condition you actually are. This is very important. If you are a teacher, you should behave like a teacher; when you are a student, you should behave like a student. So first of all you should know what your position is, or else realization of the truth will not happen to you. This is how we should understand our way. To realize our position and find ourselves is the way.

In this koan, he says, "Even though you know the nature of wind is permanent and reaches everywhere," but strictly speaking, this is a kind of rhetoric or a compliment. Actually, the monk doesn't even know the nature of wind nor what is meant by permanence. This is just complete ignorance. "Although you understand that the nature of wind is permanent," the master replied, "you do not understand the meaning of its reaching everywhere." How the wind reaches everywhere, and what is everywhere, and what reaching is, he has no idea. He doesn't know at all, about anything! When the nature of wind is permanent, and how it is permanent, is that when the wind works in some certain direction, in some spirit, under some condition, then the nature of wind will appear. You see?

"Reaching everywhere" means that the activity of the cool wind, which is blowing in some certain direction, in some spirit, covers everything. At that moment, the movement of the wind is the whole world, and the independent activity of the wind. Nothing can be compared with the wind under this condition. Ash is ash, having its own past and future, and firewood is firewood, having its own past and future. Firewood and ash are thoroughly independent. So is the wind. This is how wind reaches everywhere, and this activity is beyond the idea of time.

When we attain enlightenment, all the patriarchs attain enlightenment at the same time. You cannot say Buddha is before and we are after. When you understand enlightenment, you are independent from everything; you have your own past and future, as Buddha had his own past and future. And his position is independent, as your position is independent. If so, this realization is beyond time and space. In this way, the wind reaches everywhere. Do you understand? You cannot say Buddha is before and we are after, like ashes are after and firewood is before. In this way, you should understand that the wind reaches everywhere. In this way, you should realize the nature of wind, which is permanent. The monk did not have any understanding of this kind. For Hotetsu Zenji, it was impossible to explain this direct experience of reality, so he just fanned himself, appreciating the cool wind.

This is a very famous statement: "The wind of Buddhism actualizes the gold of the earth and ripens the cheese of the Long River." Only by your practice, when you practice zazen in this way, aiming at this kind of goal, will you have a chance to attain true enlightenment.

Thank you very much.

-----

Transcribed by Brian Fikes. Text reformatted and notes amended by Bill Redican 4/30/01.

[1] According to Wind Bell (1968, No. 1-2, p. 16), this is the last lecture of a series of three on the Genjo Koan given by Suzuki-roshi at Tassajara. The fact that Suzuki-roshi is discussing the last paragraphs of the fascicle also supports the conclusion that this is last in the series rather than first. Suzuki-roshi gave an earlier series of lectures on the Genjo Koan at Soko-ji in 1966 (see SR-66-03-13A, SR-66-05-25, etc.). -WKR, April 30, 2001.

3 - Genjo Koan 6 and 9-11

Monday, August 21, 1967

Genjo Koan

This lecture is not verbatim. The tape is no longer available. Suzuki-roshi is commenting on ¶¶ 6 and 9-11 of Genjo Koan.

Zen Mountain Center, Tassajara

Edited by Brian Fikes

There is a slight difference between your usual activity and the activity in our monastery. Of course, we do our best in our everyday work in order to support our activity. The work you do should be done with your very best effort and to the best of your ability. But you should not be too attached or take pride in your ability. Forgetting all about your ability and the result of your effort, you should still do your best in your work. This is how you work in a monastery as a part of practice.

And everyone has their own responsibility. We should work within our responsibilities; we should not invade someone else's responsibility. This is also the teaching of "form is emptiness and emptiness is form." We are working on something right now, and we do not know what we will work on tomorrow. But right now, what you are working on is your practice, and when you work, just work in your position. In your position and in your work there is meaning. So each one's responsibility or position is very important for us. If this is the case, we should not invade someone else's work. Each of us should work on our position. When you do so, there is our practice. Form is emptiness and emptiness is form. When you work on the form which is your responsibility, which is your work, there is emptiness. But the form, or the position, you have right now is not a permanent one. Right now you are working on it, and right now you should work on it. Through your position, you can attain your own enlightenment. We should work in this way.

When Dogen Zenji arrived in China, his boat could not land because of the inspection, so he had to stay on the boat. At that time, an old priest visited his ship. He was very interested in that old priest, and they talked about Buddhism. He found out that the old priest was taking care of the kitchen of Ekoso (?), a monastery. He thought there must be many young priests because it was a noted big monastery. So he said, "Why don't you stay? Even if you stay for the night in this ship, some one will work in the kitchen." But the old priest said, "You don't know what our practice is," and, "Others are not you." Others are not you; others cannot take my position, my practice. It is my practice. Each one should work on his practice. There there is enlightenment.

So today we have today's work, tomorrow we have tomorrow's work, and each of us has his own work, which should be perfect. As Dogen Zenji said, firewood does not become ash. Firewood has its own past and present. Ash has its own perfect position, it has its own past and future and its own perfection. So firewood never turns to ash. Ash is ash; firewood is firewood. And firewood includes everything past and future, and ash includes past and future, and everything which exists in this moment. So when you do your own job, your own job includes every thing and has its own past and future and perfection.

If you are wandering about, forgetting all about your place, it means you are deluded. You have no idea of practice, and you are losing your own practice. That is not our way. We should not put emphasis on our skill or the result of our work, but on knowing the meaning of the work more deeply. Then most of the difficulties in our monastic life will be solved.

Usually what we do is not so difficult. The problems which follow because of your imperfect understanding of work are more difficult. You will suffer from the useless problems, and you will lose the whole monastery. If the point of your work is lost, it is not a monastery any more. If you visit a monastery and everything is in order, the plants and vegetables are healthy, every place is clean, and the tools are well polished and sharp, that is sure to be a good monastery. But polishing your tools or raising your vegetables is not the main point of your practice. The main point is whether or not your effort is real practice. When there is good teaching and good practice, there is good feeling, and everything will grow. But the purpose is not just to get larger crops or to have a great amount of work. So even though you have some special ability, you will work on something you are not familiar with. But as long as you have something to work on, you should do your best in your position.

This is also what prajna paramita is. Although it may look like we are doing ordinary work, if you have right understanding of our work, the meaning is quite different.

The next paragraph of Shobogenzo Genjokoan says, "We gain enlightenment like the moon reflecting in the water. The moon does not get wet, nor is the water broken. Although its light is wide and great, the moon is reflected even in a puddle an inch wide. The whole moon and the whole sky are reflected in a drop of dew in the grass."

"We gain enlightenment like the moon reflecting in the water." Here the use of the parable of the moon and its reflection is different. Earlier he said our way is not like the moon reflecting on the water. At that time he meant to symbolize a dualistic idea of our practice and enlightenment. But here he means that even though you attain enlightenment, there is no difference in what you do.

"The moon does not get wet ...." Even though the moon is in the water, it does not get wet. "... nor does the water get broken." There is no trace in it. You may think there exists, or you may always seek for, an enlightenment which is some special experience, where you have no problems, where you will get rid of all vicious habits. Once you have attained enlightenment, you will not drink any more sake. That may be the kind of enlightenment you are seeking. But actually, if you like sake, even though you gain enlightenment, you will have a hard time getting past the store where sake is sold. Things will still happen to you even though you attain enlightenment. So he says the water is not broken, nor does the moon get wet. The same water and the same moon will be there.

"Although its light is wide and great ...." You may say the moonlight is bright and great, while the moon in the dew is so small. But the moon in the sky is also in the drop of dew. Even though it is in the drop of dew, it is the moon. Even though you may say your attainment is so small, enlightenment is enlightenment. There is no difference.

"The moon is reflected even in a puddle an inch wide. The whole moon and the whole sky are reflected in a drop of dew in the grass." Enlightenment does not destroy the mind or help the mind. He did not say that, but "Enlightenment does not destroy the mind, just as the moon does not break the water. Mind does not hinder enlightenment just as a drop of dew does not hinder the moon in the sky. The depth of the drop is the height of the moon." Because you compare something to some other things, you have this kind of misunderstanding or confusion. But firewood is firewood, ash is ash. And ash and firewood are perfect, because they are whole, independent, being, or independent reality. This kind of understanding is beyond our thinking. You can explain it with logic, but the explanation will not be perfect.

"The depth of the drop is the height of the moon. The period of reflection, long or short, will prove the vastness of the dewdrop and the vastness of the moonlit sky."

Now the next paragraph: "When the truth does not fill our body and mind, we think that we have enough. When the truth fills our body and mind, we know that something is missing." This "something is missing" has a different meaning. We know that that is not enough; at least we know that we should continue. It is not the end of it all. Moment after moment we should work on it. We feel this way. There is no time for us to lie down and sleep. We must go on and on and on.

And we have our ideal ahead of us. Usually, without knowing this part, when you are caught by your ideal, which is not possible to attain, you will just suffer until you commit suicide. Isn't that so? Enlightenment might be just an ideal for you, but even enlightenment is not always the same. It will make some progress -- I cannot explain it just now because you will be mixed up. There may be big enlightenments and small enlightenments, as the biographies of the great masters say, countless small enlightenments and several big enlightenments. This kind of description means that enlightenment is not always the same. Enlightenment after enlightenment we should practice our way. So you feel that something is not enough. Even though you feel good, even though you feel that you had enlightenment, that is not enough. When you feel this way, that is true enlightenment. But when you think you have had enough, that is not true enlightenment.

"For example, when we view the world from a boat on the ocean, it looks circular, and nothing else." "It looks circular. ..." It looks like he discovered our earth is round at that time. He said it looks circular and nothing else. It is just a round globe. He must have seen it when he was crossing the China Sea. "But the ocean is neither round nor square, and its features are infinite in variety. It is like a palace. It is like a jewel. It seems circular as far as your eyes can reach at the time. All things are so. Though there are many features in the dusty life and the pure life. ..."

"It is like a palace." For the fish it is like a palace. "It is like a jewel." For the dragon, it may be a jewel. "It seems circular as far as your eyes can reach at the time." When you see it, it looks circular, but water is not always a palace for everyone, or a jewel. It seems circular as far as our eyes can reach at the time, but it may not be circular. "All things are so, though there are many features in the dusty life and the pure life. We only understand what our study can reach." Whatever you may say, no matter how beautifully you describe this world, that is not all. That is the description as far as you can describe it.

"In our study of all things we must appreciate that although they may look round or square, the other features of the ocean or mountains are infinite in variety, and there are universes in all quarters. It is so not only around ourselves, but also directly here, even in a drop of water." Just now we are talking about our teaching, but it is not only our Buddhist teaching. Even near at hand, events will tell you this truth. When your understanding reaches as far as this, you may say you are studying Buddhism, and you work on your everyday life accordingly. Whatever you do, that is the practice. Whenever you do not feel good in your work, you must think this truth. At the time, you may not feel so good, but that is not all.

A monastery is not some particular place. Whether you can make Tassajara a monastery or not is up to you. It may be even worse than city life even though you are in Tassajara. But when you have the wisdom of the Prajna Paramita Sutra, even though you are in San Francisco, that is the perfect monastery. This point should be fully understood.

-----

Transcribed by Brian Fikes. Text reformatted and notes amended by Bill Redican 4/30/01.

4 - Genjo Koan 12-14

Wednesday, August 23, 1967

Sesshin Lecture

This lecture is not verbatim. The tape is no longer available. Suzuki-roshi is commenting on ¶¶ 12-14 of Genjo Koan.

Zen Mountain Center, Tassajara

Edited by Brian Fikes

Buddhism is not any special teaching, and enlightenment is not any particular stage that you attain. When you understand your life completely, that is enlightenment. So though the approach to it is not the same, as long as you study sincerely, you will reach the same goal. You may think you have discovered a new teaching, but almost all the teachings we discover have already been discovered by Buddhist teachers. You may say Buddhism is the accumulation of our human experience. So whatever you make effort on, there is the way.

Some people are always trying to discover some particular way for themselves. That is not the true way to study; this kind of idea is utterly wrong. So we say, "Don't seek for any particular enlightenment." Enlightenment is not something particular. When you start to study Buddhism, thinking that it is good to expect that Buddhism will give you some particular teaching, if you cannot satisfy your expectations, you will give up. This is not how we study.

So here (in the Shobogenzo Genjokoan) Dogen Zenji says, "When a fish swims in the ocean, there is no end to the water, no matter how far it swims. When a bird flies, there is no end to the air, no matter how far it flies." When you think the sky or the water is something special and try to discover its end, you cannot. You have no chance to study, because you cannot reach the end of the water or the limit of the air. So he says no matter how far it flies, there is no end to the air.

"However, the fish and bird do not leave their elements." A fish or bird does not go out of the water or air. The water or air we want to study is for everyone, they are not particular things. You cannot live without water or without air.

"When the use is large, it is used largely. When the use is small, it is used in the small way." Anyway, whether you are aware of it or not, you are in the air and you are in the water, and according to the way you live, there may be more or less water. The water under this limitation is not the whole water you want to study. But even though it is a small amount of water, it is water, and it is the sky.

"Though it flies everywhere, if the bird leaves the air, it will die at once." Our way which we study is like air or water. So before you try to figure out what it is, you should practice it, you should live in the water or the sky. That is how you study Buddhism. Not by trying to figure out what it is intellectually, but with all of your mind and body, you should practice our way.

"The bird makes life and the fish makes life. Life makes the bird and life makes the fish. There are further analogies possible to illustrate (this)." The bird and life, which is water or sky, are the same thing. So the bird makes life and the fish makes life. Fish is fish made of water; bird made of water, and life made of bird, and life made of fish. Life and bird or fish, or water and sky and fish and bird, is not different. "There are further analogies possible to illustrate." There may be many ways of analyzing this truth.

"In this way, practice, enlightenment, mortality and eternity." So mortality and eternity are one, and enlightenment is one. Bird and sky is one. We should understand it in this way. So where you practice it, there is the way, there is enlightenment.

"However, if a bird or fish tries to reach the end of its element before moving in it, this bird, or this fish, will not find its way or its place. When we find our place at this moment, when we find our way at this moment, then practice follows, and this is realization of the truth. For the place and the way are neither large nor small." Our way cannot be compared with some other practice. Each practice is perfect, including everything, and independent.

So, neither subject nor object: "There is no subject who practices it and no object which is practiced. They have not existed from the beginning." When you practice it, reality appears. Reality did not exist before you practiced it. "They have not existed from the beginning, and they are not in the process of realization." Each moment is realization and is not in the process of realization. Do you understand? It is not process, you know. At the same time, it is in the process of changing into some other practice. But although your practice is a continuous one, at the same time it is discontinuous. Today you have done something, and what you have done will be continued tomorrow. But even though we do not know anything about tomorrow, tomorrow is included in the present. Your work has its own tomorrow and past. Tomorrow what you have done will have its own past and future. What you have done today will belong to the past tomorrow. So it is not the same. Do you understand? Not the same at all. Tomorrow is independent, and today is independent.

There must be some relationship, but although there is a relationship, you cannot compare what you have done today to the things you will do tomorrow. So you must be satisfied with what you did today. Tomorrow you should be satisfied with what you will do tomorrow. So when you compare what you have done today [line missing here, perhaps saying something like, "with what you will do tomorrow, it is like trying to mix oil with"-B.F.] water. You cannot compare them. Oil is oil and water is water. You cannot say which is better. We cannot ignore the relationship between two things, or between many things, but each one is independent. So each one includes everything. You may say what you have done is small, but that's because you compare it. Actually, you should not compare.

"They have not existed from the beginning, and they are not in the process of realization." They are not in the process of realization. Do you understand? Your practice is not in the process of realization. So will you give up? "Your practice is not in the process of realization-it's better to give up if there is no hope." This kind of practice is not our practice. Even though you practice our way for a whole lifetime, some of you may attain enlightenment and some may not. You see? If so, do you give up your practice?

When I say some may and some may not, it means I am comparing someone's practice to someone else's practice. But your own practice itself is originally independent and perfect. So what is wrong is the comparison. You are limiting the actual value of your practice. Your small mind is a big limitation to your true practice, that is all. So it is not the practice that is good or bad, but your understanding makes practice seem good or bad. This is why we say do not seek for some particular enlightenment. You should be satisfied with your practice and practice hard moment after moment. Then there is enlightenment.

"Thus, in our practice of Buddhism, when we gain one truth, we must have mastered that one truth. And if we encounter one activity, we complete the activity. Here is the place, and here leads the way." When there is place, there is way. That is complete practice without calling it good or bad practice. When you encounter one activity, you should do it with your best effort. That is the way.

Therefore, he says, "Understanding is not always possible, because it is simultaneous with the complete attainment of the Buddha's teaching." The complete attainment is simultaneous with when you practice. So it is not possible to understand what it is. If they come one by one at different times, you will have a chance to see what Buddha's teachings and actual practices are. But when they come at the same time that you are practicing them, there is already attainment. So there is no way for us to know the other side, which is attainment.

When you are busy working on something, it is not possible to see what you have done. If you want to see, you have to stop doing it. Then you will know what you have done. Even though it is not possible to see what you have done, when you have done something, there is attainment. There is no doubt in it, but usually we are very curious about what we have done. That is alright; but when you see it, you have already put your practice in a limitation, and you are comparing it to some attainment. When your attainment is better than what you did before, or better than what someone else did, you will be pleased with it; if it is not, you will be discouraged. But that is not because your attainment is not good enough or is not perfect.

"Understanding is not possible because it is simultaneous with the complete attainment of the Buddha's teaching. Do not suppose that what we realize is knowledge in terms of concepts." So your knowledge about what you have done is not the same as what you realized. "Though we have already attained supreme enlightenment, we may not necessarily see." Some may, and some may not. This is a very important point and is the secret of the teaching. "Don't suppose that what we realize is knowledge in terms of concepts." Though we have already attained supreme enlightenment, that secret attainment, attainment which is more than you understand, cannot be seen by you. The way it appears to you is not necessarily the same.

As you know, we live in a world which is mostly perceptions. It is difficult for us to be satisfied with everything when our understanding accords with what we see or think. But we have to know that everything we see or think is under some limitation. You are not seeing or thinking about the thing itself. This point should be remembered. What you see, what you understand in terms of concepts is not always true. This is the secret of Buddhism. This point should be remembered completely.

So don't be disturbed by the ideas you have in your mind. This does not mean that you can ignore your thinking. Thinking should be systematic and should be right. But even though it is right, that is not complete. And what you think is right is not always actually right. Most people attach to the truth which they understand. The confusion arises from this hasty understanding. This is a very, very important point.

I will continue with one more lecture about this fascicle, and afterwards, Reverend Maezumi will give us some lectures. And it may be a good idea to have a discussion with you sometime, so that you may discuss many things with us. We have Dr. Stunkard and many other good teachers here, so a discussion will be very good, I think, I hope.

-----

Transcribed by Brian Fikes. Text reformatted and notes amended by Bill

Redican 4/30/01.

5 - Sesshin Lecture

Thursday, August 24, 1967

Sesshin Lecture
Zen Mountain Center, Tassajara[1]

Edited by Brian Fikes

(Again, the opening sentences were missed. According to Dick [Baker], they were something like: "This is the last lecture of sesshin. We have talked of form and emptiness, but have not understood it well."-B.F.)

... She was a part of the world, and whatever she said from the top of the mountain was in her mind. She felt an unusual warm feeling even for mountain range after mountain range, but at the same time, she felt very lonely. Something is missing in that understanding. What is it? What is it? Today, for my last lecture, I want to qualify this point.

Do you know the famous story of Gutei's one-finger Zen? I think every one knows it. Gutei Osho lived in a small hut deep in the mountains. One day a nun called [Jissai] came to the hut. As soon as she arrived, she went around and around the altar with her hat on her head. Gutei Osho said, "Why don't you take off your hat?" She said, "If you can say something good to me, I will take off my hat." But he couldn't say anything, so he was very ashamed of himself. He left his hut, his small temple, and started visiting famous Zen masters. First of all, he thought he must see Tenryu Osho. And before he said anything, Tenryu Osho held up one finger, like this, and Gutei was enlightened. You understand?

Form is emptiness, you know. When you see one leaf falling down from the tree, you will see autumn there. "Oh, autumn is here already!" you may say. So one leaf is not just one leaf; it means the whole autumn. So even one thing will cover everything, and here there is your world. Here you already understand the all-pervading power of your practice. Your practice covers everything.

Unfortunately, our understanding is so intellectual. When we say "covers everything", our understanding of this remains bound in terms of space, so the other side, time, is discontinuous. The idea of time which is discontinuous, or the momentary idea of time, is the same as the space-bound idea. "One point in wide space includes everything." Your understanding is liable to be like this. But actually, when we say "includes everything," it means the past and future too. So it includes everything which exists in this moment, and which exists in this moment, and which will exist in the next moment, and which has existed in the past. Your understanding should reach this point. The all-pervading power and the incessant continuity of the power are both important. Training period now is over, it is true. But this is not the end of our practice. Incessantly, one after another, our practice will continue.

So, now we will go back to the story of Gutei. After that, whenever someone came, he held up one finger. That is all right, because he understood it, so they must have understood it -- I don't know. But one day when Master Gutei was not at the temple, someone came, so his disciple got up on the platform and received the question. "What is Buddhism?" the visiting monk asked. The disciple held up one finger. Unfortunately, his master heard about it, and he asked him, "What is Buddhism?" The disciple held up one finger. But the master cut off his finger! There is no more finger! The disciple cried out and almost went out, but the teacher called him back and held up one finger again. The boy was enlightened. Do you understand?

This may be the training period (holding up one finger); this may be sesshin right now, you see. After sesshin is cut off, what will come as the next training for us? You see? Cut off-but another one appears! Do you understand? One after another, this will appear.

So there is the continuity as well as the universality or all-pervading power of practice. We should have continuous practice, or else your practice is not perfect. Even if you attain enlightenment by one finger-form is emptiness-if that enlightenment is a momentary experience or enlightenment, it doesn't mean much. Something is still missing in your feeling. But when you realize that your practice will continue incessantly without any gap between one practice and the next, there there is true practice. If your enlightenment reaches this point, your understanding is perfect, and you don't have anything missing. Your mind will be full of joy in its true sense.

So even though you think you attain enlightenment, usually our enlightenment remains in some intellectual understanding of time or space and based on some self-centered idea. It is pretty hard to get beyond the limited intellectual understanding. This is why it is necessary to cut off the finger and to point out another finger. This fellow will go out once he's seen the one finger held up, as Tokusan did when Yutan blew out the light. I must tell you this story.

Tokusan visited Yutan and thought he had attained enlightenment under Yutan's instruction, so he wanted to go out. It was dark, so Yutan said, "It is too late for you to go. Why don't you stay?" But, you know, he was so grateful and so glad that he understood the teaching because of his attaining enlightenment, so the master gave him a light. "Then take this with you." And Yutan blew out the light. Then Tokusan really truly understood, and he left. No one knows, as Dogen Zenji said, if this enlightenment was perfect or not. If we see him, we will understand whether he attained enlightenment really and truly. But as far as the story goes, we are not so sure.

From Buddha's time to our age, human nature has been nearly the same. We live in the world of time and space, and our life does not go beyond this limit. To live in the world of time and space is like pushing a big snake into a small can. The snake will suffer in the small can. It does not know what is going on outside of the can. Because it is in the can, it is so dark he cannot see anything, but he will struggle in the small can. That is what we are doing. The more we struggle, the greater the suffering will be. That kind of practice will not work. Putting yourself in a small can and sitting day after day in a cross-legged position is worse than a waste of time. Do you understand? Sometimes our practice is something like this. We don't know how much our understanding is limited. That is why you have to study koans. Koans will open up your mind. If you understand your way of life more objectively, you will understand what you are doing.

I think right now you must have understood what "form is emptiness and emptiness is form" means in its true sense. Here you will understand Dogen Zenji's difficult statement: "Time passes from past to present, from present to future, and from future to present, and from present to past." If you really understand "form is emptiness" in its true sense, then in the time-bound world, you have this much freedom. Time goes from future to past, from present to past. This is an extraordinary statement. Form is emptiness, emptiness is form. In this present moment there is past and future. That future exists in the present moment means that future passes to the present. Right now your future is right here. This kind of experience continues forever from Buddha to us, from us to our descendants, from you to your friend. And we will have the perfect relationship between us, something more than relationship. This is how you develop your character in the whole world, past and future.

The founder of my temple was always studying Zuigan's koan. Zuigan always addressed himself, "Zuigan?" And he answered, "Yes!" "Zuigan?" "Hai!" The neighbors wondered what he was doing! "Zuigan!" At first they thought, "Zuigan isn't well." But he was always addressing himself, "Zui gan," and answering, "Hai!" Do you understand? Our practice should be like this, you know.

Of course, all of us have some small or big enlightenment, and in your zazen you may think about it again. But if you try to think about it, you will be lost, you will be lost. I know. I myself was lost, so I think you will be lost too, because you are involved in an intellectual, cerebral way of thinking. And once you lose yourself, you start to torture yourself, you don't feel so good. That anxiety, that impatient, angry feeling will continue, and your practice will become worse and worse. That is what will happen to you.

But if someone calls your name, "Where is Kanzen?" all of a sudden, your practice will come back to you. You see? Emptiness is here, right here. Do you understand? So Zuigan had to call himself, because he would be lost if he didn't. Incessantly you should call your name. When you come back to yourself, there you include everything as a sole being in the time-bound and space-bound. And you will feel very good, you know.

This kind of practice, addressing someone in this way, is the kindest instruction to give. No one can be more kind to someone than this. Don't you think so? I do not write letters; that is very bad habit of mine. And I think sometime I really must write. Just to receive a letter from someone is enough to bring a person back to himself, directly to his home. This is true love. Incessantly we are changing, so it is necessary to call ourselves back incessantly. If you don't take care of yourself in this way, you will be lost.

After zazen we take a meal and recite the names of Buddha. That is calling ourselves back to home. Here there is the practice of continuity. The other kind of practice I have been talking about is the practice of discontinuity. Even if the practice is a momentary one, it has the great virtue of including everything. But if you practice our way incessantly, that will have the power to bring Shakyamuni Buddha right here. This is true, very true. It is more true than the time which passes from past to present. Here your practice is not spacebound or timebound. You are beyond the idea of time and space, and you are independent in this world.

And yet everyone is your teacher. Shakyamuni Buddha or your friend or your family is within your enlightenment. You may say, "If I have a family, I cannot practice our way." That is because you are bound by the idea of annihilation. To cut off your consciousness does not mean to not think anything. Dogen says, "To cut off various ideas is to have various ideas." How about it? To cut off various ideas is to have various ideas within your practice. If you have a family, it may be more difficult to practice our way; that is true. But that does not mean it is impossible to practice our way. If you have enough conviction and effort, you can do it.

In this way we should make our effort. Today I act incessantly, incessantly. One enlightenment is not enough. One after another, incessant enlightenments are necessary. Moment after moment, you must call Buddha's name or your name directly. There you have yourself.

I am so grateful for your joining our practice and listening to our lecture. Maezumi Sensei is leaving early tomorrow morning, so I hope he will speak on this occasion.

-----

Transcribed by Brian Fikes. Text reformatted and notes amended by Bill

Redican 4/30/01.

[1] This lecture does not appear to be on the Genjo Koan. Suzuki-roshi gave a series of three lectures on the Genjo Koan at Tassajara in 1967. See SR-67-08-20-A et seq.

1967 september (2)

1 - The Threefold Body of Buddha

Friday, September 01, 1967

The Threefold Body of Buddha
Tassajara

Student: Please come up front if you'd like.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, please come nearer.

Student: Those in the back come up to the front, please.

Suzuki-roshi: Tonight my talk will be quite informal. You are, of course, interested in Zen. But Zen is also Buddhism, you know. So it is necessary for you to understand Buddhism in general. Although it will not help you-my talk will not help you immediately, but it is necessary for you to have some understanding of original teaching of Buddha, and, at the same time, various understanding of original teaching of Buddha or else, I am afraid, you will miss the point.

Tonight I want to talk about the three-fold body of Buddha. The other day, Bishop Sumi[1] explained about what is the various understanding of Buddha, like historical Buddha, buddha as a-as the truth, and buddha as a teaching or dharma. This concept originated from, of course, historical Buddha, who is so great. And he was so great that Hinayana Buddhism-Buddhist or [are?] direct disciple of Buddha, had a kind of supernatural nature of form-some-some supernatural being-idea of supernatural being like Buddha who had the 32 marks[2] or eighty holy figures. Those concept already-already formed some Buddha as a embodiment of the truth-of Buddha who attained buddhahood after unusual practice. So in Mahayana school-Hinayana Buddhist had no such elaborate aspects of Buddha, but Mahayana Buddhist started-had the three aspects of Buddha. And this three aspect forms a trinity, like three [pre-?] Buddhistic religion.

The three form is Buddha as a historical being who has his own body. But Buddha, who-the teaching which was told by historical Buddha was the truth itself. So here we have the idea of truth and idea of teaching. The idea of teaching and idea of truth forms-form idea of Dharmakaya Buddha. And the Buddha who had an image of character forms the idea of Sambhogakaya Buddha. Here-so we have Buddha as a embodiment of the truth, and Buddha as a truth, and-and Buddha who attained buddhahood after his long practice. Here we have the three aspects of Buddha.

And this three aspects of Buddha was necessary for Mahayana Buddhist to become buddha or possibility of attaining buddhahood. For Hinayana Buddhists, it was not possible to attain buddhahood because Buddha was so great that they didn't think-they did not imagine-even imagine the possibility of being Buddha.

But Mahayana Buddhists put emphasis on the buddhahood which is possible for them to attain. Here Buddhism-Buddha became more religious. The Buddha for Hinayana Buddhist is some unusual person, something quite different from human being. But Buddha for Mahayana Buddhist is someone who is like every one of us. So they put emphasis on buddha-nature. So Dharmakaya Buddha actually-the express the essential nature of every one of us. That is Dharmakaya Buddha. Because we have potentiality, after long practice it is possible for us to attain buddhahood. And every one of us is nothing but the embodiment of the Buddha. Here Buddhism becomes more popular or more reli- [partial word]-took a form of religion rather than some special teaching.

This was-this development was very important for Buddhism-or for the development [?] of Buddhism because Hinayana Buddhism become-became more and more formal, and their teaching became more and more philosophical or verbal. They had a strict distinction between laymen and priesthood. But in Mahayana Buddhism, there was not much difference between Buddhism in-for laymen and Buddhism for priests or monks because the potentiality for-to be buddha for everyone was emphasized. So whether they are man or woman, whether they are priest or layman, they get together in Buddha's pagoda, and recite sutras, and practiced various formal practice.

As you know, Buddha-although Buddha's body or ash was divided in six [eight?] and enshrined [in] various place-places, but they did not worship Buddha's ash. It was a time when Mahayana Buddhism became more and more powerful. But we started to enshrine Buddha's relics, building pagoda, and various religious activity were observed by people. So they have to have this kind of definition or aspects or understanding of Buddha: buddha as a truth, buddha as a-our true nature or buddha as in every one of us, or buddha as a historical Buddha. So they had already clear distinction between buddha as a-our own nature and historical Buddha. And yet, those understand- [partial word]-those three bodies of Buddha is one. One include the other.

Although Buddhism became very common, but philosophically Buddhism became more and more deeper. In this way, Buddhism was developed as a religion and as a philosophy too. This is how Buddhism developed, and why we have the three aspects of Buddha.

And in Hinayana Buddhism, their-the sutra was-were not so philosophical-the teaching was not so diffic- [partial word]-philosophical. But in Mahayana Buddhism we have three-we call it "three baskets"[3] of [laughs]-not "baskets," but-three kinds of scriptures: philosophical one,[4] and something told by Buddha as a teaching,[5] and scriptures about precepts-observations.[6] And philosophy-philosophical aspects of understanding of teaching developed in Mahayana school or Mahayana Buddhism.

There are many "three," you know, number in our teaching: three kinds of scriptures, three-fold body, or three fields [?] of the teaching. Those are-as a Buddhist, we should know those-we must have this kind of knowledge, just as a knowledge. Those teaching or those understand-[partial word]-aspects of our teaching were the background of Zen. So it is necessary for us to have those understanding or background of Zen, as well as our practice.

If you have some question, please ask. As we have not much dokusan, so if you have some question, please-any question, you are welcome. Please ask question.

Student A: Is Mahayana Buddhism also known as the second way?

Suzuki-roshi: Mahayana Buddhism?

Student A: Is it known as the second way?

Suzuki-roshi: Second way?

Student A: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: Second way. Oh, excuse me. What do you mean-the sec-[partial word]?

Student A: I was reading someplace about the second way as being the way of total annihilation [?] of life as a goal, rather than going into life.

Suzuki-roshi: Mahayana Buddhism? No. We say "Mahayana Buddhism," but there are many, you know, teachings in Mahayana Buddhism. And the Kegon school, you know, classifies our teaching in three, you know. Or we-Kegon school-not class-[partial word]-yes, classified-has three aspects in understanding of teaching. So if the understanding is poor, that is, you know, the second way-not perfect understanding. And if the understanding is good, that is perfect understanding. And that perfect understanding cannot be attained by just intellectual understanding. That is the Tendai's canon. You see? And this is the, you know-of course this is true with Zen too. This is another-maybe I will-I must explain some other time, you know, the three aspects of-understanding from three aspects.

If you-if you study the various canon of various school, you will understand why it is necessary to practice zazen, you know [laughs]. The various schools suggest us to practice zazen. That is why we practice zazen [laughs]. Do you understand? So our practice is based on the canon of various school, you know. So Zen include, or Zen is based on all the Buddhism, all the schools of-all the teaching of many schools. Or Zen is the result of many-result of effort of many scholars of many schools. Do you understand? Zen is not something special. In other word, Zen is not one of thirteen schools, you know. Zen include the thirteen schools of Buddhism. If you understand Zen, you will understand other schools. The gist of the teaching is Zen, but not teaching-but, you know, you can say "teaching" in its wide sense. Hai.

Student B: Now that the weather is cold, how can we concentrate when we're, like, chilled in the morning?

Suzuki-roshi: Chilled? Oh-

Student B: Like, when we're really cold, like, not from the outside but we're cold-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: -and it's sort of inside our clothes.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: How can we get our meditation back and our concentration through the tenseness of being cold?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughing.] I understand how you feel [laughter], but nevertheless, you know, you shouldn't-we say, "Sick or cold will not kill you, but wrong practice will kill you." [Laughter.] Even though it is cold, you know, you should do that. You see, it will be the chance or occasion to realize the truth. The cold weather or some difficulty in your practice will give you some chance to attain enlightenment or to practice real practice. When it is cold, it-you should practice it because it is a good chance to practice. Then-this is rather, I think, traditional way of realizing our true nature.

We have various desires, you know. But by stopping it, by taking negative attitude towards your desire, you will realize your true nature, more than-rather than to have positive, you know, attitude towards your desires. It does not mean to annihilate your desires, but by stopping it-to take negative attitude towards your desire.

That negative attitude result [in] the true understanding of the desire itself, or human nature itself, or buddha-nature itself. So if it is cold, you shouldn't wear too much [laughs]. I think you wear too-when you sit you [wear] too warm clothing. It is not-not that cold, so it's much better not to wear too many, you know, clothing.

Some other question?

Student C: Around here it's very easy not to get too attached to food and sit around thinking about well, when's it time to eat and all this sort of thing, because your mind just isn't going in that direction. But say, like, at home, if you are in the kitchen a lot and the kitchen is a combination kitchen and family room, and all the life centers around the kitchen, and you're in kitchen all day, now what do you do if you have this problem: Like, since I've been sitting, all my senses have gotten sharp, and food tastes better now. So what do I do, you know, like, if I- if I just have something to eat that ordinarily I wouldn't even care about-it tastes-that simple thing tastes so marvelous now, that I'm looking for some more where that came from [laughter], you know. Well then-you know what I mean?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah [laughter].

Student C: Pretty soon I'm sitting in the kitchen, and eating and eating and eating, you know? Well what do you do?

Suzuki-roshi: Ohhh. [Laughter.] You soon will realize your nature by negative practice. For all religion, negative, you know, practice is necessary. We sh- [partial word]-you know, we should not always pick positive attitude only. Positive and negative-both attitude is necessary, but negative one is the most important practice. This is very true.

Student D: I'm a little confused. What is a negative attitude?

Suzuki-roshi: Negative attitude? Negative attitude is to-to eat [?] your-our food and to practice in-under some difficult circumstances, and to refrain from some various, you know, activity-various, you know, like sexual activity, or negative attitude towards various desires [laughs] [1 word unclear] [laughs] which something aroused, you know. We have to think more on this point, at least. Hai.

Student E: You don't mean "suppress" desires, do you, by "thinking negative" about them.

Suzuki-roshi: Hm?

Student E: You don't mean "suppressed," do you?

Suzuki-roshi: Suppress?

Student E: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: Suppress.

Student: [Aside.] Confine.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student E: You don't mean "feel guilty about it," do you, Sensei, or-? [Laughs, laughter.] Or say that it's bad, or something like that, or do you mean just not to do it?

Suzuki-roshi: If you feel guilty about it, it will help you [laughs, laughter]. "Don't feel guilty." If I say, "Don't feel guilty," it looks like I'm [laughs], you know-I'm making some excuse for something. That is not-that is not matter of discussion, you know. It is rather-it is matter of practice or experience. You should not be blind, you know, in what you do, even though it is fundamental instinct. You sh- [partial word]-you must have-you must open your eyes to those activities. You should not ignore it, you know. At least you should have positive and negative [attitude?]. And it is-as it is difficult to have negative attitude, we should try to be negative.

Student F: The word "negative" has a very-it leaves a very bad taste in my mouth. It has very bad associations with me, and I think it does with a lot of people.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student F: I don't really quite understand what you mean when you say "negative."

Suzuki-roshi: If it is-if the word "negative" create bad feeling, it's all the better [laughs, laughter]. It is, you know, [not?] the matter of you like it or not, you know-like the teaching or not. But what I mean is actual experience, you know. It is not matter of you like our teaching or not. So it is necessary for you to, you know, to open your mind to your true nature. You see, as long as you are, you know, trying to ignore one side, I don't think you can understand our true nature. What will happen if you die? That is the most negative experience [laughs]. But whether you like it or not, you will die someday [laughs]. Remember-just remember what I said, you know, and open your eyes, [be] more and more careful or more alert. And more careful with ... [Sentence not finished. Gap in tape of unknown interval.]

... feel your desire more, and you will attain the freedom from various desires, and you can change one desire to the other. It is like a blind man can hear better than, you know-better than usual person.

Student F: What you're saying is that you should put the snake in the small can.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Put the snake in straight [laughter]-Nagarjuna said, you know, "How will you put a snake straight in?" He asked, you know, someone, "How can you make a snake straight?" [Laughs.] As no one, you know, couldn't answer, he said, "Put it in straight bamboo or a pipe" [laughs]. That is a way to make a snake straight, and snake will know what is his nature. If he is like this [presumably making a waving gesture], you know, he doesn't know his own nature.

Negative and positive is very important, like a rope, you know. If you twist two, you know, rope in two, like this [gestures], that is negative and positive. One rope cannot make-by one-just one rope-just one material we cannot make a rope, we say.

Student G: Sensei, didn't Buddha do that? Didn't he get down to one grain of rice a day? Didn't he deny himself a whole bunch of things when he talked about the middle way?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. That is not too [to?], you know-his practice-difference between asceticism and Buddha's way was, his way-asceticism, you know, practiced that way-in that way, limiting their food or sleep to attain something, or to be born in some heaven, or something like that. He had-they had some-some purpose-they practiced it for some purpose. But Buddha found the truth in that practice. The practice itself is the goal. This is very, I think-

Student H: Do you think fasting is good practice?

Suzuki-roshi: Fasting?

Student H: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: Good practice for what [laughs]? That is, you know-

Student H: For mastering desire or thinking negatively about desire, whatever is troubling the spirit.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. If so, you know, there will be no need to fast, you know, for many days, for an instance. That is a kind of practice, but that is not our practice. Even though you do not fast, you can practice it, you know, in the most usual way.

This is very important point. We have to think more about this point. I think you already have some, you know, some doubt or-not "doubt," but you are wondering-you may wonder why I say this kind of-why I talk about negative or positive attitude towards our desires. But I myself have no answer to it.

Student I: Is there a difference between negative desires and positive desires?

Suzuki-roshi: No, that is one.

Student I: It's the same thing to kill someone and to love someone?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Two aspects or two kinds of attitude we take.

Student I: Does that mean that we should suppress both?

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me-two?

Student I: Does that mean that we should-that we should-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student I: -suppress these desires, to love and to hate?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, sometimes it is necessary. And it is necessary, and you are doing it [laughs].

Student J: Well, what about sincerity, okay?

Suzuki-roshi: Sincerity?

Student J: That's a very positive thing.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Sincerity-

Student J: If you suppress it, what do you have?

Suzuki-roshi: Not-that is not sincerity, do you think?

Student J: I don't know. I get confused on things like sincerity and, you know, compassion.

Suzuki-roshi: Sincerity or compassion-if I say "sincerity" or "compassion," you-you may think that is very positive statement, but it is not actually so. Sincerity-just positive sincerity or, you know, positive compassion is not true compassion. You know, when you want to say to someone-sometime you will hate it if you are sincere. If you know what will it mean-what does it mean by some statement, you will be very careful. That is already negative. Even though you want-you want to eat more, sometime you-you will hesitate to eat, you know, as much as you want. Without this kind of attitude, you cannot live.

Positive one is not always positive in its true sense, you know. Which is stronger-stronger person: a man who beat you or a man who is beating-no-who is beat-beat-beat [laughs, laughter] [having trouble finding the correct word]-

Students: Beaten.

Suzuki-roshi: -beaten. Or beat.

Students: Being beaten.

Suzuki-roshi: Being beaten, yeah. Which is stronger? You should be-it is easy to beat someone, but it is not so easy to be beaten without any, you know-not much difficulty, or to bear from being-to be patient in being beaten [by] someone. Hai.

Student K: Is it ever all right to be positive? I mean, is it ever all right to say yes to your desires?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes? To say yes or-

Student K: Yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student K: Is it all the same-no one is supposed to have for, you know-supposed to [1 word unclear], or-I don't know.

Suzuki-roshi: No, I don't think so [laughs, laughter]. Those are, you know-actual experience will tell you, you know. But if we say "religion," you know, we-you think-will think religion will give you some, you know, advantage in taking some pleasure, or in having some excuse in doing some positive things always, that is not true.

Student K: It seems to me, though, that it is nothing wrong with enjoying eating or sex or sleeping-just in being attached-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah.

Student K: -and-and in wanting [it] when it's not there. So-so-I don't, you know-like-like if there's some way so that you can, you know, just really enjoy eating as long as the food is in front of you, and then-and then it's gone-not think about it?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student K: And then is it all right to say yes and eat?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. Yes, if it is so, it is all right. Nothing wrong with it. But it is not always so [laughs, laughter].

Student L: This teaching sounds as if we're supposed to fight with ourselves, from the time we're born to the time we die. I would like to get to the point where I wouldn't be continually fighting with myself.

Suzuki-roshi: Fighting. [Laughs.] That is your understanding-

Student L: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: -of your life, you know. That act- [partial word]-that is not actually fighting, you know-[rather, it is] developing your desires-how to develop your desires, you know. The understanding-different understanding of one practice. If you say you are fighting with your desires, it may be so [laughs]. I cannot deny the statement, "I am fighting with myself." But that is not, you know, perfect expression of our way.

Oh [probably sees the time]. [Laughs.] Let's, you know [laughs], study more about this. I-I am so glad if you are that you [are] concerned [about] my talk [laughs, laughter] so much. That is not my problem [laughs]-your problems are to be study more-not to, you know-problem of Buddhism or [laughs] buddhas or Zen.

Actually there is no rule, you know. There is rules, but the rules is not always observed in the same way [laughs]. Your practice mostly will be right when the practice is forced on you-mostly it is pure. But if you practice by your own choice, there are many danger of having some wrong element in it-in your motivation-motives. "I have to do it," you know, "because someone told me. As long as I am here in this monastery, I have to observe in this way. So I do it." This kind of practice will result in more-more, rather than you practice it by your own choice. This is very true. If you become more sincere about your practice, and if you become more conscientious about your practice, you will find it very true.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript originally transcribed by Brian Fikes and checked by Mel Weitsman. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (4/6/01).

[1] Sumi Togen, who succeeded Yamada Reirin as head (bishop) of the Soto Zen School in America in 1965. He was formerly an instructor of monks at Soji-ji.

[2] The Lotus Sutra, for example, refers to the "thirty-two marks and eighty subsidiary characteristics" by which a buddha is traditionally recognized.

[3] The Tripitaka, the Buddhist canon. In present usage, "baskets" is quite common.

[4] The Abhidharma-pitaka: Buddhist psychology and philosophy.

[5] The Sutra-pitaka: The discourses of Shakyamuni Buddha.

[6] The Vinaya-pitaka: Monastic regulations as well as a history of the Buddhist sangha.

2 - Things-As-It-Is

Friday, September 08, 1967

Things-As-It-Is

Tassajara

Tonight I want to give you a correct idea of Buddhism or Zen. In a word, Zen is the teaching or practice of seeing "things as it is" or accepting "things as it is" and of raising things as they go. This is the fundamental purpose of our practice and the meaning of Zen. But it is, actually, rather difficult to see "things as it is." You may say you are seeing "things as it is," but actually, you do not see "things as it is." I don't mean that it is a distortion of sight, such as when something of one shape looks shorter than something of another shape. I mean that, as soon as you see something, you already start to intellectualize it. As soon as you intellectualize something, it is already it is not just what you saw.

When I was young, I wanted to practice true practice, and I wanted to know what the way-seeking mind is in its true sense.[1] I thought that to do something good might be the way-seeking mind. So I got up very early, and washed the toilet and sink before the other students got up. I thought that would be a very good thing to do. But while I was doing this, I was afraid someone would see me. I wanted to do it just by myself without being noticed by anyone else. "If someone sees me, that will not be pure practice," I thought. But, before they saw me, I was already going wrong in my mind. I asked myself whether I liked doing it without being noticed by anyone, or whether I wanted it to be known by someone else. Why am I doing something like this? So, in a way, I couldn't accept my way-seeking mind. I was not so sure of the purity of my way-seeking mind.

When I saw a lamp lit in one room, of course, I hid myself. I thought that someone had gotten up already and might come down. It seemed as though I was at least trying to do something good with a pure mind, but that my mind was not so pure. My mind was wandering about. I couldn't make my mind sure, and I was at a loss for what to do. I suffered a little bit. And I thought, and thought, and thought about what I should do.

One day, when I was listening to a psychology lecture, the teacher said, "It is impossible to catch our mind exactly. It is especially impossible to know what we have done. The mind which acted some time ago, the mind which belongs to the past, is impossible to catch. And even the mind which is acting right now is impossible to catch, actually." So I thought, "no wonder it is so difficult for me to understand my mind." And I gave up trying to be sure of my way-seeking mind. Since then I have done things, without thinking, just because they were good. And, at the same time, whether or not people saw me was not my problem anymore.

So when you want to see, or be sure of, your mind, you cannot catch it. But when you just do something, and when your mind is just acting as it is, that is how you catch your mind in the true sense. Anyway, it is rather difficult to see "things as it is," because seeing "things as it is" is not just the activity of our sight or eyes. This is why we put emphasis on practice. To do something without thinking is the most important point in understanding ourselves. Since it is difficult to see "things as it is," we should practice our way.

People may say if the purpose of Zen is to see "things as it is," then there is no need to practice. That is the big problem. I think in your every day life, the root practice may be to raise flowers or to grow your garden. That is, I think, the best practice. You know, when you sow a seed, you have to wait for the seed to come up. And if it comes up, you have to take care of it. That is our practice. Just to sow a seed is not enough. To take care of it day after day is very important for the good gardener. When you build a house, your work is finished. If someone has written a book, that is enough. But for a gardener, it is necessary to take care of the garden every day. Even though you have finished making that garden, it is necessary to take care of it. So I think our way is nearly the same as making your own garden, or raising some vegetables or flowers.

Each seed, or each plant, has its own character and its own color. If it is a stone garden, each stone has its own character. A long stone has a solemn, profound feeling; a round one expresses perfection; a square one expresses some rigidness or feeling of austerity. If it has moss on it, it has some deep, profound, mystical spirit to it. Those are the characters of each material you use in your garden.

People may say, "Whatever we do, that is Zen," or, "I am seeing 'things as it is.'" They usually see things one by one, but that is not enough. You may say you see "things as it is," but you are just seeing each material and each material's character.

It is necessary for a gardener to make his garden beautiful. If possible, the gardener should express some meaning, or some particular beauty, according to what has been ordered. If someone wants him to build a calm garden, he must make the garden accordingly. If he wants a solemn or austere feeling, he makes the garden austere. He has to choose the material and make it more austere by contrast, or by association, or by harmony.

There should be some rules. The way to create harmony is have a rule. We have many colors, and two colors may clash, or may be in harmony, or may be in contrast. If you arrange the six colors in order, starting from red, and going to orange, yellow, green, blue, and violet, that is the color order. But if you use red and yellow together, that is harmony. And if you use red and green, that is contrast. By using those rules, you will accomplish your purpose, and you will have a beautiful garden.

So just living however you like is not the way to live. If you want to live, you should follow some rules. If there is a sharp, straight, narrow stone, it expresses some mystical feeling. If the stone is this way [presumably making a shape with his hands], it expresses calmness or peacefulness. And these two shapes are in contrast. But a round stone will be harmonious with every stone. It goes perfectly with any kind of form. A stone which has a wide base expresses a stable feeling. This stone is in contrast with a massive stone, and a long, upright stone and a massive stone are in order. You cannot make a beautiful garden if you just arrange the stones in order. So you should also use some stones which are in contrast with the other stones you're using. There must be some rules.

So, if you want to live, in the true sense of the word, in relationship with others, and in relationship with the "you" which has been living in the past, and which will live tomorrow, there must be some rules. Although it looks like there are no rules, actually there are strict rules. To live day by day, in the true sense, means to live by some perfect rules. This point is also emphasized in Zen. Zen is not just personal practice, and our enlightenment is not just personal attainment. When we attain enlightenment, everything should be enlightened. That is the rule of enlightenment. When we find our position in this moment, we say we attain enlightenment. And when we live with other beings, we say we attain enlightenment.

So if you think enlightenment is just a personal experience, this idea of enlightenment is like collecting only square stones or only round stones. If someone likes beautiful stones, in which you can see something blue and something white, if that is his enlightenment, he will keep collecting the same stones. But with so many of the same stones, you cannot build an interesting garden. You should use various stones. Enlightenment is the same. If you attach to some particular enlightenment, that is not true enlightenment. You should have various enlightenments. And you should experience various experiences, and you should put more emphasis on relationships between one person and another. In this way, we should practice back and forth, according to the position in which we find ourselves.

This is the outline of our practice and how you attain it. If enlightenment is just collecting, or just being proud of a kind of experience, that kind of experience will not help you at all. And if that were enlightenment, there would have been no need for Buddha to strive hard to save people after he attained enlightenment. What is the purpose of wandering about the dusty road of illusion? If attaining enlightenment is the purpose of zazen, why did Bodhidharma come to China from India and sit for nine years on Shaolin Mountain? The point is to find our position moment after moment, and to live with people moment after moment according to the place. That is the purpose of our practice.

I wonder if I was able to express myself, and if you understood what I said. But I think we have some more time. Will you ask me questions?

Student A: Can you put too many stones in your garden?

Suzuki-roshi: We should forget them, one after another. At the same time, it may be better to give them away after we enjoy them.

Q: Could you please try to summarize, again, the idea of the true teaching?

Suzuki-roshi: Samurai?

Q: No, summarize.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, summarize. Zen?

Q: No, just the point you were making tonight. About the true teaching.

Suzuki-roshi: The true teaching is to accept "things as it is" and to raise it, or to let it grow, as it goes. I understand the purpose of our practice in this way. We do it by living on each moment in the right position, by giving things some nourishment, day by day, when they want it. And to understand what they want, you should be able to talk with them. That is Zen. Did you understand?

Q: Thank you, I think I understand now.

Suzuki-roshi: I should not talk too much. I should summarize. All right?

Q: Thank you.

Suzuki-roshi: And at the same time, I wanted to correct the misunderstanding of Zen. Just doing whatever you like is not Zen, and is not Buddhism. We call it jinen ken gedo.[2] Jinen ken gedo means the view of life of naturalism, such as Rousseau had.

Q: You said that after you plant the seed, then you have to wait for the seed to come up. Does the gardener do anything while the seed is coming up but before it sprouts?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, the gardener gives it some water and works it every day. He or she is very busy, day by day.

Q: Should the gardener build his garden the way he wants it, or the way other people would like it to be built?

Suzuki-roshi: Some gardeners should build according to what has been ordered. But he may build a garden just for himself.

Q: Why did you choose a garden as an example?

Suzuki-roshi: Because I like them; I understand them.

Q: What happens if you don't follow the rules of order?

Suzuki-roshi: Actually, it is not possible to not follow order or rules. But if you do not know how to follow the order, you will not be successful in your work--you cannot do anything, actually. It will be a waste of labor and time. The more you work on it, the more you will have intuition to help you follow the rules. Actually, it is not possible for us not to follow any rules. Even though you may look like you're not following any rules, in fact, you are following rules.

Q: You said that even though it doesn't look like it, we're always following rules whether we know it or not. Through practice, do we get to a point where we can pick which rules we are following more than we can now?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. That is practice, you know. So that is why we should practice our way back and forth. My practice should not be just giving lectures to you. I should sometimes listen to you. We have to change our position in our practice. That is very important.

Q: If a lot of insects come in and start eating up the garden, or if there's a hailstorm or a frost, what do you do then?

Suzuki-roshi: There it is necessary for you to follow some rules. And you should have some purpose. We say gan [pranidhana, vows to some particular end]. Gan means to have some purpose. For Buddhists, to save all sentient beings, even though it is not possible to save them all, is our final desire. Our effort should be pointed in that direction. So if the purpose of growing your garden is to help hungry people, you should protect the plants from hail and insects.

There should be some purpose, or else we cannot live. To live means to have some purpose. And that purpose sometimes is not complete, or not wide enough. Everyone works for someone. Even a thief will be kind to his wife, or at least to himself. But he is not kind enough to his neighbors. That is why he steals things from them. So we should have some ultimate desire for which we strive.

We say, "Even though the truth is incomprehensible, we have to study it completely." That is not possible, you know. One after another, we'll find some new theories, or new truths, even in science or physics. So it is not possible to reach the final, ultimate truth. Even so, we continue our effort. Even though being friendly with each other will not be possible, we should strive to be friendly with each other. Even though our evil desires are limit less, even though, one after another, we have evil desires, we should strive for realization from them.

Those are a Buddhist's ultimate desires. Before you practice our way, knowing this truth, knowing reality, whatever you see looks absurd. But once you start something with those four noble desires, you will understand that everyth ing is practicing our way. Even insects, and animals, and gophers are one, are striving to attain our way.

-----

[Transcribed by Brian Fikes and Katherine Thanas, edited by Brian Fikes.]

Formatted 8/28/00. Revised slightly 11/14/00.

[1] Suzuki-roshi also tells this story in SR-69-09-00.B.

[2] jinen = spontaneity; ken = darsana, drsti, view; gedo = non-Buddhist religion or philosophy.

1967 december (10)

1 - Afternoon Sesshin Lecture

Friday, December 01, 1967

Afternoon Sesshin Lecture
Zen Mountain Center

In this sesshin, as I said this morning, our practice will be concentrated on putting power in your hara[1]or tanden.[2] This is not just a technique of practice, but the underlying idea is very deep. Our practice-zazen practice should not be compared with any other practice or training. It does not mean, even [if] I say so, Zen is something special or Zen is superior to any other teaching. But there is a reason why we should not compare our practice to other-many kinds of practice.

As Dogen-zenji said, in his Fukan Zazen-gi-Recommendng Zen Practice to Every One of Us-Fukan Zazen-gi-he recommends this practice [to] every one of us. And he said, first of all, whatever you do, that is zazen. There is not something-some special training or some special way of practice.

Whatever you do, it is Zen, actually. At least when you are doing, that is Zen. But your understanding of your everyday activity is not right because of misunderstanding your practice or misunderstanding or discrimination of the practice or attachment to your activity. Your activity is not Zen any more to you [laughs]-only to you [laughs]. But actually it is Zen. Whatever you do, that is Zen.

But for you, only for you who do something for others or for yourself, is not Zen because of your-because you spoil your practice with your attachment, with your dualistic idea, with your discrimination, by comparing your practice to some other practice which you do or which someone else will do.

But when you practice, when you do something, at least at that time that is Zen practice. So actually, as he [Dogen] said, there is no particular enlightenment you will attain by means of some practice, because whatever you do, that is zazen. If so, you know, the mean[s] to attain enlightenment is also true practice.

So we should know why we spoil our practice, and we should know how we-how we are able to practice our way without spoiling it. So, as he says, verbal interpretation of zazen or any kind of teaching-written teaching by means of those literature or talk or instruction-only by means of those instructions you cannot attain enlightenment. Only way is to practice your way without spoiling it.

You may think my talk-if I talk in this way, there is no connection between the instruction I gave you this morning, but actually how we-you practice this kind of practice is quite simple: to put your strength or power in your tummy, because actually if you have enough strength in your tanden, you will have big broad mind in which you can accept things. Whatever it is, you can accept things. And your mind is so broad and so big-great that nothing can increase it, or nothing can disturb it.

If it is, you know, small-if it is the water in the cup [?], you can disturb it. But if it is ocean you cannot disturb it, even though you throw stone in it. It doesn't make any sound. When you see the-even the Pacific Ocean above the sky on the airplane, it is just, you know, calm water. You cannot do anything with it. This kind of mind you will have if you put strength in your tummy. That [laughs] is why I advise you to, you know, put strength in your tummy or tanden.

When you have some pain in your legs, you will wonder what will happen to you if you sit more-ten minutes more, or twenty minutes more. You will wonder what will happen to you. Nothing will happen [laughs]. Because you limit your mind, you know, the pain will do something with your practice. But if you have big, great power in your tummy, nothing can do with it [laughs]. And nothing will happen to you.

Some people who sit for the first time in the calm place, I think you will- he will be afraid of the calmness of the sitting [laughs]. Your mind is so calm and surrounding is so calm. The experience you have is quite unusual experience you have-you have had, so someone will become afraid of it. But nothing will happen.

Originally, even [though] we die in our practice [laughs], we are going [to] our original home [laughs]. After death, where you will go? You will return to your home from where you come out [laughing]. That's all. Nothing will happen to you. That's all right. Quite all right.

But why you become afraid of it is because you do not possess the big mind. Even though you become afraid of it, nothing will happen to you [laughing]. You will become afraid of it just for [?]- You know, everything will laugh at you [it?]. "Why you are afraid of it? Why you- why you think you have gone? You are there, right here." Everyone may say, you know, at-for a time [laughs]-they will say, "Oh, I am sorry. [Laughs.]" But that's all [?].

Nothing will happen. Even though-even if you are a great hero, after you pass away, nothing will happen. You may think, "After my death, what will happen to this world?" [Laughing.] But nothing will happen to this world. The sun rise from the east and set in east-west. Nothing will happen. Even though, you know, our earth is gone by atomic bomb, nothing will happen [laughs]. Nothing whatsoever happen to this cosmic scale.

If I say so, my talk is nothing to do with our practice, or with our life, you may say. But it is not so. Because you do not possess this kind of big mind, whatever you do, the activity do not make any sense. If you want to do something-something pure and great, you should fix your mind-unperturbable mind which does not move back and forth, or right or left, or successful or unsuccessful. Only with this conviction you can do something in its true sense.

So we say we practice our way not for ourselves or not for others. Our [we] practice our way for sake of the way. There is no other reason why we practice our way. We just want to go back to our home like a dragon will resume in its activity in water, like a tiger who came back and lie down in his own den.[3] With this idea we practice our way. And as we do something, we do it just for sake of the activity, without any gaining idea, or without limiting the meaning of the activity. This is why we practice zazen. To think about what is zazen is already blasphemous. If you j- [partial word]-the only way is just to sit. So if it is so, there is no other way to understand what is zazen than just to sit.

When you read something, you read something. But that is-that kind of activity which you do with some plan or idea cannot be compared with the true practice of zazen. The true meaning or reason why you practice was lost because, you know, zazen practice give you various advantage or power to you. If you practice our way, you will become more and more-you will-your mind will become calm, and you will become healthy. So for that reason, they practiced-many people are practicing zazen. But that is not [laughs], you know, true zazen. The form they take is zazen, but the way they practice or reason why they practice is not right. But if you know this point, you can practice our way with various idea too. But this point should not be forgotten, because it means you started to wandering about, you know-going round and round [laughs], seeking for something. Because you do not know the meaning of everyday activity, so you start to seeking for something better. And you are going round and round, same place, seeking for something special.

Here is the translation of Fukan Zazen-gi.[4] Dogen-zenji worked on [it] for twenty years after-right after he came back from China. He wrote this Fukan Zazen-gi: Recommending the Rules for Sitting.

The true way is universal, so why are training and enlightenment different? The supreme teaching is everywhere, so why study the means to get it? Even truth as a whole is clearly apart from the dust. Why adhere to the means of wiping away? The truth is not apart from here, so the means of training are useless.

But if there is even a slightest gap between, separation is as heaven and earth. (The separation is as far as heaven and earth, it means.) If the opposite arise-(dualistic idea arise)-if the opposites arise, you lose the buddha-mind. Even though you are proud of your understanding and have enough enlightenment, even though you gain some wisdom and supernatural power, and find the way, and illuminate your mind, even though you have power to touch heavens, even though you enter into the area of enlightenment, you have almost lost the living way to salvation-living way to enlightenment.

Look at the Buddha. Though born with great wisdom, he had to sit for six years. Look at Buddha-Bodhidharma, who transmitted the buddha-mind. We can still hear the echo of his nine-year wall-gazing. We can still hear the echo of his nine-years' wall-gazing sitting. (Wall-gazing means "sitting," so it may be easier to understand to say "sitting.") We can still hear echoes of his nine-years' wall-gazing sitting. The old sages were very diligent. There is no reason why modern man cannot understand.

You should quite-you should quit follow words and letters. You should withdraw and reflect on yourself. If you can cast off body and mind naturally the buddha-mind emerges. If you wish to gain quickly, you must start quickly.

This is the translation of the-his work who-he polished up, spending for it twenty years. And we can see his handwriting of this Fukan Zazen-gi-the one who [he] wrote when he was twenty-eight. To-to us it looks like almost same, but he changed, you know, many times. Although there were not-not much to change, but he was trying to improve it, and he polished it.[5]

And this kind of-and his intention to write this Fukan Zazen-gi was to transmit true way of practice for his descendant. So he had big responsibility for his descendant and for his former patriarchs. So he studied and studied, even after he attained enlightenment. That is why the echo of this-his work is heard by everyone.

So you should not think you are sitting in the bottom of the valley of Tassajara [laughs] for seven days. How do you feel, you know, for an instance, if you came out-if you are told to quit your sitting and climb up to the top of the mountain to see something from there? What kind of feeling do you have [laughs]? And this morning Ed [Brown] made a very delicious cake [laughs]. When you eat it, what kind of feeling did you have [laughs]?

Some people, you know, may be envious of bird or cats or dogs who enjoy the warm winter sunshine [laughing] near hot spring. But "return to the nature" in its true sense does not mean to be like animal or bird. If you climb up on the top of the mountain, or, you know, if you come from Jamesburg,[6] perhaps the place you like best will be when you see some of Tassajara Mountain. If it is April it is-they are covered with white snow.

If you want to go back to the nature, you should go back to the rocks on the top of the mountain [laughs]. That is much better than to be a bird, or cat, or even a lion. Be a rock. And sit forever, without being moved by rain, or snow, or storm. But weathered by rain and snow, rocks will tell us many stories. You may say that is just a rock. But buddha-nature, in its truest sense, reveal itself on weathered ancient rocks on the top of the mountain.

The reason why we wanted to practice zazen, putting strength in our tanden, is to realize what is true practice and what is not.

[Suzuki-roshi resumes Dogen-zenji's Fukan Zazen-gi:]

And even though you enter into the area of enlightenment, you have almost lost the living way to salvation.

Look at the Buddha. Though born with great wisdom, he had to sit for six years. Look at Bodhidharma, who transmitted the buddha-mind. We can still hear the echo of his nine-year wall-gazing practice. The old sages are very diligent. There is no reason why modern man cannot understand it.

You should quit following words and letters. You should withdraw and reflect on yourself. ("Withdraw" means to change the direction of the effort-not outward but inward.) You should with-withdraw and reflect on yourself. If you can cast off body and mind naturally the buddha-mind emerges-emerges. If you wish to gain quickly, you must start quickly.

And he explains carefully how to sit.

In meditation, you should have a quiet room. You should eat and drink in moderation. You should forsake myriad relation-abstain relations-abstain from everything. Do not think of good and evil. Do not think of right and wrong. Stop the function of mind, of will, of consciousness. Keep from meaning, memory, perception, insight. Do not strive to become the Buddha. Do not cling to sit or lying down.

In the sitting place, spread a thick square cushion, and on top of it put a round cushion. Some meditate in paryankam(sitting cross-leg), and others in half-paryankam(half-lotus).[7] You must prepare by wearing your robe and belt loosely-wearing-by wearing your robe and belt loosely.

Then rest your right hand on your left foot, your left hand in your right palm. Press your thumb together. Sit upright. Do not lean to the left or right, forward or backward. Place your ears in the same plane as your shoulders, your nose in line with your navel. Keep your tongue against the plate and close your lip and teeth firmly. Keep your eyes open. Inhale quietly.

Settle your body comfortably. Exhale sharply-exhale sharp-sharp-exhale-(mmm[8]-not "sharply," but-I don't know what to say). Exhale sharply. Move your body to the left and right. Then sit cross-legged, steady.

"Think the unthinkable."

"How do you think the unthinkable?"

"Think beyond thinking and unthinking."[9]

This is the important phase of cross-legs sitting.

"Think the unthinkable." Think unthinkable, you know-think unthinkable means think, you know-think not about something, you know. Usually when you think, you think about something. But thinking mind-if your thinking mind [is] directed [in the] opposite way, that is to think unthinkable. Your mind is still clear, but there is no object. The sun is not, you know, shining. Only the earth, you know. The earth-if the earth is happen to be here, the sun will [laughs] shine on-on our earth. Think unthinkable, you know, is-you mind is-must be like the sun. It is shining, but it is not shining [on] some particular thing. It is more than think about it [?]-something. In this way, your mind-your function of mind picked in your practice.

So he says: "Think unthinkable." "How do you think the unthinkable?" "How do you think the unthinkable?" This is very interesting word. "How do you think the unthinkable?" The sun is not shining [on] some particular thing. So the sun is just the sun. It is not trying to shine [on] anything. It is right there, just there. But [if] someone happen to appear near the sun, it will shine [on] some object [laughs]. That is, you know, how the sun shines [on] everything.

So how-how do you think the unthinkable? [Laughs.] There is no way how-how-is no way, because we don't know how [laughs]. You know, how. So there you can put anything, you know. How. "This way is how." "That way is how." "The all the way is how." "This is how." "This is how." [Laughs.] It is like a "what." Cat is what? Dog is what? What is there?"-you-you ask people. But what, you know? What may be a mouse, a cat, a dog. So how or what means-what it means is very deep.

"How do you think the unthinkable?"

This is not just, you know, question. It is [laughs] a strong statement. How do you think the unthinkable? This is not an interrogative. It is strong affirmative sentence. How do you think the unthinkable? Unthinkable thinking is how.

In what way you think? That is how. That is the unthinkable. But you have no notion of thinking about anything. That is our practice: How do you think the unthinkable? Think beyond thinking and unthinking. Think beyond thinking and unthinking. Your thinking should be beyond "I think" or "I don't think." It must be right there always.

This is the important phase of cross-leg sitting.

We sit in this way. This is how different it is-our practice. That is why we should practice zazen, and you should not neglect our zazen because you think something else is more important. Why something is important for you is because of this practice. So if you forget all about the practice, you lose your life. Whatever you do, it doesn't work. If you insist it works, you lose yourself. You are no more. You vanish [laughs] from this world.

If the earth say, "I don't want the sun," [laughs] what will happen to it? There is no other way to vanish from the cosmic world. Because- because of this unthinkable thinking, we exist. We can think. We can live. Without this unthinkable, we cannot think. It change into delusion. If you insist on it, you-it means you are involved in dark, big, delusion.

Thank you very much.

---

---

Source: City Center transcript originally recorded by Brian Fikes. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. The segment beginning with the latter part of Fukan Zazen-gi (p. 5 onward) to the end of the lecture was transferred from SR-67-12-02, where it had been incorrectly entered. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (3/28/01).

[1] hara: region of the body below the navel, regarded as the physical core or center of one's being. It is equivalent to tanden.

[2] tanden: abdomen or hara.

[3] An allusion to a line from Fukan Zazen-gi: "To grasp this meaning is to be like a dragon that has found water, or like a tiger in its mountain stronghold."

[4] This translation of Fukan Zazen-gi is based on Reiho Masunaga's (The Soto Approach to Zen, 1958, pp. 101-102). Suzuki-roshi modified certain phrases as he read it aloud. Comments in parentheses are by Suzuki-roshi.

[5] At least two versions of Fukan Zazen-gi are known: (1) the original edition written by Dogen-zenji's own hand in 1227, shortly after returning from China, and (2) the revised popular edition completed years later. Suzuki-roshi was translating the revised popular edition.

[6] The small town nearest to Tassajara.

[7] From paryankam(Sanskrit): seat.

[8] Suzuki-roshi was not satisfied with "sharply." "Completely" was used in another translation (Nishijima and Cross, "Fukan Zazengi," in Shobogenzo, 1994, Vol. 1, p. 281).

[9] These three sentences are in quotation marks here because Dogen-zenji is quoting from an exchange between Yakusan Igen and an unnamed monk (in, e.g., Shobogenzo "Zazenshin").

2 - Evening Sesshin Lecture

Friday, December 01, 1967

Evening Sesshin Lecture
Zen Mountain Center

This afternoon, in my lecture[1] I told you why we should practice zazen and what is our practice. After all, our practice is quite different from other activity we have in everyday life. Of course, according to some schedule, we practice zazen at certain time every day. So you may think now it is time to have to have meal, and it is time to recite sutra, and it is time to sit. So you think there is not much difference between zazen practice and other activities we have.

Actually if you understand the true meaning of zazen, there is no difference. Whatever you do, that is zazen practice. As long as we have innate buddha-nature, what we do is expression of our true nature. And if it is so, whatever we do that is practice-true practice.

But usually, because we do something with some aim and we want to do something [in a] more perfect way, sometime you do not-you are not satisfied with what you do, and sometime you will be pleased with what you did. When this kind of discrimination happens, that activity is not anymore true activity-at least your understanding of the activity you have done is not true activity itself. It is already a dead idea within your mind. And actual limitless activity is no more. So if you think zazen practice will be the same as our usual practice, there there is big misunderstanding.

Zazen practice is fundamental practice which you should always-you should not always lose. We say, "Because of our practice the mountain is high. Because of our practice, the sea is deep. Because of practice, bird flies. Because of practice, fish swims." It is actually so, but fish do not know where he is. We do not know where we are. We are in the air, but we do not aware of where we are because we do not feel anything in the air. So you do not feel anything. But without air, we cannot live.

Whatever you do, that is actually our true practice. But you are pleased with the limited pleasure of the practice, and you do not know the boundless meaning of our everyday life. And we always complain with what you have to do, or with what you have done, or what you should do. So you are always forced [into] something in your every day life. You feel as if you are living in some certain framework. If you come to Tassajara, you should observe our way. But when you are-you do not realize the true meaning of your life, a rule is just a kind of framework in which you are put.

But-so you think zazen is the same-a kind of rules you have to do. But if you realize what is our true practice, you will have no more this kind of mixed-up idea. In its true sense, zazen should not be practiced because zazen gives you some advantage in your life, or zazen should not be dismissed because of its hardship of practice. Why we practice zazen is just because we always spoil our life and spoil our practice-true practice in our everyday life. So our effort is directed to the-to the opposite way. We do not practice our way to attain something, but we practice zazen to be free from a dualistic gaining idea.

So far is what I said this morning in my lecture, and I recited Fukun Zazen-gi. And it is too dark, or even [if] I have glasses I cannot read this print. So I will not read it, but usually in evening zazen, we recite this Fukan Zazen-gi every night. If you read it over and over, you will realize the true meaning of it.

And in last sesshin, do you remember, I talked about Zuigan's[2] calling his-name of his own master-his master, or-and I interpreted [that] Zuigan is calling his own name because it is the same.[3] This shift of understanding is possible because our everyday life-there is no difference between our everyday life and our true practice. When we [are] satisfied with our practice, with our everyday life, if we have always gratitude of carrying on our life, that is true practice. To have gratitude or to enjoy our life does not mean to have some special feeling in our life, or special enjoyment, or special gratitude. By "gratitude" or "enjoyment," we mean something deeper than that: gratitude before we have gratitude, enjoyment before we enjoy it.

Usually when-when you say, "I enjoyed very much," you say after you enjoyed it [laughs]. So it is too late to say that [laughs]. When you are actually, you know, enjoying it, you have no words. You have no feeling whatsoever. You don't know what you are [laughs] doing. Later, you may say, it was very good [laughs]. "This sesshin was very good" [laughs]. But when you are, you know, practicing [laughs] it-what you will say [laughs], you know? You didn't enjoy it all the time [laughs]. But later you say, "It was very good." [Laughs.] So someone may think it was not so good [laughs]. Which is good? Which is right? Maybe both is right, or both is wrong [laughs].

So if you want to know what is zazen, you must practice it. Even though you ask someone what is zazen, he will not give you right idea of right practice. Even though he say something about it-if he could say something about it, you wouldn't be able to understand it by words. To have direct experience of it is the only way to know what is zazen.

So to participate with practice, or with the great activity is the only way to be familiar with it. So in this sense, whatever you do, if you do not mixed up understanding in this area, that is true understanding. So in this sense-before, I say zazen is quite different practice from other activities. But now I can say zazen is not different from the other activities we have. Only because your understanding is mixed up, I should say zazen is quite different practice from other practice.

But for many hundreds of years before Dogen-zenji, this point was not so clear. In Buddhism or in Zen, there were many schools-five or seven. And each school, including Soto, [was] supposed to be the best, you know, school of all the schools of Zen. They say, you know, "Best school." But to say "best school" is to put limitation [laughs] to their own way [laughs]. If it is really best school, there is no need to say so. So in this sense, each school will be the best one for him. So it is silly to say, "This is best school," or "This tradition or lineage is the right one." This kind of silly understanding sneaked into our zazen practice. And when we realize what is zazen, what we have been practice-we had been practice was not right-was not zazen anymore. We call it "fox zazen."

Do you know-in Japan, fox is something [laughing] to disguise or to change into or to fool people in disguise of a woman, you know. He will appear in beautiful dress with white-with white face and skin. For Japanese, white means something beautiful: white skin, white face. So that is why we use a powder on our face. And fox, you know, change into a beautiful lady, and he may-he fools us. And then become a fox that, you know-he thinks this is zazen, but the way he appears is not zazen anymore. A fox try too much. Fox change into something else. If you try too much, you know-if you try to understand what is zazen too much, your zazen will change into something else. So, you know-if-when you just practice it, that is true zazen.

In this way, if you observe your way-whatever it is, zazen practice, eating meals, or taking bath-whatever you do, that is true practice. Although it may be difficult to understand if I say, you do not take your bath because you are dirty. You do not wash your face because your face is dirty. We say, what it means is your practice of-your everyday activity should not be involved in too-too much in some restrictive idea. You should obtain freedom in your way. And you should realize limitless meaning of our activity. You should not be-you should not over-value-or what do you say?-or you should not evaluate too much or too less.

So to do something with-with right feeling is the purpose of practice. You will see someone who do things in quite appropriate way with, you know, with very harmonious feeling. Even though he is, you know, practicing something very rigidly, if someone else imitate his practice, it be-it will be extremely rigid way. But for him it is quite natural. I know some Zen master who had this kind of feeling. When we-when I would go with him to the bath, you know, he sit-he never sit [in] the middle of the bath-bathtub. He just sit in some corner-not corner, but some appropriate place. And after taking bath, he may arrange everything which other students misplaced, you know-the wooden-this is-I cannot pronounce this [laughs] word-wooden bar?

You know, wooden-

Student: Brush? Okay.

Suzuki-roshi: Okay [laughs]. Okay. He put-you know, arrange everything quite naturally, you know. So he do it so naturally that no one notice it, and it doesn't-he doesn't bother anyone. And way he talk, way he eat-this is very harmonious with other people, and yet very-very beautiful anyway. This kind of, you know, activity is, I think, well-trained Zen monk's activity. It may take pretty long time before one can act in that way.

So he himself does not know what he is doing. If he is aware of his practice, you know, naturally, we will be bothered by his being with us [laughs]. "Oh!" Here he came, and, you know, you may not like him at all. It is not just because of training, but because of his liberation from the idea of good or bad. I cannot express. This is so subtle activity that- and I cannot behave like that, you know. If I work, you know, I stay work so long [laughs], and I shall not be in time for service [laughs] [1-2 words] sometime. This is very bad. When we, you know, stop working, we should stop working. We should not be too enthusiastic, you know. Because I am caught by some-something in your work, I lose the complete freedom from the work. Without much zeal in your practice, to practice it quite naturally in appropriate way, without trying being- without trying to be appropriate, is the way it should be.

But if you do not know the point of the practice, even though you have good Zen master, you cannot study Zen because you cannot appreciate the true activity. If you know why you should practice zazen and what is zazen, you will find out the way we should be: how to achieve something without not much effort. So we say, "To go eastward one mile is to go to westward one mile." Even though you make great effort, you cannot go back to one mile. You cannot step forward-you cannot go forward one mile-always equal. The power to pull is the power to push. There is no power just to pull or just to push. So that you can go one mile means that you can go one mile backward. So in your everyday life, if you want to go one mile, you should practice zazen and go back to one mile. So without practicing zazen [laughs], just to make your effort means nothing. You think you did something, but actually you didn't [do] anything. It is nothing to do with the rest of the people. "He himself thinks I did, but [laughs] actually it is not so."

So we should make hidden effort-secret effort. Not secret, but effort which is not-which cannot be found by anyone. This kind of effort is true zazen.

I think you-I hope you [laughs] have understood what I said. But if you don't, you should think more.

---

Source: Original City Center tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (3/31/01).

[1] SR-67-12-01-A.

[2] Juiyen Shihyen (Jap. Zuigan Shigen): n.d. Ninth-century Chan master who appears in Case 12 of the Mumonkon (Gateless Gate) koan collection, "Zuigan Calls His Master."

[3] Mumonkon, Case 12: "Zuigan Gen Osho called to himself every day, 'Master!' and answered, 'Yes, sir!' Then he would say, 'Be wide awake!' and answer, 'Yes, sir!' 'Henceforward, never be deceived by others!' 'No, I won't!'" (K. Sekida, Two Zen Classics, p. 53). (See also SR-67-12-02.)

3 - Afternoon Sesshin Lecture

Saturday, December 02, 1967

Afternoon Sesshin Lecture
Tassajara

Our inner power of practice will appear according to the situation and accor- [partial word]-will respond to the situation you have like a bell. If you hit strong, the sound will be strong. If you hit it soft, the sound will be soft. But our true nature or-or true power does not make sound, but actually whatever you do, the power is there-should be there. In this way, we should understand our Zen practice power.

It is not something to acquire, or it is-but it is something to appreciate. When you sit so-just to sit [is] to be ready to [for] various activity or stimulation from-which will come from outside. But if your mind is caught by something you will lose your true mind. So without being caught by anything-just to sit without thinking-even thinking is our true practice.

In last lecture, I told you [about] this power from the opposite side. Zuigan called the names of his both: [1] "This is," you know. But if you call by your own name, that is opposite side. The power itself is-is not something you can catch or you can understand. If something happens, you will find out the power is there. But when you sit in this way, you have no idea of power. You are just sitting, that's all. But if you do something, the power is there. So in various activity, the power is there. So to call his [him?] both is to call his name as a power-a hidden power. And to call his own name means to realize his power when you do something. But actually this is two side of the one coin.

Here we understand how to apply our practice in our everyday life, how to understand your everyday life, and how to understand your true practice. So true practice is-should be everyday life. And everyday life should be the true practice. And when you practice true practice of-every-your everyday life should be there. This is how we understand our everyday life and how we understand our pure practice.

Last training period, when Bishop Sumi[2] came, he gave us-not koan but story: the question and answer between Baso and Hyakujo.[3] As you know, Baso, the Horsemaster [laughs]-Horsemaster, you know, he- we are told that when he speaks, his tongue reach through his nose [laughs], with big mouth and big-a man of big physique. So that is why we call him Horsemaster [laughs]: Baso, [who was] Nanagaku's[4] disciple and the Sixth Patriarch's grandson. Hyakujo is the famous Zen master who set up all the monastic life, you know-monastic rules.[5] He is the first one who set up precepts-our Mahayana precepts in its true sense. Before Hyakujo, almost all the Zen masters lived in precepts temples and observed Chin- [partial word]-Indian precepts. But it is not appropriate to observe Chinese people-Chinese village [?] who live in China where the climate is different and way of life different from India. But even though teaching changed, you know, into Mahayana, but precepts did not-they didn't change precepts, which he-they should-they should do-they should change. But Hyakujo did it and organized a monastic life. Since then we observe our precepts. Of course after Hyakujo, we changed many times-we changed our precepts many times. Precepts is the way of life.

Hyakujo-between-question and answer between Hyakujo and Horsemaster:

Horsemaster and Hyakujo were making trip. Suddenly wild geese flew over, and Baso asked Hyakujo, "What is it? [Laughs.] What is it?"

Baso-no, Hyakujo said, "That is wild geese."

And Baso said, "Where are they going?"

"They flew away," Hyakujo said.

But Baso [was] irritated, you know, with his answer and twitched his nose [laughs, laughter].

And Hyakujo cried [out?], you know. [Laughs.]

That is the story [laughs, laughter].

Here is, you know, something which we should understand. At first what did he say-what did Horsemaster say? "What is it? What is it?" This is very tricky question. "What is it?" [Laughs.] It may be, you know, wild geese. And, at the same time, it is not just wild geese. When we see something, our power of practice should follow, or buddha-nature should follow. So [laughs] wild geese is not just wild geese. For the Zen student, wild geese is not wild geese. Hyakujo is not just Hyakujo, and Baso Horsemaster too. He is also, you know, buddha-nature itself.

So,"What is it?"

That "what" can be everything. "What is it?" It is not just wild geese. Everything can be wild geese. I don't know whether Hyakujo knew it when he said, "That is wild geese."

And Baso said: "Where are they going?"

[Laughs.] Where are they going? Where are they going? They are going somewhere, you know. Even though they are going somewhere, they are there. They cannot escape from the buddha-nature, from our power of practice. Wherever they go, they are right here, with us. [Laughs.]

Hyakujo said: "They fled-flew away!"

[Laughs.] This is rather-may be careless answer, maybe [laughs, laughter]. "Flew away." So he hit right here [demonstrates, laughs]-hit on that person-twitched his nose. Did it flew away? [Laughs, laughter.] Here there are many wild geese on your nose [laughs, laughter].

You know, if he is practicing always, if there is no gap, you know, in his practice, they-he wouldn't say, "They flew away." [Laughs.] But will you say it if you are, you know, Hyakujo? Even though you say, "They flew away," that's right answer, you know. "Flew a- [partial word]-flew away," actually it-they are not here anymore.

But if you are prepared for his-for his teacher's twitching his nose, it was all right. [Laughs.] But in his practice there were some gap. So he cried [out]. But the way he cried-I don't know how he cried [laughs]. The way he crowd-cried is good-it is all right, even though he cried.

So this kind of koan is very interesting. If you study this koan from various angle, you will appreciate the endless-limitless meaning in it. Our way of life should be like this. And even between great Zen master and great disciple, the way we talk will not be different from a usual person. But the difference is whether they are ready for various circumstances and condition.

Even a great Zen master, when he cries-when he should cry, he may cry. When he should laugh, he will laugh. When everyone is hungry, he will be hungry too. But there is-there should be-there is some difference [between] their hunger and hunger of usual person. If your practice is right, you will be ready for various activity. So what will-will you will gain by-what-the power we will gain by our practice is not common power. It is some special power. By "special" I mean-because it is special-it is special because it can be everything.

Usually a special power is something different from usual power, which cannot be usual. We are always up to, you know, trying to get something usual-unusual. You know, even though-even though they say "this is unusual," for us Zen student it is not unusual. Only unusual thing is the thing which can be every-everything, like, you know, money or gold. You know [laughs], you can buy everything with that. Maybe like salt, you know: Whatever you eat, there is some amount of salt [laughs], you know. In this way our power is something like this, figuratively speaking. But gold or salt is not actually the power of me-me. Something you cannot understand what is it-what it is. Something which is beyond our understanding. Something which you cannot put it in words. So we say: "teaching out of letters"-teaching which will be understood if we have ear to listen to it, eyes to see it. But if we do not have eyes to see it, we cannot see it. That is the teaching out of letters.

If you try to-it is like, as Dogen-zenji said in his poem, it is like a letters. It can be a letter-letters written on high rock-high rugged rock on the seashore. Even the-even in stone, no waves can reach. Even though you try to see it, you cannot see it because it is too high. The only way-but the high rock on the rugged seashore is always there, giving various teaching to us. This kind of teaching is true teaching. And this kind of-our practice should be like this. We should, through our practice, always expressing the truth. This kind of tru- [partial word]-practice is our practice.

This introduction to this talk[6]-to this subject between Baso and Hyakujo:

[INTERPRETATION OF THE INTRODUCTION]

Enjo[7] introduced the subject and said: "What is called the substance of the universe-substance of the universe, or the great dao, is not something which exists outside of the universe. It is omnipresent and not contained in one part only. Its total activity is entirely independent.

"An enlightened Zen scholar is one who understand this mystery, and under all ordinary circumstances knows how to deal with it. Such a man may be called one who has the right of the-rights of a graduate. With regard to his words and verse, if he omits all self-regarding ideas, he will attain to the mystery-mysterious power of controlling life and death-the power to bring enlightenment by the positive word-using positive (word-using) or negative (silent) method of instruction. Well now! In what way did he reach-the ancients attain to this ultimate serenity? Here is something for you to ponder."

Here, it-he says-translator's translation-"mysterious." Mysterious does not mean, you know, something [laughing]-something mysterious. Mysterious means, you know, it is mysterious-beyond word, it means, you know. You can-you know it, you know-you can understand it, but you cannot say-you cannot put it in word because word is just-it is not possible to say various understanding-various understanding from all angles. If you say, you know, from one-one side, you cannot say, at the same time, from the other side. So that is why we say "mysterious." So even enlightened master cannot say anything properly.

Wild geese is wild geese. If it is flew away, it is flew away. [Laughs.] You cannot say, "It is there," and "It flew away" [laughs]. Not make any sense, you know. Then, you know, master will ask you which is-which do you mean? Is it here or there? [Laughs, laughter.] You-you have no answer. No answer is right. [Laughs, laughter.] So it is impossible to say, you know, to put it-the reality into word. So that is why we say "mysterious." But mysterious-it is not mysterious. It is too, you know, obvious. That we cannot say, you know. Word is not-word is mysterious [laughs, laughter] for us, you know.

It is mysterious that we cannot say anything [laughs]. Having, you know, big words, even a Zen master-even Baso, whose tongue reached to nose, cannot say anything [laughing, ongoing laughter]. If he say something, you should pull his tongue. You shouldn't fool us by your long tongue. Give me it! That is right, you know.

So if Hyakujo pull out his tongue, Horsemaster will be-would have been very pleased. Not "mysterious," you know. Too obvious. Too clear. So we sometime call it "reality," you know-"reality." It is too obvious.[8] So Zen is not mysterious at all. [Laughs, laughter.]

THE APPRECIATORY WORDS

This[9] is also interesting. [Laughs, laughter.]

That wild-wild duck. Just what was it? Baso saw it and started a conversation. The object of his talk would have-would have been love of mountain, clouds, seas, the moon. And yet Hyakujo did not understand-understand. It is just-just flew away [laughs]. He himself wanted to fly away. Instead, he himself was silenced.

[INTERPRETATION OF APPRECIATORY WORDS]

The wild duck! Just-just what was it-just what was it? Baso saw it and started conversation.

The old teachers in his practice-there was no cessation in their practice. They are always practicing their way. They are always ready to [engage in] various activity. That is how we should be concentrated on our activity.

The concentration-our concentration is not the usual concentration, you know. Concentration means usually to be-we say to be involved in something. But at the same time, we should have freedom. So this kind of concentration is more deeper and more natural, you know. If you-if you are trying to be concentrated on something, you know, your effort is directed to one way only. So it is difficult to change it, you know. If your concentration is quite natural, you know, you can change any time. And you will be ready to change your direction of effort.

So this kind of concentration cannot be studied by usual everyday practice-everyday activity. Just Zen can do it. Through Zen you can have this kind of training.

When you have some object, you know-some object-somehow your effort is directed to that object. It means, you know, your effort is working on one way only. In that way, you cannot understand how to change the direction of effort. But in-just by practice of pure Zen, you can-you will practice how to shift-make shift in your effort.

In this sesshin, our practice is concentrated to put more power in your tummy, but that does not mean, you know, to-to put special power in it. It means to put-to put some power quite naturally without, you know, making-without trying too much to put strength in your tummy.

So this practice should be-should follow-or should be followed by various instruction of sitting: mudra, or breathing, or like keeping your back straight. And if you have some pain or some difficulty, it is good chance to, you know, to practice it because if your pain is this much, this much, you know, controlling power will appear. So, you know-but if you do not know this secret [laughs], you will be, you know, involved in just pain. But if you know the other side of the pain, you know, which is keeping balance in your practice, you will appreciate the feeling of the pain. Because pain is this much you have power of training this much [laughs]. If you have no pain, maybe it is rather difficult for beginner to appreciate the power of Zen.

So the ancient disciples and teachers were ready to study true way in our everyday life, but Hyakujo looks like he didn't understand this. He was not ready for question and answer with his teacher. But no one knows, you know, this is-he may be-he might have known it.

[Chant.]

---

---

Sources: City Center transcript and original tape. The last three paragraphs were transferred from SR-67-12-04, where they had been incorrectly entered. Blanche Hartman was kind enough to refer the transcriber to R.D.M. Shaw's version of The Blue Cliff Records, which is the version that Suzuki-roshi would have consulted. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (3/31/01).

[1] Juiyen Shihyen (Jap. Zuigan Shigen): n.d. Ninth-century Chan master who appears in Case 12 of the Mumonkon (Gateless Gate) koan collection, "Zuigan Calls His Master." That is, every day Zuigan both called to himself as well as answered himself.

[2] Sumi Togen: Head or bishop of the Soto Zen School in America, starting in 1965. Formerly an instructor of monks at Soji-ji monastery in Japan.

[3] Case 53 of The Blue Cliff Record, "Hyakujo and a Wild Duck." The master in this koan was Jiangxi Mazu Daoyi (Baso Doitsu): 709-788. His disciple was Baizhang Huaihai (Hyakujo Ekai): 720-814. See also SR-71-03-09.

[4] Nanyue Huairang (Nangaku Ejo): 677-744.

[5] Hyakujo wrote Hyakujo Shingi, a set of rules for Zen monastics.

[6] Suzuki-roshi is reading from Shaw's translation of Case 53 of BCR, modifying it slightly as he reads (R.D.M. Shaw, trans. and ed., The Blue Cliff Records: The Hekigan Roku. London: Michael Joseph, 1961, p. 177).

[7] Yuanwu Keqin (Jap. Engo Kokugon): 1063-1135. Provided commentaries, pointers, and notes for the koan collection The Blue Cliff Record, based upon Xuedou Zhongxian's (Setcho Juken's) compilation of cases and verses.

[8] The original transcript ended here, appending "(CONTINUED)."

[9] From Shaw, op. cit., pp. 177-178.

4 - Evening Sesshin Lecture

Monday, December 04, 1967

Evening Sesshin Lecture
Tassajara

Our study-the more you-we study our way, the more it is difficult to explain it. But Dogen-zenji thought there must be some way to make his descendent understand the true way. And he made a great effort to express this kind of subtle truth. In [Fukan] Zazen-gi-as in Zazen-gi, he says, "If there is slightest gap between the perfect enlightenment and practice, the difference will be heaven and earth." Because it should not be any gap between practice and enlightenment, or reality and seeming. We think whatever we see is-something we see is reality, but it is not so. And what we feel is reality, but it is not so. The reality and something which is observed by our six senses is one, you know. So what-what we see-just what we see is not true without background of the reality. I will stop [laughs] this kind of, you know, interpretation.

Dogen-zenji found out a very good Chinese word to express this kind of truth. In Chinese-Chinese word [is] inmo[1]-inmo-or I don't know-know this-how they pronounce it. But inmo-inmo has two meaning. One is positive meaning: "suchness," you know. The other is the interrogative meaning: "What is it?" [Laughs.] What-what is inmo? How is inmo? You know, what is it when geese [laughs] came? Horsemaster asked Hyakujo, "What is it?" That "what," you know, what is inmo. Inmo is interrogative, and it is affirmative too.

This is very convenient word to express the reality. Everything is one side-in one sense it is suchness. On the other hand, it is not-it is something in-it is something which we cannot grasp. For an instance, you know, here is beautiful flower, you know. You think here is beautiful flower, but that beautiful flower is always changing [laughs]. You cannot grasp it, even while you are watching the changes. So you think you see it, but actually you didn't see the flower itself which is changing.

So everything is in one side something which is-which cannot be grasped, so "What?" The-on the other hand, you know, even for a while it is there in that way. And so it is-everything is suchness, and everything is ingraspable-cannot be grasped. So it is "What?" So inmo-the word inmo has two meaning, and Dogen-zenji found out this is very convenient word to express the reality.

Hashimoto-roshi,[2] the authority of Shobogenzo who passed away two years ago, in his lecture he told me-he told us refer to the menu and dishes, you know. We you make, you know, a menu of the dishes, and we cook, you know, salad or eggs or meat-everything separately. That is, you know, suchness. Everything is arranged clearly, beautifully. But he says, "When you start to eat [laughs], everything will vanish in a moment." In ten minutes there is no more dish, no more food on the table, and everything is mixed up [laughs] in your tummy.

So this is, on one hand, very beautiful things. But on the other hand, if food-function of food is fulfilled when the-function of the food fulfilled, there is no more dishes [laughs]. So everything is-our practice is the same thing. You know, you-when you get up, you know, you brush your teeth and wash your face. That is practice. You do it one by one carefully. And when you practice zazen, you practice zazen. One by one.

But, you know, none of them cannot be perfect practice, even though to wash your face is very good habit [laughs]. But, you know, even though it is good, if you are always washing your face [laughs], you cannot attain enlightenment [laughs, laughter]. Same thing will-can be said with your zazen practice. Zazen is very good practice. But even though you just always practicing zazen, you know, it doesn't work [laughs].

Zazen practice is something express-or purpose of zazen practice [is] to catch something as it is in mixed-up state. When you-so that is why you don't think, you know. When you think it-it must be each, you know-it must be each salad or bean or meat or eggs, you can think about meat or, you know, salad, but if it is mixed up, you know, in your tummy [laughs], you cannot think about it. So if you wa- [partial word]-if you want to real- [partial word]-catch reality in its true sense, you cannot think about it. When your life energy is burning in perfect combustion, you cannot catch it. That is zazen. But even zazen cannot be always same. As something you eat in your tummy does not stay always in the same way, it will change into something else.

So even [if] you practice hard, your zazen sometime will be good, sometime will not be so good. It is-actually it is not always in the same- we cannot practice our way in the same way always. The purpose of zazen is not to think about it. To catch ourselves in its full function is zazen. If so, there is no need to think about it. If you think about it, you cannot-you will lose it. When you don't think and [are] involved in the practice fully, you have zazen.

Even it is so, we have to prepare everything one by one carefully. That is our everyday life. When you wash your face you should wash your face carefully. When you walk you should walk carefully. One by one you take care of your activity. But when you are taking care of your activity, you are involved in something which is-which cannot be grasped. You are not anymore you.

So each-in each activity there is two side: positive and negative. Something which can be, or suchness and-what should I say-mixed-up state or ingraspable or unintelligible. So, "What is it?" When Baso asked Hyakujo, "What is it?" Baso should understand what he meant. And, "Where has he gone-have they gone?" He should understand what he meant. He was talking about our practice, the relationship between everyday activity and our practice, and what is our practice, and what is our everyday life. And everyday life is zazen, and zazen is everyday life. In this way, back and forth, he should assert his practice-he should make his practice sure.

In the sky, sometime wild geese is flying. And after that some cloud will come. And after that the bright moon will come. But each of the wild geese and cloud and moon is not-are not always same. The bright moon is bright moon, and wild geese are wild geese, and cloud is cloud. But at the same time, the moon is not moon, cloud is not cloud, and wild geese are not wild geese. They exist in the same place in mixed-up stage-state. Even [though] it is mixed-up, you know, we should-our practice should be concentrated on each moment. When we see the moon, we should see the moon. When we see the cloud, we should see the cloud. And we should appreciate everything one by one.

If people, you know, mixed up everything-or if so-if everything is changing and if everything exist in mixed-up way, there will be no need to work hard, you know. If everything is mixed-up from the beg- [partial word]-every-always, what is the point of appreciating everything if everything is just phenomenon? Why do we appreciate such a tentative phenomenal world?

If you understand in that way, that is-we shall-that is like to serve food in mixed-up [laughs] way. Salad and rice, [laughs] brown rice and miso soup in one big pail [laughs], mixed-up in bucket or something. It will be served for you. How do you [laughing] feel to eat from bucket like a pig [laughter]? It doesn't make any sense, you know. Even though it will be mixed-up in our tummy, we should serve one by one. Buying [?] each other [?]. That is our way, you know. But we do not keep it separately in our tummy.

But people, you know, some rigid people want to keep it one by one in their tummy, which is not possible. So that is why they suffer, you know. They don't feel so good. They cannot [be] satisfied with the way the food is served. Those people cannot be satisfied with human life, you know. Human being is so [laughs] indifferent. That is not right understanding of life.

Rikyu[3]-do you know Rikyu? Rikyu is-is supposed to be the founder of-founder of tea ceremony. He sweep-he would sweep the garden, and he appreciate the falling leaf-leaves on well-swept garden. If the purpose of sweeping the garden is to get rid of leaves, you know, why he can-he did appreciate-why he appreciated the leaves on the well-swept garden? Leaves on the, you know, well-cleaned garden and leaves on the-in the mountain is not same-are not same. The feeling is quite different. Some people may say it is useless, you know, to sweep garden every morning when so many leaves are cu- [partial word]-falling.

If you try to understand-if you understand the nature in its full sense, we are also a part of nature. We have something to do with nature, and we cannot satisfy without doing anything. We should participate [in] the nature. So even in Zen picture-Zen painting or drawing or what-picture maybe-sansui, we say. Sansui means "mountain and river." We paint one or two people-fisherman or woodcutter or farmer.

Nature-we are a part of nature. So the most natural way to observe nature for us is to do something-to participate [in] the great activity of nature. That is how we appreciate nature. And that is how we exist in this world. And that is how mountains and river exist. There is some rules in nature, and there is some rules in observing nature for human beings. And rules the nature has, and rules in observing things in human side is not different. We live in same time and same place. We live in same framework. So originally man and nature is not different. But when our civilization become so materialistic, and after violating nature, or after we tired out violating nature and material life, we are going to the other extreme, and just appreciate mountains and river, ignoring human life. That is one side of it-understanding or appreciation of nature.

We human being understand things from various angle-mainly from positive side and negative side. And when we observe things from both side-when we-when we are able to appreciate things from both side, one by one, there we have true way of life and true practice. We should not be involved in always just one-sided way of appreciating our life. Sometime positive, sometime negative. So in this sense we should practice our way in various way-observing ceremonies and not observing ceremonies by just sit. This is our way should be.

---

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (3/30/01).

[1] See Lecture SR-69-00-B for another discussion of inmo. "Inmo" is also the title of a fascicle in Dogen's Shobogenzo.

[2] Hashimoto Eko-roshi (1890-1965): a scholar of Dogen's Shobogenzo and an authority on the origins of the traditional okesa. He was Dainin Katagiri-roshi's second master at Eihei-ji.

[3] Sen Soeki Rikyu (1522-1591) is credited with developing the Way of Tea. He served as tea master to the shogun Toyotomi Hideyoshi (1536-1598), who eventually ordered Rikyu to commit seppuku.

5 - Sesshin Lecture No. 5

Monday, December 04, 1967

Sesshin Lecture No. 5

Saturday Afternoon, September 4, 1967

Tassajara

Our inner power of practice will appear according to the situation and accor- [partial word]-will respond to the situation you have like a bell. If you hit strong, the sound will be strong. If you hit it soft, the sound will be soft. But our true nature or-or true power does not make sound, but actually whatever you do, the power is there-should be there. In this way, we should understand our Zen practice power.

It is not something to acquire, or it is-but it is something to appreciate. When you sit so-just to sit [is] to be ready to [for] various activity or stimulation from-which will come from outside. But if your mind is caught by something you will lose your true mind. So without being caught by anything-just to sit without thinking-even thinking is our true practice.

In last lecture, I told you [about] this power from the opposite side. Zingan [?] called the names of his both: "This is," you know. But if you call by your own name, that is opposite side. The power itself is-is not something you can catch or you can understand. If something happens, you will find out the power is there. But when you sit in this way, you have no idea of power. You are just sitting, that's all. But if you do something, the power is there. So in various activity, the power is there.

So to call his [him?] both is to call his name as a power-a hidden power. And to call his own name means to realize his power when you do something. But actually this is two side of the one coin.

Here we understand how to apply our practice in our everyday life, how to understand your everyday life, and how to understand your true practice. So true practice is-should be everyday life. And everyday life should be the true practice. And when you practice true practice of-every-your everyday life should be there. This is how we understand our everyday life and how we understand our pure practice.

Last training period, when Bishop Sumi[1] came, he gave us-not koan but story: the question and answer between Baso and Hyakujo.[2] As you know, Baso, the Horsemaster [laughs]-Horsemaster, you know, he-we are told that when he speaks, his tongue reach through his nose [laughs], with big mouth and big-a man of big physique. So that is why we call him Horsemaster [laughs]: Baso, [who was] Nanagaku's[3] disciple and the Sixth Patriarch's grandson. Hyakujo is the famous Zen master who set up all the monastic life, you know-monastic rules.[4] He is the first one who set up precepts-our Mahayana precepts in its true sense. Before Hyakujo, almost all the Zen masters lived in precepts temples and observed Chin- [partial word]-Indian precepts. But it is not appropriate to observe Chinese people-Chinese village [?] who live in China where the climate is different and way of life different from India. But even though teaching changed, you know, into Mahayana, but precepts did not-they didn't change precepts, which he-they should-they should do-they should change. But Hyakujo did it and organized a monastic life. Since then we observe our precepts. Of course after Hyakujo, we changed many times-we changed our precepts many times. Precepts is the way of life.

Hyakujo-between-question and answer between Hyakujo and Horsemaster:

Horsemaster and Hyakujo were making trip. Suddenly wild geese flew over, and Baso asked Hyakujo, "What is it? [Laughs.] What is it?"

Baso-no, Hyakujo said, "That is wild geese."

And Baso said, "Where are they going?"

"They flew away," Hyakujo said.

But Baso [was] irritated, you know, with his answer and twitched his nose [laughs, laughter].

And Hyakujo cried [out?], you know. [Laughs.]

That is the story [laughs, laughter].

Here is, you know, something which we should understand. At first what did he say-what did Horsemaster say? "What is it? What is it?" This is very tricky question. "What is it?" [Laughs.]

It may be wild geese and at the same time it is not just wild geese. When we see something our power of practice should follow or Buddha nature should follow. So wild geese is not just wild geese. For the Zen student, wild geese is not wild geese. Hyakujo is not just Hyakujo. And Baso, Horsemaster too, he is also, you know, buddha-nature itself. So, "What is it?" That what can be everything. What is it? It is not just wild geese. Everything can be wild geese. I don't know whether Hyakujo knew it when he said that is wild geese. And Baso said, "Where are they going? [Laughs.] Where are they going?" Where are they going? They're going somewhere. Even though they are going somewhere, they are there. They cannot escape from the buddha-nature-the [1 word] of power of practice. Wherever they go they are right here with us. But-Hyakujo says, "They flew away." [Laughs.] This is rather, maybe, careless answer, maybe [laughs, laughter]? "Flew away." So he-it right here. He [?] and this [?] [1 word]. Twitched his nose. Did [?] it flew away [laughs, laughter]. Here there are many wild geese on your nose [laughs, laughter]. You know, if he is practicing always-if there is no gap, you know, in his practice they-he wouldn't say they flew away [laughs]. What will you [laughs] say if you have to? Even though you say they flew away, that's right answer, you know-flew away-actually they are not here anymore. But if you are prepared for his-for his teacher's teaching knows it was alright [laughs]. But in his practice there were some gap. So he cried [?]. But the way he cried I don't know how he cried [laughs]. The way he cried is good. It is alright even though he cried.

So this kind of koan is very interesting. If you study this koan from various angle, you will appreciate the endless, limitless meaning in it. Our way of life should be like this. And even between great Zen master and great disciple, the way we talk will not be different from usual person. But the difference is whether they're ready for various circumstances and condition.

Even a great Zen master when he cries-when he should cry he may cry. When he should laugh, he will laugh. When everyone is hungry, he will be hungry too. But there is-there should be-there is some difference in their hunger and hunger of usual person. If your practice is right, you will be ready for various activity. So what will-we will gain by what-the power we will gain by our practice is not common power. It is some special power. By special I mean-because it is special-it is special because it can be everything.

Usually the special power is something different from usual power, which cannot be usual. We are always up to, you know, trying to get something usual-unusual. And even though-even though they say this is unusual, for us Zen students it is not unusual. Only unusual thing is the thing which can be everything. Like, you know, money or gold. You can buy everything [laughs] with that. Maybe like syrup, whatever you eat there is some amount of syrup, you know. In this way our power is something like this figuratively speaking. But gold or syrup is not actually the power we use. Something you cannot understand what it is-what it is. Something which is beyond our understanding. Something which you cannot put it in words. So we say teaching out of letters. Teaching which will be understood if we have ear to listen to it, eyes to see it. But if we do not have eyes to see it, we cannot see it. That is the teaching out of letters.

If you try to-it is like as Dogen-zenji said in his poem, it is like letters. It can be a letter-letters written on high rock-high rugged [?] rock on the seashore. Even in storm, no waves can reach. Even though you try to see it, you cannot see it because it is too high. The only way-but the high rock on the rugged seashore is always there giving various teaching to us. This kind of teaching is true teaching. And this kind of-our practice should be like this. We should through our practice always expressing the truth. This kind of practice is our practice.

The introduction to this talk-to this subject between Baso and Hyakujo-Enko introduced the subject and said, "What is called the substance of the universe-substance of the universe or the great Tao, is not something which exists outside of the universe. It is omnipresent and not contained in one part only. Its total activity is entirely independent.

An enlightened Zen scholar is one who understand this mystery and understand [end of tape side A] all ordinary circumstances-knows to deal with it. Such a man may be called one who has the light of the-lights of a graduate. With regard to his words and verse, if he meets all self-regarding ideas, he will attain to the mystery-mysterious power of controlling life and death. The power to bring enlightenment by the positive word using-positive word using or negative. Silent method of instruction [1 word] now. In what way did he-did the ancient attain to his ultimate [?] serenity? Here is something for you to ponder."

Here he says translators translation mysterious-mysterious does not mean, you know, something [laughs]-something mysterious [laughs]. Mysterious means, you know-it is mysterious, beyond words it means, you know. You can-you know it, you know-you can understand it but you cannot say-you cannot put it in word. Because word is just-it is not possible to say various understanding-various understanding from all around us [?]. If you say, you know, from one side, you cannot say at the same time from the other side. So that is why we say mysterious. So even enlightened master cannot say anything properly.

Wild geese is wild geese. If it is flew away, it flew away [laughs]. You cannot say it is there and it flew away [laughs]. Don't make any sense, you know. Then, you know, master will ask you which is-which do you mean? Is it here or there [laughs]? You have no answer. No answer is right [laughs, laughter]. So it is impossible to say, you know, to put it the reality into word. So that is why we say mysterious. But mysterious- it is not mysterious, it is too, you know, obvious [?] that we cannot say, you know. Word is not-words is mysterious [laughs, laughter] for us, you know.

It is mysterious that we cannot say anything [laughs] having [?] in the big words [?] [laughs]. Even a Zen master, even Baso whose [?] tongue reach the nose cannot say anything [laughs]. If he say something, you should avoid [?] his tongue [laughs, laughter]. You shouldn't fool us by your long tongue [laughs, laughter]. That is right, you know [laughs].

So, if Hyakujo pull out his tongue [laughs, laughter], horse master will be [laughs]-would have been very pleased [laughs, laughter]. Not mysterious, you know [laughs]. Too obvious. Too clear. So we sometime call it reality, you know, reality it is too obvious. So Zen is not mysterious at all [laughter].

THE APPRECIATORY WORD

This is also interesting [laughter]. That wild [?]-wild [?] duck, just what was it? Baso saw it and started a conversation. The object of his talk would have-would have been love [?] of mountains, clouds, seas, the moon, and yet Hyakujo did not understand-understand it is just-just flew away [laughs]. He himself wanted to fly away. Instead, he himself was silenced.

The wild duck just-just what was it-just what was it? Baso saw it and started conversation.

The old teachers in his practice there was no cessation in their practice- they're always practicing their way. They're always ready to various activity. That is how we should be concentrated on our activity.

The concentration-our concentration is not usual concentration, you know. Concentration means usually to be-we say to be involved in something. But at the same time, we should have freedom. So this kind of concentration is more deeper and more natural, you know. If you-if you are trying to be concentrated on something, you know, your effort is directed to one way only. So it is difficult to change it, you know. If your concentration is quite natural, you know, you can change anytime. And you will be ready to change your direction of effort.

So this kind of concentration cannot be studied by usual, everyday practice-everyday activity. Just Zen can do it. Through Zen you can have this kind of training.

When you have some object, you know, some object-somehow your effort is directed to that object. It means, you know, your effort is working on one way only. In that way you cannot understand how to change the direction of effort. But in-just by practice of pure Zen, you can-you will practice how to shift-make shift in your effort.

NEXT PART DIVERGES FROM SR-67-12-02. IT IS CORRECT. MOVE TO END OF -02:

In this sesshin, our practice is concentrated to put more power in your tummy, but that does not mean, you know, to-to put special power in it. It means to put-to put some power quite naturally without, you know, making-without trying too much to put strength in your tummy.

So this practice should be-should follow-or should be followed by various instruction of sitting: mudra, or breathing, or like keeping your back straight. And if you have some pain or some difficulty, it is good chance to, you know, to practice it because if your pain is this much, this much, you know, controlling power will appear. So, you know-but if you do not know this secret [laughs], you will be, you know, involved in just pain. But if you know the other side of the pain, you know, which is keeping balance in your practice, you will appreciate the feeling of the pain. Because pain is this much you have power of training this much [laughs]. If you have no pain, maybe it is rather difficult for beginner to appreciate the power of Zen.

So the ancient disciples and teachers were ready to study true way in our everyday life, but Hyakujo looks like he didn't understand this. He was not ready for question and answer with his teacher. But no one knows, you know, this is-he may be-he might have known it.

[Chant.]

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham (02/23/01).

[1] Sumi Togen: Head or bishop of the Soto Zen School in America, starting in 1965. Formerly an instructor of monks at Soji-ji monastery in Japan.

[2] Case 53 of The Blue Cliff Record. The master in this koan was Jiangxi Mazu Daoyi (Baso Doitsu): 709-788. His disciple was Baizhang Huaihai (Hyakujo Ekai): 720-814. See also SR-71-03-09.

[3] Nanyue Huairang (Nangaku Ejo): 677-744.

[4] Hyakujo wrote Hyakujo Shingi, a set of rules for Zen monastics.

6 - Afternoon Sesshin Lecture

Tuesday, December 05, 1967

Afternoon Sesshin Lecture
Tassajara

Lecture A

In previous lecture, I compared zazen practice and usual everyday activity. In usual activity, as you know, our effort is directed to outside, and our activity is concentrated on some particular things. This activity of particularize something create many things. But this kind of creativity is-at the same time creates some fear. This creativity will result some feeling-whether it is good or bad-a good and bad feeling we have-we will have.

Before-before you do-if before the concentration happens to you, your mind is just big and something-your mind is something which you don't know. You do not have any feeling about yourself. But once you have involved in something or you are concentrated on something, there your mind will crystallize, and you will have some clear idea of yourself-subjectively and objectively. That subjective crystallized self reflect-project itself to the objective world, and you have some clear objects within your mind. There you have various feeling about the object. But as that object is the projected of mind of yourself, that-that you do-if that feeling is good or object is good, you will naturally cling to it. That-when you cling to some object, it means you are clinging to yourself at the same time because that object is the projected self. And if it-that attachment will result you some fear, if it is good. Because you attach to it, you try not [to] lose it. But nothing is permanent. Everything is changing. So even though you cling to it, that object will change even though you know that you have fear of losing it.

In this way the more your mind is particularized or crystallized, you will have at the same time uneasiness. That is what will result by your effort in its ordinal [ordinary] sense, while zazen practice will not result this kind of fear or attachment. Our effort will be directed the opposite direction. So the more you practice our way, the more you-your mind resume your fundamental state-big, where there is no feeling and where you do not think anything; no discrimination, no attachment and no fear. This kind of-this is the difference between zazen practice-the effort in your zazen practice and the effort in your ordinal [ordinary] activity.

I said sometime-I remember I says something, you know, very extraordinary [extraordinary] [laughs], you know: Even though you die, nothing will happen [laughs]. Even [though] the earth is, you know, broken piece by piece, nothing will happen, I said. If you-if your-if you practice zazen, your mind will resume where nothing-before nothing happens. In our mind, there is no star, no earth, no sun-nothing whatsoever. But everything will come out from that nothingness where there is nothing. So even though we pass away-we die, if we know that all of us came-arise from this nothingness, to die is to come back [laughs] to the source of life. So for everything to appear means the possibility of resuming original state from where we appear.

We live in the realm of time and space. Even though the earth disappear, space exist, time exist. As long as the space exist, time exist. Something will happen in time and space. So as long as time and space is here-is there, there is nothing to be afraid of, even though there is no form appears in this time and space. No one [laughs] can doubt that there is time and space. But according to Dogen-zenji, this kind of understanding is not deep enough, but tentatively we can acknowledge-we can['t] deny that the time and space is here.

So why do I-do we have fear of losing ourselves? Even though our form will disappear-disappear, as long as time and space exist, it is-it is all right. Nothing will happen. One after another something will appear. Actually some-that-which does not appear does not-which does not disappear does not exist [laughs]. Because we disappear we, you know, we are quite sure about our existence. If we do not disappear, we don't know what we are [laughs]. Maybe more than ghost [laughs]. If we, you know, exist forever, we should be afraid of ourselves [laughs]. You don't know where to go. But fortunately we disappears, we die. So as long as we die, it is obvious that we are-we exist in realm of time and space. So we are completely saved.

Even though you cannot deal with your fear, nothing happens to you, you know. Even though you go insane, that is all right [laughs, laughter]. Because we are normal, we have that kind of fear. That we have the possibility of going insane is [laughs]-should be lucky-we should be lucky, you know, to have possibility of going insane. But usually, you know, we are trying not to be insane [laughs]. That is opposite effort to our zazen effort. We rather [laughs] practice zazen to go to insane or enjoying [laughs] possibility of going insane [laughs, laughter]. It means, you know, we are alive-we are human being [laughs]. There is no possibility for dog and cats to be insane [laughs]. Because we are human being, we should dress up in some way. If we go insane, we will, you know, walk around without any dress, you know. If we do so you think-if we do so it may be terrible [laughs]. We don't want to do so [laughs]. That is, you know, human being. But for cats and dog there is no such fear.

Whatever happened to us, you know, after all-if we are-if we know what is our life completely and where we go completely, there is no fear whatsoever. But you-you will be-even-however, you will be very sorry for someone who lost his ordinal [ordinary] activity of their mind, because partly they are insane and partly they are not. They are still human being. And so he will make best effort to be human, but he cannot do that. Even though he want to be human, for him it is not possible because he lost his control. But even though you are in the same condition, for you there is nothing to be afraid of. As old Zen master said, "If fire come, you should be burned. If the water come, you should be drowned." That is our way.

So whatever happens to you, as long as you know the bottom of the suffering, bottom of the fear, you are-you feel quite safe. When you do not know the bottom of it, there you have real fear. You don't know what to do with yourself. Even before you go-before you die, you don't know how to live in this moment when you think of it. But as long as you know what will happen to you after your death, there is nothing to be afraid of. Our practice is to resume our ordinal-original state of being which is universal. All the being in the world or in the cosmic scale in space-time and space.

Dogen-zenji said, "Think unthinkable." We think, but direction of our thinking is opposite. Instead of trying to attain something, we try to forget. Instead of keep thinking, we try to stop thinking. What you will acquire through this kind of-this practice will be tremendous, and every activity should be based on this kind of readiness of your mind.

So all the practice-Rinzai or Soto, or five schools of Zen, or seven schools of Zen, and many other practice should be based on this power. In old time-in ancient time, the people practiced or applied various way in our practice. Sometime they meditate on white skeleton; sometime they meditate on water; or sometime they practiced zazen to obtain detachment-thinking filthy bag containing [laughs], you know, lung and stomach and many nasty things within it.[1] Even the beautiful [laughs] person contains many things [laughs] in her.

So we are all a bag of filthy [laughing] things [laughter]. To forget, someone who cannot get married, they sit thinking about [laughter] things like-. [2] Actually they did it. There are many kinds of practice for us. You are just laughing at them, but if you are in the situation, you will do it. But in America, this kind of thing will never happen [laughter]. All those practice, when it based on this true way of zazen, it works. But as long as those practice is directed to one way only, it doesn't work.

Because this-the attainment by this way of practice is-something is missing, and that is only delusion for us. It is not real. So true understanding of zazen is necessary, whatever practice you apply, if you do not understand our way as it is-our way of life as it is.

Evolution of living being is going on in the course of specializing the original nature. You know, something like our human life started from some-a kind of amoeba, you know, in the muddy pond [laughs] in which something was lived, and they divide their body in two and four and eight. In that way our life started. The more and more our life specialized as a human being or animal or plant-the more our life is specialized, the more complicated our life activity become. So a human being has more complicated life. Human being has the more complicated life. So to be divided or to be specialized means to evolve ourselves-evolution of life going in this way.

Nowadays we have very complicated life. But in this direction, as long as we are making effort to reach the moon or the Venus, if that is only way we know, there is no hope for us to be-to attain liberation. The other day-the last year, or the-no-the year before last year, I went to Yosemite and saw a waterfall.[3] I was watching it. It was one sheet of, you know, white pearls hanging on the rock. But a part of it, you know, separated from-by the rock. Part of the water separated from the rock and falling down. When I saw it, I felt very sorry for the [laughs] separated water, you know. It is-it was almost going to be mist, you know, but still water. If it become completely mist, there will be no problem [laughs] for it. But they are not mist yet and water. So it has to travel one thousand feet, you know, all the way down to the bottom. If, you know, when-if I didn't see that separated water, I have that kind of feeling for the water. But separation from the original source creates some feeling for us.

The evolution of life creates many problems for us. So I don't-I do not regret-I am not regretful about our civilization to be-to enjoy this civilization. I enjoy it very much. But at the same time, we should know that there is no complete freedom or complete renunciation in this kind of civilization. Only when we know that even though evolution of life brought our individual life to this point where we have many fears, we know how to resume our original life-source of life. Then, you know, we can enjoy this civilization at the top of evolution of life activity. So without this kind of understanding, we cannot enjoy anything. When you are involved in it you may be all right, but what will happen to next time? You will be very regretful.

In Chinese character-no, in zazen, we should get rid of, or we should be-in zazen, our mind should not be instead of contamination or in the state of sleepiness, you know. If [we] are sleeping, we cannot practice zazen. But on the other hand, if our-we are-our mind is state of agitation or state of extreme joy, we cannot practice our way. And describing this extreme joy, Chinese people used two words-two characters. One is culminating joy, you know. One is culmination of joy. And one character is regretfulness [laughs], you know. This is very, you know-it describe to the point if the culmination of joy happens to us, next moment will be the regret [laughs].

So if we do not know how to resume the ori- [partial word]-source of life, what we will have is the culminating joy and regretfulness. We cannot enjoy our life in its true sense without this practice. That is why Dogen-zenji put emphasis on this practice. It does not mean to slight the other practice, but if we forget this point, whatever practice it may be, it doesn't work. It doesn't help us in its true sense. On the other hand, if we understand this point, to apply whatever way you apply-way of practice you apply, it will work.

In this way, to open up your mind for everything and to be ready for accepting various difficulties is the purpose of zazen.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (4/2/01).

[1] Suzuki-roshi may be referring to a traditional meditative practice of concentrating on the body (including a beautiful one) as an object subject to decay in order to diminish greed or craving.

[2] Possibly: "For someone who is celibate, to forget about their attraction to others they follow this practice."

[3] See also "Nirvana, the Waterfall," in Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind, p. 93.

7 - Evening Sesshin Lecture

Tuesday, December 05, 1967

Evening Sesshin Lecture
Tassajara

Lecture B

As the nature of our practice is, like I told you over and over, and the point [of] our effort is directed-is like this, for beginner it looks like very discouraging and frustrating. Someone said it is [laughs]-Zen is like standing on-on your head [laughs], you know. It is simple [laughing], but to keep standing is very difficult. In dokusan someone said. I think that is very true, but to stand on your head should not be difficult. But to keep standing is too difficult.

But if you don't know what is true practice, and where you should put your effort, and nature of our practice based on the human nature or nature of culture-human culture, we cannot make appropriate effective effort in helping ourselves and others. This kind of instruction given by Dogen-zenji is like a lighthouse in the stormy ocean. When the sea is very calm, you should rather expect-you should rather to have-like to have a storm [laughs]. And most-most of the young people has this kind of feeling-this kind of resistance.

When we have this kind of resistance, to observe something quite common is difficult because it is not so encouraging thing. But if you are under a very critical situation, you will have-you will have to have, or you will find out your true nature.

I talked about "insane" last lecture, this afternoon.[1] Most people who are insane at first, I think, the symptom of them is to express the feeling of resistance in various way. And they cannot help resisting what people say, what people may like to doing. If you say "stay at home," they will run away. If you don't say so, he might stay home, but the instant-the moment you say "please stay-you should stay at home more," he will go away. That is the expression of the resistance.

By nature our effort is directed to outward, not inward. So for them it is- for them because they are not mentally so strong, so it is difficult to work in opposite way, or you may say to control their way. It is quite different from controlling power. Our, you know, way is not to [be] prohibitive or controlling. Just to put our effort to the other direction is our way, and we will have more difficulty in make shift of our direction of effort. So for the weak-mentally weak person, it is difficult to keep themselves-themselves from feeling of resistance. At first they resist everything, but sometime they may feel big-great regret, or they may feel great sad feeling because they cannot observe things-he cannot observe things as he should do. And well-developed human nature-the revival of well-developed human nature all of sudden happens to their mind. Once this kind of revival of highly developed human activity take place, they feel very sad that they cannot observe things as they should do according to the highly developed human nature. Originally it is our joy to develop our nature, but that development of the human nature is contaminated-is in the-a kind of contamination in our culture-in our social framework. We become sick of it. We become tired of it. And we feel big resistance against it. But when we are in the position from where we have to reach for the well-developed human life, we seek for it, and we adore for it, and we miss it. That is actually how we feel resistance and how we become very obedient.

Usually resistance and obedience is two quite different tendency or activity of mind or function of mind. But originally it is not different. There we have reason why we practice something informally and why we practice our way in the opposite way. Because you feel some resistance to your old culture, you should practice zazen. And you feel better to practice our way, because our practice is the expression of our resistance to the old way of life.

In our practice, we should forget all about the idea of good or bad, right or wrong. But when old culture become rigid and concrete, the old culture will force something always anew. But in our practice, even though we do not ignore the idea of good or bad, but we are not caught by the idea of good or bad any more. Instead of expressing resistance to outward, we resume our original nature or universal nature or stage-state of our mind before crystallized in some particular way.

I think if you know the true way of zazen, because you are young- because you have some feeling of resistance, you will practice more our way, and feeling of resistance to old way of life will encourage your practice. Moreover, you will-your mind will be big enough to accept the old way of life we had. When our practice come to this point, we say don't think "good and bad," or "right or wrong." When we do not think "right or wrong," "good or bad," our mind is big enough accept things whether it is old or whether it is new. Who told us the teaching or who force some way of life to us doesn't matter. We will not lose our way, and we will create-we will develop our way in our own idea and in our own way. There is freedom of creativity.

It is silly for us just to be caught by the feeling of resistance. The resistance, because of the discrimination, is a kind of imitation. But usually [in] imitation we imitate something. In the same way, but in-when we have resistance, we imitate in opposite way [laughs]. That is just-you imitate in the same way or the other way is the difference. But your way is caused by some outward object. In other word, your mind is enslaved by outward object. In this point, resistance and imitation is the same. You have no freedom. It means you-your mind is enslaved by it-by something. So if you want to obtain the perfect freedom from everything, your effort should be directed inward. As long as you have this kind of practice, you have no danger-danger of being enslaved by anything. You have always perfect freedom.

So the more you understand a human being-human nature, the more you will [be] interested in our way. Another human nature is-maybe we like something wrong rather than right-rather than true [laughs]. This is something, you know-this is, maybe, same tendency we have when we feel some resistance. Something which is true is maybe always very common and not so interesting, not so colorful. It is just plain and common. So you do not-you have no interest in it. Something which is wrong [laughs] is very interest-interesting to you to see, you know.

As Dogen-zenji in his instruction of zazen, "Don't," you know, "be afraid of true dragon." [2] In China there was a man who liked dragon very much. Even though he didn't see-he haven't dragon-but even though he didn't know actually what it was [laughs], he was very much interested in dragon, and he liked to talk about dragon. This kind of, you know, feeling we have always. Even though we don't know what is zazen, people like to talk about zazen all day and night, all night and day [laughs, laughter]. But Dogen-zenji said, "Don't be surprised at the true dragon." [Laughs.] You know, those people will be surprised-or not surprised but will be silent when they see true dragon because it is not so interesting [laughs, laughter]. So Dogen-zenji said, "Don't be surprised at true dragon." [Laughs.]

But common as it is-if you know how common it is, you know, and if you know-if the true dragon will appease your ambitious thought or your unsatisfied feeling in your everyday life, you will be interested in our practice in its true sense. This kind of interest is not usual interest to be [of being] proud of your power or your understanding, but something which will give you-which will appease all the ambitious thought and all the resistance. That is why many artist and poet and samurai or some influential person who found dead end in their way practiced zazen.

There is limit in our effort, and there is limit in our power to attain something. Whether you become famous or not is the difference of- difference of whether you become famous or not is by-may be by sheet of paper. If you are strong-stronger than the other a little bit, you know, you will become famous. That's all. If you can do it bit-little bit ahead of people, you will be successful. To be involved in that kind of competition is to sacrifice yourself. And it is silly, you know, to be involved in this kind of life.

Our way of life should be more stable, and more wide, and more open to everyone. Keeping something just within yourself is one of the violence [violations]-violence of one of our precepts. What-whether it may be material or spiritual, not to open up for others is the violence of the precepts. Our mind should be open to everyone. If you want to open up your mind, you should resume your true mind or essence of mind-some essence of mind, according to the Sixth Patriarch.

I am sorry I didn't bring my glasses, so [laughs] will you read it from here to here? About one page. I-I have read it up to here.[3] You are jisha,[4] so [laughs, laughter]-ask you to read from here-

Jisha: To here, or-?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. "Think unthinkable," and there is some paragraph here. No paragraph?

Jisha: No.

Suzuki-roshi: Okay. Just start by your-by the new sentence.

Jisha: [3-4 words unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Jisha: No-to where?

Suzuki-roshi: To here.

Jisha: To here. Okay. [2-3 words.] Okay. I'm a little hoarse, so I hope you can understand it.

Suzuki-roshi: Okay.

Jisha: When you stand from zazen, shake your body and arise calmly. Do not be rough. That which transcends the ordinary person and the sage-dying while sitting and standing-is obtained through the help of this power. This I have seen. Also the supreme function[5] (lifting the finger,[6] using the needle,[7] hitting the wooden gong) and enlightenment signs (such as raising the hossu,[8] striking with the fist, hitting with the staff, and shouting) are not understood by discrimination nor differentiation. You cannot understand training and enlightenment well by using supernatural power. It is the practice (sitting, standing, and sleeping) beyond voice and visible things. Isn't this a true rule beyond discriminatory views? So don't argue about the wise and foolish. If you can only train hard, this is true enlightenment. Training and enlightenment are by nature undefiled. Living by Zen is not separated from daily life.[9]

Suzuki-roshi: What was he says is very, you know, common, and Zen is for everyone. But, you know, in everywhere you will find some unusual statement. All the unusual activity of Zen master is based on this deep understanding of our practice, or else he does not deserve the name of true Zen master. His whole day-whole life effort is directed on this point. And I have been talking about maybe same thing over and over again, so many times. And I will continue [laughs, laughter]. I am sorry-same thing over and over again [laughs]. But I feel very good, you know [laughter], because I find something new, you know, in my feeling whenever I continue [2-3 words].

This is the joy of our practice. And it may be good idea for us to read this Fukan Zazen-gi little by little after zazen. We will discuss how we should do with Chino-sensei[10] later.

Thank you very much.

---

—

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (4/4/01).

[1] SR-67-12-05-A.

[2] Probably referring to the story of Sho-kung or Yeh Kung-tzu (Jap. Seiko or Shoko) in the Hsin-hsu or Shen-tzu lüeh (Shinshi Ryaku) and the Latter Han History. Sho-kung loved painted and carved dragons but was terrified when visited one day by the real thing. "Do not become so accustomed to images that you are dismayed by the real dragon" (Dogen-zenji, Fukan Zazen-gi, in Nishijima and Cross, ed., Shobogenzo, 1994, Vol. 1, p. 282). See also SR-69-09-00-A and SR-71-06-05.

[3] In SR-67-12-01-A. The student appears to be reading from Reiho Masunaga's translation of Fukan Zazen-gi (The Soto Approach to Zen, 1958, pp. 101-102), but several phrases are translated differently. Therefore, the translation of this passage may have been modified by Suzuki-roshi. There is a gap of one-half paragraph between the passage Suzuki-roshi read in SR-67-12-01-A and the passage read here. Not all lectures in the sesshin were recorded and/or survived on tape, so the missing half-paragraph was probably read between Dec. 2 and Dec. 4, 1967.

[4] jisha: attendant to a priest.

[5] Means employed by Zen masters for leading their students toward enlightenment. (See N. Wadell and Abe Masao, "Dogen's Fukanzazengi and Shobogenzo zazengi, in The Eastern Buddhist, 1973, 6 (2).)

[6] Gutei raising one finger (Case 3 of Mumonkon, Gateless Gate). Most translations include "banner" here, a reference to Ananda becoming enlightened upon taking down a banner over a gate (Keitoku Dentoroku, 1).

[7] Kanadeva dropping a needle into a bowl brimming with water (Keitoku Dentoroku, 2).

[8] hossu (Jap.) (San. vyajana): a whisk made with long animal hair.

[9] Two more paragraphs of Fukan Zazen-gi remain to be read.

[10] Kobun Chino Otogawa-roshi came from Eihei-ji in June of 1967 to Tassajara, where he served as head of training for monks (see Wind Bell, Fall 1967, Vol. VI, No. 2-4, p. 17). In 1983 he founded Jiko-ji temple in Los Gatos, in the Santa Cruz mountains of northern California.

8 - Afternoon Sesshin Lecture

Wednesday, December 06, 1967

Afternoon Sesshin Lecture
Tassajara

Lecture A

The mind which [we] will acquire or obtain by our pure practice is, as I said, something which is not graspable-which is beyond our words. But at the same time, the mind will respond to everything. So positively speaking, our mind is like a mirror which reflects various object on it. But when there is no-no object, the mirror is something which you cannot even see. This is the mind we will obtain by our pure practice.

This afternoon I want to make the relationship between our big mind and everyday activity. In everyday life, how the big mind reveal itself will be the point I will talk [about] right now-or the function of-you may say the function of the great mind.

Dogen-zenji explained this mind in his Tenzo Kyokun.[1] Tenzo Kyokun is the instruction for the monks who works in the kitchen. Those who work in the kitchen must have this mind. And work in the kitchen is the extended practice of zazen, or their way should be-their way working in the kitchen should be based on our pure practice or big mind. Especially [for] those who work in kitchen, it is necessary to have big mind because they will have various difficulties.

Food is very important-to prepare food is very-may be the most important work in the monastery. And usually we do not eat good food. The food we will prepare will not please the monks in the monastery. That is quite usual. And monks-even though they prepare something good, they will not satisfy-will not be satisfied with it. They will want something better [laughs], and there is no, you know, limit in their [laughs] desire. So they will have always complaint, and what they will do in the kitchen will be always criticized. Even though there is nothing to criticize, they will [be] suspicious [laughs, laughter] about the, you know-what they will do in the kitchen. So to work in the kitchen is very difficult work.

And so, first of all, Dogen-zenji says he must be a man of big mind to accept various criticism and complain with, you know, not smile, but [laughs] if you smile they will be more angry [laughs]. So you cannot even smile [laughs]. Just to accept what they say, and just to understand our human nature is only the way.

So-the first of all, Dogen-zenji count the big mind: the mind as great as a mountain and as wide as sea, or else you cannot-you cannot be responsible for the kitchen work.

And next thing is kind-kindness. Even though the material is not so good, you should take care of food and vegetables and fruits with great care. So he counts kind heart or kind mind. He say-he says all-all the monks' mind.

And third one will be to have always joy in his work. I-the order [in the text] was not like this. Joyous mind[2] is the first, and old ladies' mind [3] is next-kindness, kindhearted mind. And-and the great mind-the third one is the great mind.[4] The second one is kindness. And the first one is joyful mind.

In Japan, you know, there-there are many fishermans and fish store. There are many fish stores. And besides so many fish store, we have some people who is carrying fish and selling it, you know. Those people-you know, fish should be always fresh, so they are running on the street always with big flag [?], and they are always full of joy. They looks very happy. They are always active, you know [laughs]. If they are not happy, the fish look-will looks like old [laughs]. Even though fish [laughs, laughter]-is just more fresh if they carry with joy. It looks like fresh [laughs, laughter]. When fish become old, the eyes, you know, turn to white from blue, you know. Blue eyes is not anymore blue [laughs]. Even though [laughs] they carry white [laughs, laughter]-white-eyed fish, you know, if they carry with joy, you know, and if they are running [laughs, laughter], fish looks like very fresh, you know [laughter].

So if the-if a monk who is responsible for the kitchen work is not happy, you know, food tastes very bad, you know. Even though it is good, it doesn't taste too good. So Dogen-zenji said [laughs, laughter] they must be like a, you know, man is who carrying fish. No, he didn't say so, but [laughs, laughter] he means, you know-what he means [is] he should be always happy, you know. If he is not so happy, you know, the all the monks will not be happy. And the more-more complain he will have, and he will be criticized more. So first of all, Dogen-zenji says he should be always happy.

And next thing-next thing is to have old ladies' mind. Usually, by nature, old lady is very kind. Or we say Buddha's mind is-the mind of parents is Buddha's mind. Buddha's mind is parents-mind of parents. They raise children with great care, with great love, and they do not miss any expression of their baby. And when it is cold, they will take off his own coat and cover the baby. When it is hot, they will carry their baby in the cool side, exposing themselves to the sun. In this way they raise their children.

So buddha-mind is-should be-must be like the old-ladies' mind who raised children. You may say that is our instinct. Whether it is instinct or their-their act- [partial word]-kindness. The mind they have is valuable. Because of this everything grows. Because of this we-we were so happy at-when we are at home, and you will not forget how you were raised in the family-in your family when you are young. Even though you do not say "thank you," but you cannot forget it.

This kind of mind is the mind of parents. And big mind, great mind should be like this, he says. And the great mind-he says great mind is the mind of mountain and-or the sea. If you do not have great mind, you cannot take responsibility. Because we don't know when he will give up his-when he will quit his responsibility, we cannot rely-we cannot trust him. Especially a man who is responsible for kitchen quit his work, you know, you-all the rest of the monks cannot eat. That is why this mind is necessary.

By this explanation, I think you must have understood what do we mean by buddha-mind or big mind. Although our mind is something graspable-something ingraspable, its activity is so great, and so warm, so clear, and full of joy. This are-this is the interpretation of the buddha-mind or great mind by Dogen-zenji.

Because we are too intellectual and so, too difficult to put faith in something which you do not know exactly, so some explanation is necessary. Some intellectual explanation or interpretation is necessary.

So we have to talk [about] something very intellectually and logically. But actually there is no other way to appreciate than to practice our way, knowing the purpose of practice with right understanding of our way.

Here is the brief translation of the three mind by Dogen: [5]

The sole [soul?] mind as expounded in Zen differentiate itself into three minds: the joyful mind, the kindly mind, the generous mind. They are the three function of the three mind-sole mind-the sole mind. The joyful mind means the joyful frame of mind. A man of joyful mind is contented with his lot, even in adversity. He will see bright light and value, and never grumbles or complains. He finds some of the Buddha's grace in difficult circumstances. He feels pleasure even in-when even in painful conditions, and always rejoices. Seven hardship will disappear at-at once, and seven kinds of happiness will come at once. In this way, he can experience the spiritual joy and realize that the world of birth and death is the world of nirvana.

The joyful mind is volitional aspect of the Zen mind-volitional aspect of Zen mind or mentality.

Seven[6]-seven hardship-seven hardship-seven hardship, yeah-seven hardship is, you know, are the hardship when you have-you are born, you know. We don't remember-I don't remember, but [laughs, laughter] it must be pretty hard [laughs] to come out. And to the old age, you know-we become older and older-that is hardship, and sickness, and death. Those are-here we have four. And we count three more. One is to have too much energy [laughs]. That is hardship too [laughs]. So that is why you don't eat, you know, so strong stimulus food in the monastery. It will create a hardship [laughs]. That's very true [laughs].

And even though you expect something, almost all the-all the expectation will not be fulfilled in this world because by nature we expect too much. So it is [laughs] impossible to appease your, you know, desire. That is another difficulties.

And the third one is to depart from someone who [whom you] love. And to be with someone you do not like [laughs, laughter]. This is [laughs, laughter] hardship we have in this world. This is very true [laughs]. But if you have joyful mind, you know, all the friend will be, you know-all the people will be your friend. And all the-if you are healthy, the more you are healthy, the more you can enjoy your life. And birth should be happy occasion, and death is also-should be happy.

In this way, all those seven hardship, all at once, when you have joyful mind, change into happy mind or happiness.

The joyful mind means joyful frame of mind. A man of joyful mind is contented with his lot. Even in adversity, he will see bright light and value and never grumbles or complain. He finds some of Buddha's grace in difficult circumstances. He feels pleasure even in painful condition, and always rejoices. Seven hardship will disappear at once, and seven kinds of happiness will come at once. In this way, he can experience the spiritual joy and realize that the world-of-world of birth and death is the world of nirvana.

The joyful mind is the volitional aspect of the Zen mind. The compassionate mind is the affectionate mind of the parents. Parent always think of the growth-growth and welfare of their children to the neglect of-neglect of their own circumstances.

A Buddhist scripture says the Buddha's mind is the mind of great compassion. One of the lotus-excuse me-one of the [1 word] three treasures is compassion that allows courage. These are nothing but the kind mind. The kindly mind is the emotional function of Zen mind. The magnanimous mind is as big as a mountain and as deep as a sea. A man with the magnanimous mind is impartial. He walks the middle way. He never attach to anyone. He-he is never attached to any one side or aspect of things. The magnanimous mind works-walks justly and impartially. It denotes the intellectual function. The bodhi [body?]-the holy mind is the harmonious unity of intellect, emotion, and volition, and [is] equipped with the intelligence, benevolence, and compassion. The function of the great mind may be limitless. According to the circumstances you will-various virtue will appear from this great mind.

In this way-that is why we should not attach to any particular practice. Whatever the practice may be, we should practice it with big mind. If we know the fundamental purpose of our practice, you can practice our way even in your work-walking or sitting or stopping or lying down. So we should open up our mind without clinging to some particular thing. This is how we practice our way.

And our practice will be-should be refer to how treat things-how to make friends and how to study our teaching. Respectively there are some teaching told by Dogen-zenji. Anyway, our way is limitless. So without satisfying or without stopping our effort, we should express the big mind. This is the life of we Buddhists.

---

—

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (4/4/01).

[1] Eihei Dogen, Instructions for the Tenzo, 1237. The tenzo is the head cook in a Zen monastery.

[2] ki-shin (Jap.): the mind of gratitude or joy.

[3] ro-shin (Jap.): the mind of kindness, the aged, or parents.

[4] dai-shin (Jap.): the great mind.

[5] The three minds are mentioned in Tenzo Kyokun, but Suzuki-roshi's translation or commentary does not follow the available translations of Tenzo Kyokun currently available in English.

[6] The traditional list includes eight hardships of human existence (as listed by Suzuki-roshi himself in Lectures SR-68-10-00-F and SR-68-10-00-G): (1) birth; (2) old age; (3) illness; (4) death; (5) to be separated from those who are dear to us; (6) to meet those who are not dear to us; (7) not to obtain what we desire; and (8) difficulty of guarding our possessions. (See also Garbhavakranti-sutra in H. V. Guenther, trans., The Jewel Ornament of Liberation, Rider & Co., 1959, pp. 63-69.)

9 - Evening Sesshin Lecture

Wednesday, December 31, 1969

Evening Sesshin Lecture
Tassajara

Lecture B

We say everything has buddha-nature, so we have to treat as a buddha. To say "everything has buddha-nature" is not appropriate, because if I say-to say-if I say everything has buddha-nature, then [?] buddha-nature and everything is dualistic. Actually, everything itself is buddha. "Buddha-nature," we say, but this word is not so appropriate. Buddha-nature, you know-if I say "buddha-nature," it looks like we have many nature: human nature, buddha-nature, and nature of animal. But buddha-by-what we mean by buddha-nature is some special nature in comparison to other nature, or human nature-human nature itself, buddha-nature. So there is nothing but buddha-nature.

hada, Japanese character

for "skin" or "body"

So, when we say "buddha-nature"- "everything has buddha-nature," this is already wrong. But tentatively, we must say everything has buddha-nature. In Japanese, for an instance, I have, you know, two eyes. You say I have two eyes. But we do not say I have two eyes. We say, "There is two eyes." The meaning is different, and in Chinese character, "I have"-the word "have" means "skin," you know, which is part of our body. So when we say "I have two eyes," it means our eyes is a part of ours. Or we do not say even "I." "There is two eyes," we say. So I is-we do not say I, you know: Mega futatsu arimas. Mimiga futatsu arimas. Kuchiga hitotsu arimas.[1] "There is one mouth." "There are two eyes."

And, "There are two ears." It means, you know: "I have two eyes." And, "I have one mouth." And "I have one nose.[2]" And that "have" is-means a part of us. It means "flesh" or "skin." So when we say "I have-everything has buddha-nature," what we mean is not so dualistic.

Everything has buddha-nature, but tentatively because there is no other way to say it, we should say there is-we have-everything has buddha-nature, even though it sound very dualistic. And according to Dogen-zenji, to say a part of it is not perfect enough. Buddha include everything. Whatever there is in this world, that is a part of buddha-nature. If there is something outside of it-outside of buddha, that is buddha too [laughs]. So it include everything. Because it include everything, it is independent being in its absolute sense. Even though you accumulate things one by one, it will not result [in] buddha. If you divide buddha in various way, that is everything we see.

But according to Dogen-zenji, a part of it is not perfect enough, because if I say-if we say "part of it," the relationship between things is ignored already, you know. Part of-"I am part of," you know-"I am a member of our family." If you say [so], the relationship between you and your brother is not expressed well. It is ignored. So Dogen-zenji said everyone is not member of. Everyone is family itself because if there is-if someone is missing, you know, that is not perfect family anymore. So relationship between our member of families is more than the member.

So that is why I must say "everything has buddha-nature" is not perfect expression of the teaching. So Dogen-zenji says, if you-to treat-if you treat you-you must treat everything, or he says you must-you must treat a grain of rice as if it is your own eyes.[3] Eyes is part of you, and so is the grain of rice.

As you know there is famous story.[4] If you go to Eihei-ji, there is Half-Dipper water bridge: Hanshaku-kyo [so named] because Dogen-zenji used to bring back the leftover water to the river. After he use, you know, half of the dipper of water, he took it back to the river again [laughs]. At Eihei-ji we never wash our face with, you know, [the basin] full of water. We use just seventy percent of water in our washing basin. And when we empty it, we do not empty water this way [away from the body]. We dip it-we empty it this way [toward the body], you know [laughs]. If you empty it this way, you must be very careful [laughs]. If you are [1 word], we know what will happen to us. So we must-anyway, we will have to empty it very carefully. We treat things very carefully. And we respect things very much.

In your framework of economic world, you know, to consume things will be-will encourage the [1 word: producing?] things [laughs]. So to use many things will be the-will help, you know, circulation of money. In this reason-in this economic reason, you do not, you know, treat things so well. Nevertheless, you know, I found your cup is very thick, you know, because you will break it [laughs]. If it is thin-as thin as we have in Japan, you will [laughs]-one dozen of cup will be destroyed every day [laughs, laughter] in your kitchen. So yours are very thick, but ours is so thin, you know. It is easier to handle if it is thin. But you have to treat it very carefully, or because we treat it very carefully, there is no need for-for us-cup to be so thick.

And usually we treat things with both hand. Sometime some beginners will carry their eating bowl like this [laughs]-in one hand like this. It looks very strange [laughs], like pumpkin [laughs, laughter]. We always carry things, if possible, [with] both hand. And you carry things-many-you carry many things in one hand or at once, you know. We carry-we do not carry so many. And we will carry one by one, going back and forth [laughs]. This is more-or-less Japanese way.

Why we do that is out of a question. It is not just to save money, or it not just to-to be economic. It is-right now it is a kind of Japanese habit, but this kind of idea originated from Dogen-zenji's way. And we appreciate-when we appreciate a smaller things rather than big things-big one. Our mind is directed always [toward] trivial matters rather than something great. And we do it without asking why. We just do it because we respect it. That is even more than respect. To respect things is something dualistic. "To be one with it," we say. When we become one with it, there is no idea of big or small. Smaller things is easier to be one with it, and simpler things is easier to practice one of the duality. We do not even figure out why we do this.

So this is the matter of sense, you know. This kind of thing is created with-with our way in our practice in a long time. So it is rather difficult for you to observe our way, I think. Nowadays young people come and practice Zen in Zen temple in summer vacation. If we told-if I told them to observe our way, they ask me why [laughs]-like you do, you know. And it is rather difficult to explain why [laughs], because we do not do it with some reason. This is just habit. Habit is very important. So to observe way until you-it become habit of you is very important.

Sometime I, you know, I am amused myself [laughs] to observe Japanese way in America. When I go to grocery store-grocery store, I usually buy worst fruits or old-oldest [laughs] vegetables. If I see something good I, you know, I take off the something good to find something bad. And why I buy something-the worst one, because I feel very sorry [laughing, laughter throughout story] for the worst one. This is habit, you know, and I pay same amount of money. So at the store they are interested in my way of buying. "Why don't you take this one? This one is better," they say. "No, I want to buy this one." And they say, "Why? Why?" I will say, "I don't know why." And I-I amuse myself, you know, [with] my habit. I have very funny habit. But I couldn't get rid of my forgetfulness. I tried pretty hard, but I still forget.

But to repeat something is not so difficult. If you repeat it, it will be a part of you, and this is, you know, how we observe our way. Here at Tassajara you do not pass big pickle dish, you know. You divide mine and put it in front of me. But if you pass, you know, our pickles in one big dish starting for me, I always eat [laughs]-I shall always eat the worst part [laughs], and in the monastery, the last one will eat the best part.

This is, you know, our-our way and our habit. No one ask us why. But sometime, or when I was young, some people explained why. He said, "You should cultivate your virtue. You should accumulate your merit. If you do not eat, if you give others good part of the pickle, that much you will accumulate your virtue-merit. That is why you should take worst part of the pickle." And I thought, you know, it was, you know-then I would rather take the best part [laughs, laughter] to save others-to let them [laughs, laughter]-to let them accumulate more merit. I don't want to accumulate merit for myself. But I didn't try, but I thought so. Really I thought so.

So there is no reason, actually, if there is some reason, as already said, you will be punished [laughs] by it-by it. But punishment, you know-but we cannot believe punishment either. The reason why is everything has buddha-nature. That will be the final answer. In this way, and the best way to understand what is buddha-nature is just to practice our way and treat things very carefully. Because even though everything has buddha-nature, it does not mean you can mix up everything.

As Dogen-zenji said in his Instruction for Cook,[5] "Something which should be put [in a] higher place, should be put higher place. Something which should be lower place, should be lower place." Everything has its own function and virtue. So according to the virtue, we should treat them. If we treat them according to its virtue-only when we treat them according to its virtue, true value or same value-everything will have same value. Because water cannot be exchanged for fire, fire has its own virtue and water has its own virtue. So water should be in the kettle and fire should be under the kettle, you know. If everything is its own place, everything has same value, he says. So we should not mix up everything.

In same value is in the different-the absolute value-everything has absolute value because of its differentiation from each other-because it is different from others. If everything is same, they will lose the value. It should be different. Because it is different, it is value. So to mix-mix up everything is to kill buddha-nature. There is no more buddha-nature. So when one is teacher, he should be teacher. When one is student, he should be a student. But it does not mean student cannot be a teacher. So we rather put emphasis on validity than universality. We acknowledge the differentiation, or we appreciate the differentiation rather than universality. The valid-validity is-will be acknowledged when universality or when the absolute value reveal itself on some special thing which is-is different from others-other being. When you put emphasis on the universality, you know, everything lose its own value.

When you mix, you know, male and female and divide in two [laughs], you will lose your life. Man should be a man, and woman should be a woman because, you know, man and woman is different. There is value and there is life [?].

So we rather put emphasis on the difference between each being. Although we put emphasis on difference, we do not acknowledge-we do not discriminate which is better. It is different, but both is same value or absolute value because it is different. When you put emphasis on universality, it means you are killing things. At least the value of things will be ignored. True value of each existence will be ignored. If you see-if it-it is like to see many mountains in one view. You can see many mountains, you know-you will enjoy to see many mountains, but if you are interested-when you are interested in the sight of the mountains you see, the value of each mountain will be ignored. To call you, you know-if I call you by name of human being-"Hi, human being!" [laughs, laughter], your character will be ignored. Everyone is human being, you know. We don't know whether [laughs] you-you are man or woman or young lady or old lady: any human being [laughs]. It doesn't make any sense. If you are called by your name, you know, you will be happy.

So universal value is something very vague [?], and not distinctive, and not interesting at all. So when-only when you see-you appreciate many kinds of things which is different from each other, you will have happy life. You will enjoy our life. This kind of thing is quite obvious. It is-there is no need [for] any interpretation or philosophical discussion about it. It is actual truth. But there are various way of life, and there are misunderstanding with your life, so there must be some philosophy as a background of this kind of teaching. That is why we find our teaching pretty difficult, especially when you studied intellectually. The best way is just to practice until you understand it. This method is completely different method: to force some way on us.

In our practice we do not like to be caught by some rules. Nevertheless, we make best effort to observe our way. When we make best effort to observe our way, there is no more rules. The rules are part of us. Whether the rules are part of you or not will be checked out by your teacher [laughter]. Even though you are observing our way, you know, if the rules is not a part of you, you know, he will see it. The point is your sincerity, not form. We rather put emphasis on each one's own way.

In Tassajara-here in Tassajara, I think you have difficult time in observing our way, which is not familiar to you. But I want you to observe it first of all, and then you can discuss about our way. So observation is first and discussion is next. Now if you discuss, you know, I think the conclusion [laughs] will still-will not be-will not-your discussion will not result [in] same idea we have had. So if you practice it, and if you have-if you find some problem, you know, about that problem I want you to discuss. This kind of discussion is very important,

I think. Especially this kind of idea is quite new to me. By discussion you will have chance to explain why you observe our way. So others will be interested in our way.

So without experience of observing it, to discuss our rules is not right, because we put emphasis on our experience, not, you know, discussion itself-intellectual discussion, whether this is Japanese way [laughs] or American way. We have not much idea of Japanese or American way. Whatever way may be good ways [laughs]. American way, I think, or our way. So we should find out. We should try to improve our way, and we should develop our way. This is bodhisattva's mind or spirit.

---

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (4/4/01).

[1] "There are (ari) two (futatsu) eyes (me). There are (ari) two (fusatsu) ears (mimi). There is (ari) one (hitotsu) mouth (kuchi)." Suzuki-roshi also discussed this topic in a Sandokai lecture (SR-70-06-20). Japanese phrases were graciously translated by Yoko Hanabusa.

[2] Suzuki-roshi probably meant to say "mouth."

[3] In Tenzo Kyokun, quoting Baoning Renyong (Honei Ninyu)-c. 11th century Linji (Rinzai) master.

[4] Hanshaku-kyo: a bridge beyond the entrance gate of Eihei-ji. See also Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind: "Nirvana, the Waterfall," p. 92, and SR-69-08-01.

[5] Tenzo Kyokun.

10 - First Shosan Ceremony at Tassajara

Wednesday, December 31, 1969

First Shosan Ceremony at Tassajara
Tassajara

Buddha-although Buddha started teaching at Paranasi,[1] but actually when he attained enlightenment under the Buddha-Bodhi tree, he started his teaching for the people now. After sitting for seven days, I want to see and I want to hear your true teaching. Now come and show me your teaching.

Student A: My heart is full of joy. This zendo at Tassajara is like my own home. Sitting in zazen, eating with my fellow monks, trying to follow the way of my roshi. Word by word, moment by moment, feeling by feeling, my delusion and my feeling is expressed in this moment.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. "In this moment" is right. Don't live in future or past.

Student A: Thank you very much.

Student B (Dan Welch): Docho-roshi, as the sun enlightens our daily life, as the stars never cease to shine, how is it possible to forget?

Suzuki-roshi: To-excuse me?

Student B: Forget.

Suzuki-roshi: To forget it. Originally you do not forget it.

Student B: Thank you very much.

Student C: Docho-roshi, outside I see the trees, and the things that grow, and the rocks seem to do perfect zazen. And I see my own potentiality for this, yet still I feel great fear. Please tell me what is the true nature of fear?

Suzuki-roshi: Fear has no reason why it arise. So when the rocks and running water become a part of you, when you become truly their friend, there will be no fear.

Student C: Thank you very much.

Student D: Docho-roshi, the fish is in the water. The water is in the fish. It is soundless, and you cannot hear it. It is clear, and you cannot see it. It has no smell. How can there possibly be a mistake?

Suzuki-roshi: There is no mistake whatsoever.

Student D: Thank you very much.

Student E: Docho-roshi, I have two questions. Where is home? What is true strength?

Suzuki-roshi: When you start wondering about there is no home, there is no strength. But if you find your home in this moment at this place, you have enough strength to practice our way. And home is right here.

Student E: Thank you very much.

Student F: Docho-roshi, in our practice should we try to overcome our weakness or should we try to work through it?

Suzuki-roshi: Why you should overcome? You should try to overcome when there is no big mind or no small mind.

Student F: Thank you very much.

Student G: Docho-roshi, what place is this?

Suzuki-roshi: What place is this?

Student G: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: This is Tassajara zendo.

Student G: Thank you very much.

Student H: Docho-roshi, after four months' training and seven-day sesshin, what am I doing here?

Suzuki-roshi: You are doing nothing.

Student H: Thank you very much.

Student I: Docho-roshi, I'm afraid to ask you a question. Why?

Suzuki-roshi: Because you see me as your teacher always.

Student I: Thank you very much.

Suzuki-roshi: Open your eyes and listen to me more.

Student J: Docho-roshi, how is it possible to lose the fear of no nose, no mouth, no eyes, no world of eyes?

Suzuki-roshi: Fear comes from your ego. So the way is to open up your mind so that there is no more ego.

Student J: Thank you very much.

Student K: Docho-roshi, is there only one act of devotion?

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me? There is only-I couldn't follow you.

Student K: Is there only one act of devotion?

Suzuki-roshi: After devotion, devotion itself only one. And devotional life will be continued one after another incessantly.

Student K: Thank you very much.

Student L: Docho-roshi, when we are silent, what is the question?

Suzuki-roshi: There is no question when you are silent, but when you are in activity, you will have innumerable questions. But questions should be answered on each moment-in each moment.

Student L: Thank you very much.

Student M: Docho-roshi, how can I stop to ask a question?

Suzuki-roshi: Originally there is no need to ask a question. Your active mind bring about many questions. So the point is to practice our pure way. Then at least at that time you have no question.

Student M: Thank you very much.

Student N: Docho-roshi, why did you and why did all the buddhas and patriarchs joy [join?] to teach and save others?

Suzuki-roshi: Try to teach what?

Student N: Why did they teach and try to save others?

Suzuki-roshi: Save others. Because all of them are part of them [?].

Student N: Thank you very much.

Student O: Docho-roshi, as I accept you as my teacher more and more, I find more and more a growing dependency on you in that role, and I'm afraid of this. What can I do about it?

Suzuki-roshi: There is no need to be afraid of being a part of me. Don't be afraid of me, and try to study hard.

Student O: But what happens if something happens to you, and you can't be our teacher any more?

Suzuki-roshi: That cannot be happen. I am always with you forever.

Student O: Thank you very much.

Student P: Docho-roshi, how or why has this come about that we can feel that we have lost our home and make the journey-what we think is a journey to return to it? How-why-why is this?

Suzuki-roshi: That's-your feeling is opposite. You think you started your journey from home, but real home is here. Don't [go] wandering about to various countries.

Student P: I understand that, but I wonder why it is that we do that?

Suzuki-roshi: Because you started your-you feel you started your journey from your home, which is not true home. It was not true home.

Student P: Thank you very much.

Suzuki-roshi: You must feel as if you came back to your home right now.

Student Q: Docho-roshi, what is the fundamental cause of the universe?

Suzuki-roshi: Cause of youness [?]?

Student Q: Universe.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student Q: Universe.

Suzuki-roshi: Universe. Ah, we do not discuss about it because there is no beginning or no end for the universe.

Student Q: Thank you very much.

Student R: No beginning, no end. No teacher, no student. No and yes. Yes, yes, yes, yes, yes, yes, yes, no, yes, yes, no, no, yes, yes, yes, no.

Suzuki-roshi: That's right.

Student R: Thank you very much.

Suzuki-roshi: Don't forget you said "yes." Do not forget that you said "yes" with "no."

Student R: Thank you very much.

Student S: Docho-roshi, what is it that the great sages have said speaks when you are silent, yet is silent when you speak?

Suzuki-roshi: Great sages always, incessantly [are] giving teaching, not only through his mouth, but also by his blinks of eyes, walking, sitting, lying down. Always he is showing the truth.

Student S: Thank you very much.

Student T: Docho-roshi: Roshi, when a person has saved himself or herself, has that person also saved the world?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. Whole universe will be saved. If it is not so, he did not save himself or save others.

Student T: Thank you very much.

Student U: Docho-roshi, we can succeed in directing our effort inside. How can there be anything outside our effort?

Suzuki-roshi: There is no inside or outside. We say our effort should be directed towards inside, but why we say is to suggest to you the direction. One arrow will get through past, present, and future: the three worlds. And the arrow will continuously go forward. Don't think the arrow is always going outward. To outward-to go outward, one thousand miles means to come back-to going back one thousand miles. So don't think there is outside or inside in our practice.

Student U: Thank you very much.

Student V: Docho-roshi, should we think or ponder about [1-2 words] our problems or anything?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes you should. But if you want to think in its true sense, you should resume the area where you do not think. That is pure practice.

Student V: Thank you very much.

Suzuki-roshi: Your thinking should not be based on unreal foundation.

Student W: Docho-roshi, is it necessary-words, questions, or even thinking?

Suzuki-roshi: For you it may not be necessary. Continue your practice.

Student W: Thank you very much.

[Long pause.]

Suzuki-roshi: I know what you mean. Go and rest. Go and rest.

Student X (Ed Brown): Docho-roshi, I have many questions. But they seem to come and go, and they don't seem very important. And everyone seems to have worked very hard during sesshin.

Suzuki-roshi: The question is not-should not be about whether it is right or wrong. Right now, the most important thing is to find what is the most important thing. Still, your question is directed to wrong direction. You are asking yourself for others, which is not important. The most important thing is to find-to be involved in what you do-what you are doing now, without thinking "good" or "bad." Stop asking-stop thinking, and devote yourself to your kitchen work. Whatever people say, or whatever you yourself say, you should not be concerned about it.

Student X: Thank you very much.

Student Y: Docho-roshi, you have told me at first I must serve in calmness.

Suzuki-roshi: Serve?

Student Y: Serve in calmness others.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student Y: Is the boss that is illumined by the mind[']s calmness only a small boss?

Suzuki-roshi: There is actually no small or big boss. When you call any boss, that is your boss. Because you think this is big boss or great boss, your practice is not any more true practice. Don't be involved in good or bad, high or low. Just do what you should do at that moment.

Student Y: Thank you very much.

Student Z: Docho-roshi, automobile go to San Francisco, jet plane to New York, rockets to the moon. Where does instant mind go when it's not here?

Suzuki-roshi: Instant?

Student Z: Instant mind.

Suzuki-roshi: Inst- [partial word]-?

Student Z: Where does the mind go-

Suzuki-roshi: When?

Student Z: -when it's not here?

Suzuki-roshi: Mind does not go or come back. Mind is always here.

Student Z: Thank you very much.

Suzuki-roshi: The mind which [goes] wandering about is not true mind.

Student AA: Docho-roshi, there is no question that is not answered before it is asked. Have I spoken truly?

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me, I couldn't follow you.

Student AA: There is no question that is not answered-

Suzuki-roshi: That is not answered.

Student AA: -before it is asked.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Every questions is answered when you ask question already.

Student AA: Thank you very much.

Student BB: Docho-roshi, to do it all in the present moment, and to be totally involved in the present moment, and yet it seems so impossible with so much feeling and so many thoughts. It seems so impossible.

Suzuki-roshi: Too many thoughts is all right. That is not the point. The point is to be concerned about too many thought or no thought. All thought-all the thought you have is one thought or no thought. I am not saying to stop your activity. I am not counting how many thought you have. All the thought you have is originally one thought. If it is one thought, that is no thought.

Student BB: Thank you very much.

Suzuki-roshi: So don't be concerned about the thought you have. Don't be bothered by it. You should think. To think is all right, but to be bothered by it or to discriminate good thought or bad thought is bad.

Student BB: Thank you very much.

Student CC: Docho-roshi, snow is piled deep in the mountain pass making it nearly impenetrable. How do we pass from here?

Suzuki-roshi: If you want to pass, you can. There is no difficulty in passing through. Is there any difficulty? I don't think so.

Student CC: Thank you very much.

Student DD: Docho-roshi, thank you for coming to the United States. Thank you for bringing us your teaching. And thank you for showing me this new life and our way. Thank you very much.

Suzuki-roshi: Thank you.

Student EE: Docho-roshi, what now?

Suzuki-roshi: Now. Don't ask me. Now is now. You have now. I have my own now. That is why now is so important. It is beyond question and answer.

Student EE: Thank you very much.

Student FF: Docho-roshi, who are the sangha?

Suzuki-roshi: We are. Those who are in Tassajara is sangha-in limited sense. But all of us-all sentient being are sangha.

Student FF: Thank you very much.

Student GG: Docho-roshi, if everything changes, why is there always suffering?

Suzuki-roshi: Because-because of change. Change itself is suffering. If change is essential nature for everything, suffering cannot be avoid. There is-because there is no way to avoid from it. If you know there is no other-no way to avoid from it, there is our relief.

Student HH: Docho-roshi, neither mind nor Buddha, what is this?

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student HH: Neither mind nor Buddha. What is this?

Suzuki-roshi: Neither mind nor Buddha, did you say?

Student HH: Right.

Suzuki-roshi: Neither mind nor Buddha points out the real Buddha because we are caught by the word of Buddha. If we say "Buddha," we want to find out where is Buddha, when Buddha is right here. So "neither mind nor Buddha," we say.

Student HH: Thank you very much.

Student II: Docho-roshi, who observes our way?

Suzuki-roshi: You observe our way-when you observe our way everything observe our way. So our way is universal way, and at the sa-[partial word]-at the same time your own way.

Student II: Thank you very much.

Suzuki-roshi: Yakusan-zenji-Yakusan-zenji did not give lecture for a long time.[2] The monks asked him to give them lecture. Yakusan-zenji mounted on-on the altar, and seeing every monk one by one, and came down from the altar, and went back to his own room again. A monk asked-a monk who was responsible for the zendo asked him why did he-didn't he give any lecture? Yakusan said, there is a master-there is scripture master or Buddhist philosophy master, and I am master of Zen. Don't wonder who I am, he said.

Zen monks are Zen monks because they are speaking in fluently without saying anything-just by everyday activity. That is how Zen student should be. That is why I said Buddha started giving teaching when he attained enlightenment under the Bodhi tree in the country of Magadha. [3] We should not forget this point.

And we should take care of our practice, not only zazen practice but only-whatever we do in Tassajara. I am very grateful for you to observe our way in various way without asking why we do that or why we should do this. Whatever you do, that is our practice. There you will find out yourself. Our practice is valuable because we can find out ourselves on what you do in that moment.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (4/5/01).

[1] From a meal chant: "Buddha was born at Kapilavastu, enlightened at Magadha, taught at Paranasi, entered nirvana at Kusinara."

[2] Yaoshan Weiyen (Jap. Yakusan Igen): 751-834. Disciple of Sekito Kisen. Master of Ungan, Senu, and Dogo. This story is Case 7 of the Ts'ung-jung lu (Jap. Shoyoroku, Book of Serenity) collection of koans. See also SR-68-10-12-A, SR-69-06-00, and SR-71-08-08.

[3] One of the newly formed and powerful monarchies on the Ganges Plain at the time of Shakyamuni Buddha.

1968 (25)

1968 januari (2)

1 - Ten Buddhas

Thursday, January 11, 1968

Ten Buddhas
Tassajara

I already explained about Maitreya Buddha when I explained about the three period-three period of Buddhism. And in this occasion, I want to explain this-all of the Ten Buddhas which we recite [at] mealtime:

Homage to the pure Dharmakaya Vairochana Buddha.

I already explained Vairochana Buddha.

And to the complete Sambhogakaya Vairochana Buddha.

To the numerous Nirmanakaya Shakyamuni Buddha.

To the future Maitreya Buddha.

I explained already Maitreya Buddha.

To all buddhas, past, present and future all over the world.

To the Mahayana Saddharmapundarika-sutra.

To the great Mañjushri Bodhisattva.

To the Mahayana Samantabhadra Bodhisattva.

To the great compassionate Avalokiteshvara Bodhisattva.

To the many bodhisattvas, mahasattvas.

To the Mahaprajñaparamita.

Here we have complete teaching of Buddha. Dharmakaya Buddha, Sambhogakaya Buddha, Nirmanakaya Buddha. This is Buddha. And here we have Mahayana bodhisattvas. And we have also the Mahayana Mahaprajñaparamita. This is the teaching. So we have here Buddha and sangha and dharma. So to recite those names actually-if you recite those names with deeper understanding, it means you are repeating, you are practicing the Buddha's way.

And Buddha-we have three ways of-meaning of Buddha, or understanding of Buddha: Dharmakaya Buddha, Sambhogakaya Buddha, and Nirmanakaya Buddha. Buddha as a truth-as the truth is Dharmakaya Buddha. The Buddha as rewarded body is Sambhogakaya Buddha. And Buddha which takes various form to help people is Nirmanakaya Buddha.

When Shakyamuni Buddha help people, providing various teaching, like a doctor who make prescription for the invalid, is Nirmanakaya Buddha, "incarnated body," we say. Sambhogakaya Buddha is the Buddha-rewarded body or attained the buddhahood which was attained through his practice, is Sambhogakaya Buddha. Dharmakaya Buddha, as I said, Buddha as a truth. So historical Buddha is actually Nirmanakaya Buddha.

And Buddha who express-who realized the truth is Dharmakaya Buddha, Buddha as the truth. Whether he attained enlightenment or not, Buddha will be there. Truth is there. So, in this sense, although he realized the truth, but he-although he realize the truth, if we put emphasis on the truth itself, rather than its body or rather than its spiritual or physical being, that is Dharmakaya Buddha. Although he has-he is the embodiment of the truth, without practice he cannot attain enlightenment or he cannot express the truth. Only when he actually practice the truth, the truth will be realized-realization of the truth will take place in this sense. We called him Sambhogakaya Buddha.

So Nirmanakaya Buddha, or Sambhogakaya Buddha, or Dharmakaya Buddha, actually one. In this way we understand Buddha. And here, instead of Buddha himself, the name of Vairochana Buddha is here.

To-homage to the pure Dharmakaya, Vairochana Buddha.

To the complete Sambhogakaya, Vairochana Buddha.

Vairochana Buddha sometime may be Dharmakaya, but sometime he is also Sambhogakaya because he is the bodhisattva. Before he become Vairochana Buddha, he was a bodhisattva and practiced his way according to his vow.

To the numerous Nirmanakaya, Shakyamuni Buddha.

We say:

All the buddhas, past and future-past, present, and future.

When they realize-when they become buddha, they become Shakyamuni Buddha. So Shakyamuni Buddha will be numerous. So it is not only Shakyamuni Buddha that-who attained enlightenment. All the patriarchs and bodhisattvas will be the Buddha-Shakyamuni Buddha.

To the future Maitreya Buddha.

I explained Maitreya Buddha already.

To all buddhas past, present, and future all over the world.

Here "world," this "world" is not just this human world. There are many worlds. So this "world" means worlds-various worlds in which there are various worlds.

To the Mahayana Saddharmapundarika-sutra.

This is-this sutra is supposed to be-to-supposed to have highest teaching of Buddha as well as Avatamsaka-sutra.

To the great Mañjushri Bodhisattva.

Mañjushri Bodhisattva-I explained the great Mañjushri Bodhisattva when I explained Prajñāparamita-sutra.

To the Mahayana Samantabhadra Bodhisattva.

The Mahayana Samantabhadra Bodhisattva is the bodhisattva who is famous for his ten vows. Samantabhadra Bodhisattva. Samantabhadra. Samanta means universal. Bhadra means wisdom or sagacity or deep wisdom [?]. Here when we say Samanta and bhadra looks like near the same, but there is great difference.

Usually through intellectual understanding, you will-you may have the universal truth, you know. You may understand what is universal truth inducing-by induction or by experience or by thinking. But wisdom which we mean cannot be acquired through thinking or by experience.

In your philosophy there were various dispute whether it is possible to have perfect wisdom by experience. Through experience you will have some knowledge or deep perfect understanding, or that is-or someone may say it is not possible to acquire the perfect understanding by experience. So even experience-it is-we are-we cannot be sure to have perfect understanding. In-according to Buddhism, it is not possible to have the perfect understanding through experience. The accumulation of experience-even though you repeat same experience over and over, that result of experience is still experience, and that is not-that cannot be the perfect truth.

We-that which you will attain through experience will be some universality. But some accurate, substantial, solid, tangible feeling, or meaning cannot be attained by experience. So we put emphasis on validity rather than universality. This validity could be acquired through right meditation. If you, you know-if zazen practice is just to acquire or to attain some special experience, that is not true zazen. True zazen that you have acquired or obtained by-through right practice is not-is more than just experience. You may say this-what you acquire by right meditation is something-the power, you may say power of adjusting yourself according to the circumstances. Sometime we put emphasis on flexibility. You know, you should be always ready to respond to the circumstances. So when you have perfect ability to respond to the circumstances is the purpose of-is what you will have through right meditation. Even though you do not realize, you do not think, or you do not aware of your-the merit of your zazen, it does not mean you haven't acquired anything. Even though you think you have-you have had some special experience, but that does not mean you acquired the true power of meditation. That is why we say "think non-thinking." So you may say-obtain something which you cannot obtain, or you know, whatever. Anyway, what you will have through zazen is more than what you think you have acquired. This kind of acquisition cannot be attained by experience or thinking.

That is why this bodhisattva has-Samantabhadra Bodhisattva-this bodhisattva is called Samantabhadra. Samanta is "universal, universality." And bhadra means "wisdom" or "validity"-more solid and concrete idea. Anyway, his name is Samantabhadra, universal and-universality and sagacity. So this bodhisattva is bodhisattva of all the dharma, all the universal teaching, all the dharma. As bodhisattva, Avalokiteshvara is the bodhisattva of compassion. This bodhisattva is the bodhisattva of wisdom or truth. But this truth here-by "truth" I do not mean some truth in ordinal [ordinary] sense. It is more than truth. It is more concrete. It is more tangible.

And here-and there is-again there is two meaning in samanta. One is universal buddha as a Dharmakaya Buddha, and the other is the universal buddha as a Nirmanakaya Buddha, you see? He is-he is Dharmakaya Buddha, but on the other hand he is Nirmanakaya Buddha. He is also Nirmanakaya Buddha. Nirmanakaya Buddha is more concrete, not abstract. Dharmakaya Buddha is more abstract buddha, buddha as a truth. Buddha before he takes various form is Dharmakaya Buddha. But Nirmanakaya Buddha is-may be various being which has form and color. So this bodhisattva has two side: He is universal buddha as a Dharmakaya Buddha, and also Nirmanakaya Buddha as a more concrete buddha which has form and color.

As a Dharmakaya Buddha, his body is omnipresent or-truth itself as a Dharmakaya-as a Nirmanakaya Buddha, his body is more real, tangible buddha. So each one of us will be Nirmanakaya Buddha. But if you think in this way, it is not only this bodhisattva who is Dharmakaya and Nirmanakaya. All of us is also Nirmanakaya Buddha and Dharmakaya Buddha.

So if you practice, or if you realize who is this bodhisattva, you will realize who you are. This is the characteristic of Mahayana buddha or bodhisattva. So to repeat, to-and every bodhisattva has their own-his own vow. And if-his vow may not be just his special vow but our-may be the vow we should take.

This bodhisattva has ten vows-ten vows. And I want to explain one by one. But before I explain it I want to explain, or I want to make it clear what is true wisdom. I think I already explained about what is true wisdom once or twice. But it-as it is rather difficult to explain it, so I don't know whether you understood it or not, partly because [laughs] it is rather hard for me to explain it.

Did I expl- [partial word]-do you remember the classifications of our way of observing things? To observe things from the viewpoint of existence-viewpoint of existence, and viewpoint of nonexistence, and viewpoint of superior existence-superior viewpoint. Viewpoint of existence is usual, you know, way of observing things, usual understanding of is one of nature. And almost all the people are involved in this viewpoint. The viewpoint-from this point, your question will be, "What is it?" And when you have true under- [partial word]-better understanding, or the second understanding, your question will be, "How things goes?"

Even people who is not satisfied with materialistic way of life, as long as their view of life is based on some substantial viewpoint of existence, they cannot get out of materialistic way of life. Even though they seek for some spiritual life, in their spiritual life there is various materialistic values [?] or [1 word]. And evil and spirits there may be because their understanding is just bound by some idea of existence or substance which cannot-which exist actually. When nothing concrete exist, nothing permanent exist.

Some people believe in some evil spirits, you know [laughs], which works in the same way on you, you know. But no evil spirit can work in the same way forever. They are changing. Whatever exist-whatever the existence may be, they are changing. There is nothing that does not change. If so, there is no evil-special evil spirits who work in the same way. To believe in some permanent one deity, you know, is also based on the idea of existence. So we cannot take this aspect. Even though you say "spiritual life," but that is not spiritual life. It is another form of material life.

Then, if everything is changing, nothing exist, nothing special exist. This is true, but in the smallest particle of time, everything exist. Although everything is changing, but, you know, moment after moment it will change. But everything-at that moment, smallest particle of time exist in that form or color with close, close relationship with some other things. That is true.

So the third aspect or superior aspect include two aspects of existent and nonexistent, or the first and the second. But even though you understand this truth, it does not mean you have the third aspect. Actually, to attain-to have, to obtain the third aspect there is no other way to practice our way, or else you cannot obtain this aspect. Whatever you say, however, that is-as long as your aspect is in realm of thinking, that is not real[ly] the third aspect.

So if you study our way intellectually, you should arrange the various teaching in some order, or you have to find out some system of the teaching. But when it is necessary to-for you to accept teaching, one by one, as long as you rely on intellectual understanding, you should compare one teaching to the other. But our way of understanding of teaching is quite different.

In Rinzai school, if you, you know, pass one koan, it is good enough. You should pass koan, one by one, without comparing one koan to the other. Of course, in Rinzai there are some teachers who arrange koans, you know. We call it "stepladder practice"-stepladder, one by one [laughs].

But in Tendai school, they say that is-to arrange teaching vertically, to compare teaching to the other teaching is to arrange teaching. But level? What-what do you say?

Student: Horizontal.

Suzuki-roshi: Horizontal way, yeah.

So we should not arrange teaching horizontal or vertical. We should, you know, realize the meaning of the teaching, one by one, without arranging. So this is not only Zen way but also Tendai's way. So-called-it, middle way in Tendai is a way to accept teaching one by one without arranging it. That is the middle way. That is the understanding-that is the third understanding which you will acquire by the third aspect, or wisdom, perfect wisdom. That is the middle way.

So when we practice our way, we give up the one, the first aspect which is aspect of existence, and aspect of nonexistence, or the second aspect. We give up all those aspects and practice our way, resuming in a fundamental life act [?] or life force which is not intellectual or emotional.

You may understand why we practice our way in so-called-it shikantaza. We do not say shikantaza [2-4 words]. But some people say shikantaza. In Shobogenzo there are many words. [Unclear phrase in Japanese: shikan plus 2-3 words] like the shikantaza. But it means-we say "just to sit," but "just to sit" does not-means not-don't depend on intellectual understanding. But use the intellectual understanding. This is our way.

So you may understand true-our Buddhist traditional way of practice or understanding. So whatever books, texts you read there is Zen. So all those scriptures is the truth of Zen by which you will understand what is Zen. If you have eyes to read it, you know, this is not just scripture, just Buddhist scripture. This is Zen text which you should read. But there is no need to read all of those scriptures because there is no need to arrange it vertically or horizontally. So if you open some part of the scripture, there is Zen. In this way, we should understand our way, and we should read scriptures. When you can read scriptures you can find out, you can enjoy your life whatever you do. To read scripture is nothing but to appreciate, to enjoy, or-. That is why we recite ten names of Buddha when we have meals.

Each buddha, you know, is Mañjushri Bodhisattva who is taking care of our practice. Even the name of-even he has many names, he is the buddha who is taking care of our practice.

Next time I want to explain the ten vows-ten vows of Fugen-Fugen-bosatsu or Samantabhadra Bodhisattva.

Do you have question? Some question? Hai.

Student A: I don't quite understand the Samantabhadra Bodhisattva.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: What do you mean by-that it's a realized [1 word] bodhisattva? I just don't understand.

Suzuki-roshi: Samanta?

Student A: Pardon me. Sambhogakaya.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student A: Sambhogakaya.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, Sambhogakaya.

Student A: Pardon me. The Sambhogakaya.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Sambhogakaya is-we say, you know, without practice there is no buddha, you know. It means practice is buddha. When you practice there is buddha. But if you do not have real understanding of practice or everyday life, you know, you-your understanding is not based on the real understanding. So that is-that understanding is not true understanding of ourselves, or each being, or everyday activity. That you have true understanding of practice means that you have the meaning of-true meaning of everyday life. You may say, "Even though I don't understand," you know, "true meaning of life, I am buddha." In this-if-when you say so, your understanding is based on, you know, some substantial understanding some buddha-buddha, you know-something buddha, some special thing, you know. But buddha is, you know, is not some substantial being. "Whether or not I understand him, there is buddha," you may say. Or, "I am buddha. Even though I don't practice zazen I am buddha. So there may not be no need to practice zazen." But when you say so, your understanding is quite different from our understanding, which is practice and buddha is one [?], or enlightenment is one [?], or whatever we do, that is buddha.

So Sambhogakaya Buddha, which is rewarded body, which is one with everyday life, which is nothing but each being, means to, you know, to realize the buddha through-or you may say to express your idea of buddha through your way of practice or your everyday life. That is Sambhogakaya-idea of Sambhogakaya.

[Laughs.] Do you understand? Not quite [laughs].

"Rewarded body," we say, but it is not like accumulation of our practice. We-as a rewarded stage, you will attain enlightenment. But rewarded body is-when there is something, there is already buddha. That is Sambhogakaya.

For ordinal [ordinary] people, of course, you know, because of many kalpas of time, you know-because of Buddha's many kalpas of practice he attained buddhahood in this way, scripture says. But that is just more dramatic, you know, or poetic expression. "Many kalpas of time-after he practice many kalpas of time, he attained buddhahood," or-. But actually the rewarded body is-means oneness of practice and buddhahood. Oneness of your everyday life and buddhahood. That is Sambhogakaya. [Laughs.]

May be, yeah-may be difficult to accept it, especially when I say your everyday life [laughs]-oneness of enlightenment and your everyday life. That may be difficult to accept it, but it is so. Because it is difficult to accept it, you sit, you know. Even while [1 word] you sit without thinking about this kind of, you know-not make any sense, you know. You can say-so if you want to understand it, just sit [laughs] without asking question. In your sitting, you should not sit for anything [?]. Just sit. When your find-when you find yourself in zazen, you will have various ability [?] you can [3-5 words] without any problem.

You have some question?

Student B: When you say Mañjushri Bodhisattva takes care of our practice, does that include prayer, then?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: When you say that Mañjushri takes care of our practice should we pray to him [1-2 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Mañjushri.

Student B: Mañjushri Bodhisattva. Am I pronouncing it wrong?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Again, that is your understanding-based on the substantial understanding, you know. Forget all about any substantial idea. This is-I-I-I realize this point is very, very important for, you know, for people. When doctor come, I was listening to him lecture. And I was very much interested in his [1-2 words]. He is rejecting substantial, you know, understanding from beginning to end. And this is the, you know-this is why, you know, we cannot understand Buddhism or our way.

Actually there is nothing, you know [laughs], including you. If so, we should just sit. Then you will be, you know-you will be the one including everything. Because, you know, you do not get accustomed to this kind of-to live in this form you are not accustomed to it, your own home. So you are, you know, seeking for, you are wandering [wondering?] about finding your home. "Where is my home?" You are right-right in your home, and you are seeking for a home with substantial idea. The ...

[End of tape. A fragment of a lecture was found at the start of the master tape for SR-68-01-11-B, which seems almost certainly to be the end of this lecture. The fragment follows below.]

... without expecting anything. Just you can enjoy things outside of your home. Sometime you can-if it is something good, you can take-take it to your home [laughs]. But home is the most important [laughs] thing, not something which you-you have brought. That is zazen. [Chant follows.]

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Diana Bartle and Bill Redican (3/20/01).

2 - Samantabhadra

Friday, January 12, 1968

Samantabhadra
Tassajara

We are still studying about Samantabhadra Buddha. This buddha is told in Saddharma-in Kegon Sutra.[1] In Kegon-Kegon Sutra is famous for its view of dharma. In Kegon Sutra-the main thought of Kegon Sutra is perfect harmony with truth and various fact or things, and perfect harmony between every existing-every existence.

Jiji muge or riji muge.[2] Most people knows this special technical term. Jiji muge and riji muge. Riji muge-ri is truth or theory, and ji is things. Where you-where there is something, there is truth or theory. So through things you will understand the theory on which everything are based on. This much is understood [by] almost everyone, but perfect harmony between each things-this is rather hard to understand or rather hard to accept unless you study Buddhist thought more.

We say-we have-as I said last night,[3] our thought or our view of things is very substantial. And we think everything exist as it is and everything is independent from the rest of the things, but actually everything exist-everything is dependent with each other. Things are dependent with each other, and things are changing always. That things changes means it is not independent being. So there is-there should not be-there must be-originally things does not exist having some special self-nature. Strictly speaking, everything does not exist, but in the smallest particle of time things exist. Or as a smallest particle of element things exist.[4]

So in Kegon Sutra they divide things-they divide time and space in smallest particle. So in Kegon Sutra, when we-when we ex- [partial word]-when they explain this dharma world they use cosmic scale of explanation. So that is why the description is so great. I think I already read it. I read some of the description:

With deepest belief and understanding, through pure physical and mental action, to bow to the number of ultimate elements, to bow to the number of ultimate elements of all the buddhas-land in ten direction of the three worlds.

We don't know how many, you know, buddha here we have to bow to. It means that when we realize that in the smallest element there [are] innumerable elements. So each element consists of the innumerable elements. So we don't know what is the ultimate existent-existence.

When we reach this understanding-when we have this understanding, we have no more idea of self. Instead of having idea of self, we will see the Buddha in each world. So this world, if you say is great-this world is as great as cosmos. If you say this world is small, you will see the innumerable world in-even in a speck of dust. In this way we have to understand our world, and in this way we have to practice our way. So accordingly, this bodhisattva's practice is always based on this understanding.

To respect tathagata, this is the [vow] Number 1.

With the deepest belief and understanding, through pure physical and mental action, to bow to the number of ultimate elements of all the buddha-lands in ten directions of the three worlds, appearing in each of those world as innumerable bodies, as many as the number of ultimate elements of all the wondrous, incomprehensible buddhas, and bowing to them [1 word: sounds like casana] by [same word], and to continue this practice perpetually.

This is the first vow. So actually it means to continue this practice incessantly, and for us everything is Buddha. Large and small, everything is Buddha. So to respect Buddha means to respect everything.

And the second one-admiration of the tathagatas.

With deepest understanding, actually seeing innumerable of ultimate elements of all the buddha-lands in inexhaustible-

Excuse me.

With the deepest understanding, actually seeing the number of ultimate elements of all the buddha-lands in ten directions of the three worlds, making inexhaustible sound of sea from his tongue and from each of the innumerable sound making out world of the sea, to admire the sea of virtue and merits of all the tathagatas and to continue practice forever.

This is the second vow of the Samantabhadra Bodhisattva. This is also the practice, to treat everything as you treat your teacher or Buddha. As Dogen-zenji says, "You should not call rice-rice kome,"[5] you know. "You should call it okome." Okome is more, you know, honorary prefix. Okome. Instead of saying mizu, "water," [say] omizu. It means-o means honorary prefix. Or, "You should treat a grain of rice as you treat your eyes." This kind of practice comes from this idea.

So instead of respecting-instead of respecting things objectively, here we have-we respect-here we respect our practice instead. It looks like we put emphasis on to respect something, some particular thing. But actually, we respect the practice-practice of respecting thing.

Usually, you know, you-when you bow to Buddha you look like you are respecting Buddha, but actually why you bow to Buddha is to continue your practice. That is the point. Without having any particular idea of-any particular substantial idea or materialistic idea, just to live in bodhisattva's vow is the point.

So we practice our way to solemnize this dharma world. So without practice things doesn't mean anything. Because of our practice, things come to have some meaning. So without practice there is nothing. But when you have materialistic understanding of things, even though you do not practice in our way, things exist. But if you understand how things [are] going completely, you should continue your practice as things are going. This is the point of practice.

And the third one is about kuyo[6] in Japanese-to provide things for Buddha or sangha or dharma. In Sanskrit we say pujana-pujana.[7] You know, in-Vedanta was in the five-I don't know when they practice pujana, you know. It means to make offering or to recite sutra. Actually we offer incense. That is kuyo. To offer flower, that is also kuyo. And originally, we count four kuyo. One is, you know, to prepare food for the Buddha. And to prepare something to wear. And to prepare something to sleep in. And to prepare Buddha for-for Buddha something to-some medicine. Those are four kuyo. But later we count many and many ways of making offering or kuyo. This is also our practice.

And in Kegon Sutra why we make those offerings is described in detail. Why we-we do not use zuko.[8] Zuko is, you know, very fine powder of incense, you know. And we rub it, you know-we put in our hands like this, you know, when we have special ceremony. Why we do it, or why we burn incense, or why we offer flowers to Buddha? Zuko, which is the fine powder of incense, is to purify our body and everything. And to offer flower means to have compassionate mind. You think as if a beautiful flower open in your mind, and with this flower in your mind you should decorate the buddha-land. That is why we offer the flower to the Buddha. Why we burn incense is to pervade our way all over the place, all over the world. So when you burn incense, if wind come from east, incense will go to the west. According to the wind, the incense will pervade everywhere. That is why we offer incense. And each of the incense will be one merit. And one merit will be burned by wisdom fire and smoke of or smell of liberation will pervade all over the world. In Kegon Sutra, it is described in this way.

And food is to support our immortal practice. When we practice our way, sup- [partial word]-when we support our way by food, we will attain enlightenment. So to offer food, or to take food is to practice our way.

And light, candlelight or whatever light it may be-why we light-offer light is to break the darkness of ignorance. That is why we offer light. This is understanding.

And this is material offering, but there is dharma offering. The dharma offering is very symbolical and idealistic. To read, to recite sutra, or to build that-to build a shrine. Or to copy-to make copy of scripture, or to build, to make a bell, or to make buddha image, or to give lectures about scriptures, those are dharma offering or dharma kuyo, we say.

This is-it is not only-there are many kinds of description. When Buddhism was introduced to Japan-soon after Buddhism was introduced to Japan, we made big, big Vairochana Buddha. Do you know-I think you know the big bronze Buddha in Nara. This is a kind of, you know, kuyo in pretty large scale.

As the description of-cosmic description of Kegon Sutra-as it was described, way of making kuyo described in Kegon Sutra, they did it very big-they made big-great big Buddha, you know [laughs]. But it does not mean-what-true understanding of Kegon Sutra is not matter of big or small. But their understanding was rather primitive so they [laughs] made a big, big Buddha. With the best effort of the nation, they did it. And since then, Buddhism became more and more elaborate. Their practice more and more became elaborate. And they spent most of the time in their devotional way of practice until no commoner can follow their practice.

So when Kamakura period-when the government lost their power, the Samurai class arouse-arose and take over the influential controlling power. That was the Kamakura period. And various new schools appear at that time. Zen was one of the schools-new Buddhist school.

If you understand this kind of spirit of making offering, as Dogen-zenji says, offering should be like to offer the flower which blooms in remoted mountain to the Buddha. It should be like this. In spring, we-in Japan we have cherry blossom, and to offer that cherry blossom to the Buddha is kuyo-is offered to make offering.

This evening, you know, you saw big ring [laughs] around the moon, you know. To make offering to Buddha, to make the big ring-with a big ring to make offering to Buddha is kuyo. To hear the sound of the river should be kuyo, according to Dogen-zenji. So to have deeper understanding instead of shallow, substantial understanding is to make a perfect offering.

I am very grateful for you to make various offering to the altar. Sometime, you know, wildflower, sometime stone, or candlestick, or is sometimes stone. But this is, you know, true offering I think. And this is the true practice, offering of practice-our practice, which should be continued-continuously practiced. And when we practice our way in this way, there is buddha and we are also buddha. In this way, we should understand this bodhisattva's vows.

Do you have some question? Hai.

Student A: Could you explain again why the Kegon Sutra is supposed to have the highest truth?

Suzuki-roshi: Highest truth? The Kegon-yeah. You may say highest truth because the understanding of dharma is very profound. It is said that-I don't think that is true but-it is said that this is the sutra which Buddha had in his mind when he attained enlightenment. But he didn't know how to explain his lofty-his deep understanding of life. So he started to tell by Agama-sutra. Agama-sutra will be-is the first sutra which was told by him. Anyway, Kegon Sutra is very important sutra. But Saddharma-pundarika-sutra, or Hoke-kyo,[9] is also important sutra. The Hoke-kyo is more concrete-more concrete, while Kegon-kyo is very abstract.

First of all, when you want to be a Buddhist, you should understand the emptiness-or you should give up substantial viewpoint of life. But you should come back to the substantial explanation of the world. When you say something, you should put it into some word. When you put it in some word, it is already substantial. Saddharma-pundarika-sutra is more, you know, concrete and more-easier to understand and it is for everyone, while Kegon Sutra is very philosophical.

Student B: What is the English translation of Kegon?

Suzuki-roshi: Saddharm- [partial word]-no-Avatamsaka-sutra.

Student C: I don't understand about Saddharm-SamantabhadraBodhisattva. What was his role in Buddhist history?

Suzuki-roshi: Buddhist history?

Student C: How does he fit into the Kegon Sutra and into our meal chant?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, in Kegon Sutra, you know, most of the description of his teaching is in Kegon Sutra. If you read Kegon Sutra, you will have his name and that which-there is very important teaching is told by Buddha.

Student C: Was he one of Buddha's disciples?

Suzuki-roshi: I don't know. No one knows, maybe. Some of them, you know, some of the Buddha's disciples were Buddha's disciples, and some of them may not be actually, historically, Buddha's disciples.

Student C: Well then this sutra was supposed to be thought of by Buddha-

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student C: -told by Samantabhadra Bodhisattva.

Suzuki-roshi: Or told by Buddha.

Student C: I don't understand.

Suzuki-roshi: Told by Buddha about this bodhisattva.

Student C: Oh, I see.

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student D: This is-I'm not sure how to put the question, but last night you said that when we find the true power of zazen-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student D: -we wouldn't have trouble affecting what we want to affect, or it will just come naturally.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: And then at other times you've said that zazen doesn't help us or doesn't change us a bit.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughing.] Yeah. Yeah. Doesn't help. [Laughter.] Zazen doesn't help, you know. But your true nature will help. If you, you know, practice zazen because zazen will help you-with this idea if you practice zazen, it will not help you [laughs] because that is not true zazen.

Student E: Docho-roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student E: From time to time you emphasize a different recommendation for how we practice or do zazen.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Uh-huh..

Student E: Breathing, watching our breath, or concentrating our power in our hara, or last night you referred to shikantaza.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student E: When you change your recommendations, do you think that we as a group should change our way of practicing according to what you say in the lecture? Or just those who feel it?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, that is good question [laughs, laughter]. You know, I- the point is, you know-whatever practice you do, the point is to practice your way without expecting anything, you know. Just to be yourself you practice zazen. So even though you count [breathing]-even though you cannot do it properly, you should not be worried about it. Just do it. That is our way, you know. Even though your posture is not perfect, it is all right as long as you are practicing hard. You should not criticize your practice. Even though I recommend you some particular way, it does not mean if you cannot do that that is not zazen. Even though you can do it almost perfect, you know, it does not mean that is-it is not always true zazen. When you are involved in-when you limit the true meaning of zazen, or when you become critical with your zazen, or when you are proud of your good practice, that is not true zazen. Do you understand?

The way I recommend you is-I do not recommend it as the best way, you know. To put some strength in your hara is-means to take natural, deep breathing and to have calm mind. To be concentrated on your breathing or counting of breathing means-does not mean if you are just concentrated on your breathing I don't mind your posture or your mind-your wandering mind. You see? The point I-you concentrated on will be different, but the various instruction should be followed. Do you understand?

Student E: When you say-

Suzuki-roshi: Mudra, you know. "Don't lose your mudra," you know, means you should be-you should practice our way with whole-with all of your mind and body, in one word.

There are not so many, you know, points-pretty many, but, you know, in one word to keep your [laughs] posture right, and to keep your-when your posture is right your mind is also right.

Some more question?

Student F: Dogen-zenji said that the mind and body are one-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student F: -and the way is attained through the body. What did he mean by that?

Suzuki-roshi: Through? Not "through." To-mind and body is one, so if you practice physical practice, the mind is there, you know. True mind is there.

Student F: Thank you.

Suzuki-roshi: So what we should do is to sit in right posture.

Student G: Just a small question on posture. What your hands-should your fingers be together?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, fingers together. And you should not cross too deep or too shallow. See? Here, you have two joint here. And this joint and this joint will make one line-two lines.

Student G: Your first joint should be with your middle joint, and the middle joint-Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yours is right. If your mudra is not right, we correct your mudra. Some more question? Please ask me.

Student H: What are the three worlds?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? Three worlds?

Student H: Yes, that you mentioned tonight.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Past, present, and future.

Student I: And what are the ten directions?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] So in past-in present, you know, there is past and future, although-but we say "three worlds," and myriads of kalpas of time or something like that, you know. This is more-we should know, you know, what does it mean actually. The Indian literature is very, you know-scale is very big, and they repeat things-descriptions over and over again. And Buddhist scripture is not exception. But we should know what does it mean actually.

Student I: Are there supposed to be ten directions?

Suzuki-roshi: Ten-ten directions? Eight directions, and up and down-ten directions [laughs, laughter].

Student I: Like north, south, east, west?

Suzuki-roshi: And, you know, east and north [northeast], east-south [southeast].

Student I: Okay.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Eight and up and down. And there are a few this way [laughs, laughter]. So I don't know how many.

Student J: Is our community here different from the original Buddhist community? Or is it the same?

Suzuki-roshi: I don't know exactly [laughs, laughter]. This is a big subject to study, you know. Anyway, in Buddhist community there were four: layman, and laywoman, and monk, and nun is four. We count four. We have, you know, four kinds of disciples or-in our community we have few or no nun yet [laughs]. But laywoman and layman.

We will have precepts too, you know, more and more. "You should respect the Buddhist or Buddhist thought," and "You shouldn't trip based on Buddha" [preceding sentence unclear: Suzuki-roshi seems to be giving examples of new precepts]. This kind of precepts we will have-new precepts [laughs, laughter] created by you. If Buddha says, "Don't do that," that is one precept [laughs]-precepts. After they have household life, they became a Buddhist, you know, at that time. This is the typical [?] thing [?] But there are many young disciples of Buddha. So may be the same.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Diana Bartle and Bill Redican (3/20/01).

[1] Kegon Sutra: Buddhavatamsaka-sutra (Sanskrit) or Kegon-kyo (Jap.). The fundamental sutra for the Chinese Huayen school and Japanese Kegon School of Buddhism.

[2] Suzuki-roshi discusses ri and ji extensively in the Sandokai lectures: "When you practice zazen more, you can accept things as your own, whatever it is, you know. That is actually the teaching of, you know, famous teaching of Kegon-jiji-muge.[2] Jiji-muge means 'being has no,' you know, 'no barrier, no disturbance.' It-it, you know-interrelated closely. And it is difficult to say, 'This is bird, and this is me,' because it is interrelated very closely. So it is difficult to separate bluejay from me. That is jiji-muge." [From fourth Sandokai lecture, SR-70-06-03, p. 3.]

[3] Lecture SR-68-01-11.

[4] gokumi: See Lecture SR-70-06-13.

[5] kome (Jap.): uncooked white rice.

[6] kuyo (Jap.): veneration.

[7] Or puja.

[8] zuko (Jap.): to powder one's whole body with fine incense.

[9] The Lotus Sutra.

1968 april (2)

1 - (sick)

Tuesday, April 23, 1968, Lecture A

Because I was not well, I'm sorry I couldn't join your practice so much.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham (12/26/00).

2 - (sick)

Short end-of-sesshin lecture
In spite of my lack of effort

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham (12/26/00).

1968 juni (1)

1 - (sound problem)

Saturday, June 01, 1968

June n.d., 1968
Tassajara

... up to about the scroll right there.[1] That is Bodhidharma-Bodhidharma, the First Chinese Patriarch. He came to China five, maybe-we don't know exactly when. But 500, maybe 10 [510 A.D.] or 11 [511 A.D.] he came to China. He was a prince of some-some country near India-Koshi-Koshikoku in Japanese. And he was one of the many teachers who practiced zazen in India, and he came to China.

And there is a famous story about him. But before I explain-talk about him, I want you-to explain something about those scrolls. Excuse me.

[Sound problem: low volume. SR gets up and walks around

-----

[1] First words on tape are missing.

1968 juli (2)

1 - Buddhist Schools

Sunday, July 21, 1968

Buddhist Schools
Tassajara

[1] ... I don't think [laughs] we can reach conclusion.

I was asked to talk about-about some-something like sectarianism. What is Soto and what is Rinzai? Or-and what is the position, or what is the attitude as a Soto priest to other schools of Buddhism? This is the subject I was given to-I was given to speak about it. But this is not so, you know, simple question. It is very big problem.

First of all, we should understand how-why we have so many schools of Buddhism. As you know, various schools arised [arose]-or especially Buddhism, various schools which we have now is the-almost all the schools are Mahayana Buddhism. So-called-it Theravada Buddhism is also-is not just Hinayana school or Theravada school. The scholars of Hinayana Buddhism or Theravada Buddhism knows what is Mahayana, you know, and intellectually, or so far as the teaching [is] concerned, there is not much difference between-excuse me-all of-all the Buddhists, I think-most of the Buddhist understand not only their own teaching of their own school but also the teaching of various schools too.

So, so far as the understanding goes-actually there is no particular school. But here Zen is not, you know-Zen school or Zen Buddhism is very much different from the other schools of Buddhism. The other schools of Buddhism put emphasis on understanding, but we Zen Buddhist put emphasis on practice, you know, actual practice.

So, you know, Zen Buddhism is something different. And why Zen Buddhism arrived in China is something very important point we should know. Before Bodhidharma came to China, there were many schools of Buddhism already. There were Pure Land school, and Tendai school, and San-lun, and some other schools of Zen. And almost all the scriptures were translated. And Chinese people studied Buddhist philosophy very hard and established pretty well-organized understanding. And according to their way of understanding, there were many schools of Buddhism. And they put emphasis on some scriptures which was told by Buddha.

Those who or thinks Kegon Sutra is the best of all the sutra, their-their-was Kegon school. Those who thinks Lotus Sutra is best, Tendai school established. And those who thinks Pure Land-the three scriptures of Pure Land school is the best of all the teachings, then they started Pure Land school. But all those schools [were] based on the philosophy of Buddhism.

And in Mahayana Buddhism, the teaching is not anymore just teaching. It is something more than that. But they did not come to the turning point where they should switch over intellectual understanding to-from intellectual understanding to actual practice. Even Pure Land school did not, you know-was not completed like Pure Land school in Japan established by Shinran.[2] They, you know-even though they-I don't say they do not practice zazen, or they do not practice various rituals, and they do not attain enlightenment by practice.

But their practice is something different from our practice or from Bodhidharma's practice. The-what is the difference is the-according-as long as we expect perfection or enlightenment, it is-their practice is involved in dualistic understanding, you know. We are not perfect, but by practice or by believing in the teaching of Buddhism, then we will improve our understanding. And eventually we will attain perfection.

But according to even Mahayana school, it was not so easy, you know, to attain the perfection. It was necessary, according to Tendai school-it was necessary to many and many kalpas of time. And we-unless we continue our practice many and many kalpas of time for us which is not perfect, it is not possible to attain enlightenment, you know. That was their understanding. And some school like Kegon-this kind of, you know, many and many kalpas of time of practice was understood-a kind of teaching, you know, not practice itself, but they established, you know, the-another version of practice as a teaching, you know.

In Shingon school, they understood many and many kalpas of time as a-our evil desires, you know. Not actual so long time of practice. But this is another interpretation of our evil desires. Because our evil desires is so deep, it is necessary for us to practice so many kalpas of time, you know. So instead of emphasizing practice, they put emphasis on our evil desires [laughs]. And that is, you know-this is rather dangerous, you know. So unless they be a good teacher, this kind of understanding will create big problem for Buddhist. But instead of put-saying so many kalpas of time of practice, they put emphasis on so deep and in-so deep and great problem of evil desires. And, you know, the-according to Buddhism or Buddha's teaching, evil desires itself, you know-if we understand it properly, it is enlightenment itself, you know, buddha-nature itself.

So buddha-nature and evil desires is one, you know. Originally it is one. So according to Shingon, with this kind of interpretation of evil desires and enlightenment is one. This is a kind of teaching, you know. With this teaching, they replaced so many kalpas of practice into a kind of understanding of evil desires we have.

So in this way, you know, even our practice was replaced by a teaching. And this kind-this kind of interpretation of so many kalpas of practice was-happened-happened in Kegon school too. So although they noticed that, you know, just intellectual understanding actually do not help us. And if-as long as we have the idea of buddha-nature as a goal of practice, you know, something to attain it, our practice should be dualistic.

So as long as it is dualistic, you know, it takes time until we attain perfection. But actually it is not possible [laughs], you know. But even though we can-we understand it-we understand that is possible, but it takes so many kalpas of time or else, you know, we cannot attain enlightenment. That is the, you know, dead end of [laughs] Zen Buddhism-that was, actually.

But Bodhidharma's, you know, understanding of Zen is quite different. They didn't-he did not, you know-let me put in this way: The difference between Bodhidharma's practice and Mahayana practice of various Mahayana schools of practice, even though they practice Zen, but the meaning of practice or way of practice or content of practice, it was quite different.

According to Bodhidharma, you know, buddha-nature is not something to be attained by practice. But according to other schools of practice, or understanding of practice, the practice is something to attain enlightenment. That is why this practice eventually come to the dead end, you know. And there is no other way to go back, or to-to have another version of practice, or to substitute practice-actual practice to or for the intellectual understanding or teaching of Buddhism.

But for Bodhidharma, our practice is quite independent from various teaching. This is-our practice is independent practice from Buddha's teaching. Although we acknowledge, or we accept Buddha's teaching, but our practice is not something based on some teaching. The-our practice is the practice based on our original nature-buddha-nature. Even though Buddha, you know, did not appear in this world, you know, we have [laughs] all nature, you know. And we, you know, should start our practice because of our true nature which Buddha found out.

So in this sense, Buddha is founder of Buddhism, but we do not depend on Buddha's teaching which was told by Buddha. Our practice is not depend on, because our practice is the practice which is depend on Buddha's, you know, true nature as long as our nature and Buddha-as long as Bud- [partial word]-there is no difference between buddha-nature-our buddha-nature and Buddha's buddha-nature. There is no need for us to depend on his teaching, but directly we should practice as he did. That is starting point of Zen Buddhism. And that is Bodhidharma's Zen.

So it is not, you know, after you practiced so many kalpas of time that attain enlightenment, but the practice is based on our true nature, you know, which is always within us. So starting-by-because of our true nature, we practice zazen. So the meaning of practice is completely different from the practice of other schools. Do you understand this point?

For other school, the practice is something-something-the practice is means of attaining enlightenment. To attain enlightenment we practice zazen. But a characteristic of Zen is, without depending on teaching-because of our buddha-nature, you know, or starting from buddha-nature, we practice zazen. Opposite, you know. Not to attain enlightenment, but to experience the enlightenment-to have enlightenment exper- [partial word]-enlightenment experience. To express our true nature, we practice zazen.

In this way you will have, you know, ten powers [laughs]. You know, I explained what are the ten powers [of a bodhisattva]. If [?] the ten powers is the power you will, you know, attain by practice, you know. I don't know when you will attain it [laughs]. Those ten powers are to some extent the power you have already, you know. You-if you understand what are the ten powers, you know, that is the power you have already. But because of your idle practice you cannot [laughs], you know, bring it, you know, bring about, you know, fully [wholly?]. But it is not something which you attain but-but something which you have already. And this is, for beginner, a kind of belief. But for some good student it is not just to be-it is actually you feel in its true sense, you know. Something you have it, and something you found not as a goal, but as a actual power you have. This is the difference.

So for us there is no dead end. You know, we say even though we have, you know-there are innumerable sentient being, we vow to save them [laughs]. That is our vow. This vow is not based on the possibility, you know, but possibility of attaining or saving all of them, but to express-to make your best effort to express it-to express our true nature, we vow to save-to save them all. And if it is impossible-if there are innumerable people, our effort will be endless. In this way, we understand our practice and our vow. And our evil desires are, you know, [in?]exhaustible. But we vow to, you know, put an end to it [laughs]. This is something which you should do, which your buddha-nature ask us to do it. Not something which you should do or-or which should promise to do [laughs]. Something which you should do day by day, every day, you know.

This is the big-main difference between zazen practice of other schools of Buddhism and Buddhist-Zen Buddhist practice. Before I, you know, talk about non-sectarianism, you know [laughs], I must [take] pride on my sectarianism first. And how my sectarianism is non-sectarianism [laughs, laughter]. It is the next thing I should, you know, try to explain. But right now, you know, we should establish ourself, you know, in firm foundation. And we are talking about, you know, universal foundation to every schools.

This kind of understanding is true with Shin school in Japan too, you know. Before Shinran the-to repeat Amida Buddha's name is a kind of practice, you know, to be saved by Amida Buddha. So if you want to be saved by him, sooner we should repeat it, you know, many and many times. That was the idea of repeating Amida Buddha's name. But according to Shinran, because we are, you know, originally saved by Amida Buddha, so even you-even you repeat it, you know-even you say it once that is enough [laughs], according to him. If you are aware of your true nature, that is enough.

When-only when we, you know, reach this point-this kind of understanding, the Buddhism become teaching for everyone-to save every one of us. It is easy to, you know, maybe to repeat Amida Buddha's name by mouth. It is also [?]-maybe for Pure Land students or Pure Land school, everyone can practice it, you know. It is quite different from zazen. Everyone can do. And religion should be, you know, for everyone-not just for man, or for someone who can cross their legs, you know, in lotus posture. What will they do if they cannot cross their legs [laughs, laughter]? In this point [?], many people say Zen is not for everyone [laughter], and Zen is just for [laughs] men and not for ladies. Maybe Pure Land school is better [laughs]-is better, you know, because a religion should be for everyone.

So if, you know, zazen is the purpose of-means of-one of the means of to attain enlightenment, you know, the only-few people will be saved by Zen. But according to Dogen-zenji, you know, Zen is not such thing. Zen is for everyone whether you can cross your legs or not, you know. Everyone is Zen Buddhist as long as they have buddha-nature. This is, you know, difference.

Only when we understand zazen in this way, Zen is for everyone. And difference between, you know, if I say it varies-how we, you know, what will be the Rinzai school from our viewpoint-how we understand Rinzai school from our viewpoint? When-the time of Sixth Patriarch, you know, there was no koan [laughs]. There were no koans. Only Sung Dynasty, then koan started-koan study started. If koan study is only way to study

Buddhism, the Sixth Patriarch or Bodhidharma is not Zen master [laughs, laughter].

So I don't say koan study is not good, but if you think koan study is only way to study Zen, that is not, you know-you cannot explain why Bodhidharma or the Sixth Patriarch did not use koan [laughs]. So Zen is not just koan study. And the weak point of-of course, you know, there is some weak point or blind angle, you know, for every practice. Weak point of koan practice is-it is, you know, substitute [?] for the teaching, you know. Koan is a kind of teaching, and koan practice is, you know, the means of to attain enlightenment. If that is a means of to attain enlightenment, there will be many steps, you know. So that is why they say until you pass so many numbers of koan, you know, you cannot get inka.[3] You know, there should be, you know, many stages like stepladder, you know, until you solve-let me put in this way: Actually if-whether it is koan study or shikantaza, it is-if you practice it, you know, you will make some improvement. So in this sense there is many steps.

But in Soto-in shikantaza, there is no steps, you know, because we are expressing our true nature through practice, you know. We are already-we have already innate nature. And what we should do is to express it. So there is no steps. And if-as long as there are many steps, you know, then there will be someone who, you know, who can climb up so many steps. And someone will not be-for someone it will not be possible to, you know, climb even one step. If the practice is this kind of practice, that is not for everyone, you know, because it is-because we have originally true nature, and our practice is based on a kind of belief or a kind of experience for a good student. For a beginner it is a kind of dream [trip?]. Because we have-our practice is the expression-our understanding of practice is expression of our true nature. So whether our practice is good or bad, as long as we have true nature, you know, every practice should be true practice. Even though you cannot cross our legs, you know, if you have this kind of understanding, your everyday life is zazen practice. We understand zazen in this way. This is the-how we, you know-this is our understanding of Rinzai or-not Rinzai, but koan practice from our viewpoint.

Anyway, you know, the nature of practice is completely different, you know. Not the same thing. Completely different. This is, you know, one, you know-what I want to say first of all. And how-what is our attitude towards Rinzai? Or how Rinzai people-student from Rinzai standpoint, what is understanding of Soto, you know? "Soto is," you know, sleeping zazen" [laughs], you know. They understand that they have originally buddha-nature, you know. So whether they practice hard or not-whether their practice is good or bad, you know, originally there is no difference [laughs]. So, "They are not so sincere in their practice." Maybe that is true. That is, you know, what Rinzai students may say about our practice.

So for Rinzai students, you know, it is necessary for them to continue practice forever, you know-not only aiming at enlightenment but also as a expression of their true nature, or with gratitude of attaining enlightenment, or appreciating former teachers' effort to transmit Buddhism to us. They should continue our practice, and they should transmit our practice to our descendent. In other word, their practice also should be continued forever. There is no time to rest on the black cushion, you know, even though they attain enlightenment. And I think many good Rinzai stu- [partial word]-teachers put emphasis on the practice after kensho, after enlightenment.

And we Soto student should practice more sincerely, you know, like the Rinzai students make their effort, even though, you know, because of- they may practice hard because of candy [laughs] of enlightenment. Anyway they are practicing very sincerely. So that is good example for us, you know. And Soto student like to talk about zazen. Rinzai student does not talk about so much about zazen. They give you some koan, you know, without any explanation, and they ask you to give some answer to it. And that is their way.

So of course Rinzai has some shortcoming, and as we have. And at the same time, they have good points as we have. But complete, you know- we should not lose-Zen priests and Zen students should not lose the key point of Zen-why Zen is independent school of Buddhism, you know. Why it is necessary for us to have this kind of understanding of Buddhism. If we lose the key point of understanding-in understanding of Buddhism, it is not even Hinayana school [laughter]. You know, it is, you know, some-it is not even religion, you know. It is a kind of exercise instead [laughs]. It is not religion. It doesn't help us in its true sense.

In China for a long, long time, 400 or more, there was not-there were not so many teachers who understood this point. That is why Dogen-Dogen-zenji wanted to come back to Japan, you know, because he couldn't find any good teachers in China. But fortunately they met with Nyajo-zenji, [4] who had a perfect understanding of Buddhism. So he became-Dogen-zenji became disciple of him. Not as disciple of Soto school, but because one of the disciple of Buddha. For Dogen-zenji, his teacher Nyajo-zenji was the only one teacher who understand-understood what is Buddhism in its true sense. What was the mercy of Buddha in its true sense? He was only one.

So he became his disciple. That is why Dogen-zenji, you know, did not like to say he is Soto-to use the name of Soto. In China, Soto school is one of the five schools of Zen. But according to Dogen-zenji, you know, this point-this understanding is-should be the understanding of all the schools of Zen as long as they are a descendant of the Sixth Patriarch or Bodhidharma.

Originally, there should not be any-there should not be so many schools of Zen. It should be one school of Buddhism. Even though their way of practice is different, but the key points should be the same. That was Dogen-zenji's-his understanding of Nyojo-zenji. For him, Nyojo-zenji is Buddha himself, or the Sixth Patriarch himself, or the Bodhidharma himself. So for him there is no five schools, you know. For him there is no Rinzaï or Soto.

So he respects various teachers who belong to Rinzaï's lineage. He doesn't mind whether he belong to Rinzaï or Soto. If he is good, he is a descendent of Bodhidharma, and the Sixth Patriarch, and Buddha. That is his non-sectarianism.

So if people say, you know, because we stick to this key point [laughs] that is Soto-that is [laughs]-maybe all right, you know. They say-to say-for them to say, "He is Soto," it is all right. But we have no sectarianism. But we believe in religion-Buddha's religion who save all sentient beings-not selfless, good, good student [laughs]. That is, you know, our understanding of Zen.

So it is not matter of Rinzaï or Soto, you know. If there is some school like Soto-Soto school is a school which put emphasis on the transmitted buddha-mind and practice our way as the expression of our transmitted mind, or to develop a buddha's mind. So way we practice may not be the same, but whatever we do is the expression of our true nature. If I say just "expression of true nature," you know, it is quite simple. How, you know, we express our true nature is the thing I am explaining in my previous lecture.

In short, I think there must be, you know, various schools of Buddhism. There must be. But it is necessary to have mutual understanding. And it is necessary to know the position of various schools. What position does one school have in history of Buddhism, or in the activity-actual activity as a religion, you know? What kind of good points and bad points? And what kind of responsibility every religion has?

And as we concerned-the most concerning point for us is not teaching, you know, but practice. So we cannot practice many things, you know, at the same time [laughs]. So we should stick to one practice. And with full understanding of our practice, as a Soto student it is necessary to stick to shikantaza. But sometime, you know, to practice koan or to understand koan will be helpful. But the key points should be, you know, shikantaza, or Dogen's zazen, or Bodhidharma's zazen, or Buddha's zazen. This point is very important, and all the practice or all the power you will have by zazen practice is based on-should be based on this understanding, or else your practice will become, you know-you will-your practice will end in dead end. It will create more problem for you.

Our practice is like a water, you know. Water is necessary for everyone. Even though wine or, you know, lemon juice tastes good, or ice cream is good [laughs], if you always take ice cream or lemon juice, you know, you cannot survive. So you should not forget water, you know, the-our practice is like a water. So people liable to forget [laughs] why-you know, water which is so important, but you can find out everywhere [laughs]. So you do not appreciate water so much. But if you forget water, you will eventually get into some trouble. You should not forget water.

This is, you know, my understanding of sectarianism and Dogen's non-sectarian. I think this is not just-Dogen's sectarianism can be non-sectarianism with Christianity or some other religion too. Only if you have this kind of understanding, you know, Christianity is all right. [3-4 words] may be all right [laughs, laughter]. Maybe [laughs, laughter].

But they will not understand, you know [laughs], the point. It is they could understand our point, whatever the religion is, that is very helpful. This is my non-sectarianism. So my sectarianism is sectarianism and non-sectarianism [laughs]. Both. Do you understand? You cannot say it is non-sectarianism, because I am very proud sectarian [laughs].

You cannot change my, you know, understanding. No one can change it [laughs]. The only way is to change their understanding [laughter]. But you only frustrated [?] [laughs, laughter]. Even so I, you know, I do not reject any understanding. And I don't-it does not mean for me there is nothing to study [laughs]. I have to study a lot of things, but there is no need for me to change my foundation of religion.

Because of this foundation, I feel free to study many things, you know. If we-I lose this foundation, you know, I must be a kind of sectarian-very bad sectarian [laughs]. Because I feel some easiness, you know, I have no fear of losing my way. Whatever I study, it is all right.

Do you have some question? Hai.

Student A: Do you and Yasutani-roshi[5] and Soen-roshi[6] have the same foundation?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh yeah, Yasuntan- [partial word]-at least, Yasutani-roshi, you know. I talked about [?] this point, you know. And he agreed with me. He knows what is Soto and what is Rinzaï. Hai.

Student B: You were talking about non-sectarianism in Sung China. What does it mean in America?

Suzuki-roshi: In China?

Student B: In America?

Suzuki-roshi: In America there is, you know-because-my feeling is, you know, because your understanding is-first of all, you have no tradition, you know, of Buddhism-there is no Buddhism yet. And we are start to establish some activity-Buddhist activity here. And you-intellectually you study many things, and you have various understanding, and you-I think some of you already studied under many teachers. So the situation is quite different. In Japan, you know, mostly Soto students study Soto only. But in-between Rinzai and Soto, they-some Rinzai students study Dogen-zenji, and we study Rinzai practice too. But mostly Rinzai student is Rinzai, and Soto students from beginning to end are Soto students.

But here, you know, you have-the way you study is not same as we do in Japan. And this is, I think, something like-this situation is something like the situation Buddhism-or Zen Buddhism started in China after the Sixth Patriarch. They recommended their students to some other teachers. Actually there was not much sectarianism, but there were various kinds of practice or way of giving instruction. And I think we are, you know, in America, under the same situation as they had in China.

So I think it is necessary, you know, for us-for teachers to have closer relationship with each other, you know, and to help students, exchanging students, or having discussion with each other. Or else we cannot help students, you know, if I say we should, you know, practice just Soto or Rinzai [laughs]. They don't know what to do. So students should choose their way. And we should encourage students to find out appropriate teachers. This is, I think, absolutely necessary for us as a teacher. Hai.

Student C: If we-if we feel that it is just a matter of different students needing different methods of instruction to understand the same foundation-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: -then there really isn't any cause at all for controversy, and it can be just as fluid as possible. Am I correct?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah. I understand in this way, and I think Nakagawa-roshi is also-very much like Soto teacher, you know. He understand Dogen-zenji very well, and Yasutani-roshi is originally Soto teacher, you know. For some reason he became independent from Soto. There is good reason for that. That is not matter of, you know-or that is just matter of activity, not matter of understanding. So I-I don't think there is any problems. Hai.

Student D: I have two short questions. The first one is, you said that it's impossible to attain enlightenment, and that didn't sound too good. So I thought [laughs, laughter], well, maybe you meant that it's possible to attain enlightenment, but we couldn't say that we'll attain anything. Is that what you meant? [Laughs, laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: No. In its, you know-in its usual sense, you know, people think, "I attain-I attained enlightenment" [laughs]. What is, you know- they-doesn't make much sense, you know. He feels in that way, you know. If, you know, I-but it is true that, you know, you reach step. This is what I'm always talking about [laughs], you know. Whatever it is, that is Buddha himself, you know. And however it is complete, that is not Buddha himself, you know. It something that-as long as it is something which we can understand or which we can see because it has some form or color, that is not-cannot be absolute. We have this, you know, idea.

But usually you do not have this idea, so you stick to enlightenment. Even though you think you attained enlightenment, that is not the absolute itself or, you know, buddha-nature itself. It is something, you know, some expression of buddha-nature.

I was talking with-with a guest about, you know, our-and she had very good understanding. You know, I was amazed [laughs, laughter]. You know, I-I-we have been talking about maybe thirty-forty minutes, standing under the [1 word]-what do you call it?

Student: Trellis.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? Trellis. Yeah. She said we are, you know, ornament of it, you know, instead of saying buddha-nature. First of all, he said-she said, he was thinking about the word for buddha-nature, you know. And she said-she said it-and we are tools of it, you know, she said. That was what she said-tools of it. And I said, "Yeah, maybe tools of it." And maybe so-and actually we say, "We ornament of it," you know [laughs]. We, you know, we have various form and color, and we-by our body and mind and we give various ornaments to Buddha to eat, you know. We are ornament of it, and she completely understood about it. And-and she said we are not even a part of it [laughs]-even a part of it because we change it [?] [laughs]. We are just tentative ornament of it [laughs]. I don't know how she-how she, you know, keeps this kind of understanding. It is [1-2 words]. And she was German, and she has some difficulty in pronouncing English words like philosophy [laughs]. And she did not believe in so much philosophy. But she wanted to figure out what is she, you know. And she said, "I am a ornament of it."

And-oh-first of all she said, "I am not I. I am it," [laughs], she said. "I am it." Not "me," "it." That was what she said, you know, before we say not much things-we talk not-not so many. "I am not I, but it." And she started to talk about the relationship between "I" and "it," you know. And I am a ornament of it, a tools of it. And I said maybe ornament of-we say ornament of it. Yeah that's better, she said [laughs].

And next question is-was, what is, then, karma? Karma. That was the second question. And I said karma, yeah, karma is if you do something it will leave a result something, you know. And that result will cause some activity, you know. In this way, we-our activity will continue. And here we started to talk about, you know, eternal. We didn't say "eternal present," but, you know, cause and effect, cause and effect, cause and effect. And it is karma, and it is also eternal expression of each being or actual ornament of it. In this way we are free from karma. And yet we cannot get out of karma. [Laughs.] [4-6 words] communicate this kind of [laughs] things. I was rather amazed. And she is-she is from Redwood City. I don't know what was her name, you know. She was the lady who was sitting, you know, right there. She is very fat lady, wearing something like this, you know. Do you-do you acknowledge [remember?] it-her?

Student E: Was that today, Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Today.

Student E: Because I-I remember.

Suzuki-roshi: Her blouse was, you know, trimmed like this.

Student E: White blouse with red-

Suzuki-roshi: Red.

Student E: -Indian kind of braid.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, yeah. No, white on white. And there was red or- [laughter]-not like this, but like this [laughter]. That was good design for her, I thought [laughs], because it's, you know, divide her big, you know, body in two [laughs, laughter]-two small pieces [laughs, laughter]. More beautiful in this way. And her friend was waiting for her because they were leaving.

Student F: Roshi, she told me that she felt very awkward about doing zazen and doing the services and bowing. She said she was a little bit frightened.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student F: But-well-because at every move of your hands or bowing or turning, she said she felt it meant something, but she couldn't understand it. But I think she was very interested to know about it.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah. I think she may come back [laughs]. Her understanding is very good, you know. I don't know. Yeah. Her practice is not so good [laughter], you know. And it may be very difficult for her. And if she-she has-she start some diet [laughter]. Some question?

Student G: She just said she was very pleased to be able to talk to you and somewhat surprised that she was able to.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Oh.

Student F: She also wanted to know how come so many people about 25 or 36 years old are trying something like this?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh yes! Yeah. Why-how come do you have so many young students? What is it-oh yeah, that was [2-3 words]. And then we started something about the teaching, you know. How come? And she was very much interested in-to see so many young students here.

May we-? [Chant follows.]

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (3/21/01).

[1] Opening words were not recorded, but the remainder of the sentence sounded like an aside to a student rather than the beginning of the lecture.

[2] Shonin Shinran (1173-1262). Student of Honen. Founder of Jodo-shin-shu.

[3] inka (Jap.): seal of confirmation.

[4] Tiantong Rujing (Tendo Nyojo): 1163-1228.

[5] Yasutani Hakuun-roshi: 1885-1973. Student of Nishiari Bokusan-zenji and dharma successor of Harada Sogaku-roshi. He is known for his synthesis of Soto and Rinzai practices-especially for using koan practice with Soto students.

[6] Nakagawa Soen-roshi (1908-1983): Rinzai master. Dharma successor of Yamamoto Genpo and abbot of Ryutaku-ji monastery near Mishima. In the West, he taught in the United States and Israel.

2 - Non-Sectarianism

Wednesday, July 24, 1968

Non-Sectarianism
Tassajara

To have complete understanding of our school or-is at the same time-to unders- [partial word]-to have perfect understanding of the non-sectarianism. I don't know precisely [?] [1-2 words] so much, but last night I briefly talked about how various sect appeared in our history of Buddhism. As I told you last night, at first-when-in China when various scriptures was-were introduced to China or translated into Chinese-when some group of scriptures, like Prajñāparamita group or Kegon Sutra[1]-each time some important sutra [was] introduced into China, when that sutra was translated into Chinese, they did it under the help of the king. All the learned scholars, not only Buddhist scholars but also Confucian scholars, all the learned scholars in China, you know, participate [in] the translation of some special scriptures, and from China-from India, of course, some teachers. And someone who knows Chinese and Indian Sanskrit translated it into Chin- [partial word]-Chinese, and they-and many people were listening to it. And when they agreed with the translation, they, you know, write down.

In this way, in a big scale, translation was made. So each time the translation [was] made, the people who participated the translation or people who were listening to it, you know, naturally appreciate the big meaning of the teaching, and there they formed some kind of sect. In this way, there were in China there-there was many sects appeared. That is one way of, you know-it is almost by accident [laughs], you know, various schools appeared in China.

But this is not actually the one schools of Buddhism. In its strict sense-in its strict sense, when some great teacher study Buddhism through and through, by all means, not only some special scripture but also many scriptures, and organized the Buddhist thought, and finding out the key points of the Buddhist thought, they organized or systematized whole Buddhism. That is so-called it Kyoso-hanjaku,[2] you know: how you-some stand for it-"taking some stance for it"?-and organize or systematize all the teaching. If someone come to this point, there is no need to study all the scriptures, you know, as he did. The most of people can understand all the scriptures according to his way of understanding it. And actually those teachers who are very great teacher, and his-their characters were so great at the time that people naturally believed in his teaching.

And this is, you know, real-this is-in this way, true schools of Buddhism appeared as Kegon or Tendai, not by accident but by study. And what I was talking about last night is, although they-their understanding of religion is based on his philosophical study of Buddhism, but they also practiced Zen, you know, a kind of Zen.

And I talked about the difference between Bodhidharma's Zen and their zazen. Their zazen is to contemplate on some profound teaching. And to improved-improve their state of mind is their way, you know, by complete-by dwelling on the lofty teaching of Buddhism. And they-they try to have full understanding of it. And they try to improve their state of mind. "State of mind," we say, but this is, you know, it has more deeper meaning, but we say shinkyō-shinji [?][3]-shinkyō? Ji means also "zazen, Zen, or zazen practice." To-to have-to have higher state of mind or to be able to [attain] higher class [?] of zazen, you know, by studying various kinds of our teaching and they meditate on some kind of teaching.

The difference between our practice and their practice is we, you know, do not, you know-our practice is not to rely on-is not the practice to having some lofty teaching in our mind, and to dwell on this kind of understanding, and to improve our state of mind is not, you know, our way. And why we do not take this way is already-I explained.

In this way, Zen, which does not rely on any teaching, whose practice is not something completely different from the meditation on some teaching started by Bodhidharma. But later, you know, in Sung dynasty, Zen students applied something like kambo [?], or contemplation on some teaching like koan appeared. This is, you know, something more like kambo or Tendai or Kegon practice, and some of them go back to the Mahayana usual practice.

And I compared our practice, which is independent from teaching, and practice which depend on some example or some teaching or some lofty teaching. I compared and-if we become interested in kambo or to-to practice zazen aiming at some higher stage of practice, more and more our practice will become special practice for some selected people or some great teachers. And then [it] will not be everyone's practice.

Why in Heian Period in Japan,[4] various new schools of Zen appeared is -at previous time, the religion-Buddhism become more and more aristocratic, and the people-Buddhists become more and more interested in some fallacy, you know, practice of Buddhism. And naturally their practice became more and more aristocratic-luxurious way, and lost the interest of majority of people. That is why new schools of Buddhism appeared in Kamakura Period.[5]

And even for us there is this kind of danger. If Zen is a practice for just men, or for just learned scholars, or for just great-man of great ability-spiritual ability, Zen will not help people. Actually in Japan, Soto Zen, who put emphasis on our everyday life, not only zazen practice but also everyday life, thinking everyday life is a kind of prac- [partial word]-Zen practice, and having great concern to our everyday life, aiming at spreading Buddhism all at once [?], under some influential-under the influence of some daimyo [6] or government. Just to constantly trying to make them understand, not by some impure motivation, but also-but only just to help others whether they can practice zazen or not, you know. Try and help people by all means, Soto spread little by little until Soto become one of the largest schools in Japan.

But in our history, you know, we never depend on any influential people. Although we helped, you know, for an instance, Emperor Go-Daigo,[7] you know, when he was in small island after [being] defeated by Kamakura government, you know. He didn't know what to do, so [laughs] Soto priests get together and send him something, you know, to the island. In that case we helped, you know, but we never helped, you know-ask help, or we have no Zen masters of our schools [who] did not [did] like to practice our way under the influence of some patron.

You know, when Dogen-zenji was asked to help Kamakura government, he refused. But the Kamakura government asked him so intensely, so he went to Kamakura for one month and he came back. And he said to him, "If you want to help," you know, "people why don't you be a priest [laughs]? That is the best way. Why don't you give up your position as a, you know, head of the Kamakura government?" So they gave up [laughs]. "This is the best way, I think. Why don't you be a-become a priest?" he said-Dogen said, and he came back.

And there are many and many stories like this at [1 word] period. I think he was Joshu Tengyo [?]. He-he was so famous that Shikana [?] government wanted to invite him to Kyoto. So he, you know-if he stay at his temple, they will force him to come to Kyoto. So when he went for-he took a trip for some [?] day, and he went to the remoted country, and he was practicing zazen. Katsu, the Kamakura-no, Shikana [?] government found out where he was. But they thought-government thought-that was Yoshimi-Yoshimi thought he will-he will not come to Kyoto. So he sent artist, and he-Yoshimi asked the artist to paint his, you know, picture and to bring it back to Kyoto. And the painter-but painter could not meet him, you know, if he knows-if Joshu Tengyo knows he is making picture of him for the government, he will refuse it [laughs]. So he was hiding himself under the bridge [laughs]. And he was, you know, going to zendo, you know [laughs], and he draw his image and went back to Kyoto. And that is one of the national treasures [laughs, laughter].

In this way, you know, as you know, Soto Zen is peasant [?] Zen [laughs]-form of Zen, people say, you know, because we didn't have any support from daimyo or government-from outside. But there is some reason why we should be a farmer. For us there is no influential people or farmer. They are all Buddhist for us. As Dogen-zenji said, "You may say merchant is not Zen monk. But for Zen monks, there is no merchant or no Zen monks. They are all Zen students." This is our understanding of practice. So whatever we do, whether they realize or not, actually we are all practicing zazen. And why it is so is the-is the things I explained in my lecture [last night].

As you know, in Gakudo-yojin-shu[8] is ten instructions to-for the students how study Zen. He says our Zen is not kambo [?] like, you know-in one practice-practice which include three thousands of dharma, you know.[9] That kind of practice is not our practice, or he says the teaching of transiency is the found- [partial word]-people may say, is the foundation of the Buddha's teaching. But that is not, you know, something which you will know after you study Buddhism. Even though you don't study it [laughs], you know, that is actual truth, you know. That everything changes is actual truth, and it is not Buddhism. This is interpreted [?] [laughs]-outward [?] truth for Buddhist-for Buddhist and as well as for everyone. So this is not, you know, just-this is not-those teachings are not just our teaching, but the teaching for everyone. Even though Buddha didn't tell it-talk about it, that is truth. That is a truth which I-we, you know, are observing every day. So there is no need to depend on teaching. But the most important thing is to practice and realize our true nature is the most important point [laughs]. This is, you know, Zen. If so everyone has, you know-as long as we have buddha-mind, Buddhism is for everyone.

In this way, Zen school established without depending on any teaching, any particular teaching. So Zen student use various scriptures, you know. We do not say this is the most important scripture or this is not so important. We do not say that. Whatever the teaching may be, that teaching will help at least someone. Not all or-it may not be for all of them, but it will help someone. So it is like a medicine, you know, medicine or prescription, you know. For some patient some particular prescription is necessary, but we cannot say this is better prescription or this is not so good. If it is appropriate-if you use it in appropriate way, that is the test of prescription. We understand in this way.

So far I-[is] what I talked about last night. Tonight, you know, I want to explain shikantaza. We say "just to sit." What does it mean by just to sit?

Some monk asked a Zen master, [10] "It is very hot [laughs]. How is it possible to sit somewhere where no hot or no cold weather come?"

The master-the master's answer was, "When it is hot, you should be hot buddha [laughs, laughter]. When it is cold, you should be a cold buddha [laughs]."

That is "just to sit." When it is hot, you should be hot buddha. When it is cold, you should be a cold buddha. But, you know, this is very direct, you know, understanding of the story. Actually it says when it is hot, you should kill hot. When it is cold, you should kill cold by practice. It says so.

But according to Dogen-zenji, you know, when it is cold you should be a cold buddha, and when it is hot you should be a hot buddha. But if you-if you say "kill," you know, "kill" is extra [laughs]. If you say "kill," you know, or "to attain enlightenment," you know, "attain" is extra. You know, when your practice is not good, you are a poor buddha [laughs]. When-if your practice is good, you are good Buddha. And poor and good is also independent buddha, you know. Poor is buddha, and you are buddha, and good is buddha, and you are buddha too. For every word, or whatever you think, whatever you say, every word become buddha. Then there is no trouble [laughs], you know. I am buddha. If I say "I am buddha," "I" is buddha, "am" is buddha, "b" is buddha, and "buddha" is of course buddha. Buddha, buddha, buddha [laughs, laughter]. That is how you say buddha, buddha, buddha, buddha

[laughs, laughter]. There is no need to translate it into English, you know [laughs, laughter]. There is no need to [be] bothered by fancy, you know, explanation of Buddhism [laughs]. If you say "buddha, buddha, buddha, buddha" [laughs], that is the way. That is shikantaza, you know: everything is buddha. So sitting is buddha, lying down is buddha, and whatever you say, you know, each word is buddha. He understand in this way, so he said, "When it is cold, you should be a cold buddha. When it is hot, you should be hot buddha."

If you understand-actually when you practice zazen, you know, with-with this understanding, that is true zazen. Even though we say "just sit," but to understand what does it mean is rather difficult, maybe. So that is why Dogen-zenji left us so many teachings to explain what is just to sit. But it does not mean his teaching is so difficult. When you sit, you know, without thinking or without expecting anything, and when you accept yourself as a buddha or as a tools of buddha or ornament of buddha, or if you understand everything is the unfolding of the absolute teaching or truth or [2-3 words], or if you understand everything is a part of the great being-one whole being, when you reach this understanding, whatever we say, whatever we think, or whatever we see, that is the actual teaching of Buddha. And whatever we do, that is actual practice of the Buddha himself.

The problem is-because you sit, or because you do something-trying to do something, that is the trouble. Or if you do not understand what it is, you think nothing result or nothing exist. Or if you feel you can rely on something-no teaching-teaching means nothing. But before you try to rely on it, teaching exists, you know. Before you attain enlightenment, enlightenment is there [laughs]. That is true. It is not after you attain enlightenment, you know, you un- [partial word]-it is not because you attained enlightenment [that] enlightenment appears. Because enlightenment is always there, so if you realize it that is enlightenment. If you think enlightenment is something, some particular thing which you can reach for or which you can attain, so sometime you will be discouraged because you are seeking for it, and you think that is something which can be attained. But if it is not possible, you know-if you do not feel it-it was possible to attain it, you will be discouraged. And you will give up the practice and you will try to find out some other teaching which is, you know, worth while to strive for. And in this way you will change your way from one to the other. And you have no time, you know, to realize you-our true nature which is universal to everyone.

So whether you can realize it or attain enlightenment or not is minor problem-not so big problem. If you realize it or if you attain enlightenment, that's all the better. But even though you don't, you know, there is no need to seek for some special teaching because the teaching is always here.

This is something, you know-this kind of understanding will be difficult for you to accept, you know, I-I-I think. After practicing, you know, one or two months, if you don't think you make-you have made some progress, you will change-you will give up in seeking for something good. But religion is not-true religion cannot be obtained in that way. This kind of a way is the way to attain something in more materialistic sense.

But true spiritual way cannot be like this. The way to work on spiritual things is quite different from the way to work on something which is more materialistic. Even though you talk about spiritual things, that is not actually spiritual. That is a kind of substitute for the [laughs] spiritual things.

That you are here means, you know, that you will vanish [laughs]. Something, you know, which exist-things which exist are bound to be vanished, you know. So something which you attained cannot be perpetual attainment. Something which you cannot, you know, figure out what it is will exist forever. Something which exist before everything appear will exist forever. So as long as you seek for something, you know, you will get just shadow of the reality, not actual one. But when you do not seek for anything-only when you do not seek for anything you-you have it. So when you do not try to attain enlightenment, you have it, you know. When you-because you try to attain something you lose it. And renunciation is, you know, could be attained when A is just A and B is just B. Because A tried to be a C or a D [laughs], there is, you know, problem. A should-because A is just A, and A is bound to be disappear, that is renunciation, you know.

If you, you know, always stay in that way, that is not renunciation-that is attachment which does not exist. That is delusion. So A should be just A, B should be just B. And A should vanish, you know, in the form of A, and that will appear again in some form of C or D. And C or D should vanish in that form. C or D should not try to be, you know, [laughs], at the same time something different. So when you just sit and when you appreciate your being fully in your sitting, that is, you know, to lose your mind and body before you lose it.

When you have no mind and body, you have no problem [laughs, laughter]. Because you say, "This is mind and this is," you know, "body-body should not be the burden of the spirit," or something like that. "We should," you know, "mind should work hard to control our body" something like this. In this case, mind is not mind. Mind is delusion, and body is also delusion. And delusion and delusion is fighting.

What is practice, you know? We-when we were young, we disc- [partial word]-when we have discussion, we used to discuss about what is bodhisattva's way to save others before we saved [laughs] ourselves. What does it mean? Is it possible to save others before we save ourselves? That kind of thing. And what is the goal of practice, and-and-or what is idea and what is the reality-reality in its ordinal [ordinary] sense? And reality cannot be, you know, the ideas. The practice will be the bridge to the reality to idea. This kind of, you know, discussion we had.

But according to Dogen-zenji, you know, practice is practice-practice buddha, reality is the reality buddha, idea is idea buddha [laughs]. There is no problem [laughs, laughter]. When you practice, there is no Buddha or no human being. That is-that which exist is the-just practice. When you say: "I am," you know, "human being," the hu- [partial word]-it means human-being-buddha-another name of buddha. We understand in that way.

So there is no need to have bridge to the, you know-to the other shore. Other shore is other-shore buddha, this shore is this-shore buddha [laughs]. Just name is different but actually everything is Buddha by himself. Bridge is ornamental Buddha, and this shore is also ornamental Buddha. The other shore is also ornamental Buddha.

And each being is necessary. How they attain renunciation is just to be this shore, you know-this shore, the other shore-and the other shore. And they are bound to be vanish, you know [laughs], as long as they actually exist it should-it should vanish. It cannot be in that way always. So when one-because one is just one, it is possible to vanish, you know. If it is possible for one to be something else, you know, he-it maybe perpetual being, but that is perpetual being in its wrong understanding. It is a kind of delusion because no such thing actually exists.

So to be just, you know, A like A-only when we satisfy ourselves as A, you know-as me, there is, you know, chance to-to have realization or there is chance to vanish [laughs], you know. It is necessary to vanish [laughs]. If you don't, you are ghost [laughs] in your delusion. Something that which exist should vanish, you know. Is there something which doesn't vanish forever?

So we say "just to sit," but this word-just A should be A, directly point out the liberation from A. Just because you try to be something else, you know, you lose your reality. Do you understand? So we should be just-I should be just me. Then, at the same time, I have liberation. I have enlightenment. I am not ghost [laughs]. I exist here, you know. I am Buddha himself. I am not ghost. This is, you know, just to sit.

And this is not some, you know, fancy teaching at all, you know [laughs]. This is direct teaching. There-there can be no more-there can be any other teaching so direct, you know. "Just to sit" is the most direct teaching. You cannot [laughs] say no or yes even, before you-you cannot say anything about it: "just to sit" [laughs]. So we say "just to sit." There is no more teaching.

This is not something-because-something you understand because I say so, you know. This is not teaching you believe in because Buddha say so. This is actual ultimate truth, you know. And only way to attain renunciation without any problem-without causing any problem for anyone: just to be myself, you know. No problem whatsoever.

This is what we mean by "just to sit." So those-those masters who understand Soto way, you know, may use instead of "just to sit," they may say, you know, they may give you koan mu. What is mu? "Just to sit is mu" [laughs]. There is no difference. And this just to sit will be various kinds of koan, actually. So there may be thousands of koan for us, but if you can sit shikantaza, shikantaza include various power of practice. And this is the direct way to the enlightenment, or renunciation, or nirvana-whatever you say.

Thank you very much. Do you have questions? Hai.

Student A (Bill Shurtleff): It seems that on some evenings you emphasize the idea of non-attainment-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Bill: -and that there is nothing to do except simply to give up and to just sit and to be whatever you are at each instant.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Bill: And yet at other times, it seems that you speak of exerting your best effort. And when I think of exerting my best effort, it's in order to attain something. In other words, exerting my best effort to keep good posture, or you said that it's important, if you can, to cross your legs in full lotus, which is very difficult and requires great deal of effort.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Bill: Why do you bother speaking about effort at all? Why not simply stay to the teaching of not trying to do anything at all? [5-6 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah. That is very good question. Yeah. You know-anyway, you know, even though I say stay, you know, and do whatever you like, you know, you are doing [laughs] something, you know, with some effort [laughs, laughter]. Can you do it without any effort-something? No, you cannot. Anyway you have some problem, you know. So it is better to have some good problem rather than bad one [laughs, laughter]. If you don't sit, you know-if you don't come to Tassajara, I don't know what you are doing right now [laughs] at city. I don't know [laughs, laughter].

But to have this, you know, kind of accurate, you know, understanding of ourself is very important, you know. It is like to-it is same thing to have a clock, you know. To know it is ten past nine is very important. But actually, there is no such time, you know [laughs]. It is no ten past nine, you know. When I am saying something [laughs], it will be eleven past ten [nine] [laughs].[11] I am pointing up-at something, you know, which is non-verbal, you know. We say "just to sit," but this "just to sit" is extra, you know [laughs].

There may be some question like this: You know, if everything is, you know, one big whole being, according to-I don't know what-according to the ladies whom I met last night-yesterday to eat, you know-what is it-in some direction-in what way A is changing, you know? You will have this kind of question. And if you sit, you know-if you-if your purpose of zazen is just to sit, you know, is it possible to improve yourself, or which direction [laughs] you are going, you know: This kind of problem will be next question.

But before you realize who you are, you know, it is not possible for you to go your own direction. Because you-you are bound by some idea, you don't-you cannot find out your way for yourself. Only when you can "just to sit" you can find out your own way-best way for it. This kind of thing is, you know-I am explaining it as if it-this is some good teaching, you know [laughs], as if I know something-some secret, you know. But it is not so. I am speaking about everyone's own way. That is why we, you know-we put emphasis on "just to sit," because everyone has his own way and myriad of ways or dharmas. And moment after moment, you will find out your own way when you "just to sit," when you [are] exactly you yourself.

Student B: What about "just philosophizing"?

Suzuki-roshi: Philosophizing?

Student B: Just philosophizing. Just anger? Just anger?

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student B: Just anger.

Suzuki-roshi: Just anger?

Student B: You know, just killing?

Suzuki-roshi: Just killing?

Student B: Yeah. Is-is there any distinction between that and just sitting?

Suzuki-roshi: Just killing? Just be angry?

Student B: That's foolish.

Suzuki-roshi: That's foolish.

Student B: Yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, there is big distinction, you know. That is why we sit, you know [loud laughter]. You cannot be angry. Anger is-appears, you know, when you lose yourself, you know, and when you-you are enslaved by B or C, you know.

Student B: But if you "just do it," how can you lose it?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student C: I-I think he means if you could, say, just be angry and nothing else-like "just sit."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. That is not possible [laughs] when you're angry, you know. Anger last pretty long time, you know.

Student B: Just that long.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student B: Just that long.

Suzuki-roshi: Just at the moment?

Student B: Yeah-no longer, no shorter. You're just angry. Angry, angry, angry [laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: But that is not possible [laughs]. You cannot be always angry, you know.

Student B: But you stop.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? Yeah, until you stop. And if you forget all about it after you, you know, you are angry, that is good. But when it lasts, you know, so long time unnecessarily because of the idea of, you know, "I became angry," you know. "I-I'm no good." Or, "He made me angry" [laughs, laughter]. And more and more, you know, you will have, you know, more angry, you know-you will become more angry because you are not just you. That is, you know, that is why we say you cannot just to sit when you're angry. Anger is something-or delusion or anger or greediness is-means-or appears when you are not just you.

Student B: Isn't it possible to become so angry you forget about all that? Or just to become so foolish or so stupid or so ignorant you don't think about anything else?

Suzuki-roshi: I don't think so for human being. If you are animal, you know, they may-they may be able to do it. But for us, that is not possible.

Student D: Well what about loving?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student D: Loving has also this feeling of not letting go.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Loving.

Student D: Loving, yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: Loving, yeah, also, you know, according to our understanding, just love is not, you know-love usually is very ego-centered idea. And we know it. But we make some excuse [laughs, laughter] for it. But we know pretty well, you know, why I love her, you know. There is many "because, because, because" [laughs, laughter], and you don't "just love" anyone.

Student E: What does "form is form" mean, then?

Suzuki-roshi: "Form is form"-form is form means, you know, form is emptiness, emptiness is form, and form is form, and emptiness is emptiness. There is four, you know, meaning in it. Before you say, in its true sense, "form is form," you should get through "form is emptiness" and "emptiness form." Or else, that "form is form" is just-doesn't mean anything.

Student E: Well how about-how about Dogen-how he cut his finger and got angry at the knife after he understood that form is form. Would that anger be anger and nothing else-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh-oh-who did you say?

Student E: -and make him forget that his finger is cut and that's it?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Not Dogen but [laughter]-

Student E: Keizan?

Suzuki-roshi: No. No. Gutei. What do you mean?

Student E: No, I mean anybody. Doesn't-not the-not the koan. But suppose-couldn't somebody under-who understands what-does understand what "form is form" means-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student E: -couldn't that include anger?

Suzuki-roshi: I-

Student F [David Chadwick]: You said your master always used to get angry at you, right? Something like that.

Suzuki-roshi: The, you know-anger-when anger-we don't say anger is not good, you know. But anger-when anger is just anger, that is-we cannot say that is bad, you know. But anger-if anger find out some excuse, you know-if you find out some excuse for being angry, for yourself or for some purpose, that is not just anger. So anger should be just anger, but that is-unless you practice, you know, our way or unless you understand what does it mean, "form is form" or "emptiness is emptiness," it is rather hard, you know, to be just angry like a thunderstorm [makes sound like thunder] [laughs]. Next moment nothing [laughs]. That is beautiful, you know. [Makes loud sound like thunder.] [Laughs, laughter.] That's all. This is very good for-for himself and for others too, you know. If you could do so-I wish I can do so, but [makes sound like thunder] [laughs, laughter]. I think you have more possibility, you know, in this kind of anger [makes sound like thunder] [laughs, laughter]. And I think you will be a good student, you know, better than Japanese people.

You know, Japanese people think anger is [laughs, laughter] [probably gestures]. Here is, you know-his heart is boiling [laughs, laughter]. And his face is, you know, as calm as water [laughs, laughter]. And this is not so good, you know [laughter]. But if-if that is for sake of some- [partial word]-for to be more kind to others or something, it may be all right, but, you know, because-if that is because to keep his own prestige or something, it is no good [laughs, laughter]. It's much better to be natural. And to be natural is very, you know-some effort is necessary, you know, some special kind of effort like you "just to sit" without leaning like this or, you know, too much tension.

Student E: So it is all right if the most famous of all samurai masters goes [makes two swift, cutting sounds] all the time?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student E: Is it all right if the most famous-I mean, if a samurai master-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student E: -knows-knows Buddhism-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. After.

Student E: -through and through, is it all right for him to kill?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe [laughs]-maybe, but that kind of thing will not happen to him [laughter]. He should have complete freedom, but he- there will be no need to, you know, to use all the-all his ability. In all of his ability, you know-one phrase is enough, you know, for-that is one of the ten powers. To save people just by one phrase or one blink of eye is enough. And here again, I must talk about-oh [laughter]-our-

Student E: Did you kill something in the [1 word]?

Suzuki-roshi: -you know-as I said, you know, it is-as-even though we are all Buddha, you know, but there is someone who ac- [partial word]-actually [is] aware of being Buddha and who are not aware of it. So for the enlightened person, everyone is Buddha. But for those who are not aware of it, you know, he is not Buddhist.

So for Buddhist it is necessary to make some special effort to lead-to help people. That is, you know, our-that is a duty for the enlightened one. But enlightened one has some ability or some-to save-to help people in various way-various ways of-he-whether they mistake him or not, he is actually helping people. In this way, you know, our religion exist in social framework. This is, you know-Soto school has been developed in Japan. All the Soto students or believers are not, you know, Zen student. But they know somehow who is good teacher and who is not. And they rather believe in-believe in him rather than believe in his teaching, or Buddha's teaching, or teaching of Dogen, or Shobogenzo. He-they just believe in his way or his character. In this way, you know, Soto developed. And among the people we had many good teachers-good teacher appears from believers or supporters. In this way Soto developed. And this is the characteristic of Soto school.

So in comparison to Soto, Rinzai, you know, teachers has not much students or not much followers, or their organization is divided in many-I don't know how many. If one temple has a branch-five- or ten-branch temple, that is, you know, head temple-independent temple. But most of Rinzai students are people who actually practice zazen. This is very good for it, you know. Even though they have-they do not have many followers, the followers they have is sincere students who practice zazen. But the practice itself, you know, is very narrow. You know, it is a kind of, you know, practice special to some special people, you know. So that is why Rinzai school does not develop among the-do not have many supporters. That is bad points-bad point of Rinzai school.

So we cannot compare actually-we cannot say Soto is good or Rinzai is good. It is difficult to say which is better. I think both is-both should, Rinzai and Soto, should exist.

Suzuki-roshi: What is your question?

Student F: In The Training of the Zen Buddhist Monk, [12] D. T. Suzuki says that there was the invention of the koan that made-that enabled Zen to survive in China because it made it more available-because it was a simpler thing that the m- [partial word]-that you could use-a simpler thing, in a way.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student F: What is your feeling about that statement?

Suzuki-roshi: You know, if, you know, if to practice zazen is only way to propagate Buddhist teaching, you know, koan Zen is better than just to sit. You see? That is better. Because more people will be interested in [it] because that is a kind of candy. So it is better to have candy than to have nothing else. You see? So if, you know, Zen is something-just to sit in cross-legged position, like this all day long, or to behave [laughs] like a Zen master always-uuuh [serious-sounding grunt]-[laughs, laughter], if that is Zen, you know, the koan Zen is better than shikantaza [laughs]. That is better, much better [laughs]. But I don't think Zen is just to sit like this, or Zen master should be always like this, you know, like a general [laughs, laughter]. What do you think [laughs]? Even Zen master, you know, as a descendent of a buddha, you know, he should not be like always general or samurai [laughs]. He should be Buddha, you know-as a descendent of Buddha.

So if you understand in this way, first of all you should, you know, have-you should be able to accept things as it is, and you should be able to help others in various way, not just by sitting. So although we have no koan, we have various kinds of way of helping people, not just by sitting. Ahh. Do you understand?

Student F: A little.

Suzuki-roshi: Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (3/2/01). An edited version appeared in Wind Bell, Fall 1968, Vol. VII (No. 3-4), pp. 26-31.

[1] Buddhavatamsaka-sutra (Jap. Kegon-kyo).

[2] Kyoso-hanjaku: Classification of Buddhist tenets according to a sectarian standpoint. The founders of Chinese and Japanese sects adopted the classifications as their respective doctrines.

[3] shin: mind. kyo: object. shinkyō: subject and object. shinji: "mind-ground"; the mind or mental state.

[4] The period between 794 and 1185, named after the location of the imperial capital, which was moved from Nara to Heian-kyo (Kyoto) in 794.

[5] The period from 1192 to 1333, during which the Kamakura shogunate reigned.

[6] daimyo: (Jap. literally "great name") a feudal lord of a province or castle.

[7] Go-Daigo-tenno: 1319-1338. 96th Emperor of Japan. He was exiled to Chiburi island in 1331.

[8] Gakudo-yojin-shu (1234): A fascicle by Dogen-zenji in which he lists ten rules for the beginning practitioner.

[9] "Reflect on your ordinary mind. ... Is it endowed with the essence and appearance of the three thousand worlds in a single moment of thought? ... No." (Dogen-zenji, Gakudo-yojin-shu, in Yuho Yokoi, Ed., Zen Master Dogen, New York: Weatherhill, 1976, p. 49.)

[10] Case 43 of Hekiganroku (The Blue Cliff Record), "Tozan's 'No Cold or Heat.'" It is also found in Dogen-zenji's Shobogenzo "Shunju."

[11] Perhaps: "By the time I have said something else, it will be eleven past nine."

[12] D. T. Suzuki, The Training of the Zen Buddhism Monk. Kyoto: The Eastern Buddhist Society, 1934.

1968 augustus (1)

1 - The Bodhisattva's Ten Powers

Sunday, August 25, 1968

The Bodhisattva's Ten Powers
San Francisco[1]

This morning I want to continue the explanation of the ten powers. This-those ten powers are that of bodhisattva's ten powers.[2]

One is the devotion to the Buddha's teaching and no attachment to anything else. The second one is increasing one's devotion. The third is expedient ability to instruct people and alter their conduct. The fourth one is understanding what people think. And fifth is satisfying people with what they want. And sixth-uncessation [no cessation] of exertion. The seventh one including all vehicles or all teaching-teachings without abounding-aban- [partial word]-without giving-up Mahayana way-Mahayana way. The eighth one is mysterious power of showing the appearance of the Buddha in every world in each pores of-pores of the body. The ninth-ninth is making people turn towards Buddhism and leading people to perfection. The last one is satisfying all kinds of men with even a single phrase. Those are ten powers.

I explained last-yesterday the first one and the second one, and the last one-satisfying all kinds of men with even a single phrase. Ninth one-or eighth one, the mysterious power of showing the appearance of the Buddha in each world, in each pores of the body. And second one, yeah-and the first one, devotion to the Buddha's teaching and no attachment to anything. This is our practice, which cannot compare with any other activities we have or any other effort we make.

So-and all that we do or all that we think is not absolute itself, you know. So there is no reason why we should attach to it. The only thing we should observe is as a absolute is the emptiness, you know, which is the absolute in its true sense, which is quite different from somethingness, you know [laughs]. All what you do is somethingness [laughs], and you cannot understand emptiness. So that is why it is called emptiness.

And emptiness is, in usual activity, is not the goal of practice or purpose of activity or aim of activity. This much I explained. The only way to realize the absolute is through our practice-through-in its true sense.

And I explained the eighth one: the mysterious power of showing the appearance of the Buddha in each world in each pores of body-of the body. That is actually, you know, zazen practice. Another, you know-this is actually the explanation of our shikantaza. When you, you know, practice zazen in its true sense, actually you are Buddha himself, and in each pore of-pores of your body you have so many worlds [laughs]. And in that world each of the world-worlds, there is Shakyamuni Buddha. This is explanation of our shikantaza.

And when you, you know, practice our way as a one unified activity, mind and body, and each parts of your body from the end of your nail to the [laughs] tip of your head-top of your head. And I always explain how you do it, you know: That is to-to have right posture. Having some strength here [probably pointing to hara], and having perfect mudrahere, like this, and you feel as if you are trying to open your arm little bit. This way. And when you do this, on the contrary, you sh-[partial word]-you know-your arm, you know-open your-you open your arm, and on the contrary you pull your neck-pull your chin and stretch your neck as if you are supporting something on your head. And you have strength here, especially when you inhale. In other word, your inhaling comes to the bottom of your tummy. At that time you, you know, you feel as if you are opening your arms. Actually it shouldn't move, but [by?], and you should pull your neck. And when you exhale, without losing your power here in your tummy or putting some more power in your tummy, you exhale.

So your mind pervade all over your body. And all the parts of your body are participating one activity. So we say [one word unclear]-Dogen-zenji says in his instruction, Gotsu-Gotsugotsu toishite zajo. [3] Gotsugotsu toishite means "like a mountain," you know, which one your body should be, like a one big mountain. And he said "think non-thinking-think non-thinking," you know. When you do this, you cannot think, you know. So-but your mind is pervading every parts of your body. So that is "think non-thinking," not usual thinking in term of good or bad. But your mind is everything and is every parts of your body. When you think in that-when you practice zazen in that way, figuratively speaking, manifesting the Buddha in each world, in every pore of your body, that much I explained yesterday.

[Aside.] Would you bring me that blackboard? The other side.

[Speaking from blackboard. Appears to be writing or drawing on it.] That stage, you know, you are assuming your zazen practice is perfect, you know [laughs, laughter]. That stage is definitely [taps blackboard]. [3-5 words unclear] white-white is relative. Each part of your body or mind-or you say "mind or body." That is relative-relative, and relative unified with absolute-with the absolute-the relative unified with the absolute. Where you have one soul or unity of practice. This is-oh-and-this is-excuse me-this is-this is blackboard [laughs, laughter]. This is black, this is white, as you see [laughs, laughter]. But for me [laughs], this is white and this is black [laughter]. Black, you know, signify the absolute, you know, and white signify the relative. This is nighttime. This is daytime. Nighttime you cannot see anything, you know, but daytime you will see everything in its relative sense. But absolute-you don't see, you don't hear, you don't think. That is the absolute.

So when-when you one with your practice, one is black, or here. When you-when your everyday activity become one with black, then that is the stage [returns from blackboard] when-when manifestation of black or the absolute-this is the realization of bud- [partial word]-black. [Returns to blackboard.] Although there is black and white, those are two sides of the one coin. If you see from front, it may be the black-black, here, you know. It should be all black, but it-to make some distinction from here, we use this symbol. But this actually black, and this is white. And this is the absolute, and this is the relative. And this are-those things is the stage you [returns from blackboard] acquire by the practice of shikantaza. [Returns to blackboard.]

And there is also some difference in the way of practice-in the w- [partial word]-in Rinzai and Soto. Soto puts emphasis on this one [taps blackboard], rather [?], and Rinzai puts emphasis on this one. So Rinzai puts emphasis on enlightenment, you know, black, and we put emphasis on [returns from blackboard] the each part of the body, you know, which participate with the practice of the absolute. So that is why we, you know-we concerned about mudra or posture or every form or manner of your activity.

So we put emphasis on white in everyday activity or each part of your body or mind. But Rinzai puts emphasis on the black, which is the perfect enlightenment. But perfect enlightenment-realization of perfect enlightenment is possible when each part of your body, you know, work together and attain oneness of each part-each-every parts-every part. But there is actually-there is no difference when you attain it.

And now-here I must explain the third power: the expedient ability to instruct people and alter their conduct. This is, you know, this stage [returns to blackboard and points]-especially this one. [Returns from blackboard.] Expedient ability. In Mahayana Buddhism, expedient is more important, you know, rather than the original way, or black, or the absolute. Without, you know, relative, the absolute does not mean anything [laughs], you know-emptiness, just emptiness. And actually when you say "just emptiness," that is not-that is idea of emptiness, not actual emptiness. When we attain emptiness by all parts of our body, that is real emptiness, you know, actual emptiness. When everything exist in its own way and express-and express the absolute, you know, we call it a true emptiness.

So emptiness-because of somethingness, emptiness makes sense. So we rather put emphasis on somethingness or everyday activity without sticking to some idea of emptiness. But it is, you know, interesting to talk about emptiness, you know [laughs, laughter]. Whatever you say, that is emptiness [laughs], you know. If you have good friend to talk about emptiness, you know, you can talk about the emptiness whatever you like [laughs]. Whatever you say, that is emptiness [laughs, laughter]. And you can enjoy the discussion of emptiness [laughs, laughter]. But-but that is not, you know, the emptiness we mean [laughs, laughter]. But this kind of understanding helps, you know, our study, of course. And we should not say, you know, you should not write anything about Buddhism or talk anything about Buddhism.

Whatever you say, that is not emptiness itself but it is the good expedient or good devices, you know. To instruct people-expedient ability to instruct people and alter their conduct. If someone is too rigid, or someone is too-is person [partial?] to some idea of emptiness, or relative, or some kind of teaching, we can correct their understanding by the expedience. So whatever the teaching are, those teaching are just good devices. And good devices is very important. And to have power of good devices is one of the important point for us. And to-so whatever you do, that activity should be good devices to instruct people [laughs]. You should be good example of-example for the people.

So expedient ability. Why you will-you have expedient ability is because you do not think that what you are doing is the absolute itself. You know this is expedient. But this is something which you should do with kindness-with the same mercy as Buddha's mercy. That is the actual power we have as a Zen student.

So-but this expedient or good devices is not usual devices, you know.

This is the devices-this is old activity. Each activity which we do moment after moment, that is-all what you do is good devices. And to express and realization of the absolute-in this-when you understand the third power in this way, this is nothing different from the ninth one-or-oh, eighth one-mysterious power of showing the appearance of the Buddha in every world in each pores of the-in each pore of the body. You know, the meaning is the same.

And I think I-I explained the fourth one, which is understanding what people think. Or satisfying the fifth one is satisfying people with what they want. When you are doing something with calmness of your mind, with good concentration, without being involved in any prejudice, or without sticking to your own viewpoint, then you know things-you see things as it is. So you know-so you know what people want, like Bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara. So satisfying people with what they want, this power naturally will appear.

And the sixth one: no cessation of exertion. And this no cessation of exertion take place when the tenth power-when you obtain the tenth power, which is satisfying all kinds of men with even a single phrase. And devotion to the Buddha's teaching, and no-and no attachment to anything-to anything. You know, when-when you devote yourself to your practice, you will have-you will have the power of understanding through everything and through various teaching-verbal teaching and non-verbal teaching.

So you will have incessant practice when you-because you hear-because you see-observe the truth through verbal or-and non-verbal things. You increase your [3-6 words], and because you-in this way, [2-3 words] devotion, you will hear everything as Buddha's teaching. So in this way, back and forth, you will practice our way endlessly and, as Dogen-zenji said, without any trace of it, you know, this kind of practice will continue. This kind of pure practice will continue forever, endlessly. This is the power we obtain through our practice.

The seventh is including all vehicles-all the teachings without abandoning the Mahayana. The Mahayana teaching, in its wide sense-our teaching-our teaching in its wide sense is everything in its wide sense. In its narrow sense, teaching is something which was told by some sage. That is the teaching in its narrow sense. But in its wide sense, everything is the teaching for us: the color of the mountain, the sound of the river, or sound of the motorcar [laughs] even [is] a teaching of Buddha. We understand in this way.

So including all teaching, without abandoning the Mahayana. When we understand our way, and when we practice our way, we cannot, you know-whatever teaching you observe, that is our teaching-our Mahayana teaching. So you cannot, you know [laughs], abandon Mahayana way-our way. When you have true understanding of our practice, that is including all vehicles, without abandoning the Mahayana vehicle.

Those are the ten powers.

[Transcription was stopped here. Sound quality was too poor to continue without enhancement.]

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (3/23/01). All text was checked to this point.

[1] This date is probably incorrect. Earlier (July 21, 1968) Suzuki-roshi mentioned that he had already explained the ten powers of a bodhisattva. So this lecture was probably given sometime earlier in July of 1968.

[2] This version of the ten powers follows very closely the Japanese-English Buddhist Dictionary, Daito Shuppansha, 1965 (p. 153, under juriki).

[3] Gotsu is repeated for emphasis. It means "high and level," "lofty," or "motionless." Its original connotation was to a table mountain-hence, something imposing and balanced (Nishijima and Cross, Shobogenzo, Vol. 2, p. 91). Gotsu is a key term in the exchange between Yakusan and a monk on thinking non-thinking, which Dogen cites in Shobogenzo "Zazenshin" as well as Fukan Zazen-gi.

1968 oktober (14)

1 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #8

Tuesday, October 01, 1968

Lotus Sutra Lecture, #8
Zen Mountain Center

Buddha's disciples were very good people, generous and honest and sincere, but they were, I think, very tough guys, and his followers were very strong people. For instance, as you know, the Diamond Sutra was recited at the place called, in Japanese, Giju-gi kkodoku-on [Skt.: Jetavananathapindadarama], the park given to Buddha by Prince Jeta. The story is that when Sudatta wanted to provide Buddha with a place to stay, he looked for some lodging place, and at last he found a beautiful place which was the property of Prince Jeta. So he asked the Prince to give it to the Buddha. The Prince didn't say yes, but said, "If you pay as much money as it takes to pave the land with coins, I will give it to you." Sudatta was also a very wealthy person, so he said, "Okay, I will do that." And he bought a lot of coins and started to pave that land. Prince Jeta was very impressed by him and said, "Okay, okay. I will donate it to your boss."

That was where the Diamond Sutra was told. [Here Suzuki-roshi starts to recite the sutra. It sounded something like this, but I doubt the spelling is right-Brian Fikes.] "Gije reko do ban, yo dai biku shu dai myo _____." That is how we recite the Diamond Sutra in Japan. This is Chinese, actually, not Japanese. We are still reciting the old Chinese pronunciation as people did it, maybe, more than one thousand years ago. Anyway, that park was given to him by Prince Jeta.

Not only his followers, but also his students were very tough people. I didn't talk about Aniruddha yet. Aniruddha was famous for his supernatural power [abhijna]. The way he gained that supernatural power is very interesting. Once he slept when Buddha was giving a lecture. He was one of the seven, or more, priests who belonged to the Shakya family. Maybe Buddha was too familiar to him, so he started to sleep. But Buddha blamed him for drowsiness, so he decided not to sleep anymore. Very tough. He didn't go to bed after that. And, at last, he lost his sight. Giba [Jivaka] was a very famous teacher, and Buddha asked him to take care of his eyes. But since he didn't go to bed, he couldn't do anything with him. He lost his physical eyes, but he gained the spiritual eye.

I think Buddha's character was very gentle, but his spirit was very strong. Yesterday morning I told you about the four sufferings or eight sufferings. To come into this world is already suffering, and old age, sickness, death, not to be able to get what we want, not to be able to see who you love most, that you cannot always be with someone you love, and that you will always see someone you don't like. This kind of teaching is very negative, or, at least, it is based on a kind of negative feeling.

But think of why Buddha escaped from the castle. He did not escape because he wanted to seclude himself on a remote mountain. When he saw sick people and poor people and old people having a difficult time in the city around his castle, as their prince, he felt a kind of responsibility for them. His notion was to save them, to find out some way to help them, completely. I think he's a very extraordinary person. Almost all people, even in Buddha's time, must have resigned from the problem of death or sickness. Even though we do not like to die, this comes to everyone. So we think it can't be helped, there is no possibility for us to conquer this kind of problem; there is no possibility of helping people who are going to die. But he didn't give up. He had extraordinary spirit, I think. That was why he gave up his heritage to his father.

So there is no wonder that his disciples were very tough people. They were not afraid of anything, not even death. And their Way-seeking mind even went beyond the suffering of life and death. Buddha did not talk about the problem of birth and death just to make us unhappy, but because we have this kind of problem, and it will help us to have real strength. When our spirit is limited by this kind of problem, we cannot have perfect composure of life. That is why he talked about this kind of teaching from his own very critical standpoint.

So we must see our life completely, and we have to confront all the problems by all means. To confront those sufferings is to develop our religious spirit. And before our spirit is emancipated from this kind of problem, there is no chance to have perfect enlightenment.

Here is a good example: As you know, India at that time (or maybe even now, I don't know), had very strict ideas of class. The highest class was the Brahmans, the religious people or priests. The second was the Ksatriyas, the kings or rulers of the country. Third were the common people who participated in farming or some other work [Vaisyas], and the lowest class was the slaves [Sudras].

Upali was one of the ten disciples of Buddha. Before he joined Buddha's order, he belonged to the Sudra or servant class and served Shakyamuni Buddha's family. Buddha came back to his castle, after saving the five disciples and having been given Giju-gikkodoku-on-I don't know the Sanskrit-that park. [See p.1 for Sanskrit.] And he had more disciples who had belonged to some other teacher or religion, who worshipped fire. There were four brothers who served the god of fire. Their names were the venerable Kasyapa of Uruvilva, the venerable Kasyapa of Nadi, and venerable Kasyapa of Gaya, and there must be one more Kasyapa [the venerable Maha-Kashyapa?]. They joined Buddha's order with one thousand disciples. So he already had quite a few disciples before he came back to his castle.

And after he came back, all seven members of his family joined his order, including his father's prince, Buddha's son, Rahula, and his cousin Aniruddha-I already talked about the blind disciple Aniruddha-and Devadatta. When all those families joined his order, Upali helped them to shave their heads, and at last he wanted to be a priest too. But because he belonged to the Sudra class, he hesitated. But Buddha, knowing that, became very sympathetic with him and let him join. At that time, one more member of his family [Nanda] wanted to join the order, but Buddha said, "Wait. If you join our order, perhaps you will be the last one [from the Shakya clan?]. And if Upali joins our order after you, he should always be seated in the last seat, and he will not be so happy. So wait and let him join my order before you."

So Nanda gave his tan to Upali. Upali joined the order, and later Nanda joined the order. When all seven members of his family were seated in their own seats and Nanda came, the six disciples saluted him, and he had to take his seat. But when Upali came to his seat, Nanda hesitated to bow to him. He knew Buddha was right, we should not discriminate about this or that class, higher or lower. But when Upali actually came next to him, he couldn't bow. He forgot, or he couldn't do this. Upali had always been his barber, his servant, so it was rather difficult to bow to him. Buddha was very angry with Nanda and gave him a long lecture about not discriminating between classes. These are very famous words: "Whatever their class, when people join our order, they are all of the Shakyamuni family. Just as when all the rivers come into the ocean, there is no name for the rivers, so is our order. There is no family name when people join our order."

You may say Buddha was a strange person. In some way he had a very strange spirit, but his spirit is something unusual. That was why he was called "Buddha", I think. His disciples did not know on what kind of occasions they would be scolded. When they expected to be scolded, Buddha was very gentle, but when they didn't fear anything bad, they were scolded terribly. He had, I think, an unusual spirit which goes beyond our world. So for a Buddhist, this world is one of millions, a small, tiny world. There should be many, many worlds besides this small world. The scheme of this sutra is very big, and there is no wonder why this kind of description came from Buddha's talk.

Upali, who belonged to the Sudra class, is famous for his precepts observation. Not many events are told about him, but after Buddha's death, as you know, they had a synod or compiling conference. At that time, Upali decided [recited?] the precepts.

I must tell you one more thing about Aniruddha, who became blind from not sleeping. As you know, in India the summertime is the rainy season. When it was difficult to travel around to different parts of India, the members of the order stayed in a certain place with Buddha and practiced with him. But when there was clear weather, they went for a journey. Usually Buddha told them to make the journey alone. He said, "You should always be quiet, trust people, and treat people as your friends wherever you go." This is Buddha's way.

I don't know Christianity, but someone made a comparison on this point. Jesus told his disciples not to travel alone. He said, "You should go in numbers greater than two, because you will have many difficulties and many enemies." But I don't want to compare Buddhism to Christianity in that kind of way. If you try to compare them in some way, you will have the opposite conclusion. So it is not fair to say Buddhism is a more generous teaching and Christianity is more exclusive. But anyway, this is very interesting.

So Aniruddha, the blind priest went for a journey, and he had to stay at a woman's home where there was nobody but her. That woman started to like him too much. She loved him, but as he was a priest, he said, "You shouldn't do that." [Much laughter throughout this story.] After he came back to Buddha, he told him what had happened to him. So Buddha set up a precept at that time, that monks should not stay in some woman's home alone. If you want to stay, you should stay with some one else. If there is no one to stay at her home with you, you should always recite the sutra and always think of Buddha. "Buddha, Buddha, Buddha." That is one of the precepts. Aniruddha is famous for helping Buddha to set up one of the precepts.

Do you have some questions?

Q: Roshi, I think I understand what a sravaka is and what a pratyeka buddha is, but I still can't understand what an arhat is. Will you try once more to-

Suzuki-roshi: Arhatship is the goal of the practice of the sravaka or hearer. I don't know historically why, and when, and how we made this kind of technical term. Maybe someone knows, but I don't know. It may be pretty difficult to know when, and how, and why we started using these terms. Perhaps the so-called "Mahayana Buddhists" later used them. Perhaps all of the direct disciples are actually sravakas. All the arhats are listed as disciples of Buddha, but the bodhisattvas, such as the Bodhisattva Manjusri and the Bodhisattva Avalokitesvara, are not listed as historical people. They may be the people whom Buddha is supposed to have taught, but, for instance, this sutra was not actually spoken by the Buddha. This sutra was composed by someone else long, long after Buddha passed away, maybe in the first or second century A.D.

The earliest Mahayana sutra is supposed to be the small Prajñāparamita Sutra, or Shobo _____ [?]. In that sutra they do not say "Mahayana" or "Hinayana". Instead of using the word "Hinayana", they use "Sravakayana" or "people who hear." I don't know Sanskrit, but sravaka means "hearer", or those who studied under Buddha. "Bodhisattva" means one who studied the Bodhisattva way. The so-called "Bodhisattva way," or "Mahayana way," was originated by the assembly who met outside of the cave. The cave was the place where the synod was held to compile Buddha's teaching. In that cave, all the famous disciples assembled and compiled the scriptures.

But there were many disciples who did not join that meeting. They are called daishubu-I don't know the Sanskrit word. [San skrit is mahasamghika.] Daishu means "public," a more public assembly. And, of course, they compiled some other sutras. Maybe the small Prajna Paramita Sutra was compiled by those people. But even in that sutra, they do not use sravaka or "Hinayana" or "Mahayana." At that time, "Buddhism" meant that which was taught by Buddha, or which was compiled by those famous disciples. They were the sravakas, but maybe we should call them the original Buddhists instead of Hinayanists.

It looks like there is Hinayana and Mahayana, but it is not so. All those Prajñāparamita Sutras are more like Mahayana, so they are all attributed to Sariputra, who was a great disciple of Buddha. He was actually both [Hinayana and Mahayana?]. His understanding was wider and deeper than the rest of the disciples, so all the sutras are attributed to him. If we say, "Shariputra told this story," it is more like traditional Buddhism.

But at that time, "original Buddhism" or "true Buddhism" was the Sravakayana. According to the sravakas, Buddha was so great that we cannot be like him, but at least we can be an arhat. Next to Buddha are the arhats. After following diligently Buddha's precepts and observing Buddha's teaching with perfect understanding, annihilating all our evil desires, we will obtain Buddhahood [should be arhatship?]. This is the sravaka understanding and so-called "original Buddhism."

But there is one more thing we have to know. After the Meiji period, or recently, European scholars started to study Buddhism from various materials they found in India. The early scholars thought that the Agama Sutra was spoken by Buddha, but later they found out that it was compiled a long, long time after Buddha lived. So the Sravakayana was not original Buddhism. What was the teaching which Buddha taught? We still have that kind of problem. How to know what was taught by Buddha without much reliable material is our problem.

Mahayana Buddhists also had this kind of problem. They couldn't rely on the Agama Sutra or the Kusha [abhi dharma] or Yuishiki [Vijnapti-matrata = consciousness only] philosophies. So the Mahayana teachers started to think about what is Buddha's real teaching. This was very good discipline for them. I think that what is true with us, really, is true with Buddha too. That is a very strange or mysterious thing. What you think is right is also right for Buddha. Buddha said it in this way, "What is right for me was right for my teachers and will be right for our descendants."

In this way Buddhism developed. So there is the original, more fundamental Buddhism, which was taught by Buddha himself, and the Sravakayana, and the Bodhisattvayana. And true Mahayana Buddhism, which includes every Sravakayana and Bodhisattvayana, is true Buddhist teaching. We cannot say it is true, but it "should be" true Buddhism. That kind of Buddhism was established by Tendai Chigi [T'ien T'ai Chih-I]. According to him, true Mahayana teaching, Buddha's true teaching, should be original Buddhism, the Sravakayana, and the Bodhisattvayana. People say the Bodhisattvayana is the best teaching of all the Buddhist teachings, but that is a mistake. If it is the best teaching it should include Buddha's original teaching, of course, and the Sravakayana. So the arhats belonged to the Sravaka yana, but every morning we recite the sutra for the arhats too, so they are also our Buddha. People call them other names, but they are actually Buddha. But, technically, arhats belong to the Sravakayana.

-----

Formatted 8/28/00.

2 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #14

Tuesday, October 01, 1968

Lotus Sutra Lecture, #14
Zen Mountain Center

Shunryu Suzuki-roshi: We have here ... we had here ... various names of Bodhisattvas, and the next ones were the devas, devas or gods, or supernatural beings. [Begins reading from Lotus Sutra, p. 4, Line 18.]

"... further Sakra, the ruler of the celestials, with twenty thousand ... and others." Sakra, the ruler of the celestials. Sakra in Rig Veda's time is not the name of this god. "Sakra" is the adjective as you say: "the strong." If you say "the strong" sometimes you mean strong one is just strong. Same thing with this god. Indra was the name of the god. "Sakra," the strong one, means Sakra the Indra. But at Buddha's time "Sakra" became the name of indras, and here is the name of the god. Sakra the ruler, deva, devanan [?], Indra ... the strong one, the ruler of the celestials. But here, "Sakra" is name. Celestials means indras, many gods. (Again reading from Lotus Sutra, p. 4 with frequent interjections): "... with twenty thousand gods, his followers, such as the god Kandra (the moon)." God of the moon, deva of the moon; the deva of Surya (the sun); the god of Samantaghanda (the wind); the god of Ratnaprabha. Ratnaprabha I couldn't figure out who he was.

"The god Avabnasaprabha ... ; further, the four great rulers (and so on to) Vaisravana." Those are the rulers or gods who protect Buddhists in the four directions.

The great ruler Virupaksha--in Japanese, Ko Moku Ten No [?]. He is the ruler who lives ... protector who lives in West. The great ruler Dhritarashira lives ... excuse ... namely, the great ruler Virudnaka, the first one lives in the South. The next one, Virupaksha, live in the West, the protector of the West. And the great ruler Dhritarashira [?] is the protector who is on the North. And the great ruler Vaisravana [?] who lives in the East. This is sometimes the order is not the same, but here, in this book, the order is South, East, West, and North. Sometimes East, South, West, North. This is more usual.

"The god Isvara and the god Mahesvara ... Isvara ... Mahesvara ... this is in Japanese, they are: Zisiten [?] or Dai Zisiten [?] Those are the gods who protect also Buddhists. Each followed by thirty thousand gods; further, Brahma Sanampati."

Brahma Sanampati ... Saha means sava ... Sava means, in Japanese or Chinese, Saba. "Sanampati" is the "Lord of ... " or "Ruler of this world." Brahma is god of gods. "Brahma Sanampati" means Brahma, the "Lord of this world."

"... and his twenty [sutra says twelve] thousand followers," and the Brahma Kayika gods. (and so on to twelve thousand Brahmakayika gods). Brahmakayika ... kakyika means "world." Brahmakayika ... the god which belong to Brahma worlds, Kayika ... "Brahmakayika gods, amongst whom Brahma Sikhin ... " "Sikhin" is the name or a name of the Brahma.

"And Brahma Gyotishprabha, with the other twelve thousand Brahmakayika gods." Those are the gods who belong to Brahma's world. "... together with the eight Naga Kings ..." Naga Kings--eight Naga Kings is pretty famous gods. "And many hundred thousand myriads of Kotis of Nagas in their train." Naga is dragon. "Namely, the Naga King Nanda (and so on to) ... and Utpakala." Those are the eight Nagas, Dragons. "... further, the four Kinnara Kings (and so on to) ... of followers." Kinnara is "kin" is "what," "Nara" is "man." Man or what? (laughs) kinnara, man or what? He was, you know, his legs, it is animal and his body is ... his head is man, with horns, here. So, (laughs) man or what? That is his name, Kinnara. And he is good. He is a kind of musician, and people like him very much, because of his music. Man or what? Is his name, Kinnara.

"... Many hundred thousand myriads of kotis of followers (and so on to) ... the Kinnara King Dharmadhara." The first one, Kind Druma, his name means "King who respects Dharma." Kinnara King Drama. The Canary King Monothermia, "The King of the Great Dharma," Mahadhrama, the King Saddharma Pundarika, you know, "Highest, Greatest Dharma." And the Canary King Dharmadhara. Dharmadhara means to hold, or to protect, or to obtain. The Canary who obtains or who protects the Dharma.

"... Besides, the four divine beings called Gandharvakayikas." Gandharvakayikas is in Chinese or Japanese Kendachiwa [?] (Kendattiwa?). God, Kendachiwa (Kendattiwa?) ... divine being, god Kendachiwa [?]. "With many hundred thousand Gandharvas in their following, namely (and so on to) ... and the Gandharva Madhurasvara." Those are the gods who has ... who is charming, and who likes girls. You know, who loves girls, and who gave (gives) people joy. The first one is ... Manogna is the joy or tenderness, god of Tenderness. And the Gandharva Manognasvara is the god of the Sun. Gandharva Madhura is the god of Sweetness. And the god of ... Madhurasvara, he is also the god of Suns.

"Further, the four chiefs of the demons followed by (and so on to) ... of Kotis of Garudas. Uasha, Asura, he belongs to one of the six reincarnations, reincarnated worlds. You know: celestial world and human worlds and hell and hungry ghost world and animal and Asura world. This is the kind of world where human beings are incarnated. Human beings actually ... we have actually ... we are actually sometimes celestial, like celestial beings, like human beings, like animals, like Asura. Asura maybe the state of our mind where, because we have two nature: one is animal nature or good nature, the other is bad nature. And within ourselves always fighting ... the good nature is always fighting the bad nature. That is our problem. So before Buddhists, before Buddhism, there were evil natured kings, gods, who were fighting always with the gods ... gods who have good nature.

[End of Side A. Some text lost.]

_____ were the god who was fighting. Buddhists understand this god as a reincarnation ... reincarnated world for human beings. So it means that the state of mind we will actually, even in this life.

So those gods is rather more subjective gods than objective beings, which is always fighting with good nature gods. And the four garuda gods follow "garuda chiefs followed by many (and so on to) ... the son of Vaidehi." (Roshi doesn't mention the second garuda chief in the sutra).

The King of Agantasatru, this is an historical person, not a god. Here we have Bodhisattvas and sixteen laymen Bodhisattvas and celestial beings like devas; and many spirits, good and bad. And the last one, as a human being, is Bimbisara's son, or princess, Ajatasattu ... (Bimbisara = Vaidehi [?]). "Ajatasattu, King of Magadha, the son of Vaidehi." I think I told you about him already. Bimbisara who did not have his successor, he didn't have for a long time his princess or successor: so he asked some fortune teller about his prince; and the fortune teller said, "He is in the mountain ... still ... you will have your successor, but he is now a hermit in the mountains, and he will be, after his death, in his future life your successor."

So he kills him, so that he can have his next life earlier, he kills him. (Laughs). Do you remember? But at the same time he is reincarnated as his prince. And he asked again the fortune teller about him. And he said, "You killed him, so I am afraid he will kill you." So he was very much afraid of his _____ and he tried to kill him before he ... the boy kill the king. But ... the king threw him or tossed him from the Nion Pagoda, but he couldn't kill him. But he was injured--just his toe was injured. So he now ... the king now, treated him very well so that he will not have any bad feelings with the king. But when he became king he try to killed ... he tried to kill the king. He put the king in prison and his wife protected him in various ways. Sometimes she went ... she saw the king with honey, with honey painted in her body ... whole body. [Laughs] And he _____ king to lick the honey from her body. But at last [his?] King passed away in that prison. And Agatasatru became the king of the country, Magadha. And Iitaike [?] or Vaidrehi [?] ... Vaidrehi is the mother of Ajatasattu. And Ajatasattu became Buddha's follower later. He was very ... he became very resentful of what he did and he became Buddha's follower. This is Ajatasattu, the kind of Magadha ... the son of Vaidehi.

[Continues with Lotus Sutra p. 6, Line 9]: "Now at that time ... the exposition of Infinity." And so many human beings and various spirits and gods attended ... came to the castle ... not castle, but Ragagriha, city of Ragagriha ... where Buddha was and he was surrounded by those people. Four people, (classes of hearers?) ... four people means lay Buddhists ... man and woman ... and nuns and monks. Those are the four classes of hearers.

"... Honored, revered, venerated, worshipped by the four classes of hearers." "Worshipped," it says, but means that--"served" is more appropriate. "Venerated and served," "Kuiyo [?]" ... this word is very big word. Worship. In Shobogenzo-only-this term is explained-what is kuiyo. It was very deep and wide in meaning.

"Venerated," worshiped by the four classes of hearers ... after expounding the Dharmaparyaya ... the Supreme teaching ... means Dharmaparyaya ... called the "great exposition." "Dharmaparyaya and great exposition" in Chinese is in apposition: "Dharmaparyaya, the great exposition." But here it says: "Dharmaparyaya called ... the great exposition." I don't know which is correct. The text of great ... this is, you know, adjective for the Supreme Teaching. Or ... great Exposition means Great Vehicle. The Supreme Teaching is called the Great Vehicle or Great Teaching, Great Exposition.

"A test of Great Development," this is an adjective for the Dharmaparyaya or Supreme Teaching. "The Great Development serving to instruct Bodhisattvas ... serving to instruct Bodhisattvas and proper to all Buddhas." Obtained by all Bodhisattvas ... the teaching ... Bodhisattvas obtain--means: teaching which Bodhisattvas have, keep, always in their mind. Proper to all Buddhas.

"... sat cross-legged on the seat of the Law (and so on to) ... exposition of Infinity." The Dhyana [?] of Infinity, Infinite meaning. And "his body was motionless (and so on to) ... tossed ... tossed along." This is how it was moved.

"... as soon as the Lord had entered upon his meditation; there fell a great rain of divine flowers." This is ... some ... you know, important event happened, when he ... before he started to give this sutra. "As soon as (and so on to) ... great Mangushakas ...." "I don't know what flowers actually they are. But in Japan, Mangushaka means, you know, a kind of flower which comes out in Spring and Autumn. It is, you know, you don't have that flower in ... I haven't see Mangushaka in America. It is something like Daffodils, but it is red. A kind of bulb [?], you know, which comes out in Spring and it comes out twice, Spring and Autumn.

Those flowers fell and covered the Lord and the four classes of hearers who were at ... who where there. "And the whole Buddha field shook in six ways." There are many interpretations for what the six ways of shaking (means). This is one of the interpretations: "It moved ... removed, trembled from one end to the other ... tossed along." This is a mixture of many kinds of interpretations of how it trembles. But, it means, anyway: "how it shook." Some explanation is to shook, you know, if this is "world" (gesturing with hands) ... middle part comes up and four corners come out, later, this way (gesture) and some explanation ... and this one ... and four corners of it, you know, move. But this is four ... four ways. And some explained: Here ... removed ... trembled ... removed ... (some false starts on a new explanation [?]) "... moved ... moved strongly and ... moved ... and moved strongly ... and removed ... and removed strongly ... trembles ... trembled strongly. It will make six. "From one end to the other, tossed ... tossed along."

There is many interpretations, anyway, page after page. But it means to ... "something extraordinary." The people who attended there had some extraordinary feeling when he was expected, Buddha ... to tell some important teaching.

Student A: Roshi, I don't understand reincarnation at all. Are people really reborn" And if they are, who or what is reborn? And how does that happen?

Suzuki-roshi: Reincarnation? Actually, Buddhists ... most Buddhists believe in reincarnation. Actually, you know, it means reincarnated ... means ... next life. Some other being, like animals, if you do not behave. [Laughs.]

Student ____: If what?

Student B: If you don't "behave."

Student A: If you don't behave ... what if you do behave?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student A: What if you do behave?

Suzuki-roshi: If you behave like an animal, next life you will be animal.

Student A: Well now?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student A: Yeah, I mean ... what is it that is reborn?

Suzuki-roshi: I don't know. [Laughter]

Student A: Is there something, you know, something about you that continues? Or ...

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student A: Is there something, you know, something inside of me, say, that continues ... and gets reborn somehow? I read a book ... a thing that Yasutani-roshi wrote about this little thing that kind of floats around. You know, has ... eats perfume and ... and it finds appropriate parents for it ... and then it is reborn. But it ... it was like a thing. Something. I don't know what to call it. Is that what it is like? [Laughter throughout much of this.]

Suzuki-roshi: I don't know. I am not so sure.

Student B: Roshi, I don't know about reincarnation, but I have read Buddhist things on reincarnation that say there is no person reborn, but there are no actor reborn, but the acts continue ... and it seems to me that you could just as easily say as "Who is being reborn now?" As you can say "Who will be reborn later?" We don't understand. What is happening now is no more miraculous, I think, than some continuation of whatever is happening. But do you see what I mean?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. [Laughter] I am not ... I cannot explain it, you know, satisfactorily. I studied from many teachers, but it was pretty difficult to understand.

Student B: You have no opinion?

Suzuki-roshi: No. I have many opinions. [Laughter.]

-----

Formatted 8/28/00.

3 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #7

Tuesday, October 01, 1968

Lotus Sutra Lecture, #7

Zen Mountain Center

Not edited yet

Yesterday I told you about Ajñata-Kaundinya, one of the five earliest disciples[1] of Buddha. As I told you, when Buddha gave up the practice of asceticism, they continued practicing asceticism at the Deer Park. After Buddha attained enlightenment, he came to the Deer Park. At that time he told them about the four noble truths, dana-prajña-paramita, and shila-prajña-paramita. Instead of saying you will attain enlightenment if you practice shila-paramita, he said you will have a good future life. This means that, at that time, he applied some religious understanding of the common people of India when he taught his own teaching. According to Buddhism, you practice precepts, not to have a good future life, but because we attain enlightenment in this life. This is actually Buddha's teaching.

I think it is better for us to study more about what Buddha taught here about the four noble truths and eight holy paths. The four noble truths are suffering, the cause of suffering, the way to attain liberation from suffering, and nirvana. According to Buddha's teaching, this world is full of suffering. But in the Mahayana teaching which developed from these four noble truths and eight holy paths, this world is the world where we find realization or nirvana within each self. According to the Mahayana, this world is not the world of suffering, but according to the Hinayana, or according to the teaching which Buddha told for the first time to the five disciples, this world is full of suffering.

Actually, this world is full of suffering. Suffering and our life coexist. Where there's life, there's suffering. Suffering and life are synonymous. This teaching is very important, because when you think you have no problem, that is the biggest problem. You know, at first you will have a stomachache, but when your stomach is worse, you have no ache. So having suffering is good, but having no suffering is more serious. As long as you have problems, you have a pretty good stomach, a promising stomach. If you have no suffering, you are hopeless. You say you have no suffering, but that is suffering which is the great problem. In this way, Buddha started his teachings.

Student A: Excuse me, Roshi, what do you mean by suffering?

Suzuki-roshi: Suffering is various problems. He explains more about it: When you came to this world for the first time, that was suffering; when you came out from the narrow place, you had great suffering. That is one type. And you will become older and older, like me-that is suffering too. And you will have sickness-that is suffering. And you die-that is suffering. When you came to this world, you already had a very good future opportunity to die, to be sick, and to become old. So he said human life is a life of suffering.

Student B: Roshi, if we have suffering and problems and are able to feel some confidence that we can take it, is that still hopeless? Then it doesn't seem to be quite so much of a problem anymore. When it seems that I can't take it, then it seems like an insurmountable problem.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That was the four sufferings, and there are four more: [1] You will meet someone or have to live with someone who you do not like. [2] You will be separated from someone who you like very much, who you love. It looks like this is very true. You cannot leave someone who you love the most, or you will have to live with someone who you do not like. [3] That you have the five skandhas is already suffering. That you have eyes, nose, mouth, and ears, that you can think, feel, and have some idea, that you can know who Buddha is, is already suffering. What do you think? And [4] you cannot get what you want. This is also true. This is, maybe, a more developed, or advanced, or conclusive understanding, but, in short, we prefer substantial, concrete things rather than for everything to be changing. Everything is changing, but we do not like everything to be changing; we want things to be more substantial and concrete. That is the cause of suffering. So suffering is coexistent with our human life.

That is the first teaching he told the five disciples. It could be a strong teaching. And you cannot deny it, it is very true. And no one can help you, as long as we care for something concrete, something substantial, something more materialistic, when in reality everything is changing, including ourselves. So in this sense we cannot rely on even ourselves. But still he says the only thing you can rely on is you. You exist right now-this is a more advanced way of explaining it. But Buddha says you should rely on yourself because that is the only thing you can rely on. Anyway, the first teaching is that this world is full of suffering.

The next teaching is the cause of suffering. What is the cause of suffering? The cause of suffering is self-centered ideas, the self which thinks everything is constant, including ourselves, and everything is enjoyable, and everything has self-nature, and everything is substantial. Because of this kind of understanding, which has those four elements, we suffer. The way to get out of suffering is the way to attain realization, which is the third truth.

The relationship between the teaching of the cause of suffering and the teaching that we have suffering is that one is cause and the other is effect. That we have suffering here is the effect, and the cause, or reason, we suffer is that we have in our minds the four elements of eternity, enjoyment, self, and substantiality. So here Buddha has given the teaching of cause and effect.

And what is nirvana? Nirvana is well attained when we know this cause and effect. When we know what the reason for suffering is, then we will be free from suffering. That is the Buddha's teaching of the four noble truths.

Student __: Roshi, which one of these is the eight-fold path?

Suzuki-roshi: The eight-fold noble path is the way to attain nirvana. The first truth is suffering, then the cause of suffering, the way to attain renunciation, and nirvana. So the eight holy paths is the third truth.

The first of the eight holy paths is right view. Right view is to know cause and effect, to have perfect understanding of cause and effect-how suffering is caused. That is right view-to see "things as it is." When we see things as it is, we will know how we create suffering for ourselves. If you see things as it is, nothing is constant, everything is changing, so everything has no self-nature. So you cannot enjoy your life as you expected. You expected your life to be very enjoyable. But actually, everything's changing. "Oh my, that was not true," you may say.

So when you see things as it is, you have to change your understanding of this life completely. When you change your understanding of life completely, that is nirvana. There's no problem. The way to attain nirvana is by the eight holy paths, starting from right view, right understanding of our life. To have right understanding is to know cause and effect-what is the cause of suffering, and what is suffering. So starting from right view, we should see things as it is.

In Mahayana dharma practice, bodhisattvas have six practices. One is dana-prajña-paramita, to give things, material things and teaching, or to help people. The second is precepts, [shila]-prajña-paramita. The third is to be patient [kshanti-paramita], to wait, not limiting ourselves, but extending our practice in two directions, past and future. That is why we say sentient beings are in us (endless?), and our desires are inexhaustible. When we extend our practice, that is the practice of patience. Fourth is the practice of constant effort [virya-paramita]. This practice should [also] be extended in two ways. The fifth is to have good meditation [dhyana-paramita], and the sixth is to have wisdom [prajña-paramita]. Those are the bodhisattva's six practices.

In Buddha's first teaching, the first of the eight holy paths, right view, is equivalent to right giving. If you want to help people by giving some teaching or material, you should know whether they want it or not, and you should know what is the most appropriate thing to give and what is the right time to give. This is also right view. If you want to give something, you should not just give as you give some candy to a dog. Even a dog will not take it if he does not want it.

This teaching looks more negative, but what Buddha really meant was more difficult. The other side is the Mahayana-like side. And when Mahayana teachers become proud of their way of understanding, discriminating it from the Hinayana, saying, "That is Hinayana," that attitude is not, according to the great teachers, true Buddhism either. True Buddhism should understand in two ways: right view, which was taught by Buddha or understood by the direct disciples of Buddha, and the Mahayana practice of giving and helping others. They have the same quality, they are not different teachings at all. When we understand Buddha's teaching as Buddha's disciples understood, and as Mahayana teachers understood, that is the true teaching of Buddha. If Mahayana is the very best teaching, it should be that kind of teaching, not the kind which discriminates Hinayana and Mahayana. So actually, those teachings are not only Hinayana, but also Mahayana.

In other scriptures which describe when Buddha told his teaching for the first time to the five disciples, the one called Ashvajit here in the Lotus Sutra is usually called Assaji.

Yesterday I told you that Shariputra was born near Rajagrha-Oshajo in Japanese. When Buddha came to Rajagrha with his disciples. Perhaps he had more than five disciples. His son, wife, mother-in-law, and his aunt were all converted to become Buddha's disciples. And some famous teachers converted and joined his order. When Shariputra saw him, he thought he was a quite different person, not a usual one. And Shariputra was wise enough to see that he must have a good teacher if he behaved like that while quite a young man. So he asked him, "Who is your teacher?" And the disciple answered, "My teacher is Shakyamuni Buddha." Shariputra asked, "What, in short, is his teaching?" One version of it is, "Every being comes from its own cause, and when the cause is empty, every being is empty." When the cause is understood to be empty, that is Tao, that is the way. (That is another of the eight holy paths.) My teacher told it to us this way: "Although I am not quite young and I haven't studied Soto, in short, his teaching is like this ...." This is one version.

Another version is cause and effect, or causality, is the source of various beings. Therefore everything has no self-nature and is empty. So everything comes from its proper cause, and Buddha told us how to destroy the cause of suffering. This version is very similar to the four noble truths and to Mahayana teaching, which is the teaching of emptiness. Shariputra understood Buddha's teaching in a more philosophical and profound way. So this rendering is something like the four noble truths, and at the same time something like the formal teaching of form is emptiness, emptiness is form. It should be like this. Hinayana and Mahayana should not be two different teachings. Some people think, "This is Hinayana teaching, and this is Mahayana teaching," but that is a great mistake. Anyway, he told Ajñata-Kaundinya and Ashvajit and the other three disciples this kind of teaching.

Q: Maybe this is a problem, maybe not, but if one of the causes of suffering is seeking permanence, not changing, and not accepting the changing world and our changing self, yet isn't there an element of this in the teaching of the way out also, in saying, "Look, here are the four noble truths, unchanging, true, permanent. This is the way it is, you must accept these"?

Suzuki-roshi: When you discover that kind of teaching which cannot be changed, which is always true, your desires will be at peace by finding something which is true, universal, and eternal. In this sense we say Buddha's teaching is eternal teaching. But it does not mean that something which was said is eternal in the sense that the way he understands things is always true. Buddha himself did not say, "What I said is always true." The other day, Claude [Dalenberg] said that Buddha said, "If you go to the mountain and find some good place to build a building, like Church Creek or the Horse Pasture, after you come back to your monastery, you will tell your teacher, 'Here is a good place to practice our way. Let's build a monastery there.' Then many people will go. That is my way. I didn't provide any land or holy place like that.

It was there, I just found it accidentally. People are very interested in that place, and that is why I have so many students." He understood in that way. He did not do anything; the teaching was there before he taught it or before he discovered it. That is his understanding of the teaching. So he didn't stick to his teaching or his being. If he died, he said, there is no need to have a big ceremony. That is why Buddha had eternal life. He didn't stick to anything, but he stuck to one eternal teaching which gave birth to Buddha. Buddha's disciples understood him in this way. That is why Buddhism has perpetual life. So what you mean is very true.

Q: Although the paths to this place are changing and are different, to use that metaphor, the place is unchanging.

Suzuki-roshi: The metaphor is that he is not the one who provided the place.

Q: But then there is still this element of satisfying our need or desire for something, some "thing," not a concrete material thing, but something.

Suzuki-roshi : Something, yes, that is our nature, which is not good or bad. You cannot even say it is good. If you say, "It is good," it is almost dying already because you may stick to it. If it is not good or bad, you may not stick to it. This is Buddhist understanding.

Q: After you spoke about the four noble truths, you said that there were four other kinds of suffering: when you are separated from someone you loved, and when you had to live with someone you didn't like. Where did those teachings come from?

Suzuki-roshi: From what sutra?

Q: Yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: These are stock words, you may say. The teaching is repeated in this form in various sutras.

Q: It says here, talking about the four noble truths, that, "When the creatures in this world delight in low and contemptible pleasure, then the Buddha who always speaks the truth indicates pain is the first truth, and desire is the origin of pain, and the third truth is the path, to always try, unattached, to suppress desire." Do you think that is a good teaching for us at this time, "always try, unattached, to suppress desires?"

Suzuki-roshi: That may not be possible. When they encourage us to control our desires, and to have a good understanding of our nature, or suffering, they put it in that way. We call it to "suppress" or "annihilate." When you are completely annihilated, that is empty, but that emptiness is not empty. Because everything is changing and has no self-nature, we call it "empty." Desires are here, but they are not dead, they are working. So as long as a desire has some past and future and is always acting, it doesn't exist in the same way. If you see things as it is, as it goes, the desires you have will not exist in the same way. Because you think, "What shall I do with my desire?"-that is desire which is not empty, which is not changing. But even though you pass before it like this, it is changing. So in one or two years, it will disappear. If you understand in that way, that is the true meaning of emptiness. Without getting rid of it, to have proper understanding of it is the way to attain emptiness. That is the teaching of emptiness. To completely cut out, or to annihilate, is a more substantial, or narrative, way of expressing emptiness, and a more objective, calm understanding is called "to see things as it is."

So if you read this sutra literally, you will not understand it properly. This sutra is told in various ways, back and forth; it's sometimes this way and sometimes the other way. That is why this sutra is valuable. It is not a simple sutra. So after all, this sutra could be very artistic or poetic. Some parts are not so, but it ends in a big, artistic work.

-----
Formatted 8/28/00 and 9/14/00.

[1] Ajñata-Kaundinya, Ashvajit (Assaji), Bhadrīka, Mahanama, and Vaspa.

4 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #13

Tuesday, October 01, 1968

Lotus Sutra Lecture, #13
Zen Mountain Center

... bodhisattvas and arhats. Subhuti, the Venerable Rahula." Rahula is, as you know, Buddha's son. "With them yet other great disciples, as Venerable Ananda, still under training, and two thousand other monks, some of whom still under training with the other masters; with six thousand nuns having at their head Mahapragapati-" Mahapragapati is Buddha's aunt. "-and the nun Yasodhara." Of course she is Buddha's wife, the mother of Rahula. Rahula is Yasodhara's son and Buddha's son.

"Along with them, along with her train; further, with eighty thousand Bodhisattvas, all unable to slide back, endowed with the spells of supreme, perfect enlightenment, firmly standing in the ... in wisdom; who moved onward the never deviating wheel of law; who had propitiated many hundred thousands of Buddhas; who under many many hundred thousands Buddhas had planted the roots of goodness, had been intimate with many hundred thousands of Buddhas, were in body and mind fully penetrated with the feeling of charity;" and so on.

Devadatta. Devadatta is, you know, famous because he tried to kill Buddha. There were also famous King Ajatasattu. His father was King Bimbisara. But his son, he, because he have for a long time no son, a prince; so he asked an old fortune teller-what do you say, "fortune teller"? Not fortune cookie, fortune teller, okay? Asked about his prince. He says, "Yes, you may have prince but he is now in the mountain but soon he may come."

So the king sent someone to kill him, you know, he was so eager to have prince if he is going ... his future life ... next life will ... is ... his prince, it maybe better to kill him. So that he can have his prince earlier. He sent someone to kill him. And he got beautiful boy. And he ... but ... again, the king asked his old fortune teller what will be his next life. And he said, "You killed him, you know, so, he maybe; he may kill you. Because you will him, he is very dangerous." So he wanted to kill him again, and he wanted to throw him from the high tower. But he couldn't kill him so he treated him very well so that he may not have any notion of killing him or he may not give him a chance to kill him. And so another name for him was Michorin. I don't know. A man who has in his mind bad feeling or, not revenge, but what you say ... "grudge?" Yeah. So, as the fortune, the old fortune teller said, when he became quite ... a good use ... he put his father in prison, and made him starve to death. And he took over his father's throne, and became a king.

And Devadatta, the Buddha's disciple, also wanted to take over Buddha's seat. Devadatta was also from the family of Shakyamuni Buddha's family. So he wanted to take over Buddha's seat. And Devadatta helped Bimbisara to kill his father, and ... not Bimbisara, Ajatasattu kill Bimbisara, and Bimbisara, after he became king, helped Devadatta to kill Shakyamuni Buddha. But he couldn't do so. Anyway, there is many stories, but he, Buddha get injured, his toe only, when Devadatta and his men throw a stone on the street when Buddha was passing the path. He is anyway famous for his, you know atrociously bad notion to kill Buddha. That is one of the worst violations of the precepts.

Ananda is Buddha's jisha-jisha for more, maybe 20 or more years. Twenty five. Some say twenty five, some say twenty. Anyway, for a long time. One day Buddha asked him-asked jisha, only one jisha without changing, because he was, became so old that he wanted to have someone always help him. And Ananda was-became a jisha at that time when he said, "I will take care of various people who come from remote countries to meet Buddha. I will introduce them without fail if they come from remote country. And I will remember all what Buddha say. If Buddha say something when I was not with him, I will ask him to tell it again."

Buddha was very pleased and he became his jisha. And there were some more things which he told him. "What I get from people is yours; and I will not take anything which was given to Buddha," or something like that. But the most impressive, most important point, maybe two points: he will remember what he said, and that he will be very good for the people who want to meet Buddha.

And Mahaprajñapati, Buddha's aunt and who after his mother passed away, raised Buddha. Mahaprajñapati and Yasodhara, Rahula's mother, along with her train. And this sutra is described as if Buddha himself told this story, but actually it is not so. And this, as I said before, this sutra is told in such a form as Buddha himself told it, but actually two, maybe two, three hundred after Buddha passed away, this scripture was told by someone, we don't know who. But the thought is based on Mahayana teaching. And Buddha who is telling this story is actually Sambhogakaya Buddha, not Nirmanakaya Buddha. But here it says they are still under training; "along with her train; further, with eighty thousand Bodhisattvas." Bodhisattva is Mahayana, who practice Buddhism with Mahayana spirit, to help others rather than to help themselves. "Bodhisattvas are unable to slide back." Unable to slide back means if you really understand something, you know, you cannot forget it. What you attain, in its true sense, you know, you cannot lose it. Real attainment cannot be lost. So we say, "no slide back." "All unable to slide back, endowed with the spells of supreme, perfect enlightenment." This is so called Dharani. Do you know mantra? Dharani. A kind of spell-holy word which has mystic power. Or it means essence of the teaching, essential, you know-essential teaching. Chinese translation of it is so gi. So means "good merit," and gi means "to observe precepts." It means, anyway, the essence: essential teaching.

"Endowed with the spells of supreme, perfect enlightenment," it is translated in this way. Spells, you know, some words which has some important, essential words. "Spells of supreme, perfect enlightenment, firmly standing in wisdom." Wisdom is not knowledge, but more intuitive knowledge, which is his own. Wisdom which is not learned, which should be, could be learned from others but which comes out from himself. "Who moved onward never deviating wheel of the law." Wheel of the law, this idea came from the wheel of the, when the battlefield king, you know, when king turn the wheel of _____? It doesn't ... which is very strong and which never be pushed back. It will go always on and on. Buddha's teaching like a wheel of the _____?, or wheel of the horse? So it never deviating wheel of the law; who had propitiated many hundred thousands of Buddhas." Propitiate ... propitiation ... this is a kind of technical term. In Japanese, ku yo. If you consult with dictionary, you will find out the meaning of it. There are three ways of ku yo. One is to give teaching, to offer teaching. Like to recite sutra. One. And to pay respect is the second one. And to offer some materials: food or flowers or incense. Those are the three ways of making propitiation. "Who have propitiated many hundred thousands of Buddhas have planted the roots of goodness." This is Chinese also ... we have technical term. Zenmon. Zenmon-"good root." Zen is "good." Mon is "root." "Who have planted the root of goodness. Had been intimate with many hundred thousands of Buddhas." This is also, you know, technical term.

"Were in body and mind fully penetrated with the feeling of charity." And this is, you know: body and mind, this is ... one is missing here. Body, mind. You know, we say ... when we say body and mind, we usually say body and mind and mouth, you know. Talk. This is also important. Body. Mind ... even though you think something is good, it will be a merit-if you say something, that will also give you merit. And actually by body ... in Japanese or Chinese this is also technical term. Three karmic actions. Good karma or bad karma. Bad karma or good karma will be created by mouth and mind. So here one is missing but in some other translation ... some other origin text, the "word" is also here. "Were in body and mind fully penetrated with the feeling of charity; able in communicating the wisdom of the Tathagatas." Tathagata. Tathagatas is synonymous with Buddha, but this is ... I don't know what. Tathagata is the third person. Buddha himself do not call Tathagata. Tathagata is, you know, the third person. Someone is Tathagata. Or second person ... you maybe Tathagata ... to myself. But anyway, Tathagata. Wisdom of Tathagata.

"Very wise, having reached the perfection of wisdom." This is also technical term, "perfection of wisdom." This is also technical term. "Perfection of wisdom." Anata samya sambhodai in Japanese. "Renowned in many hundred thousands of worlds; having saved many hundred thousand myriads of kotis of beings; such as the Bodhisattva Mahasattva." No we have many names again. This is the ... it means that, you know, Sambhogakaya Buddha, within himself, he includes many things, you know. As he is one with every being. So there should be various names. This is many, those are not enough, but anyway we have here many names such as Bodhisattva Mahasattva Mañjushri. Mañjushri and Avalokitesvara Bodhisattva are the most important Bodhisattvas. Those Bodhisattvas like Mañjushri appeared two, three thousand ... tow, three hundred years after Buddha passed away, like Mañjushri. " Mañjushri as a royal prince is: in scripture, he told various teaching for Buddha instead of Buddha. Or, he discussed the holy teaching with Buddha, you know. So he is like a prince for Buddha. So we say prince. Royal prince, Mañjushri. And there are many stories how he ... who was his father or mother, where he was born; but so many stories were told about him so we don't know which is right or which is wrong. You know. We don't know whether he is historical person or not. We don't know. But anyway, his character represents the Buddha, one of the Buddha's character. Wisdom. He is very much like Shariputra. And he is sitting on his right, Buddha's right. Here, Mañjushri is sitting. And the other side, Fugen Bosatsu is sitting. Mañjushri is the symbol of wisdom, and Fugen is the symbol of practice.

"The Bodhisattva Mahasattva Avalokiteshvara." This is the Bodhisattva of Mercy. There is a special chapter for him. [Tape is ruffled here, but S.R. goes on with sutra.] "Mahasthamaprapta." [He says this name in Japanese.] The Bodhisattva who is always making a great effort. And next one, Nityodyukta. "Nityodyukta." This is Bodhisattva who does not rest. Who make constant effort. "Anikshiptadhura." This is Bodhisattva who make ... treasure in his hands. "Ratnapani." This is seventh one. Oh, excuse me. Ratnapani is the Bodhisattva who always [has?] treasure in his hands. And this is seventh one. By the way, there is, according to the translation of the original text ... they translated, there is some difference in number and order too. Here we have maybe twenty two, twenty three. Should be twenty four. Next one is Pradanasura. Pranadasura is Bodhisattva of to give you courage. Bodhisattva who gives you, who give us courage, or faith, or strong way-seeking mind. And next one, tenth, is Ratchanandra. Ratchanandra means the moon. The round, beautiful moon, Bodhisattva. Ratchanandra Bodhisattva, who gives everything, who is giving always beautiful light. Anantavikramin. Anantavikramin who gives us endless, limitless power. And next one is missing in Chinese translation. Both old translation and new translation ... the original text look like different. But anyway this one is missing in Chinese translation. But his translation very similar to Chinese translation so it is ... for me it is easier. Fifteenth. The next one is Mahapratibhana. This is missing in Chinese translation. And I must find out ... I haven't found out what does it mean. Satanamasuri. [Sounds like "... is not in our translation."] He is also missing in Chinese translation. He is translated in other scripture-oh, in other scriptures translated as Bodhisattva who has virtue of flower, lotus. "Nakshatraga." Twenty five. This is also missing in Chinese translation. "Bodhisattva Mahasattva Maitreya." This is Miraku who appears after Buddha fade away. "The Bodhisattva Mahasattva Simha," it says. Bodhisattva Mahasattva Maitreya. And that ... for the first one, Bodhisattva Mahasattva Manjusri. And for the next one there is no [respect?]. But, the escaped, you know, to repeat same title over and over again, instead of giving same title for the first one and the last one. So some people say Bodhisattva Mahasattva Simha was added later. It may be so; I don't know. Simha means, anyway, "lion," so, but- Bodhisattva Mahasattva Maitreya looks like the last one. And Bodhisattva Mahasattva-it maybe same title again, here. I don't know. Anyway, this kind of study is very complicated study, still. But they are studying. They do not feel so good until they have some definite conclusion.

"With them were also the sixteen virtuous men to begin with Bhadrupala." Bhadrupala is the Bodhisattva who we bow, you know. Each time when we take a bath. We have sixteen ... fifteen of his friends all were enlightened in bathroom. I don't say enlightenment but in their previous lives they were good friends. And they took bath together. And this Bodhisattva-Badabara in Japanese-in Sanskrit, Bhadrupala-attained enlightenment in his former life. And under Shakyamuni Buddha they also appeared as good friend and studied under him, under Shakyamuni Buddha, and attained enlightenment.

There is in Blue Cliff Records, then is koan about him. When this Bodhisattva attained enlightenment he said: "Myo jyako zen myo." "Myo jyako zen myo" means: "myo" his mind and body became clear and felt so good. And he realized the water ... he realized that water as well as various beings, has no self-nature. The koan is "What does it mean by "myo jyako zen myo?" How he, this Bodhisattva attained enlightenment? This is the koan in the Blue Cliff Records.

Water has, you know, a boat. Reverend Katagiri's father-teacher or master. I think he is-must be a very good teacher because people in that village-when-I don't remember exactly what Reverend Katagiri said, but, anyway, at that temple, he get water by pipe-by bamboo pipe from a spring pretty far away from the temple, you know. Bamboo pipe. And for that they have a wooden pail. And they sent that pail to get mended. And when they get it back to the temple the pail was still leaking. Still-it was still leaking. And so Reverend Katagiri took it to the store or shop to make it perfect. And the old man who is working on it said, "Maybe water in the temple, in your temple, should be very different if that water-from the water we have in the village. [Roshi can't stop laughing, but nobody gets the joke so far.] I think if you see Reverend Katagiri-the way he does it is very special, you know. The way he hit mokugyo, the way he recites sutra. His manner is anyway very gentle and precise and gives us good feeling-special, I think, his teacher, in that way. So I think his father, his master should be like him, or must be like him. "So water you use is quite different, must be quite different, from the water we have in our village. That is why it leaks."

Anyway, I think that that kind of enlightenment he may have when he took bath. When Yasutani-roshi came and took his bath, he enjoyed completely the hot spring bath. And he wrote some poem about myo jyko zen myo-about this koan. You know, water penetrate, you know, everything with-with hole or without hole, it doesn't matter. Even through the stone-penetrate into even the hard stone.

Still, why water penetrates to everything is: it has not self-nature. You know. If you have self-nature you cannot penetrate into everything. That is, you know, the koan study about this Bodhisattva.

"Sixteen virtuous men." This is also technical term. Sixteen virtuous men we call, we have to several renderings. Kai shi juroku. When we say, juroku, sixteen men means sixteen men-fifteen friends of Bhadrápala. And here we have also many names which I don't know, of which I am not so familiar. But Bhadrápala is the Bodhisattva who is enshrined in our bathroom.

Thank you very much.

5 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #15

Tuesday, October 01, 1968

Lotus Sutra Lecture, #15
Zen Mountain Center

Page eight. "Then rose in the mind of the Bodhisattva Mahasattva Maitreya this thought: Oh, how great a wonder does the Tathagata display! What maybe the cause, what the reason of the Lord producing so great a wonder as this? And such astonishing, prodigious, inconceivable, powerful miracles now appear, although the Lord is absorbed in meditation! Why, let me inquire about this matter; who would be able here to explain it to me? He then thought: Here is Manjushri, the royal prince, who has plied his office under former Ginas and planted the roots of goodness, while worshipping many Buddhas."

Ginas is another ... one of the names for Buddha. And here ... "worshipping." Worshipping it is not just worship, this is ... it means, in Sanskrit, pradikara. It means alms-giving and offer of business [?] care. To prepare food for him; or to make a robe for him; or to mend his roof or room; and to take care of the people who may come; or to prepare medicine for him, or bed or [sounds like dress or breath]. Those are, you know, not just worshipping, but to take complete care of. So original meaning is some ... to take some authority. Not authority but to take care of him. Or to take care of business or service. And those words are important ones. Here, there is some ...

"Then rose in the mind of the Bodhisattva Mahasattva Maitreya this thought: Oh, how great a wonder does the Tathagata displays! What maybe the cause, what the reason of the Lord producing so great a wonder as this?"

You know here is sitting meditation. And those descriptions describe his self-rejoicing meditation. In his meditation ... his meditation has this kind of quality. Even though he is ... he may not be aware of it, he is absorbed in ... even though he is absorbed in deep meditation, his meditation has various quality as this. And Maitreya and some Buddhas who has six powers or five powers. When we attain arhatship we have six ... we are supposed to have six powers. Every morning we recite, we say Samyo-rokuso. Samyo-rokuso is arhat's various powers. The power of thinking and remembering the former state of existence. This is ... you may think rather mysterious but mysteriously speaking, it is [laughing] former being exists, former being. But moment after moment, we reincarnate from one state to the other. Sometimes you will be demon [laughing so much as to unable to speak clearly] exists with horn on your head. Sometimes you will be asura, in anger. Or sometimes you will be garuda, with big wings, you know, covering whole world. Beautiful golden wing. Sometimes we will be hungry ghosts. If I do not have not much ... not much food we will be hungry ghosts. We reincarnate one state to the other, always.

A man of, you know, powerful ... power of sitting will realize our nature through and through. Then it means thinking and remembering former state of existence, not former but actual state of existence, which transform one state to the other. And capable of seeing everything. Capable of seeing everything. And capable of hearing everything. And insight to the others. And to attain perfect enlightenment ... this is supposed to be Arhat. To attain arhatship. And the power of free activity. It is ... sometimes understood as supernatural ... or mostly maybe. Arhats, for Arhats this is supernatural activity. But for Mahayana Buddhists or Zen Buddhists as you must have studied by various koan or Shobogenzo, those are, you know, our usual ... these kinds of powers of free activity should be always within our life. If your friend wants water, you give him water. "Do you want this?" You know, that is that kind of free activity. That kind of more natural activities. If you have ... if your mind is rigid and stubborn, you cannot have this kind of freedom. You cannot see what is happening around you. Anyway, those are the powers.

And Maitreya see through ... had perfect in Buddha's mediation. "What maybe the cause, what the reason of the Lord producing so great a wonder as this? And such astonishing, prodigious, inconceivable, powerful miracles now appear, although the Lord is absorbed in meditation!" He could see it, but he couldn't figure out what it was . Why such a magnificent event happens.

"Why, let me inquire about this matter; who would be able here to explain it to me? He then thought: Here is Manjusri, the royal prince, who has plied his office under former Ginas and planted the roots of goodness ... Manjusri who has plied his office." This is a kind of, you know, not worship, but kind of, we say "kuyo." "To make office." To give him some office work. And under various, not only Shakyamuni Buddha but various Buddhas, Ginas, "... and planted the roots of goodness, while worshipping many Buddhas. This Manjusri, the royal prince, must have witnessed before such signs of the former Tathagatas." Such omens, you know; good omens of the Tathagatas. "Those Arhats, those perfectly enlightened Buddhas; must have enjoyed the grand conversations on the law. Therefore will I inquire about this matter with Manjusri, the royal prince." And in this, and in this place, important words maybe "the perfectly enlightened Buddhas," Samya sam Buddhas ... perfectly enlightened Buddhas. Those who attained under Samya sam Bodhi. Supreme enlightenment. And "Arhats," you know Arhats. Here it says "grand conversations on the Law." "On the Law," means on the first principle or on the teaching. And the "grand conversations." Grand ... not only just conversations, it means also, it means sermons, you know. Not, in its ... I don't know Sanskrit so well, but "conversations" in its widest sense, the original word means conversations. But it means sermons. Here it maybe better to say sermons. Grand sermons. He must have listened to or enjoyed the grand "sermons" on the Law.

Those are the important words. Perfectly enlightened one. Supremely enlightened one. Sambhodi. Samya sam bhodi.

Now, this Manjusri, the royal prince. Royal prince means, Buddha's, you know, maybe Buddha's successor. He passed away, not ... this is not Manjusri but Sariputra passed away before Buddha. And most likely this Manjusri Bodhisattva is characterized by Sariputra. "This Manjusri, the royal prince, must have witnessed before such signs of the former Tathagatas." You see, here, this sutra was told by, supposed to be told or written as if this sutra was told by Buddha himself but actually there is no doubt that this sutra was not told by him. But if we understand Buddha ... if we understand Buddha, not only as Nirmanakaya Buddha, or one Buddha based on the idea on the three bodies of Buddha, then, you know, this sutra again and again was taught by many Buddhas before. So Manjusri Bodhisattva must have been it when he attended so many Buddhas in his former life. Do you understand this kind of idea of describing the truth. Truth is truth because it exists forever whether Buddha tells about it or not. It exists. But someone must have seen or realized Buddha. So someone like Manjusri. I don't know why, exactly; who exactly; we don't know who, but someone must have, some unknown person before Buddha must have seen those things. Must have attended real Buddha. And Manjusri must be one of them. And he must have seen it before. And he must have, actually, you know, not only seen those six good omens, but also must have listened to, must have heard of those teachings which existed, which appeared before Buddha. And in this way, after those miraculous mysterious omens, Buddha will start his sermon called Lotus Sutra.

So Manjusri, you know, Bodhisattva Maitreya, inquired about this with Manjusri. And next paragraph is the last paragraph, page eight.

"And the four classes of the audience; monks, nuns, male and female lay devotees, numerous gods, nagas, goblins, gandharvas, demons, garudas, kinnaras, great serpents, men, and beings not human, on seeing the magnificence of this great miracle of the Lord, were struck with astonishment, amazement and curiosity, and thought: Let us inquire why this magnificent miracle has been produced by the great power of the Lord."

The four classes of the audience, namely: monks, nuns, and male and female lay devotees; numerous gods; numerous devas, you know, devas-various, they have various devas since of old. Nagas, dragons-like eight kinds of dragons. Goblins, as I said, goblins means yakshas. There will be evil natured ones and good nature ones. Anyway, they are various spirits. And Gandharvas. Demons. Demons is asuras. To fight like Asura, you know, with many hands. And mostly painted in his body. Whole his body, red. And his eyes is maybe blue. Mostly Buddha ... Indian gods and Buddhas are blue-eyed. So in all his hands he has arms ... bows and arrows and many arms. And, not arms but he has many arms. He is mostly naked. Asuras. And Gandharvas are a group of deities since of old. Since the time of the Rig Veda, maybe one thousand years or more before the Lord Buddha. And gandaras is big, big winged bird which is Nagas. Nagas, dragons. Kinnaras as you know, whether he is a man or animal is Kinnara. Man or animal. Great serpents. This is Mangora. Mahora. We say Mangora, but Mahora ... great serpent. This is mystified ... mythological being, of serpent. Men include, to our great astonishment include, hell and celestial beings. Men includes the six states of ... all the beings which exist in six states of world. We will be incarnated in those states. Men includes the six worlds, heaven, and mankind, and Asura. Asura is, you know, Asura here we name Asura, but Asura is included in the men. And some demons too. We will be sometimes demons, like Asura. And animals. Animals is not men you say, but so far as we are, we will be incarnated into men, we count them as men. And those Hungry Ghosts and those who live in hell, too. But this is one interpretation of the six worlds. But there are many interpretations for, about, what is men, and what is not human. But I think it maybe proper to understand men as human being, includes this kind of six states. Which is supposed to be our various states of human existence.

"Men, and beings not human, on seeing the magnificence of this great miracle of the Lord, were struck with astonishment, amazement and curiosity, and thought." This is, you know, why we repeat those words, "were struck with astonishment, amazement and curiosity." This is, you know, gives you some rhythm and make you remember better. And this is the purpose of repeating various synonymous words, one after another. As you will find in the part of verse or poem about this description. In Sanskrit there are, you know, their literature is very rhythmical and a half of it maybe poem style. This sutra also, by the way, has two parts: the gatha parts and what you call ordinary description. Prose. Prose parts and gatha parts. And gatha parts and prose parts do not accord with--there is some difference. And which is first and which was prose part was first, is older or gatha parts is older. No one knows maybe. Maybe they are studying very hard which is older, or they are written at the same time. But it doesn't--they say it does not look like written in the same person at the same time. Because sometimes the content is no the same.

"At the same time," page nine, the second paragraph. "At the same moment, at that very instant, the Bodhisattva Mahasattva Maitreya knew in his mind the thoughts arising in the minds of the four classes of hearers and he spoke to Manjushri, the royal prince: "What. Oh Manjushri, is the cause, what is the reason of this wonderful, prodigious, miraculous shine having being produced by the Lord? Look, how these eighteen thousand Buddha-fields appear variegated, extremely beautiful, directed by Tathagatas and superintended by Tathagatas."

Here I must point out some points. Here it says, "... the Bodhisattva Mahasattva Maitreya knew in his mind the thoughts arising in the minds of the four classes of hearers and he spoke to Manjusri." Here, he knew, but this is also one of the six powers of Arhat or maybe Bodhisattva. And in some version, those names are repeated twice, you know. Those names like "four classes of hearers, and hearers." Not only "four classes of hearers," but also the names of goblins, gods and devas and Nagas and Yakshas ... those various spiritual beings, names of eight spiritual beings again are repeated here. But in this translation, or in the original text, maybe, there is no ... those names are not repeated here. And here again, the third line or second ... third and second from the end of this paragraph:

"Look, how these eighteen thousand Buddha-fields appear variegated and variegated, beautiful ...." One more word is here, was here, but translator skipped one word here. And the translator translated this sutra from, of course, from Sanskrit, it says here. Original text was the text written on, I don't know where, but old text which is in some museum, you know, in London. So in ... that ... there must be the word "beautiful" here. Why we ... they repeat same word like this, as I said, to give some rhythm to the sentence. But in English it maybe not be so good to repeat so many times. "Variegated, beautiful, extremely beautiful" ... same thing ... same thing happen already six, the earth, whole earth shake in six ways.

Six ways: this way, stronger, this way and more stronger, this way. And this way, trembling, it maybe this way. Don't you think? This way "shake" maybe. This way is to tremble or toss. Toss and toss more harder. [Laughing.] This is a repetition of same thing. And here it again ... appeared again--translator skipped. "Beautiful and extremely beautiful, directed by Tathagatas and superintended by Tathagatas. This is also repetition. "Directed by Tathagatas" maybe enough, you know.

This is the end of the prose part of the first introduction chapter. Do you have some question? About those names, you know; hopefully, Louise will, you know, make you some copy of those names. Not all of them but important ones.

Student A: In the book we hear again and again about different spiritual beings such as devas, nagas, goblins, gandharvas, demons, garudas, kinnaras, and great serpents. And in Milaropa almost half of the book is talks about the subjugation and conversion of these different kinds of beings. And I really don't have any idea of what, you know, they are talking about. If they are talking about something that has, an actual existence which we are able to perceive at a certain point. Or whether these are some type of ... something within our consciousness? Or what it means when it says later on in the sutra that the earth opens up and out of the cracks in the earth come all of these different types of beings. It is very difficult for me to imagine what they are.

Suzuki-roshi: Well. You are still turned by sutra, maybe. This is our way of understanding. The difference between people stick to the sutra and people understand the meaning of the sutra. And for the people who understand the meaning of the sutra, this description is not good enough, even. Must be more fancy. Should be endlessly fancy! One group or two group is not good enough. We understand in that way. Whatever you say, whatever you think, it is already understood by us. Before we understand it. Before we know it, we know it. If you say something, "Yeah. It may be so." [Laughter] It ... some miracles... "Don't you know something? Don't ... could you tell me something more miracles?" [Laughing.] Maybe. We understand in that way. That is rather ... Dogen Zenji's way. He did not say ... he did not ridicule those sutras. He is very serious. Maybe he respected this sutra best. Most. But it is very serious matter. That point is very serious matter.

Student: Roshi, why does the sutra say-describe the horrible things that will happen to you if you don't listen to the sutra and you know, it talks about how your body will be covered with thorns and all kinds of horrible things? It sounded to me like hellfire and brimstone Christianity when we are condemned to eternal hell. Is that what it is supposed to be or does it have some other meaning?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe. [Everyone laughing.] We say, result is-will result immediately, not later punishment. To do something is already punishment. That you do something is already punishment. Not later. Do you understand? [No, says student.] Good! [Laughter.]

Student: Why does the sutra say so many awful things about women? About why if you are lucky you will be born a man? [Everyone laughing.]

Suzuki-roshi: Why do you think? There are some great difference between nature of man and woman. If you take it ... it is up to the viewpoint, not ... there is no need to stick to the criticism or evaluation, but ... there is some truth, you know. Not in term of it is good or bad. But sometimes, when we talk about buddha-mind. We say ... kind mind ... we say ... "old lady's mind." We do not say "old man's mind." When we say Buddha mind is parent's mind, but we say parent's but ... "father" and "mother" we say, but "father" is suffix. It means actually "mother." So in this sense, when you acquire ....

But quality you have is, maybe deeper, and wider, and heavier. Heavy material. So sometimes it maybe difficult to sew, because material is so thick. But after you make your wear, your wearing, it is very warm and strong. So before you make it, it maybe criticized. But after you have made it, we will appreciate the quality. But when we are involved in the practice to attain something; in other words, to make wearing, you know, we tend to be critical with the thickness of the material. But like Mahayana teaching, when we put more emphasis on our practice as a man ... as a being who has Buddha nature; we put emphasis more on the equality of the material. So that is why Mahayana Buddhism ... when we talk about mercy or buddha mercy, we refer to mercy of parents, especially mother's mind. Some more time? One more question.

Student: I have two questions. First of all from what you just said about repetition ... then this sutra was probably memorized in its originality. And that accounts for part of the form of it--repetitious, rhythmic form. Is that true?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. It is said so. That to memorize sometime when memorize it is convenient to put it in some form so we can recite it easily. We can ... the sentence comes one after another. And sometimes they memorized by number: Number one, number two, number three; or various simple statements.

Student: My second question is from yesterday's or day before yesterday's lecture. It seemed to me that there is a connection between Buddha fields and Sambhogakaya Buddha.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Buddha fields ... Buddha fields, yeah. Yeah. Sambhogakaya Buddha include all the Buddha field.

Student: Is more than that ...

Suzuki-roshi: More than one Buddha field ...

Student: No but more than all Buddha fields. Can we think of ... well, can I think in this way? If I think of reincarnation past and future of all beings. Some. There must be some connecting something. This is what we were talking about last time ... between ... that makes it reincarnation, my past lives, my future life. The fact that I can say "my" means that there must be some connection between the past, present, and the future. It is not a physical thing but there is some connection. No if I take the past back infinitely, if I can just say that ... and the future forward infinitely, then I have a Buddha field. If you apply this to everyone then you have some vast number of Buddha fields. And then we have the body of Sambhogakaya Buddha.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Buddha fields. There are many Buddha fields, you know. We say. But many Buddha fields maybe actually one Buddha field.

-----

Formatted 8/28/00.

6 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #10

Tuesday, October 01, 1968

Lotus Sutra Lecture, #10
Zen Mountain Center

As Zen Buddhists, it is necessary for us to understand the second patriarch Mahakashyapa. He is famous for his zudagyo, or in Sanskrit, dvadasa dhutagunah. We count twelve zudagyo [juni-zuda = twelve zuda; gyo = practice], which are mostly important ways of organizing one's life as a person and as a member of the sangha.

The first zudagyo is to live in a calm place, such as the forest or woods, aranyaka ["forest dweller"]. In India, everyone, after finishing their household or family life, would join the religious life with other people. So to enter the aranya or forest means to start the religious life, not only for priests, but for everyone. That was the Indian custom. Here, to live in aranya means to live like religious people do.

The second zudagyo is to support one's life by begging, yathasam-strarika ["taking any seat which may be offered"]. This is mostly about food, and there are two more about food.

One is that when you beg, you have to visit houses in order [3rd: paidapatika = "living on alms"]. We should not choose houses. You should not choose someone you know or someone who is wealthy. Whether they are poor or wealthy or you don't know them, you should not change the order. This is the next one.

The fourth one is aikasanika ["using only one seat for meditation and eating"], which means to eat at certain times, not to eat many times. They did not eat supper, just breakfast and lunch.

And you should know how much you should eat, you shouldn't eat too much. That is the fifth one, namatika ["wearing coarse garments"]. This is also important. We should not be greedy.

The next one [6th] is also about food [khalu-pascadbhaktika = "not eating after the time when one should cease eating"]. We should not eat or drink except at mealtime. To have tea is our rule; that may be alright. This is a very difficult excuse. Anyway, we should not be greedy, especially when we eat.

The seventh one is about the clothes we wear [pamsukulika = "wearing clothes made of rags taken from a dust heap"]. We should wear Buddha's robe, which is made from the material people throw away. I think not only clothes, but also furniture and everything should be like this. In America, if you go to a second hand store, you can buy something which you want quite cheaply. So I thought there's no need for us to buy brand new furniture, paying a lot of money, if you can get it for two or three dollars.

This is, I think, a kind of attitude we take for our living.

And [8th: traicivarika] we should wear only three robes. When we have ordination ceremony, we receive three robes: rakusu, which is made of five pieces, and okesa, which is made of seven pieces, and the third one, which is made of nine pieces. There may be many reasons why they named three kinds. In some scripture it says they wear the simplest kind when it is warm or hot. When it is cold they wear the robe made of nine pieces of material, and in the spring or fall, they wear the robe made of five pieces.

Nowadays we have robes for everyday practice and robes for ceremonies. I think that we should not use as gorgeous robes as we do now, never wore such gorgeous robes. When I gave a funeral service for the first time for a very rich old person, I just wore a black robe with a brown okesa. They were very angry with me. At the time they didn't say anything, but later they said, "Why didn't you wear a more beautiful one like your master had?" They knew what my master wore, so they asked why I didn't wear it that time. But now I think we should not be attached to the material or the outlook of the robes. A gorgeous one is alright, a shabby one is alright. Now that is my attitude, but at that time I was very concerned about what I wore.

Perhaps no one likes to wear robes that are too gorgeous, like an actor or actress on the stage. In Japan we have _____ [sounds like "agratory"] actresses. In the winter, when they don't have much to do, or during their lunch, they would come out to the city with some gorgeous clothes, hitting drums and bells, and entertaining people with music or a play. So I thought, "We shouldn't be like that. We are not _____ [this time sounds like "andratory"] actors." But, I think, this kind of attitude is very important, and we should not forget this point.

So far, all of the zudagyo have been about food and clothing, except the first one, which is about where we should live. And the next three are also about where we should live. We should live someplace where it is appropriate to practice zazen.

One [9th = smasanika] is to live near a cemetery. How about it? An American cemetery is very beautiful, but a Japanese cemetery is not so beautiful. It is supposed to be a very gloomy, monotonous place. A place where there is a shrine or temple or cemetery is supposed to be a very lonely, monotonous place. They live near a cemetery because they will feel more deeply the evanescence of life, and maybe they can eliminate various desires.

The next one [10th: vrksamulika] is to live under a big tree. Maybe this is because it is cool, especially in India.

But at the same time, we should not be attached to the coolness of the place. So the next one [11th: abhyavakasika = "living in the open air"] is to live where there are no trees, where everyone can see you, like a common place or square, where nothing will protect you. This is a pretty strict practice.

And the last one [12th: naisadika = "using the sitting posture for sleeping"] is not to sleep in bed, to always sleep in a sitting position. Those are the twelve zudagyo.

You will have various questions, and there are many things to think about in this area. If you see those rules just as rules, in a rigid way, that will not give you right understanding. But if you think about the underlying thought, there are many things to think about.

This is, actually, how to protect people, how to maintain our order, and how to maintain our system of society. If our human life is supported with this kind of spirit, a perfect, peaceful world will be acquired by human beings. It may look rigid and strict, but the underlying thought is very warm and full of mercy. Practicing in those ways, they try to make people happy. Just to have a bare and simple life and to have joy in our life will give a limitless source of spirit to the people. Only when we practice our way, when we live in this way and maintain our order and maintain our joy of life will people be able to know it is possible to have complete joy in various kinds of life. Even in adversity, they may feel, it is possible to have complete composure, and they will have a strong spirit or strong faith in our human life.

[Text missing here?-WKR]

Buddha's nirvana day. At various temples they hang a picture of Buddha lying down on a bed surrounded by many disciples who are very sad. Even various animals and birds came to see how he was. And when they saw that he was critically ill, they all cried. But we cannot find a cat in the picture.

No one explained why there is no cat, but I thought, "Where is the cat?" When I asked them, they said, "I don't know why the cat didn't come."

When I was sixteen or seventeen years old, I found some words expressing a superficial good manner. At that time I didn't like the monk's way or priest's way. They always went like this [presumably making some gesture], and it seemed to me they didn't mean it, they just did it superficially without any feeling. And that kind of way is called a "cat-like manner." Cats look very lovely, and their manner is very gentle, but it is not so deep. There is no strong feeling in it. If we say, "Go away," they will go away. [I'm not sure about my interpretation of this. What he actually said was, "There is no strong feeling in it, they're just [laughs] go-we say go away, they will go away."] If they think it is all right, they may easily approach you. When we are busy or are observing something else, a cat may come. They are supposed to be very sneaky in some way. In some literature, someone called that "cat-like manner". So I thought that is why the cat did not come to Buddha's last hour.

Why did I start to talk about this? To just do this [making some gesture] is not a true expression of respect. To live a humble, bare, and simple life is already an expression of respect. It is the best way to express respect to ourselves and others. Even though we lead a bare life, inside, spiritually, we are rich. Even living the simplest way, we have the possibility of giving good feeling to others.

So I am not concerned about the beatnik style or hippie-like style, but only when they can express respect to others even in those costumes. There is a possibility to express respect to others in the simplest way, even though they may wear rags. But this point is missing in hippie-like living. Of course, I think they have that kind of costume to express some resistance to the old cat-like manner. I can understand their feeling. But instead of being antagonistic or feeling resistance to the cat-like manner, they should express some respect to the truth or to the real religious life. The essential element of religious life is respect. And respect could be expressed in various ways.

Exposing various parts of the body may be an expression of resistance to the cat-like manner. But in that manner, something is missing. Buddhists emphasize being ashamed of our bare, natural, primitive, naive, undefined manner. So to respect Buddha means to be ashamed of not being what we should be when we see how perfect Buddha was or when we see someone who has a very respectable character. Naturally, we become ashamed of our want of practice, want of attainment or acquisition. So to become ashamed of ourselves means to respect Buddha. When we have no idea of religion or Buddha or perfect character, we are not ashamed of anything. So we may enter the Buddha Hall with dirty sandals. When we know who Buddha is, we cannot do that, we will be ashamed of our dirty feet. Naturally, when you want to enter a practice hall or Buddha Hall, you will clean up your clothing and body. That may not be enough, but at least that much we can do. That is an expression of respect.

This kind of attitude maintains our order and supports a warm feeling for our sangha and society. Right now what we have is a cat-like culture and antagonism towards the cat. "Cat, go away. I don't like you at all. Go away." It is so noisy, you know. "Go away, go away, go away," so society. If you go to San Francisco, young people express their antagonism towards the cats. They hit drums and dance with long hair, and, "Go away! Go away, cats!" That is a kind of good feeling, you know. If there are one or two cats, we will feel sorry for them, but nowadays there are too many cats. Even though you use electric sound, they don't go away. The sound is not strong enough, but they have to make as strong a sound as possible. "Go away! Go away! Go away!" I can understand that, but that is too noisy.

So there must be some way to maintain our order, to have some warm feeling in our society. That is why this practice of the twelve zudagyo, in Japanese, or dvadasa dhutagunah in Sanskrit, could maintain our order.

When we really make this kind of effort, we will have complete freedom in our society. We should make our effort towards this point.

So instead of being enslaved by antagonism, we should make our effort in right order, with right spirit. This kind of spirit should be established in some place like Tassajara. Someone must do that, or else we have no place to live. And this is why we practice zazen, and in explanation of those twelve zudagyo or zuda practices.

There are many words for zazen, Zen or sitting: eight characters. Two tenths of the characters are sitting. You may understand how the practice of just sitting is so important. We say zazen practice, simple as it is, its meaning is very deep, and spiritual zazen will support, will maintain our order.

Mahakashyapa is famous for his zudagyo, his kind of twelve practices. But he is not famous for his understanding of shunyata or emptiness. Subhuti is the one who is famous for his understanding of emptiness, and Shariputra is the most famous one. Nevertheless, Mahakashyapa is supposed to be a successor to Buddha himself. He devoted himself to Buddha's practice, not only zazen practice, but also the zazen practice which includes everyday life, and to spiritually maintaining the order of our life as a sangha and as human beings. And he became a successor to Buddha. This point should be remembered, I think. We say, "Zen and everyday life," but it does not mean to extend zazen practice to everyday life, but that to have deep understanding of the teaching, of Buddha's spirit, we practice zazen. That is the true way. Actually, there is no Zen or everyday life; Zen or everyday life is the expression of the true spirit of Buddha, the true spirit to help others or to maintain our order or to support this society, this human world. I think this is the reason why Mahakashyapa became the successor of Buddha.

[Transcription checked and edited by Brian Fikes.

All definitions in brackets are from the Japanese Buddhist Dictionary.]

-----

Formatted 8/28/00.

7 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #3

Tuesday, October 01, 1968

Lotus Sutra Lecture, #3
Zen Mountain Center

I already explained the nature of the Nirmanakaya Buddha and Sambhoga kaya Buddha. The Nirmanakaya Buddha comes into this world with the vow that he will save all sentient beings. Not by karma, but by vow, he appears in this world, practices the Bodhisattva's way, attains enlightenment as Buddha did, and saves all human beings. So he is called an incarnated body. He changes his form in various ways, sometimes to a bodhisattva, sometimes to a buddha. He takes on various forms to help people, so in the widest sense of the word, everything is Nirmanakaya Buddha. But in the narrow sense, those who appear in this world by vow instead of by karma are called Nirmanakaya Buddhas. The Sambhoga kaya Buddha is the original source of the Nirmanakaya Buddha: it gives birth to the Nirmanakaya Buddha. In order to explain the Dharma kaya Buddha, it is necessary to explain the Sambhoga kaya Buddha more. Then you will understand what the Dharma kaya Buddha is naturally.

The Dharma kaya Buddha is called the fundamental, undeveloped Buddhakaya. In Buddhism, when we say the undeveloped, or fundamental, body, it means that it is the original source itself. But there are two interpretations for one reality. When we understand it as something which is very calm, which is not in activity, we call it the Dharma Body. But the Dharma Body does not actually remain calm and inactive-it is always active. When we understand it as activity, we call it Dharma Nature. "Dharma Nature" means something in action, and "Dharma Body" means something which is not in activity, or which is not developed. But the whole Nature exists in the Dharma Body as a potentiality. So we have two understandings of one reality: Dharma kaya [kaya=body] and dharma nature.

The Sambhoga kaya Buddha is the Buddha who realized this dharma nature in activity, or as something which has a nature. And when we understand the reality which has various potentialities to act or to develop, that is called Dharma kaya Buddha.

Figuratively speaking, the Sambhogakaya Buddha may be like the sun. Instead of observing things objectively, he understands his Buddha Nature, which is always in activity within himself, figuratively speaking of course. So, like the sun, although he is not trying to illuminate everything objectively, he is actually illuminating every thing. He is actually helping others without trying to help. He can illuminate everything because originally he has that kind of power or potentiality. But the most important thing for the Sambhoga kaya Buddha is to attain enlightenment inwardly, or to illuminate himself, instead of illuminating the objective world. Instead of observing each thing respectively, one by one, he observes his nature within himself. When he observes his inside world, as the sun does, he finds himself as earth. That earth nature is universal. This earth is also earth, and the sun is also earth. Everything is earth, so there is no difference between the objective world and the subjective world. To be enlightened in his inward nature is to be enlightened outside in the objective world. So for him the whole world is his inside or subjective world. When he reaches this kind of world, we call him Sambhoga kaya Buddha.

His world is limitless. It includes the sun and stars and everything. So his virtue and wisdom are also limitless. He is the Omniscient One, who knows every thing as being within himself. For him there is nothing outside his being. That is the Sambhoga kaya Buddha. When we understand reality in this way, our understanding includes everything. And the reality which includes everything as an undeveloped reality is the Dharma kaya Buddha itself, Dharma itself, Being itself.

Our way of understanding things is exactly the same as our zazen. We say, "Just sit!" What does this mean? When we say, "Just sit," it includes all the potential activity which we have. We remain in an inactive state, but we have potentiality. So in this sense, our practice includes everything. When we sit, we are just sitting. Each one of us is sitting, and each one of us is Dharma kaya Buddha. But within ourselves, even though we are sitting, we take breaths and our heart is beating, so we are also Sambhoga kaya Buddha. We understand reality in this way.

So the Sambhoga kaya Buddha or the Dharma kaya Buddha is the source of all bud dhas, which exists before Buddha. In this sense, Buddha is eternal, perpetual being. So we call it tathata in Sanskrit ["suchness," "thusness"], or shinnyo in Japanese. And the Lotus Sutra is the sutra which describes this kind of reality, the world of tathata. That is why it is told on a big, cosmic scale. We say in Japanese jisso, the way everything exists in the realm of reality or the realm of tathata. In this sutra, everything presumes this world of tathata. Of course, it is described in a very dramatic way, but what it means to show is how things exist in this world, in this dharma world or world of tathata. The purpose of this sutra is to give a dramatic version of tathata This is an important point.

This sutra was told by the Sambhoga kaya Buddha, with his wisdom, to save all sentient beings. It verbally tells us what dharma nature is, not with a substantial idea, but rather in a dramatic, figurative way.

And this sutra especially puts emphasis on dharma nature instead of on the dharma body, because the dharma body is inexplicable. You cannot talk about the dharma body because it is something beyond our world, beyond our wisdom, beyond our understanding. That is why we say the dharma body does not talk. My mouth talks, but my body doesn't talk. When we say "body," it is a source of activity, but not activity itself. But without the source, there is no activity. So when there is activity, there should be a source. But the source does not always have any activity. You can have the idea of source or body without activity.

There is something which is not in activity. That is the Body. But actually, there is no such thing. Whatever it is, it has some activity. Even a stone has some activity. So there is no such thing. We cannot talk about the Body itself, so what shall I do? If I talk about something, that is already the dharma nature, how dharma goes, what it is like. When I say what it is like, that is the Nirmanakaya Buddha. Objectively speaking, that is form. More subjectively speaking, it is its nature. But what the source of that Nature is, no one knows. We know it, but we cannot say anything about it. If you say something, it is not the Body, it is the Nature, or it is an attribute of the Body. So we do not talk about what the Dharma Body is, but we understand that there must be some source.

That is the dharma body, the dharma nature, and the dharma attribute, or form and color. That is [reversing the order] the outlook of dharma, nature of dharma, and dharma itself. And the Nirmanakaya Buddha, the Sambhoga kaya Buddha, and the Dharmakaya Buddha. Did you understand? The Nirmanakaya Buddha is the form of dharma, the Sambhoga kaya Buddha is the nature of dharma, and the Dharma kaya Buddha is the dharma body, which is beyond words, which we cannot describe. So this sutra tells what the Dharma Nature is, and when we listen to it, we will understand what the Dharma kaya Buddha is and who the Nirmanakaya Buddha Shakyamuni was.

I say there is no way to talk about the Dharma Body, but if you will allow me to say something about it, we can call it "Truth Itself." Truth is something which you cannot see. You can see the apple, but you cannot see the theory of gravity. But there is some theory, some truth. So nothing happens just by accident. When something happens, there should be some reason. It is caused by Dharma. In this sense, truth is close to the Dharma Nature. But we can understand it in some way, we can figure out some rules. In Buddhism, those rules, or that truth, is sometimes called the Dharma itself. That is the way in which we call it the Dharma Body. It is the source of all truth.

When we say "nature" it is, of course, truth. But nature is something which includes what we see. In its strict sense, truth is not something which we can see. Buddhists figure it out in this way: because many people ask us, "What is Dharma Body?" we must say something about it, so we try to figure out what we should say. In this case, we give a very difficult explanation. If I don't say anything, you may say, "He doesn't know anything about the Dharma Body. He is not such a good teacher." So I must make a narrow escape. The way to do it is to talk about some truth. Nature and truth are not exactly the same. Truth is nearer to the Dharma Body. The idea is also pretty close to the Dharma Nature, but it exists just in between the Dharma Nature and the Dharma Body.

So sometimes "Dharma" means "teaching," sometimes "reality," and sometimes "being," just "something," just "there." Ri means "truth," and ji means "event" or "being", something which exists, like a stone or like water. Ri means, not "water nature," but how it becomes water from air. [There is some theory of how air becomes water.] So another side of water is truth, and that truth is not something which we can see. You can see the nature of water: it flows from a higher place to a lower place.

The Japanese term for truth is ri, and the Japanese term for various beings is ji. Ji and ri are very important, key technical words in Buddhism. When we realize ri in its true sense, we are Sambhogakaya Buddha. When we observe things as we observe the objective world, and when we want to help people involved in the objective or materialistic world, we are Nirmanakaya Buddha. The way to help others as Nirmanakaya Buddha is to take various forms and give them some handy [appropriate] help. But as the Sambhoga kaya Buddha we should realize that there is no "I" or "you"-it is all one being. When we realize this nature, which is universal, we can help others without trying to help them, because whatever we do, that is our activity.

You are a part of me, you know. When we reach this kind of understanding, when we become Sambhoga kaya Buddha, then when you practice zazen you have no "you" and no "others"; your practice includes everything. So everything will take place within yourself. There is no objective world anymore. Without trying to help others, you will help them anyway. That is the Sambhoga kaya Buddha.

But when we realize that our practice includes everything, why don't we include the Nirmanakaya Buddha? Shakyamuni Buddha is included in our practice. So all the Shakyamuni buddhas, and all the Nirmanakaya buddhas which were spoken of by Shakyamuni Buddha will attain enlightenment all at once when we practice zazen. Do you understand? The Nirmanakaya Buddha is within ourselves.

Before we reach this kind of understanding, the Nirmanakaya Buddha is just a hero. He has no eternal life. He is one of the great heroes of our history. But when we understand Shakyamuni Buddha as the Sambhoga kaya Buddha or the Dharma kaya Buddha, for the first time, he has perpetual life. This is a more traditional understanding of Buddha. And actually, this kind of understanding was supported by Buddha when he was alive, although it took several hundred years before we understood who Shakyamuni Buddha was in reality. This kind of understanding, which was accomplished by his disciples, gave Buddha new life, made him a perpetual buddha. In this sense, he is called the Tathagata.

This is a history of the development of the understanding of Buddha, and at the same time, the true understanding of his teaching. He did not stick to the words he said. He was like a doctor who gives his patients prescriptions. According to the people, he gave various prescriptions. He didn't have any idea of giving the same prescription to various patients. What he said was for him like a paper. [Suzuki-roshi makes motions of writing various prescriptions out on paper, saying, "Hai, hai, hai," as he gives them out.] That is actually what he did and how he understood that he should help people. But the reason he was Buddha is that he was the Enlightened One. He was illuminated in his own nature, Dharma Nature, and everyone's nature, so he knew who he was. For him there was no disciple and no objective world. So he said all sentient beings are his sons, are part of him. That was Buddha. So only when we understand Buddha as the Sambhoga kaya Buddha or the Dharma kaya Buddha does he become real.

Since we have arrived at this kind of understanding, there is no need to talk about what Theravada or Mahayana Buddhism is. All Buddhism, whether it is Theravada or Mahayana is one whole Buddhism. This is how we have transmitted his teaching from Buddha to us. And the purpose of this sutra is to describe our Dharma Nature.

Student A: I have two questions. We read about certain masters who, upon attaining complete enlightenment, are able to direct their future rebirths, in other words, to return to help all sentient beings, coming back through a vow rather than through karma. Would a master, say in this century, who could do that, be a Nirmanakaya buddha?

Suzuki-roshi: Do you mean someone who actually knows his former and future lives? Since I don't know my former and future lives, I cannot say for sure that he is or is not. If I really knew, then I could say yes. When my self doesn't know, how is it possible to say, "Yes, he is"? But according to our more traditional teaching, I think I can say he is a real master.

Q: Then I'm confused about the meaning of the word "buddha," because we talk about the last buddha being Shakyamuni and the next being Maitreya. Do we understand that the understanding of Bodhidharma or the Sixth Patriarch or Dogen-zenji allowed them to become buddhas? Can we say that those people attained complete perfect enlightenment?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Q: Then why don't we call them buddhas also?

Suzuki-roshi: Dogen-zenji Buddha. We say "buddha" or "zenji" or "busso." So means patriarch. The way we name them is different, but what we mean by "buddha" and "patriarch" is the same. When we point them out, one by one, as successive teachers, then we call them Patriarchs-first, second, third, etc. But they are all buddhas. So they are not different, but what we call them is different.

Q: Then what is the meaning of Maitreya, the coming buddha?

Suzuki-roshi: Maitreya Buddha is the buddha who will come. There must be a future buddha too. We call him by the name of Maitreya. Buddha attained enlightenment and saw his Dharma Nature, so he became the Nirmanakaya Buddha. And he also knew the source of his buddhahood. He recognized himself as the seventh patriarch or seventh buddha. Before Buddha there were seven buddhas. But seven doesn't mean just seven, but many. He didn't say, "I am the first one." He acknowledged many buddhas before him. He is one of the many buddhas, and he is Maitreya Buddha also.

-----

(Transcription checked and edited by Brian Fikes)

Formatted 8/28/00.

8 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #4

Tuesday, October 01, 1968

Lotus Sutra Lecture, #4
Zen Mountain Center

The point of my previous lecture was that since it may be difficult for you to understand the Lotus Sutra, I wanted to clarify who is supposed to have told it. The sutras usually look like they were spoken by the historical Buddha himself. But our Buddhist sutras were not actually spoken by him. So when you read a sutra, if you think it was spoken by Buddha himself, you will be confused, because there are actually many elements in it which did not exist in Buddha's time. Afterwards, when the sutra was compiled, it was interspersed with various thoughts that existed then. Buddhist thought itself developed from the understanding of the direct disciples of Buddha to that of Buddhists several generations afterward. So you will be very confused when you read the sutra as if it was spoken by the historical Buddha.

Actually, the sutra was told by so-called Mahayana Buddhists several hundred years after Buddha passed away. Buddhism had developed from the sravaka to the Mahayana understanding. If I say Buddhism developed in this way, then you may think it developed or changed. But in reality, it did not change or develop, but tried to resume the original understanding of Buddhism. In this way, for many thousands of years, Buddhists have been trying to restore Buddha's teaching. It looks as if this effort changed Buddhism from the original way to some different teaching, but that is not so. Do you understand what I am saying? It is rather difficult, with my language problem, to explain this part. This sutra was told by someone who was a Mahayana Buddhist. It looks like the historical Buddha, over here, spoke this sutra, but actually someone who was over here told it. And Buddhism itself developed from here to here. So you may say what is taught in this sutra is not Buddha's teaching, but a teaching which developed from Buddha's teaching. So if you are attached to Buddha's original teaching, you may be disappointed, you see?

But what I want to say is that there is no need for you to be disappointed, because what Buddhists have been trying to do was to find out what was fundamental Buddhism. So they thought, this is not fundamental Buddhism, and this is not, until finally they thought this is Buddha's original purpose in teaching. When they reached this kind of understanding, someone invented this story with such conviction and on such a great scale. That is why this sutra is called the king of all sutras. Do you understand?

Nowadays we have various sects in China or Japan, but the reason so many founders of various schools continue to make that kind of effort today is only in order to understand who Buddha was. When someone found that Buddha was such and such a person, he became the founder of some school. All the effort we have been making has been to know who Buddha is and what his purpose for teaching was. Do you understand this point? For a Buddhist, Buddha is not just a historical person—he is truth itself. We think he should be truth itself, and the historical Buddha cannot be perfect. But the background of the historical Buddha should be truth. If so, truth itself should be the real Buddha for us.

Then what is truth? How should we understand the truth, or how should we accept truth in the situation of this age? Because of questions like that is why we have various schools. Do you understand? In this way, with that kind of attitude, this sutra was told. So it is necessary for me to tell you about the history of Buddhism from the original, fundamental, form to the Mahayana form. If I say "Mahayana", there is also the "Hinayana" school, its opposite. When the Mahayana Buddhists reached Buddha's original teaching, they called all the teaching from before Mahayana Buddhism arose "Hinayana". But while the Mahayana school was being established, there was no Hinayana school.

According to the Tendai school, which was founded by Tendai Chih-i in China, there are two kinds of Mahayana. One is the last stage of the development of Buddhism, which is very different from the so-called Hinayana, or teaching of the sravakas. The Pratyekas have no teaching, because they are the ones who have no teacher, who studied by themselves. So there is no school for the Pratyeka Buddhist. They have no way that they are teaching; they have no written material for their disciples. The trees we see, the flowers we see, the stars and moon, or the mountains and rivers, are the teaching. So there is no Pratyekayana. But the Sravakas have a teaching, and the Mahayana teachers who reached this point ["the last stage in the development of Buddhism"], criticized the sravakas by calling their way the Hinayana. Of course, according to the Tendai, this is not the real Mahayana, or real teaching. The real teaching is the one which can include Sravakas, Pratyekas, and the so-called "one vehicle" or "great vehicle" teaching. That is the true teaching. So the Buddhists who discriminate between Mahayana and Hinayana are not true Mahayanists.

For the true Mahayana Buddhist, there are no Sravakas, Pratyekas, "Great One Vehicle," or "Mahayana." This is called the truth vehicle, while the other is called the special teaching. The special teaching is not good enough. It should be perfect teaching. So according to the Tendai analogy, there is the perfect teaching, the special teaching, and the teachings of the Pratyekas and Sravakas. This is a more proper understanding of Buddha's teaching.

In this way, our understanding of Buddha's teaching improved more and more. Finding out how we should improve and accept Buddha's teaching as a perfect teaching is the effort we have been making. So Buddhism should change, it should not be completed. One after another, we must have new teachers, and we must improve our understanding of the teaching from an immature one to a mature one. We should study this sutra with this in mind. Did you understand what I'm trying to say?

Today I want you to present some questions if you have any.

Student A: If that was the interpretation of Buddhism that was perfect for that time, maybe some new interpretation is perfect for this time. Or do you think that the Lotus Sutra is the best expression of Buddhism for the present?

Suzuki-roshi: Another way of understanding is by logic. Or, culture is also a truth for carving Buddhism. So I think that nowadays you should use some other truth to carve Buddha's image.

Q: Do you think the Shobogenzo may have been the best sutra for that time?

Suzuki-roshi: For that time, it was. And he used a very unusual truth for a person who was born several hundred years ago. Most of the truths he used may be very appropriate for us to use too. In this sense, many scholars are interested in the Shobogenzo. But even so, you cannot say Buddhism was completed by Dogen-zenji. If you think it was, the Shobogenzo becomes like a coffee shop on the freeway. Dogen will be very angry if you stay there. That is why he wrote it. His intention was not to stay here. You should go on and on. That was the point he put emphasis on. He said Buddhism is not valuable because of the teaching, but because of the continuous practice, such as the four vows.

Q: I didn't understand the emphasis this sutra places on the future lives of the different disciples. How is that of value?

Suzuki-roshi: "Future disciples" means that Buddhism is the teaching which has a limitless future and beginningless beginning, and which should always be true. So, in the sutra, there are many disciples and buddhas who will exist in the future and who existed aeons ago.

Q: We shouldn't be concerned about that, and it seems so difficult to understand.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, it's difficult to understand. That was the point of my previous lecture on this sutra. If your understanding does not lead to the Sambhogakaya Buddha or Dharmakaya Buddha, this kind of description doesn't make any sense. It looks like a fable or tale. Do you understand? As you will see later in this sutra, Buddha said to many of his eminent, direct disciples, "You should live until Maitreya Buddha appears, many many aeons in the future," and they said, "Yes." You cannot understand this kind of thought without the idea of the Sambhogakaya Buddha. And you may say the Sambhogakaya Buddha is just some idea, but if you have some experience of zazen, you can accept it. That is why Zen Buddhism arose.

Q: What does the understanding of the vow have to do with the understanding of Sambhogakaya Buddha?

Suzuki-roshi: First of all, Sambhogakaya Buddha is the perpetual one, who exists from beginningless beginning to endless end. And secondly, Nirmanakaya Buddha is the one who exists moment after moment with various forms, so Sambhogakaya Buddha is the background of Nirmanakaya Buddha. And Nirmanakaya Buddha is the embodiment of Sambhogakaya Buddha. So Sambhogakaya Buddha will give birth to Nirmanakaya Buddha. Nirmanakaya Buddha is the Buddha which exists moment after moment with various forms. Do you understand? That is why we say sentient beings are numberless, and we exist from beginningless beginning and to endless end.

Q: I think a lot of us have felt that some of the things in that sutra are hard to understand from our experience, in the same way that the vow seems to be impossible to our understanding. But there seems to be a relationship between making that vow and the mmm....

Suzuki-roshi: It may be difficult to explain. I think you know pretty well, and Claude [Dalenberg?] explained it pretty well in his answer to someone's question. That is actually how we exist here. We exist moment after moment, taking the form and color of the great Sambhogakaya Buddha. That is true. Don't you think so? If I say "Sambhogakaya Buddha," since you don't know the technical definition of the term, it may be more difficult. But we exist here, and we are not permanent beings. Only in this moment do we exist like this. Tomorrow I will not be the same person. This is true. Next moment I shall be the future Buddha. Yesterday I was the past Buddha. And you will be another Buddha. In this way there are many, many Buddhas.

But we are incarnated bodies, with a certain color and form and character. So there must be a source or root of each being, as the Sambhogakaya Buddha was the source of the Nirmanakaya Shakyamuni Buddha. When he realized this point, he accepted himself as Nirmanakaya Buddha, as Sambhogakaya Buddha, and as Dharmakaya Buddha. When we understand ourselves in this way, we exist in this world to continuously try to express Buddha Nature, moment after moment. That is the effort we should make, rather than being caught by a certain color or form.

But even so, we shouldn't ignore things, we should make our best effort in each moment. That is a kind of attachment, but this attachment is, at the same time, detachment, because the next moment you should make your best effort again. So it means detachment from the previous being. In this way, moment after moment, we exist. This kind of understanding is expressed by our technical terms of Nirmanakaya Buddha, Sambhogakaya Buddha, and Dharmakaya Buddha.

Q: Can all sentient beings, then, be considered Nirmanakaya Buddha?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, all sentient beings are Nirmanakaya Buddha. Whether or not they realize it, it is actually so. They do not accept themselves as a Nirmanakaya Buddha, that's all. For them, they are not, but for us who understand ourselves and others, all of them are Nirmanakaya Buddha, based on Sambhogakaya Buddha and Dharmakaya Buddha.

Q: You said some people live by karma and some live by vows.

Suzuki-roshi: People who do not understand this truth live a karmic life. But those who know this point do not live a karmic life. Karmic life is another version of Buddhist life.

Q: You mentioned the triple world.

Suzuki-roshi: The triple world: past, present, and future.

Q: Can you explain bringing people from this world....

Suzuki-roshi: There is no separate past, present and future. Past and future actually exist in this present moment. Do you understand? If you do something good, your future is bound to be good; and that you are good means that your past life was good.

Q: You speak of our existence in only an instant, but at each instant, that existence should make its best effort. And the more I think about this idea of best effort, the less I'm able to understand at all what it means. I think I've asked you this before, but maybe I'm ready to hear it again. What do you mean by making your best effort on each instant?

Suzuki-roshi: I don't mean to sacrifice this moment for the future, and I don't mean to be bound by past life and try to escape from it. This is the kind of effort you usually make. But there's a more important point in your effort. What is it? To stand on your own two feet is the most important thing. To sacrifice this moment for your future, even for your ideal, means that you are not standing on your own two feet. So the most important thing is to accept yourself, to have subjectivity in each moment. Or, don't complain-accept things as it is and satisfy your self with what you have right now. You should think, this is the only reality, the only Buddha you know, the only Buddha you can see, experience, have, worship. And then if you want to do something, at that time you are Nirmanakaya Buddha and Sambogakaya Buddha and Dharmakaya Buddha.

---

The following fragment was once called File 68-10-22.A. It was subsequently found to be the end of File 68-10-00.C. It is included here because it is a different edited version of the same text.-Bill Redican, 2/13/96.

FOURTH LECTURE OF TRAINING SESSION AT TASSAJARA

October 22, 1968

... that is how, actually, we exist here. We exist moment after moment, as ... taking form and color of great Sambogakaya Buddha. That is true. (chuckle) Don't you think so? If I say Sambogakaya Buddha, you know, by technical term ... because of technical ... because you don't know, what does it mean, definition of Sambogakaya Buddha, it makes you, more difficult maybe. But we exist here; and we are not permanent being. Only in this moment we exist as like this. But next moment I will change to ... tomorrow I will not be the same person. This is true. Next moment I shall be future Buddha. Yesterday I was past Buddha. In this way there is many and many Buddhas. And you will be ... another Buddha. In this way, there are many Buddhas, but Source of ... or ... we are incarnated body, with some certain color and form and character.

So there must be source of Shakyamuni Buddha, who is called, Nirmanakaya Buddha. But when he realize this point, he accept himself as Nirmanakaya Buddha, as Sambogakaya Buddha, as Dharmakaya Buddha. When we understand ourselves in this way, you know, what will be the way ... why we live in this world is to try to continuously try to express Buddha Nature, moment after moment. And that is the effort we should make, instead of being caught by some certain color or form. But even so (laughing), we should not ignore ... we should make our best effort in each moment. So that is a kind of attachment. But this attachment is, at the same time, detachment, because next moment you should make best effort (chuckling). So, it means detachment to the last being. In this way, moment after moment, we exist. So this kind of understanding will be expressed by our technical term of Nirmanakaya Buddha, Sambogakaya Buddha, and Dharmakaya Buddha.

Dan's question: Can all sentient beings, then, be considered Nirmanakaya Buddha?

Roshi's answer: Yeah. All sentient beings are Nirmanakaya Buddha. But (laughing) you know, whether or not they realize it, it is actually so, but they do not accept themselves as a Nirmanakaya Buddha. For them, they are not. But for us who understand ourselves and others, they are ... all of them are Nirmanakaya Buddha and Sambogakaya Buddha based on Sambogakaya Buddha and Dharmakaya Buddha.

[Is text missing? That is, where is Dan's second question?]

Dan's third question: Some people live by karma, you said, and some people live by vows.

Roshi: By vows, yeah, for people who do not understand this truth, they live their life, life is karmic life. Those who know this point, our life is not karmic life. The karma is ... karmic life is another version of Buddhist life.

Student: Can you explain "triple world"?

Roshi: Oh ... triple world: past, present, and future.

Student: Can you explain "bringing people from this world"?

Roshi: There is no separate past, present, and future. Past, present, and future exist in present. Past exists in this present moment ... future also. Do you understand? If you do something good, your future is, you know, bound to be good. That you are good means your past life was good.

Student: What do you mean by making your best effort on each moment?

Roshi: I don't mean to sacrifice this moment for the future. I don't mean, you know, that ... to be bound by past life, and try to escape from, is not ... this kind of effort will be the effort you make, usually. But there is more important point in your effort. What is that? To stand on your feet (laughing) is the most important thing. You know, to sacrifice this moment for your future, for your ideal, even, means that you are not sitting, standing on your feet. So, the most important things is to accept yourself, you know, to have subjectivity on each moment. Or to accept yourself: Don't complain. Don't make any complaint and accept things as it is, and satisfy yourself with what you have right now. And you should think, "this is the only reality, only Buddha, you know; you can see, you can experience, you can have, you can worship." And then, you know, if you want to do something, as a ... and at that time you are Nirmanakaya Buddha, and Sambogakaya Buddha, and Dharmakaya Buddha.

-----

[Transcription checked and edited by Brian Fikes]

Formatted 8/28/00.

9 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #5

Tuesday, October 01, 1968

Lotus Sutra Lecture, #5
Zen Mountain Center

What is told in this sutra is the view of the Dharma kaya world, Sambhogakaya world and Nirmanakaya world. We say shoho jisso [the real state of all elements or dharmas]. Shoho means various dharmas or various beings. Jisso is reality. So this is the right view of life and the world, in which various famous disciples of Buddha and arhats and various Sambhogakaya Buddhas and Dharmakaya Buddhas and Nirmanakaya Buddhas would appear. I think it's better to start little by little.

The first chapter is an introduction to the whole sutra, and it describes the scale of the sutra. "Thus have I heard." All sutras are started with these words. Nyoze gamon [evam maya shrutam], "Thus have I heard." At the meeting of the compilation [of the sutras] after Buddha passed away, the leading disciples decided on [the correct form of] Buddha's words. So they started with, "Thus I heard." All the sutras are supposed to have been spoken by Buddha, but it is not actually so. It is a kind of formal way of starting sutras.

"Thus I have heard." "Once upon a time." It doesn't say when.

"Once upon a time the Lord was staying at Ragagriha and on the Gridhrakuta mountain, with a numerous assemblage of monks, twelve hundred monks, all of them Arhats, stainless, free from depravity, self-controlled, thoroughly emancipated in thought and knowledge, of noble breed, (like unto) great elephants, having done their task, done their duty, acquitted their charge, reached the goal; in whom the ties which bound them to existence were wholly destroyed, whose minds were thoroughly emancipated by perfect knowledge, who had reached the utmost perfection in subduing all their thoughts; who were possessed of the transcendent faculties; eminent disciples, such as the venerable Ajnata-Kaundinya, the venerable Asvajit, the venerable Vashpa, the venerable Mahanaman, the venerable Bhadraka, the venerable Mahakasyapa, the venerable Kasyapa of Uruvilva, the venerable Kasyapa of Nadi, the venerable Kasyapa of Gaya, the venerable Sariputra, the venerable Maha-Maudgalyayana, the venerable Maha-Katyayana, the venerable Aniruddha, the venerable Revata, the venerable Kapphina, the venerable Gavampati, the venerable Pilindavatsa, the venerable Vakula, the venerable Bharadvaga, the venerable Maha-Kaushtila, the venerable Nanda (alias Mahananda), the venerable Upananda, the venerable Sundara-Nanda, the venerable Purna Maitrayaniputra, the venerable Subhuti, the venerable Rahula; with them yet other great disciples, as venerable Ananda, still under training, and two thousand other monks, some of whom still under training, the others masters; with six thousand nuns having at their head Mahaprajapati and the nun Yasodhara, the mother of Rahula, along with her train; (further) with eight thousand Bodhisattvas, all unable to slide back, endowed with the spells of supreme perfect enlightenment, firmly standing in wisdom; who moved onward the never deviating wheel of the law; who had propitiated many hundred thousands of Buddhas; who under many hundred thousands of Buddhas had planted the roots of goodness, had been intimate with many hundred thousands of Buddhas, were in body and mind fully penetrated with the feeling of charity, able in communicating the wisdom of the Tathagatas; very wise, having reached the perfection of wisdom; renowned in many hundred thousands of worlds; having saved many hundred thousand myriads of kotis of beings; such as the Bodhisattva Mahasattva Manjusri, as prince royal; the Bodhisattvas Mahasattvas Avalokitesvara, Mahasthamaprapta, Sarvarthanaman, Nityodyukta ...."

This is very difficult. I may bite my tongue.

"...Anikshiptadhura, Ratnapani, Bhaishagyaraga, Pradanasura, Ratnakandra, Ratnaprabha, Purnakandra, Mahavikramin, Trailokavikramin, Anantavikramin, Mahapratibhana, Satatasamitabhiyukta, Dharanidhara, Akshayamati, Padmasri, Nakshatraraga, the Bodhisattva Mahasattva Maitreya, the Bodhisattva Mahasattva Simha."

There are many names, but I will only explain some of the important ones among them. "Thus have I heard. Once upon a time the Lord was staying at Ragagriha, on the Gridhrakuta mountain, with a numerous assemblage of monks, twelve hundred monks, all of them Arhats ...." Sravakas practice their way in order to attain arhatship. Arhatship is called, "no learn." It means there is nothing more to learn or study after reaching arhatship. An arhat was a perfect being-not Buddha himself, but next to Buddha. As you know, after Mahayana Buddhism arrived, there were the bodhisattvas and buddhas above the arhats.

Those who attained Arhatship were free from depravity, stainless. Stainless means that they annihilated all the stains, or all the evil desires. "free from depravity, self controlled...." Yesterday I explained self-control. You know the difference between controlling self, or desires, and annihilating desires? There is a slight difference. Do you remember? Sally asked that question. Controlling desires is a more autonomous or voluntary way. You do it by yourself. Annihilating is a more negative way. You annihilate some desires because they are evil and we have to get rid of them. Self control is a more positive way. If you switch your practice over from negation to self control, it becomes more religious in its true sense.

Actually, this difference between the attitudes of annihilating or controlling divides Buddhism right in two. You may not like either of them. You don't like to control your desires, but that is not Zen. We have limitless desires, so if you let all your desires go as they want, what will happen to you? You must do something with them, that is true. Do you agree with that? You may say, "Desires as they are," but that does not mean to let them go as they want.

Usually when we say "desires," they are not just desires, they are desires plus something. That something may be various powers or faculties you have, and even reason will act with those limitless desires. With the aid of all the faculties we have, those limitless desires will extend themselves until we get lost. So something should be done with them. The first stage is to know what they are and how they work. When you know what they are and how they work, you will know how to develop them. That is actually our practice. I tentatively call this kind of effort "self-control" or "controlling desires". Control is not such a good word; you may find some better, beautiful, fancy word for that. But what I mean is to know the nature of desires and how they work, what kinds of friends they have, and what kind of things they do. We should know this and develop desires appropriately; that is self control. So instead of annihilating them, we should know what they are. Instead of trying to attain arhatship by annihilating desires, one by one, you will develop them.

These are opposite ways-one is negative and the other is positive, and Buddhism is divided in two. One way goes from top to bottom, the other from bottom to top. Hongaku homon [the dharma gate of innate Buddha-nature] means to start from Buddhahood and work on our world and our desires. Shikaku homon [the dharma gate of realizing one's Buddha-nature by undergoing religious exercises] means to begin with annihilating greed, and annihilate more and more subtle desires until you attain enlightenment. But the other way is to start from Dharmakaya Buddhahood, or Sambhogakaya Buddhahood, and come down to our world to help others.

Hon means origin, gaku means enlightenment, shi means beginning. It looks like the two ways are quite different, but what we actually do is not different. To annihilate or to control is the same thing, because desires are coexistent with our being. That I am here means desire is here. If you annihilate all the desires, you don't survive. So to annihilate actually means to control, because you cannot annihilate them. If you say to cut out all desires, that looks like there is a strong feeling of controlling them. "Cut out!" If you cut them out, you will die, but that much confidence is necessary. If you extend the practice of annihilating seriously, it will end in asceticism. But if you know the real nature of desires and how they work, those two practices are the same.

If you think that they are evil desires which we should get rid of, and you are worried about them, then that is not our way. So it may be better to say to control them. Here, in the sutra, it says "self controlled," but for sravakas, it is a more annihilistic way.

"... with a numerous assemblage of monks, twelve hundred monks, all of them arhats, stainless, free from depravity, self controlled, thoroughly emancipated in thought and knowledge ...." It is necessary to be emancipated from thought and knowledge. They are "of noble breed, (like unto) great elephants ...." In India there were strong feelings of class discrimination. "... having done their task"-the task of annihilating evil desires-"done their duty"-their duty to attain emancipation-"acquitted their charge"-acquitted their karmic life charge-"reached the goal"-goal of Arhatship-"in whom the ties which bound them to existence were wholly destroyed ...."

We have Buddha Nature, but at the same time, Buddha Nature is covered by something-first of all, ignorance. This point should be explained clearly, but I don't think I have enough time. Figuratively speaking, our desires look like a cloud in front of the moon, but it is not actually so. If there is a cloud, it should be destroyed. "...whose minds were thoroughly emancipated by perfect knowledge ...." Perfect knowledge is wisdom. Perfect wisdom is different from the wisdom of knowing something. Perfect knowledge is not knowledge in a dualistic sense. "... who had reached the utmost perfection in subduing all their thoughts ...." Perfect knowledge is called wisdom. Perfect wisdom is called non-discriminating wisdom or non-judgmental wisdom or non-thinking wisdom. So unless we subdue all our thoughts, we cannot have perfect knowledge. "... Who were possessed of the transcendent faculties ...." There are many transcendent faculties: clairvoyance, or hearing something from a distance, seeing through some substance; arhats had these kinds of faculties. Those arhats were there when this sutra was told.

The group mentioned next is the eminent disciples, such as the ten disciples of Buddha. I should explain them one by one, but I will only explain the most important ones, the ten eminent disciples or the four eminent sravakas. Sravakas are also Buddha's disciples. They are the most direct disciples of Buddha, so we call them "Theravada." The Theravada are the old disciples or shiniya [?] disciples.

The five disciples, including Kaundinya and the venerable Asvagit were the disciples to whom Buddha spoke his first sermon. Originally those five disciples were Siddhartha's men. When he escaped from the castle, those five men followed him. And as you know, when Shakyamuni Buddha gave up asceticism, they thought, "My master is not strong enough, so he gave up the practice." They continued to practice asceticism, but Buddha started to practice zazen under the Bodhi tree and attained enlightenment. He thought for forty-nine days about how to explain his experience and whom to explain it to. At last Buddha went back to his five men and told the first sermon. Those are the five disciples. And ten more disciples follow those five.

Thank you very much. Do we have more time?

Claude: Yes, we have eight minutes.

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Q: Are we sravakas in that we are listening and learning from you, and are the bodhisattvas the ones of the Mahayana school, of the younger generation who sort of split away from the elders? Just because we can hear the Buddha directly doesn't mean we can't still stand on our own feet.

Suzuki-roshi: Actually, this is how Buddhism developed. When I explain how Buddhism actually developed from original Buddhism, I cannot say this is also how it developed from the sravakayana to the Mahayana. I should explain it in order as it happened. But at least when I am explaining this sutra, I should explain from the viewpoint of Mahayana Buddhism, since this is a Mahayana scripture. For the Mahayana Buddhist, there is no sravaka or pratyeka. True Mahayana includes everything. Actually, when we discriminate, that is the Sravakayana. What was wrong with them was that they were too proud of their teaching as direct disciples of Buddha, saying, "This is true Buddhism, and those who observe Buddha's precepts and can recite his teaching are priests, and those who cannot do that are laymen." That was wrong; they had too much confidence in themselves. That is why we say they are just trying to save themselves, that they just help themselves but not sentient beings, or that they are too proud of his teaching. So there are no sentient beings in their minds. That is why they are called "Hinayana". They made this mistake, but at least their practice was good and their knowledge was good.

Q: You speak of true wisdom being the wisdom of non-discrimination. How are we to understand the emphasis placed on the view that ignorance is like clouds in front of the moon? It sometimes seems like that's the way it is.

Suzuki-roshi: I wanted to explain that, but it is too complicated, so I didn't. The sravakas developed their rigid, or substantial, understanding of Buddhism and set up teachings like kusha [abhidharma] and yuishiki [vijñāna-mātrata = "consciousness only"]. Yuishiki is pretty good, but kusha is philosophically very complicated. It takes nine years to study kusha and three to study yuishiki, or, if you want to study all the Hinayana philosophy, it takes twelve years. Even if you devoted yourself solely to the study of kusha, it would take nine years. They established such a fancy, complicated philosophy. It may be interesting for some intellectual people, but if you study it, more and more you will be involved in thinking Buddhism. And why were the direct disciples of Buddha the ones who subdued all their thought, you see? They went more and more in the wrong direction. This is the point for which they are blamed.

But originally it was very good. So, especially in Soto, every morning we recite the sutra for the arhats. We say sammyo rokutsu mappo shobo ni kaeshi. Sammyo rokutsu is the arhat's power. [Sammyo = tisro vidyah = three types of knowledge: of former births, of future destinies of all beings, and of the origin and way to remove suffering. Rokutsu = sad abhijnah = six kinds of supernatural powers of buddhas and arhats: free activity, eyes capable of seeing everything, ears capable of hearing everything, insight into others' thinking, remembrance of the former state of existence, and perfect freedom. Mappo = saddharma-vipralopa = last of the three time periods of Buddhism. Shobo = sad-dharma = true law or period of righteous law. Kaeshi = ?] We should be like the arhats, who practiced Buddhism so hard and devoted themselves so well. Although right now we are in the last period of Buddhism, when we practice our way as the arhats did, this time is not the last period any more, this time is like the time when Buddha was there. So Buddha should be with them, and Buddha is here. With this spirit, we worship the arhats every morning. We are very critical about some of the philosophy they created, but we respect their practice very much-not their teaching, but their practice, their sincerity.

-----

[Transcript checked and edited by Brian Fikes]

Formatted 8/28/00.

10 - Tenryu's One Finger

Saturday, October 12, 1968

Sesshin Lecture

Shikantaza, Tenryu's One Finger

Soko-ji, San Francisco

I want to explain our way-our way of zazen. Do you know-you know the famous story of Gutei.[1] When Tenryu[2] pointed up one finger, Gutei attained enlightenment. And do you-what do you think [about] this one finger? He [Gutei] attained enlightenment, you know, and said: "I received Tenryu's one finger, and-which I have been using for-for my lifetime," when he became pretty old he said. "What do you think this is?" [Laughs.]

There is another-I will tell you another story. Yakusan-Yakusan Igen,[3] the disciple of Sekito, one day as he was asked to give lectures to the monks, he just appeared on the altar [took the abbot's seat],[4] and while-while he was sitting, and came back to his room.

The director of the temple went to his room and asked him, "You didn't give me-give us lecture for a long time, so I asked you to give us lecture [laughs]. But as soon as you appeared on the altar, you came back to [laughs]- to your room. Why is that?"

Yakusan said, "There are many teachers. Some of them are teaching Buddhist precepts, and some of them are giving lectures on sutras, and I am a Zen master."

That was his answer. What do you think that is?

If, you know-in other word, then I may ask you, "What have you been doing today?" [Laughs.] I think you have-some of you must have been very sleepy, and some of you must have had pain, terrible pain on your legs, and some of you must find it difficult to stop your monkey mind [laughs]. So I suspect quite few people, or maybe three or four people who are sitting, and rest of the people [laughs] couldn't practice zazen in its true sense-in its usual sense. You may understand in that way.

Today we have not much time to have dokusan, but suppose we have dokusan, I think I will have many questions about this-about breathing, about pain, or about your monkey mind [laughs]. "What should I do with it?" [Laughs, laughter.] As today we have no dokusan so, may be a good idea to give you some instruction about zazen.

Last Wednesday and Sunday too, I talked about to be a obstacle-obstacle of-in your zazen you should be a obstacle of buddha-nature-buddha-light. The one finger Tenryu pointed out is not actually-does not mean "one." It is actually-what he meant is our practice, our shikantaza. What Yakusan, you know, demonstrated is also shikantaza, in which you have no gaining idea. You just sit. Because you have some-you practice zazen to-to have complete calmness in your mind, then various problems you have become really obstacle of-really a problem or disturbance. But when you have no gaining idea, then all the things which happens in your zazen is-will become one finger. At that time, your zazen become so-called-it "painful [?] zazen" [laughs].

You know, when some monk ask a master, "What should I do when cold weather come?" The master said, "Cold? Be a cold buddha. And when summer come, be a hot buddha." [5] When you have no gaining idea, you know, you become various buddha moment after moment. Cold buddha, hot buddha, painful buddha, monkey-minded buddha [laughs].

Monkey-monkey mind is same, you know. But when you have gaining idea, monkey mind is, you know-when-when you want to-to have-when you want to have calm serene mind, the monkey mind you have-you will be discouraged by [laughs] your monkey mind. But when you have no gaining idea, when you just sit and accept it, then monkey mind is one finger-Tenryu's one finger. So moment after moment, various buddha will appear in your practice. Monkey mind is, in that case, monkey-minded buddha: not just ordinal [ordinary] monkey mind, that is monkey-mind buddha. When it is hot, it is hot buddha.

Yakusan demonstrated, you know, his practice without word, without saying anything. He just sit. Tenryu, you know, pointed out one finger. But this one finger pointed out without any gaining idea-without trying to teach them what it is. He just [laughs]-instead of doing so, he just did it like this [probably held up one finger].

So it is not necessary be always one finger. This is all right [laughs, laughter]. This is all right, too [laughs] [raising two, three, four fingers, etc.].[6] But people may [get] confused [laughs], so he just, you know, always pointed out one finger. So, you know, if he is tired out-tired of sitting, he may [laughs, laughter] do like this. That is also, you know, one finger. If, you know, this one finger means something, it is-may be two fingers, or three fingers, or many fingers, not one finger. Because this one finger can be various thing, according to the situation, we call it true one finger.

Like Avalokiteshvara Bodhisattva's body, he-he is supposed to have thirty-three bodies. According to the people who want to-according to the people he tried to save, he takes various figure, sometime ladies, sometime asuras,[7] or sometime human body, and he takes 33 bodies. So even though he has many figures, you know, but his true body is one. That is true one.

So we say "just to sit." Just to sit doesn't-does not mean to-to have same pattern of practice. When we are ready to be many figures, when we are ready to practice [in] various way[s], that is shikantaza. So it is the foundation of-maybe you may call it foundation of various practice.

If you do not have this secret of practice, you may be easily discouraged. But if you make some progress in your practice, you know, naturally you will stick to your old same way [laughs], you know, because you feel very good about your practice, and you feel you made some progress in your own way. But even so, if you attach to the same old way, you will [be] sure to have time to be discouraged about you-with your practice, and you will be very much confused. "What is zazen?" you may say.

It looks like very difficult to sit without any gaining idea. But actually, as you sit today, at least you should be completely involved in the atmosphere or feeling of zendo, and just practice our way. You should not bring in many ideas in zendo. You should-when you enter zendo, you should be a quite different person, forgetting all about what you have been doing, and you should just sit. Zazen practice is not continuation of your everyday life-everyday practice. In-in Fukuan Zazen-gi, Dogen-zenji says: "You should give up everything when you practice zazen. And you should put everything aside and should practice zazen."

At least you have-you must have-you must realize that this point is very important.

We say it takes time before you know what is zazen. But actually, why we say so is without this kind of conviction, you cannot give up everything and practice shikantaza. If you think, "I'll sit two months more or three months more [laughs]," then your practice, you know, is not pure enough. You know-you know-you, you practice zazen as if you do-as if you study something else, you know.

We should not mix up our practice with ordinal [ordinary] training or exercise. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.] [Some lost, perhaps something like, "If you study ...."] [8] ... this point more, you will find out why we have Tassajara or why old Zen masters had very difficult time in their practice. Only to put everything aside and practice our way without gaining idea-they made such a effort. To practice our way to attain enlightenment-even to attain enlightenment is not good, because this kind of gaining idea is-usually is not pure enough. Instead of, "You should attain enlightenment, forgetting everything else," we say, "Practice zazen without any gaining idea." This is more str- [partial word]-you know, stronger instruction, more strict instruction. Without, you know, trying to-even to attain enlightenment, you should practice zazen. That is actually what we mean. To practice zazen to attain enlightenment may be pretty good, but not good enough-not strict enough-not strict with your impetus of your practice.

Instead of useless effort after you started zazen, we make greater effort before we practice zazen when we enter zendo. After, you know, entering zendo, even though you make great effort, it doesn't work so well. Before you enter zendo, you should be fully prepared for zazen practice.

I think you are very sincere students, but, you know-but your conviction is not strong enough, is not pure enough. I think that is why many teachers expelled his disciples. "Go away!" [Laughs.] You know, if he is not ready to practice zazen, it is better to say, "Go away." It means, "Come again." [Laughs, laughter.] "Go away, and prepare for coming in again." That is real kindness. I think we have to repeat, you know, this-we have to-almost all of you should be expelled [laughs] from zendo, and we should start Zen Center again [laughs]. How about it [laughs, laughter]? Again and again [laughs]. "Go away!" Or, "Let's do it again." We must have this kind of spirit always, or else we cannot clean up our mind.

In Japan, once a year, we have general housecleaning [laughs]. We take out everything. We choose-we decide, you know, to have housecleaning, watching newspaper [for the date], you know. And when-sometime it-it may be windy, or cloudy, or rainy day. So we, you know, watch the newspaper, and we have housecleaning. On that day, we take everything out [laughs]. We expel everything [laughs], even Buddha shrine or Shinto shrine, you know. We take them out, and we clean completely our house. In the same way, I think, this kind of cleaning is necessary. Without this kind of effort, you pile up, you know, things one after another. Then you will be easily caught by some same old way of life, you know. So you cannot practice zazen in its true sense. When you have this kind of spirit, you can practice shikantaza.

When I came to America for the first time, for pretty long time, as our old students knows-know, I put emphasis on way-seeking mind. When we have true way-seeking mind-pure true way seeking mind, we can practice our way without any problem. When you have questions or problems in your practice, it means that you are not practicing shikantaza. If you practice shikantaza, you know, you will be monkey-minded buddha in shikantaza. You will be pain-legged buddha in shikantaza. And your whole body will be obstacle buddha-obstacle of buddha-or to be obstacle itself is buddha. Is there any problem, you know, when whatever you do, that is buddha? That is shikantaza.

When our community-if-when our community is based on this idea, there is no problem. We will enjoy our problem even. To have various problem is to have many mandala. Without this shikantaza, all the teaching and mandala will cause you-will be a cause of trouble. If we become successful, if our community expand, we will have problem-big problem. You may say it's better not to have it [laughs]-you may say-I'm sure you will say so. Why you say so? When you say so-before you say so, you should think why [laughs]. Why we have this kind of problem? Why this is problem with me?

I-the more I think about this point, the more I find out why Dogen-zenji put emphasis on shikantaza. "First of all, before we practice zazen," he says, "in delusion we should set up our pure way of practice. Before enlightenment, we should attain enlightenment."

Before you enter zendo, you should attain enlightenment [laughs]. Do you understand? "If you"-sometime he said, "If you enter zendo by mistake, you should go out." [Laughs.] By mistake [laughs]? You should go out. If you want to enter zendo, you should be really prepared for practicing pure practice. "By mistake" [laughs]-isn't it interesting [laughs]? "If you enter zendo by mistake." [Laughs.] I think almost all of you entered zendo by mistake [laughs, laughter]. So-if so, you know, take a rest in our Zen apartment [laughs] across the street, and come back again [laughs].

Ahhh. Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (1/24/01).

[1] Jinhua Juzhi (Jap. Kinka Gutei): n.d. (c. 9th century) Disciple of Hangzhou Tianlong, who taught him the practice of holding up one finger. This story is Case 3 of the Wu-Men Kuan (Jap. Mumonkan, Gateless Gate) collection of koans. See also A. Ferguson, Zen's Chinese Heritage, Boston: Wisdom, 2000, p. 177.

[2] Hangzhou Tianlong (Jap. Koshu Tenryu): n.d. Disciple of Damei Fachang.

[3] Yaoshan Weiyan (Jap. Yakusan Igen): 751-834. Disciple of Sekito Kisen. Master of Ungan, Sensu, and Dogo. This story is Case 7 of the Ts'ung-jung lu (Jap. Shoyoroku, Book of Serenity) collection of koans. Another version is reproduced in A. Ferguson, op. cit., p. 109. See also SR-71-08-08 and SR-69-06-00.

[4] Text in brackets from original transcript. Not on tape.

[5] Case 43 of Hekiganroku (The Blue Cliff Record), "Tozan's 'No Cold or Heat.'" It is also found in Shobogenzo "Shunju," in a translation that is more similar to Suzuki-roshi's usage.

[6] Text in brackets from original transcript. Not on tape.

[7] asura or asura (Sanskrit): demons or evil spirits.

[8] The text in brackets is from the original transcript. Not on tape.

11 - The True Dragon

Saturday, October 12, 1968

The True Dragon
Soko-ji, San Francisco

[Laughs.] This? [Probably an aside to tape operator.]

Dogen-zenji says, "Don't practice your way as if blind man-blind man-blind men trying to figure out what is elephant." [1] The real elephant is not a trunk or rope or fan or wall. But the people thinks blind man-blind man-a blind man may think an elephant is like a wall or rope or trunk. But the real elephant is not-none of those-are not-is not none of those.

And he says, "Don't-don't be curious about the true dragon, like Seiko." [2] In China there was a man who [was] named Seiko. He loved dragons. All his scroll is-was-were dragons. And he designed his house like a dragon-house. And he had many figures of dragons. But so dragon thought-real dragon thought, "He-if I appear in his house, he will be very pleased." So one day, real dragon appeared in his room, and he was very much scared of it and almost [laughs] draw his, you know, sword and cut him-cut the real dragon. So the real dragon [said], "Oh, my!" [Laughs.] And he escaped from his-hardly escaped from his room. "Don't be like that," Dogen-zenji says.[3]

Most of us are practicing our way like a blind man or Seiko. That is why we have to start our practice over and over. You think you are practicing real zazen, but may not be so. So if you notice that you haven't been practicing true zazen, you have to start practice true zazen again. And over and over, we have to start our zazen, because we are always liable to practice zazen like blind man or Seiko.

And here is another story which was told by Nangaku.[4] Rinzai belongs to Nangaku's branch. And Nangaku said after-can you hear me? You-you cannot hear me [laughs]. Okay. Huh?

Student: I can see you.

[Laughs.] Oh. You cannot hear me so [laughter], you have to see me. In that way you shouldn't study zazen [laughs,laughter].

Nangaku-Rinzai belongs to Nangaku's lineage-branch. People say there is Rinzai Zen or Soto Zen, but Dogen-zenji always talks about-talked about-Nangaku's famous story of polishing tile.[5] You know that story.

When Nangaku-no, when Baso was practicing zazen, Nangaku, who passed by, asked him-asked the disciple Baso, "What are you doing?" [Laughs.]

"Of course, I am practicing zazen."

And [Nangaku asked], "Why do you practice zazen?"

And Baso said, "I want to attain buddhahood," he said.

And Nangaku did not say anything, but he picked up a tile and started to polish it, you know. This time, Baso started to wondering what he started to do, and asked him, "What are you doing?"

"I am making a tile-a jewel." [Laughs.]

And after this story, Nangaku told Baso, "When a cart-a cart does not go, do you whip a horse-the horse or a cart? Which do you whip?" [Laughs.]

And he explained about this koan. Which do we-should we hit, a cart or a-the horse? The cart or the horse?

Dogen-zenji says in usually-usually there is no person who hit the cart when [laughs] cart doesn't go. Usually people hit a cow instead of a cart. Usually people do so. But in-in our way, there should be way to whip a cart. There should be way to whip a cart when cart doesn't go. Usually when you practice zazen, you know, you know how to [laughs], you know, whip-almost all of you just knows you should whip the cow. And to whip a cow, you practice zazen [laughs]. You are giving whip-pretty hard one on your practice, without knowing to whip the cart. That is actually what you are doing.

That is usual way, you know. But we should know that there is another way of practice: to whip a cart-the cart instead of cow. Cow or what? [Asking for correct word.] Horse-no, no-not horse. In China [laughs], horse is too fast [laughs].

Student A: Oxen.

Oxen. Okay. Cow is milk cow isn't it? [Laughs, laughter.] Ox-oxen.

This is something which we should know, or as a Soto priest it is necessary to know. Maybe the best way is to whip the cart instead of the ox. To whip, you know, ox is like you see-like you understand, ox is symbol of mind-the picture of, you know, ten oxes.[6]

The cart means body. And it means also zazen-form-formal practice of zazen. And ox means attainment, spiritual attainment. And cart means physical practice.

Usually, you know, we-our way-usually we understand [that] zazen practice is formal practice. And-or shikantaza is formal practice, and koan practice is spiritual practice or mental-more mental practice. But this kind of understanding is both-is not complete. This kind of understanding is the understanding of blind men or Seiko. True practice is not formal practice, or so-called it shikantaza, or koan practice. None of those. Those practice is just the practice to whip ox-to whip the ox.

The true practice we mean is true shikantaza, you know, not [that] shikantaza [is the] opposite way of koan practice. So those who talks about shikantaza mostly understand that is Soto way, while koan practice is Rinzai's way.

This is, you know, like Seiko loves, you know, dragons. This is-those are carved dragon, not real one. So each one of us, you know, think of this point. Each one of us practice zazen in his own way, with his own understanding. That is right. And he continue that kind of practice, thinking that, "This is right practice." So even though he is sitting in here, you know, in zendo, he is involved in his own practice. In other word, he is carving, you know, carefully carving his own dragon [laughs], which is not real. That is [what] most of [the] people are doing. Some people may, you know, explain what is zazen in philosophical way. Or some people [are] trying to express our zazen in some literature, or painting, or scientific way, without knowing that that is his own, you know, dragon, not real one [laughs].

So, that is not wrong. That is all right, but we should know that there must be the way to whip a cart. Or we should know that there is true dragon which has no form or no color, which is called nothingness or emptiness, and which include koan practice, and so-called-it shikantaza, and various Hinayana way of practice, or pre-Buddhistic practice. This is the practice transmitted from Buddha to us. You know, we-right now we recite sutra for the screen maybe. What is the screen? The white, you know, screen where there is no Buddha painting-or no-no images.

Actually, I was, you know, reciting sutra for this Shobogenzo [laughs]. I put it in this way [laughing] and recite sutra after that time. I'm, you know, talking about Shobogenzo in this way. But this is also, maybe, carved dragon. But at least when we do something, you know, there must be something which is supposed to be a true dragon, not real dragon. I know that [laughs]. But this is supposed to be a true dragon. In this way we practice zazen, you know.

You come and practice zazen in this zendo where there should be true dragon. But the instant you think, "This is true dragon," that is mistake, you know. But knowing that, if you come to this zendo, you should practice zazen with people, forgetting all about your, you know, carving or your painting. You should practice zazen with people, with your friend, in this zendo, completely involved in the atmosphere we have here.

Sometime I allow people who is-who are stick-sticking to-stick to his old way. I allow people to do that, but strictly speaking those who come and practice zazen here should be involved in-should be completely involved in the feeling we have in this zendo, and practice our way with people according to my instruction. That is what you should do.

But people who do not know what is real emptiness or dragon may think he is forcing his way [laughs] to us. And, "Soko-ji is the Zen-Soto Zen temple. I have been practicing Rinzai way." So-but that is not true. We are practicing our way transmitted from Buddha to us. We are one of the Buddha's disciple. And we practice zazen with Buddha, with patriarchs.

Recently, if you read books written by many scholars, you know, you will find out various, you know, opinion-opinions about, you know, Zen literature or Zen thought; or what is Bodhidharma's way; whether Bodhidharma was historical person or not; what is shikantaza; what is koan practice? But, in short, most of the-I don't say all of them [laughs], but most of the teachers and scholars talking about the-their own dragon. It is easy to, you know, to analyze or to compare one dragon to the other, you know. Because it is carved one it is some form already. So, you know, this is-"Ah-ah-this is Soto dragon [laughs], or this is Rinzai dragon [laughing]." But Soto way is not so easy to, you know, figure out what it will be [laughs]. Looks like Rinzai, looks like Soto [laughs, laughter]. Maybe Soto [laughs].

In this way they write many books about Zen. But it is not true, you know. There is some true dragon is very difficult to figure out. "What is it? Is this dragon or snake [laughs]? Looks like snake. No good," some scholar may say. But true zazen sometimes looks like snake instead of dragon. So, you cannot say, you know, true zazen is dragon, or true dragon, or miniature dragon. It is not possible to figure out if that is possible-if it takes all the-same form always, that is not true dragon.

For-for people who cannot be satisfied with some form or color, true dragon is some imaginary animal, you know, which does not exist, because [for] those people, something which does not take some form-some particular form or color is not true being. So they may say that is imaginary dragon. But there is-for Buddhist, there is the way to-to understand reality in two ways: by form and color and, without form or color. That is, according to Nangaku, to whip the cart instead of the ox. To whip a-if someone whip a cart, people may say he is crazy [laughs]. But, you know, there is actually the transmitted way to whip the cart. To practice formal way it-to practice some formality, Rinzai or Soto, or in Zen Center ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

But ordinal [ordinary] person-for the ordinal [ordinary] one to see the carved dragon is not to see the true dragon. That is so-called-it "one pure practice"-ichinyo-zammai.[7] Usually, ichinyo-zammai is understood "to be completely involved in some kind of practice." It is so, but at the same time, even though we are involved in-deeply involved in a kind of practice, at the same time we should have complete freedom from it. Do you understand [laughs]?

Usually, you know, when you become very much attached to something, you have no freedom from it. But for us, because of complete freedom, we-for us it is possible to be involved in or to be attached to something completely. That is shikantaza, true shikantaza.

So shikantaza is not matter of whether you practice zazen or not, even. Even though you do not practice our way in cross-legged position, actually if you have this point, you are always practicing zazen. Even you are sleeping, you are practice-actually practicing zazen.

Dogen-zenji says-said: "Sickness does not destroy a person, but if you do not practice zazen, that no-practice will destroy a person." Do you understand [laughs]? Sickness does not destroy a person. You may say: "Today I cannot practice zazen because I have headache. But, if I practice zazen I shall die, so I cannot practice zazen." But Dogen-zenji said, "Sickness does not destroy a person, but no-practice will destroy him."

Actually, Dogen-zenji left when he was very sick-he left Eihei-ji and went to Kyoto and stayed [in] his disciple's home. We should know what did he meant by practice when he said practice does not-no-practice-if you don't practice zazen that will destroy you.

It is not so easy to talk about this point-what is real practice? Because this practice is-if we want to figure out what Dogen-zenji meant when he said so, without having this kind of experience, to talk about this point may be completely wrong. But we can figure out what he meant, and we can figure out when we study Shobogenzo what he meant by our practice. It is-prac- [partial word]-his practice is something beyond formal practice or spiritual practice, or even beyond enlightenment. Something-the more you try to figure out, the more you feel distance from your practice and from his practice, and yet some practice which we cannot be escape from it.

Actually we are practicing his way day by day, but for us there is no time to figure out what he meant completely. And even though we human being continue his way forever, he-we will not-we will not be able to say this is his way. The only thing we can say is this is the way which has no end and no beginning, and from this way we cannot escape. That is all what we can say.

Because of this practice, actually, various being survive in this way, and everything is going in this way, including we human being. Actually-so there is no problem for us. But as a human being who live in this world in this way, the constant effort to keep up the way whole universe is going and practice our way is necessary, as long as this universe exist. With this feeling, with this complete calmness of our mind, we should practice our way.

If you sit at least-if you sit one year, most students [will] actually have this quality of practice. But when you try to figure out what is your practice, you have there [a] problem, or you create problems which does not belong to your practice. If you just sit, there is no problem for most of our students, but sometime you create problem, that's all. And you fight with the problem, that's all [laughs]. You are creating it, actually. In your zazen there is no problem.

When you practice your own personal practice, you have problem. When you just sit, being absorbed in our feeling in zendo-the feeling we have in our zendo, there is no problem at all.

We should make our effort in this point more, instead of trying to- instead of carving your own dragon. That is how you carve your own dragon, actually. How you have completely-complete freedom from everything, including your-you, yourself. To talk about freedom is quite easy. But actually to attain-to have it is not so easy at all. Unless you are able to have freedom from yourself, you will never have freedom from everything. Or, if you only have freedom from yourself, you will have complete freedom from everything. How we attain this freedom is our practice.

You should not listen to the various instruction in detail. It may help-the instruction will, of course, help you only when you are ready to practice zazen according to the place you practice, forgetting all about the old way of practice you have been making.

I am not emphasizing Soto way instead of Rinzai way, but as long as you practice zazen in Zen Center, you should practice Zen Center's way, or else you will be involved in personal practice. You will be carving your own dragon, always, thinking this is the true dragon. That is a, you know, silly [laughs] mistake. You shouldn't create this kind of problem for your practice.

As Zen masters-as some Zen masters say, "Our way is like a," you know, "like walk," you know, "step by step." This is our practice. When you, you know, stand on one legs you should forget right legs. This-step by step. This is true practice. You know, if you stick to right legs or left legs, left foot or right foot, you cannot walk [laughs], you know. This is how we practice our way. This is complete freedom.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. SFZC librarian Celeste West was kind enough to find the citation of the elephant parable in the Udana-sutra. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (4/4/01).

[1] Dogen made passing reference to this famous parable in Fukan Zazen-gi. It is said to have originated in China sometime during the Han dynasty (202 BCE-220 CE). [Louise Kou and Yuan-Hsi Kou (1976), Chinese Folktales, 1976, Celestial Arts, 231 Adrian Road, Milbrae, CA 94030, pp. 83-85.] However, an apparently earlier version is found in the Udana-sutra (VI, 4), in which Shakyamuni Buddha recites the tale. (See also Digha Nikyaya, 19, and the Nirvana-sutra.) African and Islamic versions also exist.

[2] Probably referring to the story of Sho-kung or Yeh Kung-tzu (Jap. Seiko or Shoko) in the Hsin-hsu or Shen-tzu lüeh (Shinshi Ryaku) and the Latter Han History. Sho-kung loved painted and carved dragons but was terrified when visited one day by the real thing. "Do not become so accustomed to images that you are dismayed by the real dragon" (Dogen-zenji, Fukan Zazen-gi, in Nishijima and Cross, ed., Shobogenzo, 1994, Vol. 1, p. 282). See also SR-67-12-05-B, SR-69-09-00-A, and SR-71-06-05.

[3] In Fukan Zazen-gi.

[4] Nanyue Huairang (Jap. Nangaku Ejo): 677-744. Early Chan master; student of the Sixth Patriarch Dajian Huineng (Jap. Daikan Eno); master of Mazu Daoyi (Jap. Baso Doitsu).

[5] In Ching Te Ch'uan Teng Lu (Record of the Transmission of the Lamp), translated by Thomas and C. C. Cleary, in The Blue Cliff Record, Boston: Shambhala, 1992 (Appendix, p. 566).

[6] The Ten Oxherding Pictures.

[7] ichinyo-zammai (Jap.): ichinyo = oneness, non-discrimination, absolute unity; zammai or sanmai (samadhi, Sanskrit) = nondualistic state of meditation. Suzuki-roshi may have said ichigyo-zammai, which is defined as zazen or prajñaparamita, but it sounded like ichinyo-zammai.

12 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #1

Sunday, October 20, 1968

Lotus Sutra Lecture, #1

[Third Lotus Sutra series in 1968]

Zen Mountain Center

This sutra titled Saddharma-pundarika-sutra was supposed to be told by Buddha, but actually this sutra appeared maybe after two or three hundred years after Buddha passed away. So historically we cannot say Buddha spoke this sutra. If you ask if all the sutras were spoken by Buddha, the answer may be that only parts of them were spoken by him. And they will not be exactly as he said them. Even the Hinayana sutras were not handed down by Buddha's disciples exactly as he told them. Since even the Hinayana sutras were not told by Buddha, the Mahayana sutras could not have been told by him.

But some aspects of Buddha developed after the historical Buddha passed away. The historical Buddha is not the only Buddha. He is the so-called Nirmanakaya Buddha. We also have the Sambhogakaya Buddha and Dharmakaya Buddha. So Buddha was understood more and more as a perfect one. When Buddha was still alive, this point was not so important because Buddha himself was their friend and teacher and even god. He was a superhuman being even when he was alive. He was their teacher or master, so there was no need for them to have some superhuman being like a god. But after he passed away, because his character was so great, his disciples adored him as a superhuman being. This idea of a superhuman being is a very important element for promoting the understanding of Buddha as the Perfect One.

This sutra was not told by the Nirmanakaya or historical Buddha, but by the Sambhogakaya Buddha. According to this sutra, it was told a long, long time before Buddha. And Buddha, knowing that there was this kind of sutra before him, talked about the sutra which had been told by the Sambhogakaya Buddha. The sutra was attributed to Shakyamuni Buddha, but he told this sutra the way Vairochana Buddha told it a long, long time before.

So it is necessary for us to know first of all what the Nirmanakaya Buddha, the Sambhogakaya Buddha, and the Dharmakaya Buddha are, and how those aspects or understandings of Buddha developed from the historical Buddha. Without this understanding, this sutra does not mean much. It is just a fable, like a fairy tale which is very interesting, but doesn't have much to do with our life. Accordingly, I have to explain the three aspects of Buddha and how the Buddhism which was told by the Nirmanakaya Buddha developed into the Mahayana Buddhism which was told by the Sambhogakaya Buddha.

This may be a difficult thing for you to understand. Do you know of the Nirmanakaya Buddha, Sambhogakaya Buddha, and Dharmakaya Buddha? The Nirmanakaya Buddha is the historical Buddha. But the historical Buddha has two elements. One is a human being, and the other is a superhuman being. These are the two elements of the historical Buddha. Historically, such a character exists. As you know, Buddha was not God Himself, but was a human being. But for his followers, he was a kind of Perfect One. He attained enlightenment and reached to the bottom of our human nature. He was enlightened in human nature, which is universal, true nature. His human nature is universal to every one and every being. And he subdued all the emotions and the thinking mind. He conquered all of this, and all of the world, and became a World Honored One. He had this confidence when he attained enlightenment, and his followers listened to him as to a teacher who is also the Perfect One.

So the historical Buddha has two elements. The vital element for the idea of Buddha was this superhuman element. If he was just a historical character, or one of the great sages, then Buddhism could not have survived for such a long time. The reason Buddhism could survive for such a long time is this element of superhuman being in the historical Buddha.

This idea of Buddha as a superhuman being was supported by his teaching. One of the most important teachings of Buddha is the teaching of cause and effect, the teaching of causality. If you do something good, naturally you have some good effect. So his disciples wondered how he could have acquired such a lofty character, such a good character. Buddha told them that if you do something good, you will have a good result. If you practice hard, you will acquire good character. Since his character was incredibly high, his former practice must have been an incredibly hard, long one. So, since their adoration for Buddha extended limitlessly, his practice before he attained enlightenment, or Buddhahood, became limitless. It follows that, if Buddha is a limitlessly lofty person, the time he practiced his way must also have been limitlessly long. In this way, the historical Buddha became more and more something like Absolute Being.

It is the same with us. We appeared in this world, but we appeared in this world with a limitless background. We do not appear all of a sudden from nothing. There must be something before we appear in this world. And there must be something before Buddha also. That he was so great means that he had a great practice. This point is very important for the development of the idea of Buddha.

So he was described in various ways as a superhuman being. He had eighteen characteristics and virtues which are completely different from those of a usual person, and he also had the thirty-two physical marks. They say this is just a "big adjective" for the Buddha. That may be so, but there is some reason why they applied such a "big adjective" to the Buddha, to the extent that these kinds of things were even described in the Agamas, which belong to Hinayana Buddhism. This kind of Mahayanistic idea of Buddha is already included in the Hinayana. So it is difficult to say which is the Mahayana teaching and which is the Hinayana teaching, actually. If you read them closely, even Hinayana sutras have a Mahayanistic description of Buddha.

But actually, he was a human being. When he was 80 years old, he passed away. At this point he was not a supernatural or superhuman being anymore. But how should we understand his death as a superhuman being? If he were a superhuman being, there would not be any need to enter Nirvana. Whether to die or to remain alive would have been his choice. For an ordinary person, it is not possible to have this kind of choice. They say that he took Nirvana because he had completely finished giving people a chance to attain enlightenment. He gave a full teaching for helping people to attain enlightenment, so there was no need for him to live any more. That is why he entered Nirvana. They understood his death in this way.

We usual people appear in this world, according to Buddhism, because of karma, and we die because of karma. But Buddha appeared in this world with a vow, the Mahayana vow. The first of the four vows we recite is to "save all human beings." He appeared in this world with this vow instead of karma. Karma and vow are actually the same thing, perhaps, but our attitude changes when our understanding changes. Karma changes into a vow. Instead of living by karma, we live with the vow to help people who live in karma. That is Buddha's teaching. This kind of teaching is supported by what Buddha taught when he was alive, you see? So for them, this is not just a story-this is the actual story we see through the example of the Buddha. In this way, Buddhism survived for a long time.

This kind of Buddha, who made a vow to save people, starting from his training as a bodhi sattva, and who appeared in this world as a bud dha, is called the "incarnated body" or Nirmanakaya Buddha. So far, all of this kind of teaching is called Hinayana Buddhism. But if you look closely at those teachings, there is already the Mahayanistic understanding of the teaching. I said just now "incarnated body." If there is an incarnated body, there must be an "essential body," the mother of the incarnated body. When our understanding reaches this point, the more profound teaching will be understood as Mahayana teaching.

Student A: You said that there is some reason why people should apply a "big adjective" to the Buddha. What's the reason?

Suzuki-roshi: Because when Buddhism was the teaching between Buddha and his followers, there was already a kind of poetry [?]. For us, who actual ly do not know who Buddha is, he is just a historical character. But for his disciples, he was a greater than historical character. That was the reason.

Q: But should we believe it because they were romantic? It sounds very superstitious to me, Roshi. You know, flowery and full of things that are not so real.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, maybe that is your understanding. [Laughter.] Which is realistic? I don't know. You have to think more. We are naturally pretty romantic beings, you know. So perhaps we are too romantic and too emotional. That we don't want to be so romantic and emotional and want to be more realis tic, is our desire, but we have romantic and emo tional being. That is very true. So I don't argue about whether we are romantic or realistic. But the purpose of religion is to solve this kind of problem.

Q: By giving in to it?

Suzuki-roshi: No, by knowing that. That is wisdom. [The meaning of next 3 sentences was unclear to me, so I left them unedited--B.F.] You understand if I explain Sambhogakaya Buddha and Dharmakaya Buddha but so far, how Buddhism developed, a kind of history. And as a true teaching. If we want to treat him as a historical character, it is necessary for us to understand what a historical character is. A historical character has a deeper background. There is no character which just appears without any background. So a more realistic understanding is possible if we understand the background of the Nirmanakaya Buddha.

[Meaning of next sentence unclear--B.F.] So if we say this is just the Nirmanakaya Buddha, that means, in one sense, "superficial," because this is Nirmanakaya Buddha. I'm not talking about the Mahayana Sambhogakaya Buddha or Nirmanakaya Buddha.

Q: In the meal chant it says "numerous Nirmanakaya buddhas." Is there more than one?

Suzuki-roshi: There is more than one, you see? A kind of, perhaps, romantic idea created this kind of profound, more realistic Buddha. If you ignore one side of our life, you will not have a good understanding of human life. Nirmanakaya Buddha is the tentative form and color of the true Buddha. Then, "What is the true Buddha?" will be the next question.

[Tape turned here.]

Q: If someone makes a tape recording of a person's words and takes photographs of the person, there is still something left that he hasn't got. How is he going to describe and communicate to the other people this part that he hasn't been able to record? I think that perhaps about the only way to express it is in a symbolic way.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, very symbolic. But the scriptures include the good and bad parts of human nature. They are very realistic, actually, but the scale is so big that it includes various elements, good and bad, right and wrong. So the scale should be very great and extravagant, or else you cannot accept this kind of teaching which includes the good side and the bad side.

Q: What is the essence of the term "Vairochana"?

Suzuki-roshi: Vairochana means Dharmakaya Buddha. I'll explain it in the next lecture.

Q: Roshi, is there a vow of a bodhisattva not wishing to enter nirvana until all sentient beings have entered nirvana?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. "Until all sentient beings enter Nirvana, I will not enter Nirvana." Some bodhisattvas take this kind of vow. If you take that vow, at that time, you are Buddha himself.

Q: In what way, Roshi, was it like that when Shakyamuni Buddha entered nirvana?

Suzuki-roshi: Shakyamuni Buddha entered Nirvana. Finishing his task, he became a Perfect Supreme Buddha, which is more than a Nirmanakaya Buddha. Those questions are very important. They will be the key to understanding Mahayana Buddhism. So to give an answer to your questions means to give you a chance to better understand Mahayana Buddhism.

In the first chapter, in which the scale of this Lotus Sutra is described, you will find many people who described Buddha's way, such as Devadatta, who tried to kill Buddha, or his wife and son as a nun and priest. And there is much spoken of mountains and trees and flowers. This way of describing it is very poetic, but it actually points out many elements of Mahayana Buddhism, all the problems we have, all the furniture or ornaments of this sutra.

Q: When we read this sutra, are we reading about the historical Buddha and his times, even when we read about the thirty-two marks, or are we reading about our own mind right now, is it all about existence right now?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. You know, when we say thirty-two marks, you understand that he had beautiful blue eyes, beautiful hair, very crinkled feet, good feet, or things like that, but it also describes how he acquired these kinds of marks. If you read that part, it says it is not at all easy to be a Buddha. That is the teaching. We are not just describing something good. And Buddha's teaching is very strict. Even though they are describing his teaching in a fancy way, it is actually very simple and very strict. In one way, you can describe his teaching, if you understand it, as very simple and very fancy, including many things good and bad. So to exist in this way, like a lotus in muddy water, is not so easy. But without this kind of strict, profound, and rich understanding of life, we cannot be disciples of Buddha.

Do I have ...?

Student: No, that's it.

-----

Formatted 8/28/00.

[Transcript checked and edited by Brian Fikes.

Date established from text of next lecture.

No transcript for Lectures 6, 9, 11, 12.]

13 - Lotus Sutra Lecture, #1

Monday, October 21, 1968

Lotus Sutra Lecture, #1
Zen Mountain Center

[The Lotus Sutra] ... which was told by a historical Buddha. But some people may be disappointed who believe in historical Buddha. This is not a characteristic of any religion except Buddhism. Only Buddhism went through a long history before having a complete understanding of the historical Buddha. It took a pretty long time for us to understand who he was.

At first his disciples were attached to his character, or to what he said and did. So his teaching became more and more static and solid. His teaching was transmitted by so-called Hinayana Buddhists, or Sravakas, because they were the disciples, or followers, who tried to preserve his teaching by memory and discussion or meetings. No one is sure when this kind of meeting was held, but it is said that seventy-five years after his death they had a meeting where they chose various good disciples to compile his teaching.

When they discussed the precepts, Upali was the head of the group, and he recited what Buddha had said. When the Sutras were discussed, Ananda, who was Buddha's jisha, discussed what Buddha said. In that way, they set up some teaching: "This is what Buddha told us, and these are the precepts Buddha set up." Naturally, they became rigidly attached to the teaching, and, of course, those who studied this kind of teaching had a special position among Buddhists. Buddha's disciples were classified in four groups: laymen, laywomen, nuns, and priests. And the distinction between laymen and laywomen and priests and nuns became more and more strict. Buddhism at that time already had become a religion of priests, not ordinary people or laymen.

But when the meeting was held in the big cave, there were many people who did not join it. And there were many good disciples and followers among the people who did not join the meeting. Those people naturally got together and formed a group. That is the origin of the Mahayana School. So Buddha's followers divided themselves into Thera vada or Joza-bu [or Sthavira] and the common followers, called Daishu-bu in Japanese [or Mahasamghika]. Daishu means "assembly," a group of people or followers. Among them were many good teachers. One century after Buddha passed away, this group established an understanding of Buddha and his teaching. At that time the difference between the Jozabu and the Daishubu was not so great. But later, after Mahayana Buddhism was established, the other group acknowledged the more traditional and more fundamental teaching of Buddha. That is actually Mahayana Buddhism.

I started this kind of long lecture to explain who spoke this Lo tus Sutra. This sutra was supposed to have been spoken by the historical Buddha, but actually, what was recorded here is the Sambogakaya Buddha, not the historical Buddha. Because this sutra was told by the Sambogakaya Buddha instead of the historical Buddha, it is valuable.

Last night we had a very interesting lecture and discussion, and I was very interested in your questions and the lecture. How Buddha would feel about the idea of the pratyeka-yana or shravaka-yana is a very interesting question, I think. In my last lecture we explained what the Nirmanakaya Buddha is, and this morning I want to explain the Sambogakaya Buddha, the one who is actually telling this Lotus Sutra.

The reason I was so interested in the question of how Buddha may have felt about it was because Shakyamuni Buddha, as I told you in the last lecture, has two elements: Buddha as a human being, and Buddha as a superhuman being. The idea of the superhuman nature of Buddha is the result of a more emotional attachment to his character and teaching, which the Sravakas or Hinayana Buddhists had. This Shakyamuni Buddha who has two natures or two elements, the historical Buddha or the Buddha who incarnated to save others, and the more idealized Buddha, who is called the Nirmanakaya Buddha. But the Nirmanakaya Buddha is already not Buddha himself. If you think more about it, the historical Buddha is not Buddha himself. The historical Buddha became Buddha because he was enlightened in his true nature. That is why he became a Buddha. So without being enlightened in his true nature, the historical Buddha is not Buddha.

Here we already have a background for the historical Buddha. And even though that background was idealized so much as to reach the Nirmanakaya Buddha, there is also the incarnated Buddha. In other words, he changed, starting from a Bodhisattva, and became Buddha. So he is not true Buddha; he is always changing. "Who is changing?" is the next thing we should think about when we really want to know who Buddha was. To have, not just an emotional or romantic observation of Buddha, but also to more sincerely and deeply want to accept him as our teacher, it is necessary for us to know why he is Buddha.

If we are to get to this point, we have to have some idea beyond the incarnated Buddha, or Shakyamuni Buddha, or the Nirmanakaya Buddha. That Buddha is the Sambogakaya Buddha. The Sambogakaya Buddha incarnated into the Nirmanakaya Buddha. So the Sambogakaya Buddha is the Perfect One, and truth itself. When he is seen by people as truth, he may be a teacher. Even plants and animals, mountains or rivers, can also be our teacher when we have eyes to see this. So when the historical Buddha has this kind of background, when he is elevated to this stage, he will be accepted as our teacher in the true sense. Not just in an emotional way, but we can accept him wholeheartedly as our teacher, because he is the one who is enlightened in the eternal truth, who has the strong background of the truth. And he is the one who taught us, who introduced this kind of truth to us. That is why he became Buddha.

He was enlightened in it, and he is the one who teaches us the truth he found out. Without this kind of background, Buddha could not have been remembered by human beings for such a long time. After Buddha was acknowledged as truth itself, then as long as truth exists and as long as we care for truth, we can remain as Buddhists. This Buddha is called the Sambogakaya Buddha.

The Sambogakaya Buddha is not the Buddha who will, or will not, attain enlightenment. He is the truth itself. But people may say the Sambogakaya Buddha is, at the same time, the Nirmanakaya Buddha. People see the truth in many ways, but the truth is always the same. Do you understand? If we understand his background in this way, that understanding is also the Dharmakaya Buddha, truth itself. For the Dharmakaya Buddha there is no need to attain enlightenment. He is already enlightened. From the beginningless beginning to the endless end, he is always enlightened. Only the Nirmanakaya Buddha attains enlightenment and becomes Buddha.

So for Buddha, after he attained enlightenment, to save others, or for others to help themselves, to be enlightened in himself or to cause other people to become enlightened, was the same thing. To help others and to help himself was the same thing.

To be enlightened does not mean to be aware of it. Do you understand? To be aware of it would be for him to observe himself objectively. When he attained enlightenment, that was being aware of himself. But to enlighten himself means to have confidence in himself, to accept himself as he is, to accept "that I am here". And, in this way, when you do not care for anything, you know that "I am here" already. That is the most important point, to stand on your own two feet before you observe yourself objectively. "Who am I, and what am I thinking? What kind of experience did I have? What kind of enlightenment did I have yesterday?" That is not true realization of oneself. To realize oneself is deeper than that kind of superficial observation of oneself. Before we objectively observe ourselves, we should be one with ourselves.

After Buddha discovered his true nature and knew exactly who he was, he attained enlightenment and became the Sambogakaya Buddha. He became truth itself, one with himself and one with the whole universe. And he did not care for anything. He was completely satisfied with himself. And, when he became one with himself and with everything else, whatever he saw, everything had the same nature as he had. Just as he existed under the Bodhi tree as an enlightened one, as a perfect one, so everything existed in the same way. That is why Buddha said, "It is wonderful to see everything has Buddha Nature." Just as he is, so every thing is Buddha, we say. But when we say this in its true sense, it means "I am Buddha."

Only when we stand on our own two legs can we help others. Before this, you are observing yourself, thinking, "Who am I? Have I attained enlightenment or not? Am I able to help others?" and you cannot help others. When you become just you yourself, without comparing yourself to others: "I am I. I am here. When you have difficulty, I am with you, and I can manage myself pretty well. If you like, I can help you," that is Buddha.

This kind of Buddha is the Buddha before we attain enlightenment. Without this confidence, you cannot even practice zazen. How can you practice zazen when you doubt, or when you are observing yourself objectively without having any subjectivity? How can you practice zazen? Only when you accept yourself, and when you really know you exist here. You cannot escape from yourself. This is the ultimate fact, that "I am here."

This is very true. Don't you think so? But still you doubt, and still you make a separation from yourself and observe your self from the outside: "Who am I? What am I doing?" Zazen practice is not this kind of practice. Someone else is practicing zazen, not "you." "You" should practice zazen. That is shikantaza. That is the Sambhogakaya Buddha.

Buddha's teaching is not the written teaching or something told by the historical Buddha. When the Sambhogakaya Buddha, the true Buddha told it, it was Buddha's teaching-very much so. But when we read, we are trying to figure out what he told us, what was the true teaching, and what was the historical Buddha, Shakyamuni Buddha. We are, in other words, deeply attached to someone else, forgetting all about the ultimate fact that we are here. As long as we try to understand the real Buddha in this way, we cannot understand who he was. Anyway, to help others and to help ourselves is the same thing. To realize myself and to make others realize the truth is the same thing.

So the true Buddha is the Sambhogakaya Buddha, and when the Sambhogakaya Buddha does some activity, or is observed by someone, he may be the Nirmanakaya Buddha. Before the Nirmanakaya Buddha, there must be a Sambhogakaya Buddha. And before a Bodhisattva appears to save others, there must be a Sambhogakaya Buddha as the strong background of the Bodhisattva. So every Bodhisattva and Buddha, and their activity of helping others, comes from this source, from this origin of the Sambhogakaya Buddha. And the Sambhogakaya Buddha is truth itself. So we have Dharmakaya Buddha, Sambhogakaya Buddha, and Nirmanakaya Buddha.

When we understand the Lotus Sutra as the sutra which was spoken by the Sambhogakaya Buddha, or when we understand that, "I am now reading the Lotus Sutra," then the Lotus Sutra makes sense to us. If we lose this point, we will be turned by the Lotus Sutra. If we realize this point, we will turn it. I said, "I am reading," but actually, I meant, "I am telling the Lotus Sutra." So the Sixth Patriarch said, "When we are in delusion, the Lotus Sutra will turn us, and people may be turned by the Lotus Sutra. But when our mind is clear, we will turn the Lotus Sutra, we will speak the Lotus Sutra instead of Buddha." So, to study the Lotus Sutra and to listen to it are not two different things. To read it and to talk about [tell?] it are the same thing. If there are various materials to talk about, then we can speak the Lotus Sutra.

I have come to the conclusion already, but let us think more calmly and understand clearly what we have been studying in these two lectures. There are several things I want to point out. One is that when we read Buddhist scriptures, it is necessary for us to know at what kind of historical stage each sutra was told-to know, in other words, who spoke the scripture.

For instance, when Westerners started to study Buddhist scriptures, they thought they were a kind of myth. That may be so, a kind of myth, nothing but a myth. If someone studies a scripture literally, without knowing what kind of background the scripture has, and if someone has compiled the scripture in a very emotional way, the description will be very mysterious. So we should know what kind of people described Buddha in this way, and whether this sutra is based on Mahayana or Hinayana teaching. I am not comparing, and I am not saying which is better. But we should know with what feeling, and what kind of attitude, this scripture was presented, or else we will not understand what it is.

The same is true of the way you treat things and people. Without knowing who a person is, we cannot help him; without knowing what things are, we cannot treat them properly. When you know who made this tea bowl and what kind of history this tea bowl has, then you can treat the tea bowl properly. If you handle it without knowing who made it and what kind of tradition it has, it may be just a bowl; it doesn't make any sense.

So it is necessary to know how this tea bowl appeared here, in front of me. And at the same time, it is necessary for you to know whether this tea bowl is suitable for this season or not. Even though it is a very traditional and valuable one, a summer tea bowl cannot be used in winter. So you should know, at the same time, whether this is suitable for this season and suitable for the guest. And you should choose the tea bowl accordingly.

So we should arrange the teaching this way, and, according to the time and occasion, you should choose from the various teachings. But that is not enough. You should also know the history, or tradition, of each teaching. Then you can use the teaching in its true sense.

This way of doing things is, in other words, the four vows. This kind of effort will be continued forever. I am not forcing you to follow our Japanese way at all, but you should know how Buddhism was extended from Buddha to us. This is a very important point. The other point is to understand whether this kind of teaching will be effective enough to use right now, like a tea bowl. To arrange the teachings this way [moves hand horizontally] is not good; to arrange the teachings this way [moves hand vertically] is not good enough either. When you arrange the teachings this way [motions vertically], and choose one of them, and when you arrange the teachings this way [motions horizontally], the historical or traditional way, and understand the characteristic nature of various teachings, then you will find out what kind of teaching you should apply. That is why I am telling you what kind of nature this sutra has and who spoke this scripture.

The point is not whether this Lotus Sutra was told by the historical Buddha, or by some other person. As long as you attach to the historical Buddha too much, you cannot understand Buddhism. Buddha was great because he understood things in this way. How do we know Buddha had this kind of attitude towards things? Even though we do not have very much historical material, we do have quite a bit. We can study Hinayana Buddhism and pre-Buddhistic material and ask how pre-Buddhistic thought became Hinayana teaching.

How did it? It is impossible for pre-Buddhistic teaching to be Hinayana teaching, so what was the bridge? The bridge was Buddha; Buddha made the bridge. When we realize this point, we see that the Hinayana understanding was not perfect enough. The Hinayana Buddhists made Buddha a pre-Buddhistic person. He was pushed backwards to a pre-Buddhistic character.

So Mahayana students found that the Hinayana scriptures cannot be recognized as the main current of Buddhist thought. They are not the main current. This kind of mistake always happens. We do not like sectarianism because that is Hinayanistic. I always say that sectarianism is like having coffee in a coffee shop when you are going to San Francisco. You know, when you have a cup of coffee on the freeway, that is very good. But you shouldn't stay there. You should go on to San Francisco.

Emotionally, we like coffee shops and big banana splits. But that is Hinayana, you know. Even though it is good, we should continue on our trip. This is the Mahayana way-on, and on, and on. Usually people stopped at the coffee shop for many, many days-one or two weeks. But we cannot stay that long, because the coffee shop will not stay open that long. If it is not the main current, it will die, eventually, and only the main current will continue. So we don't have time to stay at the coffee shop very long. Once in a while, when we become sleepy, we must have some coffee. That is our way. With this attitude we should continue our trip. And if we want to continue our trip, the four vows are necessary. At any rate, we should continue our trip as long as our car goes. This is our attitude and our practice.

-----

Formatted 8/28/00.

14 - Fourth Lecture of Training Session at Tassajara

Tuesday, October 22, 1968

Fourth Lecture of Training Session at Tassajara
Tassajara

[This may be the end of another lecture. -WKR, 8/28/00]

... that is how, actually, we exist here. We exist moment after moment, as ... taking form and color of great Sambogakaya Buddha. That is true. [Chuckle.] Don't you think so? If I say Sambogakaya Buddha, you know, by technical term ... because of technical ... because you don't know, what does it mean, definition of Sambogakaya Buddha, it makes you, more difficult maybe. But we exist here; and we are not permanent being. Only in this moment we exist as like this. But next moment I will change to ... tomorrow I will not be the same person. This is rue. Next moment I shall be future Buddha. Yesterday I was past Buddha. In this way there is many and many Buddhas. And you will be ... another Buddha. In this way, there are many Buddhas, but Source of ... or ... we are incarnated body, with some certain color and form and character.

So there must be source of Shakyamuni Buddha, who is called, Nirmanakaya Buddha. But when he realize this point, he accept himself as Nirmanakaya Buddha, as Sambogakaya Buddha, as Darmakaya Buddha. When we understand ourselves in this way, you know, what will be the way ... why we live in this world is to try to continuously try to express Buddha Nature, moment after moment. And that is the effort we should make, instead of being caught by some certain color or form. But even so (laughing), we should not ignore ... we should make our best effort in each moment. So that is a kind of attachment. But this attachment is, at the same time, detachment, because next moment you should make best effort (chuckling). So, it means detachment to the last being. In this way, moment after moment, we exist. So this kind of understanding will be expressed by our technical term of Nirmanakaya Buddha, Sambogakaya Buddha, and Dharmakaya Buddha.

Student A (Dan): Can all sentient beings, then, be considered Nirmanakaya Buddha?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. All sentient beings are Nirmanakaya Buddha. But (laughing) you know, whether or not they realize it, it is actually so, but they do not accept themselves as a Nirmanakaya Buddha. For them, they are not. But for us who understand ourselves and others, they are ... all of them are Nirmanakaya Buddha and Sambogakaya Buddha based on Sambogakaya Buddha and Dharmakaya Buddha.

[Is text missing? That is, where is Dan's second question?]

Dan: Some people live by karma, you said, and some people live by vows.

Suzuki-roshi: By vows, yeah, for people who do not understand this truth, they live their life, life is karmic life. Those who know this point, our life is not karmic life. The karma is ... karmic life is another version of Buddhist life.

Student: Can you explain "triple world"?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh ... triple world: past, present, and future.

Student: Can you explain "bringing people from this world"?

Suzuki-roshi: There is no separate past, present, and future. Past, present, and future exist in present. Past exists in this present moment ... future also. Do you understand? If you do something good, your future is, you know, bound to be good. That you are good means your past life was good.

Student: What do you mean by making your best effort on each moment?

Suzuki-roshi: I don't mean to sacrifice this moment for the future. I don't mean, you know, that ... to be bound by past life, and try to escape from, is not ... this kind of effort will be the effort you make, usually. But there is more important point in your effort. What is that? To stand on your feet (laughing) is the most important thing. You know, to sacrifice this moment for your future, for your ideal, even, means that you are not sitting, standing on your feet. So, the most important things is to accept yourself, you know, to have subjectivity on each moment. Or to accept yourself: Don't complain. Don't make any complaint and accept things as it is, and satisfy yourself with what you have right now. And you should think, "this is the only reality, only Buddha, you know; you can see, you can experience, you can have, you can worship." And then, you know, if you want to do something, as a ... and at that time you are Nirmanakaya Buddha, and Sambogakaya Buddha, and Dharmakaya Buddha.

-----

Formatted 8/28/00.

1968 november (1)

1 - Shosan Ceremony

Monday, November 11, 1968

Shosan Ceremony
Tassajara

[If you want to know what buddha-nature is][1] ... which is not possible to know what it is-but if you want to realize it, you should wait until it comes to you. If you know-if you want to talk about [that] which is not possible to talk about, present some words to me.

Claude Dalenberg: [2] Docho-roshi: Incessant change and evanescence everywhere. Life is so short. What is the most important-most important thing to do?

Suzuki-roshi: To continue everyday practice forever.

Claude: Thank you.

Suzuki-roshi: Good point.

Ed Brown: Docho-roshi, thank you very much.

Suzuki-roshi: Thank you very much.

Jim Norton: Docho-roshi, if I look at the moon, on one hand I may think, "This is the moon." And on the other hand I may think, "This is my own eye." Is this Nirmanakaya and Sambhogakaya?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, it is. The moon-you see by your eyes, and your eyes is the-are not different, actually. So that is Nirmanakaya Buddha.

Jim: Thank you very much.

Jeff Williamson: Docho-roshi, recently in my zazen I have been putting forth every bit of effort that I can find. And before too long-before too long that I have been sitting there, I think that I should slow down, that I am trying too hard to have good practice. And then I think, "No, I am not trying too hard. I am putting forth my very best effort." And I really do not understand what you mean when you say, "Put forth your very best effort, but be careful that you do not try too hard." I do not know where to draw a line. I don't know when I'm doing one thing and when I'm doing the other. Could you please say something that would help me now?

Suzuki-roshi: "Try your best effort" means not to lose your way. Always keep up with your practice. That is what I mean. Of course, zazen practice is difficult because we should reject the two extreme. While you are practicing, it-or while you are keep up with your practice-everyday practice, you will find out how to reject the two extreme. So when you become frustrated, when you have problem, when you are discouraged, at that time you should try your best effort to resume your own practice. That is what I mean.

Jeff W.: Thank you very much.

Jeff Sherman: Docho-roshi, very often I feel your compassion. I don't understand emptiness. I was wondering where-where compassion is in emptiness, or-

Suzuki-roshi: Compassion-

Jeff S.: -what is emptiness.

Suzuki-roshi: -compassion will be directed, will be on always some phenomenal world, which is-which cause our attachment. Originally when-originally everything is empty. That is how our compassion arise.

So compassion and somethingness and emptiness is the same-has same quality. When we understand com- [partial word]-emptiness, we become compassionate on something which exist in term of material or spiritual. So emptiness is not different from compassion. It is source of compassion.

Jeff S.: I'm not sure I understand, but I don't know-don't know what to say about my not understanding. I can't ask another question.

Suzuki-roshi: Where there is something, there should be compassion. Compassion should be always on every being [?], like everything arise from emptiness.

Jeff S.: Thank you very much.

Doug Bradle: Docho-roshi, there you sit resolute in your serenity, and here am I miserable and quivering in my confusion. And as I try to think of a question for you, I just became hopelessly tangled up in my own thoughts. And then, just now I thought, well, you probably had to go through the same thing at one time too. And you probably had to try and think of a question for your master. And what did you do? Did you become hopelessly confused like me, or did you find some way out?

Suzuki-roshi: As you have someone to ask about, you-you don't know-you say you don't know what to do. If there is no one to ask you--ask about the confusion, then what is the confusion? The confusion itself is already the meaning of life, your own experience which you have-get through. So to ask question, to present question, is a kind of communication-mutual understanding. It means that-to extend your experience. So you should accept the confusion as your experience of life. To be in confusion means to be in-to be amid of the boundless mercy of the Buddha. We should accept in that way. And we should lead our life in this way.

Doug: Thank you very much.

Chris Flynn: Docho-roshi, some Zen masters, both contemporary and historical, have put a great deal of emphasis on reaching kensho.[3] They-they put emphasis on method and posture, but here at Tassajara and Soko-ji we don't do that.

Suzuki-roshi: Then what will you do-will you do, here? Here-it is necessary to have confidence to keep up with everyday activity which is going here. If it is difficult to do everything perfectly, then choose something like zazen practice or like sutra reciting, like study-sutra study. Choose one or two out of the many activities, and try to-try to be concentrated on the activity you have chosen, and try to do it satisfactorily.

Chris: Thank you very much.

Rick Norton: Docho-roshi, how may this Lotus Sutra be used to gain salvation?

Suzuki-roshi: We don't know how [it] may. Still the salvation is going. It may go forever.

Rick: Thank you very much.

Elias: Docho-roshi, there are many questions about how hard and how long. The stream outside Tassajara has been flowing a long time. I wish to ask it now how long and how hard must it flow? Listen.

Suzuki-roshi: If you notice that point, that is Buddha's-that is Buddha's sermon.

Elias: Thank you very much.

Arnold Silberman: Docho-roshi. [One sound of clapper, then silence for a few moments.] Thank you very much.

David Chadwick: Docho-roshi, I am so grateful to you and Tassajara and Zen Center that I'd like to study Zen. What should I do first?

Suzuki-roshi: You should do something in right time in the right way. Try to keep up with our practice.

David: Thank you very much.

Pat Herreshoff: Docho-roshi, I do not understand the meaning of my life. We have been given to understand that meaning is eternal. Is it possible for me to relate eternal meaning to this transient body?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes it is possible, and eternal meaning is actually in your everyday life. So there is no need to figure out what is the meaning of life-especially for you. I-I say what you are doing is very good, so don't try to figure out the meaning of your life. If you-to me your life is meaningful, but I don't know right now [if] it is meaningful for you or not. But whether-whatever-however, your life is meaningful, very meaningful, and that you are struggling with it is also meaningful. Don't lose another aspect of your life. Don't stick to one aspect only.

Pat: Thank you very much.

Pat Lang: Docho-roshi, could you explain what it means to be a serious Zen student?

Suzuki-roshi: Serious? Excuse me-serious Zen-

Pat L.: Serious student of Zen Buddhism.

Suzuki-roshi: Serious student Zen Buddhism. Don't try to be serious [laughter, laughs]. Just keep up with our practice. Don't, you know, try to get up earlier than other people [laughs, laughter]. Stay in bed. Okay?

Pat L.: Okay. [Laughter.] Thank you very much.

Emmy Buckley: Docho-roshi, I carry a very weak light to help me find my way through the darkness that I feel breathing all around me. I go very slowly. And I am very deeply grateful for your patience and understanding you have in helping me. Thank you very much.

Suzuki-roshi: Go slowly as much as you can.

Francis Thompson: Docho-roshi, your kindness touches my heart.

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe because I am not so kind [laughs].

Francis: Thank you very much.

Evelyn Pepper: Docho-roshi, you say that we're all one. Then why are we-is everything so different?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Because it is different, they are all one. Do you understand [laughs, laughter]? If it is same, you know, it is not even one. We say "one" because they are different. If it is, you know, same from the beginning, it is- there is no need to say one. Okay?

Evelyn: Thank you very much.

Angie Runyon: Docho-roshi, I too want to know the meaning of human existence. The meaning of human existence?

Suzuki-roshi: Human existence? Yeah-human existence, you know, is- the characteristic of human existence is duality. We are dualistic being. That is our characteristic of life. So if you attach to one-on one side of our life, we will lose-we will be completely lost because we have double nature. So our understanding of life should be double structure.

Angie: Thank you very much.

Sally Block: Docho-roshi, you have told us that we are not alike at all, and also you tell us that we should develop consideration for each other. How can we develop a feeling for what goes on in other people's minds, or how they think, how they react, why they react, and how they live, so that we can develop consideration for them?

Suzuki-roshi: To be able to understand reality from various angle-even though it is not possible to understand things from various angle, we should reserve always some understanding for someone else and try to understand other's feelings, other's understanding. Other's understanding may not be always right: sometimes wrong, sometimes right. As you understand is sometime right and sometimes wrong. But without being caught by the idea of right or wrong, we should try to understand something which is something wrong as well as something which is right. This is-if you try to do it, this is very difficult. But the only way is to practice zazen-to be concentrated on your zazen practice, not-the way you practice zazen and the way you do something in your everyday life is not the same. Your everyday life will be good when your practice is good because your everyday life will be supported by your power of practice. So best way for us is to be concentrated on our zazen practice. This is, anyway, the most important point. Something everyday practice will be taken care of if you-if your everyday life is concentrated on your zazen practice.

Sally: Thank you very much.

Liz Wolf: Docho-roshi [one sound of clappers], I have many questions, and I can't choose between them. And so I just want to say that you are the only faith that is here for me, and I want to thank you.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. But choose, you know, something and be concentrated on something you have chosen. Choose some problem and try to be concentrated on that-

Liz: On that what?

Suzuki-roshi: -on that problem-on the problem you have chosen.

Liz: What if it seems insurmountable?

Suzuki-roshi: Choose something easier [laughter].

Liz: Thank you.

Mary Quagliata: Docho-roshi, I always forget what I am going to say at this ceremony because it is so formal, but I hope you had a good day today and we can practice together in a group.

Suzuki-roshi: [Silence. Sounds like Suzuki-roshi bows.]

Harriet Hiestand: Docho-roshi? You told us once that we are each our own teachers, and so every question I thought of for you I could answer. But I felt that I should ask them anyway. How can I trust my own answers?

Suzuki-roshi: Your own answers? Maybe you cannot completely trust any answer. Whether it is your answer or my answer, you cannot trust it completely. But when you ask me question, it is a kind of communication. To share the problem is the point of asking question.

Harriet: But I get very frustrated because you never answer. You just substitute words, and there's never-never an answer.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. To understand in that way is better, you know, not to rely on the answer so much. But to present some question, that is enough.

Harriet: Thank you very much.

Katherine Thanas: Docho-roshi, who are you?

Suzuki-roshi: Good question [laughs]. To whom you are asking [laughter]?

Katherine: To all of you.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? All of me [laughs]? You know, "all of me" is bad [?], you know. All of-are you really understand all of me, you know? All of me-what you see and what you do not see?

Katherine: I don't know that I understand it all. I feel there is much there.

Suzuki-roshi: I am here. But before I am here, you know, what exist here? Something you don't know existed [laughs]. I am, you know, someone who exist here who is speaking something. And I am also someone who-someone which does not appear in this way. Before I say something-before I exist here, something is here with all being. And I am both someone who has form and color, and someone who has no form and no color. And you are speaking to someone who has body and mind.

Katherine: Thank you very much.

Dan Welch: Docho-roshi, may we all understand our true home by the use of these words in the ceremony.

Suzuki-roshi: I couldn't follow it.

Dan: I hope-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Dan: -that we all come to understand our true home-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Dan: -by the use of these words in the ceremony.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Yeah. I hope so.

Dan: Thank you very much.

Niels Holm: Docho-roshi, will you please tell me why I judge myself and other as good and bad student?

Suzuki-roshi: I couldn't follow it.

Niels: Will you please tell me why I judge myself and others as good and bad students?

Suzuki-roshi: Judge or discriminate, you mean?

Niels: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: You are good student. There is no need to compare you to someone else. You have your own good quality which, you know, no one has. So you are independent. And when you become you yourself, you will be with all your friend. Okay?

Niels: Thank you very much. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

Jeff Broadbent: Docho-roshi, why do I feel hatred, repugnance, and disgust?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe because you want to solve everything, every problem in limited sense and by limited way-that is why. You should wait, you know. You should do one by one. Then there is no hatred or no bad feeling.

Jeff: How do you mean one by one?

Suzuki-roshi: One by one? Just to do something in time. To keep up with other's practice. That is the main point. And don't discriminate your work too much within your limited time and material or space. You should do your best. Whether it is good or bad, no one knows [laughs], you know, whether it is good or bad.

Jeff: Thank you very much.

E. L. Hazelwood: Docho-roshi, I have a question, but I can't see it. And so I can't grasp it. And so I don't know what it is. And so I don't know how to ask it.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. The basic problem is the same for everyone. Anyway as long as you are here, don't be too much concerned about yourself, or what you do, or what others do. Just observe Tassajara as one body, as one person who has every parts of body-hands, legs, head, ears, eyes. And let it work without it-not much mistake. If you try to practice our way-everyday practice our way with this idea, then there is salvation for each one of us.

E. L.: Thank you very much.

Dan Chesluk: Docho-roshi, why have you told us this morning to concentrate on one-on one activity?

Suzuki-roshi: What I mean is not so diff- [partial word]-complicated thing-you know. To do-try to get up, you know, before, you know, alarm [laughs], or, you know, try-try not to eat too much-that kind of thing is-anything which will-which you think you want to try.

Dan: I thought you meant that for a long period of time we should-we should concentrate on one thing.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah [laughs], that is something which you should do always for long period of time.

Dan: Concentrate on one thing? Pick one thing?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That is very good practice.

Dan: 'Cause for myself I tend not to do that, you know-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, maybe so.

Dan: -[2-4 words unclear].

Suzuki-roshi: So stick to one practice forever [laughs]. That is very good [laughter].

Dan: Thank you very much.

Jack Weller: Docho-roshi, I am troubled by your saying that you don't trust us.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah. I want to encourage you to, you know, stick to something, you know, not in term of good or bad, but anyway [laughs], you know. Like a water stick to [seeks], you know, lower place. That kind of-without that kind of spirit, I-we cannot trust anyone, you know, until we can see that kind of practice in some other person.

Jack: Then we can trust them, right?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah.

Jack: So we can trust you.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughing.] Ho!

Jack: But you cannot trust us.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, maybe. I am trying, you know, always to stick to something, not because this is good or bad, you know-whether it is good or bad. To stick to one thing-when you stick to one thing only, you know, it may be sometime understood as something good. Sometime it may be understood [as] something which is bad. But whether it is good or bad, it is out of question. If it is helpful, you know, for-to me and for others, we should stick to one practice.

Jack: Thank you very much.

Allan Winter: Docho-roshi, how can we make our marriage with Buddha more real?

Suzuki-roshi: Marriage?

Allan: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: More real [laughs, laughter]? That [is a] good question. Marriage is not so real [laughs, laughter]. I agree with you. So if you want to have real marriage, you should polish yourself, and you should try to relate yourself to someone else whether your friend is man or a woman. Your wife should be your lover in [on] one hand and should be your-someone who is nothing to do with you-someone who is quite independent from you. That is your wife. Wife is some-some human being which you don't know, which you can-some usual person which you do not-which is nothing to do with you. And at the same time, she will be your friend, or your best friend, and someone who you love most. Your wife has two side-ordinal [ordinary], just ordinal [ordinary] person and someone who you love. Okay?

Allan: Thank you very much.

Stan White: Docho-roshi, the only words I have this morning are not words.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. We are, you know, discussing which is not possible to discuss by words. So how actual words should go-this is how actual words should go. Words is-by words we should communicate something which is not possible to put-to limit by our words.

Stan: Thank you very much.

Craig Boyan: Docho-roshi, who is practicing harder now, me or the clock?

Suzuki-roshi: Which? Both. When you practice hard, clock practicing hard [laughing, laughter]. Clock will not practice anything [by itself?]. I think so.

Craig: Thank you very much.

Allan Rappaport: Docho-roshi, I am very afraid a lot of the time. I am afraid now. Can you help me?

Suzuki-roshi: Afraid of what? Some-something-afraid of something of which you cannot figure out, you mean?

Allan: I think I'm afraid of being hurt, and then lost.

Suzuki-roshi: Lost? No, that is not possible. You are here, you know, and there is no need to be afraid of-because, you know, to be a-because anyway you are changing. If you are afraid of being always changing, that is, you know-maybe that is why you are afraid. But if you are changing always, why don't you try to change for better? As long as you are making that effort, there's no need to be afraid of anything. Even a little bit, you know-even little bit change for the better will work.

Allan: Thank you very much.

Bill Shurtleff: Docho-roshi, the sound of the water in the stream seems to wash away all of the questions that I had. The questions still come, but they seem to flow away. Trying to hold a question and to give it a form keeps me from hearing your words this morning and from hearing the sound of the stream. It feels strange for me to be without a question, and so I just like to thank you for your wisdom, and for your kindness in being here with us today.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. People take [?], listen, and talk. In this way, everything is going. Like electric lamp, you know, the current is always going back and forth. It looks like very certain, but it is not, you know. Actually it is not as we see it. So the moment we appear, we vanish. We are-we still practice always. That is our life. That is everything-how everything exist, and that is how Sambhogakaya Buddha exist. So when we understand our life in that way, there is no problem at all.

Bill: Thank you very much.

Tim Buckley: [4] [Silence.]

Suzuki-roshi: [Silence.]

Butei,[5] the Emperor of Liang, asked Bodhidharma, "What is the first principle?"

Buddha [Bodhidharma][6] said, "Who is it in front of you?"

Buddha [Bodhidharma] said, "There is no holy person or common person."

And the Emperor said, "Who are you in front of me?"

Bodhidharma said, "I don't know."

Bodhidharma in his answer appeared to be someone who is just sitting without thinking, without doing anything, being with everything-without form, without color. He revealed himself in that way for the emperor. But emperor wanted to know someone who is wise, who is powerful, who is learned, who is very helpful. So this question and answer did not was not so successful.

We should know-we should understand ourselves in two ways: as some person and as someone which has no name, or no body, or no mind. To understand ourselves in this way is liberation from myself. And true understanding of ourselves when we say "things as it is," means that to understand ourselves from viewpoint of being and non-being. That is how we understand ourselves. That is how we should exist as a human being in this world, or else we will be lost. Right now, most people live-lead their life as someone who is known to each other, but we lose the another point. That is why this world is so busy and noisy.

When we understand our world in this way, with calmness of your mind-our mind, we will have compassionate mind for the people who is just involved in one-sided view. Our practice should be concentrated on this point by doing trivial, near-at-hand practice.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (1/25/01).

[1] Text in brackets is from original transcript. Not on tape.

[2] Names of students were identified in the original transcript.

[3] kensho: to see into one's original nature; to attain enlightenment.

[4] From original transcript. (Silence on tape.)

[5] Emperor Bukei (Liang Wudi, Bu, Wu) (502-550) founded the Liang

(Ryo) Dynasty in southern China. This exchange is found in Case 1 of The Blue Cliff Record and Case 2 of The Book of Serenity.

[6] Suzuki-roshi probably meant to say the Emperor, which is why he repeats the exchange and substitutes the Emperor for Bodhidharma.

1968 december (2)

1 - True Happiness and Renewal of Practice at Year's End

Saturday, December 21, 1968 [vergelijk dec. 1969]

True Happiness and Renewal of Practice at Year's End
San Francisco

Not edited yet

Everyone seeks for true happiness, but happiness cannot be true happiness if the happiness is not followed by perfect composure. The- usually happiness does not stay long. Happiness is mostly just very short time and it will be lost in next moment when you have it. So, sometimes we will think rather not to have it because after happiness usually followed by sorrow and this is, I think, everyone experiences it in our everyday life.

Buddha, when he escaped-can you hear me?-when he escaped from his castle, he felt this kind of-he had this kind of happiness in his luxurious life in the castle, he at last forsake all of those, this kind of life, so we say he started his religious trip because of evanescence, because he felt evanescence of life. That is why he started study of Buddhism. I think we have to think about this point more. I think everyone seeks for happiness, that is all right, but the point is what kind of-how to seek for happiness is the point. But whether our way, whether the happiness we seek for is something which we can...it is something which is possible to have it.

Surely there is-we have to seek his teaching more carefully. He taught us the Four Noble Truths and first of all he taught us this world is world of suffering. When we seek for suffering-happiness-to say this world is world of suffering is very, you know-you may be very much disappointed with your teacher. World of suffering. This world anyway is world of suffering, he says. And he continues. Why we suffer is this world is world of fantasy, everything changes. When everything changes we seek for some permanent thing, we want everything to be permanent. Especially when we have something good or when we see something beautiful or we want it to be always in that way. But actually everything changes. So that is why we suffer. So if we seek for happiness even though we seek for happiness it is not possible to have it because we are expecting something to be always constant when everything changes. So naturally we must have suffering. So far, according to this teaching, we are-there is no other way for us to live in the world of suffering-that is the only way to exist in this world.

Then it is not possible to obtain eternal happiness, or eternal composure of life. Though we have some way to have eternal composure of life or happiness of life, but first of all if we want to composure of life, we have to change our view, our way of observing things. To observe things as it is, we say, but to observe things as it is for usual sense and to observe things as it is in our way is not the same. This point is not truly realized by even Buddhists. Things as it is, way as it is. What is way as it is. Usually things as it is means to observe things as if something exists in that way, constantly, forever. We say-here in incense bowl. But this is already mistake. There is no such thing exists. This is always changing. This is bronze, but even so this is changing, and you sense in it always changing. In ten minutes there will be no more incense, but if it is very good incense you will think as if something exists-not forever-you may not think in that way, but at least you think this incense exists and fire exists in that way, but the fire is not exactly the same fire as you observe this fire. This is actually, you know-instead of combustion, it is not red-red fire as you-as you see it. It is constant repetition of combustion-like this-there is electricity, but that light is always-current back and forth, this way, and doesn't exist in that way, but we see there constantly electric light, like so. But that is not true. So we Buddhists call this kind of naive way of looking-observing things is aspect of being because we think everything exists in this way. Aspect of being. And when you understand everything changes and everything is changing, like electric light or fire, we call this kind of view, is view of non-being. No such thing exists, so non-being. And for Buddhists, for you maybe if you seek for happiness, if someone who has view of seeking for happiness, it means that he is seeking for something which is impossible and if you have the view of non-being you will not care for anything. If you accept things in that way, you will be very-your way of life is very empty. And you will not find out any meaning of life at all. And our way of observing things is based on view of being and non-being, both. And we know that view of being is too naive, and view of non-being is too-logical. Or too critical. Or view of-true view of life should be both. View of being and view of non-being. This is our way.

But view of being and view of non-being is not-is not possible to accept. We can accept one of the two, but we cannot accept two of those viewpoints. And here there is another problem for us. But when you face-when you face this second problem, you will be said to be Buddhist. And you will give up to rely on your intellectual understanding of teaching and you will start our practice-to accept this kind of paradox.

Recently I ask you and I want you to reflect on why you seek for-why you study Buddhism. Because I think this point is-if this point is not fully understood, it may be difficult-to put whole physical and spiritual power in our practice. Usually maybe in your practice without thinking about our life more deeply and you try to if you have problem you will try to solve it by means of practice or teaching, but if you really think about whether your view of life is right or wrong, whether you are trying to obtain something which is possible to obtain or you are doing-you are trying to accomplish something which is not possible to accomplish. Then you will not be sincere enough to practice our way because you are always fascinated by some teaching or chanting. We don't know-what we study in intellectual way is very shallow, but what we actually experience is very deep.

When-after-when I came to America, I found very, you know-I found-special, some special food for me and I enjoyed it, I enjoyed it very much-that was potato. Potato was delicious to me, but I don't know if it is so for you or not. I don't know what kind of nourishment potato has, I haven't studied anything about potato, but I like it very much. The reason why I like it is-I don't know why-when I was in Japan, of course, I liked it, but I didn't think I liked potatoes so much!

But after I came to America, having very-various foods and I haven't not much chance to eat potatoes: maybe once a month or so. When I was invited for Thanksgiving, I had mashed potatoes-that was delicious. But usually I haven't mashed potatoes, or even baked potato. At Tassajara I told Ed I like potato [laughs]. Sometimes, as we have various food-various kinds of food, so Ed cannot give me always potato. So only once in a while I had potato.

As soon as I come back from Tassajara I go to the grocery store and buy three or four potatoes. And as it takes pretty long time to cook it, I cut it and fry it. My boy doesn't like it, but I like it. My wife doesn't like it much. So I cook it just for myself. Do you know why? Potato was-when I was young I-my hometown produced a lot of potatoes, so I was eating potatoes always when I was a boy. So that is why I like it. When I was eating I didn't like it so much because I had it almost not everyday, but four times or more a week.

This kind of experience characterized our character. I think you may not like zazen so much, but you think this is good, so you may practice it. But you may not realize how much progress you made in your zazen practice. Some may do, but most of you don't, I am afraid. But that is all right. This kind of experience which is not just reading or listening to lecture and something which you experience, both physically and spiritually, without thinking about it. Without trying to find out the meaning of it, beyond our intellectual understanding, to practice our way without any gaining idea. To practice our way is valuable and you will have real power of digesting things.

In Lotus Sutra, as you know, Chapter Three, Buddha told Shariputra:

You may not know what you have done before. You will not remember what you did in your former life or even in this life. You may not remember all of it, but," he said, "you have been practicing our way for so long time. That is why now-you have been practicing our way for so long time, that is why now you have attained enlightenment. I know that, but you may not know it-why you have attained enlightenment. I ask you why you came here so many times. I think you don't know why you came here, but there is some reason why you came here. You didn't come here just by curiosity. Why you came here is, I don't think possible to figure out. But there must be some reason.

This kind of reason-you practice your way is so-called-it-there is no other way to say so we say-your buddha-nature seeks for buddha. Buddha seek for buddha. This is very mystic way of putting it, but there is no other way to say it. So we say buddha-nature seeks buddha-nature.

We have various Buddhist philosophy, and we have a lot of teaching to study, but Buddhism is not actually philosophy or teaching. Buddhism is always within ourselves and always helping us. But we do not-when we are not-when we don't realize it, then that is so called it suffering. Or when we live in the realm of good or bad, right or wrong, we lose our meaning of life. Only when we do something we practice, with right understanding, whatever you do that is our practice. Because we are so intellectual being, it is necessary to-to be free from our reasoning or our intellect. That is necessary. And instead of being caught by intellectual mind, we should seek for something more or we have to rely on way things goes and the way we live without-without every reason-why we are practicing-Indian way or Chinese way or Japanese way-you may feel in that way. But actually there is no special way. Our way is not just for Japanese or Chinese or Indian people. This is for everyone. We sit in cross-legged position, but if you think just cross-legged position is just Zen, that is a big mistake.

If you want to practice our way, we should free our mind from intellectual or conscious activity in term of right or wrong, or good or bad. Whatever it is we should try it and we should have taste of it through direct experience. Not just feeling or thinking, but direct experience. That is zazen practice.

So many people here practicing our way. I feel a great responsibility as a teacher. If I am not here maybe you will not come here. If I am here you come here and spend all day in our practice. But if you misunderstand-if you have misunderstanding in our practice it will not work at all. It is quite natural for us to think some result or effect as long as you do something, but our practice is something different from that kind of activity. Just-we practice our way just to have ...

[Tape turned over. But nothing follows in transcript. Check SR-68-12-24 to see if it is the tail end of this lecture.-WKR]

-----

Formatted 8/28/00.

2 - The End of the Year

Sunday, December 29, 1968

The End of the Year

[1]

Next Tuesday we will have no lecture, so this may be-will be the last one for this-at the end of the year we clean up our house and we throw [out] old things which we do not use anymore. And we renew our equipment, even things in the-furniture we renew it. And after cleaning our room we-we put new, new _____ and which is distributed from temple like this. We take off old mats and put new ones, like this. This is-when in temple we have prayer for the-to control fire, this is what you call it _____ "taking care of fire," it says in Japanese.

And this is-in temple at end of the year we have ceremony to read Prajñāparamita Sutra-600 volumes of Prajñāparamita Sutra. But actually we cannot read 600 pages of sutra, so the priest conducting the ceremony read one-one volume of the 600 sutras. Then we have one volume, one of 600-[inaudible]-just to turn it instead of reading. And so the most important volume will be recited by the priest who is conducting, and we-and you receive this kind of prayer card from the temple. That is what we do.

And end of the year is the most busy days. We have to clean up our rooms, and if you have some debts you should pay. For someone to collect the money he lent, and for the most people it is time to pay the debt. And then we-after cleaning up everything, spiritual and physical, we decorate New Year's decoration so old times [?]. Those should be done before twelve o'clock. And after twelve o'clock there is no need for you to pay-pay back the money you owed, so the man who-wants to collect his money _____ even after twelve o'clock, if he had chosen [inaudible].

So usually it is pretty exciting week. This kind of custom still in Japan and each one of us, rather we enjoy this kind of activity. We understand each other-we fool ourselves in some way and enjoy the last day of the year. This idea is based on Buddhist way of understanding life. Moment after moment we should renew our life, we should not stick old idea of life, or way of life, we should renew it, our life day by day, especially at the end of the year. Especially at the end of the year we should completely renew our feeling and completely renew our car. If we stick to old ideas always, or if you have no chance to renew it, it is rather difficult to renew your way of life. Some encouragement is necessary if you always repeating same thing over and over again, then even though you have no feeling of sticking to old way of life, actually you are confined in old way of life. Some excitement or some occasion is necessary. For instance, we use this kind of stick. This is to renew your practice, if you become drowsy, if you don't receive a stick you will have chance to renew your _____ and in this way, you can live moment after moment. Actually-faithful-you will be faithful to your own life.

So, as it is we say, but actually when most people say "way as it is" is not at all way as it is. Without clearing up your mind and body, physically, you will not have chance to live on each moment. So the (end) for us is laziness. If you are always lazy and drowsy, spiritually and physically lazy, you actually have no chance to live truthfully to yourself. That is why we practice various practices. But if you-if we stick to old way of practice it is not so good also. So it is necessary maybe to change our way of practice sometimes. For an instance, at some monastery they start to bathe in cold water from January, December 1 until December 15. All the monks getting up about four o'clock and going to the lake and bathe _____. This is not _____-just to get out of drowsy mind. And you will not catch cold. Recently flu is all over, but if you make up your mind to bathe every morning and evening in cold water, your mind do not accept _____ because you are so physically and mentally very active. So we monks rather _____ ourselves when we catch cold. Lazy monk!

_____ Especially-it is rather difficult to take cold-water bath, and more difficult after working so hard and to take cold bath in evening very difficult. Maybe I don't know why but anyway when you get up you need some situation, natural, but in evening usually we are not prepared for that kind of situation. That is-it is so difficult to take cold bath in evening. This kind of practice is not orthodox practice, but according to the situation of the monastery we apply various ways of life and to keep chance to renew our mind and body. Especially people who live in San Francisco where climate is always same, it may be necessary to, to have some pool for Zen monks to take cold baths. Maybe exciting practice for us, and it will give pretty good stimulation for San Francisco people. I am busy now, everyday activity, but if you want I think you can do it, and you are young enough to do it. It doesn't mean to be involved in ascetic practice, it is the purpose of those practices _____ physically and spiritually. We say Zen-if we, if we are caught by even the idea of Zen we call-sticking the _____ he is not fresh enough-old stinky Zen student! But if we do not have some chance to renew our practice we will soon, soon we will be stinky student. As if you wear same underwear one week or two weeks. What will happen to us _____

And so my teacher or my master[2] always told us: "You stinky boys, wash your underwear!" Not just underwear. And so my teacher-my master, his way of training his students was-disciples was pretty different from usual master. He did not allow me to stay at Eihei-ji so long time. "Two years is enough! You will become stinky Eihei-ji student! That's enough, you should go to Soji-ji."

And when I stayed at Soji-ji more than one year, one day he appeared and after talking with me ten minutes. "Maybe it is time for you to leave Soji-ji." And he always put emphasis on Dogen-zenji's beginner's mind. You should always be all right. It means you should not stick to old style of practice, or any kind of practice and you should be always new student. When you go to Rinzaï temple, you should be new Rinzaï student. And if you go to Japan, you should be new student. You should forget all about what you have studied in America. You will know-the fundamental practice is the same, but we should practice the essential practice with renewed feeling. This is important. To practice always with new fresh-freshness of the feeling is rather difficult. Necessary for us to change some part of our practice.

My master didn't give me-didn't give us any idea of what we will do next day or next week. He didn't talk about tomorrow and it was-he was very unpredictable type of monk and monks and priests were very much afraid of him. They couldn't get what he had in his mind. Maybe he didn't have any idea, but he was always concentrated on what he was doing. That is, I think, too much, but it is necessary for us to practice our way moment after moment, with our best effort and _____ mind. As we are pretty new students, so it is rather difficult to practice our way without much rules, but each one of you should make your best effort to study without, without instruction in detail, detailed instruction. You should feel as if you are study-with few people, you shouldn't think that we have so many students. You study our way as if you are studying with your teacher only. I think that help you to ignore other's practice. But we should not be involved in group study only. This is not school-not school system. I want you-to understand this point more, whether you are you have only one teacher. We have each one of you are only disciple, disciple for teacher, for a teacher. With this spirit we should practice our way. If this point is missing, we cannot practice Zen _____. Originally Zen master do not have so many students. When Dogen left China, receiving transmission from Tendo Nyoho.[3] Tendo Nyoho-zenji said to him: "After you go back to Japan, you should practice your way in remote country with few students and keep always our practice fresh and new, and take good care of your students." That is what he said when Dogen leave China _____ and he secluded himself in remote country, northern part of country and built his small temple in [Echizen, now Fukui] Prefecture, where there is Eihei-ji now.

Tassajara may be-at Tassajara they may have small, but Eihei-ji they-at this time of year the-all the buildings is dark because of the snow. We have to cover all building by _____ to protect building from heavy snow. Such a remote country he practiced his way, with candlelight, when winter come. That was his way.

That kind of practice is very important. Even though we are many people now, we should not forget this spirit.

Thank you very much.

-----

Formatted 7/10/00.

[1] Date is unsure. This may be the conclusion of SR-68-12-21 (WKR, 8/28/00).

[2] Gyokujun So-on.

[3] Tendo Nyojo (Tiantong Rujing): 1163-1228. The Fiftieth Chinese Ancestor. He gave dharma transmission to Eihei Dogen-zenji.

1969 (54)

1969 maart (5)

1 - Blue Cliff Record #3

Sunday, March 09, 1969

Blue Cliff Record #3

Soko-ji, San Francisco

I am glad to see you from here [laughs]. My organ [?][1] may not be so good yet, but I am-today I'm testing, you know, just testing. [Laughs, laughter.] I don't know if it works or not. Whether it works or not, or if I speak or not, is not such a big problem for us. Whatever happens to us, it is something which it should happen-which should happen. So purpose of our practice [is] to have this kind of complete composure in our everyday life.

Some of Japanese member, you know, thought because I am-I am practicing always zazen, "he not-he will not be catch cold. [Laughs.] He will not suffer from flu. But it was funny for him to stay in bed so long." [Laughs.]

But purpose of zazen is to make-to make our-to make ourselves physically strong or to make ourselves mentally healthy or strong, maybe to make our mind healthy and body healthy. But healthy mind is not just, you know, "healthy mind" in its usual sense, and weak body is not weak body in its usual sense. Whether it is weak or strong, when that weakness and that strength is based on so-called-it truth or buddha-nature, that is healthy mind and healthy body.

As you know, there is a koan in Blue Cliff Record. It was the third koan in Blue Cliff Record[2] and 30-maybe 35 in Shoyo-roku.[3] Soto use mostly Shoyo-roku, and Rinzai use mostly Blue Cliff Record, but subjects we find is same. We find same subject in a different order, with different commentary.

Anyway, the story is the-Baso-Baso-Zen master Baso, the grandson of the Sixth Patriarch-Baso Doitsu[4]-the Sixth Patriarch Eno[5] and his disciple-his-one of the two main disciple is Nangaku,[6] and Nangaku's disciple is Baso. So the other-the other important disciple is Seigen.[7] Those are the most important lineage from the Sixth Patriarch because, under those two disciples, Zen Buddhism flourished, and we have many and many good, famous Zen masters under two-those-two of those teachers: Seigen and Baso-no, Nangaku.

Nangaku's disciple is-was Baso. Baso was a big-physically he was very strong and great-a man of great physique, like this, you know [draws in air the figure of a large man].[8] And when he speaks, his tongue covered [laughing] his nose. Maybe he was very fluent speaker [laughs, laughter]. But he was-once he was, you know, ill, so temple acolyte or temple master, who take care of the temple, asked him, "How are you, recently? Are you well or not?" And Baso said, "The sun-faced buddha and the man-the moon-faced buddha. The sun-faced buddha and the moon-faced buddha." Nichimenbutsu gachimenbutsu.

Nichimenbutsu is supposed to live for one thousand and eight hundred-eight hundred years. And the moon-faced buddha lives only one day-one-one day, one night. That is the "one-faced buddha." So, you know, when I am sick, I may be the moon-faced buddha [laughs]. When I-I am healthy, I am the sun-faced buddha. But "the sun-faced buddha" or "the moon-faced buddha" has no special meaning. It means that, whether I am ill or healthy, still, you know, I am practicing zazen. There is no difference. So you shouldn't worry about my health, you know. Even though I am in bed, you know, I am buddha. So don't worry about me.

And this is quite simple, you know. This is actually what we are doing every day, you know. But the difference between Baso and we ordinal [ordinary] people are-is for Baso, you know, whatever happen to him, he can accept things as it is, as it happens. But we, you know, we can not-we cannot accept everything. Something which you think is good, you may accept it. But something which you do not like you cannot-you don't accept it. And you compare one to the other. And you may say, "this is the truth; this is not true." And "he is a true Zen master; and he is not a true Zen master." And "he is good Zen student; but I am not." That is quite usual way of understanding. With this kind of understanding you cannot, you know, figure out what kind of-with what kind of idea we can-we sit every day.

To attain enlightenment means to have this kind of complete composure in our life, without any description-discrimination. But, at the same time, if we stick to this kind of attitude of non-discrimination, that is also a kind of discrimination, you know. So how we practice zazen-how we attain this kind of complete composure-is the point, you know, you should have when you start our practice.

First of all, you should know that with ordinal [ordinary], you know, effort you cannot practice our way. When I was in Japan, I also had, you know, some Zen students. Some of them are very rich, and some-and some of them are very influential people. And some of them [are] just, you know, students. Some of them are-were carpenter, you know, and some of them were other workers. In Japan, you know, still we have some-not, you know, class, but some, you know-we respect, still, we treat some-someone-or mayor or teachers in some different way. We, you know, we have-we use some special-we-we have some special way of addressing them and we have-we have some way-special way to talk with him. And we-we have also special manner to them. As you say, "Yes, sir." [Laughs.] That is a kind of thing you have. But nowadays I don't think you have this kind of difference in your way of communication. But I always, you know, told them, "If you want to-if you are Zen students, you should," you know, "forget all about your position, or work, or title, and you should be just," you know, "Zen students, or else," you know, "we cannot practice zazen in its true sense."

When we-actually, when you sit I say, "Don't think," you know. "Don't think" means don't treat things in term of good or bad, you know, or heavy or light. And just, you know, accept things as it is. So even though you do nothing, you may hear, you know, and the moment-usually the moment you hear, your reaction is, "What will it be? Yeah, that is a motor car, or that's very noisy," you know. "That may be the motor cycle."

But in zazen you should not, you know, react in that way. You should just, you know, hear the big noise or small noise, and you should not be bothered by it. It looks like impossible, you know, for you, for especially for a beginner, because the moment you hear, you know, some reaction follows. But if you practice zazen-if you try-if you continuously try not to do so, just accept "things as it is," you can do it eventually.

Of course it is difficult. That difficulty is not some difficulty to-like to carry some heavy things, or to work on mathematics, you know. That difficulty is that very [?]-wants some special effort. How you can do it is to be concentrated on your posture, or breathing, or perfect physical practice. That is the only way to-to have right reaction.

That is why, you know, Zen and samurai, you know, is not-in Japan samurai practiced zazen to master, you know, sword martial art.[9] Martial art is not just physical things. It is, you know, the matter [of] whether he k- [partial word]-he is lose or win. So [laughs]-so long as you are-you are afraid of losing their life [laughs], they-they will be their, you know, ability-they cannot act in his full ability. When-only when he is free from "to kill or to be killed," you know, and only when he react [to] his enemy's activity, he will-that is only way to win. If he try to win, he may lose. [Laughs.] So, you know, if he-how he can act without this kind of fear, which will-which will keep himself in limited activity is the most important thing. Because they had this kind of problem, they practiced Zen very hard. It is matter of, you know [laughs], whether he can survive or he cannot in battlefield. So he fought his fight in zendo, not in battlefield [laughs].

But we have not much, you know, need in our every day life, so we don't feel the necessity of this kind of practice. But our human problem we have in this world is created-are created this kind of-want of [desire for?] this kind of activity. Because we make our effort just to achieve something in its materialistic sense, or spiritual sense, we cannot achieve anything. We must achieve nothing [laughs], so that is the real meaning of nothingness.

So at first, I think, you should observe, you should understand your own everyday activity in two ways. And-and then you should be able to understand or react in one way without problem. One is, you know, dualis- [partial word]-to understand our life in dualistic way: good or bad, right or wrong. We should be-we should try hard to understand things in term of good or bad. And sometime you should unders- [partial word]-you should be able to ignore the understanding from the viewpoint of good or bad. "Good" or "bad" is just superficial understanding. But when you understand things, everything is one. Everything is one. Or all things are one. Then that is the other understanding: understanding of oneness. The understanding of duality.

At first you should be able to understand-accept things in two ways, but this is not enough. It is still dualistic. So you should be able to understand in one of the two ways without thinking, "This is one of the two understanding." So it-here you come back from starting point, but actually it is not starting point because you have freedom from-from one to the other. So you will not be bothered by it. And whatever you do, that is the great activity of the practice.

The sun-faced buddha is good; the moon-faced buddha is good. So whatever it is, that is good-that all things are Buddha. And there is no Buddha, even. But usually [when] you say "no Buddha," [laughs] it means that you stick to one-only one of the three understanding: that is, you know, "no buddha," the opposite of "buddha." [1] [10] Buddha, [2] no buddha, and [3] no buddha and buddha or buddha or no buddha. Whatever you say, it is all right. If you have complete, you know, understanding of it, whatever you say, it is all right. Only when you are not-you don't understand buddha, you know, you concerned about if I say there is no-buddha. "You are a priest," you know, "why-how you can say there is no buddha?! And why do you chant? Why do you bow to buddha?" [Laughs.]

To bow to buddha is "no buddha" for us. There is no buddha, so we bow to buddha. [Laughs, laughter.] If you bow to buddha because there is buddha, you know, that is not true understanding of buddha. So whatever you say, it is all right. If you say, "The sun-faced buddha, the moon-faced buddha"-Nichimenbutsu gachimenbutsu-no trouble. [Laughing.] Whether I am [at] Tassajara or Soko-ji, that's no trouble. [Laughs.] Should not be any trouble. Even though I die, with me it is all right, and with you it is all right. And if it is not all right, you know, you are not Zen student. [Laughs.] It is quite all right. That is buddha.

If I, you know, when I die, the moment I am dying, if I suffer, that is all right, you know. That is suffering buddha. [Laughs.] No, you know, confusion in it. Maybe everyone will struggle because of the physical, you know, agony or spiritual agony too. But that is all right. That is no-that is not problem. We should be very grateful to have limited body like me, you know, or like you. If you have limitless life, it will be a great problem for you. [Laughs.]

I'm, you know-my wife's favorite TV program is [laughs]-start from 4 o'clock and 4:30. I don't know the-what was-is the title-in Channel 7. [11] Some ghost, you know-problem. Some of them has, you know, has very, you know-the monsters, the people who lived, you know, long, long time ago and appear in this world, and creating many problems for people, and creating problem for himself. [Laughs.] That is what will happen.

And we are almost reaching to the moon now, but we cannot, you know, create human being in its true sense. We can create robot, but we cannot create human being. Human being is human being. We can enjoy our life only with our limited body and limited life. This limitation is vital element for us. Without limitation nothing exist, so we should enjoy the limitation. Weak body, strong body; man or woman. We should-the only way to enjoy our life is to enjoy the limitation which was given to us.

Whatever it is, you know, the limitation has some meaning-not some meaning-it has absolute meaning in it. It-that is most important point: for us to know [the] limitation. So, "the sun-faced buddha, the moon-faced buddha" does not mean, "I don't care the sun-faced buddha or the moon-faced buddha." It means that the sun-faced [hits table with stick] buddha, the moon-faced [hits table with stick] buddha, you know. We should enjoy the sun-faced buddha, the moon-faced buddha. It-it is not indifference. It is the more than attachment-strong, strong [laughs] attachment to the moon-faced Buddha or the sun-faced buddha. But usually our attachment-we say "non-attachment." When our attachment reach to the non-attachment, that is real attachment. So if-if you attach to something, you should attached to something completely [laughs]. The sun-faced buddha, the moon-faced buddha! "I am here," you know, "I am right here."

This kind of confidence within ourselves is important. When you have this kind of confidence in yourself, in your being, we can practice true zazen, which is beyond perfect or imperfect, good or bad.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Checked against tape and made verbatim by Dana Velden and Bill Redican (10/26/00).

[1] Probably referring to his throat.

[2] Case 3, "Master Ma Is Unwell," Blue Cliff Record.

[3] Case 36, "Master Ma Is Unwell," Book of Serenity.

[4] Jiangxi Mazu Daoyi (Jap. Baso Doitsu): 709-788. Disciple of Nangaku Ejo, and master of many disciples.

[5] Daijan Huineng (Jap. Daikan Eno): 638-713. Sixth Chinese Zen Patriarch. Disciple of Daiman Konin, and master of Nangaku Ejo.

[6] Nanyue Huairang (Jap. Nangaku Ejo): 677-744. First prominent disciple of Daikan Eno, and master of Baso Doitsu.

[7] Qingyuan Xingsi (Jap. Seigen Gyoshi): d. 740. Second prominent disciple of Daikan Eno, and master of Sekito Kisen.

[8] Note in brackets from original transcript.

[9] See also SR-69-04-19.

[10] Numbers [1]-[3] were assigned by transcriber and could be erroneous.

[11] Possibly Dark Shadows, a soap opera that prominently featured a vampire.

2 - Nansen's "Everyday Mind Is Dao"

Monday, March 10, 1969

Nansen's "Everyday Mind Is Dao"

... it was very, very cold. It was November? I don't remember exactly. November or-he said [?]-I told you [him], you know:

"Don't wear so-so much clothing. Even though we wear many clothing, you will not be so warm. And if your practice is sincere enough, even though you do not wear so much, you will not be so cold. If you are involved in intense practice, you know, actually you don't feel so cold."

And so he appeared in zendo [with] only one thin shirt [laughs, laughter]. And he practiced. I said to him, "It may be too thin. You have to wear little bit more " [laughs, laughter].

But he say, "It's all right." And he sits [with] just one shirt on his body. Why I, you know, talk about his experience is because I want to talk-talk about one koan: the famous koan of Nansen[1]-between Nansen and Joshu,[2] Nansen's disciple. "Everyday-Everyday Mind Is Dao." [3] I think you may know that koan.

Koan is not something to-something to explain. Why we talk about is to give some suggestion, you know, about how you practice zazen. It is suggestion. We don't talk about what koan means directly. We give you just suggestion, and you, according to the introduction or suggestion, you work on koan. That is how we explain koan and how you listen to koan.

So you don't-you must not think-if I, you know-if you remember what I said or if I-if you understand what I said, you-that is-there is no need for you to solve the koan, you know. So I am not trying to explain what is everyday mind or what is dao, but through this koan-by this koan, I want you to-I want to give you some suggestion how you practice shikantaza.

Actually, shikantaza and koan practice [are] not exactly the same, but there is not much difference. Shikantaza is more condensed practice, more essential practice, or fundamental practice than koan practice. The purpose of koan is same as shikantaza. Anyway, I want to-I want you to understand how you practice our way by explaining this koan of "Everyday Mind Is Dao. Everyday Mind Is Dao."

You may think, you know, that if you practice good enough then you have power which could be extended in your everyday life. It-it is so-actually it is so, but how-then how you, you know, acquire this kind of power is different matter. When you have power, you know, then you can extend that power to everyday life. But the next question will be how you can obtain that power will be the next question. But-and you may wonder what kind of experience you have when you have acquired the power [laughs]. That kind of-this kind of question will continue endlessly. How-how you will acquire that kind of power, or how to extend the power to everyday life.

So anyway I will explain, first of all, this koan:

Joshu, you know, asked his teacher Nansen, "What is dao?" What is dao?

And his teacher Nansen answered, "Everyday mind is dao."

And Nansen asked his teacher again, "How-how to accord with the dao?" or "How to follow the dao? Tell me how to accord with the dao." That was, you know, Joshu's question.

And Nansen said, "If you try to follow the dao," you know, or "The more you try to follow the dao, the more you will lose the dao." [Laughs.] That was his [answer]. And he continued, "The true power does not belong to the matter of attaining it," or "matter-matter [of] aware of it or not aware of it, or attaining it or not attaining it. If you," you know, "if your practice goes beyond the matter of attaining it or not to attaining it, your mind will be boundless blue sky-like a boundless blue sky. And you will have no problem in your everyday life." That was his answer.

Now I want to come back to the discussion between one of you student and me. He said he want to-to have vacation or to go to see someone, and he want to leave Tassajara for one week, he said. And, you know, I-I wanted to know why, you know, why he was-he feels in that way. And at-at last I found how is that. He wanted to-before he rigid-rigidly, you know, strictly attached to or strictly observed Tassajara way. But now he feels to-to observe his way, you know, strictly with the idea to observe Tassajara way is right and not to observe-not to practice even for one day is not good.

So he-he was-his practice, in other word, involved in right or wrong-right practice or wrong practice. And found out that our practice should beyond, you know, go beyond right or wrong. "If so," you know, "what is wrong in my idea of going-leaving Tassajara for one week? [Laughs.] Before I saw in that way, but right now I don't understand our way in that way-in that way. So I don't understand our way so rigidly. So sometime we can take-we can leave Tassajara. What is wrong with you to leave Tassajara when I want to leave?" That was his-that is why he now want to leave Tassajara.

Before, you know, as you see in the question and answer between Nansen and Joshu, Joshu said-Joshu asked him, you know, "If I do not try to observe the way, how-how will-can I follow the way-don't-if we-if I don't try to observe it?" It-or in other words, "Is it possible for me," you know, "to observe our way without trying to observe our way?" But Nansen said, "If you try to observe our way, that way is not true way." [Laughs.] How you will understand this point? It means that, you know, unless you have s- [partial word]-until you have some power or some experience of real practice, you will not understand what is true way.

Even though I ex- [partial word]-I explain what is true way, and even though you understand what I say, that is not true way. Only when you have actually you have that power to extend your experience to everyday life. Then, and without trying to observe our way, naturally, intuitively, when you are able to observe our way, that is true. You understand?

So to-to follow our way rigidly, you know, to-to attain some power or some enlightenment or experience is not, you know-may not be true way. But while you are doing so, unexpectedly [laughs] your enlightenment will come to you. And that enlightenment is not the enlightenment you expected [laughs, laughter]. That will [be] how, you know, you will experience our true way.

So Dogen-zenji says-always says, "Don't try-try not to attain enlightenment. Just [laughs, laughter] practice it, even though," you know, "you-you have some idea of enlightenment-like a picture," you know, "like a beautiful picture." To attain, to realize, to actualize that idea, you practice zazen. What you get is quite different thing. It will not be the paintings, you know, [of] rice cake. What you will get is something quite different. That is true.

So in koan practice, you know, you try hard to attain enlightenment. In shikantaza, you know, we do not try to attain enlightenment. Or in shikantaza we have no time, you know [laughs], to expect something. We have-we have, you know, pain in our-on-in our legs, and sometime it may be very cold [laughs]. So to remain in right posture is difficult, you know. And if you [are] involved in our practice with right posture, with good breathing, you-you have no time even to, you know, try to-even to have beautiful picture of enlightenment, [laughs]. It is already hard enough to sit, and you have no other idea of-to have some imagination.

So actually, what will-we do in the same, and what we will attain is same. But, you know, what you attain is something completely different [than] you expected.

So he says, you know, if you try to-if you try to follow the way, you will be far away from it. That is what Nansen said. But what, you know-after what you will attain is something quite different. It is not something to describe. Maybe like it [?], so we call it emptiness. Or sometime toilet paper. [Laughs, laughter.] Sometime cats. Sometime fox. Whatever it is, you know, it is another name of something which cannot be described. That is true enlightenment. When-only when you have it, you know, then you may say, "everyday life is true way." Even toilet paper is true way [laughs]. Whatever you do, that is another name of the true way you attain-you have.

This morning I didn't, you know, explain so-so far [?], but even though I say it may be-I agreed with his idea not to-to go-to leave, you know, for one week or two, it does not mean that is the true way [laughs]. True way is not something like that. You know, to-sometime to observe our way, sometime we don't. That is not true way. But even so, I don't mean that you should, you know, stay here. You sh- [partial word]-if you-some day he will realize the true way, then he may understand why I said you should-why I-I agreed with his idea of leaving Tassajara for a while. Or sometime don't wear so-so much clothing. Or you should practice rigidly and strictly enough.

To be completely involved in our practice, some day he may understand but I meant. But at least, you know, right now I don't think he understood what I said. I didn't agree with his idea. Or I didn't agree with his rigid practice-what is the true practice. True practice is not in the realm of, you know, "This is true practice and this is not true practice." True practice is beyond right-the idea right and wrong, and beyond experience, beyond human [?] suggestion.

I think old [all?] student may have very difficult time with me [?] because I do not say anything definitely [laughter]. "Yeah, that is all right. That may be all right. Do whatever you like." And, you know, sometime I don't feel so good, you know, so-so old-old student will wonder, you know, why he is not-he doesn't feel so good when he said, "Oh, whatever you like. Do whatever you like." Or without saying, "Do this. Do that." [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

... "I don't feel so good." So, you know, he may understand, you know, his-he doesn't feel so good. Why is-the true way, you know, is not something you can achieve in term of good or-right or wrong, or successful or not successful. But the important point [is] to have always composure within ourselves whether we are successful or not. To have deep mind, to include everything within ourselves-that is, you know, true way or dao.

So everyday-when you have-when you accept even toilet-paper buddha, you know, you have to true way. So anyway, the point is to-that you can accept things as it is, as you accept Buddha as your teacher. That is true way. And as our patriarch and buddhas did it, it is possible for us to attain that kind of true way.

So there is no difference in everyday problem and true-and koan. There is no difference between bird's or fish's way and Buddha's way. And to attain that there is many ways and various ways to attain that kind of true way-true way experience which is your own, which could be your own, and which will be different from each other's way, and which is quite independent way from other's way-at the same time which is universal way to everyone. That is true way. If so, you know, how can I explain [laughs] what is true way?

But-only way to, you know-although Nansen and his-great teacher Nansen and his disciple Joshu have this kind of discussion, it does not mean anything [1 word unclear] who do not understand the true way. But it will give us some suggestion, and it will give you some encouragement to practice our way even though here is-he-here may be some Rinzai student or Soto student.

You may think that-for-it is nonsense for Rinzai student [laughs] to come to Tassajara and practice shikantaza, but it isn't so. Koan practice could be shikantaza. Shikantaza could be, you know, koan practice. Actually if you really practice koan practice with right understanding-with right-under right instruction, that is shikantaza. If you practice shikantaza under the right teacher it will be koan practice. There could not be-if you understand our practice-what is our practice, there is no two practice. Your practice is pointing one way. It looks like various way because you understand it in term of "Rinzai or Soto," "shikantaza or koan practice." That is your fault [laughs], not, you know, teacher's fault. Or he is-you may say I am Soto priest, Soto teacher, but actually, you know, you may be-my lineage is Soto lineage, but actually our-or way directly came from Buddha. They are set off [?] in two ways.

[Brief whispered exchange with Suzuki-roshi off-mike.]

Did you understand? [Laughs, laughter.] Actually, you know, what I meant is-anyway, you should practice zazen [laughs, laughter]. That is what I wanted to say. But you should practice it. You should-should be completely involved in your practice. That is what I meant in short. Then everyone will attain enlightenment. That is what I said in short. You cannot waste your time. It is not possible to waste your time. But you th- [partial word]-you think I am wasting time, that's all [laughs]. But you are not wasting your time.

So anyway, if you trust in words, you know, it's better to practice zazen [laughs, laughter] without any doubt. And it's better to be completely involved in your practice, forgetting-putting everything aside. That is what I mean.

And we shouldn't be fooled by Nansen and Joshu, even though he said, "Everyday life is [laughs] true way." So if you are fooled by them, you will say, "Whatever you-we do, that is true way." [Laughs.] "There will not be no need to practice zazen. What is wrong not to practice zazen? Even though we do not sit in cross-legged position, that is true way." [Laughs.] It means that when you understand in this way, you are trying to understand koan literally without knowing what they really meant by those discussion.

I am so glad to see that you have experienced here in last time period [?]. So after you did it, you understand what you have done [laughs]. Before you do it or when you-is [?] coming back to Tassajara, or it doesn't mean anything to sit with a teacher, but after you did it, you-you must have experienced what you have done.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original City Center tape transcribed by Dana Velden (6/26/00).
Checked by Bill Redican (11/1/00).

[1] Nanquan Puyuan (Nansen Fugan): 748-835. Disciple of Baso Doitsu.

[2] Zhaozhou Congshen (Joshu Jushin): 778-897.

[3] Case 19 of the Wu-Men Kuan (Jap. Mumonkan, Eng. Gateless Gate) koan collection.

3 - Find Out for Yourself

Saturday, March 15, 1969

Find Out for Yourself

In your zazen, perhaps you will have many difficulties or problems. But when you have some problem, it is necessary for you to find out-try to find out by yourself why you have problem. Before you ask someone, it is necessary for you to try to find out why.

Usually your way of study is to master it as soon as possible and by some best way. So before you think you may ask someone why you have some problem. But that kind of way may be very good for your usual life, but if you want to study Zen, it doesn't help so much.

You should always try to find out what really mean by "buddha-nature" or by "practice" or by "enlightenment." In this way, you will have a more subtle attitude towards everything until you understand things as it is.

If you are told something by someone, naturally you will stick to something you experienced or you understand-you understood. The moment you think you understand something, you will stick to it. And you will lose the full function of your nature.

So when you are seeking for something, your true nature is in full activity, as if you are, you know-when you-even know what are you seeking for-like someone who is in the dark seeking for his own pillow because he lost it. In the dark-so you don't see anything but you're seeking for the pillow you lost. At that time, your mind is in full function. So-but if you know where the pillow is, you know, your mind is not in full function. Your mind is acting in limited sense, you know.

So-but if you don't know where is the pillow, you are just seeking, worried, and your mind is open to everything. In that way, you will see things as it is.

So to study means-if you want to study something it's better not to have any purpose to study without, you know, knowing how to study or what is Buddhism. But because you do-you are not satisfied with something which you are told, and you cannot rely on anything which was told-which was-which is set up by someone. Perhaps you may have this kind of feeling always. And I think you seek for freedom just because of the freedom you seek for. You try various way.

Of course, you will sometime-you will find, sometime, you wasted your time. If some Zen master drink a lot of sake, you may think the best way to obtain enlightenment is to take a lot of sake [laughs]. Then you will attain enlightenment, you know. But even though you take a lot of sake as he do-as he does [laughs, laughter], you will not attain enlightenment [laughs, laughter].

It looks like waste of time [laughs, laughter], but it is not so, you know. That attitude is, you know, important. To-if you continue, you know, to try to find out in that way-your, you know, understanding-power of understanding will-more and more you will gain the more power to understand things.

So whatever you do, you will not waste your time. But when you do something with some limited idea or some definite purpose, what you will gain is some concrete things which is not-which will be-which will be the cover of your inner nature. So it is not matter of what you-what you study, but matter of to gain the faculty to see things as it is, to accept things as it is, to understand things as it is.

Some of you may try hard, may study something if you like it, you know. If you don't like it, you don't. You ignore it. That is not only selfish way, but also the limiting your power of study. Good or bad, small or big, we should find out the true reason why something is so big and why something is so small, why something is so good and why something is not so good. But if you [laughs] only are trying to find out something good, you know, you will always lose something. And you are limiting your faculty. So you always live in limited world. You cannot accept things as it is.

We have-perhaps too many students in this zendo. But even there are two, three-even [if] some master has two, three students, they will-he will never tell you what our way in detail. The only way is to eat with him, to talk with him, and to do something-to do everything with him. And to help him without, you know, even [being] told how to help him.

Even-but eventually, you know, because it is difficult to help him, you will try to find out how to help him and how to make him happy [laughs]. Mostly, he is not so happy. You will be always scolded without any reason. Maybe there is some reason, but because you don't find out why so [laughs] you are not so happy and he is not so happy. So what you-if you want to-if you want [to] really study with him, you will try hard how to please him-how to make your life happy with him.

You may say that is very old, you know, way. I think you had, in your civilization, sometime I think you had, this kind of life-not like in Japan, but there is some reason why they had this kind of difficult time with their teachers. There is no particular way for us, because each one of us are different from the other.

So each one of us must have each one's own way. And according to the situation, you should change your way and-to find out some appropriate way. So you cannot stick to anything. The only thing we have to [do] is to find out new-some appropriate way under new situation.

For an instance, you know, in morning time we have-we clean our room. But we have not enough rags or brooms, so it is almost impossible to participate our cleaning-in [our cleaning]. So under this circumstances, what you should do is to find out something to do [laughs]. You may think, "It is-there is nothing to do for me." But there is, if you, you know [laughs], if you try hard to find out what you should do.

I don't scold you so much, but if strict-if I were a strict Zen master I shall be very angry with you [laughs], you know, because you give up quite easily. "Oh, no. There is not much equipment to clean." Or, "There is not much things-there are not much things to do." And if you sit, you know, [on] balcony with people without much help [laughs], you may easily give up to practice. "Maybe better," you know, "not. It is not possible," or "It may be foolish to practice," you know, "under this circumstances-under such a, you know, bad circumstances [laughs]. You may easily give up. But in such case, you know, you should try hard. How you should practice-for an instance, if you are very sleepy, you know: "Oh, maybe better not to practice to zazen. Maybe better to rest." Yeah, sometime it is better, but there is-that is, at the same time, that may the good chance to practice.

When I was [at] Eihei-ji serving a teacher[1]-helping teacher-my teacher, he was-he did not tell us anything. But whenever we make mistake [laughs], he scolded. It is a rule-a kind of rules to open left-hand-right-hand side, you know, [of the] sliding door. This is usual way. Little bit-you open little bit by the handle-not handle, but by the hole which serve the-which-by which we open.

So I opened this way [probably gestures], and I was scolded: "Don't open that way-that side." So next morning I opened, you know, the other side [laughs]. Scolded again. I don't know what to do [laughs, laughter]. The next morning I-but I found out that the day I open this side, his guest was this side. To open this side is a rule, you know. Left-hand side is the rule. But because-at that morning his guest was there. So, you know, I should open the other side. Before I open, we should-I should be careful and find out which side guest is.

And one day-yeah-the day I [was] appointed to serve him, I gave him a cup of tea. And it is rule-almost rule to fill eighty percent of the cup. That is the rule. So I filled eighty percent or seventy percent [laughs]. And he said, "Give me hot," you know, "hot tea. You should fill the cup," you know, "with very hot tea." So next morning I filled, you know-next morning when there were some guests, I filled all the cups [laughs] with hot water almost ninety-nine percent and served them. [SR hits or slaps something.] I was scolded [laughs, laughter]!

There is no rule actually, you know [laughs, laughter]. He himself like hot-very hot bitter tea filled in the cup. But almost all the guest doesn't like bitter hot tea. So for him I should, you know, give him bitter hot tea. And for the guest I should give-I should have given her-given them, you know, usual-given them usual way. In this way, you know, he never tells [us] anything.

If I get up earlier-or I-when I get up twenty minutes earlier than the handbell come, I was scolded. "Don't get up so early!" [Laughs]. "You will disturb my sleep." Usually if I get up earlier it is good, you know, but for him it is not good [laughs]. In this way when-if you are trying to understand things better, without any rules or prejudice, then that means selflessness.

You say "rules," but rules are already some selfish idea. Actually, there is no rules. But when you say, "This is rule," you are forcing something on the rules to others. You are-so actually, there is no rules. But when it is-rules is only needed when we have not much time or when we cannot help others more closely, more kindly. So-or anyway, this is rules. So you should do that [laughs]. This is easy, you know. But actually-that is not actual way-our way. So to give each student-to give instruction-some instruction is not so good, you know.

If possible, we should give instruction one-by-one. But because that is difficult, we give some instruction or lecture like this [laughs]. But you shouldn't stick to lecture. You should think more what [laughs] I mean-what I really mean. So for the beginner, maybe, instruction is necessary, but for, you know, for advanced students, we don't give so much instruction, and he should try various way.

In this sesshin I think-or I'm-I feel very sorry for you that I cannot help you so much. But the way you study true Zen is not [through] some verbal things. You should open yourself, and you should give up everything. And whatever it is, you should try-anyway, you should try, whether it is-whether you think it is good or bad. This is the fundamental attitude to study.

You should be like a children, you know, who drew things whether it is good or bad. Sometime you will do things without much reason. If that is difficult, you are not actually ready to practice zazen. It is, you know, we say "absolute surrender." But you have nothing to surrender. If you have something to surrender, it may be-it is usual way. But we have nothing to surrender. But you should find out always yourself. You shouldn't lose yourself. That is only things you should try.

Some more time. Do you have some question? Hai.

Student A: What do you mean we don't have anything to lose-or to surrender?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Without finding-without-I mean, you know, "without surrender" means when you have-when you find it difficult to surrender, that is surrender. But you should know that is not complete surrender because, you know, you find it difficult. So that-that much you should [be] aware of, you know-yourself, what you are doing [laughs].

That-that you have problem means you are not-not yet [taps five times with stick-once for each of previous five words], you know, surrendered enough. [Taps several times.] Something is there, you know. So you should-you should not attach to it, or you should not [be] bothered by it, or you should not [be] satisfied with it, whatever it is, or you should not try to avoid it because it is there [taps several times]. So you should think-or you should be aware of that, you know, problem and why you have that problem [taps several times]-that kind of problem.

You know, if you fail to serve, you know, tea, you should think why, without sticking-without making some excuse, you know. You failed anyway, you know. So what you should do not to fail again? So there is no rules but to be aware of what you are doing. Do you understand?

Student B: What do you mean, "We should not lose ourselves?"

Suzuki-roshi: "Lose yourself" means you should not stick to something-some rules or some idea. You should be more realistic [laughs]. Do you understand? Lose yourself-lose-"to lose" means to stick to something, [to be] enslaved by something. We exist-we always-we are doing something always with-in relation to something else. But we should not be enslaved by it. There is difference, you know: to be enslaved by it and to have a good relationship. When you are enslaved by it, some-you're-what you do is not pure enough-realistic enough. Something, you know, is in it between you: rules or idea or idea of self, you know. "I am doing something." That is actually-"I am doing something" means, you know, I am enslaved by "me," ideal "me." So, you know, we should be more realistic. Do you understand? What I want to say ...

[Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student C: Do you think it's important to continue practice even when we're not feeling well? When we're ill?

Suzuki-roshi: When you are ill, but-sometime it may be better to sit even though you are ill. But sometime you cannot, you know. Or sometime [it] may be better not to take formal posture. But you can sit-not sit, but you can practice our way whatever the situation is. Even though you are lying in bed, you can practice zazen-not zazen but-we can practice our way. Hai.

Student D: In the beginning it was suggested-in the beginning of my practice of zazen it was suggested that I count my breaths. Are there other methods I could use? Should I just experiment around [with] different ways.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. For an instance, maybe, you know-usually our breathing is very shallow, you know, and if you try-if you continue shallow breathing in zazen because, you know-in everyday activity, you naturally-sometime you take deep breathing like this [gestures], or, you know, when you do some particular activity you take deep breathing. But in zazen, you know, if you keep-if you do shallow breathing always, you know, it is-it create problem because, you know, in your-in zazen you cannot do like this [speaking in an ironic voice-sounding very tight or compressed], you know [laughs]. So you are always like this without making deeper breathing. So that is why I say, you know, take deeper breathing. You should try to make your breathing deeper. Hai.

Student E: Roshi, why do people suffer? Why do people suffer?

Suzuki-roshi: Suffer? Yeah. The-it means-suffering means, you know, spiritual suffering especially or some-most of the physical suffering too. When you have-you-you expect something, you have already suffering, because actually things doesn't go as you expect. So there is suffering already. Even you are ill, you know, for an instance, if you try-if you do not try too much to, you know, to get well, it is pretty good. It is not so bad. But if you try to get well too much, that is suffering. So you should-when you are ill, you should accept it. "Oh, I am-I am not so well [laughs]. Maybe someday I shall be all right." Then you have not much suffering. So, you know, some idea will create some, some-when you expect something, we have already suffering. And that expectation is not realistic enough, usually. Hai.

Student F: If I-if you try-I guess if you try not to have expectation, that's negative expectation.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student F: But if you get into wanting to expect-like someone would say, "Would you like to go get an ice cream cone?"

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student F: How-how do you, in your daily life, how do you keep from-how do you keep a healthy mind from not expecting when some people, without knowing it, want you to get into expecting it with them?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That is-to know, you know-if you don't know the nature of suffering, you know, you will suffer more. But if you know why you suffer, then you think, "I expect too much," you know. "There is no ice cream here," [laughs] so I shouldn't think about ice cream. It is-that there is no ice cream is-already not so good. But if I expect it-if I want [laughs, laughter] to have it, you make yourself words [laughs, laughter]. So in that way, you know, you will be relieved from a lot of suffering.

Student G: Roshi, you said not to get stuck or caught by some particular idea. But it seems like many ideas have two sides.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student G: And you get stuck on one side-still that allows the other side to help you. For instance, if you get caught by the idea of the sangha-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student G: -become impassioned [?] by sangha or an area [?] of practice-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student G: -even though you're caught by it, still it's kind of a skillful way for a sangha to help you, because it keeps you with it.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, yeah.

Student G: But how-it's a very strange feeling, if you find yourself afraid to stop practice or to change practice-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student G: -out of some formal sangha, because [you're] getting caught by both sides of the idea.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student G: Even though the other side may help you, still, you know, still you're caught.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. If you know that point, you know-it is necessary to know-to understand that much. Without understanding it, you know, if you push one way always-one side always, that will be awful. So at least we should know both side. Then the rules we have will help us. But because we don't know the other side, rules doesn't help at all-makes us worse.

So our sangha is small world itself or society itself. So we will know-we will learn many things. So for-for us it is necessary to know or to understand why we have rules-why he say so, you know. Like you steal something [laughs]. Why, you know, you should steal his way. Or-and you should, you know, understand what he mean-actually what he means without being caught by rules or words or what he says. And he should know why, you know, we have rules and why you have to say something to others. So actually, there is no rules. But [laughs], the rules is good devices. Hai.

Student H: In zazen, if the cushion before your eyes begins to glow, or you see the bodhisattvas blinking their eyes, or the people on each side of you seem to be mutas [?],[2] what is happening?

Suzuki-roshi: What is happening? Maybe that is a good experience. But sometime, you know, it is because of your bad breathing exercise. Something-if it is healthy, you know, good experience for you, of course that is very good. But sometime, you know, it is just some created idea because of your unhealthy practice. [It is] not always-what I mean is not always good, you know.

Student H: Well, one feels very peaceful when one sees this[?]-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm

Student H: -then perhaps it's good.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student H: But if, for instance, there's a feeling of a strong weight on the head-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student H: -then that's unpleasant.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student H: And one doesn't know what to do.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That is, you know, your breathing is not so good. And even though it is good, we shouldn't stick to it, you know. You [?]-

Almost time?

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Katharine Shields and Bill Redican (10/23/00).

[1] Serving Kishizawa Ian-zenji at Eihei-ji Monastery. See also SR-70-06-03.

[2] Possibly makyo: "diabolical phenomena," or deceptive appearances or feelings that may arise during zazen.

4 - Selflessness

Sunday, March 16, 1969

Selflessness

Our practice should be based on the idea of selflessness. This selflessness is very difficult [to] understand. If you try to be selflessness, you know, that is already selfish idea. [Laughs.] We don't know what to do, what-how to cope with it. Perhaps you may-you must have tried various way, but selflessness is not something which you can try, you know. It-selflessness should-should be there when you do not try anything. Selflessness is not something which you can be aware of. But for us, we have to-it is necessary to try and to know-it is necessary to know how difficult it is.

And because it is difficult, you want some guidance or teacher. Maybe when you have good teacher and when you are practicing with good teacher, you will be naturally not so selfish. Why our teacher is so hard on us is because of our selfish attitude. Whenever he see our selfish attitude he may point out-or he may be angry with it. Usually-for an instance, you know, when I was a little boy, I was going [to] primary school at that time-grammar school, you know. And I learned something about animal-small animal and-like, you know, some-some-some animal which live on fish['s] body. When we were working in the pond to clean the water from the muddy-mud and worm in it, I, you know, picked up a small goldfish and found a small worm on the body. So that was the worm I studied at primary school. So I point out that worm and said:

"This is"-in Japanese-"mijinko!" You know, "This is mijinko!" Maybe I proudly, you know, pointed out thatmijinko. And my teacher said: "Shut up!" [Very loudly. Laughs, laughter.]

I didn't know why he shouted at me, but now I know [laughs, laughter], you know, why he was so angry with me. You know, to encourage student by showing some example is the mercy, but [laughs] to shout at me when we proudly showing-that is another mercy, another kindness. So whatever we do, he is watching us, you know, whether he-we are selfish or not.

We small disciples would eat anything he-he wants, you know. When guest come, if he has a good Japanese cake, he would put-he would hide it from us, you know, because we eat always what he want to use [laughs]. Whatever it is, as soon as we find out, we would eat it [laughter]. At first, you know, we have not much, you know-at first we cut a corner which-[laughter-probably demonstrating the technique] it is in the box, like this. And we would cut just a slice of it, four corner [laughs]. And next time a little bit more [laughs, laughter], until, you know, it is obvious we cut it. So when we realize that anyway he may find out what we did, so we cut [laughs, laughter-probably demonstrating the technique] and divided, you know, between us. When-but when we divide the cake and eat it, he was not so angry. But when he thinks some-someone, you know, ate it all by himself, he became very angry.

Once he put a persimmon-big persimmon-a bitter one, in the rice so that it will be ripened. But someone-it was just one-someone ate it, you know. But I didn't know that when I-and my master thought that we must have eat it. So he asked me who ate the persimmon. Because I didn't know who did it, so I said, "No, I didn't." He became very angry, not with me, you know, but someone who ate it by himself without sharing it-sharing it among us. And as soon as he found out who did it he was very angry. And, you know, I became very sorry for him, to say that I didn't-I didn't eat it.

Any kind of selfish-selfishness is strictly observed by our teacher. Selfish attitude create arrogance, you know, arrogance-arrogant attitude based on selfish idea. Because he is selfish he became-become arrogant. So this arrogancy is strictly observed by our teacher. This arrogance is sometime-most-when it is positive, it is easy to find out. But negative arrogance is rather difficult to see or to know. The negative arrogancy is the arrogancy when you say, "No, I cannot do that," you know. But it means that-what I mean by "I can do it" is to do it perfect, you know. Better. So he may say, "I cannot do, it but you do it," he may say. And if he cannot do it as he expected, he may, you know, express arrogancy, you know. He said he can do it, but look at it, you know. Look at it, what he did. That is arrogancy.

So in Zen School we put emphasis on self-power-to do it ourselves. And Pure Land way is, you know, we are originally sinful being. But teachers of Pure Land School strictly, you know, pointed out that kind of arrogancy: "I cannot do it. I am sinful!" you know. It means that everyone must be sinful, you know. "I am a one of it." Here, you know, if you misunderstand, if your understanding is not close enough, you know-"I am one of it. Everyone is sinful." That is most of the time-most of the time it is arrogancy, the negative arrogancy. It is better, much better to say: "Although I am-now I am sinful, but we can-by practice we must conquer it." That is more, you know, faithful to the sinful nature of ourselves: sometime, not always.

So it is not matter of what you say or how you, even, behave. When you reach this point, you will find out the real practice of repeating Amida Buddha's name or practicing zazen. There is no other way than to repeat Amida-just repeat Amida Buddha's name without any reason. There is no other way to sit, you know, without any gaining idea.

So before you have this kind of struggle, you may wonder why we say you have to sit without any gaining idea. After you try various way to be free from selfish idea, then I think you will find yourself in the position where you can sit-just sit.

We say "conscience," but that conscience, you know, [is] mostly based on selfish idea. Con- [partial word]-real conscience is more than the verbal thing. More than you can think about or you can feel. Until you, you know, you are when-only when you are every strict with yourself, that real conscience will appear. In other words, as long as you are seeking for something, some truth, or some way, or some understanding from outside, you will not find out what it is. Only when you are strict with yourself you will find out what is needed for you.

So instead of being attached to some verbal thing or something which you can hear or see, you must feel impulse from inside which support everything, every phenomenal world. And to be grateful for-for the life energy from inside, which support everything. That is buddha-nature. And maybe that is Amida Buddha's mercy.

But usually, you know, when-when you have selfish practice, you stick to something, you know, which you can see, which you can understand. And when you stick to something which you can understand, you will forget all about what is supporting the understanding, the color you see or the beautiful shape it has. So instead of being one with the flower, your friend, or your teacher, you will stick to-you will be caught by your teacher, the flower you see, the friend you have, without, you know, direct-without having direct intimate relationship. You will make, you know, some barrier between you, and what you will see is dead flower or wooden teacher.

So in short, what-the best way is to get up, you know, when people get up, to eat whatever it is when your friend eat, and to sleep where our friend sleep, to behave, you know, like other students behave, without any reason. [Laughs.] That is, in short, the best way. That is shikantaza in everyday life. If you are not able to do that, you don't know what is zazen. In your zazen, you know, every sound comes [?], you know, but you do not think about it. You do not discriminate it. You just hear it. So in our monastic life, you should be able to do whatever it is. Whoever it is, your teacher is teacher, you know. That is the only way to get rid of your selfish practice. You should forget all about why or how, even [laughs.] You should do-whether it is creative activity or imitation. It doesn't matter.

If you become too fussy about things, you know, you will lose your practice. So I don't like to discuss something too much [laughs]. You will be lost in your discussion. It will take, you know, night after night, day by day, and you will not have any conclusion. The last thing you will do is to decide by vote.

Discussion is necessary if you understand the fundamental attitude or fundamental practice of selflessness, discussion is very useful. But usually-when you-because you [are] caught by some idea, some way to solve the problem, you cannot solve the problem. Because no way can be perfect. It will create some other problem, whatever you do. So when you know that whatever we do in term of good or bad, right or wrong, that is not perfect, then tentatively you can choose some way. That is, in another words, selflessness. You do not [taps stick twice] force anything. Tentatively: "Let's do this way." That's all, you know.

Religion is, after all, for ourselves-each one of ourselves. [Tape turned over.][1] And it is-if so, it is necessary to observe our way as a personal practice and independent effort. And when you get through the superficial activity, you will find out some universal things within yourselves. That is a kind of mystery. When you think-when you can accept things-you can accept completely the things which people may accept-the truth which is truth for us was the truth for even Shakyamuni Buddha. There is no difference.

If we-if our understanding, you know, [is] deep enough there is not much difference, there is not much time difference or space difference. Whatever it is which is true with us is true with our ancestors and maybe for our descendant, too.

As we are, you know-as we are practicing our way with so many people, the personal-and we are busy to organize our practice. But we should not forget our personal practice.

Thank you very much.

---

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Dana Velden and Bill Redican (10/30/00).

[1] Sentence was repeated at head of Side B, so the "original" tape must have been a copy. No text was lost at the (non-)turnover of the tape.

5 - Ordinary and Holy

Sunday, March 30, 1969

Ordinary and Holy

[The point of][1] ... my talk is just to give you some help in your practice. So it is just help, you know. So there's, as I always say, there is no need for you to remember what I said as something definite, you know. I'm just trying to help you, so it is just support of your [laughs] practice. So if you stick to it, it means that you stick to the support-not, you know, tree itself. You know, a tree, when it is strong enough, it may want some support. But the most important one is the tree itself, not support.

I have, you know, I am one tree, and each one of you are a tree of itself. And by itself, you should, you know, stand up. And when one tree stand up by itself, we call that tree a buddha. In other word, when you, you know, practice zazen in its true sense, you are really buddha. So buddha and tree is one, in that sense. It may be sometime we call it a tree; sometime we call it a buddha. "Buddha" or "tree" or "you" is many names of one buddha.

When you sit, you know, you are independent from various being, and you are related to various being. And when you have perfect composure in your practice, it means that you include everything. You are not just you. You are whole world or whole cosmos, and you are a buddha. So when you sit, you are ordinary man, and you are buddha. So in this sense, you are both ordinary man, ordinary man, and buddha. So you are not just ordinary man-ordinary man. Before you sit, you know, stick to the idea of "you" or idea of self. That is sheer [fear?] old [?] ordinary man. But when you sit, you are both, you know, ordinary man and buddha. So you are not the same being. When you sit you are not same being before you sit. Do [laughs] you understand? Because, when you sit, you are ordinary man and buddha.

You may say it is not possible to be ordinary and holy [laughs]. You may think so. When you think so, your under standing is, we say, heretic understanding or one-sided understanding. We should understand everything, not just from one standpoint. We call someone who understand things from just one side, we call him "tamban-kan." Tamban-kan in Chinese or Japanese means "a man who carry a board on his shoulder." Because he carry a big, you know, board on his shoulder this way, he cannot [laughs] see the other side [laughs]. He is always, you know, carrying big board on his shoulder. Almost all the people are carrying big board [laughter, laughs], so he cannot see the other side. He thinks he is just ordinary man, but, you know, if he take off the board, he will understand, "Oh, I am buddha, too [laughs]. How come to be a buddha and ordinary man? It is amazing," he may say. That is enlightenment.

So when you experience enlightenment, or when you are enlight ened, you will understand things more freely. You don't mind whatever people call you. "Ordinary man." "Okay, I am ordin ary man [laughs]." "You are buddha?" "Yes, I am buddha," you know. How come to be a buddha and ordinary man?" "Oh, I don't know why, but actually I am buddha and ordinary man." [Laughs.] Doesn't matter. Whatever they say [laughs], that is all right.

The buddha, in its true sense, is not just different, special one from ordinary man. So ordinary man, in its true sense, is not someone who is not holy or who is not buddha. This is complete understanding of ourselves. With this understanding, if we practice zazen [laughs], if we practice zazen, that is true zazen. You will not be bothered by anything. Whatever you hear, whatever you see, that is okay. Actually, but before you have this kind of actual feeling, of course it is necessary to be accustomed to our practice. Although intellectually we understand ourselves, but if we haven't actual feeling with it, then it is not so, you know, powerful. And so that is why you must keep on our practice. If you keep practicing our way, naturally, you know, you will have this understanding and this feeling-actual feeling, too.

Even though we use-we can explain what is Buddhism, if you do not have the actual feeling with it, we, you know, cannot call him real Buddhist. Only when you, you know, your personality is characterized [by this] kind of feeling we call him a Buddhist. How we, you know, characterize ourselves by this kind of understanding or practice is always, you know-it is necessary, you know, for us to be always concentrated on this point.

It is rather difficult to explain how to be con centrated on this point. There are many koans and saying on this point. And those saying looks like very different, but [laughs] actually they are all the same. Ordinary mind is tao, you know. Ordinary mind is tao, you know. Even though we are doing quite usual things, whenever we do something, that is actually Buddha's activity-Buddha's activity, but our activity [laughs], you know. Ordinary mind is tao. Buddha's mind, Buddha's activity, and our activity are not different.

Someone may say our activity is originated or based on Buddha's mind. And Buddha's mind is "such and such" is Buddha's mind, and the "so and so" is ordinary mind. You may, you know, say various explanation [laughs], but there is no need, you know, to explain in that way. Whatever we do, you know, if we, you know, do something we cannot say, "I am doing something," you know, because there is no one independent from, separated from, the others. When we do [thumps stick on table] something, you know, it makes sound [laughs]. What is the sound? [Taps stick once per word.] When I say something, you are hearing it. So I cannot do, you know, anything by myself, just for myself. That is actually what we are doing, so I cannot say I am doing something. Everyone-if someone do something, everyone is cooperated. And everyone will do something. So there is no explanation [laughs], actually, you know. So just [thumps stick] minute-moment after moment [thumps stick], we should continue this kind of activity, which is Buddha's activity.

But you cannot say this is just Buddha's activity, because you are [thumps stick] doing actually [laughs]. You may say then, I don't know what I-who is doing what. But why you say, "Who is doing what?" you know. You wanted to limit your activity, you want to intellectualize your activity, that's all, you know. So before you say something, the actual [thumps stick] activity is here. That is, you know, actually who we are. We are Buddha, and we are each one of us [laughs].

Our activity is cosmic activity and personal activity. So there is no need to explain what we are doing. When you want to explain it, that is all right, but we should not think if we cannot understand it, you know, because of we-because it is impossible to understand it you should not feel uneasy. You know, actual you are here, right here. So before you don't [thumps stick] understand yourself, you are you, you know. After you understand it, you are not you anymore [laughs].

But usually you stick to who is not you, which is not you, and you ignore, you know [laughs], the reality. And you feel uneasy with the reality, and you feel something, some satisfaction, you know, which is not real. As Dogen-zenji said, you know, we human being attach to something which is not real and forget all about which is real [laughs]. That is actually what we are doing. If you realize this point, you will have perfect composure in yourself, and you can trust, you know, yourself. Whatever happen to you, it doesn't matter. You can trust yourself.

That belief or that trust is not usual trust or usual belief in [that] which is not true, [that] which is not real. So when, you know, you are able to sit without, you know, being attached to any image or any sound, with open mind, that is true practice. And that you can do that means you are [have] already absolute freedom from everything.

Right now I am put emphasis on, you know, one side of the truth. But it is all right with you to have, you know, to enjoy your life moment after moment because you are not enjoy your life as something which is concrete and eternal. Our life is momentary, and, at the same time, each moment, you know, include its own past and future. Next moment will include its own past and future. In this way, our momentary and eternal life will continue. This is, you know, how we lead our everyday life, how we enjoy our everyday life, and how we get freedom from various difficulties. How we not suffer from difficulties and how we enjoy our life, moment after moment, is our practice, based on true understanding.

I was in bed for a long time, and I was thinking about those things, you know. I am just practicing zazen in bed [laughs, laughter]. I should enjoy my bed [laughs]. Sometime it was difficult, but [laughs, laughter] if it is difficult, I laughed at myself. "Why is it so difficult?" [Laughs, laughter.] "Why don't you enjoy," you know, "your difficulty?" [Laughs.] That is, I think, our practice.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript. Entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Verbatim transcript (checked against tape) by Bill Redican 7/14/00.

[1] Text in brackets from original transcript. Not on tape.

1969 april (4)

1 - The Only Desire that is Complete is Buddha's Desire

Tuesday, April 08, 1969

The Only Desire that is Complete is Buddha's Desire

[Recently][1] I was talking about denial of, you know, desires. This is very confusing, you know-may be confusing. Our way is not asceticism, but actually, what we-if you read, you know, our precepts literally, there is no difference [laughs]. But what it means is completely different. What is the difference is what I want to talk about tonight. Or what is the difference between "to study" and "to listen to." "Go to the master and listen to what he says" and "to study." Or why you started to study Zen. There must be some reason why so many people come and-come to Zen Center and practice Zen and study Zen.

I think this is because of the-because our culture-our civilization-came [laughs] already [to a] dead end, and if you realize that you cannot go any more-any further more. So someone who notice-people who notice that this is the dead end may come to Zen Center [laughs, laughter] to find out some way to go further. That is, you know, your feeling, you know, whether or not you understand what is dead end or why we came to the dead end.

The foundation of our culture is based on individualism. And individualism is based on, you know, idea of self, you know. And from the time of Renaissance, we awoke in our human nature, and we started to put emphasis on our human nature rather than, you know, something which is called "divine nature" or "holy nature." We put more emphasis [on] how-what we are and what is human nature. And we wanted to express our human nature as much as possible. But-and, you know, the human nature-holy nature, you know, or buddha-nature, were replaced by human nature. And that human nature is not what we mean by buddha-nature. This is, you know, starting point of mistake. So whatever the-whatever sort may be-communism, or capitalism, or individualism-all those sorts are based on individual right, or individual power, or individual-supremacy of individual.

So, for an instance, you know, individualism or capitalism seek for the freedom of our desire, our freedom, you know. But capitalism-or-but communism rather put emphasis on equality of the profits or right. But equality of-equality and freedom is not, you know, compatible, you know. If you want to be free, you know, from everything, if you want to extend your desire freely, limitlessly, you know, you-you cannot divide things equally, you know, because you want to extend your desire as much as you can. If each one of you extend, you know, their desire, it is not possible to-or have-to possess things equally.

But our conscience-our conscience always tell us, you know, "You should be free from-you should be free in extending your desire. It is all right. It should be all right to act freely, to possess things as much as you can, if you don't disturb people." But if you have too much, you know, when others do not have so many-so much, you don't feel so good. So [laughs] that is not compatible thought-those are not compatible.

Why, you know, this kind of-this individualism and to-and-or desire-freedom of desire and equality of our right is compatible is because our thought is based on, you know, self-centered idea. We, you know-when we say "equality," equality means, you know, equality of our human power. When we say "desire," "limitless desire," "freedom of desire," it means "our" freedom, "my" freedom, or "someone's" freedom.

So there is no idea of holy being, or Buddha, or God. There's no idea of it which will make some rule to-some background to give appropriate position to equality and desires or freedom. So those idea-those thought-if it is necessary for-for us to accommodate those thought without difficulty, it is necessary to postulate some big fundamental idea of non-selfish desire or limitless boundary of-boundary of material or place, which is not just material or spiritual. Something beyond spiritual and material is necessary. That is so-called-it "non-selfishness."

As long as our life is controlled or based on a selfish idea, you know, it is not possible for every thought to find its own place without fighting with each other. So there's no wonder why we have difficulty in our life when we-when our life is based on just, you know, superficial idea of self or individual.

Asceticism before Buddhism-asceticism before Buddhism put emphasis- they practiced asceticism for their future, you know, good life: to be born in some place where they have lot of enjoyment or more, you know, perfect world. That is, you know, a kind of selfish extension-extended selfish practice. But our mortification is not based on selfish desire. The purpose of our practice is to control our desires so that our desires find its own place and act properly. We control our desire. And so that every one of us, you know, without any difficulty, to extend our desire, we practice mortification.

So difference is our mortification is based on non-selflessness. And before Buddha's mortification is practice of mortification based on selfish desire or extended practice of selfish practice. When you practice-when you study Buddhism, you know, you have a lot of selfish idea: "I study. I must know what it is," you know. When you want to listen to your teacher, there is not much self, you know-selfish idea. That is the difference. This is very important point.

Why you should have a teacher is, without extending selfish practice or understanding, to learn the truth in its pure form, excluding selfish practice. Study is also, you know, practice. It is not just intellectual. It is intellectual practice. So it is nothing-it is not different from zazen because it is based on non-selfish idea. It is not selfish-extended selfish practice.

Why we say you should practice zazen without "gaining idea," you know: Gaining idea [is] based on selfish idea. And when you just sit because you are told to sit, because that is Buddha's way-only because that is Buddha's way-then you have not much selfish idea in your practice. When you have-you eliminate selfish idea from your practice, that is actually non-selfish practice-the true way of practicing true-true-truth.

In Shobogenzo, on the first chapter,[2] Dogen-zenji refers to interesting story. There were a priest called Gensoku.[3] Gensoku is the name of the priest who is taking care of a temple of Hogen-zenji.[4] And he-he thought he understood Buddhism very well, so he didn't ask any question to the master for three years. At last, the Hogen-zenji asked him, "It-it is already three years since you came here. Why don't you ask some question to me?" And Gensoku said-[someone raises a hand to ask a question][5]-excuse me?

Student A: The Lankavatara Sutra said-says that, like, that there are two different classes of beings. And one class-one person is called a "non-returner," and one person-one class is called the-the "returners," "the once-returners."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: I would-I would imagine that the former are the ones who would maintain or keep their selfish desires, whereas the latter would-would not keep their selfish desires.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. Yeah.

And "Why don't you come and ask some question?" he said-the master said.

But that acolyte, you know, said, "I-I studied for a long time under Seiho-zenji, [6] and I-I think I understand what is Buddhism completely," he said.

"How did you-how-how do you understand Buddhism, and what kind of teaching did you receive from him?"

And the priest said, "When I-when my former master asked me, 'How do you understand?' When-the old master said, 'It is,' you know, 'to study Buddhism is like to seek for fire. It is like a-a man who were-who was born in the Year of Fire,' you know, 'seek for fire.' Fire seek for fire, you know. And to study Buddhism is to study Buddhism. Who is-who himself-who is-who-he himself is Buddha. Buddha study Buddha. That is my understanding of how we study Buddhism."

The-but Hogen did not, you know, accept it. He said, "That is what I thought. You don't understand [laughs] what is Buddhism is at all."

So he was very much upset, and he went away. But before he traveled so long, he thought, "Hogen is the famous Zen master. There must be some reason why he said-he said so when I said to study Buddhism is fire seek for fire."

So he thought, "It may be good chance for me to have real understanding of Buddhism. He must have some good understanding of our way."

So he came back to him and asked him, "What is the way to study Buddhism?" he said. And the master said, "It is like a fire seek for fire" [laughs, laughter]. He repeated same thing.

And Dogen-zenji said, you know [laughs], and he enlightened, you know, by the same words. When-before he [was] enlightened, you know, he thought, "I understand," you know, "what is Buddhism." And he, you know-he thought, "My understanding is perfect." That is why his understanding was not perfect. When he gave up, you know, his intellectual understanding, his limited understanding, and seek for some more truth-when he tried to seek for some more, then he-his mind is open and enlightened.

So Dogen-zenji says, "If you understand like the acolyte, and think-think that is the way to understand what is Buddhism, Buddhism will not continue so long." We should not be-if it is all right to understand some teaching literally and stick to the teaching is all right. The Buddhism cannot be, you know, transmitted to us. When we limitlessly extend-try to extend our true nature, instead of selfish, limited self, then Buddhism is there. When we forget all about the limitation of-intellectual limitation of the teaching, then true Buddhism will be extended forever. In that way, Buddhism is-will have eternal future.

So some recent teaching or something which was told by someone, and if you stick to it, that is not true teaching. When you, you know, receive it-accept it with selfish-self- [partial word]-non-selfish attitude, you will have it. Something [If you have a?] humble attitude you will have true understanding of the teaching. The teaching is there. That is why Hogen-zenji is necessary for the acolyte-for the students.

If-written [?] teaching-even though Shobogenzo, you know, is perfect, there will be no[7] need to study Buddhism under some teacher. Even though Shobogenzo is perfect, you know, you want your teacher. That is why we recite sutra, you know, before we start lecture. Shobogenzo is here, and I bow to Shobogenzo, and I study Shobogenzo with you. If I say, you know, "I know something," that is wrong. The extended practice of bow to the Shobogenzo is how I speak about it and how you listen to it, instead of, you know, some confidence. If you have confidence, that confidence is not in something which you have, but confidence in something you can extend forever: something which comes from selflessness, which is the base or foundation of all teaching.

So instead of putting emphasis on Soto way, or Rinzai way, or Tendai way, we put emphasis on nothingness. Everything comes from nothing, and our way will be extended forever, limitlessly. That is how we study Buddhism.

Our desire, you know-our desire-when it-the desire based on selfish, you know, idea, that is not acceptable. We cannot accept that kind of desire. But our-when our desire is based on-when our desire is unselfish desire, we-that is how we extend our way.

So [there is a] difference between mortification of asceticism in pre-B-[partial word] [?]-Buddhistic practice and asceticism. Our way is different. And the way to control our desire looks like same, but actually completely different. This is the most important point, and I didn't refer to this point on this lecture-when I give lecture at Tassajara.

So to control-to extend our desire is to be strict to ourselves, you know. Without being strict with ourselves, we cannot do anything, because that will be the wrong practice. So first of all, you should-we should reflect on our practice. And before we say something, you know, we should reflect on ourselves. This is a very, very important point. You should not rely on some teaching, but you should reflect on yourself, and polish up yourself, and get rid of selfish idea as much as you can, even though you attained a wonderful attainment or enlightenment. If you do not polish yourself-if you forget to polish yourself-that enlightenment will not work. That is not real enlightenment.

When we realize ourselves, and when after reflecting on ourselves, and when we are able to see "things as it is," whatever the thought may be is acceptable: "Capitalism is all right. Communism is all right. Nothing wrong with it." But when we, you know, understand things-when our understanding is based on selfish idea, and when we try to force our opinion to others, then, without reflecting on our way, and when you attach to your own idea, rejecting other's idea, then you will be-your effort will end in dead end [laughs], you know. After all, you should fight-you will fight with others, that's all, and both will be hurt. You cannot survive any more because you lose your background-true background.

You will have some question? Please ask me.

Student B: Is deep breathing the same as introspection?

Suzuki-roshi: Introspection, yeah? First of all, we have to have wisdom to see things as it is. When we have no selfish idea, we can see things as it is. So we know what we are doing always, and we know that we are not perfect, and our idea is a one-sided idea. So we have, you know, always room to accept someone's idea, too, because we know that what I say or how I practice is not perfect. That is humbleness, you know. That is how to accommodate our opinion to other's opinions. Hai.

Student C: You said that we should control desire.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: And I still don't understand how to go about that.

Suzuki-roshi: How do you do that?

Student C: How do I control desire?

Suzuki-roshi: You shouldn't, you know-why I say so-how-why I say "control" is your, you know, way of extending desire is, you know, based on selfish idea. So you-with out reflecting, your desire is selfish one, you know, and you take it-you try to extend it. You think this is-there is nothing wrong, you know [laughs], to extend your desires. That is, you know, the mistake. Something matters [laughs]. Something wrong. It is something wrong if you extend-just extend your desire, without thinking or reflecting, without-not "control," but without observing your-without reflecting on your desires. What is desire, you know? Desire, in its usual sense, always based on selfish, you know, idea. Isn't that so? [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

But when you think, you know, "Nothing wrong to extend my desire" you know-if-if someone say you should-you should control, you know-you shouldn't do so, then you will feel bad [laughs]-you will feel some restriction. But if you-that is "control" in its ordinal [ordinary] sense. But when you realize-when you reflect on your desire, as a-if you understand your desire [as] pretty selfish, you know, then naturally you will limit your desire to some extent. That is not control. That is the way desire should be. There is big difference. Do you understand?

Student C: Could you explain the part of the [Heart] Sutra that says, "no eyes" [?]-until we come to our [2-3 words unclear].

Suzuki-roshi: "No-no eyes--"

Student C: "No eye."

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: "No eyes," until we-

Suzuki-roshi: "No eyes" or "no ears" means, you know-we-we think: "I have ears. I have nose," you know. But nose is not just nose, you know. Nose is some organ to smell, and ears some organ to hear. And combination of nose and, you know, the five senses-sense organs will have some understanding. So just nose or just ears doesn't work.

But we usually think: "I have nose. I have ears. Ears is-our ears is quite different organ from," you know, "nose." But that is not true. So even though you cannot see, you can tell-ear will-will "see" something [laughs], you know. The function of the ears will, you know, will change, and the ears will [have] some faculty to, you know, to see colors. And by listening to something, you know, you-you will see some color. That kind of change will take place, if you cannot see. So nose is not just nose, and ears is not just ears, as we understand. So "no nose"- "no nose" is right.

There is nose, that is right, and there is no nose. That is also right. And "yes" and "no" [laughs]. You should understand in two ways: yes and no [laughs, laughter]. That is complete understanding.

So you do not, you know, stick to your nose. "I have no nose. That's okay," you may say. "You have no nose." That's okay. "You have no ears." "That's okay," you may say. Both is true. The two ways of explaining something. So "no nose"-why it says "no nose" is because we think there is, you know, "nose." You shouldn't ask question like that, you know [laughs, laughter]. "No nose" is all right. When you do not ask question, if you take it for granted, you know, it is real understanding of things. That kind of, you know, wisdom is necessary if you want to see "things as it is." So as long as you have stick to some selfish, you know, understanding or special understanding, you cannot see things as it is. Hai.

Student D: If things as they are require selfless-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student D: -or are selfless, where does the small self come from?

Suzuki-roshi: Small self comes from?

Student D: Where does it-

Suzuki-roshi: Actually, there is no small self, you know [laughter], but you-you say there is small self [taps stick on table four times as he says previous words beginning with "say"]. That is the mistake. We-we usually have that kind of mistake.

Student D: Where did that mistake come from?

Suzuki-roshi: That mistake? That is not actually mistake, you know [loud laughter]. That is all right. But you say "mistake," you know. You may ask me why I say mistake. That is, you know, one-sided view [laughs]. You don't see things as it is because you stick to one-sided view [laughs]. Okay? [Laughing.] Judy, your eyes is wondering [laughs, laughter]-wondering "Is it all right? Is that true?" Hai.

Student E: You said that it is not good to allow our desires to extend themselves limitlessly. Would you also say it's not good to restrict them too much, so that it-one becomes unhappy and makes others unhappy too? [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: When I say restrict-you should restrict your desire, I mean you should not extend, you know, your desire in limited sense-limited sense. You know, for instance [picks up something], "This is my desire," you know. You limit the nature of desire already. So "without limitation" means to based or to have a wider understanding of the desire. Then you can extend forever.

Student E: What about a concrete situation [4-6 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Concrete situation? Concrete situation-yeah. Concrete situation-actually, you know, there is no concrete situation [loud laughter]. You know, if you say "concrete situation" [laughs] you should also say "limited desire," you know. When you say "concrete situation," the-your desire-your limitless desire-also limit- [partial word]-will be limited. But actually, you cannot limit your desire, or you-there is no concrete situation. It is, you know-somewhat it is changing.

Student F: Well. if someone comes up [to you] and you want them to do what won't-what they want to do, and-I had a-we have a choice. I mean, if someone comes up and like-someone goes and felt my arm to see how big it was [laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: Um-hmm.

Student F: And instead of showing off, I just let my arm-they held it-they grabbed my arm, and they expected me to go like that [possibly flexed his bicep]. But instead I just raised it. And then when I moved it again, I just lowered it. And wherever they put it I put my arm.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student F: And I was really surprised at my response. And I said, "Gee!" [Laughter.] What it is is a big [1-2 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. Yeah. But if you-if you see-if you reflect on your situation, as long as you see your situation, it is all right. Then you will not, you know, do anything too much or too little. You can do just [what] he wants.

Student G: Does reflecting on your desires make it-I mean, when you reflect-I mean-go ahead, Roshi [?]-I'm getting confused by it [laughs].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student G: I don't know. Do you mean that-I think that you say that if we think about our desires, then when we reflect on them, then we can-if we see they they're selfish desires, then we can limit them.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student G: Yes?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. You-you limit the desire.

Student G: Can you-can-could-could we-or should we limit our desires and, two, not ourselves but for other? In other words, like, if we have a desire and it's affecting the [2-4 words] what I want or maybe what someone is likely to need to pretend [4-6 words].

Suzuki-roshi: The point is, you know, the point is whatever the desire is, you know, it is necessary [laughs], you know, to-to control. It should be under control, in short. But why we should control our desire is [that] the desire we have right now, you know, in this moment, is not perfect one. More or less, our desire is involved in selfish, you know, selfish desire. So only one desire, you know, which is complete is Buddha's desire [laughs]. We should know that. And Buddha's desire is not desire-is not some desire which we have actually right now.

All the desires we feel we have is actually limited desire, not-not perfect desire. We should know that. But when we don't know that, we will get into trouble [laughs]. That is what I mean. The only perfect desire belongs to Buddha: perfect one which include everything. Whatever he does, it is all right, because he is just one whole being [laughs]. He is no-for him there is no friend or no enemy. What exist is Buddha himself. So for him it is all right, but for each one of us, which is a part of him, you know, it is necessary to, you know, to accommodate our desire. If I desire so much, you know, you should ask someone if I extend my desire little bit more [laughs, laughter] or not, you know. Hai.

Student H: Is our desires conditioned by our human nature?

Suzuki-roshi: Conditioned by?

Student H: Our human nature?

Suzuki-roshi: Human-when we say "human nature," you know, maybe human nature will be understood in two ways. In comparison to buddha-nature, we say human nature in its humble sense and humble attitude. And-but some-sometime most people say human nature-when most people say human nature, he may think, because this is human nature [taps something repeatedly], you know, nothing wrong to have human nature for a human being [laughs]. So I can do whatever we like! You know, that is another kind of understanding of human nature. We should know that, you know, when we understand human nature in its more humble way, you know, in comparison to perfect nature, then human nature makes sense. That is what I-we mean by human nature. Hai.

Student I: Supposing I would like a cheese-I have a desire for cheese.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student I: Then, as I understand you, to limit my desire is to eat some cheese but not eat too [?] much cheese.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student I: To not be greedy.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student I: But someone might interpret you to mean, "Well, since I have the desire for cheese, I must limit my desire. I will not allow myself to eat any cheese." And then that person might become envious and angry when he sees other people eating cheese.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.]

Student I: He will-he will be angry at them because they are eating cheese, and he doesn't let himself do it-

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.]

Student I: -but he has the desire for it.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student I: So-

Suzuki-roshi: But so-

Student I: I just think [?] it would be bad to be too strict-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student I: -as well as too free.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. So you should not interpret same, you know, words in always same way, you know. It is how-how we study Buddhism. If we can, you know, read same word same way-by the same way, that is another mistake. So constantly, you know, we must open our eyes, open our mind, and see the situation. That is the point.

Okay?

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Tanya Takacs and Bill Redican 11/20/00.

[1] The first word or two was missing on tape. "Recently" was added by the transcriber, based on usage in other lectures

[2] Shobogenzo "Bendowa."

[3] Baoen Xuanze (PY), Pao-en Hsuan-tsê (WG), or Ho-on Gensoku-zenji (Jap.): Chan master, disciple of Fayan Wenyi (Hogen Bun'eki) in 9th-10th century China.

[4] Fayan Wenyi (Jap. Hogen Bun'eki): 885-958. Founder of the Fayan (Jap. Hogen) school.

[5] The note in brackets is from the original transcript.

[6] Qianfeng Chuanchu (PY), Ch'ien-fêng Ch'uan-ch'u (WG), or (Jap. Seiho Denso-zenji or Kempo): no dates. Dharma heir of Luopu Yuanan.

[7] Suzuki-roshi definitely said "no."

2 - Afternoon Sesshin Lecture

Saturday, April 19, 1969

Afternoon Sesshin Lecture

Ryogen-sensei: Good afternoon. Are you very tired in sesshin? ...

Suzuki-roshi: [Whispers 1-2 sentences in Japanese, presumably to Ryogen-sensei.]

It is already 3:30. I have twenty minutes more. [Laughs.] Twenty minutes more.

Actually, Zen is not something to talk [about], and also it is something to talk [about]. [Laughs.] If you understand Zen in that way, your understanding will be perfect. If someone ask you, "What is Zen?" you may say, "Whatever you say, that is Zen." [Laughs.] And you may say, at the same time, "Whatever you say, it is not Zen." [Laughs.] Both is true for us.

So this kind of paradoxical statement could be understand just by your tummy [?] [making a gesture-possibly rubbing his stomach], you know, by your zazen, or else you don't understand. That is, you know, how we communicate with each other, without sticking to words. You should directly communicate with each other, not by words. This is very important.

So Zen is not something to study, maybe, you know, like you study science or philosophy. Zen is something to listen to. "Listen to" means, you know, to-with empty mind, to accept the truth without seeking for what your teacher says. Just, you know, listen to it with empty mind. Then his words will penetrate into your mind. So whether you understand it intellectually or not is not point. We say if you attend a lecture, even though you are sleeping, it is all right, we say, you know. [Laughs, laughter.] It is all right because, you know, the teaching will come right into your home, through your, you know, through your nose, or-what do you call, you know?

Student: Pores?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Students: Skin.

Suzuki-roshi: -skin, you know. So you-there is no need to listen to your ears. This is enough. [Laughs.] So to listen to it with empty mind is very important as you practice zazen.

Once Yakusan,[1] the famous Zen master in China, was asked to give them lecture. "It is so long since you give us your lecture, so please give some lecture after sesshin." [Laughing.] He came up to the altar and came down, and went [to] his room without saying anything. So for him, one minute is enough. For me, it takes twenty minutes; for him, one minute [laughter].

But his jisha[2] asked him, after he went back to his room, "Why didn't you give them lecture-some lecture, some words?" And he said, "I am a Zen master," you know. "So-but-so I will not say anything. If you want to study Zen, you should listen to some philosopher, you know-Buddhist philosopher, then he will explain it in detail [laughs, laughter]. I am a Zen master, so to practice with you is my motto [?]. So for me there is no need to speak, and for my student there is no need to receive any lecture."

There are many stories like this. In Shobogenzo, Dogen-zenji told us very interesting story. There were famous Zen master named Isan.[3] Isan and Kyozan[4] formed-established Iggyo-Iggyo Zen sect. Isan-some priest, some monk stayed Isan's temple for three years, but he didn't ask any questions. So Isan asked him, "Why don't you ask any questions?" This is a kind of opposite, you know [laughs]. "Why don't you ask any questions?" [Laughs, laughter.] That monk, you know, who was taking care of his temple, said, "I already," you know, "attained enlightenment under Seiho." [5] Seiho was also a famous Zen master-

Can you hear me?

-also famous Zen master. So Isan, you know, asked him, "How did you attain enlightenment?" Isan asked that monk. Monk said, "I attained enlightenment when he said, 'To study Buddhism is like a man who was born in year of fire, seek for fire.'" Isan said, you know, "As I thought, you don't-you didn't understand, " you know, "you didn't attain enlightenment yet." [Laughs, laughter.]

So he was rather upset [laughs, laughter], and he went away, you know. But on the way to some other Zen master, he thought, "Isan is a very famous Zen master, so there must be some deep meaning when he said, 'You didn't understand.'"

So thinking about why he said so, he came back to Isan's temple again and asked the same question-how to study Buddhism. He asked him-he asked Isan.

But Isan said, "It is like a man who was born in year of fire, seek for fire." [Laughs, laughter.] He repeated, you know, what he said, and, at that moment, that monk attained enlightenment [laughs, laughter].

Word is same, you know. First he tried to, you know-at first, his understanding was just intellectual one: "Everyone has buddha-nature," you know, "so it is rather foolish to seek for buddha-nature when he has-when everyone has-everyone, including him, has buddha-nature. It is foolish. I will never seek for buddha-nature." That was his understanding, but just intellectual understanding. He must have repeated same thing over and over wherever he go [laughs, laughter]. "It is like man who was born in the year of fire, seek for fire." That was his stock words.

But when Isan repeated same thing, he was struck [laughs] by his statement. Dogen-zenji says, "If study of Zen is like the way of studying as that monk, Zen will not be transmitted to us." In short, Zen will be understood by your direct experience. And if you want, you know, to have direct understanding, you must have some confidence, you know, you must have some conviction, strong conviction-conviction to study it, you know. "Whatever happened, I must understand it." This is very important. "How long it takes it doesn't matter. I will study it." This kind of-without this kind of conviction and without this kind of experience-direct experience based on strong conviction, you cannot, you know, attain enlightenment.

Someone, some swordman, you know, visited Yagyū Tajima,[6] famous swordman. I don't know whether it was Takuan-zenji[7] or Yagyū Tajima. I don't know. Or this is true story or not, I don't know [laughs, laughter]. Anyway, that man, you know, wanted to master martial art of kendo.[8] Asked him, "How long will it take for me to master," you know, "your way?" [Laughs.] The answer was something like that. "If you want to," you know, "master it in three years, it may take," you know, "one hundred years, maybe. But if you have strong conviction to be killed by me, then you will master it immediately." [Laughs, laughter.] That is, you know, the way.

Excuse me? [Students apparently could not hear in the back.]

Student: Roshi, we couldn't hear that back here.

Oh. "If you-if you expect to study-to master it, in three years," you know, "it may take one hundred years. But if you," you know, "if you don't mind to be killed [by] me in this place, you will," you know, "understand it right now." That was what he said.

You may understand how important it is to have some, you know, some strong conviction to practice zazen. When you sit, actually: "I shall never stand up," you know, "from this seat unless someone tell me to stand up," that is the way. Then, at that time, your practice is beyond space and time. "How long, it doesn't matter. Wherever I am-am I, it doesn't matter. I shall never stand up unless someone," you know, "tell me to stand up." That is shikantaza.

When I am talking to you, and when you are listening to me, I think you have that kind of conviction, and I have too [laughs]. But when you go home [laughs], what will happen? And when I am not, you know, talking, or when I am not practicing zazen with you, what will happen to me? That is the point.

So this kind of practice should be extended in your everyday life, but your way of everyday life should not be extended to our practice [laughs, laughter]. You should extend this kind of conviction, you know, to your everyday life. That is our everyday life. But we lose, you know-we easily lose this kind of conviction. That is a very important point, and in your everyday life I want you to-I want you to, you know, come back to this kind of conviction. Then, you know, your everyday life will be completely refreshed. And at the same time, I think, you will-it may be your great problem that you haven't this kind of conviction in your everyday life. This is very, you know, difficult thing.

When you eat, you know, for an instance, you rather eat something sweet and nice, you know. But actually, we should-whatever it is, you know, we should be ready to accept and eat, without saying, "This is delicious," or "This is not so good." When you, you know, want to have something more, you should be-you should, you know, come back to our conviction.

Kitano-zenji-when I was at Eihei-ji Monastery, head of the monastery was Kitano-zenji.[9] He told-he told us why he-how he gave up smoking. He was inveterate smoker when he was a monk, and he told us about it. "I was," you know, "very bad smoker." But when he was traveling, he came across the pass-Hakone Pass. It was misty weather. So, sitting on the rock on the top of the pass [path?], take out a pipe and started to smoke in misty weather. It is very good, as you know, to smoke in some damp, misty weather. It was so nice that he was struck by the, you know, by the taste of it, and he determined to give up [laughs, laughter] smoking. That was the last smoke, you know [laughs]. You know, wherever he is, you know, even he is resting on the top of the mountain after climbing up maybe eight miles, he was actually-he didn't lose the conviction [laughs] of practicing zazen. "Oh!" [Laughs, laughter.] "I must give up!"

No wonder he was such a spiritual character. Even though he is weak, you know, when he was more than ninety, you know, he was like this, you know. When he bow, we wondered-or we worried whether he can get up again. [Laughing, laughter.] We all watched him. But he get up, you know. Again and again, he bowed. And, you know, to watch him is much harder than [being] him, we thought. Full of spirit.

That is, I think, a good example. I'm not, you know, convincing you to give up smoking, or something like that. But we have-must have that kind of, you know, way-seeking mind. Then, you know, your practice will be pretty good.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Diana Bartle (7/21/00) and Bill Redican (9/27/00).

[1] Yakusan Igen: Yaoshan Weiyan (745-828). Ch'an master; dharma successor of Sekito Kisen.

[2] Traditionally, a monk who attends the head monk.

[3] Isan Reiyu: Guishan Lingyou (771-853). Ch'an master; dharma successor of Hyakujo Ekai.

[4] Kyozan Ejaku: Yangshan Huiji (807-883).

[5] Seiho Denso or Kempo: Qianfeng Chuanchu (no date). Ch'an master; dharma successor of Luopu Yuanan.

[6] Yagyū Tajimanokami Munenori was a master instructor, in the Yagyū Shinkage school, of traditional Japanese swordsmanship (ken). He was widely regarded as the most eminent swordsman of his day (Winston L. King, Zen and the Way of the Sword, New York: Oxford University Press, 1993, pp. 112, 167).

[7] Takuan-zenji: Takuan Soho (1573-1645), a Rinzai master of the Edo period and sword master of Yagyū Tajimanokami Munenori. The shogun requested him to write an instructional guide (The Unfettered Mind) for the great swordsmen of the period, including Yagyū Munenori (ibid., p. 167).

[8] Kendo: Way of the sword.

[9] Kitano Genpo-zenji (1842-1933): The 67th abbot of Eihei-ji Monastery.

3 - Why We Practice

Sunday, April 20, 1969

Why We Practice

It's-it is pretty difficult, but I will try-try to speak about purpose of our practice.

Before I try to explain our practice, I think I should explain why we practice, you know-why we should practice Zen when we have buddha-nature. And this is the great problem Dogen-zenji had. And he worked for this question before he went to China and met with Nyojo-zenji.[1]

And this is not, of course, so easy problem, but if you understand what do we mean when we say everyone has buddha-nature, and everything has buddha-nature. What does it mean? And he explained very carefully in Shobogenzo, on the-in the first chapter.

When we say "buddha-nature," you know, you may think buddha-nature is some innate nature, you know, because we say nature. In Japanese we use same words-nature-buddha-nature. But actually it is not nature like nature of human being or nature of plant-or nature of cats or dogs, you know. It is not, strictly speaking, it is not that kind of nature.

"Nature" means something which is there whatever you do. Whatever you do, there is nature. Nature is not something which is there, you know, before you do something. When you do something, you know, at the same time, nature appears. That is nature, you know. What he meant.

You know, you-you think, you know, we have buddha-nature within ourselves or innate-as a innate nature. And because of this nature, you do something, you know. That is usual understanding of nature [laughs]. But that is not his understanding. Or it is not like some seed, you know, which is there before plant come out you know. "That is not the nature which I mean," Dogen-zenji said. That kind of understanding of nature is, you know, heretic understanding of nature [laughs]. It is not correct understanding of nature.

That kind of nature is some idea, you know, you have in your mind. "Here is plant," you know. "So there must be-before this plant appear-there must be something-seed or within the plant, there must be some nature which promote the-its activity. Because of that nature, some flower is red and some flower is yellow." Most people understand in that way. So why we practice-when we think why we practice zazen is, you know, because we have nature-buddha-nature.

"So after," you know, "after practice-after training-after eliminate various selfish desires, that buddha-nature will," you know, "appear." That kind of understanding is based on unclear-unclearness of your understanding of observing-observing things. According to Dogen-zenji-he, you know, worked on this problem for a long time, so his understanding is very clear.

Only when you, you know-when something appears, there there is nature, you know. So nature or outlook of things is two names of one thing, one reality. Sometime we say buddha-nature. Sometime we say enlightenment or bodhi or buddha or attainment. But those are just-those are the two side of one reality. So not only we call it from those two side, but also we call it, sometime, "evil desire."

"Evil desires," we say [laughs], but it is another name of buddha-nature [laughs]. You say, you know, "evil desires," but for Buddha, that is buddha-nature, you know. There is of course, layman and priest [laughs], but usually you understand in that way, but actually there is no particular person to be a priest, you know. You may be-each one of you can be a priest and I could be a layman, you know. Because-just because I wear a robe I am priest. Because I behave like a priest maybe-like way, I am a priest. That's all, you know. There is no special person for priest or for layman.

So whatever you call it, that is another name of one reality. Even though you call it mountain or river, that is another name of one reality. So we should not be fooled by words of "nature" or "result" or "buddhahood." We should see thing itself with clear mind. In this way, we understand buddha-nature.

Then why we have evil desires at the same time is, as I explained, that is another name of buddha-nature. Then why we practice zazen-where-from where that evil desire [laughs], you know, come up ["out"?]-there is actually no place for evil desires. But actually, you know, we have so-called-it buddha-nature-evil desires which should be annihilated. Why is that? And where should I, you know, should we-after you eliminate, you know, buddha-nature-evil desires from us, you know, like this-here is evil desire [probably gesturing]. Where do you throw this away [laughs, laughter]?

You know, when we start to think in this way, we are already [laughs] started to understand things in heretic way [laughs]. That is just name, you know. Just name of one thing. There is no such thing to pull out, like this, and to throw away.

You may feel as if you are fooled by me, you know, but it is not so [laughs, laughter]. It is not a laughing matter. You know, we are seriously confronting with our selfish desires, and we are always observing things in wrong way. When we come to this point, it is necessary for us to understand our practice-our practice of shikantaza.

I said, where should I throw evil desire? There is very famous koan, you know. A man who climb up to the top of a pole.[2] If he stays here [tapping on stick, probably held to represent the pole], he is not enlightened one. When he jump off from the top of the pole, he may be a enlightened one. This is koan.

How we understand this koan is how we understand our practice. Why, you know, we have something which should be take out from us is because we, you know, stay here, you know [probably tapping the top of his stick]. Because you stay at top of a pole, you have problem, you know. But actually there is no pole for a-no top for a pole-for actual pole is continued, you know, endlessly forever. So you cannot stop here, actually.

But you think when you have some experience of enlightenment or something, you think we can rest here, you know, observing various sight at the top of a pole, forgetting all about to climb up-to continue climbing up a pole. We say, you know, this is-because this is koan, if-we say "usually," but "usually"-people think, you know, on the top-on the top for the pole. Usually we think in that way. But there is-actually there is no top for anything. Things are continuously growing or changing to something else. Nothing exist in its own form ["home"?] or color ["corner"?]. So actually there is no top. But when we think, "Here is a top," that is already misunderstanding.

So accordingly, you have problem whether we should jump off from here [laughs], you know. Actually you cannot jump off [laughs] where we-it is not possible. And even though you try to, you know, stop on the top of the pole, you cannot stay here because it is growing continuously [laughs]. So you will be continuously, you know, higher and higher. You cannot stop here. But you think it is possible.

That is the problem, you know. That is why you should practice and you should forget all about the top of the pole. If so, you know, where should I forget or throw our misunderstanding is right here [taps three times on table with stick], you know. Not this way or that way or past or future. Right here. You should, you know, forget all about the misunderstanding when the place where you are right now. Do you understand? You should, you know, forget this moment, and you should grow to the next-you should extend yourself to the next one. That is the only way. I think you must have understood our practice.

For an instance, you know, my wife [laughs]-every morning, when breakfast is ready, he hit, you know-what do you call it?

Student: Clappers.

Suzuki-roshi: Clappers? Yeah, clappers-like this. If I don't answer for it [laughs], you know, I-he-she may continue to hit it [laughs, laughter] until I feel rather angry [laughs, laughter]. Why we have that kind of problem is quite simple. Because I don't answer, you know. If I say "Hai!"-that's all [laughs, laughter]. Because I don't say "Hai!" she, you know, continue to-she has to continue because she doesn't know whether I heard it or not [laughs].

Sometime she may think: "He knows but he doesn't answer." Eei!
[Probably imitates a mock attack by Okusan.] [Laughs, laughter.] That is what will happen. When I don't answer, you know, I am, you know, on the top of the pole [laughs]. I don't jump off from here. When I say "Hai!" you know, I jump off from here. Because I stay at the top of the pole, I am-I have something to do-something important to do [laughs, laughter]-something important at the top of the pole: "You shouldn't call me! You should wait!" So before I say something I determined to shut up-not to say anything. "This is very important! Don't you know that?!" [S.R. and students laughing.] I am here [taps on stick], on the top of the pole! Don't you know that?" So she start to- [Probably gesturing.] That is how we create problem.

So the secret is just to say "Hai!" you know, and jump up from here. Then there is no problem. It means that, to be yourself-always yourself, without sticking to old self. When you say "Hai!" you know, you forget all about yourself and [are] refreshed into some new self. And before new self become old self, you should say another "Hai!" or you should work to the kitchen. So the point is on each moment, and to forget the point and to extend our practice, forgetting ourselves.

So, as Dogen-zenji says, "To study Buddhism is to study ourselves. And to study ourselves is to forget ourselves on each moment." To forget ourselves is-means to be yourself on each moment. Then everything will come and help you, and everything will assure your enlightenment. That is enlightenment, you know. When I say "Hai!" you know, my wife will assure my enlightenment. "Oh, you are a good boy!" [Laughs, laughter.] But I stick to the "good boy"-you know-"I am good boy." [Laughs, laughter.] I will create another, you know, problem. "Oh, you are good boy. Then you have to help yourself," she may say. So I shall not be good boy any more. I shall not be enlightened one.

So on each moment [laughs] you should be concentrated yourself, and you should be really yourself. At that moment, where is buddha-nature, you know? Buddha-nature is actually when I said "Hai!" That "Hai!" is buddha-nature itself, in its true sense. Buddha-nature which you have proudly within yourself is not buddha-nature. Actual buddha-nature is when you say "Hai!" or when you become you yourself, or when you forget all about yourself. There is another name-you will have another name of Buddha or buddha-nature.

So "nature" is not something which appear-which will appear in future. Buddha-true, real buddha-nature should be something which is actually [taps on table with stick] here-there. If you cannot see actually what is buddha-nature [taps], it doesn't mean anything [laughs]. It is rice cake or painted rice cake. It is not actual one. If you want to see the actual rice cake, you should see it when it is there. So purpose of our practice is just to be yourself. When you become yourself in that way, you have really-real enlightenment is there. The enlightenment you have in your mind, you have attained-you attained long-you attained long time ago is not actual enlightenment.

Back and forth when we-you understand our practice, you will enjoy your practice, thinking about what kind of practice you had had before you attained actual enlightenment. Sometime you will have pity on someone who has-who is involved in wrong practice. And sometime you will laugh at yourself, you know, when you fall in-when you are involved in wrong practice. "Oh, what are you doing?" [Laughs.] You will, you know, laughed at you-you will tease yourself: "What are you doing?" You will have various feeling. All the real compassion or real love or true encouragement or true courage will arise from here. You will be not only courageous person but also you are very kind person when you reach-when you understand yourself in that way.

So one practice include various virtue, and one feeling of practice will result [in] various feeling like a wave on the sea. So we say, "One practice covers everything"-various virtue. And when you practice your practice in that way, you may be a piece of stone, you may be a tree, you may be a star, you may be a ocean. So you cover everything.

That is how we practice zazen when-before you attain enlightenment. Actually, enlightenment is, you know-will be there only before you attain enlightenment, or just before [laughs]. You will say-if you say, "I attained enlightenment," you know, it is too late to say [laughs, laughter]. You should say, you know, you should say before smallest particle of time imaginable, if you want to say [laughs]. But if you cannot say, maybe better to be silent. Better not to say anything.

So to talk about enlightenment is rather, you know [laughs], foolish-rather foolish. But sometime we have to talk about it in this way until we lose our, you know, "eyebrow" [laughs]. You know, to talk about it is to lose our eyebrow, you know-to lose ourselves.[3] Instead of being ourselves. In this sense, we say "be yourself" to be natural. If you say, "This is the way to be natural," you know, that is not natural [taps table]. Only when you are you in its true sense, on this moment, at this place, that is "naturalness." So there will not be any particular way to be "natural."

For me, you know, to be here right now is naturalness. And to wear robe is naturalness. And to shave my head is naturalness, as a priest [laughs]. In this way, we should-our practice-we should practice our way and we should remember this. It is not so easy [laughs] to be natural. Not so easy.

If we have, you know-in our practice if we have a smallest gap, you know, we will, you know, fall into hell. So our practice should be, you know, continued. Continuous practice is necessary. And we should not, you know, rest. We should continue it, if possible, without trying to, you know, continue it. Just, you know, to have generous mind and big mind and soft mind is how to continue our way. And we should be always flexible, you know. We should-we should not be-stick to anything.

I will not repeat same thing over and over again [laughs, laughter]. I think this is enough. To change our topic or angle of understanding, if you have some question, please ask me. Hai.

Student A: You said when we had the smallest "something," we will fall into hell. I didn't understand-

Suzuki-roshi: Smallest. Yeah.

Student A: -what word you used.

Student B: It sounded like "cup."

Audience: "Gap."

Student B: "Gap."

Suzuki-roshi: "Gap," yeah. Gap, yeah. But gap between our effort, rather-rather than gap-our gap of our-gap between our efforts. It is, you know, to be more-we say "soft mind," you know. It is, at the same time, it is big mind, you know, because we do not stick to anything. We do not see things objectively as something good or bad, or strong or weak because, you know, we are strong enough to accept things as it is. So for us who have big mind there is no need to be afraid of anything. But we do not ignore anything. That is strictness of the way.

When we are not afraid of anything, that will be unperturbability [imperturbability]. And the effort-when the effort is understood by him, you know, to the point that is simplicity, there is no need for him to make his effort in various direction, you know. The only way is just to be yourself on each moment. Our only way is to be concentrated on what you do, completely. [Sentence appears to have been finished. Tape turned over.]

... whatever it is, you know. In that way, if you understand our way in that way, that is simplicity. And if it, you know-when the feeling of practice could be extended various way, that is the, maybe, the beauty of the practice. Here we have simplicity and variety of feeling of practice. Simple and rich. Strong and weak. Strong and kind. This is, you know, our practice. So you cannot say what is our practice-it-because it could be various virtue. It is not-it should not be so difficult [laughs], but it is difficult, you know. That is our way. So you cannot say our way is quite easy [laughs]. Or you cannot say our way is very difficult. It is not difficult at all. Everyone can do it, but to continue it is rather difficult. Don't you think so? [Laughs, laughter.] You agree with this point [laughs, laughter].

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997.
Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Tanya Takacs
and
Bill Redican (2/23/01).

[1] Tendo Nyojo (Tiantong Rujing): 1163-1228. Chan master; teacher of Eihei Dogen.

[2] From Ts'ung-jung lu (J. Shoyoroku, E. Book of Serenity), Case 79: "Changsha Advancing a Step": "Climb one step beyond the top of the hundred-foot pole. The whole world in the ten directions is revealed." See also SR-69-04-29 and SR-69-06-17.

[3] "He is making reference to a lecture by Rev. Yashimuro [Yoshimura?] on a koan." [Footnote is by original transcriber. Suzuki-roshi may also be referring to the mirror parable in the Shurangama-sutra-see SR-69-07-30.]

4 - Bodhisattva's Vow

Tuesday, April 29, 1969

Bodhisattva's Vow

This morning I want to explain how to take our bodhisattva's vow. We say "bodhisattva's vow," but actually this is not only Mahayana Buddhist vow but also all the Buddhist vow. When we say Mahayana, we also-it means that something-usually it means that the something superior teaching in contrast with Hinayana. But this is-may not be real understanding. According to Dogen-zenji, this is not right understanding, to say "Hinayana" or "Mahayana."

From the beginning of-the Agama-sutra[1] is supposed to be the oldest sutra-Buddhist sutra, but even in Agama-sutra this kind of thought is there. [It] says, Shujo muhen-"Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them." [2] Why Buddha, you know, come to this-came to this world is to save sentient beings. Usually those who do not believe in Buddhism comes to come to this world because of karma. But for Buddhist-for Buddha, he did not come to this world because of the karma.

In Agama-sutra, they say Buddha passed away by his own choice. And because he finished his task, he-because he has nothing to do more in this world, he took nirvana, it says. When he finished, you know, his task he took nirvana. It means that already [the] purpose of his coming to this world is to save sentient beings or to help others. So if that is, you know, the reason why he come to this world if he finish his task-when he finished his task, there is no reason why he should stay in this world. So he took nirvana.

So underlying thought [is] already to help others, to save sentient beings. Usually, you know, Mahayana Buddhist denounced Hinayana Buddhism. Only Mahayana-Hinayana Buddhist just practice our way to help themselves, not to help others. That is what they say, but actually when they say in Agama-sutra that he took nirvana because he finished his task in this world, it means that already he came to this world to save others. And [in] various Hinayana-so-called-it Hinayana sutra, we find this kind of thought everywhere. Anyway, those vows are supposed to be Mahayana-Bodhisattva's vow or Mahayana vow, but it is actually-those four vows actually [are a] vow for all Buddhists. All Buddhists should have this vow.

To take vow is very important. To believe in Buddhism means to take vow. If you don't take vow, life will be life of karma. Only when we take vow, we-our life is life of Buddhist. And how to take vow is with-should be ex- [partial word]-may be the most important point. How to take vow.

Another reason Mahayana Buddhist denounce Hinayana-so-called-it Hinayana Buddhist is they are rigidly caught by precepts or teaching or what was told in scriptures. And they have no freedom from precepts or teaching. That is another reason why we denounce-why Mahayana-so-called-it Mahayana, Buddhist denounce Hinayana Buddhist.

But when Buddhism [was] started by Buddha, there was Maha- [partial word]-there were-there was not much difference between-actually, Buddhism was Mahayana. So if I dare to say, that was Mahayana. And why Maha- [partial word]-so-called-it Mahayana Buddhist arise was mainly Buddhist teaching of Buddhism or teaching of Buddhism became more and more concrete or caught by concrete idea of some particular teaching or some precepts. And they rigidly try to stick to the teaching. At first it was they respected the teaching too much and preserved-trying to preserve teaching, and that was the purpose of the priest especially. And this kind of effort result [in] very rigid understanding of precepts or teaching. So when, for an instance, they had-they-at first, Buddha did not have no idea of setting up precepts. And some-when someone do something wrong, Buddha just said, "That is not right. Why don't you do it this way?" That was the precept-the original precept. So there was no precepts in term of "Don't do-this is a precepts all the Buddhist should keep."

But when we count precepts in-like Ten Precepts-Ten Prohibitory Precepts, it is, you know-we feel as if we-if we fail to observe those Ten Precepts, you know-if you miss-if you cannot [if you violate] even one of the ten, you will not be the good Buddhist. So the purpose of precepts, receiving-taking vow or taking precepts is just to, you know, observe those things literally. That is maybe the usual way of understanding of precepts. But a true purpose of precepts is not just to observe precepts so that you can attain enlightenment.

Why we observe precepts or why we take vow is to actualize Buddha's spirit-Buddha spirit. So to take vow I, you know, this is the way: "Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them." The sentient being are numberless, you know-if it is numberless, you know, how is it possible to save them? [Laughs.] Same thing will be true with keeping precepts, you know. We should not kill: We should not take life without reason. "Without reason" is, you know, extra, you know. Without reason-we shouldn't say "without reason." We should just say, "You should not kill." [Taps table four times.] That is enough, you know.

When you fell into the idea of more usual, you know, secular understanding of precepts, you should say, "without reason" [laughs], if it means that if there is some reason, we can kill. By saying so we are making some excuse to kill. But why we have to make this kind of excuse is because you think the purpose of keeping precepts or taking vow is to attain enlightenment. And if you do not kill, or do not observe precepts, or do not take vow, you will not be a Buddhist or you will not attain enlightenment.

But purpose of-if you understand the purpose of observing the precepts is-precepts is to arise buddha-mind, then when you say "I will not kill," at that moment you have buddha-mind. There is no need to think, "I have to keep or observe precepts or vow forever." Even though-actually we don't know what we will do in next moment [laughs]. It is very difficult to know, to be sure about our future. But even it is so right now "I will not kill!" That is enough to arise buddha-mind. Even though it is not possible to save all sentient beings, but moment after moment if you say, "I must save all sentient being"-then you have buddha-mind.

So to arise-to be a Buddhist, moment after moment, we take vow. So it is not necessary to think about whether this is possible or not. When you take vow or when you keep precepts in this way, your way is already is not Buddhist way. You are fell into the superficial practice of "you should do" or "you should not," or "you should take vow" or "you shouldn't take vow." To take vow is to observe our way. So this is one of the way-many ways to practice our way, like zazen practice.

So "Sentient beings are numberless": Maybe, you know, it means that sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them moment after moment, continuously. But "moment after moment, continuously" is not necessary. "I vow to save them" is strong enough and good enough. "I vow to save them." If the sentient beings are numberless, we will take this vow numberless times, that's all [laughs]. In this way, we feel another, you know, quite-feeling of quite different quality. We feel the eternal practice of our way, of our Buddhist way. So that it is-"Sentient beings are numberless" means that our practice is-will continue forever.

"Desires are inexhaustible. I vow to put an end to them." [3] If our-the purpose of keeping precepts is to annihilate our desires. This vow is con-[partial word]-not possible, contradiction. But if the purpose of vow is to arise our buddha-mind, then it makes sense. The "inexhaustible" is some-gives us some encouragement, and we can continue our practice forever. And we-we will have firm confidence in our practice which continue forever. So we will be encouraged by this vow forever.

"The dharma is boundless. I vow to master them." [4] Here it says also "boundless," the boundless dharma. I vow to master it. So our vow will continue forever, and we-we can believe in our boundless dhamma. [5]

"The Buddha's way is unsurpassable. I vow to attain it." [6] The same thing will be true with this vow.

In this way, we should take vow and we should keep our precepts. When you receive precepts, you know, you say, "I will," you know, "keep it," you say. When I give you precepts, you say, "I will keep it." It is not even promise. When you say, "I will do it," by words that is how you keep precepts. "I will do it." That's enough.

But you [laughs]-you may think, you know, when you don't know, you can [how can you?] keep the precepts. To say "I will keep it" is, you know, not so conscientious, you may say. When you take the precepts in that way, or when you receive precepts in that way, you are not receiving precepts in its true sense as Buddha expected. Why don't you say, "Yes, I will do it." [Hits table several times.] That is what Buddha wanted you to say. That's all. And whether you can keep it, you know, in next moment or next day is not the point. Do you understand? So it not so-it is not difficult at all to receive precepts. We say so-so we say, to receive precepts is to arise buddha-mind. To receive or to give precepts is to arise buddha-mind at that moment. It is not matter of keeping precepts literally or not. To arise buddha-nature, buddha-mind [we say], "I will do it!"-you know. That's enough.

You know, when you say "I will not say so because I don't know whether I can do it or not," that is maybe a kind of arrogance, which is the enemy of Buddhist. People may say, you know, people who is not so conscientious may say, "I will do it." But a person like me who is very conscientious will not say [laughs], "I will keep it." You see? Big arrogance is there [laughs]. Anyway, you know, you say-when you say, "I will keep it!"-you know, there is no arrogance. There is soft mind, which we Buddhist expect is there when you say, "I will do it. At least I try to do it." And "try to do it" will not be so good, you know. "I will DO it!" [laughs], you should say. "I will try to do it" is you are hesitating. "I will do it" is like to jump into the ocean. "I will do it!" Then there is no trouble.

The other day I told you about to climb up the top of the pole and to jump off the top of the pole. [7] We say-usually we say to climb up the top of the pole is easy but it is difficult to jump off from it. I don't think this is true [laughs]. To climb up, you know, to the top of the, you know, pole is difficult, but to jump off from it is not difficult. The way is just so say, "I will do it!" [Laughs.] When you think which is easier, you know, to climb up to the top of the pole or to jump off from the top of the pole, which is easier? [Laughs, laughter.] When you-because you are thinking that way, it is difficult. When you don't think, when you trust Buddha, and when you say, "I will do it!" that is way-easy way.

We are liable to be caught by something we see or something we experience, and we liable to compare one experience to the other and say which is difficult. So you say to climb up, you know, to the top of the pole is difficult-too easy in comparison to jump off from the pole [which is] not so difficult, but to jump off is very difficult. But you shouldn't say so [laughs]-or because you say so, because you think so, because you compare the experience of jumping off from the pole to the experience to climb up, you hesitate to do so. So how you keep this-those-how you keep precepts or how you take vow, four vow, is to-to do it, you know, without being involved in some idea of vow or practice or precepts.

In Japan, Buddhist receive precepts-we say jukai-and everyone says, "I will keep it." [Laughs.] And when I was young, you know, I thought this is nonsense. [Laughs.] How they keep precepts, you know? When they go home have to eat eggs, meat, even they eat rice, that is living being. They are killing everything as long as they live. How is it possible to say, you know, "I will keep it. I will not kill"? But later, you know, I was strucked by them when they say, "I will keep it." [I thought], "Oh, that is the way," you know, "to keep precepts."

In this way, we should take vow-Mahayana vow. This is the way the Buddha's disciples-direct Buddha's disciples took vow. Later, you know, Buddhism became more and more idealistic or more rigid, and we lost the important point. Those things is not something which we should be told. Actually we are doing-we are leading our life in this way. If you observe carefully our everyday life, we are actually doing so-doing in this way. When we understand our life in some sophisticated way [laughs], you get into trouble.

So if you want to study our way, we must not forget this point. It is necessary to study, of course, but in your study if you lose this point, your knowledge or your study will not work. You cannot own your knowledge in its true sense.

Thank you very much.

---

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Sara Hunsaker.
Checked by Bill Redican (2/23/01).

[1] Agama-sutras (Jap. Agon-gyo): A collection of four Sanskrit sutras roughly corresponding to the Pali Nikaya. The Agamas form the basis of Hinayana teachings.

[2] Shujo muhen seigando: "Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them"-the first line of the four-line vow traditionally chanted after lecture.

[3] The second line of the four-line vow traditionally chanted after lecture.

[4] The third line of the four-line vow traditionally chanted after lecture.

[5] Suzuki-roshi used the Pali pronunciation.

[6] The fourth line of the four-line vow traditionally chanted after lecture.

[7] From Ts'ung-jung lu (J. Shoyoroku, E. Book of Serenity), Case 79: "Changsha Advancing a Step": "Climb one step beyond the top of the hundred-foot pole. The whole world in the ten directions is revealed." See also SR-69-04-20 and SR-69-06-17.

1969 mei (1)

1 - Suzuki-Roshi's 65th Birthday

Sunday, May 18, 1969

Suzuki-Roshi's 65th Birthday
Soko-ji, San Francisco

I don't know what to say. I am already 65 years old. Today I became 65. And I am-in one way, I am very-I feel very good to become older. And on the other hand, I regret, you know, for my past practice. Not regret-I am not so regret-regretful, but reason why I am not so regretful is we have now pretty sincere students here in America. That is big encouragement for me. Why I am regretful is-on the other hand, why I am regretful is because I am not so good teacher for you, because of my past practice. I try to be sincere, but I find now that I was not sincere enough [laughs]. That is my feeling. So I don't know what to say [laughs].

But let us, anyway, have more sincere practice. Even though you think you are sincere, [you] may not be sincere enough. That will-that will be how you feel when you become old.

You know Joshu,[1] famous Zen master Joshu-he joined-or he attained enlightenment when he was eighteen, and he was practicing hard until he was sixty. And after sixty he started new practice, making trip to visit various famous Zen masters. And he never sit in perfect chair like this. His chair was always broken-he sit always on broken chair, mending, you know, the chair by piece of wood and rope, like this [probably gesturing].

I think that is true spirit of Zen master or priest. The image of the priest you have and image of priest we have may be something different. For us, Fuyo Dokai[2] or Joshu is the best example for us. With great spirit and with humble life, they strived for the truth. So what I feel is I wish I could, you know, make a trip to visit various teachers. So far, I had so busy days when I was in Japan. I was too busy. In America, for a while I was not so busy. I enjoy [laughs] American life here. But now I feel pretty busy. So actually I have no time to visit various teachers.

To Tassajara I am lucky to have, but I am lucky to have good teachers visiting Tassajara. But if I could make a trip, you know, it may be much better: with-as a unknown priest to visit-unknown humble priest, you know, and to ask question and to receive instruction. In this way they studied.

Joshu said: "If someone is good I will study under him. If I am better, I shall be a teacher, wherever I go. Whether he is old or young is not point," Joshu said. So we should be always equal, you know. If you know better than I, you should teach me. If I know something which you don't know, we should-I should teach you. In this way, we should practice our way.

We have many teach- [partial word]-students now. That is, I think, very good. But it is difficult for me to take care of you, because you are so many [laughs]. I don't know what to do with so many students. I am thinking always [about] that point. And while I was in bed, what I thought was it may be better for us to be concentrated on more simple practice. The most-I think the most simple practice is counting breathing practice: suzoka [?]. This is very old style of practice. That-this practice was for Hinayana Buddhist and for Mahayana Buddhist and for Bodhidharma's zazen and for various teachers' practice. And which is very simple and-but which is pretty difficult: just to count from one to ten, over and over. [Laughs.] That is practice.

From old time, many people tried this way. Just counting inhaling only, or exhaling only, or both inhaling and exhaling. Can you hear me? Inhaling and exhaling. So there are three ways. So you can try, you know, any of those three ways. I try-I am practicing on counting exhaling only. And I want you to, you know, try this practice more. I think you started-you have tried already, but before you can complete it [laughs]-many people asked me, so far: "I tried counting breathing practice for one year. So maybe the time to start-how about just following," you know, "our breathing, without counting? Just follow the breathing."

So-but I-I always said okay. [Laughs, laughter.] But I think I was not so kind to you. I know he-he couldn't, you know-for-even though he tried one year, he may not be able to, you know, to do it. Why he says is-that is because he lose-he forget to count [laughs], maybe, you know. So many times he forget counting, or he may go from ten, eleven, twelve [laughs, laughter], thirteen, fourteen-and forget. Maybe forget sometime. So that is why he said-that was the reason why he said: "It may be better just to follow our breathing" [laughs].

So I-I said [it] be all right. But recently I don't think so [laughs]. We have to-we should be able to do it. After you are able to do it, you should start another practice, one by one. In that way we should practice. That is very interesting. When you are too tired, you cannot do that. And when you are too much involved in something, specially, you cannot also do it. For an instance, at Tassajara, like Paul,[3] who is always thinking about building [laughs], his practice will be always, you know, building practice [laughs]. I think that is not so good. I-I see something wrong, you know, with their everyday life when he is, you know, involved in something specially, forgetting all about our practice.

If we-if we ignore this point, Tassajara will not go smoothly and you will not be friendly with each other. Someone may be, you know, involved in building. Someone may be completely involved in office work or kitchen work, and someone may be involved in pure practice. So there is no, you know, common practice for us. So we should not lose the fundamental practice. I noticed this point recently.

And especially older student-old students is not so good for their practice-zazen practice. This is serious [laughs] matter for Zen Center. The reason why is not because our practice is not mature, but we are not sincere enough for-in our practice. So every one of us-for every one of us, the most important point should be our practice. As long as they enter zendo, they should practice our zazen sincerely. And we should be involved-we should devote ourself for beginner's practice like counting breathing.

We say "koan zazen"- "koan Zen," or "shikantaza," but, you know, that is only-in its strict sense, koan Zen or shikantaza is for very advanced students, not for us. Before we can practice koan Zen or shikantaza, we should be able to practice counting breathing practice and-or following breathing practice. This is very-which is very close to shikantaza: just follow our breathing. And then, maybe, we can say our practice is shikantaza.

The people say Soto Zen is "sleepy [laughs] zazen." Soto priest, even though their posture is good, but they are sleepy. That is true [laughs, laughter]. We become easily sleepy-especially, you know, when we are completely involved in some heavy-physically heavy work or when we are want of sleep.

And to count breathing is-if you count your breathing, you will easily notice that you are not taking care of your everyday life. So if you-if you find out some physical reason, or some reason why you cannot do that, you will notice the reason why, and you can organize your everyday life more. That is the one advantage-one of the advantage of monastic practice. If you are in Tassajara, you are comparatively in good situation. Although those things looks like very minor problem, but actually, if we ignore this point, even though you try to achieve something great, you will not be able to do it.

In Japan, you know, they-scholars and teachers study Zen from various angle-Zen and Buddhism from various angle. But if they ignore those points, it may be like counting sand-counting sands of Ganges. It doesn't work at all [laughs]. They will create more problems [laughs]. So Buddhism will be lost. I think this is very serious problem.

But before I think we talk about or worry about those things, we should do-do it, you know. We should practice real practice, without counting others' treasure, you know. It doesn't, you know, mean anything to count someone's treasure.

So let's start, you know, counting breathing practice, you know, with all of us. I-I think I will go to Tassajara again next month-first, maybe, fourth or-third or fourth. We have two more weeks, so we will be concentrated on our counting breathing practice.

I have not much things to say for this morning, but I thought I must ask you-it might be very good idea to ask you to be concentrated on this counting breathing practice. One by one, in this way, we will solve our problems. You made a great progress, actually, but, on the other hand, there is some, you know, danger in it.

So we must, you know, step by step, we must make mule step [laughs]. Better than horse, maybe. The cow step is best for-for us, but that is too slow for American people [laughs, laughter]. Let's make our, you know, practice sure, you know. Sure and steady.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Dana Velden and Bill Redican (11/10/00).

[1] Zhaozhou Congshen (Joshu Jushin): 778-897. Disciple of Nansen Fugan.

[2] Furong Daokai(Fuyo Dokai): 1043-1118. Disciple of Tosu Gisei. Furong was known for renewing the monastic standards of the Caodong-zong school of Chan Buddhism. Dogen commended him for refusing either to wear elaborate robes or to accept imperial honors.

[3] Almost certainly Paul Discoe.

1969 juni (3)

1 - Find Yourself Mentally and Physically

Sunday, June 01, 1969

Find Yourself Mentally and Physically
Tassajara

A famous Chinese Zen master, Yakusan,[1] did not give lectures for a long time. So his student asked him to give a lecture. So he came to lecture hall and mounted the altar, and sitting on the altar for a while, and came back to his room without saying anything. And his jisha asked him why he didn't give them lecture-some talk. Yakusan said: "I am a Zen master. So if you want-if you want to listen to lecture, you should go to some-some other master, like some Buddhist philosopher or someone who knows many scriptures. But I am Zen master, so you should know that I am Zen master," he said.

Last night Reverend Katagiri[2] was talking about how we should make our effort. When we say "to make some effort," [it] means to make effort with some goal or with some aim. For many hundreds of years, especially after Renaissance, we human being are involved in how to make our life easier and happy. So we are involved in scientific research. And to make effort means to find out some-to be involved in some scientific research, or to make freeway, or to work, to find a job, to earn some money, and to make our life happier-mostly in materialistic way.

So "to make effort" means, I think-mostly, we understand in that way. But to make effort or to study something means-does not mean that kind of study like the student of Yakusan who asked him to give some lecture.

While I was in bed for maybe two, three months, I found very difficult to put myself-to put my body on my bed. I tried various way, but it was pretty difficult. To lie on bed looks like very easy thing, but actually, you know, if you stay in bed so long time it is not so easy.

So how to, you know, find yourself physically and mentally is not so easy a thing. But when you are involved in something, you forget that point. And you are always running after something, to get something, to gain something, without finding yourself in right position.

Of course, we must work as long as we live in this world, which is organized in very materialistic way. It is necessary to work with this-in this sense. But more important thing is to find ourselves physically and mentally in right position. You may say to sleep on bed-in bed is not work [laughs]. It is most important work for us, in its true sense. To, you know, to work-to walk on the floor, you know, is very important work. You will find out important it is, you know, when you are hardly walk [work?]. To go to rest room is very important thing. If you cannot go to rest room, what will happen to you? The most important thing. But you don't think that is so important: those activity like to cook something in the kitchen, or to rinse your mouth as soon as you get up, or to get up at right time in right way. Those activities are ignored, or we don't pay any attention to those activities. Zen students put empha-[partial word]-put-pay mostly, you know, attention to those things. And, moment after moment, to find ourselves physically and mentally, is how to attain liberation.

What we do, you know, for an instance, to sit in this cross-legged position like this. And we, you know, pay utmost attention to, you know, our posture. It means that we find ourselves, moment after moment, what will be the best position right now. That is how we make effort.

So why we sit is not actually to attain enlightenment. To sit to attain enlightenment is something heretic [laughs] practice. When you, you know, without paying attention in your posture or in your state of mind, to seek for some other thing or to be involved in a gaining idea, forgetting our physical-physically and mentally our present life is not true zazen. What we do looks like very formal, you know. But it is not actually formality in its usual sense. When we pay best attention in our activity, moment after moment, naturally we will be formal, and we will be very careful in treating things, in acting, and in doing various things.

So in this sense, to bow to Buddha or to drive your car doesn't make much-any difference. If you do-when you-you have this kind of life, we say we have complete freedom because we are always amidst the center of the cosmic being, without being involved in anything else. We are-we are boss of everything. We are doing things for ourselves. Each one of us doing things for each one's own sake, and we are independent from everything. That is complete freedom, complete liberty.

So each one of us must have his own, you know, domain or castle. And we always try not to disturb others' life, but to help other's practice. That is true relationship, one to the other. We treat things not to destroy their own nature-nature of being. So we treat things very carefully. Nothing is-everything has its own buddha-nature. So we should respect everything and treat everything in that way. That is our attitude to treat things.

But usually, you know, we treat things for- [partial word]-forgetting all about the true nature of things, and [we] abuse things for our own sake. Animals and vegetables are raised for benefit of human being [laughs]. This is very, you know, very shallow, very egoistic, ego-centered way of observing things, way of treating things. But mostly it-it is quite usual for people to use things in that way or to treat even your friend in that way.

That is difference Reverend Katagiri was talking [about] last night: the difference between usual effort and our effort. Our effort is-should be-our right effort should be continued incessantly, without any gap. Carried on forever. That is what we mean [by] to make right effort. Not-not only people-nowadays people or-not only non-Buddhist but also Buddhist and especially even priest has been involved in this kind of-Buddhist priest has been involved in this kind of wrong activity for a long time, I think-I am afraid. So I think now people already begin to realize what we have been doing for a long, long time. And they started to-to be aware of-started to realize their wrong effort.

I think we must be concentrated in-to concentrated in some kind of effort which is quite different-which has quite different quality-quite different meaning. You will realize exactly what Buddha meant when he said: "You should make great effort to attain liberation and to continue our sincere effort-to continue our true effort." And so he explains mostly about our wrong effort, what is-what we are doing actually, and what kind of disaster we will have by our wrong effort. He points out what is wrong with us-with our eye [?]. That is Buddha's teaching.

And actually, what is right effort is very difficult to explain. So to realize our mistake and to start to find out how to behave-how to make our right effort will be our-our practice. This kind of practice also will be continued forever. And way we behave, way we do, should be always renewed according to the time [and] according to the place you live. On each situation we must find how to live [and] how to practice our way. This is right effort.

First of all, we should know that we are involved in-most people are involved in wrong effort.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Dana Velden and Bill Redican (1/24/01).

[1] Yaoshan Weiyao (Yakusan Igen): 751-834. Dharma successor of Sekito Kisen. Master of Ungan, Sensu, and Dogo. This story is Case 7 of the Ts'ung-jung lu (Jap. Shoyoroku, Book of Serenity) collection of koans. Another version is reproduced in A. Ferguson, Zen's Chinese Heritage, Boston: Wisdom, 2000, p. 109. See also SR-71-08-08 and SR-68-10-12-A.

[2] Dainin Katagiri-roshi (1928-1990): Japanese Soto Zen master who first came to the United States in 1963. He was Suzuki-roshi's close colleague in the early years of San Francisco Zen Center, and he later established the Minnesota Zen Meditation Center.

2 - Everyday Zazen

Tuesday, June 17, 1969

Everyday Zazen
San Francisco

...[1] Just to-just to practice zazen, you know, will not be perfect enough. So more and more I want to make our rule strict and maybe formal and rigid, or else [laughs], you know, you will waste your time, I think. How should we establish our system of practice in San Francisco is-will be our future subject.

I started to explain, you know, the way upward and way downwards-or to help others or-and to-or help yourself: to climb up [to] the top of the pole and to come down from the top of the pole. This is rather fancy, you know, more advanced practice. So it may be-it may not be necessary for you actually to explain this point, but it may be important for us to understand or to know what kind of practice you will have after you enter our practice hall.

And only when you actually started our true practice in our zendo, that practice will be extended in your everyday life. And this evening I want to, you know, explain this point more: how to develop our everyday zazen-our zazen practice to our everyday life, because to follow rigid practice does not mean Zen is always, you know, to-to follow rigid rituals or rigid practice is Zen.

It is necessary for you to get through that road-that door, but that is just door. So to make-I want to explain what I-kind of practice you will have after you enter the door, or else no one will come to Zen Center [laughs] if I-if you say, "Just to follow the rigid practice is the-Zen. And Zen Center way is just to sit-come and sit at certain time and to follow teacher's instruction, very formal-which is very formal." Then no one will come to Zen Center, I am afraid. So I want to explain little bit, you know, about this point, as much as possible.

It is rather difficult, you know, to explain what is not possible to explain, but as much as I can, I want to explain it-referring to several koan-at least one or two koan.

"Climbing up the top of the pole-this is-and step forward one step for-[partial word]-make-to make one step forward from it"-is very famous koan,[2] and many teachers explaining about it.

And for Soto priest-for Soto students, the most we have a story, you know: "Four Kinds of Horse." Do you the story of "Four Kinds of Horse"? [3]

The horse, you know, which will run at the shade of the whip-before he get the whip. And the next one is-as soon as the whip reach to its hair, you know, he may start to run. That is the second one. And third one is, you know, when he felt the pain on his skin, he will run. That is the third one. The fourth one is-fourth one will not run until the pain penetrate into the-into the marrow of the bone. Shht! [Makes sound like a whip cracking, laughs, laughter.] Then he will start to run [laughs.] That is, you know-the whip, by "whip" we mean the teaching of evanescence of life-teaching of evanescence of life. Or teaching that everything changes. There is nothing to stick to. There is nothing to care for, in its true sense, because everything is changing. That is, you know, the Buddha's-the most important teaching.

But-many Buddhists from ancient times, to understand this teaching, they studied various scriptures and practiced hard. But Dogen-zenji says, you know, that is not something to study [laughs], he says. It is actual fact which you see every day. No one can stay always young. Nothing is always same. Everything is changing, including you. That is actual fact you see. That is not something which you will study after reading many books. So if you really, you know, suffer-if you have a lot of suffering in your everyday life, you will actually, you know, feel the most important teaching of Buddhism-that everything changes, there is nothing to stick to.

But nowadays, you know, our system of the world, or society, is based on [laughs] to develop our desire, to stick to something, you know, to gain something. And we study many things just to develop our greedy desires. And our knowledge of science cannot stay as a science-scientific study. Scientific research is always a result-some improvement by doing something, by making some machine. As soon as we know it is possible to reach the moon, you know, we actually try to do it.[4]

So our, you know, study is not just intellectual study or scientific study. It is directly-it is directly connected with our desire. And everything-every system of our society is based on this kind of desire, without knowing what is human nature in its true sense, but to desire to see something, to gain something in its-not only some subject to study, but also some concrete way of achieving something.

This is what we are doing, actually. And we are, you know-every one of us is deeply or completely involved in this kind of activity-social activity. But we never, you know, try to understand what is ourselves, what is our true nature. And even a student, Zen students who want to study ourselves through and through is included-is involved in this kind of idea of study-way of study.

By practicing zazen, you know, you want to attain enlightenment. But that enlightenment must be very concrete, you know. Something-if you can fly, you know. If you cannot fly you don't think you attained enlightenment. [Laughs, laughter.] Or if you feel very good, you don't think you attained enlightenment. So [laughs] the effort to attain enlightenment is another way of developing your desire. To go to Japan. To know what kind of thing he is thinking, you know. Or without asking someone any question, to know what kind of mind he has, you know. That is a kind of power of enlightenment. And many people seek for that kind of enlightenment.

So maybe none of us, you know, none of us are really practicing true zazen. Before we stop try[ing] to find out something from outside, we cannot start our true practice. You may ask me how, you know, to practice. But it is rather difficult to say in its positive way-in positive way. But negative way, I can give you various suggestions.

And in-then, I think, Zen Center is not just for priest. And it is for layman, too. Most of us-you will be a student who want to study our way as a layman, I think. So it is-it may be rather difficult to follow our way as a layman-but even for one year or more, not, you know, forever. I think it is necessary to follow our practice as long as you come to Zen Center. And our way-although our way is not just for priest but to-to know, to realize what is our practice it is necessary for you to follow our way as much as possible.

I don't want to tell you what kind of idea I have right now, you know [laughs]. But some change should be done, or else we are too many. So we must organize or set up some system for you, I think.

And how you apply our practice-our practice in your everyday life is, in short: in your everyday life, the most important thing is to be involved in-completely involved in what you are doing. And to do something-just to-to do something as a means of gaining something else-you should do things for sake of-as a practice, as you practice zazen.

In your zazen, just to practice zazen is purpose of practice. You practice zazen for the sake of zazen. And we say: We practice zazen not for others, not for ourselves. We practice zazen just for sake of practice. That is true practice.

And that practice could be the practice to save others and to save yourself, to help yourself and to help others, and to develop Buddha's way. But when you do it, you have no idea of doing something. You should be completely involved in your practice, and you will be-you must be able to do it. That is, in short, how to extend our practice in your everyday life.

To attain enlightenment-even though you attain enlightenment-in Rinzai, you know, you will-you must attain enlightenment innumerable time. [Laughs.] And you have to have big enlightenment two-three times. That is what they say. And in Soto, we should continue our practice forever. How we continue our practice is to be involved in what you are doing right now. If you are counting, you should count, you know. And if you are doing something with your mind, your mind should be always with what you are doing. Just as, when you sit, you just sit without thinking anything. But in your activity, you act or you think, so you should be completely involved in your thinking mind.

For [laughs]-for, you know-for maybe ten days or more, I was completely involved in thinking, you know. In one thinking. I was concentrated, you know, how to-what to-what kind of-which way we should take as a Zen Center group, you know. This way or that way. [Laughs.] I was completely involved in that idea. So I didn't know that I was completely involved in that thinking, but my wife told me many things. "You say [laughs] when you do something you should be completely involved in it, but look what you did! [Laughs, laughter.] What you are doing? What do you do-when you go to restroom?! [Laughs, laughter]" But, you know, I didn't say anything. [Laughs, laughter.] I cannot say anything, because I have-because I feel I have to go to restroom, that is why I went to restroom. But actually I didn't have any idea of going restroom, or where I was [laughs, laughter], you know-restroom and dining room, you know, were same to me. But, you know, I was completely involved in one thing only.

So it is rather difficult to say how you should be-how you should extend your practice in your everyday activity. But actually, you know, in short, your life, you know, should be always-instead of complete combustion, you know-you shouldn't be idle, you know. And when-to be idle-to think about something, you know, or try to think, "I must read this book," is-means still you are idle, you know. You are hesitating to read it. "I have to study," mean you are still hesitating to study. "I must go to Soko-ji and practice zazen"-that-it means that you are still involved in some lazy mind. When you are completely involved in it, without knowing you-your foot, you know, your body will be carried to the zazen practice hall. So you have-you will not have any regret afterwards, what you have done, if you [are] completely, you know, involved in it. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

Why it is difficult for us to continue this kind of practice is because of our self-centered desires. And we should always know this point, and we should always try to give up this kind of self-centered desire after you- even after you attain enlightenment. If you notice this point, whether you are Rinzai student or Soto student, you will start real practice, which Dogen point out. The practice which is one with enlightenment. And in this practice there is no difference between Rinzai and Soto. Just before you enter-the approach is different-just before you enter the meditation hall, there are Rinzai students and Soto students. After you enter our hall, there is no difference at all.

There are various kinds of words to explain this idea of oneness of practice and enlightenment. Soto, you know, students always say "oneness of the practice and enlightenment." But this is one-one of the many ways of explaining our true practice. "To jump off from the top of the pole" is the same idea. Or "to kill Buddha." [5] This is rather [laughs] extraordinary word: "to kill Buddha." Killing-Buddha practice. It means that after you enter the buddha hall, you should be, you know, completely involved in your pure practice. You have no idea of buddhahood, what is buddhahood, or whether you are ordinal [ordinary] person or buddha.

So we say-they say, "Kill the Buddha!" After you attain enlightenment, you must kill the Buddha. You shouldn't have any idea of enlightenment. So you have to kill the idea of enlightenment. I have-you have to forget all about the idea of enlightenment. That is "Kill the Buddha." So when you have no idea of enlightenment, you know, there is no difference between Buddhist or non-Buddhist. When you have no idea of Buddha, you know, you are not Buddhist because you have no idea of Buddha.

The difference between, you know, Buddhist and non-Buddhist is Buddhist has-true Buddhist has no idea of buddha or layman. But ordinal [ordinary] people has-stick to the idea of buddha and laymen or ordinal [ordinary] people. That is the difference. So they may, you know, start to-they may start to come to zazen. But after he enter the buddha hall, he shouldn't have any idea of attainment in their practice. Even though, you know, he enter the buddha hall, as long as his, you know-his practice is involved in attaining enlightenment before he attained enlightenment, then he is not spiritually Bud- [partial word]-true Buddhist. That is the difference. But both-some ordinal [ordinary] people has no idea of buddhahood-what is buddhahood and what is ordinal [ordinary] people.

As Buddhist who knows what is our true practice has no idea of Buddha or ordinal [ordinary] people because he-he forget all about the idea [of] Buddha who is helping others. And no idea of people who wants Buddha's help. But Buddhist will continuously trying to help others forever. That is, you know, way, you know. That is his own practice to help himself. And that is also the way to help others. So there is no two ways. When you are able to extend our practice in your everyday life to help others and to continue your practice for your own sake, you know, [it is] the same thing. Not different at all.

So two way-way upwards and way downwards is the same. So actually, as I said, there is no point-no top of the pole. We should-what we should do is continuously keep on-keep going on and on. That is our way. When we realize this point-so some people may say "to jump off from the top of the pole" means to attain enlightenment. And "forget the top of the pole" is to jump off from the pole. Some people may understand in that way. But actually, when-after you jump off from the pole, you start, you know, real practice. Before you climb up to the pole-top of the pole, that is-was not true practice.

So to climb up to the top of the pole means, for Soto student, you know, to enter zendo after you see the-all the notice, you know, on the bulletin board. "Okay!" [Laughs, laughter] You may say, "Oh my! Anyway, I will do it." That is to enter-to climb up the top of the pole. Not, you know, step by step-all of a sudden! Rrrr! [Makes a mocking roar.] [Laughs, laughter.] Jump off from the top of the pole.

It may take many-pretty long time, before you make that kind of decision, you know. Before you feel the commitment as a student. It may take time, but anyway, when you do it, they way you do it-jump! [Laughs, laughter.] That is the way.

If you wonder: "Why he is so mean? Why he say? Why Soto way is so rigid?" Even though you ask, you know, your teacher, he will not say anything. "Just do it!" That will be what he will say. That is, you know, to climb up from the-to jump off from the pole of the-top of the pole.

Dick [Baker] wrote me [from Japan] and said: "Soto way looks like gradual way," but he said "I don't think so," he said. "Soto way [laughs] is more sudden way. Our way is to push something from the -someone from the cliff," you know. Whaa! So I think that is more Soto way. Rinzai student, you know [laughs], can practice zazen, you know, until he find out big ox, you know. Wandering about mountains and stream, and appreciating beautiful sight, and he may encounter, by some chance, a big ox. But [laughs] Soto way is to show a student big, you know, hip of the ox. Wraa! "This is [laughs, laughter]-this is the ox! You should see! Did you see it?" It is so big that even though you hit it, he will not move. [Laughs, laughter.] That is more Soto way [laughs].

Do you understand? That is what he s- [partial word]-Dogen said. It is not matter of something you will find-find out after reading many scriptures or after listening to fancy explanation of great Zen master. It is actual fact you are confronting right now, here! That is Dogen says-that is what Dogen-zenji says. It is not-not those things. You should, you know, see the big ox in front of you, without any explanation, without practicing zazen. [Laughs.] It is true, you know.

You-just you don't want to see it, you know. It is so big and so ugly! [Laughs, laughter.] "Nooo! No! That is not Buddhism. Oh, no! [Laughs, laughter.] So may be better [laughs]," you know, "to take a walk," you know, "to take a trip. Trip of study." And, "I may come back same place, but not now!" [Laughs, laughter.] I feel in that way.

So if you don't want waste your time, I think, you should establish some rules for American Zen student. It is very big problem for me and for you, and I was thinking about it for many and many days, until I forget [laughs], you know, where we-where I was. Restroom or dining room-I didn't know. I think-I want you [to] join our, you know, problem: How we establish our way of studying Zen in America. It is not matter of Rinzai or Soto.

Thank you very much.

Do you have some question?

Student A: Roshi, what is the difference between concentrating on something and allowing yourself to actually do it? During the day I continuously work with this-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student A: -whether I should concentrate when I do it, like, "Okay, now I am going to do this"-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: -or whether I should just do it and allow it to be done. It seems like two different things.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, maybe. In your everyday activity, you know, it is necessary to be concentrated-try to be concentrated on something especially. In your zazen, I think, especially for you, better to allow yourself to do it. You are very good in, you know, concentrating on one thing. So if you practice, you know, that way in your zazen, you know, your mind will be like this, you know. Your mind will be very sharp- very sharp concentration. And your mind will not open. But when we are in some situation where it is difficult to be concentrated on one thing, because of the noise or, you know, disturbance, it is necessary to be concentrated on one thing, I think.

Student A You know, once I experimented. We hiked with the mountain yogis up the mountain-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm

Student A: -you know? And they use a mantram like Om mani padme hum while they hiked. And as they hiked, they are just going over this mantram like this. So sometimes when I go downtown, and there's all this noise and all the billboards, and I just hear all this sound in my head, I'll start doing this mantram-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student A: -Om mani padme hum.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That is good, I think.

Student A: That-that keeps me-gives me a center as I go through all this confusion.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student A: And sometimes during work, too, when there's a lot of things happening, to have a center like that. Would you consider that concentration also, as an aid to concentration?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, but more-best way is, you know, to extend our-your practice in zendo, you know. You are try to be concentrated on one thing. Still you are trying, you know. So that is not-that is not best way. You should be more natural in your doing things. Hai.

Student B: What is the difference in the discipline to practice and attachment to practice?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. [Laughter.] Same, maybe. The difference is whether you do it [with] big strong conviction or, you know, sm- [partial word]- or you do it with small ego mind-egocentric mind. That is attachment, literally. That is attachment. But if you do it with big mind, it is-may be attachment, but-it may be strong attachment, but it has no-it will not-that attachment will not [leave] any trace in your practice. So it is also detachment, you know, because you have no trace of doing something.

So when you are doing, that is strong attachment, you know. You are doing. [Hits table for emphasis during preceding two sentences.] But after you did it, the difference is you will-you have no trace of activity. When you do it with big mind, with strong conviction, you have no-you h- [partial word]-you don't have to, you know, think about it because you did it with big mind. You don't-you are not regretful. So it is detachment. And when you are doing, it is very strong attachment.

Student B: When you do it with big mind, then you don't worry about attachment or discipline.

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student B: When you do it with the big mind, then you don't question whether it is discipline or attachment?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah.

Student B: You just practice-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. The word "disciplined" is-I don't think appropriate words for our practice. Practice is more-something which should be done with big mind, not by small ego-egoistic mind.

Student C: Roshi, when you sit zazen and you feel pain in your legs-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student C: -do you think we should concentrate on the pain or-or to try and concentrate on something else?

Suzuki-roshi: Anyway, that is every day [laughs], you know-that is, you know, quite natural, and that is a kind of everyday routine, you know. That is not problem, you know. Do you understand? It is same thing you feel hungry, you know. There is no difference.

Student C: Well, when you are hungry you eat, usually.

Suzuki-roshi: You eat. [Laughs, laughter.] But what will happen to you if you eat whenever you will feel hungry? Maybe it is necessary to feel hungry for one hour or so.

Student C: I know. I want to know if you think we should concentrate on the pain [?] or just ignore it.

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe-that is not big problem, you know.

Student C: Sometimes it is. [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Not big problem in comparison to the problem Buddha points out. This is your problem. [Hits table four times in previous sentence.] You know, that is big, big problem. So many people-Zen student and Zen master say: "We must achieve buddhahood," you know, "next life. If it is not possible to do it next life, we will achieve it someday," you know, "after many life." The problem is so big. But pain on your-our legs is small problem. Nothing wrong to have pain in your legs. And, you know-crossing, if it is too painful, you know, there is no need to-if it is almost impossible for you, there is no need to cross your legs.

Student C: I-but-what I-what I was interested in was what did you think you should devote your concentrate to, in terms of on the pain itself or-or away from it?

Suzuki-roshi: No. Away from? No. No. Don't try to be away from it. And don't try to be concentrated on it. [Laughs, laughter.] You know, let it painful. Let it be painful always. [Laughs, laughter.] That is your problem, you may say. I have to practice zazen. If you are painful, you know, that is your-your problem. [Laughs, laughter.] Hai.

Student D: Roshi, when counting the breath-when-excuse me-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student D: -is it better to let your breath take its natural rhythm and observe it, so that when you're counting, be detached from it, or to sort of "make" the numbers-like to push the breath in [?] a while and then push it out?

Suzuki-roshi: I think, you know-why I suggested to practice counting-breathing practice is-in its-to practice following-breathing practice is more advanced practice-more advance-advanced practice. And it is difficult, you know, to practice it in its true sense. So-so you should do it, you know, after you are able to practice counting breathing practice. Then your breath- [partial word]-practice will be more complete.

Student D: I-I guess I didn't make myself clear. What I meant is should you be detached when you're counting the breath? Should you let the breath take it nat- ... [Sentence not finished. Tape ends.]

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Dana Velden and Bill Redican (12/11/00).

[1] The first words of the lecture are missing on tape.

[2] From Ts'ung-jung lu (J. Shoyoroku, E. Book of Serenity), Case 79: "Changsha Advancing a Step": "Climb one step beyond the top of the hundred-foot pole. The whole world in the ten directions is revealed."

[3] Probably from the Samyuktagama Sutra (J. Zo-ichi-agon), one of the four Agama sutras (J. Agon-gyo). Also discussed in Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind.

[4] Apollo 11 was launched July 16, 1969 (see also SR-69-07-20).

[5] Quoting Linji Yixuan (Jap. Rinzai Gigen): "Whether you turn to the outside or to the inside, whatever you encounter, kill it. If you meet the Buddha, kill the Buddha; if you meet the patriarchs, kill the patriarchs; if you meet Arhats, kill Arhats; if you meet your parents, kill your parents; if you meet your relatives, kill your relatives; then for the first time you will see clearly. And if you do not depend on things, there is deliverance, there is freedom!" [From Linji-lu (Jap. Rinzai-roku), Sec.

20: I. Schloegl (trans.), The Zen Teaching of Rinzai, Shambhala, 1975, pp. 43-44.]

3 - Study with Mind and Body

Sunday, June 22, 1969

Study with Mind and Body
San Francisco

Dogen-zenji says: "Everything is encourages us to attain enlightenment. Mountains and rivers, earth and sky: everything is encouraging us to attain enlightenment." So, of course, a purpose of lecture is to encourage-to encourage you attaining enlightenment. So we call our lecture, you know, teisho. Teisho means "with teaching-with koan," to help people to attain enlightenment.

And usual lecture-sometime to explain the context of teaching-like to explain philosophy-to understand our teaching in philosophical way is more a "lecture"-a kowa.[1] Kowa is more philosophical. And purpose of to listen to kowa is to have intellectual understanding of the teaching. While teisho is to encourage students to attain enlightenment, or to have perfect understanding of-to have real experience of-to have real Buddhist experience.

So same thing will be subj- [partial word]-topic of our everyday life in its ordinal [ordinary?] sense. And same thing will be koan [definitely said "koan" here] to encourage-to encourage us to attain, to have direct experience of our life. Even though you think you are studying Buddhism, actually, you are, when you are just reading, you know [laughs]-it is-it may be-it may not be true or it will not help to have direct experience of Buddhism but just intellectual understanding of it.

That is why we, when we study Buddhism, it is necessary to have strong conviction and to study it with mind and body, not just, you know, not only just mind but also body. So if you attend lecture, you know, even though you are sleepy, you know, and unable to listen to it, just to attend the lecture [laughs] in spite of the drowsiness will be, you know-will bring you some experience of enlightenment. And it will be the enlightenment itself.

So intellectual understanding is necessary, but it will not-it will not complete your study. Through-by actual practice you can study it in its full meaning. So intellectual study, we say, doesn't make much sense [laughs], but it does not mean to ignore intellectual understanding or-enlightenment experience is quite different thing from intellectual understanding. And the true, direct experience of things could be intellectualized. And to intellect- [partial word]-to have to try some intellectual explanation to our direct experience is necessary to help your-to help your direct experience. So, for us, both intellectual understanding and direct experience of it is necessary.

Sometime even though you think that is-you think this is enlightenment experience, it may be just, you know, intellectual, extended explanation of-or extended experience of intellectual things, and not true experience-direct experience. That is why you must have true teacher who knows the difference between extended experience of common experience in its dualistic sense. Direct experience will come when you are completely involved in your practice, or when you are completely one with your activity, and when you have no idea of self-not only when you are sitting, but also when you are-your way-seeking mind is strong enough to forget your selfish desires. Or to forget selfish desire when you do something, study something with your whole mind and body, you will have direct experience.

That you haven't-that you have some problem means your practice is not good enough. When your practice is good enough, whatever you see, whatever you do-that is direct experience of the reality. This point should be remembered. And if you know that, it is not so easy to say "this is right" or "this is wrong"; "this is prefect" and "this is not perfect."

Anyway, [for] most of us, it is not possible to say "good and bad" or "right or wrong." Usually we, you know, without knowing this point, you say, "this is right, this is wrong." [Laughs.] That is, you know, ridiculous when we know what is real practice. Because you are just involved in usual judgement of good or bad, right or wrong, you can easily say, "this is right, this is wrong."

We Buddhists-you may say, for Buddhists there is nothing wrong. Whatever you do, you know, "Buddha is doing it, not me." [Laughs.] And so, "Buddha is responsible for it, not me." But [laughs] that is, you know, also a kind of misunderstanding.

When we say we have buddha-nature, that is, you know, the statement to encourage you to have actual experience of it. To encourage your true practice we say, "we have buddha- [partial term]-you have buddha-nature." It works only to attain enlightenment, you know, to encourage your true practice. Purpose of the statement is just to encourage true practice, not to give you some excuse, you know, [for] your lazy practice or your formal-just formal practice.

People misunderstand the true meaning of, or true purpose of our words, and you abuse and-or you make excuse for your lazy practice, referring to Buddha's words, understanding the statement in relative sense. This kind of mistake is everywhere. "It works," you know, "only this way and not that-the other way." [Laughs.] Do you understand?

Everyone has buddha-nature. Period. No more. You shouldn't say, "so" or "but" [laughs, laughter]. You should put "period," you know.

"Everyone has buddha-nature." [Hits stick on table once.] No more statement. If you say something, you know, you will be-you will get big slap. Whap! [Laughs, laughter.] You have to put "period" here. If you don't, you know, your teacher will put big "period" [laughs, laughter].

So we say, you know, in China, people carry something on their head. Honey or water in big jar. Sometime he may, you know, falled [dropped?], you know, of course, by mistake. But if you do not, you know, look back, like this [laughs]-it is all right. You should go on and on [laughs], even though there is no more honey or water on your head. If you go on and on, that is, you know, that is not mistake. But if you [say]: "Oh! I lost it! Oh, my!" If you say so, that is mistake. That is not our true practice.

When skillful martial artist use their, you know, sword, he could be able to-he should be able to cut fly [laughs] on your friend's nose, ffft!- [laughs] without cutting off your [his], you know, nose. It means that, you know, if you have some fear of cutting his nose, that is not true practice. When you do it, you know [laughs], you should have strong determination to do it! Whei! [sound of sword cutting air]-without any idea of skillful or not, or dangerous or not. You should just do it when you have to do it.

When you do it with this kind of conviction, that is true practice. So when you do-do it with this conviction, it is true enlightenment at the same time. Not just because of the skillful-skill. It is necessary to have strong conviction to do it, conviction beyond "successful or not successful." Beyond any feeling of fear. You should do it. That is real practice, and that is the way-seeking mind, which is-which goes beyond the idea of-dualistic idea of good and bad, right or wrong.

Now-can you hear me?

So if you should do it, you should just do it. We shouldn't mind whether it is-whether you will be successful or not. That is our vow, you know, four vow. We-we must do it. We must help people just because we must, you know. Sentient being are numberless, so we don't know whether we can help completely all of our sentient being. That is out of question. Our practice should go beyond it-the idea of numerous sentient being or some limited number of sentient being. A part of it or all of it-it doesn't matter as long. As we are here, we should continue our practice. That is true, you know, practice.

Of course, there is no limit in our understanding of the-our teaching. The meaning of Buddha's teaching is limitless, but we should do it. Whether you understand it or not, we should try to understand it. This kind of conviction is necessary when you-once you started to study Buddhism. Then that teaching ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... has the teaching, valuable teaching which you will not encounter even [in] a thousand kalpas of time. That is the absolute teaching-incomparable teaching to any teach- [partial word]-any other teaching. That is the most valuable teaching.

"Incomparable teaching" or "supreme teaching" does not mean this is the best of all or something like that, in its comparative sense. When you have right attitude in your study, the teaching you study is the absolute teaching. So, as Dogen-zenji says, "We do not discuss the meaning of teaching in its comparative sense, but we should practice it in its-our practice should be right." With right practice we should study. As a right practice we should study the teaching. We should try to accept teaching with right attitude. Whether teaching is profound or lofty is not the point. But the point is our practice, our attitude to study it. So whatever the teaching is, we do not, you know, we do not discriminate teaching in Zen. Kegon Sutra or Lotus Sutra or Agama Sutra, we don't mind. Whatever the sutra is, the sutra is-all the sutra is our fundamental teaching. We do not discriminate: "This is tea- [partial word]-this is scripture for Soto." Or "This is the koan for Rinzai." Or "This is scripture for Nichiren Sect." Or "This is the scripture just for Pure Land School." And all the sutra is our sutra.

Whatever the teaching is, if we have right attitude towards the-in our study, that is our teaching. This is characteristic of Zen and characteristic of true Buddhism. We do not set up any system of Buddhism, but we put emphasis on true practice.

In this sense, we say "Zen school." Zen means "right practice." It means to extend Buddha's practice, you know, day by day. That is, you know, how to be Buddha's disciple. That is why we started Zen Center here, or Tassajara Mountain Center: to practice our way in its true sense. It may be rather difficult to study our way in the city, but if you understand, you know, this point, you have no excuse for not practicing zazen. All the rules we have-but all the rules we have here is just to make your practice easier. Not to make our door narrow, but to open up our door for everyone.

Maybe Tassajara door is narrower, you may think, but wider. To have rules is to help your study. Because we know, you know, how difficult it is, so we set up some rules to help your practice. That is the purpose of having rules in Zen Center. If there is no-no pole, you know, to climb up, it is rather difficult for you to experience what kind of feeling you will have when you jump off from the pole. If a baby has no toy, you know, it is rather difficult to-to have actual experience of human being, as a human being. We have-we must experience many things, but if there is nothing, you know, even though whatever things may be-things in our room could be, you know, devices to experience human experience. But if we have, you know, special toy for babies, it is easier to experience our human-develop our human experience.

The, you know, rules we have is just a kind of toy to help your experience as a Buddhist. But toy-it does not mean toy is always necessary, you know. When you are young it is necessary, but after you know how to handle a cup or how to work, it is not necessary for you to have some wheel to, you know, push, or to have some cup or toy made of, you know-miniature, you know, cup made of plastic. If you want to have taste food better, plastic, you know, cup is not so good, you know [laughs] . It is better to use some ceramic, you know, or cups made of-mud? How do you say it? Clay. You taste better.

So you don't-it is not necessary for you to stick to toy always. And you should extend your way of life deeper and wider. But it is-even so, you know, beautiful, you know, ceramic is not necessary. If you have, you know, if you are ready to appreciate things, and if your practice [is] always encouraged by things you see, things you eat, you know, any special things is not necessary. Whatever it is, things will encourage your true practice.

If you can enjoy your life in its true sense, even though you lose your body, you know, it is all right. If you are not conscious of your mind, it is all right, you know. Even you die, it is all right. If-when you can-when you are encouraged by everything, you know, and when you realize everything is always helping you, then there is no difference whether you are dead or alive. It doesn't make, you know, any sense. It is all right, quite all right [laughs]. That is complete renunciation.

And your practice will be vigorous-enough to continue this kind of practice forever, regardless of life or death. In this way, our enlightenment should be-could be explained. And how to, you know, have this kind of practice is up to you. I cannot, you know, explain your understanding of Buddhism. You should explain your way of life as a Buddhist in your own way.

So, you know, my talk is just to encourage your practice, but even though you memorize what you say-what I said, it will not help you in its true sense. Maybe it will give you some suggestion.

Tomorrow I-I will go to Tassajara and stay there maybe more than ten days or two weeks. So I must say sayonara, you know [laughs, laughter], for ten days or more.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Diana Bartle and Bill Redican (9/28/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] kowa: ko (lecture) + wa (story or lecture itself). A college- or informative-style lecture, sometimes using a blackboard to convey content.

1969 juli (10)

1 - The Meaning of Practice

Tuesday, July 01, 1969

The Meaning of Practice
Tassajara

It is rather difficult for us to figure out why we started to practice zazen. It is rather difficult, and I think it may be same for you. But the more you think why you started zazen practice, the more you will find out how deep it is-the meaning you started zazen practice. And once you start our practice, even though your determination is not so strong, or you don't feel your determination is not so strong, but you will find out how strong the determination has been.

It is rather difficult, you know. You think-when you are here, you think sometimes or, you know, once in a while it may be better to give up [laughs]. But actually to give up our study or practice is not so easy. But you have some, you know-when you-your determination-you think your determination is not so strong-when you think in that way, your-you will not make much-much progress. So anyway once you study-start to study zazen, it's better for you to have strong, you know, determination not to give up our study or our practice. That is why we Soto students put emphasis on way-seeking mind or determination to practice our way forever. And trust in our true nature, who-which is always seeking for our true nature. You know, we say, "True nature is seeking for true nature." You know, true-because we have true nature, so naturally we seek for [it]. It is quite natural for us to seek for true nature. So, "Buddha seek for buddha," we say.

Anyway, you know, even though-once you study-start to practice zazen, even though you stop it, or you leave Tassajara, or Zen Center, I am sure you will come back [laughs, laughter]. I am quite sure about that. But it is rather, you know, waste of time. So once you st- [partial word]- anyway, you are caught [laughs, laughter] by buddha-nature which you have, you know. So it is better to continue it until you have complete freedom even from sitting zazen. That is much better.

So to get through, you know, our practice until you have freedom from it. Then, whenever you do, that is extended practice of zazen. If you-if you stop practicing it until you have freedom from even zazen practice, your life will be always shaky, you know. So you feel as if you waste your whole life.

For a man who realized what is practice, even though we haven't attained enlightenment-so-called-it "enlightenment," we don't feel we waste-we have been-our practice have been waste of time. We don't feel in that way. If you-you are-even though your practice is not perfect, you think someday or in next life you will, you know, sure to-you will have-sure to have that kind of feeling. And we are quite-we know what we sh- [partial word]-what kind of life we should have.

So even though you don't feel your life was perfect, you will leave for your descendent some problem which they should solve. So your descendent or some of you will find out the meaning of our practice, and find out it is necessary for human being to solve this problem and to continue our practice. So if no one start this kind of practice, your descendant will not find out what is our true life and what is the way to solve personal problem as well as social problem.

Especially, I think, in America not much people knows the meaning of practice. And even in Japan, too, you know, it is-in Japan, I think there are-they have wrong understanding of layman and priest. The priest is, you know-priests are quite different Buddhist from layman. But that is not right. So although priests practice zazen, layman doesn't. Layman don't practice zazen. Of course, some of them do. But quite few people practice zazen. They understand-they think zazen practice is too difficult, you know, for layman, so the priest only should practice zazen. But that is-they have this kind of idea. So I think most of Japanese people doesn't understand why we practice zazen. It is not matter of layman or priest. For all of us, it is necessary to practice zazen: not only Buddhist but also for all followers of various religion.

But zazen practice is not just personal practice. Buddhist practice is for each one of ourselves and for the others too. And to help themselves and to help others is the purpose of practice and reason why we practice zazen.

I think it is-now it is the time to practice zazen for-with every one of us. So if you realize this point, our practice is not just, you know, for ourselves. And we should know this point. Al- [partial word]-I know the American people are very individualistic, you know, and so their practice is very sincere. I know that. But their practice is just-tend to be just for himself. And so if he think, you know, he has-he thinks he has freedom of choice whether you should practice-whether he should do it or not. But we-actually we don't practice our zazen just for ourselves. And here I feel some difficulty, some, you know-in spreading our true way in America. Maybe, you know, personally I think you may have very good teachers. But-and good teacher will give up personal things, you know, and sacrificing their-his own life, and he may devote himself to the practice in its true sense. But people may think, you know: "That is just," you know, "his choice. It doesn't," you know-"just his choice. So for him that may be," you know, "very good thing, but I don't-I don't," you know, "agree with him." Or, "His practice is nothing to do with [laughs]-with me-with our life." So even though you have-you may have good teacher, I think you will appreciate his value, or his practice, his being so much-you may not appreciate him so much [corrects previous clause].

But that is, you know-that kind of understanding of individualism is not so good. Individualism, in its true sense, is very good. And our religion should be for each one of us, you know, first of all. He should do it for his own sake. He should not [be] concerned about other's criticism, you know. He should have strong determination to do it. In this point, individualism is very good. But if you think individualism is absolute, you know, teaching, like bible or scripture [laughs], it is, you know-we don't take that kind of understanding.

For Buddhist there is no absolute teaching. Even though it is good, we should know good side and bad side. We should know our tendency. We should know that it is human beings who believe in some kind of teaching. And human being originally has some difficulty to accept teaching as it is. Usually we accept teaching just to make some excuse for himself-for ourselves. You know, "In scripture," you know, "it is said so-and-so. So it is good to do so," [laughs] without thinking about it so much. "Scripture says this is American way. That is the Japanese way." You know, we don't accept teaching in that way. When you want to study-accept teaching, you should know what it is. American way is not always good. Japanese way is not always good. If there is good side, there must be bad side. So we should be very careful to accept the teaching. We should know the both sides of the one teaching.

You may say this is difference of the cultural background. So Buddhist-Buddhism should be extended or should be developed according to the cultural background. And, "In America there must be American Buddhism-in Ja- [partial word]-as Japanese," you know, "Buddhism, is based on or extended on the base of the Japanese cultural-culture."

But this is, you know-one of the important characteristic of Buddhism is whatever the, you know, cultural background is, Buddhism has some power to penetrate into the cultural background. We do not ignore the cultural background, but Buddhism is the deeper foundation of various cultural background. That is why, even though Chinese-Indian Buddhism, Chinese Buddhism, and Japanese Buddhism are different, quite different, are very different, I may say, but there is some traditional, you know, understanding of Buddhism which is always the same.

So I think until you understand your culture, good side and bad side, and accept the Bud- [partial word]-accept Buddhism as a deeper, you know, foundation of your culture, I think you-your effort will-you will make a vain effort. So we should know that all of us are just human being. You know, I am Japanese and you are American. But I think even though you say you are American, you know, I don't know who is true American and who is not [laughs].

Dick [Baker]-the other day Dick wrote me [from Japan] saying: "I thought," you know, "you are-you are not-I didn't know you are not so Japanese." But when I came to America I thought many people like me, you know, in Japan. The more he understand Japanese people, the more he understand how, you know, difficult Japanese was. If I am, you know, among you, even though I-if I don't wear this robe, I don't know, you know. You may-you don't think I am Japanese. But if you go to Japan, seeing people like me [laughs], you will immediately realize, "Oh, he is Japanese"-maybe especially you saw me from, you know, back. You know, "Oh, same figure is-same figure as you see in Japan. You will find same figure, you know, you saw in Japan in me, you know. But even, you know-I think that is the idea of Japanese, you know. If there is many people like me, you know-if you see many people like me, you will have idea of Japanese. But if I talk personally with you, there is no idea of Japanese or American. And if we are just here, even though I am Japanese, when I am talking with you like this, I have no idea of Japanese. And I don't think you have any idea of Japanese.

So "Japanese" or "American" is just idea. "American way" or "Japanese way," you say, but actually there is no such thing. There may be same, you know, people doing same thing, but it does not mean he is Japanese. People may say, you know, people may have some idea of Japanese, that's all. As Dogen-zenji said: "No one say," you know, "he is-he is Zen Buddhist or Soto Zen student. No one calls himself Soto Zen student-teacher. But people may say he is Soto. But that does not mean we should call ourselves Soto students."

So we-when you make some excuse, you say: "This is-we are American people who is raised in American cultural background." I don't think that is proper-that is right. Actually, for each individual there is no American way or Japanese way. That is his own way. So he should-he is responsible for his own way of life and understanding.

And-and I think we should not try to propagate Zen in America, you know. That is not Dogen-zenji's way. One by one is enough. If we have, you know, good understanding between your friend, that is enough. If you love someone, you know, you should try to make-make him understand you. That's all. That is quite natural for us. But we should not try to propagate Soto Zen or Rinzai Zen in America. It is same thing, you know, [to] try to force Japanese way-way of life to American people, or American way of life to Japanese people, which is not really exist.

That which exist in its true sense is, you know, mutual understanding between one and the other. I think that is true Buddhism in its true sense. We have-all human being or living being has fundamental tendency to try to find out some composure in identifying himself to others, you know. If some worm or frog-frog stay in green, you know, leaves, they change their color to the green-into green. That kind ...

[Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

But we have to realize a deeper, you know, nature than we feel or than we feel or see. We have deeper nature which is called buddha-nature, which is not various nature-or which is not one of the various nature, but which is the basic nature for various nature. Deeper nature than we see. That is human tendency, you know, to identify ourselves to-to the majority. But, that is-for us, that is the nature to be aware of, or to be careful about, rather than to follow it with our eyes, our thinking mind, our five senses stopped [?], and our reason stopped [?]. That is the nature we should be careful about.

But most people, you know, make some excuse, numbering various nature we have. One by one, when we face to the problem, we should know our nature. And we should be careful our nature, not to stop our-not to limit our basic nature, so that we can extend our fundamental basic nature without any trouble.

So it is important to know American way or Japanese way. But more important thing is to know our own cultural background, and to have eyes to see our-each one's own cultural background, and what kind of tendency you have. If so, it-it may be very helpful for you to have Japanese friend and for Japanese to come to America and study Japanese way, or to have-to listen to criticism of [by?] American people. Then we will be aware of our tendency, which is difficult to-to notice. Not to, you know, not just to stick to American way or Japanese way, but to know our weak points. This kind of effort should be continued.

You think you have, you know-as you are in America, you know, I think you-you may say: "We have no cultural background." [Laughs.] But you have. You, you know-I noticed, you know, many, you know, characteristic of American people. That is, you know, your cultural background. Here at Tassajara what are you doing is not just American way or Japanese way. And we are studying what should be our human way, day after day. There may be many reasons why I came to America without knowing this kind of thing. When I came to America, you know, what I thought was: "Anyway, we are all human beings [laughs], so I think I can survive" [laughter]. That was what I knew-only thing what I knew. I, you know, I didn't know where is San Francisco, even. Anyway I came to-I bought a ticket [laughs, laughter], and I came to America. That's all. And, you know, I was rather angry if people say, you know: "He is Japanese" [laughs], you know. Why I am Japanese? You know, those who come to America is American people, you know. Whatever nationality he is, they are all American people.

Some of them must have come a long time ago, but all of them, anyway, except Indian-American Indian-they are people who came from other country. Why they call me Japanese? And, you know, sometime: "That is Japanese way." Why? I didn't know myself. But now Dick wrote me, "I find-I found-at last I found you typical Japanese," you know. And I realize, "Oh, maybe so." Because there are many people like me. It may take pretty long time to study the true relationship between various, you know, people-various-various kinds of people. But I think we should start to study our basic human nature.

And we should start to study our weak point. If you want to be really strong, you should know your weak point. Without knowing your strong-weak point, you cannot be really, in its true sense, cannot be strong person. And if you don't know your weak point, you will have various worry, and you will have various problem, and you don't have real courage to do something. If you know your weak point, you know-because you know, "My weak point is here," you know, so you-you know how to protect yourself from it. But if you don't know where is your weak point, you will-you must have protect yourself covering [laughs, laughter] all parts of your body. Maybe best thing is to enter a big bag [laughs]. That will-may be the best way, but you cannot survive in that way. So you should know the weak point only, and protect weak point and extend strong arm, you know. If one-left arm is, you know, not so weak [strong] you should fight with right arm. If you don't know which is-which is stronger, you don't know what to do.

A scroll given to me by my teacher[1] says: "Piece of stone in the air. Piece of-piece of stone in the air." [Laughs.] "Piece of stone in the air." It means that the created problem, not real problem. There is no stone in the air. There may be bubbles, you know, but there is no stone in the air. But we create-we hit against stone in the air, always. "Oh!" That is what we are doing. If you know, you know, real, you know, problem, you will not hit against so many stones which doesn't exist, you know. Maybe-sometime there may be stone in the air-even in the air. But there-there is-I don't think there is so many stones in the air [laughs]. So if you know that there is stone, you know, but you know the way to go through the room even though several stones [are] in the air. But most people has many stones in the air, not only one piece of stone. That is, you know, the problems we have because we don't know ourselves.

Most-most of the problem are the problem we create because we don't know ourselves. If you know yourself, you will have, you know, problem. But that is actual problem which will help you-help your way of life. It is much better to have some problem than no problem. If you want to help others, the best way may be not to involve others in the problem you created [laughs]. Not only you have, you know, various problem created by yourself. You may involve many people in your problem, in your created problem. If you stop doing it, that may be great help, I think.

I may, you know, point out [laughs] something, you know, always, but it does not mean to criticize you. Because it may be difficult for you to-to know your weak point, I may point out, you know, sometime. So don't be angry with me [laughs] too much, okay?

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Tanya Takacs and Bill Redican (2/1/01). Date was changed from 6/31/69 to 7/1/00 because 6/31 was impossible, and 7/1 was a Tuesday (a common day for lectures at that time in Tassajara).

[1] Kishizawa Ian-zenji. (See Crooked Cucumber, p. 382, for a discussion of this scroll.)

2 - Rinzai and Soto

Tuesday, July 01, 1969

Rinzai and Soto
San Francisco

Morning.

In-in America, between Rinzai Zen and Soto Zen there-there must be some clear understanding of-of the two, or relationship of the two. Dogen-zenji's, you know, problem of, or koan was, "If we have buddha-nature," you know, "why we should practice zazen?" That was his, you know-that is why he went to China. All-all-in all the scriptures say that everyone has buddha-nature. If so, why we should practice zazen?

And Soto more put emphasis on the statement that we have buddha-nature. And Rinzai put emphasis on practice to attain enlightenment, you know. If we have buddha-nature, like Soto student says, why is it necessary [laughs] to attain enlightenment? And usually, you know, people understand that "we have buddha-nature" means that potentially we have buddha-nature. We have buddha-nature within ourselves, but that nature-buddha-nature is covered by many things: many evil desires. Or because of the bad karma we cannot, you know, reveal-we cannot realize buddha-nature. But if we practice zazen, or if we get rid of evil nature, the buddha-nature, which is innate nature, will reveal itself. Usually people understand in that way. But, as the Sixth Patriarch said, that is nihilism [nihilism?]. But anyway, people understand in that way to explain why we must practice zazen.

But this understanding is not true understanding, even according to usual understanding of sutra. There are many, you know-we try to understand Buddhism just our ordinal [ordinary] way of thinking-ordinal [ordinary way]. That is maybe why we cannot understand what-why Dogen has to go to China to understand that point. If he understand in that way, you know, it is-for him it was not-there was no need for him to go to China. You know, if-by practice, by our practice, by stopping all sort of evil desires, and we will attain enlightenment, and we will have no trouble, you know, and our buddha-nature reveal itself because there is no evil desires which covers our innate nature. If he understand in that way, there was no need for him to go to China.

But that was not, you know-that kind of understanding is just, you know, usual understanding which you can accept it intellectually, but you cannot accept it emotionally in its true sense, you know. Your mind says you are-you think, you know, or you can explain why we should understand-we should practice zazen intellectually. But actually if you try to attain enlightenment in that way, you will be discouraged, you know, because it is not possible to annihilate all evil desires you have. One student out of thousand, you know, cannot [can?] attain enlightenment in that way. So naturally Dogen-zenji, you know, didn't-couldn't satisfied that kind of answer. So he actually went to China, not because of study of philosophy of Buddhism. He wanted to have complete-he wanted to accept Buddhism as his own teaching. He was very sincere person. He couldn't satisfy-he couldn't be satisfied with the usual, you know, intellectual, philosophical understanding of Buddhism. Although he was the eminent philosopher, he was-he is actually very profound-established very profound philosophy-Buddhist philosophy. But even so, he couldn't satisfy with his philosophy-of-philosophy-Buddhist philosophy, and he went to China. And after he received transmission from Nyojo-zenji,[1] he, you know, described this point from various point.

So he is the one who, you know, understand-understood what is enlightenment and what is real practice. What do we mean by-what does the Sixth Patriarch or old Zen masters mean by practice and by enlightenment? This is the point he-Dogen-zenji strived for to explain. And he thought people of his age-of his time will not understand this point fully. And he wrote his understanding for his descendant, who may understand his point.

This morning I want to briefly, you know, explain this point: enlightenment and practice, you know. What is enlightenment and what is practice? The enlightenment-according to Dogen-zenji, enlightenment equal practice. We use, you know, soku. Soku means, you know, "equal," but not just equal. When you say "equal," you know, although-two side of the equal, you know. Although it looks-there looks like different, but if you change, you know, form, two things is equal as, you know, as you solve the problem of algebra, you know. If you change the form, both side is equal. But when we say equal without changing [laughs], you know, anything, that is equal. If, you know, practice and enlightenment is same if, you know, if you attain enlightenment, that is equal. Practice and enlightenment is-are equal, same.

But when we say soku, "equal," it means that without changing [laughs]-without changing form it is equal. They are same. This is rather difficult to understand. Practice equal enlightenment. [Laughs.] It means that the other side of, you know, practice is enlightenment, and the other side of the enlightenment is practice. He understood in that way. So there is no need to change the practice into enlightenment, or there is no need to change enlightenment into practice. Without changing, practice and enlightenment are same. That is his understanding of our practice.

Now, as I said last time, in Rinzai Zen they put the emphasis on-on kensho. To put emphasis on kensho means actually to put emphasis on our practice. To encourage our practice, they put emphasis on kensho. But actually, kensho is not the actual goal of practice. Practice itself is important. Kensho is just candy. [Laughs.] You strive for candy, and you make good practice. That is why Rinzai put the emphasis on kensho.

Soto put emphasis on practice, you know. Forgetting all about our practice is shikantaza, as you know. We, you know, forget all about kensho and fully devote ourselves to practice. So actually [laughs] both Rinzai and Soto put emphasis on-in actual practice. And if you talk about, you know, kensho in Rinzai school said, small enlightenment-numberless small enlightenment and several big enlightenment. What does it mean? Small, you know, numberless enlightenment [laughs], and big, several enlightenment. If, you know, enlightenment is a goal of practice, one enlightenment will be enough [laughs]. Why do they want so many, numberless, numerous enlightenment? And several big ones? [Laughs, laughter.] You know, it is, you know-it is just words, just means of encouraging people to follow Buddha's way, to continue our practice forever, from beginningless beginning to endless end, we should follow Buddha's way because Buddha's way is the true way. And for Buddhists, there is no time to stop our effort to save people and subjectively to save ourselves. That is why we decide, you know, we have four vow.[2]

I think it is necessary both for Rinzai and Soto to have this kind of clear understanding of our practice or Buddhism. Forgetting all about the fundamental teaching of Buddha, just to put emphasis on Rinzai or Soto means nothing. As you know, in all religion the most important point is to have conviction to follow the truth. That is, in other word, faith, or to believe in, or to trust in the truth whatever happen to us. That is our basic attitude of-basic attitude for human life.

So for Rinzai or Soto-for Rinzai because, you know-Rinzai people-because we are not sincere enough, you know, they put emphasis on kensho. But Soto put emphasis in attitude or belief. So naturally Soto is more rigid in our practice, or more formal, you know. If you, you know, if you-to have strong conviction to follow the truth means try to have strong faith or to-in our buddha-nature, and to have determination [to] try to follow the truth or try to help people. So naturally, instead of putting emphasis on kensho, we Soto students should follow rules of monastery or rules of our life.

So for Soto students, it-we put-it is necessary for you to organize your life so that you can practice zazen well. For Rinzai students, it is necessary to realize, to reach the point where you don't mind your everyday problem so much, so that you can easily follow the Buddha's way. That is more Rinzai way.

Soto way-nowadays we have, you know, many Soto followers in Japan and many priests. But originally Dogen-zenji try to-try to have just several sincere students. We say "one by one," or "half by half" [laughs]. He said one or half by one or half [laughs]. Half by half. [Laughing.] Half is enough if he is sincere.

So, you know, the relationship between teacher and student should be very close. We say if one is someone's disciple one should, you know, make calligraphy exactly the same as his teacher, you know. You sign, you know-in America you have signature. By your handwriting is your signature, but it doesn't work so- [partial word]-in Japan. We put the emphasis-we practice calligraphy so hard that one can imitate someone's calligraphy exactly the same as [laughs] your friend does or your teachers-your teachers does.

That much, you know, close relationship is necessary, but not by imitation but from bottom of your heart. So how you, you know, learn Oriental-Japanese-Oriental culture is to imitate, you know, his teacher's way. And when you are able to, you know, imitate his way, like his own calligraphy or way, you can, you know, establish your own way after you are able to imitate his teacher's way. And after you acquired fully his teacher's way then, if necessary, you know, you should create your own form of calligraphy. But not before [laughs] you can fully-you can imitate his way exactly the same.

My teacher is not, you know, my father-was not my father. But people said when I laugh, you know [laughs]: "You must be," you know, "your teacher's," you know, "secret boy" [laughs, laughter], because the way you do something, way you laugh, way you speak, and way you make your voice [are] exactly the same as your teacher. So your teacher must be your father," they said-some-not every one of them, but some people said. That is more Soto way.

But the point is to give up selfish, you know, way as much as possible. Not completely, because it is not possible to give up our selfish idea. And we know that is impossible. We continue our practice forever. But you may say if it is not complete-if it is not possible to complete it, it does not mean to try to, you know, try to annihilate evil desires. But it is not so. That is not Buddhist understand- [partial word]-Buddhist effort. Even though it is not possible [tapping table with each word], if it is right we should follow the way. It is not a matter of possible or impossible. Even though it is impossible, if it is right, or if we want to do it, we should do it. We should try to-at least we should try to do it.

Maybe both Rinzai way and Soto way is necessary, I think. If, you know, I want you to be completely Soto students or Soto disciples, I will not allow you to have long hair [laughs]. I wouldn't. At first even, you know, that much, you know, confidence is necessary. If you want to follow Buddhist way from the starting point, that is more Soto way. "Even though you don't like it, you should do it!" Do you understand? That is Soto way. Rinzai way [is]: "Practice zazen! Practice hard until you have kensho! Whether you have long hair or dirty shoes, it doesn't matter. Practice zazen hard!" [Taps stick three times.] That is more Rinzai way. If y- [partial word]-he attain enlightenment, he will not matter whether his hair is long or not. Whatever costume-in whatever costume he is, he [it] doesn't matter.

But Soto way is: "WHY DO YOU-DON'T YOU SHAVE YOUR HAIR if you are Soto student?! [Laughs.] That is difference. So whether you like it or not, we will force you to [laughs, laughter]-we will put you in square box! [Loud laughter.] Instead of, you know, putting emphasis on enlightenment or kensho. Same thing, you know.

So in Rinzai way there is more freedom, maybe. In Soto way we don't have freedom until you have complete freedom, until you feel freedom in your everyday life. So, you know, if you stay in Soto way for several years, you know, strictly observe Soto way, you will not have not much problem in your ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... in its true sense, giving up self-centered activities.

So we should not, I think, be-we shouldn't be too much attached to Rinzai, or idea of Rinzai or Soto. But we should know that-we should know the point. I think this is, in this sense-when we understand this point, I am very much grateful for Dogen-zenji who found-who was sincere enough to found out this point clearly. And, according to him, there is no Soto or Rinzai or no Zen even. We are all Buddha's disciple. That is enough, he said. He is-he was a person who [was] sincerely devoted [to] Buddhism and wanted to be a good Buddha's disciple. Fame or rank was not his point, or how many students he has, that was not his point. To be a good disciple even, you know, he-no one knows where he is, who he is. That is not his point. And he wanted to be a good disciple. And he want-but he wanted to help real disciple. He doesn't mind how much, you know, student he has. If he-if he has one good disciple, that was enough for him. Or even though he hasn't no disciple, maybe that was-he will not regret for that, because he wrote so many things for his descendants, who may understand his way. Usually even priest-even a priest are very much attached to his achievement, in its worldly sense. Because of him, I think, we came to this kind of understanding of Zen.

We say, you know-last year at Tassajara, Peter [Schneider] asked me to speak about non-sectarianism [laughs]. And after I gave lecture, he said: "That is sectarianism!" [Laughs, laughter.] Maybe our sectarianism is non-sectarianism: sectarianism of non-sectarianism. [Laughs.]

And he [Dogen?] says, also-people may say, you know, "Zen," but no patriarchs said-called themselves Zen master. Even though people said "Zen," there is no need to-to be or to call ourselves Zen. We are not Zen Buddhist. We are just Buddha's disciple. If you, if-to understand Buddhism in that way, or to understand Zen in that way is sectarianism, we are very sectarian. But it is not so, actually. At least we have sincere enough or honest enough to accept his teaching, giving up our selfish viewpoint or criticism.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Sara Hunsaker. Checked by Bill Redican (2/24/01).

[1] Tiantong Rujing (Tendo Nyojo): 1163-1228.

[2] "Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them," etc.

3 - Emptiness is Form

Thursday, July 03, 1969

Emptiness is Form
Tassajara

I have explained the poem about "Emptiness is form," or shochuhen.[1] Sho is reality and hen is "form" or "seeming" [?]. Shochuhen. And the next one is henchusho,[2] the opposite. And chu means, you know-chu or soku-means some activity in which-not activity-some-not relationship, but something in which everything appears-every event, you know, appears. What will it be [laughs]? Something in which, you know, appears. Maybe say a little bit more [laughs]: something in which everything appears-something in which always appears-that is the present moment, right now. You know, right now, you know, things happen, not in past or present. So practice should be the practice of "right now." That is chu or soku.

When we, you know, catch things, you know-how you catch it, you know? You cannot-you cannot catch past or future, you know. You can catch just present moment, right now. If you want to catch someone, you know, you-you should catch him right now, not past or not in future.

So if you want to practice zazen, you know, you should practice it right now. That is chu. Shochuhen or henchusho. Or Shiki soku ze ku, [3] you know. Ku soku ze shiki [4] is, you know-is-means "right now there is being," you know.

But because we are always, you know, involved in thinking mind, and because we try to understand teaching, you know, in-with seeking mind, in term of present or past or, you know, now or later, you know, or always, you know. Usually "is" means "always so." "One plus one is two," you know. That "is" is always so. But our "is" or soku ze-"without changing," you know, "without waiting." You know, "A is B." That is actually what we mean. Right now it is so.

So we-if we, you know, catch things right now, "Form is emptiness, and emptiness is form" because we catch it right now. Because we practice right now zazen, you know, not future or not past, we are Buddha himself. It does not mean-"Form is emptiness" does not mean "some day [laughs] we will-we will attain." That is, you know, right understanding of "Form is emptiness."

So in empty screen, you know, you will see many pictures-the projected pictures. Without screen you cannot see anything. Because of the screen, you can see many things. What is that screen now [laughs], you know? Screen is just parable, you know. In this parable, what do you mean by screen?

This is a kind of a training of your mind, you know, comparing your thinking faculty and non-thinking activity. The screen is "right now." Without screen you cannot see anything. You cannot have direct experience of anything, you know. Only by the screen you can see things. Only you, you know-the way you have direct experience of something is to experience it right now, not future or not past time. Do you understand?

So when you count your breathing: "one, two, three"-means "right now, right now, right now, right now." "Right now" is "one, two, three." It means that you never lose you practice. You will not be so rigid, you know, to try to do it in the future time, but right now. Whatever condition you are, you know, you should do it. Even though you are sleepy, when you do it, you know, you have direct experience of zazen practice. So, you know, this is-it looks like very rigid formula of-formula, but what it means is very direct and very clear: much clearer than, you know, formula of mathematics.

"Two plus two is four" is not so clear, you know, and it is not always so. But "Form is emptiness, and emptiness is form" is very accurate. Only you are not familiar of this kind of, you know, formula. You think this is just formula, you know [laughs]. You are-you will not be interested in-in it so much becau- [partial word]-if you-but if you become very sincere with your practice you will understand this formula [as being] very accurate and very explicit.

It means-chu or soku ze means "right now," or "practice"-real practice which you do right now. Okay? You know, so "Form is emptiness," you know. Right now it is so, but it is not always so. Do you understand? You don't understand [laughs, laughter]. Let me have a cup of [laughs] water. You have to think.

Wave and water, you know-right now, you know, it is-wave is water, water is wave. But if you think about it, if you have the idea of water and idea of wave because you saw it, you know -because you saw the wave and you have idea of water-here. And you may think: "But that is water. Water is something like this, you know." [May be referring to his cup of water.] But right now when you see waves on the water, wave is water and water is wave, right now-when you don't think.

What, what-that you think means, you know, you track [?] some movement, you know, activity and analyze wave from water. That is what you do when you think. But right now, you know [laughs], when you [whack-sounds like he hits one palm with his stick] hear the sound, that is-so that is, we say [whack, whack]. You know, which hand [laughs] make sound? [Whack.] Right now [laughs], you know, you cannot say which. Maybe this hand, maybe that hand, or maybe both [clap-sounds like he claps hands together]. You don't know. That is reality.

But when you think after you hear the, you know, sound, there is right hand and left hand and sound. But [whack], you know [whack], this time here, you know, right now sound is hand, hand is sound. Hands are sound.

So this, you know, chu or soku ze is very, very important. That is why Dogen-zenji left [?] Shobogenzo explaining "this moment, this moment, this moment." So "What does it mean?" is very important. It is a point by which our teaching, you know, means something.

If we lose this point, your practice doesn't work. Whatever teaching it may be, it doesn't work. That is "someone's," you know, teaching or teaching which you had long time ago. Or teaching which we will understand, you know, "sometime after" [laughs]-"someday." "Someday is no-day," we say [laughs]. Various [?] day after tomorrow [laughs]. "Day after tomorrow we will do it [laughs]. Day after tomorrow we will do it [laughs]." That is, you know-if you lose this point, nothing works.

Now the poem for the second statement-"Form is emptiness." By the way, when you say "Emptiness is form, and form is emptiness," you know, those two statements, you know, makes complete sense, you know. Even though you say-when you say-when you just say, for an instance, "Sugar is something which is sweet," you know, there may be something, you know, besides sugar which can be sweet. But relationship between, you know, waves and water, you know-"There is no water except wave; there is no wave except water. So "Sugar is sweet"-statement "Sugar is sweet"-is not complete statement. The waves, you know, when you can say both way: "Waves and-is water and water is waves." Then water and waves are completely same thing, you know. If it is not same thing you cannot say in two ways.

So it means-when we say "Emptiness is form," it is, you know, more stronger. It means, you know, you cannot escape from this. You have no reason not to practice zazen. If you don't practice zazen, you know, you are not buddha because you are not in complete relationship between buddha and you. If you don't do that, you-it is like a water without wave. There is no such water exist, you know. If it is water it must have some, you know, wave. Even though you cannot see it, you know, there must be some waves.

So Dogen-zenji says: "Even though you are buddha, if you don't practice zazen, you are not buddha." [Bangs stick on table once for each of several preceding words.] Or you may say the other in this way: "If," you know, you miss this point" or if you understand yourself on this moment right now [bangs stick on table once for each of several preceding words], without moving anything-without moving even-without having even blink of-what-blinking [laughs]? What do you call this? Hmm?

Student: "Blink."

Suzuki-roshi: Blink [laughs]. Blink of eyes, you know, you cannot, you are not buddha. Without-without having blink, if you practice zazen, or if you do something, you are buddha.

There is no such buddha like dead buddha. Dead buddha is only exist in your mind-not-but actually, you know, there is no such thing exist. Something exists is-something and buddha. [Ohh.] Do you understand that? [Laughter.] Huh? [Laughs.]

So you have no reason why, you know, you are not buddha as long as you alive-as you are taking breathing-because form is emptiness and emptiness is form. That this world exist is because you are doing something right now, you know. That is why exist. Right now you are-because you are doing something.

But-but when you think about it-about our world-it is not real world-the world produced by thinking mind. Isn't that so [laughs]? So we should not be deluded by some idea which we just produce by thinking mind. By direct experience we should be buddha. That is what it means.

Okay.

The poem says: [5]

At dawn an ignorant old woman finds ancient mirror.

There was story in India-there were an old woman called Enyadatta [?]-Enyadatta. And he-he-she used to, you know, see herself in-in her old mirror. And she liked to see her beautiful face-or her beautiful eyes and eyebrow in the mirror. But one day she couldn't see the beautiful eyes in the mirror. So she was-she became crazy, you know, at seeing-when she thought she lost her beautiful, you know, eyes or face-eyes.

This is the story which we should understand first.

At dawn an ancient old woman finds ancient mirror

wherein she clearly sees her face

which cannot be elsewhere.

And this is the second one [line?]. And next one is:

No more will she reject her head

by grasping at its shadow.

"An old woman" means "form." An old ignorant woman means "form" or "seeming" or "attribute" opposite to the reality or original face. "At dawn"-early in the morning-"ignorant old woman find her ancient mirror." It means that, you know, form-the old man[6] and mirror is one.

When she, you know, see herself into the mirror, you know, she is the image in the mirror, and image in the mirror is herself. So it means "form is emptiness." Emptiness is old mirror, or original face, or emptiness. So here, old woman is-it means old woman is emptiness or original face.

The next line is:

Clearly, wherein the-wherein she clearly sees her face

which cannot be elsewhere.

This is the translation. This translation may be too beautiful, you know. If you are rigid-if you translate it literally:

"Clearly it is," you know, "nothing but the reality," you know.

Both is nothing but reality. She is mirror. Mirror is she. Image in the mirror is herself and herself is in image in the mirror. If you take her as a subject of the sentence, it means "emptiness is form, and clearly it is- they are nothing but the reality."

This is next line:

No more will she reject her head

by grasping at his shadow.

The har- [partial word]-

No more will she reject her head

by grasping at its shadow.

When she-she saw her eyes, you know, in the mirror, she was very happy. So she-she was grasping her head, in other words. And she, you know-but she rejected her head, you know, when she couldn't see her face in the mirror. So it means, you know, she thought-she took one and rejected another. But actually they are the same.

Tentatively, you may understand this way, you know: Early in the morning an old woman had a mirror. And old woman and image in the mirror is one. So it is foolish of her to reject, you know, her original- her own face, you know, accepting the face in the mirror. Even though, for some reason, she couldn't see her own face in the mirror, it does not mean she lost her face [laughs].

So-tentatively, you know, I want you to understand this way. But actually the story we have in Indian sutra Shurangam-dharani, you know.[7]

There were an old [wo]man, you know, who enjoyed to see her image-her face in the mirror. But when she, you know, wanted to see her beautiful, you know, eyes and eyebrow on her head, you know, it is not possible to see her face [laughs]. So even though she tried to see her eyes, you know-which she see, and eyebrow, you know-it is not possible to see, you know. But she became very discouraged when she couldn't see her beautiful eyes on his head without a mirror. And she became crazy. That was more like original story. I don't know which-which is true story but-

If we understand in that way-to reject her-not to reject her face-oh yeah, it-it means, you know, because she couldn't-just because she couldn't see, you know, her own beautiful eyes, but that is real, you know, eyes-that is "form," you know. And that is nothing but the mirror [image?] she will see, almost all the time, in the old mirror. Old mirror means "reality."

So maybe better to understand this story in this way. Do you-did I explain [laughing] pretty well to make sense for you?

One story is, you know, she thought-when she thought she couldn't see her own face in the mirror, so she became crazy. Another one is: she-after seeing her beautiful face in the mirror, you know, he-she tried to see her own, you know, eyes and eyebrow on his-on her head [laughs], which is not possible. And she couldn't see, so she became crazy.

Anyway, this is just parable-parable, so-I don't mind which-whichever is true. But anyway it means that what you see, you know, right now, in this moment, is also reality-not after or not before. The right now, what you see, is reality.

Now when I come to America, you know-when I came to America, I didn't ask any information about Soko-ji temple. And at that time, there was no Zen Center [laughs]. So I have no way to ask what is Zen Center, but I could ask, you know, "Where is San Francisco?" at least. But I didn't, you know, study anything about San Francisco because I accepted to go to San Francisco, wherever the city is. I thought: "If I go there [laughs], I will find out with my eyes [laughs] what is San Francisco and what kind of temple Soko-ji is.

So only when you, you know-it is, you know-it may help, you know, but we shouldn't be too much interested in someone's talk, you know, or someone's rumor about future-future life. If you go there you will find it.

Maybe I am a kind of extremist [laughs, laughter]. Maybe it-it is better to know, you know, something about what we will-where we will go. But that kind of information-informations doesn't help you so much. And it will create your prejudice, you know, which will disturb- which will be a disturbance for your intuitive-intuition, I think.

Now, at this moment, is very important point.

The next one [of the shohengoi] is: "Form is form." Shochurai.

"Form is form" or Shochurai. Sho is "emptiness." [8] Chu is "right now," or "is." Rai is "come." So seeming in-according to Charles Luk [9]-seeming unite-uniting with the real-seeming uniting ... [10]

[Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... as emptiness. That which exist is just emptiness, you know. It is utter darkness where you cannot see anything in it. That is shochurai. It is enlightenment itself, in which anything doesn't [1-2 words unclear].

When someone, you know, attained enlightenment, he couldn't hear anything for three days, you know, or he couldn't see anything. Whatever he saw, things doesn't make any-made any sense, you know. It is the stage where you cannot find any particular meaning to things you see, or when you are completely detached from things you see. So for him, you know, things appears just like utter darkness. What he see is utter darkness. No perceptual world. Even in your zazen, you know, when your-you have very goodshikantaza, and if you hear the bird sing outside, there is no distance between you and bird. And you-actually you are not hearing the bird. And the bird is not anywhere-anywhere special-not on the tree, or across the stream, or on the wall-just [laughs], you know, sound-beautiful sound [laughs].

That is, you know-you may say that is "bird." But it is not even a bird. Afterwards, you know, you may say: "That was bird. It was very beautiful." But at that time it was not even a bird [laughs]. That is something like this. Or you-you don't even move, you know [laughs]. Just sound. Shhh. That is, you know, shochurai. In-in the new Japanese-English Buddhist Dictionary it says: [11]

"Even in the state in which discriminative thinking is transcended, there exist power to manifest the function of all the phenomenal-phenomena."

"Even in the stage-the state in which discriminative thinking is transcended, there exist power to manifest the function of all phenomena." The thinking or sensational world is-is already transcended completely, but still it has-still there exist-or there will be the manifestation of sound or color. Even though there are sound or color, you know, it is just same as no sound because that is the world of sound only or color only, you know. When it is color only, you know, it doesn't make any sense [laughs]. It is just one color only, you know. If something-if, you know, some-something just happened in that way. If sound-in the world of sound only-do you understand? The world of sound only-there is nothing but a sound-one sound-one sound of the bird.

That is the, you know, that sound is completely different sound from the sound you may hear in term of good or bad-or in term of who made that sound. Do you understand the difference? The difference between you have in everyday life, in usual sense, and the things you will hear in complete zazen. In the world of "things only," or "sound only," you hear. You cannot hear the sound-that kind of "sound only" or "sound only" when you are involved in, you know, lazy practice: "What time will it be?" "I am very sleepy this morning." "I should stay in bed more so that I can have good practice [laughs, laughter] next time," you know. In that kind of zazen [laughs], you will not hear the bird-the bird of sound only.

This poem says-oh:

Hard though it be,

there is no way to-there-there is no way to keep free from dust.[12]

Tonight's ability to avoid what is forbidden-

There is no-oh [sorting through notes]-

Hard-hard though it be,

there is a way to keep free from dust.

Today's ability to avoid what is forbidden surpasses yesterday's most eloquent discussion.

This is also-is not literal translation. "Hard though it be, there is a way to keep free from dust." If you translate it literally, "There is the way to keep yourself from dust."

It means that in-excuse me-can-there is a way to keep emptiness from dust. The "emptiness" means "original face" or "emptiness." And "dust" means the dualistic thinking mind. "There is a way-there is a way to keep our empty mind-to keep our emptiness from the dust of dualistic thinking mind." It is more, you know, literal translation.

"Today's ability-today's ability to avoid what is forbidden-what is forbidden. Today's ability, you know, to avoid what is forbidden" means, you know, we don't call [say] Emperor's name, you know. You call, you know, very intimately, friendly pres- [partial word]-name of the President, you know. But in China or in Japan, you know, we don't call Emperor's name by his first name, and he has no-he has no second name. He has just, you know, first name, and we don't call [say] his first name, even.

So "to avoid what is forbidden" means, you know, not to have the-not to call emptiness by name of many things, you know, like: "I attained enlightenment." Or, "Enlightenment experience is something difficult." And, "I have attained enlightenment." And, "This is big enlightenment." And, "This is minor enlightenment." [Laughs.] If you say so, it means that you-you couldn't avoid what is forbidden. You called the name of what-you called forbidden name [laughs].

So if-if someone ask you what is emptiness, you know, there is no way to say what it is. If you say something, that is not all-that is not emptiness itself. We should know that, you know .

Hmm. I think I have to explain this point, you know, next night-next time. There is many misunderstanding in this area, you know. When you say, you know: "it is not possible," word is very-word has just limited sense, and there is some limit. It will give some limitation to-to the reality, you know.

Even though I say: "Water is cold" [laughing]-but if you don't drink it, you don't understand actually what is-what is water. This is just, you know-

But when we say words is-when we say-we do not say-explain the limitation of the word, but we use words to point out the reality. So we do not mean to reject the word, or to reject our head. We should not reject our head. We should not reject our word even though it is not perfect.

And if you talk about limitation of, someone thinks: "If he thinks-if he talk about how imperfect ability-how poor ability it has-our thinking mind, our words-is, you know, Zen," you know, it is not so. If he is real Zen student, he should be able to point out, you know, by word, what is emptiness or what is enlightenment. At least he should try to do so instead of rejecting word-instead of rejecting the intellectual understanding of sutra. This point is very important because there are many people who make this kind of mistake. Just talking about "word' is no good [laughs]. The intellectual understanding is-doesn't mean anything. It is so poor it-we cannot communicate by words. The only way is to attain enlightenment. Unless you sit and attain enlightenment, you cannot study Zen [laughs]. So I don't explain what it is. "Just sit!" This is, you know, another mistake. If you understand zazen in that way, that is also a mistake.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Katharine Shields (7/10/00) and Bill Redican (7/18/00).

[1] shochuhen: The first of the shohengoi, the five degrees or ranks of enlightenment, a system developed by Tozan Ryokai et al. One definition is "ultimate reality encompassing phenomena" (The Japanese-English Zen Buddhist Dictionary, Tokyo: Sankibo, 1991, p. 684). Phenomena dominate consciousness, but they are experienced as a manifestation of fundamental reality (Shambhala Dictionary of Buddhism and Zen, p. 69).

[2] henchusho: The second of the shohengoi: "phenomena encompassing ultimate reality" (Sankibo, ibid.). Nondistinction becomes prominent; multiplicity fades (Shambhala, ibid.).

[3] From the Heart Sutra: "Form is emptiness."

[4] From the Heart Sutra: "Emptiness is form."

[5] From the Mahayana Shurangama Sutra (Ryogon-kyo), "The Sutra of the Heroic One." See, e.g., Philip Kapleau, The Three Pillars of Zen, pp. 57-60. The tale is not in verse form in the Sanskrit/Chinese versions, so Suzuki-roshi is probably translating from the Japanese Ryogon-kyo.

[6] Enyadatta is female in the Japanese version of the tale and male (Yajñadatta or Vajradatta) in the original Indian tale.

[7] "The Buddha said, 'Did you hear about Yajñadatta from Shravasti who on impulse one morning held a mirror to his face and fell in love with the head in the mirror? He gazed at the eyes and eyebrows but got angry because he could not see his own face. He decided he must be a mountain or river sprite, lost control, and ran madly about'" (Shurangama Sutra, Taisho Tripitaka, No. 945; translation by the Buddhist Text Translation Society).

[8] Sho means "emptiness" in the case of the third stage, "the fundamental" in the case of the second, and "the absolute" in the case of the first-i.e., it is used as the opposite of hen (Shambhala Dictionary, p. 69).

[9] Suzuki-roshi may be referring to Charles Luk's Śuraṅgama Sutra (Leng Yen Ching), London: Rider and Company, 1966, or Ch'an and Zen Teaching, London: Rider and Company, 1960.

[10] The Japanese-English Zen Buddhist Dictionary, 1991, defines this stage as "ultimate reality alone" (p. 684). In this stage, one no longer has an awareness of body and mind: both drop away (Shambhala Dictionary, p. 69).

[11] Daito Shuppansha Publishing Company, 1965. Suzuki-roshi is reading its definition of shochurai.

[12] Note.-Translated as a positive statement immediately below (i.e., there is a way).

4 - Question and Answer Session

Tuesday, July 08, 1969

Question and Answer Session

San Francisco

Suzuki-roshi: Tonight I have nothing special which I want to talk [about]. Of course, there may be many things which I must talk [about], but I cannot think of anything right now. And I don't know what kind of thing is to be told. Maybe-so may be better to answer your question. If you have some question please ask me. And at first I will-I want you to make several questions, and I will try to answer for it. Do you have some questions? Hai.

Student A: Will you speak of purity and worship?

Suzuki-roshi: Purity? Uh-huh. And worship. Some other questions too?

Student B: Could you speak of shikantaza?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: You said once that when someone's been enlightened it's just so much "candy." [SR laughs.] Could you explain that?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Oh.

Student D: With-with practice it seems that if I'm just following the natural flow, but if my practice changes often, sometimes watching breathing, sometimes just sitting, really involved in whatever I am doing, it just seems sort of unnatural just to try to stick with one particular practice like [1-2 words unclear] or watching breathing.

Suzuki-roshi: Okay, that's maybe enough [laughs]. Most of your question is-excuse me, will you-

Student E: Could you-could you speak on the practice of not-thinking or no thought during zazen?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Mostly, you know, the-your questions may be about practice, shikantaza, or your question is worship and purity of mind. And purity of mind is also something-the idea of purity of mind is how we practice shikantaza. Or "Enlightenment is just candy." That statement is rather [laughs], you know, maybe blasphemous or something like that. Or to attach to one practice is-looks like unnatural, you know.

Maybe, after all, I have to explain [laughs] how we should practice anyway: the purpose of practice or how you practice. Natural, you know, not-by "n-" [partial word]-our practice should be pure or should be natural. Or we should not be-our practice should not be encouraged by some candy, you know. To be natural or to be-to have pure practice or "to have no candy in our practice" means, after all, to have deeper practice. And our intention to practice zazen is not just in term of pure or impure, or successful or unsuccessful, or natural or unnatural. Those, you know-maybe what you mean is deeper than what you say, you know. But if I take it literally it looks like very-not so deep, you know.

When you say-when we say "pure," it is more emotional, you know: good and bad practice in its emotional term. Pure or impure is also-maybe emotional area-a field. You say "pure" or "impure." But our practice is more than that. So we do not practice zazen, whether it is Rinzai or Soto-we do not practice zazen to experience some special experience. And when we say "enlightenment" it does not mean to have some experience-some particular experience, according to Rinzai, you know. To-whatever it is, whatever the experience may be, if you feel it or if you understand it, that is not [what] we mean by enlightenment experience.

Enlightenment experience is some experience-to experience-to go beyond you or your surrounding, or teaching, or zazen, or-zazen practice-or enlightenment, or someone who practice zazen, and zazen in its-in some form. Of course there is no idea of koan practice or shikantaza. Koan practice-you know, you-you know, you may say that that is koan practice, that is shikantaza. But when you experience enlightenment experience, actually there is no koan practice or shikantaza. And if you say, "This is," you know, "the enlightenment experience," that is not actually the true experience-enlightenment experience.

So how you practice zazen is without expecting, you know, some special-without dreaming of something, you know, in your mind. Without expecting some special experience you should devote yourself fully in your practice. When that is difficult we count our breathing or we practice koan practice. The koan practice or counting breathing practice is some help, you know. To help our pure practice, we use koan or counting breathing.

We say, "counting breathing practice." It is not actually to-purpose of counting breathing is not to count your breathing without mistake. Even though we try not to make mistake [laughs]-but we try [?] not to make any mistake. But the purpose of zazen is not just to count our breathing without any mistake. To engage in, you know, a full practice we count our breathing. That you can count your breathing without mistake means you are fully engaged in true practice. [Laughs.] Do you understand the difference? Just count your breathing, and-between just to count your breathing and when you are-you are able to-when you are counting your breathing without mistake, that is perfect, you know, that is perfect practice. There is some difference. You may-you can count your breathing, you know, even [if] you are-you have lazy posture like this [gestures, laughs], without mistake, from one to ten and go back to one. But that is not true zazen because your body, you know, activity is not fully engaged in the practice. All of mind and body should be engaged in one full practice. And to help this kind of entire practice of body and mind, we count our breathing. So counting breathing is just, you know-handle of-handle of your jar, like this [gestures], you know. Not jar itself, just-that is just handle of the jar which you may take hold of. Or it is something to-some way to encourage your pure practice. That is, you know, counting breathing practice. That is not actual purpose of zazen, but it is aid of pure practice.

If I say so, at the same time you will have some mistake. If, you know, that is just aid of practice, you know, it is not so important. So you may make some mistake, but that doesn't matter, you know. But that is not also true. So even though you make best effort in your counting breathing, the purpose of counting breathing practice is not just [to] count. Even though it is not the purpose of practice, you sh- [partial word]-you must, you know, try to count your breathing without mistake.

Do you understand this much? Or, if necessary, I have to explain, you know, more completely. But I don't want to explain so-in so-in some-I don't want to give you another problem, you know [laughs], in an-[partial word]-by my answer. Is that okay with you, or-

And pure practice is, you know, the practice-when you practice-when your practice is beyond pure or impure, that is pure practice we mean. And to sit "without candy" means, you know, also to practice our way beyond our-beyond the idea of what is the purpose of zazen. Even the idea of enlightenment we should not have. Even though you-once you attain enlightenment, and you should not try to have same experience. That kind of thing, that kind of practice is not right practice. Does it make some sense?

And "natural," you know-and here is-natural practice, you know, our-you like word "natural," you know. Because you like it so much [laughs], I don't agree with your idea of natural. Because you like it so much, you stick to the natural-naturalness too much. When you stick to it, it is not natural any more. [Laughs, laughter.] We-we, you know-our life is not natural, you know. But, you know, to do something, you know, without any idea of what you should do, you know, idea of any particular way, that is maybe naturalness. But "natural" we mean-by natural we mean more than that. Before we discuss naturalness, you know, we should know how unnatural our human being are [laughs]. We are very unnatural being. We are not natural being. Our way of life is not so natural-very, you know, twisted and very unnatural.

Recently, you know, people are going to extremes, you know. To go to the extreme will be natural [laughs] according to your connotation of naturalness. But we don't mean that is natural. Do you think usually what you do is quite natural? We say, [1] you know: "to be free from"- "to obtain our natural order of mind we should be free from greed," we say, you know. What does it mean? To open our mind fully.

So when we, you know-when we are free from greed, and anger, and foolishness, we will have natural order of mind. That kind of naturalness is our naturalness. Do you understand the difference? Your naturalness [is?] to be greedy, to be angry [laughs]-whenever you become angry, to be angry, and to eat as much as you want, that is naturalness. But that is not the naturalness we mean. Very different, you know, actually.

Naturalness-natural mind or-means maybe more flexible mind, you know, without sticking to something rigidly. When we-when we are-when we have-when our mind is perfect freedom from everything, and when our mind is open to everything like a mirror, you know, the mirror do not have any particular image on its face always. So it is naturally-naturally it will have various images according to the object. That is naturalness.

Zazen mind-we say stop your thinking, but when we think, you know, our-to think is to-to have some picture of something, you know, in term of long or short, or white or black, you know. That is thinking mind. So when we start to think, our mind will be dead, you know. So when we don't think, you know, our mind is open to various objects.

My friend is studying Chinese. After finishing his schooling, he started to study. Even he was at school he was very much interested in Chinese classics, about herbs and medicine. And he is still studying: collecting Chinese books about various therapy or medicine or herbs. According to Chinese classics we have two minds. One is here and the other is here [gestures]. This mind is called yang mind, and this is yin mind. Yin and yang, two minds. And this mind is, you know-the center of this mind is branch of this mind. According to-he says, according to some American doctor, it is possible for us to be alive even [if] this mind of your[s] is cut off from the yin mind here. What do you call the center of, you know, nervous system in your-?

Student F: Solar plexus.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student F: Solar plexus.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. I don't know where, but-I understand it is some-center is here or here [gestures]. And Chinese people called our navel, God-"gate of God." This is very important, you know. So I don't know where, but according to Chinese-old Chinese people, we have five minds which has various different function. We have five organs here, and we have five function of mind here which is more autom- [partial word]-automnal-or what do [you call it]-au- [partial word]?

Student G: Genetic.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student G: Genetic?

Student H: Autonomic?

Suzuki-roshi: Automatic-yeah, autonomous, maybe. Like blink of your eyes, you know. When I do like this [gestures], maybe this mind is, you know, working. But mostly this mind is not working when you blink your eyes or-nothing to do with this mind when our heart beats or movement of tummy. And 99% of our nervous activity is more autonomous or vegetable-like nervous system. And center of those vegetable-like nervous system is here [gestures]. And this is, you know-when we human being became more and more human-like, we started to form some mind here [gestures], which is thinking mind. And we started to talk, you know, to communicate, to give some idea to others. We started to have this mind which is branch of-maybe more fundamental one is [pats himself three times] this mind.

Why did I started to talk about [laughs, laughter] something like this?

But, anyway, we put more emphasis on here [gestures], you know. More original and more basic activity rather than limited thinking mind, which will, you know, be the disturbance, or which will give some strong disturbance or change [?], you know, to the original activity of life. The more you think, you know, the more your mind become busy, you cannot digest, you know, or you will have some trouble in your tummy. So when your mind is open, this mind [gestures] is more open and natural, you know, in its true sense, you will have more active, more natural, good activity of your emotional activity.

So, anyway, in our practice, we sh- [partial word]-we put more emphasis on to get rid of various-to free our physical activities from our mental activity. So physiologically, you know, you can explain why we put emphasis on to attain more, you know, natural function of our mind and body. Usually, you know, this mind has too much authority, you know, to your emotional activity. "You should feel this way" [laughs, hits stick on table twice], you know. Or "Even though you feel in that way, that is not possible," you know, this mind will tell, you know, your emotional activity. "That is just superstition," you know. "Even though you feel good, that is just superstition." Or "It is-you have-we have no time to do so. Even though you feel sorry for him, we have no time to save him." So in that way, you know, our-this mind has, in our life-this mind has more dominating power over our activities of life, which is not, you know, so good.[2]

So naturalness, usually, is not true naturalness, you know. Maybe naturalness of your mind [laughs] maybe, mind only, which is not so natural in its true sense. Do you have some other questions? Hai.

Student I: You mentioned some practices which we could use in our daily practice besides zazen-formal practice-zazen, which might help us rid ourselves of this thinking mind or less addictive [?], our mind.

Suzuki-roshi: Although I said, you know, in that way, I rather put emphasis on-right now put emphasis on more emotional activity rather than thinking mind, you know. But it does not mean thinking mind is not, you know-is bad, you know. It is important too. So in our daily life, you know, if we know this point, it will be help. But actually the best way is to practice Zen and to-to have this kind of naturalness in your-this kind of naturalness which you have in your practice should-could be-should be extended to your nat- [partial word]-everyday life, you know, usual activities. That is, you know, what we try to do more.

Student I: The difficulty seems to be that I use my thinking mind to rid myself of the influence it has on my thinking mind. [2-4 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: But-that is more, you know-that will be the-I think, you know, even just to know, you know, this kind of thing actually doesn't help so much, you know. Even though you know it, you know, even though you know you have a lot of, you know, money in your bank, it doesn't help so much [laughs], you know. When you actually use it, it will be a great help. But just to know something about it-this kind of teaching or explanation-is not much help actually. So best thing is to have actual, you know, practice to control your thinking mind and to free your everyday life from thinking mind, and just to use your thinking mind when it is necessary. That is, you know, that is important, but how you do it is not just to know this kind of thing. And only way to do it is to have actual power to do it. And how to obtain this kind of power is [to] practice zazen.

So, you know, when you practice zazen, that is why you must have strong determination or confidence in your practice. The way you practice zazen is not-should not be like to read some book, you know, to find out something good [laughs]-something good, you know, or to be fascinated [by] some beautiful experience. This is very, you know, shallow, and your determination is not strong enough. So when you practice zazen, you must have strong confidence, like: "Whatever happen to me, I will not stop s- [partial word]-my zazen." This kind of-so your-you should be dead, you know [laughs], on your practice. That kind of, you know, attitude is necessary. It is not just to think something or to find out something. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

Student J: ... So there's many types of work that we can do. We can do work that involves thinking, we can do work that involves teaching like with children, do work which is nothing but physical work, you know. Power [?] is very tiring. And all of these different kinds of work-it all takes some consideration, it seems. And lately I've been giving it quite a consideration, and sometimes I don't really know what kind of work would be most beneficial for a frame of mind which would be good for zazen. I wanted to ask you if there are certain types of work or employment that should be avoided and certain kinds that are more beneficial.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah. Right is, of course, better to choose your work. But I think there will be two kinds of work, you know. It is just physical work, you know, without using, you know, your mind so much. And the other is opposite, you know, like office work or counting something-calculating something. This kind of work is just, you know, mental work in which you cannot, you know, practice koan study, you know [laughs]. You cannot practice koan study when you are counting something. But if that is just physical work, you can do it. But mostly I classified in this way, but most work is not purely mental or physical-maybe mixture of both. So I think best way is to be concentrated on what you do-what you are doing. That is mostly [how] we apply our practice in our everyday life. Not to-to be concentrated on what you do. Maybe most work is more mental than physical. Don't you think so?

Student J: I think it's better if it is more physical than mental.

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student J: It should be better for us if it was more physical than mental.

Suzuki-roshi: I don't know which is better. Physical-physical one is also difficult, you know, and you will be very much tired of-physically tired. And it is not so good-if you are tired out too much, I don't think you can practice zazen after your work. So even though you practice zazen, it will not help, you know, immediately, you know [laughs]. Little by little you will gain the power, but it will not help, you know, like to drink some honey, you know [laughs]. When I cough, if I take some water it helps a lot, but zazen will not help so-so well immediately. But, you know, it will-what you gain in zazen will not, you know, go away. That is advantage of our practice.

Our practice make your mind clear, you know, and make your physical and emotional activity natural and stronger, and make your character more, you know, like this [gestures?], more natural and-so you will give good feeling to others. This is very important too. When you are-when you give good feeling to others, at the same time you will have good feeling too. Do you agree with that? [Laughs.]

Student K: What is the place of love and devotion in our practice?

Suzuki-roshi: Love and devotion in our practice? Both love and devotion is very important. But, you know, love or devotion should be, you know, defined. It is not-love or devotion in its usual sense is not so, you know-is not polished up-love or devotion. We do not believe in some label, you know [laughs]: "love", "devotion," or some beautiful words. That is just paper [laughs], you know, picture. So we are not so interested in just picture. What it means is, you know, more important. Love or devotion is-must be something which is-which could be recognized by others, rather than to-or-to have some confidence in it, you know. Even though you say, "I love you," you know, or "I love practice" [laughs]-but if practice doesn't say, you know, "Oh, thank you," [laughing] it doesn't mean much, you know. Maybe that is your love, but it doesn't help-it doesn't mean so much for others, you know. So, again, naturalness is important: something which comes out from the source of your, you know, character. That is more important things than some idea or some beautiful words. Hai.

Student L: For about the last hundred years, in Western culture, I think the idea that maybe we're too civilized has come up a lot. And with Sigmund Freud, the discovery that the suppression of many animal instincts such as anger, may lead to mental illness, may lead to more problems-that on the one hand, if you allow complete freedom of animal impulses, you know, chaos [results]. But if you suppress them too much, people become unhappy and even destroy themselves in other ways. How would Zen Buddhism look on that problem and how would it resolve that seeming conflict which Freud could not see any resolution in that? He thought men must be always somewhat neurotic, somewhat sick because of that conflict.

Suzuki-roshi: I couldn't clearly follow you, but Zen, you know-I cannot say, you know, our way is like this or like that, you know, because I- And we don't like to say, "this is Zen" or "that is Zen," or "This is the true way" or "That is not." But we-tonight I have no time to explain it, but we have some formula, you know, to avoid from going to extreme, you know, and to have always right judgement about things you see, about what you do, or about what you want to do. There is some, you know, not teachings, but some way to observe things more effectively and more clearly-to know what is wrong with it, you know, with your activity, or with what you did, or what you want to do.

So, usually, you know, I'm sorry to say that, but when you ask questions, you know, you want to know exactly what is Zen, you know, but we don't want to say, you know, what is Zen because something which was said will create some problem. Hai.

Student L: My question really wasn't, "What is Zen?" It's more, just, how to live.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: Maybe it would be simpler [?] if I give an example. If I am angry at something-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student L: -if I completely suppress my anger-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: -but it stays in me-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: -it may be bad for me. It may-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student L: -be very bad for my life-

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student L: -for my practice-

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student L: -say, sitting. If I express it, I get rid of it-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student L: -but I may hurt somebody else.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah.

Student L: So what am I going to do?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] I think it is more harmless to express it, you know, than to suppress it. But at that time you know-you must know what is anger, you know. Anger is not something which, you know-actually, we cannot be angry with anything, you know. [Laughs, laughter.] Actually, when you are angry at it, something wrong with it-with you, yourself, you know-or your understanding of you about something. But to show, you know, "I am so foolish," you should be angry. Not to, you know, not to stop someone, you know, to do something or, you know, to suppress something, but to show your foolishness you should be angry. "Oh, I am sorry. I must be angry!" [Thumps table dramatically at "angry." Laughs.] Then it will-it will be [a] help [to] you yourself and others too. So at that time you are free from anger, actually, and you-being angry you will be helped, you know, because you don't suppress your feeling.

We have precepts: "Don't be angry," you know [laughs]. And Dogen-zenji's explanation to it is: Anger will be the beautiful cloud in the sky, or beautiful, you know, waves of water. When the sun lights or the moon lights, you will-we will have, you know, water in the sea, in the wa- [partial word]-moon in the-on the water. The anger is something like that.

So according to him, there is no need to suppress it because it is so beautiful [laughs]. But when you say it is so beautiful it is not so beautiful. When you [are] just angry, you know, like a boy, like a naughty boy, it may be very beautiful. That kind of humbleness is more important, and if we practice our way you will understand how difficult it is to be humble. So maybe better to be just honest. Whatever you do, you know-we should know that whatever you do or whatever you did is not perfect, so you should say, "Oh, excuse me" [laughs]-whatever you do, "Excuse me."

If a master slaps his student [makes mock scolding noise], and you should say-he should say, "Excuse me" [laughs] to himself. [Whispers:] "Excuse me" [laughs, laughter]. But usually, you know, after you hitting someone, and you should kick him [laughs], and toss him, and he would be tired out [laughs, laughter]. That is not so good. Some other question? Hai.

Student M: You suggested to us that as students we should try to steal our teacher's way.

Suzuki-roshi: Ohhh. [Laughs.] [Mistakes "way" for "wife."]

Student M: I-I-[you said] something like that.

Suzuki-roshi: Did I? Did I say so? No. [Laughter]. I have no idea, you know, being stolen my wife. [Laughs, laughter.] Okay.

Student M: Do you-will you please explain how we commit that crime?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] How? [Asked with astonishment.] Do you want to commit that crime? [Laughter.]

Student M: To steal your way.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Way?

Student M: Your way.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh! I thought you said "wife." [Laughing, laughter.] "How-how I should steal my teacher's wife!" Way! I see. I shall be very glad to be stolen my way.

How you steal teacher's way may be not difficult, but may take pretty long time. But even though you are-if you are patient enough, or if you like him, naturally you will-eventually you will steal his way completely. That is true. It happens in that way. Even though you don't try to imitate his way. Or even though you hate to, you know, to steal his way, it is quite- I don't know why it happens in that way. So, you know, to be a teacher is awful, you know [laughs]. We don't know-because we don't know who is stealing-who or when, you know, stealing our way.

So it is-you should-you reminded me [of] a[n] awful thing I was almost forgotten. And students will learn something a teacher, you know, want him not to, you know, steal or learn. If, you know, his teacher is forgetful, his student may be forgetful easily, quite easily. But even though his teacher is patient it may be difficult-it may take long time when his student become patient as his teacher. So something what, you know, teacher want his student to steal something, he may not steal it.

So we say-Dogen-zenji says, "You-we must practice hard for our descendant, for our disciples," you know-not for himself but for-if he-if we know how important it is to have good disciple, then he must practice very hard. That is very true. When we come to this point, you know, our practice is not just for us-or our practice is just for disciples, or for others, rather than for ourselves.

So when we have real relationship of teacher and disciple, that relationship is much deeper than the relationship between your children and you, or your wife and, you know, you or husband and you. It is much deeper than that.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Diana Bartle and Bill Redican (2/1/01).

[1] From the formal meal chant: "Desiring the natural order of mind, we should be free from greed, hate, and delusion."

[2] The transcriber believes the antecedent of "which" is "activities," not the relationship of mind to activities.

5 - Form and Emptiness II

Wednesday, December 31, 1969

Form and Emptiness II
Tassajara

In our previous lectures we have studied the relationship between-relationship between real and seeming, or emptiness and forms. [By] "real" we mean something beyond our thinking. This is, you know,-there is no way to-whatever, you know, we say about it, it is the expre-[partial word]-just suggestion, you know, not real or emptiness itself. It is something beyond our thinking mind, so we call it "emptiness."

It is not actually something which we can understand in term of good or bad, real or not real. And seeming and all-whatever it is-all what we say, you know, everything what we say or what we see is forms. And we actually live in the world of forms and color, you know. And we don't know, actually, what is emptiness itself. Even-we call it "emptiness," you know, there is some rules, you know, how emptiness takes various form. So according to some rules, emptiness take its form and color. And we are explaining about the relationship between emptiness and form which we can see.

Right now we have been mostly discussing rather philosophical way, but tonight may be better to explain it more psychological way or physical way. According to Buddhist psychology, you know, of course, we have five senses, and thinking mind, and to-some faculty to lead our thinking mind in false, you know-to make our thinking mind mistake, you know. That kind of faculty we have. And there is also some faculty to point out the mistake of the seventh mind, you know. Five senses and thinking mind, that is six. Seventh one is, you know, to make our mind made-make mistake. That is the sixth one-the seventh [corrects self] one. That is the mind which let our thinking mind stick to something, you know. There is [laughs] no need to stick to something, you know, actually. But seventh mind, you know, make sixth mind to stick to something.

The truth we think-idea we have is not always-should not be always same. It should change. But we [are] liable to stick to some-some idea. Why we do so is because of the sixth mind we explain. And that sixth mind is, of course, mistake, you know. We should not stick to some idea always, because everything is changing. If things in reality [are] changing, our mind should change also. But we [are] liable to think, you know, something always exist, something which we see-which we saw always exist and some conclusion we reached is always true. But it is not so. Today's, you know, conclusion will not be true anymore tomorrow, maybe. But we [are] liable to stick to some conclusion or idea. That is the seventh mind.

And eighth-eight one-eighth one told us-tell us, you know, that is also mistake. And eighth one-eighth sense is at the same time the storehouse of various, you know, ideas and knowledge. And eighth-eighth sense is just the purpose of-motto [?] of the eighth sense is just to keep things as it is, old and new. Everything is mountain and river, whatever it is, you know. What we see is always kept in our mind. That is eight-eighth one. And it include also not only knowledge or ideas but also outward object-so-called-it outward object: objective world, including mountain and stones and river and water. Everything, you know, which we call "objective world" is included in our eighth mind. So eighth mind or sense is both subjective and objective, and material and spiritual.

But most of us-most of us are very much involved in thinking mind, and we do-we ignore the more fundamental minds-mind. Because we put more emphasis on thinking mind, so we ignore, you know, our tummy [hara], you know, which is the center of more vegetable-like nervous system. We call it-I think you call it "autonomous [autonomic] nervous system," you know. This is the center of the autonomous system. And, you know, our brain is the center of thinking mind, you know. And it-our nervous system connect both center, you know, like this [probably gestures].

We know many things about our brain system, but we don't know whether have mind here or not. But from ancient time, Oriental people studied a lot about this mind. Just very-you ca-[partial word]-I don't think you-you have any idea of having some mind here in your tummy [?]. And to our great surp- [partial word]-astonishment, you know, the most, you know, maybe 99 percent of our nervous system [consists] of more vegetable-like system, not, you know, smart thinking nervous system. And we-Chinese people call mind here [points to brain?] is yang; and this mind here [points to hara?] is yin. Some people understand yang is better than yin or powerful-more powerful than yin, but that is not right. Both yin and yang is important.

So yin means, you know, some-something which produce many things. That is yin, like earth, you know. Earth is yin, and the sun is, you know, yang. And yang, you know, help producing us many things. And woman is yin, and man is-a man is yang [laughs]. I-we don't know which is more important [laughter, laughs]. Anyway, both is necessary, yin and yang.

And Chinese people thinks this mind we have here is-or this mind or nervous center-center of vegetable-like nerves is here [hara?], right here. And this is actually, you know, a branch of, you know, this nervous system, according to Chinese understanding of mind. So even though you cut off our mind from this mind, you know-cutting off the connection between this mind and this mind, still, you know, you can survive. And you-still you can-you will have children, you know. Still you can eat. If you cut off this mind from yin mind, this center, you know, exist, but this center stop, you know, working. So that is why, you know, we put emphasis on practice of here [hara], you know. If you practice-if you practice zazen, you will have more active autonomous nervous system. On the other hand-on the contrary, if you use too much thinking mind, it will affect the activity of your nervous center here and will create some indigestion or some-will create some trouble to your tummy or lung which is in-in your tummy [hara].

We, you know-by the way [sounds of Suzuki-roshi writing on a blackboard], it [niku] means "flesh," you know, and this [do] means earth, which is in.[1] And this character means hara. This is hara.

The flesh-earth-or in nature's flesh, you know, here [in the hara]. And it is-so this is very important part [laughs]. It is not just to-tummy is not to just to keep your various things, you know-bag to keep it-various thing in it. It is very important, you know. Hara.

So in our practice we rather stop our thinking and encourage our activity of more vegetable-like nerve [nervous system]. And this is nearer to the understanding of reality. We-we analyze things for some purpose, you know. But more important thing is to support ourself, you know, in healthy condition. And you can analyze things, and think about something, and try to make our life easy-easier. But first of all, we have to keep ourselves healthy.

So even though-so maybe, you know, that is why we are now more interested in medicine or medical science rather than philosophy nowadays, I think. And when you become more interested in medical science, eventually we will [become] more interested in study of our own hara. And Chinese people say-according to Chinese people, we have five, you know, five organ in our body. And each one of us-each one of them has some special-not thinking, but nervous activity. My friend is very-now in Japan, authority of Chinese medical-medicine, and he has been-he was a good student when we were studying together. But he started to-he became interested in herbs and Chinese medicine. And he is still continuing reading many books, and [studying] relationship between Zen and Chinese medicine. It is so voluminous that I have no time to follow his books, you know.

But what he describe in those magazine or books is very interesting. And he has big confidence in our future medicine, which is almost, you know, vanished from China and from Japan after Meiji period, when we are more interested in Western medical science. So, according to our law, we cannot be a doctor unless we study Western medicine. That is only way to be a-to have license, you know, as a doctor. And we have still therapy, for an instance-what you call it?-to burn our skin,[2] you know, on some point, you know, or to put a needle,[3] you know-by needle here we help some people. But they are just popular therapists. They have no-they have license, but they have no license to diagnose-diagnose a patient. If y- [partial word]-if they come, they will see him, and, of course, you know, unless he knows what is wrong with him, he cannot use his therapy. But by law it is prohibited to make some prescription or [to] diagnose a patient. But if you study more-nowadays it is very difficult to have-to read books-to collect books because we haven't not much books even. In China, also, those valuable classics is no more. So he has very difficult time to study Chinese medicine.

This is not what I wanted to talk [about] tonight [laughs], but anyway what I want to say is, you know: Thinking mind-in our practice, you know, we stop-rather stop our thinking mind to make our more fundamental activity active. Sometime we say "direct experience." What does it mean physically or psychologically? More to stop our thinking mind and to open our basic mind-our practice, physically speaking or psychologically speaking. Anyway we-Western p-[partial word]-Eastern people or Oriental people-our base of-for Oriental people, base of our thinking is oneness, you know, oneness. And that one will be divided yin and yo-yin and yang. There is no yin and yang, or seeming or reality, quite separate element, you know. One-originally it is one element, and yin or yang is two side of one element.

So we catch, you know, our things in the picture of yin and yang, or seeming or reality, you know. That is just picture of one reality, you know. It is not-we don't think, "Here is seeming, and here is reality," or, "Here is yin, and here is yang," you know, and, "Yang is better than yin," or "Yin is better than-more powerful than yang." We don't think in that way.

And-our world will be divided [into] yin and yang, will be divided, you know. Our world will be divided in two. But temporary we can divide it in two, but it does not mean our world is consist of yin and yang. Yin plus yang is not our world. But we, you know, tentatively divide or analyze our world in two: yin and yang. Do you understand the difference? So it is difference of-base of the thinking mind. Your thinking mind is based on duality and our Oriental thinking is based on more oneness.

So even though we use those-this kind of formula, this is a picture of reality, you see? Just picture of reality. We understand reality in this way, that's all. It does not mean there is, you know, form and co-[partial word]-emptiness, something which is called emptiness and which is something called form. Form and emptiness is originally one. But because of our rigid, limited thinking mind, or to destroy our thinking mind, we use this kind of tools. This is a tools to destroy our thinking mind, or destroy-by "destroy" I mean to be free from thinking mind.

And tonight I think I have to explain this one: "Form is emptiness." Oh-excuse me. "Form is form." When we call "form," there is nothing but form-form-world of form only. After we understand or accept the formula of "form of emptiness, emptiness is form," and "emptiness is emptiness," we will reach the understanding of world of form only-form only.

I think you will understand the world of form only. Actually, you know, whether you understand Buddhism or not, maybe we are actually living in the world of form only. But this form include thinking mind too-everything: physical and spiritual. Whatever it is, what we think is world of form only. So actually we live in world of form only, but there is difference between Buddhist and non-Buddhist. Buddhist also live in world of form only, you know. But there is difference. The difference is, you know, Buddhist understand "form is emptiness, and emptiness is form, and emptiness is emptiness, and form is form," you know. But usual people understand-do not understand "emptiness is form, and form is emptiness, and form is form, emptiness is emptiness." That is the difference. Usual people, you know, in short, do not, you know, have any experience of zazen practice, any experience of stopping thinking mind to reach the world "form"-[corrects self] "emptiness is emptiness."

So for usual people, you know, to lose something is very discouraging, you know. Like the old Indian-Indian old woman, you know, who happened to see in her mirror no head [laughs]. [4] She couldn't-see, one morning, her own head in his [her] mirror, so she was very much discouraged, you know. We Buddhist will not be discouraged, even though, you know, we die because we know form is emptiness. Originally we are empty. Originally we are not here, you know, because we are changing moment after moment. I am here, but tomorrow I shall be quite different person because I am changing always into someone-something else. I cough a lot tonight, but I may not cough tomorrow morning [laughs], so I'm not same person. So [if] I die in two days, you know, Suzuki and new Suzuki will be born in tomorrow morning. That is, you know, our understanding of ourselves. That is the difference.

But I am right here, you know, and I am doing something. I am talking to you and you are listening to me, so we are involved in same activity. So we are doing same thing, but our understanding of life is different. Actually difference is, you know, whether you understand our life in this way, you know, with five ways or with one way is the difference.

Usually we understand things-as I said, "Form is form." [Laughs.] "I am I," you know. "Table is table." "Fire is fire." That is our usual understanding. And that understanding is called "dualistic understanding." So in one way, Western culture is enemy of [laughs] Oriental culture, or good husband of Oriental culture, maybe. Enemy and, you know, good husband is same thing [laugh, laughter]-not different at all. Good, you know, good couple are always fighting [laughs]-quarrel-get into quarrel. So we say, "You should not try to," you know, "[get] involved in the quarrel of husband and wife." He may be very good friend, you know. He is so good to continue their quarrel. But, you know-so whatever the relationship may be, it is all right, you know. For Buddhist it is all right. For non-Buddhist it is, maybe, big problem [laughs]. So we must be able to, you know, have various picture of same reality.

[Sound of papers being shuffled. Long pause.]

Do you have some question? By the way, can you hear me? [Laughs, laughter.] [Turned tape over here.]

Student A: You mentioned a part of the Shobogenzo that we should read? The "Shakokate"?[5] And I didn't hear what it was, and I'm getting very curious.

Suzuki-roshi: Shakura practice?

Student A: Yeah. You said that if it didn't sound absolutely right, there was something wrong with our practice. Something that we should read-some part of the Shobogenzo .

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. [Laughs.]

Student A: Do you remember?

Suzuki-roshi: No, I don't remember [laughter]. Shobogenzo?

Student A: I think so; I'm not sure. Shobogenzo maybe-Suzuki-roshi: When? Recently?

Student A: Oh, maybe a month ago. Is that-Suzuki-roshi: When I was talking about counting-breathing exercises?

Student A: Uh-huh.

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. Chakra.

Student B: To check our practice. He said to check our practice.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, check.

Student A: Yeah, to check our practice-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, check.

Student A: -to see if it's all right, you know. To-if-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh.

Student A: You said that if we read it and it didn't sound right, if it didn't sound all right, then there was something wrong with our practice? Do you understand?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. You know, when you think, you know, your practice [is] all right, you know, that is not all right [laughs, laughter]. So you just, you know-you should just sit. Whether it is all right or not all right doesn't matter [laughter]. Do you understand? But difficult, you know. When you say "This is all right, or this is not all right," that is here, right here-not here [probably alternately pointing to head and hara]. So we should not be bothered by this one, you know [tapping-probably pointing to head].

Student B: Roshi, could this mind be received by this mind [probably also pointing to his head and his hara]?

Suzuki-roshi: By this mind? No. No, no. This is very limited mind.

Student B: Can this mind be perceived by this mind?

Suzuki-roshi: This mind is supporting. This mind is supporting this one. This is branch office, actually [laughs, laughter]. So he doesn't know, you know, what is going on here.

Student B: Can this mind perceive itself?

Suzuki-roshi: No [sounding tentative or qualified]. The mind perceive something is here [hara]. This is-so you call it "autonomous," you know, autonomous-autonomous nerve-nervous system. And anyway some American doctor, according to him, you know, some American doctor put emphasis on mind here. I don't know who he is, but- Hai.

Student C: Why do we need to study about Zen and listen to lectures about Zen if we're not going [?] to be bothered by [1-2 words unclear]?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Because, you know, we are always involved in thinking mind only, and we have not much ability to free our mind from thinking mind. That is why. So those formula is to, you know, to destroy the attachment to thinking mind. This is a kind of thought. Because we are intellectual being, so the thought should also be intellectual or else it doesn't work. So we use this kind of, you know, logic or thinking formula. So this formula itself-themselves doesn't mean much, you know. This is just thought to cut off something-something we should not [be] involved in too much. That is-that is why we study this kind of thing. And because we are intellectual-excuse me, because we are so intellectual, it is necessary, you know, to intellectualize our intellectuality [laughs, laughter] to be free from it, you know. That is why we study those things. But actually if you practice zazen, that is enough. But what is real practice is-will be the problem, you know. So to know what is right practice also we use this kind of suggestion or tools. Hai.

Student D: Once you said in a lecture that if we are thinking while we are eating, we are not doing good practice of eating, but we're doing good practice of thinking. Should we as Zen-as beginning Zen students, try to avoid occupations that require using the thinking mind, or is there a way to keep up our practice in jobs that-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student D: -make us think?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. And, you know, there may be, you know, -if you, you know-maybe tentatively you can classify our work in two ways, you know: physical work and mental, you know, work. So physical work, when you, like when you scrub floor, you know, we don't have to think. In that case, a student who is practicing on koan mu he can, you know, practice koan study even [when] he is scrubbing floor because he is not, you know, using his head. And koan practice is mostly-the purpose of koan study is to give up thinking mind. Anyway, it is practice of mind. So you can do it-do that, you know.

But when you are counting something, you cannot, you know, study koan practice. So in that case, I think it is-your practice should be to-to do your job, you know, or to think only your job and without thinking some other things. That is, in that case, our practice. We say, "one-thing-only practice," you know. When we-why this is practice is when we are involved in only one thing, you know, it is only one activity, only one kind of activity. Then your mind will not be disturbed because you do not-you are not involved in some other things. So it means that your thinking activity include everything, or there is nothing but your thinking world at that time. That is, you know, the world of "form is form" only. There is no other thing. Just exist is your-your thinking activity at that time. So if that kind of thinking activity continue, that is the world of form only. That is one-a kind of practice.

Student E: Is it possible for Zen monks to disagree among themselves?
[Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. [Laughter, laughs.] It is possible. But, you know, at the same time, you know, you should, you know, understand some others' understanding too. You know, there are so many formulas, you know [laughs]. So you shouldn't be, you know-although there are so many formulas, you know, it is-actually it is just one formula. One formula will be, you know, understood in five ways, that's all. So not to disagree is, maybe, agreeing with it, you know [laughs]. To agree with it may be not to agree with it, or whether agree or whether or agree or not agree or not not [laughs] not disagree. We don't stick to it, that's all. You can say no, but that's all.

Student F: Since we are constantly changing, is there anything you know that doesn't change?

Suzuki-roshi: No. Nothing. Nothing. [Pause and slight laugh.] If there is something, point out what it is. You cannot. This [thumping desk or floor] doesn't change, you cannot say. That is, you know, our understanding, you know. For you, you know, there may be "something changes and something which doesn't change," but that is not true with Buddhist. Everything changes, including Buddha himself. Hai.

Student G: Well, if we are constantly changing, moment by moment, what gives the continuity of being the same person?

Suzuki-roshi: Continue-same person?

Student E: What seems-what gives the appearance of being the same person all the time-the quality of that same person?

Suzuki-roshi: Continuity, you know. Continuity is like some, you know, some current, you know. "Continuity," we say, but that continuity is like something-some thread, you know. You may think this world consist of, you know, long, long thread [laughs] like this. Continuity may be the thread, you know. And that thread will be-if you roll like, you know, this [gestures] will be a big ball. That is our world, maybe. That is not our understanding.

So we say-as some-as Nishida[6] said, "If we understand our world is unfolding of the-a truth," you know, "we will lose one side of the truth." The one side of the truth is, "What is the relationship between long thread," you know. This is just one thread. It means the unfolding of one truth, you know, "just thread." [Laughs.] What is the, you know, relationship between A and B? This side is missing in this understanding. So when we say, "Everything changes," you know, it means that we are related to everything, you know, this way. And we are related to future, you know, to the future being and past being. So this is rather difficult to explain, you know, how this world is consist of. And your questions is, you see, when you ask that question, your understanding is based on, "This world is," you know, "consist of long, long thread." But it is not actually so, you know. This kind of lecture is, you know, to the-for the training of our thinking mind, to get-to be free from our thinking mind, and to utilize thinking mind fully, we study this kind of thing. Did you understand? [Laughs]

You-it-what I want to say is you are still, you know, stick[ing] to [laughs] thinking mind, and there is something, you know, which I should explain, you see? Your question is based on the understanding of-unfolding of the truth about this reality.

The reality is something which is not possible to explain what it is. If we say, you know, "We are part of reality," you know, that is also mistake. As you said, you know, as you said, if we are a part of it, you know, what is the relationship between, you know, "you" in this moment and "you" in next moment? [Laughs.] We don't know what to think [laughs], you know-what to say, you know, that is right. And I-we don't know what to say is the last one here. "Say something!" "No." [Laughs.] We say, if you say something you will get thirty slap, and if you don't you will get [laughing] thirty slap.[7] That is, you know, true understanding.

Student F: When we listen to your lectures, should we-I find it very hard to listen to the balance to my thinking mind and my hara mind-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student F: -and if I just, maybe, count my breathing during lecture, I don't hear anything [laughter]. If I-if I use my thinking mind, I find in my eyes [?] a lot, I start-I have some question-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student F: -and then I start following that, I lose-I lose your lecture again. So should we listen to a lecture-to your lecture with-

Suzuki-roshi: With thinking mind, yeah. This is, you know, the training of our thinking mind. And if you give lecture like this, it will be good training. Following the thinking mind and giving freedom to thinking mind-that is how you give-how you make teisho.[8] Teisho means, you know-does not mean to give you some idea, you know, but to give good suggestion to the reality. That is-tei is "to take up something," or to, you know-"This is it!" is teisho.

Student G: Roshi, if everything is always changing-

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student G: -would that not mean, in effect, that nothing ever changed?

Suzuki-roshi: Affect?

Student G: Well, would not that-if everything is always changing-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student G: -then nothing is changing. Then there is no change, if everything is always changing-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student G: -the change would in effect cancel the change, making nothing change, wouldn't it? Everything is always changing-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student G: -then nothing is changing-

Suzuki-roshi: Nothing change.

Student G: -because everything is changing-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, nothing change.

Student G: -nothing changes.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That's right understanding. So this is just game of the word. Everything changes. [Laughs.] It mean nothing changes [laughs, laughter]. You know, everything change, you know, so, you know, nothing change. But if you-because you see, you know, just one part of it, you know, it changes. But if everything changes, you know, one before big thing is-is not changing. Something is always there, but it is changing. [Laughs, laughter.]

But as Prajñāparamita-sutra it said, "Doesn't," you know, "increase, doesn't decrease. It doesn't be tainted, or it doesn't be-it will not be pure, or it will not be impure." And this is, you know, actually-there are two ways of listening to the lecture. One is to listen to it as a exercise of your thinking mind, and the other is, you know, to know-to know our practice precisely, you know. How much we, you know, we have-how much freedom we have from thinking mind.

So if you are disturbed by my lecture, you know, there is something that is-it means you still stick to some idea, you know, some way of thinking. So how you-I answer to the question is to, you know, to find out what kind of thinking mind he has, and explain his, you know, own thinking mind, and let him realize his thinking mind is not always right so he will give up his own thinking mind-his way of thinking mind which he always stick to.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Sara Hunsaker and Bill Redican (4/10/01). One previous lecture that Suzuki-roshi may have been referring to at the beginning of this lecture is SR-69-07-03. A note included in the original reel backup tape for this lecture stated that SR-69-07-09 was recorded July 5, which would place it closer to the July 3 lecture.

[1] That is, "earth is in our flesh or body." Sources of Japanese characters: Andrew H. Nelson, The Modern Reader's Japanese-English Character Dictionary, 2nd edition, pp. 738 (niku), 264 (do), and 740 (hara). See also character No. 3800.0 for hara.

[2] Moxibustion.

[3] Acupuncture.

[4] The tale of Enyadatta. See SR-69-07-03.

[5] Phonetic guess only. Possibly "Shukke" or "Shukke-kudoku."

[6] Nishida Kitaro (1870-1945): an important 20th-century Japanese philosopher. In Zen no kenkyu (A Study of Good, 1911), he discussed his theory of "pure experience." In Hataraku mono kara miru mono e (From the Acting to the Seeing, 1927), he discussed the meeting of Western and Eastern thought. He also wrote about the Buddhist concept of emptiness from a Western standpoint. Suzuki-roshi entered Komazawa University, Tokyo, in 1926, at a time when Nishida Kitaro was probably widely discussed.

[7] Quoting Deshan Xuanjian (Te-Shan Hsuan-chien, Tokusan Senkan): 782-865. "Thirty blows if yes, thirty blows if no."

[8] A lecture by a Zen master conveying some aspect of the essence of Zen.

6 - Eulogy for Trudy Dixon

Friday, July 11, 1969

Eulogy for Trudy Dixon
Given During Her Funeral Ceremony

Soko-ji, San Francisco

Go, my disciple Sesshin Baiho [?].[1]

You have completed your practice for this life and acquired genuine warm heart and pure and undefiled buddha-mind, and joined our sangha. All that you have done in this life and in the past life became meaningful in the light of the buddha-mind, which was found so clearly within yourself, as your own.

Because of your complete practice, your mind has transcended far beyond your physical sickness, and it has been taking full care of your sickness like a nurse.

Dogen-zenji, the founder of our sect, says buddha-mind differentiates itself into the three minds: the joyful mind, the kind mind, and the magnanimous mind.

The joyful mind, he says, is the joyful frame of mind. A mind of joyful mind-a man of joyful mind is contented with his lot. Even in adversity, he will see bright light. He finds the Buddha's place in different circumstances, easy and difficult. He feels pleasure even in painful condition, and rejoices. For us-for all who have this joy of buddha-mind, the world of birth and death is the world of nirvana.

The compassionate mind is the affectionate mind of parents. Parents always think of the growth of their children and welfare of their children, to the neglect of their own circumstances. Our scriptures say the buddha-mind is the mind of the great compassionate.

The magnanimous mind is the mind which is as big as mountain and as deep as ocean. A mind of magnanimous mind-a man of magnanimous mind is impartial. He walks middle way. He is never attached to any side of extreme or aspect of things. The magnanimous mind work justly and impartially.

Now, you have acquired the buddha-mind and become-and became really a disciple of the Buddha. At this point, however, how I express my true heart: [Suzuki-roshi makes a GREAT ASCENDING SOUND].

At Tassajara, outside of your cabin, at first you made your trip with the moon and stars, and then followed ever-flowing stream of Tassajara.

July eleventh, nineteen sixty-nine.[2]

-----

FOOTNOTE FROM WIND BELL, 1970, IX (1), p. 3:

On July 1st [1969] Trudy made the difficult trip to Zen Mountain Center with her brother Jack who had come from Wyoming to see her. She wanted him to see Tassajara and to meet Suzuki Roshi. At night, she slept outside of her cabin in the moonlight. On the night of the 3rd, she shared a cup of water from Tassajara Creek with Roshi and her brother, and the next day was driven back to a hospital in San Francisco. She returned to Tassajara and zazen two days later and, on the 8th, she again left for the hospital where, early the next morning, she died.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican 9/6/00.

[1] The second name was hard to understand. It may have been something like "-daiosho." Two Buddhist names were given to her at her lay ordination in 1967: Baiho Sesshin ("Fragrant Plum, Pure Mind").

[2] Date was spoken aloud by Suzuki-roshi.

7 - Shikantaza

Tuesday, July 15, 1969

Shikantaza
San Francisco

Again, I have nothing in my mind [laughs, laughter]. I think I want you to hit my head, you know, like this, and try what kind of sound I make-my head make-makes. Would you hit my, you know, head like this? If possible, you know, hit my head with long, long talk, maybe one hour long. It will be a great help. Do you have some long, long stick to hit my bell? If you have some long stick-longer the better. Do you have some question? Long, long question [laughter]. No question? Some question? Hai.

Student A: [4-6 words unclear] on shikantaza?

Suzuki-roshi: Shikantaza? Oh. Practice of shikantaza or-? We say there is no such thing like shikantaza, you know, actually. But in comparison to koan practice, we-because we don't use, you know, koan, people say that is shikantaza.

Shikan means, you know, to be involved in zazen completely. That is shikan. Taza is zazen. So to-if you practice our way, even without any gaining idea, or even without any idea of enlightenment, that is shikantaza. So sometime it may be actually-koan practice may be also shikantaza. When you are completely involved in koan practice, that is actually shikantaza.

And there is-there may be various misunderstanding about shikantaza. If you think shikantaza is just to sit, you know, without making not much effort, you know: just sit, like this, is shikantaza. And we say, when, you know-sometime we say when some im- [partial word]-you have some image, you know, let it come and let it go away. That is shikantaza, we say. It looks like, you know, if you just sit with some idea in my mind, or without some idea in my-in our mind-if you just sit, you know, that is shikantaza. But that is not actually shikantaza.

Why we say, "Let the idea come in, and let it go away" means don't sit, you know, to-it means that, actually, don't sit with some purpose, you know, some purpose of to free yourself from various idea. You know, to free yourself from various idea-actually not to be bothered by various idea you will have in zazen.

That is true, but even though you are able to do it, that is not shikantaza. If you think this is shikantaza, that is not shikantaza anymore. So shikan-if I explain what is shikantaza. In this way, to sit, you know, with some idea which may come to you without, you know, being bothered by it, and just to sit is shikantaza. That is, you know-sometime that is shikantaza, but it is not always so. Do you understand [laughs] what I am trying to say? It is rather difficult, but-. So if possible, of course, if you are able to sit without any, you know, image or thinking mind, that is, of course, better, you know. But if I say, "When you practice shikantaza you will have many ideas, you know, so let the idea come in and let them go away. That is shikantaza." If I say so, it does not mean-it means that, for a beginner, that is shikantaza.

But for more advanced student or for student who sit for two, three years, you know, if he remain in that practice, you know, it is not-I don't think he is practicing shikantaza in its true sense. That was very lazy practice, you know. "Oh, this is shikantaza. I am practicing shikantaza [laughs]," you know. "Roshi said," you know, "even [though] you have various idea in your mind, that is all right. Let them come in! [Laughs.] Eventually it will go away. That is shikantaza. So I am practicing shikantaza every day!" If you understand in that way, that is not shikantaza.

So I think if you-that is why, you know, I am-I want you right now to practice counting breathing practice, instead of, you know, just to sit, because you will have very lazy idea of shikantaza. So if you try to count your breathing, you know, you will find out it is pretty difficult [laughs] to practice counting breathing practice. Even though in counting your breathing, even though you are successful in counting breathing, just to count your breathing without mistake-that is not also shikantaza.

So when you practice counting breathing practice you-of course you have to count, but at the same time you should be very careful with your posture. The-about your mudra, with straight back, and your mind should take care of every parts of-every part of your physical condition. And you have-you must have good breathing, you know. So with all of your, you know, effort-physical effort and mental effort, you should count your breathing. That is shikantaza.

For an instance, there is, you know, flower vase like this, you know. It is possible to hold it like this, you know. And it is-at the same time you can hold it like this. So if you-if I say "counting breathing practice" or "following breathing practice," it is same thing to hold the vase this part-by this, by the handle, or by the mouth, you know. Anyway, you should hold all the vase, you know [laughs]. If you take hold of this part, it doesn't [make] much difference, you know, whether you take hold of this part or this part. Anyway, you take hold of whole vase. So shikantaza points out-means to take hold of whole being, or all of your mind and body, which include all the world, you know. That is shikantaza.

If koan practice [is] to take hold of this part, you know-people say this is koan practice. But for us, this is shikantaza,because in perfect koan practice he is taking hold of whole vase. And counting breathing practice may be to take hold of this vase by your-by the mouth of the vase. Do you understand [laughs]? No?

So most teacher may say shikantaza is not so easy, you know. It-it is not possible to continue it more than one hour, because it is intense practice to take hold of all our mind and body by the practice which include everything. So in shikantaza, our mind should pervade every parts of our physical being. That is not so easy. Did you understand? If you actually practice zazen you will understand it, you know. As I always say, to count your breathing like this is not zazen [laughs], you know. Just to count our breathing is not counting breathing practice, actually. With, you know, with your whole body and mind, you should count your breathing.

You know, for an instance, we say when you put your hand together or when you sit, you should feel as if you have one egg or two eggs under your arm like this [gestures], you know. Don't crush it, don't drop it [laughs]. That is how you put your arm, you know, in right position. It means that-just, you know, try[ing] not to drop it is not, you know, practice. But that-it means that in that way, you know, your arm should join our practice. Do you understand? In that way, your arm should join our practice. If you are like this [gestures], you are holding eggs under your arm, you know. If you are like this [gestures], you are not holding eggs. So your mind should be free from the idea of holding eggs or not holding eggs [laughs], you know. And join-let our arm join our practice. If you are doing like this [gestures], you know, your arm is not joining your practice, you know. Maybe all of your body is joining the practice of your holding-eggs practice [laughs, laughter], instead of, you know, joining-instead of arm joining in your practice. Do you understand?

So in that way you should understand what is shikantaza. Did I explain? Does it make some sense? Your eyes, you know, is not watching anything, you know. Even though there is flower like this in front of you [puts vase down on table with a thump], in your practice, your eyes are not watching it. Even though our focus is around here, like this [gestures]. Now I am watching, you know, you like this, but now I am not watching you [laughs, laughter]. My focus is right there. You may see the difference, you know. You may see the difference in my eyes when I am watching something and when I am not watching anything. The-my eye focus is right there. Do you understand? [Laughs.]

So, you know, if I say: "Shikantaza is to do-or like this is shikantaza," is same thing I say: "To watch you is shikantaza,"you know. But it is not so, actually. Even though people who do not have this kind of experience-maybe look-looks like same, you know. But if you carefully, you know, see my eyes you will find out the difference. Did you understand?

You know, "One is everything," we say. We have a kind of stock term: "One is everything, and everything is one." This is, you know-you can explain intellectually, "One is everything and everything is one." Because everything is changing, moment after moment, one is not always one. It may-it will change into something else in next moment. So actually, one is everything, and everything is also one.

So if you-so we say if you pick up a part of a net, you know, you will have whole-all the net, you know. It-it means that our-it does not mean some intellectual explanation of the relationship [of] one and many, but it points out actual practice. When I am not watching anything, you know, with this kind of eyes, you know, if someone moves I will immediately catch you [laughs]. If you don't, I-I don't see anyone. If someone move, you know, I-I will feel something, you know. That kind of eyes, you know, covers everything [laughs]. When you don't see anything, you see clearly everything [laughs, laughter]. If you are watching something, you know, you lose the rest of the things, you know. Hai.

Student B: Is that just ordinary-

Suzuki-roshi: Ordinary practice?

Student B: -practice?

Suzuki-roshi: When-usual practice?

Student B: Non-seeing-just ordinary natural mind.

Suzuki-roshi: Natural-yeah.

Student B: Not seeing anything, but covering-still seeing everything.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student B: Is-that is the natural order of-of mind?

Suzuki-roshi: Natural. Yeah. "Natural order of mind." [1] But as I said, you know, when you are counting something, you know, like in office work, you know, you should be concentrated [starts tapping] on one thing [stops tapping], on what you are doing. That practice is more, you know, the practice of-at Tassajara I explained various ways of understanding of things, and various kinds of practice. Form is emptiness and emptiness is form. And form is form. "Form is form" means-oh-"emptiness is emptiness" means to-to use this kind of eyes, you know. This is [laughs] "emptiness is emptiness." Complete emptiness.

And to be concentrated on something like this, you know, without any idea of anything, this is "form is form." But underlying spirit is the same, but way of expressing the feeling of zazen is different. So even though you are strictly, you know, watching something like this, still you have freedom from this. But for usual people, you know, who don't-who do not have any experience of practice, to watch something like this is-immediately he will [be] caught by the flower, you know. So there-still there is difference, but-but even though he is detached from this flower, he will not make any mistake in describing things. His mind will be very articu- [partial word]-articular [articulate]. But he has, at the same time, freedom from it.

So we, you know, when we-this is, you know-eventually, even though we practice zazen, we will come back to the starting point. Form is form, you know. But when you come back from-to the original stage, it looks like you come back to the original state, going around making trip all the way to heaven [laughs], and come back to earth again. But actually this is not the same level, so maybe as Hegelian [?] explains, you know, we are making this kind of trip-like this, you know. It looks like we came to the same point, but level is not the same. But this is, I think, just intellectual explanation of reality. Some other question? Hai.

Student C: What do you mean when you say that we will vanish-or you will vanish?

Suzuki-roshi: Vanish?

Student C: Vanish. Disappear.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Disappear. The idea you have should disappear, I mean. If you-when you say, "Here is flower," you know, but there is no such flower. [It] substantially exists, you know, in some particular way because it is always changing. In other word, it is always vanishing.

Student C: So you've vanished when you've stopped clinging-you're just [1-2 words] without clinging to the self?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. But this kind of-if you really unders- [partial word]-try to un- [partial word]-if you really unders- [partial word]-try to understand what does it mean-everything-by "everything vanishes," you should know the only way is to practice zazen. If you want to bring that idea into practice, you know, the only way is to practice zazen.

So there-there [are] two ways: to have intellectual understanding of it, you know, it should be-everything should be like that, and everything is going in that way, you know. That is-intellectually we can understand that. But real understanding-not understanding, but I don't know-if you accept that truth, actually you must practice zazen. That is the only way to have direct experience of the teachings or philosophy of Buddhism. Some other questions? Hai.

Student D: Could you talk about guilt?

Suzuki-roshi: Guilt?

Student D: When I'm listening to you-when I'm not listening to you, I-when my mind wanders off, I feel bad about it. And then my mind wanders off to my feeling bad about it, and then I think I shouldn't feel bad about it, and the "shouldn't" itself makes me feel guilty. I know what I am supposed to think, but I can't think that way.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] Yeah. You cannot think that way. That is, you know, when you feel bad, you know, about it, it is already, you know, you-you are out of practice, you know. You are not practicing true way, you know. You are just thinking about it.

Sometime you are making some excuse, you know [laughs]. You know, to feel bad about it, you know, means at the same time [laughs] you-you are finding some good excuse, you know. The same-same activity-no, no-different activity based on same, you know, impulse. You don't want to be bad [laughs], so you feel bad. So, you know, in that way you cannot solve-you cannot find out your own way just by finding out some reason why you did it or some teaching to justify your-what you have done. You are far away from the prac- [partial word]-real practice.

So anyway what you have done will create some effect, you know. That-it is inevitable, you know, for some acts to create some result. So it is not matter of bad or good, you know [laughs]. Anyway, you will have the result of it. So, you know, Buddha is very fair to everyone. You cannot escape from what you have done. So it is more than to say you did something bad [laughs], you know.

If you, you know, accept-if you understand your life in that way, there is no more-no idea of good or bad already. You may feel very bad about it, you know, but it doesn't make much difference. You may feel-sometime you will find out some excuse for it, but it doesn't make any difference [laughs]. Do you understand? That much is very true, I think.

If so, what you should do is-will be the next question. So naturally you will be very, very careful what you will do. Not because people say-people may say something-people may be critical with you or not because we have various precepts. If you make that kind of effort, you know, people will have very good feeling ab- [partial word]-with you, I think. And you may feel very good when you accept the truth of cause and effect completely. If you are ready to accept the result of what you have done, that is the only way to be free from what you have done-to go beyond the idea of good and bad. Hai.

Student E: It seems to me that in every one of us there is an animal that lives inside of us, and there is a human being, and there is a buddha. And they all need different food. How do you go about feeding the different parts of you? Zazen is maybe good food for the buddha, you know, but for the animal, he wants some meat!

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] He-he wants meat! But he is not so greedy as human being [laughter]. A human being wants to eat meat and some [of] buddha's food. That is human being, you know. So that is not just human being-Buddha's teaching is not for just human being. Because even though they do-the animal doesn't live [?], they are not so greedy, you know-but they are not so greedy as human being. So we have some special food, you know, because of the human nature. So I don't know which is better, you know, human being or [laughs] animal.

I don't know which is better.

But anyway, everyone has food provided by Buddha, you know. And some special being like human being has some more feed, you know- food to reduce human being like animal, maybe, in some way. So my understanding may be opposite to your understanding, you know. I think human being is worst animal, maybe. That is why we need Buddha's mercy badly [laughs]. Hai.

Student F: Could you speak to us of bowing and taking refuge?

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student F: Could you speak to us of bowing-

Suzuki-roshi: Bowing?

Student F: -bowing-and taking refuge?

Suzuki-roshi: B- [partial word]-taking refuge. "Taking refuge" is not, you know, good translation. Taking refuge is to, you know, to protect yourself in Buddha's home, maybe like that. But it-it is so, but if you know how to protect yourself, that translation may work, but "to take refuge in Buddha" looks like to escape from this world and to go to Buddha, you know. But it is not actually so. To be one with Buddha is "to take refuge in Buddha." Or to-to be Buddha, you know, is to "take refuge in Buddha." There is no special home for Buddha, you know, or for us. The home is always within ourselves. So it is not to go to Buddha, but to find out buddha-nature within ourselves is "to take refuge in Buddha."

To bow to Buddha is same thing, you know. To bow to the buddha on the altar is not actual meaning of "to bow to Buddha." To find ourselves as a disciple of Buddha is to bow to Buddha. So Buddha is rather behind you, you know [laughs], not in front of you, you know. "I am your children," you know. "May I help you? [Laughs.] If you-if you have something to do, I will do it" you know. That feeling is, you know, to bow to Buddha-to find ourselves as a disciple of Buddha.

So even though Buddha passed away so many years ago, we are Buddha and we are disciple of Buddha. We should not lose his way. And, you know, so we have to behave. And we should know what he will, you know, tell us, you know, when he is with us right now. With this kind of attitude we should bow to Buddha, you know, as if you help your-your mother or father, you know, as if you serve something to your parents. That is how you bow to Buddha. Bow is just, you know, one of the many ways of expressing our sincerity to him, as if he is alive and he is with us. Do you understand? That is how-why we bow to Buddha.

Student G: It's said that-I think the Buddha said that, "The greatest gift we can give is the dharma." If that's so, how do we give that gift?

Suzuki-roshi: Dharma.

Student G: That that is the greatest gift-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student G: -the dharma.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student G: I don't understand what that means, "to give the dharma."

Suzuki-roshi: "To give the dharma." There is, you know, various-that is very complicated. If I want to clarify, you know, your question, it is necessary to give you long, long lecture, you know. What is dharma? What is buddha? What is sangha, you know? What is the-what is the scripture, you know? What is a building? Or what is equipment to offer something to Buddha, you know? What is priest? Or who is Buddha, you know? There is [laughs]-we have to study, you know, this kind of philosophy, maybe.

Student G: Would you say how to give a gift unselfishly, then?

Suzuki-roshi: How to give gifts is, you know-in short, maybe to practice zazen is-will be the greatest gift you can give to anyone, in short. You know, we practice zazen because just to read scripture, just to understand scripture, and just to give some virtue of, you know-virtuous meaning of scripture to other people is not, you know, good enough. It is not best way.

So we practice zazen because that practice is complete, you know. By our practice, we can experience or we can actually accept the dharma in its true sense. And in that way, we can transmit our dharma to others in its complete sense. Why that is so is-need pretty long explanation about what is dharma, and historically what kind of idea we have had, you know, about dharma. And we could not [be] satisfied with the explanation of the dharma, you know. Or we couldn't [be] satisfied with the written teaching, you know, or dead teaching. We wanted some, you know, some actual, you know, dharma rather than, you know, dead dharma written in scriptures or understood by philosophical mind. I think you must have some idea of, you know, why we practice zazen and why practice of zazen is so important, you know. Hai.

Student H [Reb Anderson]: Does a Zen master suffer in a different way than his students suffer?

Suzuki-roshi: Same way [laughs, laughter]-like to others. If he is different, you know, I don't think he is good enough, you know. "Form is form" [laughs]. We-we must make that kind of effort. After you understood what is, you know, zazen, and what is practice, what is dharma, what is sangha, and various interpretation of our teaching. So we must try to forget all about that kind of, you know, confusion. And we should be able to just do something as people may do. It is also-it is very important practice. After you understood what is Buddhism. Hai.

Student I: Suffering, then, has something to do with this "form is form"?

Suzuki-roshi: Suffering? Yeah.

Student I: -has to do with this "form is form"?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, we-we have to, you know-some people try to help people in the stage of "emptiness is emptiness," you know, like this [probably gestures], you know, without watching any particular ... [Gap in tape of unknown (probably short) duration.] ... in the form of "form is form" rather than "emptiness is emptiness." [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

[The great poet Basho[2]][3] expressed this kind of feeling through his poem. He is always, you know, crying with people. He is always full of tears in-in his eyes. That is, you know, stage of "form is form." He was a completely good friend of children and poor people. And sometime, you know, once in a while very learned scholar, or he-he was a very-he himself was very learned scholar, but his practice is always in the form of "form is form," rather than "emptiness is emptiness."

Student I: Can you give some examples of this particular [3-4 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Example?

Student I: Yeah, of the practice of "form is form," or the practice of "emptiness is emptiness"? A master's approach to this-

Suzuki-roshi: To be completely the friend of people is "form is form" practice. And "emptiness is emptiness" is to help people in, you know-to give big encouragement to people or to force some people, you know, to attain enlightenment. If you attain enlightenment, you will not suffer so much, you know, with big slap [laughs]. That is more Rinzai way, you know. Soto way is not to say: "This is zazen," or "You should attain enlightenment." We do not say so. We will be completely with-the friend of ordinal [ordinary] people. We take form of various, you know-if you see a woman is suffering, he will be a woman, you know. If he see-like Bodhisattva, you know, Avalokiteshvara. That is more practice of "form is form."

Student J: I-I thought you had said that you cannot really help people in that way.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student J: Yet that's the Soto way.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student J: I don't understand that.

Suzuki-roshi: You know, if you try to, you know, follow Soto way without [laughs], you know, without having this kind of true experience of zazen, you know, even though you give, you know, people something special, that will not help. Unless you have real quality-after you get going through those, you know, practice of "form is emptiness," and "emptiness is form," and "emptiness is emptiness"-and then "form is form," then you can help people. But [laughs] even though, you know, "form is emptiness," you know, but if you don't-if you do not have real experience of actually "form is emptiness," you know, then you cannot help people, even though you have a lot of money to help. That is what I say. Hai.

Student K: What does the word mean, "I vow to save all sentient beings"?

Suzuki-roshi: "I vow to save all sentient being." And "Sentient beings are numberless," you know. "I vow to save them." So it means we will continue our practice forever, in short, because there is no other way, you know. It is not matter of "I will help," or "I will not help," you know. There is no choice, you know. The only way is continue to help others. That's all-all what we can do. And that way is the only way which continue forever. Do you understand? To help sentient beings is to continue our practice through zazen practice as I explained, you know. That is, you know, "to help sentient being"- "to save sentient beings."

Student L: Can a doctor or a psychiatrist help sentient beings?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Sometime you may need him, you know. But he will not save you, you know, in its complete sense. We cannot, you know, help people in its complete sense, actually. But [laughs] we are, you know-we will continue, you know, incessantly to help people, even though our way is not complete. There is-there is some slight difference.

We should know that there is no complete remedy [laughs] for sickness. No complete remedy. If you know that, you can discuss with psychiatrist, you know. He may help-help you, but if you think he will help you completely, it means that you are ex- [partial word]-you are, you know, you are a big burden for-for him, you know. Okay? Hai.

Student M: Is enlightenment a complete remedy?

Suzuki-roshi: No.

Student M: Why not?

Suzuki-roshi: Why not. [Laughs, laughter.] Do you think-I said, you know, there is no complete remedy [laughs, laughter]. To think there is some complete remedy is delusion, you know. Cannot be so. Even Buddha cannot help, you know, in its ordinal [ordinary] sense-in its dualistic sense. "He will help us," you know. We are enlightened being without being helped. When this-maybe you can say in this way, too: Even-because we are not perfect, we are Buddha. You may say so. If you are-if you think you are perfect, you know, that is delusion. Perfect one is not-cannot be someone, you know, some special person who has almighty power, you know. That kind of, you know-that is just idea of something. Idea of God. The idea of God but not real God. So toilet paper may be God, you know, in this sense. So, you know, toilet paper, or flower, or everything is God if you understand toilet paper with some idea, you know. But in reality God is God because he is beyond our conceptual world. Hai.

Student N: In one of the sutras, it says the-for a bodhisattva practicing the paramitas, that he should dedicate the merit involved to complete enlightenment. And I am having a hard time understanding what merit is-I mean, what you should do with it. On the one side it seems if you do good works, good works will be returned. But you shouldn't have selfish ideas about things returning-returning back. And the other side is what you said about accepting-what you said earlier about accepting-be willing to accept the consequences or effects of our actions. Is that-is that some kind of definition you have [1-2 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: So merit, you know-I don't know what do you mean by merit, you know [laughs, laughter].

Student N: That's what I thought.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah. Maybe so. Bo- [partial word]-as Bodhidharma said, "No merit," you know. "No merit is merit." [Laughs.] So we have to get through the idea of "no merit" before we discuss what is "merit." "No merit" means to believe in the strict rules of cause and effect. Even Buddha must suffer his karma, you know. If-as long as he is historical Buddha, you know, he must suffer his own karma. But because we couldn't satisfy the idea of Buddha as historical Buddha, we started to have deeper idea of Buddha, you know. Like Sambhogakaya Buddha or Dharmakaya Buddha.

So, you know, scripture tells us-if you read, you know, scripture without having any idea of zazen practice, you know, it looks like, you know, some myth or, you know, maybe bodhisattva is someone who has miraculous power, you know. But actually it is not so. Those sutra is based on, you know, deep understanding of our practice. That is why, without any contradiction, they can describe Buddha's miraculous power. It looks like very mystic, you know-a kind of myth. But we cannot criticize it, you know, because it is based on very profound philosophy and very deep experience of Zen practice. You cannot criticize it. That is, you know, why Mahayana sutra is-oh, that is why Lotus Sutra is called "King of the-All the Sutra." Okay? Hai.

Student O: When you say "disease," I think it is an understanding of "no disease."

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student O: By that I mean, I don't think there is a perfect remedy because I don't think there is anything wrong that needs a remedy. If I have what I call a "disease," and I go to meditate and [am] absorbed by pure practice, and I get up and I have no disease, is that a delusion?

Suzuki-roshi: Disease is, you know-if you pick up, you know, some painful, you know, part of your body, you know, thinking that "here is disease," you know, that is disease in its usual sense, you know: if you have headache here, and I have disease here. But why your head is painful is not just because of your disorder of your head-brain, you know. And it means that disorder of your whole body. And our organic system, our body, you know, try to control-try to have more, you know, smooth, harmonious, you know, living activity. So that is why we have pain here, you know. But that is not because this part is in disorder. But maybe your tummy is not so good, you know. Maybe you didn't sleep well, you know. So even though you cut off, you know-you have operation [laughs] on your head, I don't think it will help completely, unless you, you know-you should find out in what way your natural, you know, organic activity is going.

When you realize this point-actually we-even though you have, you know-to have pain is not disease, you know. Still you are in right order. To pain-if you are not painful, you know, when you should be painful, that is disorder. So even though you have operation here, you know, you think for a while it is the remedy. But actually your cause of, you know, trouble is still remain as before. So I don't think-"disease," we say, but it is not so simple, you know, like mechanics, you know.

So to some extent we, I think-when you are-we are ill, we should pa-[partial word]-we should be patient, you know, patient enough to-to, you know, suffer. After you suffer pretty long time, you know, you will understand your physical condition better, and you will find out perfect remedy for it. So in this sense, I think no one is completely healthy. Everyone is sick, you know-sick people. If you say "disease," you know-if we say-you say, "You are sick person," all of us are sick people, I think.

So the point is to find out-to understand your physical condition is very important, rather than to be caught by idea of disease. For an instance, you know, the stomach is very-is very closely related to your head, you know-brain. So when your mind become calm, your tummy will be healthy without having operation on your tummy. When you think you have disease here [patting self], I think you are actually creating disease here [pointing]. It will make your tummy weak, you know, by concept of disease.

But if you understand yourself better, and if you know how to control your mind, it will be a great help to your physical condition. For an instance, you know, most people, when you are young-when they are young, they have weak stomach, you know. When they become fifty or sixty [laughs]-I don't know why-they will not suffer [from] their stomach so much. For an instance, I was very weak, you know. My tummy was very weak. And doctor told me to have operation on my tummy to cut off [laughs] a part of it. And my friend, you know, who live in-near my temple had also bad stomach, you know, and he had operation. And he told me: "You should go and have operation. I-He [the doctor] cut off half of-one-third of my tummy, and I feel very good," he said.

So I thought if it is possible for him to cut off one-third of his tummy, you know, [laughs], I thought tummy is not so subtle thing. Even though a doctor cut off, you know, one-third of the tummy, it doesn't matter for the tummy operation. If it is so strong, may be better not to be-better not to have operation [laughter]. It doesn't make much difference, I thought. It means that, you know, our tummy is so strong.

So I didn't have operation, and the doctor I-saw me whenever I was weak, you know. [He] was amazed, you know, why I, you know, why I am so-why I have so-why I could survive, you know, without having operation. I don't know why, but soon after that we started building our-mending our temple,[4] and I became so busy that I forgot all about my tummy problem [laughs]. And now, my tummy is not so strong, but I have no problem, you know, with my tummy. And-but I-I have problem of cough, you know [laughs, laughter].

So I, you know, I always tell them to tell people even though your tummy is so strong, you cannot give your tummy to other people after you-you don't want-when you don't need it, you know. In other word, after you die, you cannot give your tummy to other person. So if your tummy is strong enough, you know, to give you some nourishment, you know, until you die, it may be all right. So, you know, the natural-some natural order is more important than to have some strong, you know, to strong-to have some strong remedy for it. Leave it like that, you know. Let it survive as long as possible. So if our body is always in, you know, some harmony, I think it is good enough.

One more question? One more question, please. Hai.

Student P: When we try to practice hard in the city, where we have a lot of freedom, it seems that sometimes we can become caught by our own way and become too narrow and hurt ourselves too much by trying to practice hard in our own way. What should we do?

Suzuki-roshi: In city, you know, our way looks like very narrow, you know, narrow approach. But actually it is not so. It is basic, you know. Our practice is directed to the basic problem we have, you know, always. So you cannot compare our practice to some other ways of life, you know. It is necessary for you for some time, maybe, to be caught by narrow idea of practice, which is not actually narrow. But if you are concentrated on some-on our practice, eventually you will find out that is not narrow-that was not narrow practice. But before you find out true meaning of our practice, you may think this is narrow practice. So even though you think you are caught by narrow idea of practice, I think you should continue it without some conviction-with some conviction, excuse me [laughs]. Without any doubt, you know.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Carmel Crane and Bill Redican (2/2/01).

[1] A line from an early version of the meal chant used at Zan Center.

[2] Matsuo Basho (Matsuo Munefusa) (1644-1694): The renowned haiku poet of Japan.

[3] The phrase in brackets is from the original transcript (not on tape).

[4] Starting in March 1958, Suzuki-roshi directed the rebuilding of the main structure of Rinso-in temple in Japan. This may be the year he is referring to. And the "tummy" problem may have been a gallbladder disorder. (Suzuki-roshi had it removed in 1971.)

8 - Trip to the Moon

Sunday, July 20, 1969

Trip to the Moon

If you go to some library you will see many books. And those-in those books, we will find out our achievement, our human knowledge, which is almost impossible to study out. And now we are going to arrive to the moon.[1] And [laughs] actually I don't know anything about, you know, how they reach to the moon and what kind of feeling they may have when they arrive at the moon. To me it is not so interesting a thing.

When I reflect on myself, especially when I feel, on this occasion, I have to speak about the moon trip [laughs, laughter], I have no time to study about those things. So if I try to speak about it, it is nothing but to tell you how foolish I am, you know. That is what I can do, you know. If I talk about the moon trip you may think, "Ah, he is so ignorant about [laughs, laughter] the moon trip." And I think I may see many people today or tomorrow to speak about the moon trip as if he knows everything about it [laughs]. When I hear them speak about the moon trip, you know, how I feel is-maybe because I don't know or he has-he is interested, actually really interested in the moon trip, you know. And because I know that, I may not respect him so much.

The first-even the first one who may arrive at the moon-I don't think, you know, if he is very much proud of his achievement. How I feel is I cannot think he is a great hero. I don't know how you feel, but I don't feel he is a great hero. But on television, you know, he may be, you know, for some time, a great hero. At least he will be treated like a great hero.

And why we treat him a great hero is, you know, quite different reason, you know. He may be very proud of his experience, but reason why he is treated by the people as a hero is quite different. If we think in this way, we immediately know how important it is to practice zazen.

Instead of seek for objective world, in its usual sense, we, you know, try to make our life or make our every moment of life, deeper and deeper. That is purpose of zazen. Someone said-I-I remember what someone say-as someone said-one of your student-our students said: "The more we see many things changes, the more we find out the similarity in it." Nothing changes, you know. Even though things looks like changes, but actually we do not find anything new. I think that is very true.

Nowadays-when I came to America, you know, first feeling I had is-I-before I came to America I thought America may be the quite different country from Japan [laughs]. But when I came to San Francisco, I was amazed because San Francisco was not-there was not much difference, you know, in Tokyo and San Francisco. I think if you make your trip all over the United States, still, you know, you will-I don't think you will find out something different. You will not be interested in the way of life in different states.

And I remember one experience when Marian [Derby], you know, show me-showed me a small stone. I like the stone very much. And she picked up the small-not stone-sand, actually. And she gave it to me. She gave it to me. "This-those are very interesting stones [laughs]," she said. But that was just, you know, a pick of sand. And she asked me to see it through a glass, you know, small glass like this, which-which you use to see jewels or something. And those small stones are not-nearly-nearly the same as interesting stones I have in office, you know, although the stone is-stone I have in my office is big [laughs]. That is the-difference is just the size of the stone. But I found much more interesting stones in the sand. And I think even though you go to the moon, the moon-the rocks they will bring to us [laughs] may be the same, I think.

If you say, "This is the rock from, you know, the moon," you will be very much, you know, interested in it because it is-it was [laughs] on the moon. But actually I don't think there is a great difference between the rocks we have on the earth.

Maybe in ancient time, long, long, long time ago, the earth and-the moon may be the piece of the earth. I don't know. I think, even though you go to the Mars [laughs], you will find out the same rocks. I am quite sure about it [laughs, laughter].

If you find out something very interesting, you know-if you want to find out something quite interesting, only way is-instead of hopping around the universe, you know, like this-to enjoy our life in every minute, you know, and to-to see-to observe things which we have now. The surrounding-or to live in the surrounding, in its true sense.

Yesterday I went to see an island where there were many kinds of animals: birds and fish and maybe shells, which owned by-which is owned by Natural Conservancy group. It was very, very interesting place, this place. If you live in that, you know, area and really start to see things-see the plants and animals in that area, you will-I think you will stay whole life. It is so interesting place. But we human beings, you know [laughs], what we do is hopping around or driving around the states, you know, by highway, losing [laughs] many interesting things. And that kind of trip will be extended to the moon and to the Mars [laughs, laughter]. It is rather foolish, you know. If you stay that place, you know, you will enjoy your life completely. Ev- [partial word: even?]-that is more, I think, human life, you know.

We are now-I, I don't think we are even human, you know, now. We are just, you know-I don't know what it is [laughs]. Dogen-zenji said when he received the purple, you know, robe from the emperor-although he refused it second time-but the emperor said, "You must receive it." So he at last received it. But he didn't wear it. And he wrote to the-wrote back to the emperor saying, "If I wear this, the birds and monkeys in this mountain will laugh at me [laughs, laughter]." That was what he said to the emperor. "I am very appreciate," you know, "your purple robe, but I am afraid I don't wear it. If I wear it," you know, "birds and monkeys will [laughs], in this mountain, will laugh at me."

I think there we find-find spirit of zazen, you know-way of life we should follow as a human being. In other word, we should not be fooled by things, you know-fooled by some i- [partial word: idea?]-some particular idea.

Now we are practicing counting-breathing, you know, practice-in comparison to use-using various machine or computer, you know, to count your breathing [laughs]. It is very silly [laughs] to count your breathing from one to ten, making, you know, mistake-"Oh! [Laughing.] Six or seven?"

If you use computer, you know, you will not make any mistake [laughing]. But is very silly to count your breathing just because of this is traditional way of practice. Why it is so-it looks so silly is the, you know, underlying spirit, or thought, or understanding of our life is quite-is the same, you know. If we count our breathing in practice-in our practice-in its-in ordinal [ordinary] sense, as you count the distance from earth to the moon, you know, our practice doesn't mean anything. But it-our-when we count our breathing, you know, in each number we find limitlessly deep meaning of life.

Not only we count our breathing by our whole mind and body, we count each number with the power of whole universe. That is, you know, counting-breathing practice. So when you ex- [partial word: experience?]-when you have-when you experience really the counting-breathing practice, the gratitude you have in your practice is more than to arrive at the moon, you know. [Laughs.] You will not be so interested in, you know, something great, in its usual sense, or something limitlessly small, in its usual sense.

Of course, you may-you may be very much interested in to have some new experience like a small-like a baby. But like a baby, you know, you will-you-you are comp- [partial word]-your basic attitude towards things will be the same as-same-always same.

Babies finds many things, you know. And he is-she is very much interested in things, always. But if you watch her, she is always, you know-she has always same joy. She will not [be] fooled by things, you know. She is always aware of it. And she al- [partial word: always?]-she will be always enjoying her life.

But we, you know, adult has too many ideas-many preconceived ideas because we are not completely free from objective world. Or we are not one with objective world. So sometime we [are] interested in something, but some other time we will not be interested in so mu- [partial word: much?]-things so much.

Yesterday, you know, I experienced-I could see myself quite clearly when I went to the island where there is-there were many birds, you know. Young people are very much excited [laughs], but I was not so much, you know. That is just because I am old [laughs].

Even though we see things, you know-same things, the way-the life we have is quite different. Even though I didn't enjoy so much, but I was not discouraged [laughs], you know. I know why I am-I was not so much interested in it, you know. One of the reason is because I am old, you know. But that is not just one reason. There-there must be many and many reasons. So I was not discouraged. And I think I had some other joy which is different from young people may have.

So, you know, if you observe things and everything is changing, you know, that is not what I meant when I say everything is changing. Everything is changing-when I say everything is changing, I don't-I don't see the similarity in change. I feel always difference in change, instead of similarity. So to say: "The more we see the changes the more we find out the similarity of things"-it may be so, but what we mean or what we find out in the things which changes is to find out complete change, you know, in everything. In other word, to enjoy our life moment after moment [taps stick on table after each of previous three words] in its true sense.

The life we have cannot be the same. The life I had yesterday is-cannot be the same as my life today. And we-we will enjoy completely new life in each moment. Before you become Buddhist, you know or-most of us become Buddhist because we find out evanescence of life, and we seek for the life which is more stable or which is more meaningful.

So things changes, you know. For usual person [it] is very much discouraging, you know. You cannot rely on anything. You cannot have anything. And you will see which you don't want to see. You will meet someone whom you don't like. If you want to do something, you know, you will find out it is impossible to do something.

In this way you will be discouraged by the, you know, the w- [partial word]-by the things-by the way things go-is going-are going. That is why most people, you know, become Buddhist or seek for religion. It means that actually you are trying to, you know, change-you are trying to change the foundation of your life-or understanding of your life.

Before you have-when you haven't right effort to enjoy-right understanding or right effort to enjoy your life, you know, things-that things changes will be the reason why you suffer in this world or when you are-why you are discouraged by the change-by the evanescence of life. But after-when you change the understanding of life or way of life, then the evanescence of life is the reason why you enjoy your life.

So the point is, you know, to change your understanding of life. And the point of practice is to practice our practice with right understanding of it. To arrive at the moon may the great-the historical event, but if we don't change the understanding of life, it doesn't make much, you know, meaning. It doesn't make much sense. What we should do right now is to have deeper understanding of life-to make effort with right understanding of life.

You may say "Rinzai way or Soto way" [laughs], you know, "Hinayana practice and Mahayana practice." Whether it is Rinzai or Soto, you know, if you practice it as you drive your car or as you hopping around whole universe, you know [laughs], it doesn't-it is same thing, you know-Rinzai or-there is no Rinzai or Soto. Mostly people, you know, who say Rinzai or Soto are the people who want to practice zazen as they drive their car-as they choose their car: Chevrolet or Ford [laughs] or-you know-I, you know-that is their understanding of zazen. A train or, you know, airplane.

If you understand-if you have right understanding in your practice, you know, that doesn't make much difference, you know. Train or airplane or ship or-doesn't make much difference. You can enjoy, you know, trip-your trip anyway.

If you go to Japan by boat, it may take ten days. But you will-and by airplane, maybe ten hours. But if the point is to enjoy your trip, you know, it doesn't, you know, make much difference. Time is not the point because you don't-even though you make a trip by airplane, you cannot live a thousand years [laughs]-same thing. You only live, you know, maybe one hundred years at most. So it-it-it is the different way of enjoying your life. It is. And you cannot repeat your life, you know. So you cannot compare your life to someone-some other's life. You have your own life.

So the only way is to enjoy our own life. So even though you are practicing zazen, you know, counting breathing like a snail [laughs], you can enjoy your life, you know, maybe much better than to make a trip to the moon.

That is, you know, how-why we practice zazen. And we should-whatever-what kind of life you may have is not important. The most important thing is to be able to enjoy your life, without fooling by things.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Katharine Shields (6/27/00) and Bill Redican (7/27/00).

[1] Apollo 11 was launched July 16, 1969, at 9:32 am EDT. It landed on the moon on the day of this lecture, July 20, at 4:17 pm EDT. Neil Armstrong walked on the moon later that same day at 10:56 pm EDT.

9 - Blue Cliff Record #43

Saturday, July 26, 1969

Blue Cliff Record #43

Tassajara

A monk asked Tozan-Zen Master Tozan[1]-can you hear me?-

"It is so hot," you know. "How is it possible to go somewhere where it is not hot?"[2]

Tozan asked to the monk: "Why don't you go," you know, "somewhere it is not so hot?"

And Tozan said-Tozan asked him-told him, "Why don't you go somewhere it is not so hot?"

"But wherever I go, when it is hot, it is hot," he said-the monk said.

Tozan answered the question and said: "When it is hot, you should kill the hot; when it is cold, you should kill the cold."

To kill cold or hot-it-I don't know how you understand it. Maybe for beginner it is pretty hard to sit when your legs are painful. I think it is more difficult for the-for someone to sit with painful legs in hot weather. But how you, you know, practice zazen in such a difficulty-with such difficulty, is something you should understand.

Whenever I had some pain in my legs I used to think about this koan, and I try-try not to move, even though my legs are painful. When it is hot, I-when I went to tangaryo-entered tangaryo-it was summertime. [3] So it is very hard for me to sit, although I practiced zazen before I go to Eihei-ji monastery. But still it was pretty hard to sit all day long in crossed-legged position. When it is very painful and when I felt very hot, you know, the big cryptomeria[4] tree started to swing [laughs]. That is-it is not the big tree that started to swing. My mind started to swing this way [probably gestures]. All the big trees started-started to move like this. And I found out that I didn't-I couldn't allowed to see my watch in tangaryo, but I-I thought in every-in ten-every ten minutes, you know, peak of the pain comes [laughs], you know, like this. And-and the cryptomeria trees start to move like this.

When the pain come to the peak of the-peak, it, you know, start to calm down. Every-maybe every ten minutes, you know, like wave it comes and goes. But pain in your legs doesn't hurt you, so it is all right, you know, even though you feel painful. This kind of practice is necessary. And if you try to sit, you know, you must have the strong confidence that you do not stand up or move. Even though what kind of difficulty you may have, you should try your best.

To kill the pain or cold or hot, means to become one with, you know, pain. You should-you should forget, you know, about your legs, you know. You should become one with pain, not your body's pain, but pain. And it is not "you" who feel the pain, because you are one with the pain. That which exist is the-just pain. Nothing exist but the pain. You have no legs or no body. No body. Or no feeling. Then it means that you, when we say to kill the pain, it means that you become one with the pain.

At first, you know, it is pretty difficult to wear many clothes in hot weather, when it is hot. But, you know, even though you take off all of your, you know, clothing, it is still hot [laughs]. So as long as you are trying to, you know, take off, you know, your dress one by one, you may be still hot. So if you fix-when you fix your mind not to take off your dress even though it is hot, then there is some possibility for you to stay in hot weather. But most people, you know, when you feel hot, you start to take off your suits. But that is not way. Most people, you know, seek for some shady place, you know-start to seek for some-try to go [to] some cooler place.

That is all right, but if you [are] determine to sit, you should not try to find out some easy way. The only way is to sit where you are, and to find out the complete absolute composure where you sit. That is how we sit, and that is so-called-it shikantaza.

So Soto priest translate-may translate "to kill cold or hot": "When it is hot, you should be hot buddha. When it is-excuse me-hot you should be hot buddha. When it is cold, you should be cold buddha." Literally it says: "When it is hot, you should kill." Kansatsu jari [5] means: jari means, you know, a priest or monk. "You should kill the monk by cold or by hot." But the actual meaning is "to be cold buddha or to be hot buddha." So it may be better to translate it in this way: "When it is cold, you should become cold buddha or cold priest or cold monk. When it is hot, you should be hot priest or hot monk." That is the stage we should attain, you know. "When it is cold you should be cold buddha."

When you are trying to seek for some attainment, it is the stage "form is emptiness." But after you attain-you start the practice of "form is emptiness," you know, you should find out that everything should-is buddha. Buddha is everything. So that is "emptiness is form."

And "emptiness is emptiness" means to get rid of the attainment you attained. And when you bec- [partial word]-are quite free from attainment, that stage is "form is form." Where there is no-when it is hot, you should be hot buddha, you know. That is "form is form"-the stage of "form is form." As long as you, you know, stick to your attainment, your attainment does not work. So when you are free from your attainment, your attainment will start to work.

So if you say, "I attain this kind of stage," you know, as long as you say,

"I attain this kind of stage," you are not ordinal [ordinary] person. So you cannot communicate with ordinal [ordinary] person. You may be- you may be something different person from ordinal [ordinary] one, but that is not our stage to attain. When you become completely ordinal [ordinary] person, after your attainment, you are said to be perfect-you are said to have perfect attainment.

Maybe this is the characteristic of Zen. We do not stay [in] some certain stage. For us there is no stage to stay [in]. When it is cold, we are cold buddha [laughs]. When it is hot, we are hot buddha. We may say: "Oh, it is hot!" [Laughs.] But we do not [say] any complaint.

"Oh, it is hot. Oh, it is cold." To say so is all right, but if-if you don't try to escape from [it], it is all right. That is the stage [in which] you can help people in its complete sense. Sometime, you know, if you have-if you are respected, or when people respect you, you know, because of your attainment, you will find out some-you will find out some way to help them. That is true. But that is not perfect. When you completely forget about your attainment, and you become completely good friend of others, I think you can help people in its true sense.

The people may not, you know, even [be] aware of being helped by such person, but actually they are helped by him in its true sense. It is-maybe, you know, for an instance, if I try to help people as a priest like this wearing okesa and robe, you know, sometime it is easy, but I cannot help all of them. You may say: "Oh, you are priest," you know [laughs], "so that is why you-you can say so. But I-I have various," you know, "commitment. I have my family. I cannot give up my business. So you cannot be good example of layman." You may say so. It is same thing if you are rich: It is rather difficult to help people. "Oh, you are so rich, so that is why you have no problem. But I have no money. [Laughs, laughter.] I have-that is why I have so many difficulties." So it is rather hard for a rich man to help others.

Without money, if you are happy, you know, then you will be a good example of people. The people may try to, you know, try to be like you if you have nothing to give him-give them, or if you have no particular status. I think this is, you know, best way to help people. I think so, you know, because I belong to Soto school [laughs]. But at the same time, it is not so easy. That is why I am wearing robe like this, always. I feel, you know, I feel always protection, you know, by my robe. I know that is not so good, but [laughter] as Soto priest I should be like Ryokan,[6] you know, who-who is-who was almost a beggar. And yet he-he was a-a famous, you know, poet and scholar. But after, you know, he died, we found out he was so great. But when-I think, when he was alive, no one, you know, knew that he was such a great person.

Wherever he is in his trip, lonely trip, he, you know, he-always, in his mind, there was Dogen-zenji. And he left many poem about his adoration to Dogen. I think I-as long as you stick to some position, we are not really, in its true sense, we are not Dogen's descendents. So even though we wear those robes, you know, we should forget about those robes. Although we observe strictly, you know, the way of wearing those things-how-there is strict manner to wear those robes-even though we are observing strictly our way, at the same time, we should be completely detached from the rituals and robes. Do you understand? Maybe, you know, if we are-if I am very strict with the manner or rituals, usually you think, "He is very rigid," you may say-you may say so. But actually it is not so. This is, you know, something which is difficult for you to understand. That is why we have so many, you know-we repeat:

Form is emptiness.

Emptiness is form.

Form is form.

And:

Emptiness is emptiness.

Even though you study those four lines or statements as a whole life study, you will find-you will have something more to study. Most of you, in [at] your age, I think, that you attained is-will be the stage-may be "emptiness is form." Most of you may be "form is emptiness." When you, you know, see some, you know-when you at- [partial word]-you have some attainment or some understanding [of] what is emptiness, you feel as if you attained something pretty well-not completely but pretty well. And you feel you are something different from usual person. "Oh, they don't understand what I attained. But I know what it is, you know. I am something different from ordinal [ordinary] person." You will be-most people will stay forever in this stage. And you will be very proud of your attainment. And you will behave quite different way from usual people. But that is, you know, the second stage or-first stage or second stage. And there are many things to study after you attain that kind of attainment.

Why you st- [partial word]-why you stay without ma- [partial word]-without making any progress at the first stage or second stage is mostly because you don't know the real practice-what is real practice, and because you do not have real teacher.

Dogen-zenji says: "Most people," you know, "thinks real teacher is someone who has a great knowledge, or someone who has a mysterious power, or someone who is different from ordinal [ordinary] people. But you should-even," you know, "children of seven years old may be your teacher," he said,[7] if you, you know, after you attain first stage or second stage.

So great scholar or great Zen master can be a good-will give you-will give us a great encouragement. But as long as you accept him because of his knowledge, because of his power of practice, then he is not it [?]-he is not, you know, for you right teacher.

It is, you know-whether he is good teacher or not is not only because of his ability, but because of real understanding of practice, or because you have true understanding of our way. When you, you know-when you know what is our practice and what is our ultimate attainment, you will start to respect [a teacher], you know, even [if] he is-is a child, you know. You will start to respect him. So it is not matter of "he is great" or "he is ordinal [ordinary]," in that case, if you know what is our practice.

If you don't know, you know, what is real practice, you should have some teacher who knows what is real practice, even though he is not real teacher. But if he is striving for the ultimate attainment, he will be a good teacher and he will practice with you forever. Or else I don't think I can be a-I can be your teacher, you know [laughs]. I know what is right practice, but I know, at the same time, I am not, you know, perfect teacher. I know what is real practice, and I know I am not perfect. But I know how to help you and how to be a good friend of you. I think even though I am not perfect, I can be a teacher, you know, especially when a child of seven years old could be your teacher [laughs, laughter]. I am not making some excuse for me, [but] that is true, I think. That is why Dogen-zenji says: "There is no problem for us to study our lofty way. People may say 'lofty way,' but the-our gate is widely open to everyone. Everyone could be a teacher." Every one of us could be a teacher if we know what is real practice.

I have ten minutes more [laughs, laughter]. If you have question, please ask me. Do you have some question? No? Hai.

Student A: Could you explain more how we should practice our way strictly, without being attached to it?

Suzuki-roshi: Strictly. Yeah. You want strictness [laughs, laughter]. I think if you want strictness, it may be enough, you know. If you meet, you know, some strict-if you find out how strict our human life is, you know, you will be encouraged by the difficulties you have in our human life. Even though you come to-enter into the deep valley of Tassajara, you know, you cannot escape from the human life. And our human life is pretty strict. It looks like very easy, but actually it isn't.

Hard practice in monastery is not so hard, but to practice our way in the city is much difficult. So I understand, you know, why you want strictness in your practice. I understand that. But if I am very strict with you, you know, I must be dead, you know, with you [laughs]. Maybe before-before, you know-in-in-maybe in one or two months, I will be dead-trying to be very strict with you [laughs, laughter]. So let's, you know, make best effort, anyway [laughs, laughter]. Some other question? Hai.

Student B: Roshi, you spoke in one lecture about-you got to the Seventh Mind. But you didn't tell us where the Eighth Mind was. Where is the Eighth Mind? [Laughs, laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Eighth Mind-Eighth Mind is "no mind," is Eighth Mind. The Seventh Mind is, you know, "some mind." [Laughs, laughter.] "This is mind," you know. "I understand it. You are good teacher." That is Seventh Mind. Even though Seventh Mind say so, you know, you shouldn't trust him [laughs]. Do you understand [laughs, laughter]? Seventh Mind is ego-ego-centered mind, you know. "I understand it. I think he is a good teacher. I think he is not so good." So you should always ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

Student C: ... "emptiness is form" and "form is emptiness." Is that the English of yu soku mu and mu soku yu?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah-you-wu soku-yeah, you can-yeah, that is-that is correct. Mu means "not"-we say "emptiness" but actually it is not-it may not be good translation [laughs, laughter]. So whatever you say, that is a kind of sign, you know. Mu. Do you have some more question?

Student D [probably Bill Shurtleff]: Sometimes when we're sitting and pain starts to come-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student D: -we have a choice of becoming one with the pain or of escaping from it-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student D: -by unfolding our legs.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student D: And I find that when I become one with the pain or continue sitting with the pain, afterwards I feel, somehow, proud. [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Mm. Yeah.

Student D: What do you think about that? [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Afterwards-you [think], "It is good. It is [1-2 words]," you know, because you think-afterwards you think, you know. When you are practicing, you know, you don't-you will not be proud of it. You will just do it. When, you know, you become proud of it, you know, all at once your legs start to ache.

It is that kind of time when you, you know, attain kensho experience, you know, before you become proud of it, if you hear something, you know, or all of sudden, or if you receive a big slap or something, you know, all of sudden you will lose everything. Anyway, you know, the important point is to become just one with it, whether you become aware of it by outward stimulation or not, you know. When something happen to you, you know, you will-you have no time to become proud of it [laughs]. Whhht! All of a sudden, everything bounced up, and you will lose everything, so that you have no time to be proud of it. That is so-called-it kensho experience. But even enough you have that kind of experience, because of lack of outward stimulation, we cannot say you haven't that kind of practice.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Judith L. Randall and Bill Redican (12/27/00).

[1] Dongshan Liangjie (Tozan Ryokai): 807-869. Chan master in Tang China. Dharma successor of Ungan Donjo; master of Sozan Kyonin. Co-founder of Soto school of Zen.

[2] Case 43 of Hekiganroku (The Blue Cliff Record), "Tozan's 'No Cold or Heat.'" Also cited in Shobogenzo "Shunju," in a translation that is more similar to Suzuki-roshi's usage.

[3] September 17, 1930.

[4] Japanese cedar.

[5] kansatsu (Jap.): "cold is nothing but cold"; to give oneself up to cold [when it is cold]. jari (Jap.): abbreviation of ajari (acarya, San.), a senior priest or monk.

[6] Ryokan Daigu (1758?-1831): Soto monk and renowned poet.

[7] Shobogenzo "Raihai-tokuzui."

10 - Question and Answer

Monday, July 28, 1969

Question and Answer
Tassajara

[1]... mind. That is the purpose of counting. Not just count, you know.

Student A: But, like, in daily life, are we to count when we are walking, or would you just walk?

Suzuki-roshi: In daily life if you walk as a practice of Zen, you know, you, you know, you steady [steadily] walk step-by-step like you count your breathing. Hai.

Student B: Roshi, I found in the past three months at Tassajara that I've uncovered tremendous anger in myself from time to time-

Suzuki-roshi: : Uh-huh.

Student B: -with no fixed object, just great force of anger.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: Can you tell me what the root of that is and how to deal with it-that anger?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe your confidence is not strong enough. That is why you become angry. You see, you have, you know-I think most people, you know, try to solve psychological-special conditions by psychology, you know, by knowing why, you know, and by knowing how to treat it, you know, like a mother treat their children, you know. But our way is a little bit different from that. Actually, you know, for an instance, I am very impatient, you know. But sometime I sh- [partial word]-I may-I shall be most patient person. Why is it? [Laughs] Same person, you know, sometime became-become very patient, and sometime very impatient. When I think I should not be angry, I am never angry. [Laughs.]

That is possible, and that will not create any trouble-psychological trouble to you. If-if you have a kind of wisdom, you know, you do not-I-I'm not trying to control my anger, you know. But I know, you know, I shouldn't be angry, you know. My wisdom tell me, you know, you shouldn't be angry for one year or two years [laughs]. And it may be foolish to be angry. Then I don't be angry. And when you say it is difficult to control, to me it sounds like you-you want some help, you know [laughs]-help of psychology or psychiatrist or teacher. But he-they will not help you. Buddhism will not help you [laughs]. You must help yourself. Hai.

Student C: You spoke a minute ago about direct experience-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: -of truth-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student C: -through practice.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: It seems like most of us today don't believe in absolutes-in absolute truths-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: -or in absolute truth. And you said also that, like, this truth cannot be apprehended, you know, through understanding.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: It must be direct experience.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: I mean, this is a standard thing we hear that now, I think, anyway-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student C: -that there are no absolutes. Everything is, you know, must be seen in the context of the time-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: -and the place and the situation-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, yeah.

Student C: -and that sort of thing.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: And this makes me wonder whether this may be connected to what you said earlier about our seeking meaning, because if we firmly believe that there are no-you know, nothing is absolutely true or right-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: -or good-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: -then what, you know, I-then what is the meaning of-of a-of-of this? And so you-I'm just sort of thinking this out loud.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That's a good question. And that is the point. You should make effort. Usually absolute truth, you know, means something you cannot change. That is absolute truth. But we don't think there is such a thing like you say "absolute truth." When I say "absolute truth" means, you know-the meaning is quite different. Absolute truth is the truth which reveal itself on various form and color. That much, I think, everyone will understand it.

Student C: I don't understand, because all-if all I see are the changing forms and colors-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah.

Student C: -always changing and all. And-and I can't see the absolute truth that-Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, you cannot see [laughs], so still you are seeking for, you know-

Student C: To see, yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: -something you can understand.

Student C: Yeah, right, right.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, that is not the way to understand the absolute we mean. So, you know, maybe only way is to know nothing is permanent. Nothing is completely right [?] or [?] good [?]. We should know this fact completely. And you should not, you know, try to seek for something absolutely right. And you shouldn't try to depend on something. Then, you know, you-what you will do is, you know, to appreciate things you see or you have now, right now. If so, the thing you have has the absolute, you know, meaning to you whether it is beautiful or ugly doesn't matter. You don't compare one thing to the other. If you-when you compare something to some other thing you have, you must have some standard or measurement. That measurement is not completely right, you know. This is just tentative, you know, measurement to help your ego-centered purpose [laughs].

So you cannot, in its true sense, you cannot compare one thing to the other. When you ignore the meaning of-various meaning of something, you know, you can-the things will have comparative value, you know. You can exchange diamond, you know, for some big property [laughs], you know. But actually you cannot do that. When you limit the value of diamond or property to serve your purpose, you know, you can exchange it. But originally diamond is diamond, and piece of land is piece of land.

So in this way, you will find out what do we mean by absolute. So when you give up your thinking and when you, you know, without thinking you hear something-you will hear the true voice of a bird or flowing water. That is what I mean.

So we say everyone is self-supported, you know, or everyone is full-fledged, you know. Everyone is grown-up person. We don't want anything from others. Each-each one of us has his own value and meaning which you cannot ex- [partial word]-no one-which no one can take your place. That is "absolute."

Student C: Then you are using absolute or truth in a different way. Wouldn't it be better-

Suzuki-roshi: Completely different way!

Student C: -wouldn't it be better not to-not-not to use that word, then, or-or I guess it-

Suzuki-roshi: We have to use it.

Student C: Why?

Suzuki-roshi: Why?

Student C: Yeah, why-why can't we use some other-

Suzuki-roshi: Comparat- [partial word]-to destroy the-to exchange, you know, to make your relative understanding clear, you know? The absolute you use, is-to me is relative, you know. So-and you stick to the relative as absolute, you know, as if you-we stick to something real-really absolute [laughs]. So we have to use it. So actually I am giving you some completely new words. If you want to suffer forever, you don't need it [laughs]. Some other question?

Student D (Bill Shurtleff): Some ways of practice emphasize the body energies, such as the Buddhism of Tibet and yoga, and they try to awaken these energies in the body and then somehow direct them or control them toward the same end I feel that Zen does. However, Zen seems to neglect this or not to mention this.

Suzuki-roshi: Physical-physical what? Neglect what?

Bill: This-awakening the energies of the body and deliberately controlling those energies in the body toward understanding our true nature with, as a means-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Bill: -for an understanding of true [?] nature. Why is it that Zen simply doesn't mention these things? For example, Buddhism of Tibet talks about the chakras in the body, and use of breathing, and awakening the energy at the base of the spine and rising it up the spine. It seems to talk a lot about this and practice it a lot. Why is it that Zen makes no mention of this?

Suzuki-roshi: That is also more-we-it is possible-it is-you can use various way, you know, but in that direction you cannot find out complete composure, you know. The direction is wrong. The way may be help-may be helpful. But if you use those thing-those practice for, you know, another direction or opposite direction, you will not find out complete composure. Do you understand? This is nearly the same question, you know.

We-as Soto Zen we do not say to practice zazen to attain enlightenment. Even to attain enlightenment, you know, is not our way because direction is opposite. Did you understand? We are, you know, aiming at emptiness [laughs]. You are aiming at somethingness, you know. But both is necessary, of course, but when you aim at something, you should know that, you know, that is in that direction, you know. It may be helpful, if you know that, but if you attach to it, you know, if you [are] bound by it, you will have another burden on your shoulder which you didn't have.

So, you know, because almost all of us is, you know, practicing our way, facing, you know, the other direction, so we always talk about to face this way, this way, this way. But, you know, both is necessary, of course. One more question, please.

Student E: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student E: You said before that we should look at our experience absolutely and not relatively, not compare ourselves with-compare our experiences or compare ourselves with others. But to me, when I see you, I say, "Oh, Roshi. He's good." And I say, "Oh, I'm not so good." And by saying that to myself, it-it seems to stimulate my effort. It wakens my way-seeking-mind.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student E: Should we-what-what would you say about that?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Right now I explained there is two ways of understanding of reality or emptiness or enlightenment, you know. Enlightenment is sometime is goal of practice, and sometime enlightenment is not goal of practice. It is something which we have already. And in this sense, whatever you do, there is some reason, you know. Because there is some reason, we cannot say that is bad. But if the goal of practice [is] to-to attain some attainment where we have complete freedom from things, you know, for human beings there must be some way, but for animal or a baby, you know, there is no need to follow this kind of steps or way. Do you understand? There is two ways, you know, of-when-even though we say "enlightenment," but the meaning-sometime is original enlightenment. And sometime it is goal of practice for usual person who stick to something.

Student E: Should we-are-are there different paths for different people?

Suzuki-roshi: No, no. Original-for original attainment there is no teacher or no disciple. It is-

Student E: There's no goal-there is no goal of enlightenment, then.

Suzuki-roshi: Goal, you know-same-we-sometime we talk about, you know, like philosophy or, you know, like a drama, you know-talk about like Lotus Sutra, you know. We talk about enlightenment in various way. That is the description of original enlightenment which isn't-I cannot say "nothing to do," but "something to do," but not much to do with attainment for human being. Truth is truth whether, you know, we reach to the moon or not.[2] Truth is truth. But for human being, there must be some way to go, you know. We enjoy the trip [laughs, laughter]. Whether we enjoy our trip or not, moon is there. [Laughter.] So there is two ways of talking about the moon. That is what I meant.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Sara Hunsaker.
Checked by Bill Redican (2/23/01).

[1] Opening words were not recorded on tape.

[2] Apollo 11 landed on the moon just over a week before this lecture, on July 20, 1969.

1969 augustus (8)

1 - Truth and Liberation

Friday, August 01, 1969

Truth and Liberation
Tassajara

As a Buddhist, of course, the most important precept is to-to believe in Buddha and his teaching and his disciples. Buddha, you know, for us is someone who attained enlightenment-not only historical Buddha but also Buddha's disciples who attained enlightenment is buddha. And still this is its-in its narrow sense. In its wider sense, whether we attain enlightenment or not we are buddha-not only human being but also various beings, animate and inanimate. Even something like stone is buddha, in its wide sense. So everything is buddha in its wide sense.

But the religion is mostly for human being who saw-when we said "buddha" usually someone who attain liberation is buddha. It may be better to understand in this way to avoid the conflict. And "his teaching," we say, but when we say "his teaching" we do not mean something which is written in scriptures. Mostly, you know, even though you read so-called-it king of the scripture Lotus Sutra, it may be difficult to understand for you because it is written pretty, you know, in ancient times.

And we know that it is not directly told by Buddha, so this point makes us more difficult to-to have faith in that scripture. So nowadays or from ancient time, when we say dhamma,[1] dhamma is truth in its wide sense. So which is written by-written in scripture is not all the dhamma we mean. It is a part of dhamma, or it is dhamma in its narrow sense. In its wide sense, truth is the dhamma, especially in Zen, you know. We believe in no teaching [laughs]. [Coughs.] Excuse me.

Not only-it is also up to our attitude of living, you know. If we attach to some teaching or if we [are] bound by teaching, that teaching, even though it is good-if we think "This is the best teaching," then that is not Buddhist teaching any more. When we read it, we should be completely free from and appreciate the meaning of the teaching. That is how we understand dhamma. And sangha is, of course, his-Buddha's disciples and those who practice Buddha's teaching is sangha.

I think tonight I want to explain mostly what is dhamma, especially, and what is the fundamental teaching of Buddhism.

Teaching will be classified in two: pure teaching and teaching for human being, you know. For an instance, you know, science is also teaching for us, but science does not directly related to our human life. Of course it is related, but not directly. You may think science is more helpful than Buddha's [laughs] teaching, but it is not so. For an instance, Buddha said, "When you are shot-shot by a poisonous arrow," you know, "do you discuss the nature of poison?" you know, "What poison will it be? Is it acid or some other poison?" you know. No one discuss, you know, about the poison. To discuss what kind of chemical it is, you know, is science, and to pull out the arrow is [laughs] Buddha's teaching. So teaching how to pull out the poisonous arrow is another teaching. And what kind of poison it is, you know, to know what kind of poison is it is another teaching. But both scientific true pure teaching which is not-which is always true whether human being, you know, studied or not is a truth-maybe teaching Number 1. And the teaching Number 2 [is] how to attain liberation for human being-is teaching Number 2.

I think why you become, you know, why mostly young people become interested in Buddhism is because you are tired of the teaching Number 1. And the teaching you study, you know, as a Number 2 teaching, is very old teaching. And especially the teaching Number 2 [is] based on the value over life, like which do we like: money or spiritual attainment, you know. Which is more important person who has, who is learned in sense of science, or who is-who attain liberation in spiritual world? This is a kind of value, you know.

The way you evaluate things is basic standard of the teaching of-teaching Number 2. Nowadays, you know, your way of, your standard of life, your understanding of life change. It's changing little by little. So the old-you are not interested in, you know, old standard of life, which is mostly based on comparative value. For maybe ten or twelve years or more, young people in Japan [have been] interested in Communism because, you know, the standards-viewpoint or standards of evaluating things is different.

So people started to [be] interested in it, but when you-when we study more and more, we found out that this kind of standard is not-not much different from our standard which we have being pride [proud?] in our human life. And Buddhist way of evaluation things-evaluating things is quite different from usual viewpoint. But I'm not-this evening, I'm not talking about this kind of thing because it is-it is necessary to discuss, maybe, discuss our life from various viewpoint, including politics [laughs], you know, and social science.

Tonight I want to explain Buddha's teaching as a Number 1-as a philosophy or as a more scientific viewpoint. As you know, the fundamental teaching of Buddhism is everything changes. This is the teaching, the fundamental teaching, which is always true and, which is true wherever you go. Even [if] you go to heaven, this is true. Even though you go to hell [laughs], this is true. Wherever you go, there is nothing which does not change. We say Buddha is a teacher of all the teacher, or teacher of three world.[2] It means that his teaching is always true, you know, wherever you go. It is true in past and present and future. Even though you go to the moon, everything changes [laughs]. Even though you go to Mars, everything changes. So wherever we go, his teaching is true-always true.

Why this teaching is so important is because actually we do not accept this teaching completely. So for us, it is necessary to know-to make this teaching sure. And it is necessary to-to accept this teaching. So when you want to accept this teaching, it is-it is necessary for you, you know, to have teaching Number 2. When you just talk about Buddha's teaching, like me, you know [laughs], whether you accept it or not, or whether I complete-completely accept it or not, just to talk about like scientist or philosopher. This is teaching Number 1. But most religion, you know, put more emphasis on the teaching Number 2, teaching for just human being.

Of course, we Buddhists put emphasis on the teaching Number 1. But we Buddhist, for a long time, studied our teaching as a teaching Number 1, from historical viewpoint, or from scientific viewpoint, or from philosophical viewpoint. Not only special teachings for human being, but also teaching for every being. So when we say "sentient being," it include everything, not only human being, a dog, or a cat, or a worm-everyone-everything is-every animate being-not only animate being [but also] inanimate being is included. So accordingly Buddhism is-looks like very cold teaching, but on the other hand it is more universal and more scientific teachings.

Now, the teaching "everything changes" could be extended [to] the teaching of selflessness. Selflessness, you know, in its usual sense, you know, [means] don't be selfish. It is something-it looks like some rules. But when we say, "Don't be selfish,"-[it] means you cannot be selfish, you know. Even though you try to-try to be selfish, you cannot be, you know, selfish because everything is changing, you know. Even though you try to be selfish, who is you, you know, when everything is changing?

We should not understand we exist in the same way always, in relation to others. For an instance, if I know, you know, I am always like me in this moment, if I know that, I cannot convince you, you know-I cannot be angry with you so much because tomorrow I shall be some other person. But because I think I am always like me, so I became angry with you. But that is not true. I cannot be angry with you. There is no reason for it-to be angry with you. Or I cannot try-there is no reason why I should try to convince you in some special way because, you know, I cannot be always in this way. I don't know, I-I may change my mind tomorrow. No one knows [laughs] what will happen to me. But when I am trying to convince you [of] something, it means that, you know, I-I am always like this, and what I think is right is always right. But it is not so. Actually it is not so.

Even though I think it is right at this moment, tomorrow I don't know what do I say. That is true-very true. If we know that everything is changing, you know, even though I think here is a cup like this [moves cup across table and takes a sip of water], but this cup cannot be always like this. Moment after moment, the cup is changing. But if someone break it I shall be, you know, disappointed. But if I know that this is always changing, we will-I shall not be discouraged so much because I know someday it will be broken.

And we always expect something to be always same, but that is not true too because everything is changing. So even though we expect something to be always same, or try to-or to expect something always same, is not possible. And if you expect something to be always same, it will be the cause of suffering, you know, because even though you expect something to be same, but it change. When you change some-you see something changed, you will be discouraged. So to expect something always [to be the] same is the cause of trouble for you.

So same truth-"things always changing"-in one way it is truth itself, and it is the truth-something to do with you. And we do not-Buddhists do not ignore teaching as a teaching Number 1. Even though we say, "Don't be like this," it means that the foundation of the teaching is Number 1 teaching always. This is one of the characteristic of Buddha's teaching.

So meaning-even though we say, "Don't be selfish," the meaning is quite different. The meaning is-what we mean is it is not possible for us to be selfish. And if you try to be selfish, it will be very-it will create [for] you some trouble. And you should know that. So even though no one ask you to be unselfish, you should know whether it is possible to be selfish or not. What we mean is not prophetary [?][3] teaching, but some teaching which you should know by yourself and which you should study by yourself. So our teaching is not, you know, in this sense, [that] which was told by Buddha. The-our teaching is something which you should realize by yourself.

The sangha, or Buddha's disciple, or between-relationship between Buddha and Buddha's disciple is-both is independent, you know. Disciple should not be always dependent on his teacher. We should try to study our way by ourselves. The teacher can help you, you know, in some way. But the teacher cannot help you completely because our teaching is not [that] which you can study literally. And teaching itself is-should be always changing. Today's teaching cannot be applied for tomorrow. Day after day, you should continue study our teaching according to the circumstances.

Famous Zen master Hyakujo[4] was a disciple of Nansen.[5] He said, "If we are like-if I am like my teacher Nansen-if we attain-if I attain-even though I have same power as my teacher, I shall lose half value of my teacher Nansen. So disciples should be better-better than our teacher." [6] That is what Nansen-what Hyakujo said. It means that why we have disciples is because teaching should be changing always and should be extended always. And we cannot apply same teaching all the time. That is why you study Buddhism and you study our teaching. The teaching itself-so teaching itself should be changing as everything changes. The teaching that everything changes is very important teaching for Buddhist.

Nowdays people understand-people are very much interested in [tape defective and unclear for 8-12 words] ..., but we should, you know, know the depth of teaching that everything changes. And we should try to understand this teaching directly. As Dogen-zenji said, "The teaching 'everything changes' is not something-some teaching which you realize after many years' practice. It is teaching you should directly know."

When we, you know, we say "to have direct experience of it." What do we mean is to appreciate things not because of something is useful or not, not because of something is favorable for us or not. Usually, you know-at Eihei-ji there is bridge named Hanshaku-kyo.[7] Hanshaku-kyo means Half-Dipper Bridge, because Dogen-zenji, after using, you know, water from the dipper-half of the water from the dipper, and he returned it to the river always. Half-Dipper Bridge. Usually, you know, if there is-at Eihei-ji there is-it is a valley like Tassajara, and the stream is full of pure water. And there will be no need to, you know, return it to the river after he used half of it. But he always return it to the river.

Usually, you know, water is valuable because when-only when it is not so much, you don't use so much water as we do in sip. But at Eihei-ji monastery we cannot use-we cannot wash our face by-with-with bucketful water. We-we always use 70% of the water.[8] Usually, you know, we evaluate things because [depending on] whether it is-whether we have a lot of it or not. If we haven't so much, the water become valuable. And our economy-economic principle based on, you know, our labor and the things we have. And if, you know, something is-if we don't have some particular things ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... this is, you know-whether you think some other principle and evaluate things or not is the point.

Things are valuable because-usually because the things are, you know, produced by labor. But labor is-of course, we should count labor, but more important thing is the place we stand up with earth,[9] you know. So labor or something which-something which we have plenty of it or not, is not count so much if we know how we exist in this moment like. This is very elaborate intellectual explanation.

But what I want to say is when you sit, you know, you should not think whether this practice is necessary or not [laughs]. Anyway, what I mean [is] you should sit. That is what I wanted to say, in short. [Laughs, laughter.] I go round and round. This is direct experience, you know, to accept yourself as you are. If you always look around like a hungry dog, you know, you will not gain anything. When you are ready to be there, you know, and to accept things which is given to you, then you will be-you will find out everything valuable. This point is missing, you know, in our life.

What we are always trying to is always finding some measurement, and we are trying to measure ourselves or measure our life. And if you don't feel good, you try to change your measurement. That is what we are doing. Now, you know, most of our young generation trying to change all measurement to new one [laughs]. But you don't try to, you know, measurement-measure things by your eyes, you know. You don't have to depend on measurement. You can measure it, you know, by your body, not because someone said this is valuable or this is not so valuable, bec- [partial word]-not because someone said this is old or this is new.

You must have-accept before you, you know-we don't have to think so much. Mostly you can depend on your intuition. But you-you want, you know, always you depend on something always. And [tape defective and unclear for 8-12 words] ... to accept things as it is and try first by your intuition.

So whether we have plenty of water or not, we should best use of it-you should have best use of it. Whether you can sit-whether you can complete your practice or not, you know, you should try first, and when you returning to do it, you can do it. When you hesitate, you cannot do it. When we are completely [free?] from everything and try to open your mind, then you find your own way. And your, you know, behavior will change, and your face will change. Everything will change-not only you, but whatever you see. Things will change. Then, sometime, you can enjoy your measure to explain [laughs], you know, various way. But you shouldn't depend on measurement.

This is pretty difficult practice, but we will-you will see it [?]-try. This is how we accept the teaching [that] things changes. Because things changes, you should-we should be concentrated on each moment.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Sara Hunsaker. Checked by Bill Redican (3/1/01).

[1] Suzuki-roshi used the Pali pronunciation, so that spelling is used.

[2] Possibly triloka (Sanskrit), the three worlds or spheres that make up samsara.

[3] Suzuki-roshi pronounced it "pra-FEET-a-ree," and he had difficulty with the word. The transcriber's best guess is "prophetary," as in pertaining to a prophet. Another possibility is "profitary," as in pertaining to profit.

[4] Baizhang Huaihai (Hyakujo Ekai): 720-814. Dharma successor of Mazu Daoyi (Baso Doitsu), as was Nansen. Suzuki-roshi may have meant to say "Joshu" instead of "Hyakujo."

[5] Nanquan Puyuan (Nansen Fugan): 748-835. Dharma successor of Mazu Daoyi and master of Joshu Jushin (778-897).

[6] See also SR-70-06-17.

[7] Hanshaku-kyo: a bridge beyond the entrance gate of Eihei-ji. (See also "Nirvana, the Waterfall," in Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind, p. 92.)

[8] That is, the monks fill their washbasins only 70%.

[9] Possibly an allusion to Dogen's statement, "Those who fall to the earth should stand up by the earth," in Shobogenzo "Inmo." Dogen in turn was quoting the fourth Indian patriarch Upagupta in Keitoku Dentoroku (Keitoku Era Record of the Transmission of the Light), Chapter 1. (See also lectures SR-69-09-00-B, SR-69-09-00-C, and SR-71-08-21.)

2 - Change and Suffering

Saturday, August 02, 1969

Change and Suffering
Tassajara

I'm afraid I will-I am making you hotter [laughs] because I cough and my lecture is maybe pretty difficult to understand because of my English especially. Last night I was trying to-my skeleton of lecture was like this [laughs]. Can you read it?

The first teaching-the-we-we have four or three series of Buddhist teaching. The teaching-the teaching that [laughter]-the teaching that everything is changing-in Japanese, shogyo-mujo[1]-or Chinese shogyo-mujo-teaching that everything is changing. This teaching can be-could be understand in two ways: the one-the teaching as the law of the truth. This teaching is always true, you know, whether we observe it or not. The-so-if everything is changing, that means non-substantiality. There is no substantial being, you know. We are only composed being from various elements. So we are non-substantial being. (a) Non-substantiality.

(b) As a-as the presupposed teaching of the teaching of the selflessness. Teaching of selflessness is the teaching that everything changes. And teaching of selflessness, the second one, is two of the four important teachings. The four teaching are: teaching that everything changes, and teaching of selflessness, and teaching of suffering, and teaching of nirvana. Those are the four important teaching of Buddhism. So we call it "four seals of Buddhist teaching."

And this teaching is presupposed teaching for the second teaching of the selflessness, because everything is composed being. So there is nothing which is understood to be "self." That is a teaching of selflessness. Usually if we say selflessness, you may understand that that is the teaching, you know, of a few [?] human being who are very selfish, you know.

But actually, not only human being but also everything it-has no self. So-and the actual, you know, teaching for human being could be this teaching of selfless-no, everything is changing could be applied for the human life: (a) to be free from attachment. If, you know, everything is changing, then [there is] nothing which we can attach to, actually. So this is for human being the teaching of attachment-non-attachment. (b) idea of fate-free from idea of fate. And (c) to make best effort in each moment. So only way for us is to make best effort in each moment because that which actually exist is we in this moment, you know, because we will change into something else in another minute. So the only way to reach the reality is to make best effort in each moment. This is the-actually the framework-fundamental framework of Buddhist teaching.

And the second teaching is extended teaching from the teaching that everything is changing. And this is the teaching of selflessness. (a) in time span; (b) in space span. In time span, because we are changing moment after moment, so there is nothing to be called self. In space span, you know, we are interrelated to many things. We cannot be completely independent from other being. So this-in space span, it is-we should understand that everything has no self.

(a)-(b)-(c): [2] the way of change-in the way of change, nothing permanent involved. It means that, you know, in some religion, you know, something create us, you know. We do not understand in that way. Everything is changing. Then you may ask some-who make us, you know, change? But we do not have any idea of something like God, who make everything changes. So we have no idea of somethingness whatsoever. So [we are] including everything, you know [laughs]. Everything changes. There is nothing which does not change. So that is why people called Buddhist non- [partial word]-"atheist," you know. We have no idea of [a] God which is absolutely permanent and which has almighty power. We have no such idea. So here-in way of change, nothing permanent or absolute is not involved. So, in short, we do not have any idea of deity which is permanent.

This is the teaching, you know-teaching of selflessness as a true law of the truth. And when we apply this teaching to our everyday life, it is also non-attachment-teaching of non-attachment or teaching of emptiness. We studied about this for pretty long time: emptiness, emptiness, emptiness. "Emptiness is form, and form is emptiness." And then put emphasis on this emptiness. And this is what we were studying in hot weather [laughs, laughter] last night. And I was making my best effort, drinking so many-so much, oh!-so many cups of water.

I think let's take it easy [laughter] this morning [?].

The third teaching is-third teaching is actually-this is pretty hot teaching too. Teaching of suffering. Everything suffers. Even it is not so hot, we suffer. Why we suffer-and if we know why we suffer, we will find-we will have some way to-to be free from suffering. This is important, you know. Because we believe in the theory of cause and effect, you know, so if we, you know-if we can get rid of cause of suffering, actually we will have-we will be free from suffering because suffering has some cause for it. And there is, you know, complete relationship between cause and effect. We cannot change the result. If we have some certain cause, we will have-its effects accordingly. This is our belief. No one can change the law of cause and effect. If you don't, you know-if you eat too much, you will have stomachache, you know. No one can change it. And if you have bad karma in previous life or past life or in past time, you will have bad result. This is Buddhist belief. But anyway, here we should know why we suffer-the teaching of suffering. And when we know why we suffer we will know how to get rid of the cause. And how we change-we will know how to change-how we improve-how we could improve our life.

Why we suffer is, actually, you know-we-we-the reason why we suffer or cause of suffering is ignorance-ignorance. Ignorance means we do not know the true teaching that everything changes and that everything has no self. Because we do not know anything about those teaching, we suffer. Actually everything changes, but, you know, we expect things not to change.

For an instance, I am changing, you know, every day. So-but I'm not anymore young. But I feel as if [laughs] I am quite young, and I expect you to treat me as a young boy [laughs, laughter]. But, you know, I am not young at all, and next year I shall be much older, you know. But I feel as if I am always young like this or like, you know, I was 40 or 45 years old. As I expect you to treat me, you know, as a young boy, or I-as I expect me to be always young when I see my-the mirror-myself into the mirror, I shall be very discouraged. [Laughs, laughter.] That is suffering. [Loud laughter.] You don't know this kind of suffering because you are too young. But for you, there is particular suffering. That suffering is suffering because you have too much energy [laughs]. To have too much energy is also suffering.

There are many suffering, but cause of suffering is-we-we actually don't know not much about that. Jane [Schneider?] said this morning, to me, Alan Watts, you know-he is very famous, as you know-[said] ignorance means ignore-ignore-ance, to ignore. Intellectually we know everything changes. But actually we don't like things [1-2 words] change. To ignore the truth is ignorance. Maybe so. I thought he said, "ignore ants." [Laughs, laughter.] There are many ants. So I though he said to "Don't kill ants! Ignore ants!" But ignorance.

We should ignore, you know, the truth. And we-we know that we should not ignore the truth, but still, you know, we ignore-we are always trying to ignore the truth. Truth, we think, should be true without us, not with me. That is usually how I feel-how we feel. The matter of birth and death is inevitable for human being. But we know the truth of birth and death. But we think as if that truth is for someone else, not with me, you know. With me, I feel as if I live forever. Even though someone die-even though we see someone die-someone is dying, we don't feel that matter of birth and death is universal suffering for us. And someone may feel, "Oh, this is terrible," you know, when your friend die. "Oh, this is terrible," you know, for you. But someone may not feel so seriously even though your friend died. But if your direct relative die, you will feel-you will be shocked. But someone will not-even your direct relative die, you may not feel so bad. But when you feel-when you are dying, you will feel terrible. [Laughs.] That is the human way, and that is true for almost all human being.

So we count suffering-four-four suffering or eight suffering. If we count the suffering of birth and death, suffering of illness, suffering of old age. I think birth and death, so it is two, actually. So suffering of birth. Birth should be a great suffering, you know, for us, even though we do not remember. It should be a great suffering for the baby and for the mother. So suffering of birth, suffering of illness, suffering of old age, you know, suffering of old age [laughter], and suffering of death. Next suffering for me will be suffering of death. That is four.

And there is-there are some more. We count just four. But actually there are many, many suffering. The suffering of separating-separated-being separated from someone who you love. That is one. The suffering you meet who you don't love. That is actually [laughs]-actually very true. I don't know why, but if you think over and over you will find out why-who is-who should you blame [?] for. Anyway, we suffer. You know, for meeting someone you hate-you don't like, that is next one. And suffering you cannot gain which you want. This is very true too. That is, you know, if you think over it, over and over about it, you will find out why. It is because, in short, because you expect things, you know, too much. And you expect something which is not permanent to be permanent. That is another reason, maybe. In this way, you will find out many reasons why you cannot gain what you want. And the last one is we suffer because of our own vitality, or unbalance of the vitality, or difficult-difficulty to control our desires and vitality.

Those are the four-another four suffering. So we say four suffering-sufferings, or eight sufferings. So suffering of birth, suffering of illness, suffering of old age, suffering of death, and suffering of separating from-separated-being separated from someone who loved, and suffering of to meet someone who you do not love, and suffering which you not gain which you want-suffering that you cannot have what you want, and suffering of unbalance of the vitality. Those are eight sufferings.

But in short, those sufferings comes from ignorance. The fundamental suffering is caused by the idea of self. Self which-which we have subjectively and which we have objectively. We think, you know, everything is substantial, everything exist just as you see it. But actually it is not so.

Something you see is created by yourself, you know. If you do not see anything, there is nothing actually. Because you see something, there is something. So in one sense, we are creating things by our eyes or by your ears, by your five sense organs. There is nothing which is purely subjective or objective-something which ex- [partial word]-something exist is subjective being and also objective being. This is very true. You may say that is not true, but actually it is so.

You may say objective being is something which really exist, and subjective being is something which you yourself created. But actually, you know, for us something exist is very subjective-maybe 80% or 90% subjective. And it means that, at the same time, ignorance-our ignorance create, you know, or subjective ignorance-because of ignorance, we-our subjective function of five sense organs create things. We don't know why, you know, but human being creates many things-not only space ship [laughs] but always we are creating something.

I have a scroll done by famous Zen master.[3] It says, "a piece of stone in the air." It say-"piece"- "a stone in the air." Actually there is no stone in the air, you know. You may find some electric bombs, but there is no stone in the air. But we see many stones. Something subjective, you know-something which we-we create, you know, in the air. That is something which we see. This is very true even though your scientific mind will not accept it, but actually there many things-many difficulties which we create.

So I say "homemade" difficulty [laughs, laughter]: difficulties created by yourself. "This is the cookies I made. Please have it. This is very good." [Laughs.] I don't know if everyone think that is good. At least you think this is very good. Maybe so, maybe not so. I don't know. That is very true.

But you think the cookie-cookies you made is best. [Laughs.] And there is no "just cookie." Cookie-cookie is something-maybe always best cookie, whatever cookie is. The cookie is always best cookie, especially when you made-make it. [Laughs, laughter.] When someone else makes-make it, especially someone who you don't like make it, that is always bad cookies. So cookies are always "good cookies" or "bad cookies." [Laughter.] No-the cookie-no "just cookie" doesn't exist.

So "cookie" are very subjective, you know [laughs, laughter]-subjective view. Maybe 1% of it objective cookie, but most cookie are-99% of cookies [laughter] [are] objective [subjective?] cookies. I think Buddha was very wise to say it, you know: "We create things, and all the being is created by ignorance." We ignore the truth, you know. You may ask, then, "Who created that ignorance?" The phenomenology of ignorance is-which you-which was created endless-no, beginningless time. We don't know when it was created and who created. We have-we don't suppose to-suppose something who-someone who create it, you know. We have no idea of-we are not interested in who created or how created. Yes we are interested in how things are created, but we don't say who created. This is the difference between Christianity and Buddhism.

So as a Buddhist, it is all right to say, "I don't know. I don't know who created the ignorance." That is quite all right for us. If you are Christian, you-you shouldn't say so [laughs, laughter]. If you say so you are not Christian anymore. You should say, "God created it." And then you will ask why he created it. [Laughs, laughter.] There is no end.

So it may be better to say, "I don't know." [Laughs, laughter.] And I may ask you, you know, "Why do you ask such a question?" you know. That will be my question for the-for someone who ask me. This kind of discussion should be continued sometime which is not so hot-what I was talking about.

Anyway, because of ignorance everything exist. This is, you know, another translation of the teaching of selflessness. That you ask, you know, why we have ignorance means you, you know, try to figure out some substantial being must have created ignorance, you know. We Buddhists are more interested in how everything is going on like science, not who created. How everything is actually going on is the main point of Buddhist teaching.

But we do not seek for what exist besides our-besides the things we see, besides phenomenal world. In Western thought, there is idea of absolute. But actually we don't have the idea of things like you understand by absolute. For us, the word "absolute" is another interpretation of the each phenomenal being. So absolute and phenomena-phenomenal being is two side of one coin.

There is no absolute beyond our phenomenal world. This is the-also the point you should always remember. When you study Eastern thought, you should put this point always in your mind, or else you will not pass koan [laughs]. You will always fail to pass koan because you stick to the idea of absolute, absolute, absolute, absolute, and ignore the reality-ignore your human life.

We say "ignorance," you know, but ignorance-to know that we are ignorant is wisdom. To know what is ignorance is wisdom. And that you don't know what is wisdom is ignorance. If you know we are ignorance-ignorant, and we are creating things because of our ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.] ... enlightened. With this wisdom, you will have-we will reach the stage of kendo. Kendo means the first stage-the stage [in which] you have right understanding of reality or real life.

And so real life we mean is life of ignorance, you know, and life of wisdom. And wisdom and ignorance is also two side of one coin. So we say if you know the cause of suffering, which is ignorance, you know, you will know how to attain perfect understanding.

Buddha said, "Because this arise," you know-"A arise, B arise. And because A exist, B exist." Because A arise, B arise, you may say. Actually he says B extinguish, but the same thing. It is the truth of cause and effect in time span. Because, you know, I arise here, I will die some day. Because A arise, B extinguish. And because I exist, you exist at the same time. If I don't exist, you don't exist. For you, if you don't exist, I don't exist.

Actually we cannot be separated completely from you [laughs], physically and spiritually. If I say something you will understand it. So in space-time span, we are related crossing. We cannot be independent. So this teaching is called interdependency-teaching of interdependency. Vertically and horizontally we are closely related, and we are all interdependent being. That is another interpretation of how we exist and how we suffer. And actually it is the teaching of everything changes and selflessness. Nothing to be called "self" particular, you know, because we are related-completely related with each other. So in Mahayana, teaching conclude this sort-in this way: "One is all, all are one." One is all, you know. That I exist here, everything exist. That everything exist means I exist here. So I or everything else is another interpretation of one reality. So in-in reality, one is all and all is one.

So far is maybe intellectual understanding of the truth, because actually even though we understand in this way, we ignore [laughs] our understanding and stick to self, idea of self. "I-I-I," you know, we always say, "I-I-I," ignore-ignoring how everyone else will be. That is actually true. I am sorry to say so, for me and for you, but it can't be helped.

If you have this kind of wisdom, you will completely understand why we suffer and how we could get free from suffering. To know, you know, the cause of suffering is to attain the way to free from suffering, way to get of-get rid of suffering. And Buddha conclude in this way: "There is no other way to get out of suffering for us. The only to get out of suffering is to know, to have wisdom, or to know what is the cause of suffering." Before Buddha, you know, people offer sacrifice, you know, to divine being and to have-sometime to be born in some wonderful world. But, you know, there is no-to sacrifice something-the act of sacrifice something cannot result, you know, for us to be born in s-[partial word]-in some other world. If we kill some animal, the animal may suffer, you know, and we-we will suffer too. That is true. That is true course of cause and effect.

And we, you know, offer some money to Buddha and to have-to improve our health, you know [laughs]. "Buddha help me. I-I will offer a million dollar to you. [Laughs.] So please help me." But it cannot be-we cannot be helped in that way because the cause-of-course of cause and effect is wrong. So only way to get free from suffering is to know real cause of suffering and to get-to get rid of the-no, knowing what is the cause of suffering, trying not to do something which will cause suffering. That is the only way to get out of the suffering, according to Buddhist. So we have no miracle at all [laughs] because we believe in the truth of cause and effect, and we are strictly observe true course of cause and effect. And if we mix-mix up the cause-course of cause and effect, that is so-called-it "to violate the-one of the precepts," kaigon suke.

That is the teaching-teaching of suffering. I think next time, or tomorrow,[4] I must explain the teaching of Four Noble Truths.

So we-tonight we studied what is suffering, and what is cause of suffering, and we refer to the teaching of interdependency. Teaching of interdependency is arising from conditional causation. Everything arise from conditions and not being spontaneous. Or self-condition has no separate and independent nature. Nothing has no independent nature. This is, you know, the teaching of interdependency.

Oh. [Laughs, laughter.] I have no time to drink. [Laughter.] Excuse me.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Sara Hunsaker and Bill Redican (3/5/01).

[1] Shogyo-mujo-ge: A sutra verse on impermanence (e.g., in Nirvana-sutra): "All things are impermanent; they appear and disappear. When an end is put to this appearance and disappearance, then the bliss of nirvana is realized."

[2] It sounds like Suzuki-roshi is counting down a list from (a) to (c).

[3] Kishizawa Ian-zenji. [Discussed in Crooked Cucumber, p. 382.]

[4] Lecture SR-69-08-03.

3 - Selflessness

Sunday, August 03, 1969

Selflessness
Tassajara

As most of you know, this is Yoshimura Ryogen-sensei.[1] Ryogen Yoshimura-sensei. In Japanese way we say family name first, so Yoshimura Ryogen. But-Yoshimura is family name. Ryogen-sensei, or Yoshimura-sensei. He was appointed-he arrived at San Francisco as our teacher, or as our friend, March 27?

Off-mike: Yes.

March 27. And mostly he was in-he has been in San Francisco. I think he came here once? Twice?

Off-mike: Twice.

Twice. So most of you know, I think, know him. But as some of you may not know him, so I think it is better to introduce him to you. Thank you very much.

Last night I talked about the teaching of selflessness and the teaching of suffering too-not completely, but briefly about what is our suffering. May be better to explain about the selflessness more, because that is very important teaching which is directly related to the teaching of Zen.

We practice zazen so that we attain selflessness. This is very, you know, important and very subtle thing, the matter of self. We don't know where is ourself, but it is very tenacious one, as you know [laughs]. Even though you think you are pretty well, but it is not so. Why selflessness means, you know-why we say "selflessness" [is] because each one of us is not substantial being. You think you are here, but there is no such thing as "you" exist here. You are not ghost, but [laughs] at this moment, at this place, you exist here, but you don't exist here so many times. It is just, you know, just tentative being which is always changing. We know that by here [possibly pointing], you know, but it is almost impossible to get rid of this idea of self or feeling of self.

To change, you know, to have good understanding is easy, we say, but to have right-I don't know what to say-to have right feeling or to accept it completely emotionally is very hard. Even though you know it, you know, but actually you have no feeling of it. Emotionally you don't accept it.

So it is easy to get rid of idea of self intellectually, like break small lock, you know. It is not so difficult to break some small lock if you hit it [with a] big hammer, you know, it is quite easy. But it is difficult to get rid of habitual thinking, or habitual way of thinking, or habitual way of understanding, or emotional, you know, feeling of it. [It] is as difficult as to break lotus root, you know [laughs]. To break lotus root is quite easy if you right. You think I have diamond. I break-broke it in two like this. But string is, you know, still here in between, even though [laughs] you pull as much as you can, string is always follows. It is so hard, like to break a lotus root in two. I think that is very true.

Dogen-zenji was so kind to explain this point in the-one of the fascicle of Shobogenzo, "Sansuikyo"-the sutra of Mountain and Water Sutra."[2]

Mountain-what is mountain? What is water? We know-we think we know what is mountain and what is the water. Of course you know. But water for human being, [is] of course water. But for the people in hell it is blood, you know, water is blood. For fish or for dragon, who live in water, [water] is a beautiful palace [laughs]. And for human being, that is water.

He says a dragon or a fish knows-understand water is blood or palace-their own home, but they don't understand the palace for them is the water-is water for the human being. But you know-you think you know what is water. You are not like a fish, or like a dragon, or like a hungry ghost. "I know water," you know. But Dogen-zenji says you don't know [laughs] water. You are almost same as-almost ignorant as the dragon or hungry ghosts in heaven. Even though you say you know what is water, Dogen-zenji said you don't know actually what is water.

I think that is why you don't understand why he took the water-leftover water, to take it to the river and return it to the river.[3] Maybe-maybe he knows what is water, but we don't know what is water, maybe, according to him. Do you think [laughs] what is water then? He says, "You don't know [laughs] what is water. You are almost as ignorant as the fish." So he says mountain is mountain and water is water. This is point we should study or understand even in intellectual way.

I said last night-I explained last night how everything exist in this world. The teaching how things exist in this way is teaching of interdependency. [Brief exchange off-mike.] Teaching of interdependence. Actually I explained last night, but may be better to repeat it.

That something exists means that some other thing exist before-in time-span before. Because something exist before, something else exist later here. Because this exist or because that exist, this exist here. And that something exists here means, at the same time, some other thing in space-span exist, you know. That you exist-that I exist here means you exist here at the same time. And that I exist here means my father existed. Because my father existed, I exist here. In this way, we are closely related to something else. So we do not-we cannot exist just as a independent being from others. It means that, that something exist here, the rest of things exist here. And many things exist-existed in past time.

So, you know, if water, if, you know, if water is here, you know, it means that mountain exist, and fish exist, and the stone exist, tree exist, frog exist, stars exist, moon, and milky river, and everything exist. So we said that water exist, you know, you-you-you may say that. When water exist, everything is water, you know. The water is representative of the whole world. So whole world is water. Nothing can compare to the water because the water is closely related to other things. So actually water may not be water. But if we say, "This is water," the rest of things can be the same thing. May be the water too. Just for convenience sake, we name it "water," that's all. When we reach this kind of understanding, even intellectually, we said-we may be said to have understood what Dogen meant by "water."

You exist here, you know, helping you. But actually there is no borderline between you and I. For me, you are everything. you know. When I-as long as I am here, you are everything. You know, like water, for-like for water everything is just water, just for water. A husband is-for your husband, you are everything [laughs]. There is nothing but you for your husband right now. When you reach this kind of understanding, you know, you will live in this moment in its true sense. As long as you understand things in term of duality" "I am here and he is there," as if there is no relationship between you and others.

So water is not just water. The water I drink, if I drink a cup of water, the water is everything for us right now when-as long as I am drinking it. With this kind of feeling and spirit, you have to drink water, and you have to treat others. There is no separation between us.

So you say "star," star is only one being which include everything. If you say "mountain," mountain include everything. For mountain, you know, everything is just for himself. Do you understand? And if you reach this kind of experience by practice, you are said to have been practicing zazen. Do you understand?

So there is no wonder why Dogen-zenji says, "Water for you is just like water for the fish," because actually a fish doesn't know what is water. Even though you said you know what is water, but you don't know actually what it is. And you have no feeling of real water. That is something which is very little to do with you. You do not appreciate water. So there is no wonder why he had to-he couldn't help to return the leftover water to the river. Okay? [Laughs.] There's big, big difference-even-in Kegon Sutra. So how we exist in this world is very miraculous way. Even though you can reach to the moon, you cannot explain this point.

According to Kegon Sutra, you know, how we exist is-he-sutra-the sutra says, "I am Vairochana Buddha,[4] who is sitting on a big lotus in-in a big miraculous shape of lotus named Lotus Seed. And in the Lotus Seed there is a lotus-big lotus. And sitting on it. And the lotus has thousands-a thousand leaves." Do you say "leaves"?

Students: Petals.

"Petals. Thousand petals. And I incarnated into thousand buddha and sit in each petals of the," you know, "lotus. And in each-in each petal-and then in each petals there is"-how many there [laughs]? "There is hundred millions of Sumeru Mountain[5]-one millions of Sumeru Mountain, and-no, no, hundred millions of Sumeru Mountain-Mountains, and hundred millions of Four Seas, and hundred million of the world called Naiyenbudai."

So it makes-how-how much, you know, world there is. And in each world there is Bodhi tree. And under the Bodhi tree there are Bodhisattva Shakyamuni practicing zazen to attain enlightenment. And after he attain enlightenment, he will tell you the true sto- [partial word]-true law. And that is very true, you know. In this world-I don't know how many beings is in this world. Even we don't know how many stars there are in this cosmic world. I think much more than one hundred million of world or earth, and that is very true.

And in each world there is Shakyamuni Buddha, who know the truth, who know what is water, what is this Bodhi tree, what is petals of lotus. So this is just, you know, a way of expressing the truth, but actually we cannot figure out how things exist in its true sense. That is actually the teaching of selflessness or teaching of interdependency.

Only when you understand our world or-in this way we will be free from suffering. So every existence is just for you, you know. If you ignore this fact, that is, you know, ignorance [laughs]. Ignore the truth. You ignore the fact-this fact. Even though you cannot describe it, it is true.

And now I think I have to explain the Four Noble Truths: how to-how we should get out of the suffering. The Four Noble Truths are: All existence is suffering. The second, the cause of suffering-what is cause of suffering? Cause of suffering is because of our ignorance we don't, we do not know how we exist here. So cause of suffering is illusion or ignorance and desires based on ignorance. Desires-there is nothing wrong to have desires, but if the desire is based on, you know-based on ignorance, it is like a-like to, you know, drive a car when you are drunk [laughs]. You don't know where to go with the desire. It is good to have a brand new car. That is okay. But, you know, you must drive the car pretty well, you know. You shouldn't be drunk. The cause of suffering is delusion [illusion?] and desire based on ignorance.

The third one is nirvana. Nirvana-what is nirvana? Nirvana is realm of free from suffering, you know. When we understand the "things as it is," like I explained-when we understand the teaching of interdependency then we are in nirvana-in realm of nirvana.

The fourth one is the means for attainment of nirvana-how to attain nirvana. And how to attain nirvana is the practice of hasshodo, or Eightfold Noble Path. And Buddha exp- [partial word]-this[6] is the, you know, the first teaching which was told by Buddha when-after he attained enlightenment. How we suffer, why we suffer, and cause of suffering. He points out the cause of suffering. The cause of suffering is ignorance, illusion. And he pointed out if the cause of suffering is the illusion or ignorance, to be free from ignorance, or to get rid of ignorance, or to have wisdom is the way to attain enlightenment. The cause of suffering is directly related to the result of suffering-suffering which is resulted by the cause which is ignorance. So, you know, cause of suffering is here, and the end of the suffering, the result of ignorance is suffering.

So to-there is, you know, immutable truth between the cause of suffering and suffering. And this is the teaching of cause and effect. And you cannot, you know, get out of the cause-course of cause and effect.

So to-only way to be free from suffering is to transmute the ignorance to-into wisdom. That is the only way. Or to replace ignorance for the wisdom. And the relationship [between?] wisdom and ignorance is the same, you know. The-it is two side of the one coin. And suffering and the relationship between suffering and nirvana is also two side of the one paper. It is actually one, but because of our ignorance we cannot see, you know, the other side of the wood [?],[7] like we can see the water but we do not actually understand what is water, like Dogen-zenji point out-pointed out.

Now how to-the practice how to attain nirvana. The one is to have-this is, you know-what I am talking about for-in three lectures are-four lectures are not Zen-teaching of Zen, but in its wider sense it is teaching of Zen, but in its narrow sense this-those lectures are lectures about Buddhism in its wide sense. And those teaching are called teachings for shravakas,[8] or Hinayana Buddhist, or Theravada Buddhist. But it is true for every Buddhist-Buddhist.

And Four No- [partial word]-Eightfold Noble Path-Paths are: One is correct view. The second is correct thinking. The third is correct speech. Correct action. Correct livelihood. Correct endeavor. And correct memory. And correct meditation. Those are Eightfold Noble Truth-Noble Path. Here it says "correct," but there is no other word for this. So in Chinese or in Japanese we use "right": right thinking, or right speech, or right thinking, right view, right thinking, right speech, right activity, right livelihood. In this way, we say-we use "right." But this "right" is not the "right" in term of good and-right and wrong. This is more than that.

Anyway, we cannot say-we cannot explain it in one word. So "right," here, it means to have good understanding or, if possible, perfect understanding of the four teaching of: everything changes-everything-teaching of everything changes; teaching of selflessness; teaching of suffering-teaching of everything in state of suffering; and how-teaching of nirvana.

To have correct understanding of it is right understanding. As you have-as you underst- [partial word]-you-as you have understood what is water, actual, you know. When you reach this kind of understanding, that is right thinking, right view, right viewpoint. Not partial, you know, one-sided view, but correct view or right view. And right way of thinking. Just-it is not just thinking, but it is wisdom itself. And if you think accordingly, that is right thinking and right speech. Right speech does not mean to, you know, to speak-to give a speech in term of right or wrong, good or bad. Right action. The right action should not be one-sided action. We should speak impartially always. And the fourth one is right livelihood-livelihood. It want some explanation. And this is-it gives us very good suggestion what is right livelihood. Of course, this is for monks.

What is, then, wrong livelihood? To cultivate the land or to cultivate land for a monk is not right livelihood. But in China, you know-this is like a kind of precepts for Indian monks. There are the people who enter religious life after finishing their family life. And they are supposed to be supported by people-not only his family but also people in the town-in his the town.

So after they entered religious life, they are not supposed to cultivate land or cut the wood for fire. Or they should not [practice] compounding. They should not compound medicine, even. And they should not study astrology. [Laughs, laughter.] They should not speaking by proxy for another. You should not be attorney [laughs]. You should-you should not practice charms, you know, some magic. And you should not be fortune-teller. You should [laughs] tell fortune for others or [1-2 words]. You know ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... is-what will be a monk-what kind of person, you know-what kind of personality is for monk, or ideal image of monks. They should not tell something, you know-they should not pray some magical power, you know. They should not fascinate people by some, you know, by some extraordinary [extraordinary] way [laughs]. Only his own personality, only his own everyday life, he should be a monk. Do you understand? They should not take some particular-they should not take some different activity. They should be plain, common, ordinal [ordinary] people, and they should be a good friend of others. And sometime they should be even a teacher of others, without having this kind of charm. This is how the monk should be-how Buddhist should be.

If you understand the teaching of interdependency, or if you understand what is water, actually, you will easily understand what will be the right livelihood for Buddhist. Okay? You should remember this. I don't prohibit, you know, those things, but you should know the image of the Buddhist. What will be the Buddhist? In this way, Buddha had many disciples.

Do you know Mañjushri? He was a very alert fellow. How he joined Buddha's order is when he saw his-Buddha's disciple early in the morning on the street, walking, you know, straight, calmly, and gently. And he was strucked by his appearance. Just-when just he saw him, he was fascinated in its trueness [?], not because of some magic-magical power. And he decided to join Buddha's order.

In this way, you know, Buddha obtained many disciples. He did not play any magic. He did not say anything strange, special. The teaching he told for us is very usual teaching. It is very wide and big, but if you try to understand it, you know, it is bottomlessly big. But he did not tell us anything strange. This is right livelihood. I think this is very important, especially for you who want to be a pioneer of American Buddhism in its true sense. You should not depend on some, you know, power, or some wisdom, or some particular knowledge or study.

And right endeavor. This is also important, you know. [Laughs.] It is rather difficult to-to have right endeavor. In short, when people get up you should get up. When people eat, you should eat. That is right endeavor. You should not get up too early or too late.

And right memory. Memory-something-to remember something which is important for our practice. And the last one is right meditation. Before Buddha, people practice zazen, you know, in various way, with various aim. But Buddha's meditation is completely different from those meditations. I think there is no need to explain about this. Okay? I think you will dust [?] everything [laughs, laughter].

You cannot use, you know, what you have now. Even though you know many things, you should not tell-you should not use it, and just to sit is what you should do. Just to know what is meditation, what is water [laughs], why did you come here-that's all what you should know. And, in this way, if you continue your practice, you will be a good Buddhist in its true sense.

Oh! [Probably finds out the time. Laughs.] I thought it was too early to stop it.

Before, I use big towel [?]. [Laughs, laughter] I better [?] change over.

---

Source: City Center original tape. Verbatim transcript by Sara Hunsaker and Bill Redican (3/6/01).

[1] Soto monk who came from Japan to San Francisco in 1969 to help Suzuki-roshi. (See Wind Bell, 1970, Vol. IX, No. 1, p. 30.) He died at a young age after returning to Japan.

[2] See also Lecture SR-69-08-07 and SR-71-07-24.

[3] Referring to the story of Dogen respectfully returning the unused half of the water in his ladle to the river at Hanshaku-kyo, a bridge beyond the entrance gate of Eihei-ji. (See also "Nirvana, the Waterfall," in Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind, p. 92, and Lecture SR-69-08-01.)

[4] One of the five transcendent buddhas.

[5] In traditional Buddhist/Hindu cosmology, Mount Sumeru (Meru, Jap. Shumi-sen) is regarded as the center of the four continents (i.e., the world-system or universe) as well as the largest entity in that universe.

[6] The Kegon Sutra.

[7] If "wood" is correct, Suzuki-roshi may be referring to tamban-kan, carrying a board on one's shoulder in such a way that one cannot see the other side.

[8] shravaka (San.): literally, "hearer": originally, one of Shakyamuni Buddha's students or students in general.

4 - August Sesshin Lecture

Wednesday, August 06, 1969

August Sesshin Lecture
San Francisco

I think you are facing actual problem in your zazen practice. The worst one may be the pain of your legs, maybe. It is some-not secret, but it is some certain way to sit in pain. Because it is so direct that you have no time to-to think of some way, you know. Before you think it comes, and you are involved in the pain. But that is so-called-it, you know-that you are involved in the pain immediately means that your way, your way of life, or your attitude towards your life is not well-trained.

For an instance, if you-I think some of you must have this kind of experience. If you are going to fell, you know, from, for an instance, from the tree to the ground, the moment you, you know, leave the branch you lose your function of the body. But if you don't, you know, there is a pretty long time before you reach to the ground. And there may be some branch, you know. So you can catch the branch or you can do something. But because you lose function of your body, you know [laughs], before you reach to the ground, you may lose your conscious[ness].

But in zazen practice, first problem you face will be the pain. Even for Japanese people who are sitting always on the floor, this problem of pain. But how you endure the pain is, as I always say, to have-not to lose your power right here and free your legs, you know, from pain-having more strength here [possibly pointing to hara]. And this is-this kind of way-this way will be applied for various problem you have. For an instance, when you are about to be angry, you know [laughs], you shouldn't be involved in the anger immediately.[1] You have time-you must have time before you become angry. So we say count to ten before you are angry. Your anger will not come while you are counting: one, two, three, four [laughs].

My cough is, you know, same thing. You know, if I have, you know, some strength here [possibly pointing to hara], I don't cough. Even though I cough-not so bad. But when I laugh or when I am excited-in other word when I have no preparation in my tummy, you know [coughs] [laughs, laughter], I immediately cough. My doctor said: "Nothing wrong with your," you know, "throat. Maybe that is some," you know, "nervous cough." So I-I was very ashamed of [laughing] being so nervous, you know, as a Zen master [laughter]. So I decided to conquer the cough. Before I didn't matter so much, but after doctor said: "Nothing wrong with your throat. If you cough, let your wife collect ten time-ten cents each time." He said so.

So I am-I am trying, you know, to have always some power here [possibly pointing to hara], but when it comes, you know, it comes so suddenly, so I have no time to prepare for it. My cough is good, ex-[partial word]-good practice for me.

That you have some problem or difficulty in your practice is, I think, very good thing. It is much easier to practice zazen without any problem. If you have some problem, you have some excuse to work on it [laughs, laughter], instead of shikantaza. Shikantaza is actually not so easy. If you are supposed to practice shikantaza, maybe it is pretty difficult thing. It is difficult to continue it. For a while you can do it, you know. Five minutes, ten minutes-you may be able to do it, but without cessation to continue shikantaza is pretty difficult.

We say "selflessness." "Selflessness" is to say, you know, just-or to explain what is selflessness is-is not so difficult, but actually what it means is, you know, not something to explain, but something to actually practice it or attain it-the stage you must attain, although there is no such "self" you know-no such thing as self. We have no self. Originally we have no self. But we feel as if we have self. And we see as if everything has its own self-nature. But there is no such things as self-nature.

You may say water has its own nature and iron has its own nature, but that nature is conditioned by many con- [partial word: conditions?]-factors. That is why water is flowing, iron is hard. So, as Buddha said: "All constituent object are-has no self-self-nature." The nature is-universal nature takes some particular way of function and under some condition. That's all. So there is no such thing as self-nature.

But although-although there is no self-nature, there is some rules. The fundamental rules is rules-rule of causality. If there is cause there is effect. That is the immutable truth. And that is, maybe, the only-only truth we can figure out. The rest of the truth-truth is- there is no special truth. To explain in this way is not difficult, and whether-whatever you feel about it, you know, even though you say there is self-nature, but there is no self-nature. That is very true. Excuse me. Can you hear me?

So there is two-two ways of understanding about self-nature. Self-nature which exist, and no self-nature as a ultimate-ultimate truth. And no self-nature as a goal of practice, you know. For human being, unless we strive for-unless we make a great effort, it is difficult to realize the self-nature- no self-nature, even though there is no such thing as self-nature. For us, I don't know why, you know, it is necessary to practice and to attain no self-nature. It is-for us it is something to attain.

That is why we practice zazen, you know. By zazen we can realize-or realization of self-no self-nature will appear-will take place. Without zazen, even though you know that we have no self-nature, it doesn't work. That is why we practice zazen. And intellectual explanation of no self-nature is to give you some confidence in our practice, you know-to point out the possibility of attaining no self-nature. Or even though you don't attain it perfectly, you know, if you-you will find out-you will have some confidence in your practice. That is-we have teaching for-we have various explanation for zazen practice.

And you may ask, then, after-after we, you know, realize-or realization of selflessness happen to you, what-what will be your way of life, you know? If you, you know, think something, you know-after attaining non-self-nature you will have some, some wonderful, you know, feeling or some special power, that is also mistake. Nothing will happen [laughs, laughter]. If nothing happens, why you make such [laughs]-such effort, with pain? Here, you know, there is interesting story. Here is some interesting or famous koan.

Do you know the koan of Hyakujo[2]-"Wild Fox and Hyakujo"?[3] Hyakujo was a famous-famous Zen master, as you know, who established special precepts for Zen monks. Before Hyakujo, Zen monks were practicing at some other temple-some temple which belongs to mostly Precepts School. Precepts master were lead [?]. There they were practicing zazen as you have been practicing zazen at Soko-ji [laughs], because they have-they haven't their own temple. And they observed mostly Indian precepts. But Hyakujo established a monastery and they-he set up monastic rules, like Buddhist-like we have precepts-like Buddha set up precepts.

And he-one day-everyday he was giving lecture. The one old man always came and listened to the lecture. But one day he didn't leave after-after lecture. So Hyakujo asked him: "Why do you-why don't you go back to your room?" And the old man said: "I-in many hundreds of years, before you come to this temple, I was a resident priest of this temple. And I-when I was asked, 'Is it possible to be free from the truth of causality?'"

If you do something good you will have good result. If you do something bad you will have bad result. This is rules of causality in morality. And there must be various truth or theory. And-or you may say this is truth of karma.

"Is it possible to be free from karma or to be free from the truth of causality?" someone asked him. And he said: "Yes. It is possible." And that answer was not, you know, proper. "So [laughs] I reincarnated in fox, and I reincarnated [as a] fox again and again, about five hundred times, maybe," he said. "And I cannot-now I cannot be-I cannot get free from the karma because I did-I said something wrong."

And the old man asked-the fox actually, in disguise of fox asked, you know: "What will be the right answer?" And Hyakujo said: "Right answer will be, 'You will not-you cannot be free from karma.' That will be the right answer." And at that time the fox attained enlightenment. And next day he didn't-the old man didn't come to the lecture. And Hyakujo said, "We will have funeral [laughs]." And, you know, students amazed, "Who died?"

At that time, Buddhist didn't take funeral service for someone else. They take-they took funeral service for their students only or teachers only. "When no one dead," you know, "why do we have funeral?" But Hyakujo said: "Go back-go to the mountain, back of the temple." And they found dead fox in the mountain. And they had big funeral for him.

And this is the story. And since then we have-we made it as one of the many koans. To be free from karma is one. And not to ignore karma. That is, you know, next to. We have two.

But what do we mean by, "We not ignore the truth or truth of causality?" And, you know, to be free from karma, without ignoring karma, and to get free from karma, what will be the way? After you attain enlightenment, you-you-your way still, you know-you should follow the truth of karma or truth of causality.

You sh- [partial word]-you cannot ignore the truth. But you should not be caught by it. The way is just I wear such a troublesome robe [laughs]. This is karma. Because of karma I have to wear [laughs] long-sleeve-sleeved koromo like this [laughs]. And without taking off the koromo, you know, to have freedom from koromo is the way. Do you understand?

Sometime to use koromo to hide something underneath [laughs], when it is necessary. To use karma, you know, to help others, or to enjoy the karma without ignoring it. To enjoy our life-complicated life, difficult life-without ignoring it, and without being caught by it. Without suffer from it. That is actually what will happen to us after you practice zazen.

Actually you-whether you attain enlightenment or not-if you continue this practice, naturally you will have that kind of quality. It is a matter of just slight-subtle feeling like, you know, the-this-like the sound box [speaker?]. Some, you know-there is slight difference between my own voice and the voice through the-voice you hear through the-this box. But this slight difference makes big difference [laughs]. It is, you know-you think I-you say: "I practice zazen for two-three years, but I haven't make [laughs] any progress," you may say [laughs]. But actually, you know, the feeling you give by your conduct, by your words, will be quite different.

It is like to feel something, you know. This is wood; this is cloth, you know, and this is enamel, and this is a kind of lacquer [probably pointing to or picking up various objects]. Looks like same, but if you feel it, feeling is quite different. And feeling you have from it-when the feeling you have from it is different, you feel as if this is something else, you know. This is quite different from that. That kind of difference-subtle difference, but big difference in our actual life.

Physically it is very small difference, but spiritually or-feeling you have from it is quite different. And we, you know-when we talk about our practice, we-our merit of practice or value of practice, we tentatively talk about the value in term of good feeling or bad feeling. If you help others or not; or if you help others or don't help others; or give some-both someone. We say "non-discrimination," you know. Non-discrimination [laughs]-but when we try to help others, you know, we should say "good and bad" or else we cannot help others. Good feeling or bad feeling.

But originally there is no such thing good and bad. But when peoples feel something is good and some other thing is bad, we should also involved in that kind of idea of good and bad. Even though we don't actually feel as they feel, but-it-feeling is not exactly the same, but we-we must give-we must be able to express our sympathy by some words, in term of good and bad.

That is also actually two contradictory attitude. One is non-attachment. The other is attachment-looks like attachment. But not actual attachment, but it looks like discrimination. Looks like attachment, but there is slight difference.

If you do not have complete calmness of your mind, you know, you cannot tell the difference. You see everything nearly the same-exactly the same. You cannot tell the difference of the quality. One may be glass and one may be jewel, but [laughs] you-you think all jewels or all glass. So if you actually, you know, practice zazen with pain, you will know what is pain in its true sense.

If you sit in calmness of your mind in pain, you will know what is pain in its true sense, but which you didn't know in your everyday life. So when you have time, you know, to wait when you are angry, you will know what is angry, exactly. So you will not make any mistake. You are so subtle, you know, in handling your words. Even though you are angry [laughs], you have time to think.

So it is necessary for us to have complete calmness always. And we should be able to go back to the complete calmness, even though sometime you are angry or excited. You should be able to go back to the calmness of your mind. Over and over, if you train yourself in this-in this way, you will have complete freedom from the karma. So, you know, not to fall into karma, you know; not to be caught by karma; and not to ignore the karma. And the third stage will be to have complete freedom from karma. And those things should not be different, as I explained-as we wear robes. It does not mean to take off. To be free from karma does not mean to take off all my troublesome robes. "Now I am free!"-this is not the complete freedom we mean. Do you understand? This kind of stage is the stage Buddhist are aiming at. So under-under the difficult situation, without escaping from it, we should have com- [partial word] freedom from, from the circumstances- adversity or easy circumstances.

If there is, you know, no pain in your legs, it is rather difficult to make progress. But if you have some problem, I think you will make progress easier. It is true with calligraphy or with sumi painting. When you start to feel some difficulty, you know, you start to make progress. When it is easy, you know, you don't make much progress.

When you are wealthy and happy, with money and with family and with everything [laughs], you don't make any progress. After you lose-you have lost everything, you know, without money, without family, without house, with begging bowl [laughs], then you will start to make some progress. That is why we go for-go for trip-trip of takuhatsu. But nowadays, you know, we have big temple like this; once in a while we go out with begging bowls, so it doesn't-so it isn't so difficult. But real takuhatsu should be done without anything.

But after you attain complete liberation from this world, without escaping from it, you will have all the money people has [laughs]. So there is no problem [laughs]. If, you know, everyone of us-oh, no-one out of ten person have this kind of freedom, we will have no war, no social problem, we will be all happy. With this kind of understanding of practice, we, you know, practice zazen.

So we must trust people, you know, and we must trust Buddha, and you must trust yourself. And you should be completely give yourself to practice, completely involved in practice, forgetting everything: pain or various confusion.

Thank you very much.

---

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Katharine Shields (6/28/00) and Bill Redican 7/31/00.

[1] S.R. starts coughing here and continues to do so intermittently throughout the remainder of this paragraph and the next two paragraphs.

[2] Hyakujo Ekai (Baizhang Huaihai): 720-814. Chan master of the Tang period. Dharma successor of Baso Doitsu.

[3] Mumonkan (Wu-Men Kuan, Gateless Gate), Case 2.

5 - August Sesshin Lecture

Thursday, August 07, 1969

August Sesshin Lecture
San Francisco

[In][1] Buddhist scripture, you know, there is a famous story. Water is same, but-water is, for human being, is water [laughs], and for celestial being-for celestial being it is jewel. And for fish it is their home. And for people in hell or hungry ghosts it is blood or maybe fire. If they want to drink it, the water change into fire. So they cannot drink it [laughs].

Same water [laughs, laughter], you know, looks like very different. But you may-you may say, you know, our understanding of-of water is right. It-it should not be "home" or "house" or "jewel" or "blood" or "fire." It should not be so. Water should be water.

But Dogen-zenji says, you know: "Even though you say 'water is water,' it is not quite right." [Laughs.] It is not right. I think most people think water should be water, and that is right understanding of water. "It-it cannot be anything else. Water is something drink [laughs], not to live in it." Or, "It cannot be fire," you know. But he says that is not right- quite right. He doesn't say it is wrong, but he says, "Not quite right."

I think we practice zazen, you know, and this is right practice, and the attainment we will acquire is something right and perfect. But if you ask Dogen-zenji, he may say, "Not quite." [Laughs.] This point should be- this is, maybe, good koan for you to work on two more days or three more-two and a half days more.[2]

I don't know how to explain-or how to explain why, you know, the answer "Water is water" is not quite right. At least not much different if you say-if human beings say "Water is water," it is-it's not much difference from to say "Water is fire or blood or jewel." Not much difference. Don't you think so?

You know, it may be, you know, actually for angels, it may be actually jewel, you know. And he may-they may like it because it is beautiful. But we like it because it is cool-nice and cool and not tasty, but, you know, help our thirst. If so, to say "Water is jewel," there is some reason. And to say "Water is water" is also some reason. Not much difference. Buddhist has been explaining this point in various ways. For an instance, teaching of selflessness, or teaching of interdependency-those teachings, or teaching of emptiness, you know. There are many teachings which will explain- [partial word]-intellectually explain why the answer "Water is water" is not perfect.

When we say "Water is water," we understand substantially, you know, here is water. But what we-we say water is maybe H<sub>2</sub>O [laughs]. This is not actually-may not be actually water. So by-under some condition, you know, H<sub>2</sub>O became liquid. But under some condition it may be a vapor, you know. So you cannot say "This is-here is water," because water is not constant. So it is changing, and because it exists under some condition, it is something which is-which exists the rules of interdependency or rules of causality. So because of the some reason, some cause, water just tentatively became water, that's all. So we cannot say "Water is water."

Tentatively, you know, for convenience sake, you can say "Water is water." But it is not always so. We-you may understand in this way. But when Dogen-zenji says that is not complete answer, we should actually, you know, appreciate the water in its true sense. Water is something more than just water. It should not be a kind of, you know, drinking, you know-one of the drinking of many liquors.

When we drink water, water is everything to me, you know. And the whole world is water. Nothing exists besides water for me. When we drink water with this understanding and attitude, that is water, but that is, at the same time, it is more than water. So he says: "'Water is water,' that's right. But not quite."

This explains what is shikantaza. We say "just sit." "Just water" is like water. We should just sit. Or to "settle ourselves on ourselves." It means to become we ourselves, you know. We should not be anything else-something else. We should be just ourselves. And when we become just ourselves, "we" covers everything, "we" include everything. There is nothing else than-nothing else but you. That is shikantaza.

So by practice-so what we acquire is ourselves. To become ourselves, we-completely ourselves-ourselves, we practice zazen. That is shikantaza. We have everything. We are fully satisfied with ourselves. And there is nothing to gain or nothing to attain. This is maybe very verbal [laughs] interpretation of-of true practice. Anyway, this kind of gratitude or joyful mind we sh- [partial word]-must have in our practice.

I understand-I think I understand why you practice zazen. But I-I think most of-and I think most of you are trying to seek for something-something true, something real because the world is, you know, too much unrealistic, and too many, you know-too many things is told. And we hear too many things which we cannot accept or believe in. So I think you are s- [partial word]-you seek for something true and real. And you don't seek for even something beautiful. Something beautiful is not-to you, I think, is not true or real, you know. It is very-it looks like beautiful [laughs], but actually you don't think-you don't think that is really beautiful. Some-something, you know-it is just outlook of something. It is just ornament for someone who is not honest enough.

So justice doesn't mean anything, or beauty doesn't mean so much to you. Or some virtue, you know, doesn't mean so much-virtuous person. Mostly, you know, maybe-I forgot the word-hypocrist [hypocrite], you know. I think you feel in that way because so many beautiful things-so many things was told something like "true." And so many virtuous person appeared but who didn't convey you real, you know, gratitude. You couldn't trust him.

So what is real to you is big problem, I think, for you. What is real? [Laughs.] What do you-you know-you don't know. You don't have any person to trust, or any teaching to believe in to follow. I think that is most people nowadays, you know, have inner idea-in our mind, and this kind of feeling is universal feeling for many people.

That is why, I think, you came to Zen Center. Real reason is-that is the reason. But, you know, even though you came here, you know [laughs], I myself, you know, don't believe any special thing, you know [laughter]. I don't-I don't say "the water is water" or "water is jewel or blood or house or"-I don't say so, you know. But really, according to Dogen-zenji, you know, this-water is something more than that. Our-we stick to righteousness or beauty or virtue, but there is something more than that.

So I can, you know-I don't feel so bad, you know, even though you seek for something. First of all I will tell you, you know, you are-it-it is not appropriate or it is not wise to seek for something like that. I noticed that you like trip, you know, very much [laughs]. Today Alaska, next day, India [laughs, laughter] and Tibet. I don't think that is wise too, you know. You are seeking for something-blood or jewel or something like that. But because we come to the time when we cannot believe in those things, we should, you know, change our way in seeking the truth. We have to change our way of trip. Instead of going to moon [laughs], you must make some other trip. I don't mean acid trip [laughs, laughter]. We have to change our way of trip. That is, you know, [as or what] Dogen-zenji suggested. The trip he meant is something different.

Yesterday I-I talked about something about freedom. Real freedom is, you know, to feel freedom wearing robe-this kind of, you know, troublesome robe. Instead of, you know, [being] bothered by this busy life, we should wear this, you know, civilization without, you know, being bothered by it, without ignoring it, without being caught by it. So without going somewhere, without escaping it, we should-we should have composure, you know, in this busy life. You shouldn't laugh at people, you know, who are engaged in busy activity. We shouldn't laugh at them. But-or we shouldn't follow them. As Ummon[3] says: "Following wave and drive wave. Follow the wave and drive wave." It means that, you know, to follow the wave, and actually you should drive the wave.

Or Dogen-zenji says: "We should be like a boatman." A boatman is on the boat, you know, but actually a boatman is carried by boat. But actually boatman is handling [laughs] the boat. This is how we live in this world. We know how, now, if I explain in this way, you feel as if you understood how [laughs] you live in this difficult world. But actually, even though you understand how, you know, like boatman, but it does not mean you are able to do it [laughs]. To do it is very difficult. That is actually why you practice zazen.

I, you know-yesterday I said, "However painful your legs are," you know, "you shouldn't move." I, you know-maybe some people understood in that way. But I-I talked about the confidence or determination to practice zazen should be like that, but there is no need, you know, for you to do it literally [laughs]. If-if it is too painful, I think you can change your posture [laughs, laughter]. But your determination should be like that-and should be also, you know. When I say "should be" is, you know, some-that is a good example, but it is not always-it is not necessary be so always.

When I say something, you know, you understand-like a "fish" or like a, you know, "angel"-you know, you understand it literally and rigidly. "This is house, our house. This is-this is WATER," [thumps table for emphasis at each word-especially at "WATER"], forgetting all about how human being feels. So even though you live in water like a fish, you know, you should know: "This is, for human being, something to drink. So we should be very careful not to be drunk by human being, like a small fish." [Laughs.] This kind of consideration is necessary. That means to have freedom from everything.

The secret of Soto Zen is, you know, just two words: "Not always so." Oh-oh-three words [laughs, laughter] in English. In Japanese, two words. "Not always so." This is secret of the teaching. If you understand thing in that way-you don't ignore, you know. "It may be so, but it is not always so." If you understand things in that way, and without being caught by words or rules, without too much pre-conceived idea, we should actually do something, and doing something, you should apply your teaching. Then, the teaching which was told by our ancient people-ancient masters, will help.

Actually, you know, to take something rigidly is laziness, you know [laughs], because, you know, you-because you under- [partial word]-because you want to understand it before you do something difficult [laughs]. So you-you are caught by some words. But if you are, you know, brave enough to accept your surrounding without saying which is right or wrong, then, you know, a teaching which was told to you will help.

If you are caught by teaching, you will have, you know, double problem: whether you should follow this teaching or whether you should go your own way. This is, you know-this problem is created by the teachings which was told-which was told.

So practice-practice first, and apply teaching. Then, you know, teaching will help you. So to-to seek for some good teaching like Buddhism [laughs], you know, is, you know, to seek for something good anyway. Whatever it may be is the "sightseeing people" [laughs]. You-even though you don't take a trip by car, but spiritually you are making sightseeing: "Oh, beautiful teaching! [Laughs, laughter.] This may be true teaching!"

We say yusan-gansui.[4] Yusan means "to-with playful mind," you know, "to go to mountain or to go to river or ocean"-someplace where you can enjoy the view of things. Yusan-gansui. This is the danger of-danger for Zen practice. Yusan-gansui. Don't, you know-be careful so that you may not [be] involved in practice of yusan-gansui. It doesn't help at all [laughs]. It doesn't help. If you have right understanding of yourself and right understanding of practice, then yusan-gansui will help. But if you don't know the actual way of practice directly, whatever you study doesn't help at all.

Or we say: "You shouldn't be fooled by things." Fooled by things: Fooled by something beautiful. Fooled by something it looks like true [laughs]. Don't be involved in play game, you know. This is also [as, what] Dogen-zenji suggested. You should trust Buddha, trust the dharma, and trust the sangha in its true sense because that is the-those are ultimate goal you will reach anyway. You shouldn't be fooled by things.

So we should practice zazen like someone who is almost-almost dying. For him nothing, you know, to rely on, nothing to depend on. When you reach this kind of situation, you will not be fooled by anything because you don't want anything, because you are dying, you know. Money [laughs] or wife? No [laughs]. No more wife, no more children. You have-you cannot be fooled by anything. But you may still want to know who you are, without fooling-being fooled by anything. That is why we put emphasis on the feeling of evanescence of-of life, so that you may not be fooled by anything.

But most people, you know, not only always fooled by something, but fooled by himself [laughs]. Very silly, you know. Fooled by himself. When you are fooled by something else, you know, the damage will not be so big. But when you are fooled by yourself [laughs], it's fatal. No more medicine [laughs].

I think we should know whether we are fooled by ourselves or not. Here there are many students, but I think most of you are fooled by yourself [laughs]. Most of you are fooled by yourself: by your ability, by your beauty, you know, or by your ability, by your confidence, and by your outlook. It is all right, you know, to feel some resistance to this kind of way of life, but we should not-we shouldn't be lost in fight [laughs], in resistance. Do you understand? You know, if you involved in-deeply involved in resistance or fight, you will lose yourself. As you are human being, not so strong and very emotional-not much reason you have. It is-you will be easily lost. Even though you are young, you will be lost. You will lose your strength and you will lose your friend, lose your parents. You will lose everything. And you will feel lonely. And what will you do?

You lose your, you know, brightness of your eyes. You lose your confidence. [Laughs.] You are dead body. And no one will say, "Oh, I am sorry." No one say so [laughs]. Actually many people, you know, are lost, I think. Look at your face into the mirror-[see] if you are still alive or not.

If you don't change this kind of-this sightseeing practice, even though you practice zazen, it doesn't help at all. Do you understand? It doesn't help.

We have three-two and half day-oh, no-two-two days more, so let's practice hard, while we are still little bit alive.

Thank you very much.

---

Sources: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (9/28/00). Miyagawa Keishi-san kindly provided assistance with the translation of Japanese terms.

[1] The opening word(s) is/are missing on tape. The transcriber added "[In]."

[2] That is, for the remainder of the sesshin.

[3] Yunmen Wenyan (Ummon Bun'en): 864-949. Chan master of Tang China.

[4] yusan (sight-seeing); -gan (play); sui (water). Figuratively, "Go to the mountains and enjoy the sights; go to the water and play (i.e., do both sides)."

6 - Question and Answer

Tuesday, August 12, 1969

Question and Answer

[I did not][1] prepare for tonight lecture anything. So I want you to ask some questions, and I will answer for the question, as I have nothing in my mind right now. Hai.

Student A: Of the two types of meditation, the counting and the shikantaza-the counting-do you think that has more to do with ego purification?

Suzuki-roshi: The counting-if you-it looks like different from-counting-breathing practice looks like different from the shikantaza. But actually, if you, you know, practice it, [there is] not much difference. Because purpose of counting-breathing practice is not, you know, to count. No, it is quite easy to count your breathing, you know, if you try to count, just count.

Why it is difficult is-you have to-you have to have right posture, and you have to make-and all parts of your body should participate in the practice of counting breathing. And your mind should follow the counting, and your arm, and mudra, and legs, and spines, and, you know, muscles should join-participate [in] the counting-breathing practice. And it is more than concentration to-it is more than to be concentrated on your counting. Concentration usually means mental practice, you know, but counting-breathing practice is not just a mental practice but also physical practice too. Then not much difference between shikantaza and counting-breathing practice.

Shikantaza means to practice zazen with your whole body and mind-that is shikantaza. So maybe after you-you can practice counting-breathing practice pretty well, you can practice following-breathing practice-to just, you know, follow your breathing without counting. Your mind is always in-on breathing, and your physical practice is participate [in] the breathing. That is to follow the breathing. And shikantaza, you know, is more than that. You don't even try to follow your breathing. Maybe you can say more advanced practice. Hai.

Student B: What is the function of the ritual and monotonous chanting that preceded your talk?

Suzuki-roshi: The rituals, you know, also-before you, you know-before you get accustomed to it, it may be, you know-it is not so natural to you, you know, especially for you, you know. You are not familiar with this kind of practice-bowing.

So-but it is same thing with counting-breathing practice. To-to-and our way breathing may be-may be very unfamiliar with you. So unless you try, you know, pretty hard to take deeper breathing, it is-it may be difficult to have deeper breathing. And bow-bowing is also-may be difficult until you get accustomed to it. But to bow to Buddha, you know, means to attain selflessness. It means that when you get accustomed to-when you make bow thousands of time [laughs], you will lose your ego-ego. You will not much-you will not have too much ego. We understand in that way.

I don't know how you feel, but that is the reason why we practice bow. Even to put your hand together, it, you know, may be-you-when you do it for the first time, you feel funny, you know [laughs], blushing [bashful] feeling you may have. Maybe I-I cannot explain so well about it, you know. While you are doing over and over again, you will understand what it is. It is that kind of things. Through practice you will-through physical practice you will have spiritual freedom too. Okay? It may not be okay [laughs], but I cannot explain so well. Hai.

Student C: Roshi, could you say something about the difference between the mission of Jesus Christ and that of the Buddha?

Suzuki-roshi: Between what?

Student C: The missions of Jesus Christ and-the missions of Jesus Christ and the Buddha? Are they similar?

Suzuki-roshi: What did-I don't-I couldn't follow you. The last part.

Student C: I was wondering if you could compare the messages of Jesus Christ and those of the Buddha. If you could-

Suzuki-roshi: I don't know Christianity so-at all, you know, maybe. I have-I studied, you know, very [hard], you know, as a Buddhist. I was not Christian, so, you know, my understanding will be-will not be appropriate-good understanding of Christianity, because I am not-I don't believe in, you know, God or [laughs, laughter] some-so-

I have no-I have no position in-as a Christian, you know, so I'm afraid to say anything about Christianity because I don't know, you know. But I am just-as a Buddhist, I want to study our way, and I want to be very critical with Buddhism not with other religion. As we are Buddhist-if it is difficult for me to believe his teaching, I must have some doubt, and I must have some criticism, you know, about it-about Buddha's teaching.

I have some, you know, right or-I don't feel so bad if I criticize Buddhism, as I should criticize me, you know.

But I don't want to criticize other religion which I don't know so well. And if I talk about-when I want-when I start to think about Christianity, you know, as a Buddhist I have big doubt or [about] how Christian people believe in God, you know. I don't understand so well. I can imagine, or I can guess, you know, how they believe in God. So I cannot compare Christianity to Buddhism.

And, of course some Buddhist-some teacher, Buddhist teacher, who was-who was once Christian, you know, can compare Buddhism to Christianity. Like Uchiyama-roshi, who live in Kyoto, he was a-once he was Christian minister, and he converted to Buddhism. So he know-he knows both Christianity and Buddhism. I am sorry, I cannot [laughs], you know, answer.

Student C: I was thinking more of the figure of Christ than Christianity. When I said that, I was thinking more of the figure of Christ or-rather than Christianity. I don't think Christianity [4-8 words unclear].

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me, I don't want to say anything about Christianity, you know. I am completely blind [laughs, laughter].

Student D: Could you say something about the state of samadhi regarding our zazen practice?

Suzuki-roshi: Samadhi? Samadhi is-mostly it is-it is understood [as] deep concentration, you know, of especially mind-that is samadhi. And-but Zen is not just samadhi. Zen is not a kind of state-state of mind. It is more than that. If we-if I try to explain about it, I have to tell you the history of Zen, starting from, you know, pre-Buddhistic practice, and Hinayana practice, and Mahayana practice, and Zen practice.

The background of the practice-or understanding of practice is different, not the same. The other day I explained about sightseeing [laughs] zazen. There is many kinds of samadhi, you know. If you practice zazen to, you know, attain various-to practice various samadhi, that is a kind of sightseeing practice, you know.

The purpose of practice for us is to find the deep meaning in our everyday life, and in various being, to have complete-not-I cannot say "complete," but because I have no other word for that, I must say complete understanding of things. Not in term of comparison or dualistic sense. In another words, to live on each moment accepting things as it is. That is zazen practice. And to go beyond the comparative value of things.

This point may be interesting point for people who cannot accept the old standard of appreciating or evaluating things. You know, wealth or fame, you know, is not so important thing for us, you know, when most people put great value-find great value in money or their happiness in its worldly sense.

Those, you know, standard of evaluating things belongs to comparative, you know, evaluation, we-which we do not think it is-it is-we rather, you know, put more emphasis on thing itself. And we do not try to evaluate things in its relative sense. Do you-what is your question?

Student E: Does the con- [partial word]-does-what is meant by truth in Zen?

Suzuki-roshi: Truth? Truth for us-truth in its usual sense may be opposite of false or untruth. But [the] truth we mean is beyond right or wrong is for us truth or absolute. This is maybe-I don't know-but this is for almost all the-all people. This idea is very difficult to accept: truth which is not good or bad, not right or wrong. The truth is something which is beyond right or wrong.

So, you know, Buddhist does-do not talk about, you know, "this is right," or we don't say "this is right" or "that is wrong."

Student E: Would you consider it wrong to just-like, to just count to nine in your breathing practice?

Suzuki-roshi: Just-

Student E: Like if you just counted one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine-one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine-would that-like-in the-in a bigger sense that wouldn't be wrong, but like in a smaller sense that would-that-now that's something that would be wrong. Am I correct? [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Maybe [laughs] wrong. Maybe right, you know. Someone may say that is right, and someone may say that is not right, you know. Because people has some standpoint, you know, from standpoint it may be wrong. From the other standpoint, it may be right, you know.

So it means that it is not always right, you know, or always wrong. So, you know, if so, you know, which is [laughs]-without taking any viewpoint, you cannot say right or wrong. Without having some standard, you cannot say that is good or bad. So the standard we take, you know, belongs to us, not to thing itself. So if we, you know, forget all about standard, you cannot say good or bad. Hai.

Student F: Is it important for us as Zen Buddhists not to eat meat or fish? And if so, why?

Suzuki-roshi: Zen Buddhist-because we didn't, especially in Asian time, they didn't eat fish or, you know, meat because it is directly related to the first precept of non-killing, you know. "Don't kill." Directly related to the precepts of not-don't kill. And it is the most brutal, you know, way of killing animals, you know. So we didn't.

But, you know, our, you know, feeling or emotional life is more complicated right now, you know. And even though we know that-even though we don't kill animal, to eat rice or vegetables may be the same thing. We understand that, so we don't know, you know, to eat meat or fish is so bad or not, you know, anyway-because anyway we have to kill something when we eat something.

So our understanding or our understanding of precepts, you know, changed little by little. And in China, you know, the Sixth Patriarch, you know, when he received the transmission from his master, he lived for a long time in fishing village. And he mixed-the people, you know, would eat fish, but he ate soup [?] [laughs]-soup and the fish. Fisherman must have eaten the meat, and he mixed his soup with rice and ate. That may be actually violence [violation?] of the precept.

So precepts, you know, according to the time and place, changed little by little. And especially in Zen precepts we take-we observed precepts [in a] more positive sense. Without saying "not to kill," we say "help," you know, "living being in some way." For an instance, to raise, you know, to be kind to animal, or to be-to help to raise vegetables. This is more positive way of observing the precepts of not to kill. The best way of observing the precepts of "not to kill" is not to kill buddha-nature is the highest way of observing precepts.

So to practice, you know, zazen and to have more meaningful life is the way to observe our precepts. So we don't understand precepts in term of fish or, you know, meat. But I think to-I'm sure meat is not so good food for us. I think so. If so, we should not eat meat so much. Not because it is violence [violation] of the precepts, but because of, you know, because fish or meat is appropriate food for us or not appropriate. Hai.

Student G: It says that you need faith, doubt, and determination. What kind of doubt?

Suzuki-roshi: Doubt. Doubt means, you know, try to understand completely is doubt, you know-to accept teaching in its true sense. When you, you know, when you don't-when you find something difficult to believe in, you know, then you should, you know, try to accept it until you can accept it. That is doubt.

Student G: Well, if you accept it but you have doubt or true [1 words] as to what you're seeing while you practice it-or what you are going [1-2 words]-

Suzuki-roshi: Still-still that doubt should go on and on until you, you know, completely get over the doubt. That is a kind of-that is a way of studying our way. To continue doubt, that is very good practice. As a Buddhist it is good. The doubt should be very big and [laughs] and very wrong, you know. Then you-what you attain is greater.

Student H: Someone began as a student and doubted all rituals.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: How do you speak to him [SR laughs, laughter]? Would you ask him to do it and put his doubt aside? Or would you ask him to not do it and exercise his doubt?

Suzuki-roshi: That's-that is just intellectual doubt, you know. I mean doubt [laughter], you know, physical doubt and everything [laughs, laughter]. "If you have doubt, why don't you try it? If that is true or not?" Okay? [Laughter.]

Some question?

Student I: Could you explain to us some of the ceremonies that are used in the Buddhist funeral service and what they mean, please?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. In Buddhist funeral, you know, if he hasn't received precepts, we give precepts first of all. And then as a Buddhist, you know, we say farewell to them in some way, you know, in some traditional way. That's all, you know, but, you know, what we-

Student I: There is something in the service about forgiveness of sin.

Suzuki-roshi: Sin?

Student I: Yes. [4-6 words.][2] In the context of the service, could you explain that part?

Suzuki-roshi: We, you know, before we accept, you know, precepts, we make confession, you know, and receive precepts, and become Buddhist. And as a Buddhist I-we say, you know, last words to them or, you know, we, according to some traditional way, you know, as we say goodbye to our friend, we say goodbye to him. That is, you know, our Buddhist funeral service. And maybe we have to translate all those, you know, things into English, but which we haven't, you know, yet.

Student I: Do you believe that the person for whom the service is given is aware that you are giving it?

Suzuki-roshi: That, you know, it-we understand in this way: That we, you know, observe service with some certain feeling means that he also have that same feeling, you know. It is not, you know-we say "that I am here means that he is there," you know. There is closely related-his being to our-to my being. That I am here means that you are there. That is very true, you know [laughs]. That I feel in some way means, you know, that you feel in the same way. Not exactly, may be-may not be exactly the same, but there must be some reason there is some difference between my feeling and your feeling. But there is some reason, and it is the law of causality.

That my feeling is different from your feeling does not mean we have quite different feeling completely. It should be so because if it is-if I think your feeling and my feeling are exactly the same, that is wrong understanding of the truth. It should be different, and why it is different is some reason of causality. So we don't mind, you know, even though my feeling is different from his feeling who is no more-who is supposed to be no more. But no-we say "no more," but it cannot be so. In some way he exists, and there is some reason why he is now different from me or from other people who is-who are alive.

So still we believe in, you know, even though he is in other world, maybe there must be some relationship [between] this world and to the other world. And that relationship is the law-still, you know, in the relationship of causality-cause and effect. So one is all and all is one, and in this sense we, you know, say farewell to everyone.

Student J: If-did the Buddha say that ego is-does not really exist-that it really exists is delusion, then what exactly is it, you know-the experience beyond death? I mean, what does it mean to be dead, or-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh-yeah, you know-ego-ego-we say ego doesn't exist. We say so because you think ego exist, so we think-we put more emphasis on egolessness-egolessness. But both is true. Ego exist, but not in some substantial way, having some special nature, you know. So in this sense, ego doesn't exist. But, you know-but it exist. Very paradoxical, but it is so. Strictly speaking, in the smallest particle of time you exist there. But not always-you don't exist always in that way. So we say egolessness. Exist but not always exist in the same way. That is what we mean. Okay? Yeah?

Student K: You mentioned that the chain of cause and effect in, you know, my present life-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student K: -then when I die this chain does not end, but it goes on and carries me through another world to a-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student K: -in a similar way [1-2 words].

Suzuki-roshi: In time span it goes in that way, but in space span, you know, you-your existence is closely related to other existence. We understand in that way. So we say "egolessness," because we think we exist here-most people exist-understand we exist here in this way. And next life will be same person will [laughs], you know, with same character will exist, but I don't think so. We will change into something: not into cats or snake, but some change should take place on each one of us. So there is not much reason why we should stick to, you know, to our being[3] literally in its substantial way.

Student L: In Buddhism, as I understand it, they teach that life and death are not opposites. Death is a part of life.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: And from what I've read, the Buddha had great composure in regard to his-Suzuki-roshi: Great-?

Student L: Composure.

Suzuki-roshi: Composure. In birth and death?

Student L: Yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yes.

Student L: So my question is, why does it seem that most living beings-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student L: -try hard to extend life and to avoid death if death is-Suzuki-roshi: Another form of living?

Student L: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That is, you know, how we exist, you know. That is also a kind of paradox, you know. So Buddhist-Buddhist-our teaching tell us not to, you know, not to be discriminative, you know, in birth and death [laughs].

Student L: But still as living beings we should-

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student L: -try avoid death?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, try to. That is, you know-the "try to avoid" means to be-to continue our life, you know. So we-as long as we live in our ex-[partial word]-our life is continuous, you see? Or our idea of time is continuous. To live long is-in time span, we try to live long. We try to continue our life. That is our tendency. But at the same time, you know, we want to enjoy our life moment after moment.

When you go to the moon you may say, "Oh! The moon was wonderful place." [Laughs.] You say so. That is idea of discontinuity. You don't want to be discontinue, but, you know, you don't want to live just-even the moon is so beautiful place, you don't want to live in the moon always. So when you appreciate your life in the moon, you have both desire to be continuous-continuously live.[4] If so, you will not stay so long at the same place, because you want to continue your life. If you want to continue your life-even though you want to continue your life, you know, if you realize we are continually going some other place, that is also which you don't like. If it is something good you want to stay there for long time until you are really tired of it. That is, you know, idea of discontinuity.

So-but when we talk about our life, we are deeply involved in first of all, the idea of continuity. That is why you don't like death. But actually when you are-when you enjoy something very much, you are involved in idea of continuity-discontinuity. That you stay he- [partial word]-one place for a long time mean-is not possible, but that you want to live in this world forever means the idea of discontinuity. That you say, you know, this is quarter of nine, you know, that is idea of discontinuity.

So, you know, we are very selfish, you know-selfish-we are not-our feeling doesn't-is not so-what do you say? We-our emotional activity doesn't work so well, you know, so impartially. If we see one thing, we cannot see the other side. That is good, you know, but at the same time we should know the other side of the truth. Did I-yeah, I-

Student L: Then it has something to do with nonattachment somehow. We-if we live, if I understand it, shikantaza, we would appreciate it very much, but we would not try to hold on to it. Is that so?

Suzuki-roshi: When we practice shikantaza we go back before this kind of feeling arise. Do you understand?

Student L: That would mean inactivity.

Suzuki-roshi: Inactivity, and in our feeling we have no emotional attachment, or we have no feeling of no-thinking. If some thinking activity arise, we will be involved in, you know, some confusion.

Student L: So to say appreciation means thinking? Is that what-Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, usually it is so. But when we say appreciation in its true sense, [we mean] detached from emotional things and thinking faculty. And to have direct experience of it is, you know, non-detachment [non-attachment?] or shikantaza.

Oh. Excuse me. Do you have some more questions? Hai.

Student M: Do you practice for me or Buddhism?

Suzuki-roshi: To practice Buddhism for Buddhism is not to practice Buddhism in term of good or bad, or in term of "I like Buddhism," or "I don't like it." Whatever it is, if it is true, you know, we should study it and we should practice it. That is our spirit. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

... you have-we should [gap in tape for 1-2 minutes] ... different. Having complete relativity way in term of reality is Buddhist way. So even though we understand things from various angle, and we-even though we have completely different understanding of life, as long as we are here in this world, we should, you know, extend or we should follow. But that relativity is based on, you know, non-duality of life. So we don't-that is at the same-you may say that is detachment. Detachment does not mean to cut off worldly desires.

Having worldly desires, you know, with right understanding of it, and knowing how to treat our desires-to live in this world is Buddhist way. But usually, you know, we have no idea of non-detachment [non-attachment?], and we will be enslaved by our desires and world of duality. That is why we have always-we should have-we should fight always. Hai.

Student N: You said that Buddhism is to live with our desires but not be ruled by them, if I understand you. Can you still say the vow, "I vow to put an end to them"?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student N: Wouldn't it be more accurate, if I'm standing here teaching, wouldn't it be more accurate that we vow-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student N: "I vow to understand them." [SR laughs, laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: You continue-it means that you continue this practice, you know, forever because it is-our desires are, you know, inexhaustible. If so we [laughs, laughter]-there is no end in our practice.

Student N: Should I even try to put an end to them?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student N: To our vows [?] I should try to put an end to them. But as I understand you, I should sort of make an effort to limit them, if I understand [3-4 words].

Suzuki-roshi: No, we don't mean that. Moment after moment, we should make best effort to put an end to the desires [laughs]. But desires- because desires is endless, so our effort will-may be endless. That is why, you know, Buddhist exist forever. You know, if-you know, if we put an end to every desires, you know, there will not be any need for Buddhist to [laughs] practice our way.

Student N: Do you dream at night? [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: [What] did you say?

Student N: Do you dream at night?

Suzuki-roshi: I? [Laughter.] I don't remember so well, but-yes I do.

Student N: Dreams are a [1-2 words] [laughter]. Our dreams [2-3 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, maybe. [Laughter.] But I don't remember so well, you know, because I don't-it is-maybe I have this kind of trouble always, so it is not so important to remember things one by-one after another, you know. I may laugh at me if I dream of something.

Student O: I was trying to ask of myself the question of birth and death. I see when one attains a certain consciousness, that birth and death are a daily process or of a "now" process. [2-3 sentences unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Oh.

Student O: And I say I've seen a sleepless death of the body, because body is not there any more. You know, it sleeps.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh.

Student O: Is that an individual thing, and why is this-this [3-4 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student O: [4-6 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: I-I often wonder why I don't, you know-why I am not afraid of going to sleep, you know [laughs]. If it is, you know, it is a kind of death, you know. I am not afraid of going to sleep, you know. I don't know why, but maybe I'm so sure tomorrow-that tomorrow morning I'll get up, you know.

Student O: So death is only a physical thing-a physical [1 word]. I was wondering if [8-12 words]. I guess-is the body a part of the mind?

Suzuki-roshi: Body?

Student O: Is the body a manifestation of the mind?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, I-

Student O: Does the body come from the mind? The universal mind? [2-4 words.]

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. [Laughs, laughter.] I couldn't follow you completely, but-what is your point of question?

Student O: Oh. It's-I'm still talking about birth and death.

Suzuki-roshi: Birth and death?

Student O: Yes. Duration of-Suzuki-roshi: Duration of.

Student O: Does [1-2 words?] clear things up when you talk about death? I-I think about death a lot. But, you know, like I [4-6 words] the longer I think of [4-6 words]. Birth and death are cycling and always options [?]. I-I guess I'm not phrasing this in the form of a question, but there is a question that I'm asking.

Suzuki-roshi: Birth and death, you know-the-the most important point of problem of birth and death is, you know, the idea of self, you know.

Student O: Isn't talking about-speaking of death as this gentleman was speaking of it, in the sense saying the body is less than the mind? That it is a separate entity from the mind?

Suzuki-roshi: We understand, you know, oneness of mind and body.

Student O: They are one?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. We don't understand "here is body, and mind is floating in the heaven and come [laughs] to my-our mind. And after death it will go out from our body and enter again into our body." We don't under- [partial word]-we have not-our understanding of mind and body is more than that. The-we put emphasis on the point that mind and body is one.

Student O: Umm. Question: What do you think of mirrors?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student O: What-what do think-do you look in the mirror a lot [laughter]? I was thinking that-I think-doesn't man's fear of death come from a fear of physical change? In other words, the body disappearing-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student O: -that's the only fear-

Suzuki-roshi: Reincarnation.

Student O: -[2-4 words] death, that this thing we live in will disappear, and-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. That kind of thought exist in Buddhist thought too. But that is Buddha applied the teaching which-usually-usual people had at that time. But to help people, he applied the-he did not, you know, deny their understanding of life. But somehow he managed to, you know, to make them understand the point of Buddhism even though he applied various thought-various folk religion. But he did not lose his point always.

And later, you know, most Oriental people had been involved in their naïve [native?] folk religion. And that kind of religious understanding became more and more powerful and common. That is why Buddhist has that kind of-put emphasis on that kind of idea of reincarnation or something like that. But if you read Shobogenzo, he clarify this point completely. Hai.

Student P: Would it be correct to speak of a-that we have a human personality?

Suzuki-roshi: Personality.

Student P: Human personality.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Personality, we say but it is not-personality may be not completely so, but some tendency which is caused by his physical, you know, condition or physical nature. This is a kind of materialistic, you know, philosophy, but it is true, I think. So even though you receive education, you know-a kind of education, it is almost impossible to change their character. If it is possible-I think if it is possible to change our physical, you know, condition completely, then our character will change too. That is true from materialistic viewpoint. But from idealistic viewpoint, you know, our thinking-our mind will change our physical body-physical function of our body. If we have healthy mind, our body will be healthy too. This is also true, but we cannot completely argue, you know, from materialistic viewpoint and idealistic viewpoint, because both is true.

Student P: Well, [2-4 words] asked was-you were speaking of idea of self. And yet it seems to me that all of us have a concern for expressing our unique [?] personalities-in place of our human personality. I don't mean my individual personality, but I mean somebody that's a version of the self being expressed in me. This is just-at this moment of time, it's a force.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Oh. Not as a self, but as a momentous [momentary], you know, impulse or something. Yeah, I think that is-that is all right, you know, but we usually, you know, without being aware of it, we are usually controlled by-by our preconceived idea or by our past experience. And so we should know that-this point also. Even though this is just expression of my, you know, my being[5] right now, but it is not always so. If we understand this point, you know, we should train ourself more so that we can express ourselves fully, completely, without any-without being enslaved by something or bound by something. Only we are alert enough to, you know, to see ourselves, to check ourselves. We cannot easily accept ourselves, you know, so easy. That is why we-we are so strict with ourselves. Hai.

Student Q: It seems that in order to [8-10 words] always scheming.

Suzuki-roshi: Always what?

Student Q: Always scheming-trying to find ways to snatch [8-10 words] or [6-8 words].

Suzuki-roshi: No, I'm sorry. I couldn't follow you. Did you-

Student Q: If you couldn't hear, I-

Suzuki-roshi: Will you make your question in short-put in some short way? Condense your question?

Student Q: Can zazen practice stop-

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student Q: Can zazen practice-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Zazen practice.

Student Q: -get you to stop your grasping for attention?

Suzuki-roshi: Zazen practice stop-I'm sorry. What-Student R: Grasping.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student R: She's saying, "Can zazen practice initially stop grasping?"

Suzuki-roshi: Grasping-

A brief clamor of several students all talking at once: [Unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Attention.

Student S: Desire for attention.

Student R: Will zazen stop this? [Said slowly and gravely.] [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Attention. Stop? [Laughs.]

Student Q: It could be I just need to find more control, or can zazen practice eventually stop the greedy grasping [1-2 words] completely?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, you know, when you start our practice, you know, your effort should be, you know, concentrated on something-some particular thing-like counting breathing. But eventually, you know, that effort will be extended in many direction, and you will have deep, wide, strong mind. Then you can, you know-you will have some power or some ability or, you know, the ability-without trying you can do many things. But at first it is necessary for us to make some effort in right direction. As long as you know the direction of practice, that is all right. And one by one you make your effort, you know, in-with right direction. Without going this way, you know, you can go this way.

We-we say detachment, it is not so easy thing to [laughs]-to attain. We can talk about it, but not so easy. So the only way is to try to practice our way, starting from very simple way like counting breathing or following-breathing practice. Then, you know, even though you have various problem amidst [?] of the difficulty, if you can count your breathing perfectly, you know, you have already have power of controlling yourself or power of being free from objective world.

It is more than habit, you know, because you have some belief or power in it. Habit is just, you know, succession of our activity-our intentional activity. But zazen power is, you know-with always steady steps it is going with some direction or intention. But eventually that intentional part will vanish, you know, and the power will go by itself. That is complete detachment. As we-our-we are very selfish, and we are always, you know, [feeling] some tendency. So without some effort we cannot get out of it. Okay.

Student S: In yoga meditation, we're taught to relax the muscles and clear the breathing passages so-to help the meditation, which zazen seems to ignore completely [?].

Suzuki-roshi: No, we don't. We don't. Yoga maybe put more emphasis on physical practice, you know, than our practice. I think yoga practice will help a lot if-but-if it is too much like zazen, you know, it will create some problem for you. So maybe we should be careful, anyway. Hai.

Student T: Could you explain that problem?

Suzuki-roshi: Problem?

Student T: Yeah, the problem-could you share what could be the problem?

Suzuki-roshi: That is, you know, some person, you know, for some person who is very difficult to sit in cross-legged position, you know. If you-if he force too much, then it will create some physical problem, maybe. And-

Student T: Yoga, then, can create a great deal of intake of energy-your forced-breathing exercises rather than just watching them. Can those energies taken in cause anything difficult for zazen?

Suzuki-roshi: No, I don't think so. I don't think so.

Student T: Also, another question on sleep. Can one practice zazen in sleep?

Suzuki-roshi: In sleep? We don't say that is zazen practice, you know [laughs, laughter]. Maybe we say-but we say if you are really Zen student, way you sleep must be different from ordinal [ordinary] person [laughs].

Student T: Often I have seen an icon of the Buddha sleeping on his-not sleeping, or-laying on his right side.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student T: This is often described as a parinirvana. I don't know what this is. Did he attain some kind of enlightenment lying on his side?

Suzuki-roshi: That is, you know, how most Indian people say they sleeps, you know. This side down. There is-of course, if you think why, it is quite obvious, you know, why they do this way. And most people are, you know, right-handed.

Student T: Also it relieves the stress on the heart. This is not from-this is not from Buddhism, but a woman who-part of her way is pure sleeping heart. And-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh.

Student T: -she says that lying on the right side-the heart-there's no stress on the heart, or less stress on the heart, so that it can beat fully and regain strength during the night.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm. [Laughter.] I don't know, you know. I am not concerned so much about those things, you know. But, you know, if you, you know, sleep left-side-down, you don't feel so good, you know [laughter]. It's obvious, you know. Maybe-and-it is-it may be better to sleep, you know, this way [laughs, laughter]-south and north, you know, rather than east and west. We are very magnetic being also. Everything may be so.

So if you start to study this kind of thing, you know, we will have many things to study. But we will have some specialist, you know, and-who may suggest us many things. As much as we can, we should apply-we should follow their suggestion, I think.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original City Center tape transcribed verbatim by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (3/9/01).

[1] Text in brackets was not on tape. It was added by transcriber.

[2] Possibly referring to "All your ancient twisted karma ... is now released."

[3] "Being" used as a noun.

[4] Used as the verb "live," not the adjective.

[5] "Being" used as a noun.

7 - Liberation

Monday, August 18, 1969

Liberation
Tassajara

Suzuki-roshi: Tonight I want to discuss about our way to attain liberation or enlightenment. When you study Buddhism through teaching or reading scriptures, it looks like Buddhist has some special way of thinking by which we attain liberation. If we understand Buddhism, and if we take the Buddhist standpoint or Buddhist way of thinking, that is the way to attain liberation.

Do you hear me?

Various Students: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: Okay? [Laughs.] Most people may understand in this way. If so, there will not be-no need to practice zazen. But-but it is necessary. And why it is so is the point of my talk-discussion tonight.

When the Sixth Patriarch attained enlightenment, his teacher Konin[1] thought it may be dangerous for him to accept disciples because of the situation of the world at that time-situation of the country at that time when China was culturally divided in two: South and-North and South, and partly because the Sixth Patriarch was unknown, you know, unknown disciple. He was just one of the many disciples, while Jinshu [2]-the head of the group-was very famous. And if people know that the Sixth Patriarch is Jinshu-[corrects self] [that] Hui-neng received the transmission from the Fifth Patriarch and become Sixth Patriarch, people-some people may [get] angry with him.

So he segregate himself in seashore, and he worked with fisherman. And when he appeared for the first time in some temple, there were several disciples were discussing seeing the flag, you know, whether the green-thin flag-what do you say? Flapping?[3]

Students: Waving?

Suzuki-roshi: -waving by the wind [laughs], and some disciple say, "Because wind blows, the flag is waving." Some said, "Because," you know, "flag is waving, so we know that the wind is blowing." They are arguing about it. Actually maybe means that the flag may be, you know-each one of ourselves, and wind may be our objective world or our surrounding. Because, you know, surrounding is not good, we are not so good [laughs]. Or because we are not so good, we will make our surrounding, you know, [something] which is not so good. There may be two ways of understanding of our life. They have been in dispute for pretty long time.

And the Sixth Patriarch appeared and, you know, while listening to them, and said, "Because," you know-"It is not because of the flag or because of the wind [that] we see the flag is waving. But because of our mind," you know, "flag is waving and wind is blowing." That was his, you know, answer for that. And he said very definitely, you know, he said so. So they thought he may be a great Zen master, and he-that was the beginning of his life as a Zen master.

There may be, you know-it may be interesting, you know, to think about the opinion that flag is waving because of the wind. Or that flag is waving-that wind is-because flag is waving, we know that wind is blowing. Or, you know, because our mind is waving, so flag is waving.

Actually, in Buddhism we have this kind of three-those three understanding. Actually, as the Sixth Patriarch said, the two, you know, two opinion-because of our surrounding, or because of our environment, or because of the society, we change, or because if we are strong enough, we can change our surrounding. This is true. And what the Sixth Patriarch said-in Buddhism, as the Sixth Patriarch said, actually we, in Buddhism, we do not discuss anything which is-which has nothing-which is nothing appears in our mind. Whatever it is-that thing exist means that we exist, that we-our mind exist. And our mind-when our mind see something to start to exist. This is, you know-there is some reason why we say so. But most people thinks-think things exist whether we observe it or not.

Maybe so, but what we discuss is something which has something to do with our mind, to do with ourselves. It-when we discuss something [in the] objective world which exist independent from our mind, is more scientific discussion but not religious discussion. Whatever it is, we discuss things as things which has something to do with ourselves. That is Buddhist way of discussing. And that was actually the answer of the Sixth Patriarch. Because that flag is waving means our mind is waving. We treat things-understand things, as something which is something to do with ourselves. This is actually pretty close, you know, to our final understanding. But that is-that is not complete.

We Buddhist teachers usually give some instruction or lectures according to the audience, you know. And the Sixth Patriarch thought they may not understand if he say something more difficult, so he made it easy-he made his answer easy and explained in that way. I think most people understand if we attain enlightenment or if we study Buddhism, you will have some special experience or you will have some special understanding. So, so-called-it "wisdom" is some power of understanding things. If you think in this way, your understanding is nearly the same as the two-the people who were discussing about the flag-waving flag. And if you think-if you train your mind, or by training you will have some special power to change your environment, that is, you know, so-called-it more philosophical understanding of life, more idealistic understanding of things-a kind of idealism. Mind is first, and object is second.

But Buddhism is not idealism. So according to Dogen-zenji, when we say "mind," that is not mind-that is not our mind which observes things. What is our mind is-when we say "mind," it means big mind. The small mind-to observe things, you know, even though it is right, we do not say that is our big mind. When we say "mind," the mind is big mind in which everything happens. So waving flag is mind-itself mind. And waving flag include everything. If so, waving mind is big mind itself. That is, you know, maybe right understanding. And how we attain this kind of mind is our practice.

If I explain this much you may, you know, already understand what is our practice, what is shikantaza, or what is our everyday life in its true sense. When we say "one is all and all is one," you know, that is how things happens in our big mind. This mind is not mind in relative sense. It is-this mind is beyond subjective and objective world.

We say, you know, when you eat you should eat. When you sleep, you should sleep [laughs]. That is the big mind, that is selflessness. And best way to get rid of small mind is just to, you know, sleep when you should sleep. Just get up when you should get up, without hesitation. Do you understand?

In monastery, the basic practice is, you know, to follow people. Follow waves and drive waves, that is our way. Wind may follow the waves, you know, of the wind. And at the same time wind drive flag. So-if so, wind and flag moves, you know, at the same time, and that movement include everything related to various movement in this world, in this cosmic world. That is actually to realize the true activity of true mind.

If you go to monastery [in Japan], you will see the big notice: Dojodaishuniichini.[4] Dojo daishuni ichini. That is Chinese and Japanese. "Whatever you do, you should do with people at the same time." That is [1 word]. Basic practice: "When they sit, you sit." So zazen practice is not actually-we do not practice zazen just to attain enlightenment but to practice zazen itself is the realization of the truth. And to, you know, to realize this point, we practice zazen. To get up, you know, when you hear the bell, you know, is the most important practice for us. The moment you hear the bell, you should get up and you shouldn't feel rested [laughs]. "Two minutes more, three minutes more." You shouldn't stop a lot [?]. Okay? If you do so, you are not practicing our way. But you should not, you know, run into wall [laughs, laughter] or into door, you know.

As I have, you know, now in my room three mats. At first, to enjoy spacious room of three tatami. I slept this way, using all three mats [laughs, laughter]. I felt I am a giant, you know. Like a giant I slept using all three tatamis. But if I do so, I have to sleep east and west, like this. And someone tell me-someone-someone tell me that is not so good. You should sleep this way, south and north, you know [laughs, laughter]. So I change my way of sleeping. Last night, you know, I got up all of-this is my habit, you know-if alarm or if I get up, immediately I wake up, I get up, and [laughs] I lost my place [?]. Usually if I get up and walk this way [laughing, laughter], that is my rest room. But last night, I, you know-learning to [where it was]-by lamp, that was not so good, but-you know, this kind of habit, you know, is-usually it is good, but sometime it is not so good.

Without hesitation, you know, you must have-you must be able to do something without hesitation. Even though it is cold you should be able to get up and sweep the garden or clean the garden if you have to. If-when the garden is very frosty, you know, you may hesitate, you know, to work on the garden without tabi or without sandal. In wintertime [laughs] we do not, you know-we small disciples do not use sandal. But summertime we use something. We have to wear something. But nowadays we don't, even in monastery. But we do not wear tabis. Why we do so is to have some habit of doing something without hesitation.

Whatever it is, you should be able to eat it. You shouldn't say, "This is good" or "This is bad." And if you, you know, eat it, and if you determine to-decide to eat it, everything taste good. Before you eat it, you don't like it. But if you start to chew it up, then everything has some good-its own taste which is very good.

This kind of practice is based on the teaching to do something with people, without not much self-centered idea-without not much discrimination. Then your manner will change, and your countenance will change, and your face will change. We say when you are young your face is given to-was given by your parents. But after forty, you know, your face is-will be given to you by your practice. If you continue a good practice you will have generous, happy face. If you don't practice our way, you will become more and more nervous [laughs]. You will be very mean father or mother, you know. That is why we practice our way [laughs, laughter], and-to be a good father or good mother or good teacher.

And we say, after forty we should not have thought-we should not, you know, have thought-we should forget all about our [1 word-sounds like "weapon"]. If he has, you know, [same 1 word] after forty, he will be a, you know, a kind of fool, we say. It means that we have accomplished selflessness before we become forty. And without any [same 1 word], without anything to rely on, we should be able to manage our life. But usually, you know, when we cannot, you know, work properly we cannot do something properly because of the old age, we stick to some teaching [laughs]. And we talk about too many things, like me [as I do]. That is not so good.

Without, you know, saying anything we should be able to communicate with each other. That is the best way to accomplish something good. Not by words, not by rules, or not by teaching, we should be able to accomplish things, especially when you become over forty years.

If you have some question, please ask me. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

Why we are-maybe before twenty-for woman, maybe before twenty-, you know, twenty-two or -three, have to study something, you know. That is the time you make foundation of your life. And after, for a man, maybe, after twenty-five, we should-before twenty-five-we should make background or foundation of our life.

And after twenty-five, we should try, you know, things-try out things which-which-by all means. And when we become forty, you know, we should be able to manage our life without using some special means or special things. And we will, you know-after forty we will help people and help ourselves in its true sense. But still we will make a great effort to do so. But after, maybe, sixty we should be able to do it without so much effort. We should be able to do-to manage-able to manage things quite naturally, without much effort. By doing something which we like, you know-by doing something by his own way, he should be able to accomplish something without much effort. Hai.

Student A: If best way is without speaking, what would we do-what do we accomplish here with rules and teaching?

Suzuki-roshi: Teaching?

Student A: And teaching.

Suzuki-roshi: Teaching.

Student A: Rules and teaching and schedule. What-what good do we do with all of that?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Yeah-I [laughs]-without words or, you know-I mean, we have to see our schedule or we have to remember our names, you know. That much effort-words or rules-may be necessary. But rule is not the first, you know. Just to observe our rules is not-is not the-is not the most important thing. Do you understand?

Student A: Mm-hmm.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. I, you know-I cannot say literally, but I put more emphasis on our natural, you know, activity with good concentration, and with tender mind, or with soft mind-not rigid mind. Not-we should not use very sharp knife, but, you know, dull, you know, maybe big dull knife [laughter]. Most of the time that is better because there is no danger, you know, of cutting you fingers or [laughs]-. It may be difficult, you know, to use blunt, you know, thick knife-big knife [laughs]. That is-most of the time, it is safe and bigger. And we should not-we should try not to use something so sharp. Sharp knife is necessary, you know. Of course it is necessary. But to use it always is not so good. Do you understand what I mean [laughs]?

Do you have some question? Hai.

Student B: If we do not exercise discrimination, many times we will get into situations that are dangerous or bad for us. How do-is that not so?

Suzuki-roshi: No, it is not so [laughter]. I don't think so, you know. [Laughs.] We feel in that way, you know. We have some fear of, you know, something we-we feel some need of being smart, and, you know, but it is not actually so. Everyone knows what we should do and what we shouldn't [laughs]. And for us it not so-it is not necessary to be so smart and so clever, especially to understand Buddha's way. It is one of the difficulty, you know. One of the difficulty of being Buddhist is "too smart." "Too smart people is difficult to enter the true way." That-that is what Buddha said.

But for-for such a person who is very alert, strong practice is needed. And after practicing very hard, he will attain-his attainment will be great too. But mostly, you know, smart people think, "Oh! I understand that. I know that. That's all." [Laughs, laughter.] They will not make so much effort, you know, so he cannot be a good Buddhist. If he is [having] some difficulty in doing things with people, like a donkey [laughs, laughter], he should, you know, practice hard to be a donkey.

We-we say we should get through donkey's way [?] and horse way [?] [laughs]. We should get through. It means we should get through life of donkey and life of a horse. That is, you know, important practice.

Do you have some question? Hai.

Student C [Bill Shurtleff?]: One of the last times that you spoke here-

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student C: One of the last times that you spoke here-not tonight, but before-

Suzuki-roshi: Oh. Oh.

Student C: -you said that-I understood you to say that we may think of the whole world as existing for ourselves.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: And often I feel that there is a mind or a magician or a buddha who knows my problem and keeps creating a world-

Suzuki-roshi: Who know whose problem-his problem or?

Student C: My problem.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, your problem [laughter].

Student C: The problem that I think I have.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: And he keeps creating a world that comes to me which helps me to see that problem.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: And in this sense I often feel that the world does exist.

Suzuki-roshi: World?

Student C: That the world does exist-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: -for me-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student C: -and that it keeps showing me this problem again and again and again.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: And-as if it's instructing, like in the Diamond Sutra it says, "The tathagata instructs-"

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student C: "-the bodhisattvas."

Suzuki-roshi Uh-huh.

Student C: And-

Suzuki-roshi: Do you mean some particular person or things?

Student C: Things and-Suzuki-roshi: Many things.

Student C: -the world and situations-the-Suzuki-roshi: Situation, yeah.

Student C: -anything that happens-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, yeah.

Student C: -seems to be constantly-

Suzuki-roshi: And it may be-he may be many things, you know-various things. Do you mean that, or-?

Student C: Yeah. Sometimes a bird, sometimes people, sometimes-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, yeah.

Student C: -the kind of work that I'm given.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student C: Sometimes missing a bell.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: Missing hearing something. Sometimes taking too much food.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student C: All of those things together-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah.

Student C: -seem to keep speaking to the same thing-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yes.

Student C: -as if there were something outside that was sending all of these things-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: -like a magician.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student C: And somehow-I don't know how-but I feel that this is very closely related to what you're saying tonight-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student C: -about the flag and the wind. And I can't-I can't grasp quite how, but somehow in a very formless way, they seem to be one and the same thing.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student C: Could-could you talk about that a little bit?

Suzuki-roshi: Mmm. You talked about it pretty well [loud laughter]. Yeah, I-you know-that is very true. That is what Dogen-zenji said, you know. Buddha guide us and teaches us with everything. And when we talk about the truth, my mouth-our mouth become Buddha's mouth.

And when we-what do you say to do like this [gestures]? Not-the opposite of grasping thing.

Students: Let go?

Suzuki-roshi: Let it go, you know. My hand become Buddha's hand. Not grasp, you know. To talk about is something to grasp. Here is teaching, you know, in my mouth. But this mouth, actually, when you feel-we feel in that-in that way, my mouth is not any more my mouth. Buddha's mouth. And if you-we let my hand open, my hand become Buddha's hand. If you hear something, that is not something. It is something more than that. So if you-if you cannot hear or see things or talk about things in that way, we are not Buddhists, he [Dogen-zenji] said [laughs]. Very meaningful, you know. He express that kind of feeling very well. It is not so interesting if I translate it in English, but if you say it in Japanese in that way, it is very poetic. And it is more than poem.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original City Center tape transcribed verbatim by Diana Bartle (10/30/00) and checked by Bill Redican (5/7/01).

[1] Daman Hongren (Daiman Konin): 602-675. Fifth Chinese Patriarch.

[2] Yuquan Shenxiu (Gyokusen Jinshu): 605?-706. Disciple of the Fifth Patriarch, Daiman Konin. Founded the Northern School of Chan.

[3] Wu-Men Kuan (Mumonkan, Gateless Gate), Case 29: "The Sixth Patriarch's 'Your Mind Moves.'"

[4] Japanese: dojo: "temple, meditation hall." Possible daishu ("monks") and ichi ("one"). See also lecture SR-66-08-15A.

8 - Question and Answer

Thursday, August 28, 1969

Question and Answer
Tassajara

Suzuki-roshi: I want you to ask me a question. [Laughs.] I have nothing in my mind to say. Something-some question about our practice, maybe, or zazen practice, or our everyday practice. Hai.

Student A: I have two days-I am leaving Tassajara to live in the city after being here for one year. I wonder what you might have specifically to say to me about that right now.

Suzuki-roshi: Right now [laughs]. What time did you actually come back?

Student A: Come to-back?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. What time today?

Student A: Today? Today, it was about 5:15.

Suzuki-roshi: 5:15. [Laughs, laughter.] The feeling-I think when you-you are at Tassajara, you know, you don't find anything special [laughs]. But if you come back, you know, from city you will have-you will find Tassajara something quite different from city. I had same feeling when I came back to Eihei-ji Monastery after staying outside of the monastery for maybe one or two days. When you are here, you know, you don't feel anything special. But, you know, even [if] you feel something special when you come back to Tassajara, if you compare, I think proper understanding should be like this: Tassajara should be like a water, you know. That you feel something special about it [is] to see the wave on the water. So even though you feel you have some special feeling about Tassajara, but that is not true Tassajara. It is-you feel very good, but Tassajara should be greater than that. The wave is, you know-wave you see is, according to Dogen-zenji, you know, the wave is a part of-a part of-part of water, or-or one-many ways of observing one of the feature of water.

So even though you have special experience in your practice, that special experience you had is just a part of the reality or perfect enlightenment. Perfect enlightenment is something more-greater than that, which is beyond our experience.

But usually, you know, we become of-we become very proud of our practice at Tassajara when you feel good. But, you know, if our true practice is-whatever feeling you have about our practice, that is a part of-if that is a part of our practice. So even though you feel good, that is not-it does not mean our practice is good. Just because of [if] you feel good-even though you don't feel good, you know, about our practice [laughs], it does not mean our practice is not bad. And if you don't feel anything about it, it does not mean our practice is-practice does not mean anything.

Our real practice is something which you cannot compare to some other practice. It is s- [partial word]-it is-we should know that it is something greater than that or deeper than that. And it is so great that you cannot compare [it] to your ordinal [ordinary] experience. This point should not be forgotten, I think.

But anyway, you know, if you come back from city you will feel wonderful, you know. Maybe Tassajara is more than your home, I think. That is how I felt [when I came back to Eihei-ji monastery after staying outside for a month].[1] I think you must have had same feeling. Hai.

Student B: Roshi, what of the auto-suggestive aspect of zazen? By "auto-suggestive" I mean like self-suggestion. Do you understand? Why don't I-Suzuki-roshi: I-I don't understand your point.

Student B: I-I-you say "count to ten." To a degree, this is auto-suggestive. Or if someone said, "I should put my consciousness below my navel"-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: -this is even more auto-suggestive.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: But if somebody said, "In zazen, just sit."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: "No matter what happens, just sit."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: That would be like the antithesis to auto-suggestion. I just wanted you to talk a little about auto-suggestion or its antithesis and its relationship to zazen.

Suzuki-roshi: Zazen is, you know-I am talking about shikantaza, you know-we-we say, you know, "count your breathing" or "put your mind on your palm." This is just-it does not mean that to put our mind, you know, on our palm is-is our practice, you know. What we mean is to have mindfulness, you know, in our practice, not only on your palm but also your mind should pervade in various corners of your body, you know-your body should be-all of your body should [be] aware of our practice.

So to be concentrated on something like tummy or like your palm means-it is like, you know, if you are sitting, you know, for an instance, I may go, you know, for an instance, you know, check your posture. And I see your mudra and back, your neck, you know, and breathing. If something is missing-some-even though your mudra is right, you know, your [laughs] neck is like this [gestures], you know, that is not practice, you know. Even though your mind in on your palm, if you are watching like this [gestures, laughs, laughter], whether there is your mind on your palm, that is not what I mean, you know. This is very-I don't think you are-you understand in that way.

But mostly-there is some danger of mistake, you know-to understand our instruction in that way. So why we say so is-this is the most important point or center of your practice. So that is why we say so. But center is center when all of your body is participating [in] the practice. So, in short, with your mind and body-whole mind and body, you should practice zazen.

And for me and for you, best way to know whether your practice is good or bad is, you know, to see your mudra, you know. That is what-whether you have strength here or not is easiest way to check some other's practice and to know whether your practice is good or bad by yourself. That is why we say-why you-we give you that kind of instruction. Does it-[laughs]?

Student B: I-that doesn't mean, then, that-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: -if you say "keep your mind in your left palm"-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: -that 40 minutes should go by with concentration on the left palm.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: You say-am I-is that the understanding?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. It-that is not all, you know. Of course, you know-

Student B: The counting of the breathing-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: -should the whole 40 minutes be devoted to counting exhales, one to ten, and back to one? Which-

Suzuki-roshi: That is, you know, pretty difficult. But you should be able to do that. Not always. I don't think you can do it always in that way. But when you are in good condition, you should be able to do that.

Student B: In other words, this is sort of like a self-test?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah-yeah, a sort of self-test. And actually-actually if you can do that more than maybe ten minutes, you know, it is-it is more than self-test. You-you will forget, you know-not forget, but you will be-your practice is [to] go beyond actually breathing counting. You are counting, but you are not counting like you count something. Hai.

Student C: Roshi, sometimes when we have discussions about the dharma, you -you are quoting, you know, "Roshi said this," or "Roshi said that." How do we find our own true way with you?

Suzuki-roshi: With me.

Student C: With you.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] That's very difficult. [Said quietly.] The best way may be, you know, if you understand-if you think you understood what I say, you should try, you know-you should try to accept it in its complete sense. And if you cannot, you should ask question again.

About breathing and practice-do you have some-some other questions? Hai.

Student D: You said that in counting the breathing from one to ten, it's not counting in the usual way. Could you say something more about that?

Suzuki-roshi: We count, you know, actually, and-but-not only count our breathing, your mind follow your breathing. And your physical body also follow or participate in breathing and counting. In that way, you-as you count, you continue the practice with your mind and body. That is how we count our breathing.

Student B: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student B: You said to push down on the exhale, just-not too much, but some little bit. Should that be done for a whole period of zazen-

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student B: -or just for a short period?

Suzuki-roshi: Not just short period. You should continue [for the full period], especially for, you know, for beginners.

Student E: Roshi, can you-can you say something about the mudra, like you use while sitting and other mudras connected [?]?

Suzuki-roshi: This is called "cosmic mudra." There are many mudras, of course, but we, you know, we put all of our fingers like this [gesturing], and second [1 word], and first joint and second joint will make one line like this. And so-so shape will be like this. And here we have vertical line-here-right here. And it should not be like this or like that [laughs].

We must be, you know-we have to be aware of what we are doing, you know.

Student F: My right thumb is always crooked. Does that mean my zazen is sort of crooked?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter.] No. No, I don't think so. That is all right. My-for an instance, my-this finger is crooked, you know [laughs, laughter]. It doesn't come flat [?]. If you do your best, that is all.

Student G [Bill Shurtleff]: Roshi, could you speak about pain in zazen-physical pain?

Suzuki-roshi: Physical pain, yeah. Legs? [Laughter.] Or where? If it is legs, you know, if you continue it, you know, it may be all right. If-if that is too much, I don't know, you know.

Bill: Well, I-I always have the choice whether to sit half-lotus and not have any pain, or sit full lotus-

Suzuki-roshi: Half-lotus.

Bill: -for a full period-

Suzuki-roshi: Why don't you try half-lotus? It-it is not necessary-always necessary to be [in] full lotus. Half-lotus is good enough. But when you-in you-cross your legs half-lotus-may be better to try to [do] full lotus. [Laughs, laughter.] Naturally you will do so, you know, when you-when you find it easy to-too easy to cross in half-lotus, you may try [full lotus], you know. I think you will try.

Student H: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student H: Do you have-are we supposed to count our breaths now? I know-I know you say that sometimes, but I don't believe it enough to do it more than sometimes. [Laughs, laughter.] And sometimes I will count it for five minutes, and then I'll start wondering if I should be counting my breath and I'll quit. So why don't you tell me how to count my breath or don't count my breath? [Laughing, laughter ongoing.]

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm. Hmm. [Laughter.]

Student H: And-is this-does it depend on the person?

Suzuki-roshi: That is your zazen, not my zazen. That is not my problem, you know.

Student H: Oh my God. [Loud laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: So if you feel good, you know, giving up in five minutes-but I don't think so.

Student H: You don't think so, what-?[2]

Suzuki-roshi: You don't think you, you know-I think you don't feel good if you give up in five minutes. And you-I think until you can continue it, you know, one period, you will not be satisfied with your practice. This kind of effort is, you know-here the effort is the point-to make continuous effort is the point, not, you know, attainment is-not attainment-actually posture or ability to count is not the point. To give up is bad. Do you understand? The spirit is important. This spirit-you know, as I explained in parable of water and wave, in our practice we are liable to be caught by waves, you know. But wave is a just a part of the nature of water. So five minutes is valuable. Ten minutes is also valuable if that is-if the practice is based on our belief in buddha-nature. Okay?

Student H: I guess. I don't know.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student H: I'll just-I'll count my breaths.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. [Laughter.] You will-you should continue, okay? And don't be discouraged if you cannot do that. But try as much as you can. So far as you are trying, that is practice. Hai.

Student I: If we're having-I'm having a great deal of difficulty counting my breaths.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student I: In fact, I gave it up about a month ago [laughter], and I started concentrating on my posture because I found that when I was counting my breaths-I counted my breaths for five or six months, and then-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, yeah.

Student I: -I found that if I counted my breaths, my head was hanging, my mudra was-was lopsided-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student I: -my whole body-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student I: -was-was not with it.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student I: So I just-I started to concentrate on my body. And when I did that, I couldn't count my breaths any more. What should one do? Should one-if-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, if so-

Student I: -one has great difficulty counting breaths-

Suzuki-roshi: -yeah, I understand what you say. The breathing, you know-without right posture, it is difficult to have natural good breathing. You know, only with right posture you can count or you can follow your breathing, or you will have natural good breathing without much effort.

And even though your posture is good-you can sit in good posture-even though you can do that, but if you are not yet fully accustomed to it, you know-if you-as long as you are trying so hard just to keep your physical posture-the spine or, you know, straight or, you know, mudra right, then it is rather difficult to follow your breathing even. So counting breathing is good because it will help your breathing. And naturally your breathing will be deeper. That is why we count for beginners.

Student I: Do you think-I find the counting exercises difficult. I mean, I'm just beginning, but it seems too difficult-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student I: -because there's so-in the beginning there is a great deal of pain, and the body-it's such a new position for the body to assume-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student I: -it's very difficult.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student I: And-and taking concentration and putting it into the counting which then becomes very mechanical. I find that my practice is, I wouldn't say "better or worse," but stronger when I'm very aware of where my body is: how it's moving, how my mouth is feeling, my head, my hands, rather than just counting one through ten and following my breath.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. I think so too.

Student I: So-could-can we-should we-if we're beginning and finding it very difficult to count, can we concentrate on our posture?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. If so, a kind of preparation for counting breathing, you can do that. It does not mean you gave up [laughs], you know.

Student I: I try occasionally, but I fall asleep when I count.

Student B: Roshi? Does counting breathing alter the character of the breathing?

Suzuki-roshi: Character. No.

Student B: If a person breathes as I'm breathing now, I'm not counting-

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: -when you make a suggestion with your mind: one, two, and so forth, does that make the breath different-longer, or shorter, or more pushed down, or something? It seems different to me, but I'm not sure.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. It-it-it will help deeper breathing.

Student B: It seems like the breaths are longer-

Suzuki-roshi: Longer.

Student B: -both the intake and the exhale.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. And what-try-I usually count exhaling, you know.

Student B: Yeah, that's what you suggested to do was to-to let the in-in-but the inhale is connected to the exhale.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. [Laughter.] And when the inhaling is, you know-inha- [partial word]-exhaling is good, inhaling is naturally good. It means that you make more space for your lung to inhale, you know, to-

Student B: Push down?

Suzuki-roshi: -push down. Push everything down and make, you know, your-you make more space for your inhaling.

Student J: Roshi, I don't understand what you mean by ["pushing down"].[3]

Suzuki-roshi: Without [laughs]-you-you don't feel you are pushing down. You feel just having deeper breathing, you know. You feel as if your air come to your belly, you know, but it [laughs]-it-that is your feeling, but actually exhaling doesn't reach here [gestures]. Inhaling doesn't reach here [your neck].[4] So when you exhale, you know, it means to press everything down, that's all, even though you don't try to do so.

Student K: Should the chest rise, Roshi, on the inhale? Should the-if you're breathing up here-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student K: -your chest inflates.

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe so. I don't realize in that way, but-

Student L: If the-

Suzuki-roshi: -inhaling is quite natural when the exhaling is deeper.

Student M: Would you speak about makyo[5] in zazen and nightmares during sleep?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Nightmare and makyo may be different.

Student M: What is makyo?

Suzuki-roshi: Mayko is-there is many things, you know. When you-you practice zazen, being concentrated, in deeper concentration, you will see something. The reason why will be different-many-there must be many reasons, but mostly it is because of your imperfect breathing. And physical practice is not so good. But your mental or your mind is pretty good-in good concentration, then there-there may be some imbalance between physical and mental practice. I understand it-I, you know-understand, you know, in this way about makyo. But that is-anyway, you have pretty good practice.

Student M: How about nightmares?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student M: How about nightmares?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] That is, you know, lack of, you know, understanding of practice. [Laughs, laughter.] Makyo is also, you know, also good. Makyo or nightmare is also good, you know [laughs, laughter], if you enjoy your nightmare. That is one of the function of our buddha-nature, so you should welcome nightmare. There is no reason why you should be afraid of [it]. So, you know, that kind of-our practice should be, you know, based on that kind of faith, or conviction, or confidence.

Student N: Roshi? Monday[6] you said that the buddha-nature was ignorance. Does this mean that enlightenment is an illusion, or that we-

Suzuki-roshi: No, no, no. [Laughs.]

Student N: Does this mean that we practice just to practice? I've been worrying about this a little bit [?].

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] You know, when you are not afraid of anything, you know, whatever happen to you, that is all right, you know. You will not be killed by it [laughs]. Even though you are killed by it, it is all right. You know, we should-our practice is not-we should not practice our way in some personal reason or selfish gaining idea. We cannot escape from this world, you know [laughs]. So, that you are afraid of something means you have some-something. So the purpose is to get rid of that something. And that is possible. And most important point is to understand our buddha-nature or absolute nature in-from various angle, you know-to observe our life from various angle. Not just the selfish angle, but various angle, good and bad.

What we mean by "good" is when you are ready to follow the truth, that is good. And when you have selfish idea, that is bad. It does not mean to have some special standard, and measure our practice, or evaluate things. Hai.

Student B: Roshi, if we follow this method of counting breathing we won't necessarily feel better physically, or-and we may have even more mental stress, or-it's very hard to compare because if you don't do it, you don't know [?]-than we would if we didn't follow this method?

Suzuki-roshi: Anyway, you know, to practice shikantaza, you know, it is-it is easier to follow some way to help shikantaza. So the purpose is of those practice is to-how to-how to practice shikantaza. Without doing anything, we should-you can practice-we can stop-if you can stop your mind and practice our way-these two things-that is good. But that is very difficult. For a moment you can do that, but it is very difficult to continue.

So if you are counting breathing, that is not-not much, you know-you are not involved in some-not much activity. It is much better than to think many things or to have many images to come over. And even though you don't do anything, if your mind pervades all of your body, and all parts of your body participate in the practice, you don't actually think, you know. So for a while you can do that, but it is rather difficult to continue it. So we need some help, you know.

Student B: You mean like a koan or a wato[7]-something on this order?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe. Koan practice is-purpose of koan practice is, you know, mostly to stop thinking or to push yourself to the limit of thinking, where you cannot think any more, where you have to give up thinking.

Your urge to accomplish our way [must be] so great that, you know, mental thinking cannot help you anymore. So as long as you cling to thinking faculty, you will be defeated, or [laughs] you will be lost, or you don't know what to do because the something you will-which support you is too weak. You will find it too weak, so, you know, you will [say], "This is no good." And you will confront with the problem or koan without anything, you know, without relying on anything.

Student B: This-this is formal koan practice, not counting breathing, but more the Rinzai-type koan that you're talking about now? [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

Suzuki-roshi: The counting-breathing practice is very old-has old tradition, and it works pretty well for everyone. Maybe as long as you-when you, you know, practice zazen with some purpose, you know, you may, you know, say counting-breathing practice is good or bad, you know. But when you feel you have to practice zazen in some way and you have to accomplish your practice, when you have this kind of urge first, then counting breathing or whatever it is will work. So-

Student O: How about repeating a single word, Roshi? I've found, like if you take the word mu and just sit and fix your concentration on that word and let it repeat, it fixes the mind, and eventually the word seems to go out too. Is that-is that wrong practice to-to do that?

Suzuki-roshi: It is good, actually, you know, to be involved in some activity in its true sense without any subjectivity or objectivity. When you become one with your practice, whatever it is, not only zazen but drinking, eating, you know, with oryoki, [8] or bow, or reciting sutra- whatever it is. When you become one with the practice, then you-it means that you are one already-one with everything, and that practice include everything. When the practice include everything, there is no- nothing to achieve or, you know, even nothing to do. And that activity include everything. I say "everything," you know [laughs]. Everything: this is just word, you know. "Everything" means, actually, something greater than things, you know, which you can figure out. So that is so-called-it "nothingness." Nothingness will, you know, will be realized when you are involved in some activity completely. That is nothingness.

Student P: You disappear into the activity.

Suzuki-roshi: You-you will disappear-

Student P: -into the activity.

Suzuki-roshi: -and what exist is actually activity only. And that activity is not your activity [laughs]: someone's activity. I-that someone I don't know who [laughs]-who he is. Maybe he is Buddha, and we don't think he is Buddha even. That is actual nothingness, you know. Nothingness is not somewhere else. Right here. When we do something, there is actual nothingness. And when you-we are able to continue this kind of activity, more or less, that is Buddhist practice in our everyday life.

Student Q: Does that ever happen while you are talking, say [laughter]-

Suzuki-roshi: What did you say?

Student Q: -or only in activities that are like physical, or like the oryoki or rock-moving? Could it happen in-in talking.

Suzuki-roshi: Can it happened.

Student Q: -while talking or-.

Student R: Can-can it happen while talking?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student R: Can it happen while talking?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, it happens. Whatever it is, if you can do that [laughs, laughter]. It looks like very difficult, but zazen practice will, you know, will give you some proof, you know, if that is possible or not. Oh.

Student B: Roshi, does-does that mean-just to get really straight on this-that for all of us, we should all count our breathing for 40 minutes [laughter] during zazen?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student B: That we should all count-all of the students that follow your way-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: -should count their breathing for 40 minutes during zazen?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. [Laughter.] They have to try. If that is not possible, you should figure out why: because of want of sleep, or [laughs] because of your physical posture. You will find out many things. Then you should correct [them], you know, one by one, so that you can do it. So it does not mean if you cannot do that you should, you know, you should be expelled from Tassajara. It does not mean that. So I want you to understand through counting-breathing practice, many-what is actual practice of zazen. That is the main point.

Student S: Is it possible to experience emptiness other than through form?

Suzuki-roshi: There is only one way. There is no other way.

Student S: There's-there's no experience where one-where one perceives emptiness rather than just-just being involved in activity? I mean, if-if one is involved in activity, you said that's emptiness. That is nothing-nothingness. Is-is-is that the-is there another experience where one experiences emptiness as emptiness rather than emptiness through form?

Suzuki-roshi: Emptiness through form-or through some idea-aid, you know?

Student S: Pardon?

Suzuki-roshi: By some aid, or-?

Student S: Well, some special experience [laughs, laughter]. So we-I mean, I've been confused about the idea-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student S: -of enlightenment.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, maybe so. [Laughter.] "One with something" is very, you know, very imperfect, you know, way of putting it.

First of all, you know, before we figure out what does it mean, we should practice zazen, you know. We should be completely involved in zazen practice, you know, or else you will have many various misunderstanding. And as long as you are here, you should follow our everyday life. And you should recite sutra in certain form, and you should bow with some instruction, and, you know, with some certain way. That is the shortcut to understand what does it mean. If we-I try to explain it, you know, we will-I will cause you various misunderstanding. That is why we practice our way in this kind of a way. Hai.

Student T: Roshi, it seems like zazen is more difficult when you're not sitting on a cushion. I mean, I work in the kitchen, and I clean vegetables or something. And all of a sudden I become aware of the fact that I haven't been "just cutting" vegetables at all. I was thinking all the time-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student T: -thinking, and so [?], you know, [I say to myself] "Shut up."

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Yeah.

Student T: Fine, you know [?]. And the more I thought to shut up, the more-the more it just was-it's more noisy. And I get, you know, really grouchy.

Suzuki-roshi: You feel what?

Student T: I feel grouchy.

Suzuki-roshi: Grouchy. Ah. Yeah. You should come back to our practice, you know, when you realize-when you notice that you are not practicing.

Student T: But it seems like the more-the more that-the more that I'm trying [to] make it be quiet, the more it's noisy-the more difficult it becomes. But then if I'm not aware of it, then nothing happens.

Suzuki-roshi: The more you [are] quiet, you find it more difficult?

Student T: No. The more-if I don't notice it, then it's easy. I'm not working on anything.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student T: And I don't feel grouchy. But I'm not working.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] You should try to work, you know, and you should, you know-you should try to keep yourself on track.

Student U: She's saying the harder she tries, the crookeder the track gets, though.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. No, I don't think so. Even so, you should try to keep yourself on track [laughter].

Student U: Of course, but-Suzuki-roshi: If you don't, you know, you don't know where you are going. So [laughs]-so there is no way to-to practice our way.

Student T: Well, what-what I'm asking is that-is that effort directed in the right direction, because it seems that-it seems that what-what you're doing seems to me-seems to make [2-3 words]-

Suzuki-roshi: If you-if you are cutting something, you know, you should be-you should be cutting. That's what I'm saying.

Student T: But if-if you're thinking, what do you do about thinking. Do you try and stop thinking, or do you [1-2 words]?

Suzuki-roshi: Thinking-if you are thinking some other things, you should stop thinking and you should cut [laughs, laughter]. You know, that is like-that is why I advise you to practice zazen, you know. This is easier.

Student T: Yeah, I know. That's the only thing that makes me feel better.

Suzuki-roshi: Much easier. And if you-the more you get accustomed to, you know, zazen practice, naturally you can do it without-without not much effort. So it is better to practice zazen rather than to apply the weak practice [laughs] to your everyday life. So first of all, you have strong, you know, power of practice. Then you can do things quite easily. You can read well, you can think better, you can act better. Do you agree?

Student T: Mm-hmm.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Okay. Hai.

Student V: Roshi, my back is sore all the time. I feel that in zazen I should be relaxed, but there's a tension. I try to keep my back straight, and my muscles get very tense up and down my spine. And I-I've tried several ways of sitting lower or sitting higher, but it still seems to hurt quite a bit, and I-I don't feel relaxed. My zazen is very rarely relaxed because I am always trying to keep my back straight. But when I just relax, then [laughs] I fall over.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Yeah.

Student V: Is-is there any way, or does a way develop to keep your back straight without tension?

Suzuki-roshi: More easily? You can do it quite easily if you are-how long have you been sitting?

Student V: About three years.

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe not enough, you know [laughter]. You know, some kind of effort is always necessary, you know. As I am 65 years old, you know, my back tend to be like this [gestures].[9] And my mother was like this [laughs, laughter], and so I-I have to make always some effort to keep my back straight. It is not-I don't feel so bad, you know. I rather feel better. But I am trying always keeping-to keep my back straight.

This kind of, you know, effort is always necessary. You know, sometime you will be sleepy, you know, and you cannot practice zazen as if you are lying in bed [laughs]. Some-some effort, which will help you-encourage your practice, is necessary. If there is no difficulty in your practice at all, I don't think you can practice zazen. Like counting breathing, you know: you may easily lost your [laughs] number. Then you-you will [think], "Oh, I lost. So [laughing] next time I must-I-I must not lose my counting." So you will, you know, make some effort to-to continue counting.

That kind of effort, you know, will encourage your practice. And if you-if you feel, "This is good practice" or "That [is] bad practice," that is not our way. Whatever happen to our practice, you should accept as a part of your practice. And you should continue to practice.

Anyway, you know, if you think you will attain something which is beyond, you know, our-excuse me-which is beyond our reach, or, you know, which is beyond-completely different from our everyday life, you know, that is wrong understanding. In our everyday life there must be our way.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (1/8/01).

[1] Text in brackets was added by the original transcriber. Earlier S.R. in this lecture had said "one or two days," not one month. This return to Eihei-ji is described in Crooked Cucumber, pp. 74-75.

[2] That is, he is asking SR to continue.

[3] Text in brackets was added by the original transcriber. [Mike noise obscures student's voice.]

[4] Text in brackets was added by the original transcriber.

[5] makyo: Hallucinations or delusions.

[6] SR-69-08-25.

[7] wato (Jap.): a single koan given by a teacher to a student; a subject; a koan.

[8] oryoki: Buddha's eating bowl. The meaning of the word has been extended to include the entire set of eating bowls and utensils, wrapped in a cloth, with which Zen monks eat their meals. The procedure for unwrapping the bowls, eating from them, cleaning, and re-wrapping them has been formalized, and, in the zendo, this ceremony is performed in unison by all of the monks at mealtime. The Japanese tea ceremony grew out of the use of the oryoki in monasteries. [Footnote by the original transcriber.]

[9] Original transcript said "slouched forward."

1969 september (8)

1 - Interviews with Peter Schneider

Monday, September 01, 1969

Interviews with Peter Schneider
Interview With Shunryu Suzuki about his life in Japan

by Peter Schneider

[In the fall of 1969 Peter Schneider interviewed a reluctant Shunryu Suzuki about his past. There are two tapes made at two different times but only a few days apart. There's another one (or maybe that's the second one--I'm not sure--I have to piece it all together) which was made during a lecture done on the evening of one of these interviews. I have all sorts of versions of these interviews and frankly, I don't have the time to sort it all out right now. This file was labeled SR-PS.JP3, or the third editing of parts of Peter Schneider's interviews with Suzuki-roshi that pertained to Suzuki's life in Japan. This includes the lecture Suzuki gave or at least part of it because I remember that that's where Suzuki talked about Miss Ransom as "my old, old girlfriend." The way he said it, it brought forth gales of laughter from the audience (not an unusual occurrence when he spoke--and it's things like this he said that led some very few to wonder if they were lovers. I seemed to have conveyed this nuance in my book because Don Latin, the SF Chronicle reviewer indicated that he'd picked that up--and this led to a certain amount of upset and some letter to the Chron. I don't think so, but who knows.). I have so many files representing so many different versions of all this that it will take me some time to get it down in an archive that shows the original version and subsequent useful editions. I have to erase a lot of my files. I had to edit things along the way to be able to use them and to work on them. The originals are, at times, not so clear and are more boring, so for now I go to the best edited version that I used. I spent hours and hours and hours and hours and hours going over these interviews and things he said in his lectures and what I remembered and other peoples' memories and what people in Japan remembered and really, Crooked Cucumber represents an enormous amount of effort to get at the crux of it. I think that this archive of the interviews should show the raw materials that were used AND my interpretations, but it will take me time to organize it all and I'll need help from people like Richard Speel and Jamie Avera and LezaLowitz (who are all helping me now) to get it organized so that it's usefully presented. I don't want to spend a zillion years on it again but I do want to leave it in a form that others can understand what's raw material and how I came to what I came to. Some of the information in here might differ from what I said in the book but that may be because Suzuki forgot and subsequent research cleared that up or because I couldn't understand at that time. I just went over it and I see there's lots of stuff that was figured out and fixed later so don't take anything Japanese or Buddhist as the gospel truth or even the right words or spelling. Anyway, it's an interesting interview and mostly it's correct and shows what he said and how he felt without a lot of the hemming and hawing. -D.C.]

PETER SCHNEIDER INTERVIEWS SUZUKI-ROSHI

ABOUT HIS LIFE IN JAPAN

BASIC

Date at time of filing out: 1969

Name in Full: Shunryu Suzuki [other 1st name? Toshi [boyhood name-- Toshitaka, the kunyomi or Japanized reading of Shunryu, the onyomi, or Chinese reading].

Date of Birth: May 18, 1904 (age at time of filling out - 65)

Family Relation: First son of Sogaku Suzuki [others?]

Permanent Domicile: 1400 Sakamoto, Yaizu-shi, Shizuoka-ken, Japan.

Present Address: 1881 Bush Street, San Francisco, California (Soto Zen Temple - Sokoji)

--

EARLY YEARS

My teacher, Gyokujun So-on Suzuki, was my father's disciple. He had the same family name as my father, Suzuki, and it was not just coincidence. He had been adopted by my father. He was my uncle, but not a real one. I had tokudo, he ordained me, on my thirteenth birthday, May 18, 1917 at Zoun-in, Morimachi, Shizuoka-ken. I lived there until 1924 when I went to Tokyo to complete high school.

When I was young, even from my boyhood, I wasn't satisfied with Buddhist life for many reasons. So I wanted to be a good teacher when I was very young and I wanted to look for a good teacher for there were so many people who did not respect priests so much. At that time my ambition was directed to some narrow attainment, but, anyway, I made up my mind to leave my home and to practice under a strict teacher. So I went to my master's temple. My master was a disciple of my father and my father when he was young was very strict with his disciples. My master was one of my father's disciples who was raised up in a very strict way, and my master was always talking about my father's strictness with him and that was hardest thing for me to accept.

My master would always bring up my father. "Your father, you know, raised me in this way." That was very hard to listen to. So naturally, this kind of spirit I had all the way until I became maybe thirty or more. After my master's death I didn't feel it so much and that kind of feeling changed into the opposite way and I missed my master very much.

--

Peter: Looking at your history, it looks pretty ordinary. Is it ordinary sort of Zen teacher's history?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe so. Not so ordinary. I say priests in my age had it pretty hard. If I told you all about it in detail it would seem very noble.

Peter: Oh, ho. That's what we never hear.

Suzuki-roshi: What I did was actually not so different for back then. But nowadays a priest who is brought up in a family temple succeeds to his father's position, that's all, you know. But my age was thirteen when I left my father's temple.

Peter: Why did you leave your father's temple?

Suzuki-roshi: My father took care of me too well, so here in my heart I always felt some family feeling. Some emotional feeling, too much emotion, too much love. And my teacher at grammar school told me this kind of thing. He always said to me, to us, "You should be ..."

[Did he ever talk about his father or mother? Or Gyokujun Soon?]

--

EDUCATION

Peter: You graduated from college at 26 - pretty old for that.

Why did you start school so late?

Suzuki-roshi: Because I was with my teacher from the time I was thirteen: cooking, serving, and so on. I hadn't finished middle school or high school. I only finished grammar school. And I was studying, of course, in the temple so I could enter the last years of high school which at that time went for five years. I only took the fourth grade and fifth grade of high school, from 1924 to 1926, staying till I was twenty-one. [where did he live while doing these last two years of high school - name of school, location?]

--

SHUSO CEREMONY

Shunryu was (head monk) Shuso-risshion[sp?] (risshion - standing body) from Nov 15, 1925 to Feb 18, 1926, at Kenko-in, in Shizuoka City, during a full practice period under Dojun Kato-roshi. A note on his curriculum vitae says at that point the other priests stopped considering him a boy. He became their new young friend. He was 21 years old at the time.

Twenty is the traditional age to enter adulthood. Maybe for priests at that time, the shuso ceremony marked a young monk's passage into adulthood. This is also the period when he was finishing up his last year of high school. Being shuso outside of the hard-core training temples like Eiheiji is usually largely formality. Shunryu made a point that this was more than that, and he did go to a special temple to be shuso, but still he was surely quite busy with his studies.

Kenko-in was technically a training monastery, but actually there were not many students. Just a few. But when Shunryu had his shuso ceremony more priests and monks came to join the ceremony and the practice.

--

DHARMA TRANSMISSION

Just before entering Komazawa University, six months after his shuso ceremony, on Aug. 21, 1926, at the age of 22, Shunryu received dharma transmission [ Japanese word -shiho] from Soon Suzuki-roshi in a private ceremony at Rinso-in. According to a traditional way of looking at dharma transmission [probably Kobun wrote this part], in the Dharma Transmission Ceremony, the teacher's robe is handed down to the disciple from his dharma master. The Zen master considers his disciple as a Zen Master, Tathagata knows Tathagata, Buddha meets Buddha.

But in Japanese Soto Zen, the initial transmission ceremony is merely the first of many steps toward being considered a truly independent priest. Shunryu received dharma transmission at this point, so he could become head of Zoun-in because Soon was too busy to take care of it anymore with all of his responsibilities at Rinso-in, but it was important to keep it in the lineage. Shunryu was still in the university, and his father had retired to Zoun-in, which had originally been his temple and which he regretted he'd left at all. Shunryu said that this transmission was just a formality. "At that time my master wanted me to be successor of his former temple. Although my practice was not good enough, he wanted me to take it over. Before he came to Rinso-in he was head priest of Zoun-in where my father had also been previously." So at that time [August 21 of 1926] he became the [what? - priest?

Chief priest is 1929] of Zoun-in where he'd had his early training with Soon, and his retired father Sogaku actually officiated as priest. Arrangements like this are quiet common.

"Officially I was supposed to receive transmission here (thumping) [1926], but actually I haven't. It was a just a formality."

Peter: How do you mean you haven't?

Suzuki-roshi: Just because, you know, to get an acknowledgement from headquarters we submitted this (thumping), my master submitted this [1926].

Peter: So you could have a robe for Eiheiji or what?

Suzuki-roshi: I didn't wear it - this is just a formality - what do you say? - for the record. I have this record at our headquarters, but actually I changed my robe [at another time - at the Ten'e.

Peter: Oh, there - I see, I see. [1929]

Suzuki-roshi: If I didn't have this record I couldn't have taken over my master's former temple[1926]. At that time I couldn't actually take over his position so my father did my job there while I was studying at Komazawa University.

Peter: So that transmission does not make you Zen master then? That just makes you osho?

Suzuki-roshi: Osho.

--

MRS. RANSOM SR1

Interpreter for Miss N. Ransom from Aug 1, 1927 to May 30, 1929.

(Roshi is very grateful for this job - this training helped him a lot) (When Roshi was at university he lived in one room of her home with 2 other boys - he was the best to help her and she became earnest Buddhist.)

Mrs. Ransom was teaching at Komazawa University when I first saw her. I took her English (and) conversation class once a week. At that time I didn't have much of a relationship with her, but after I finished the preparatory courses of the University and specialized in Buddhist courses, I was still interested in studying English, so once in a while I attended her classes (lecture - some other course and English course). Then one day during summer vacation I was (on my way home) but it was so hot I just wanted to get out of the heat and I was near her place so I went to the back door and called her. She was quite gracious and invited me inside to a sitting room near the kitchen. She asked if I would like something to drink and I asked for water but she brought (us) something different, watermelon. So while we were eating watermelon she asked me if I would like to help her, in shopping, or such things like that, as she had some difficulty in communicating with Japanese people, especially some of them. At that time two students from Komazawa were working for her, helping her already, so I thought she may not need me, but she said one boy would be leaving quite soon so she wanted me to take his place. From that point on, our relationship became much closer.

Mrs. Ransom had been a tutor to Emperor Sento of China. Yoshida who became prime minister of Japan invited her and her parents [mistake-DC] to Japan. It seems her father was quite famous though I don't know who he was or why he was famous. As far as I know he was as famous as General Toho who defeated the Russian fleet in the Japan Sea. [I think SR is off here.-DC]

She was quite strict and stubborn and she tried to force her English ways on us and on Japanese people in general. And she always had some complaint - mostly what I had to do was listen to her complaints.

I stayed with her, living in her house, for a year and a half. I had many difficulties, but anyway I stayed there. At last I left her, not because of any difficulty between us but because I felt that if I continued I might not remain a priest. This was brought home to me one day when I visited the Turkish Embassy. I was doing some business for Mrs. Ransom with an assistant to the ambassador and we were speaking in English. While we were talking I looked at him. Maybe someday I shall be like you, I said to him in my head. I scared myself. If I stay with Mrs. Ransom for two or three more years, Will I become an ambassador? I wondered, and not a priest? So I left her and moved back into the dormitory.

She was not a Buddhist when I met her, but she had a beautiful sitting Buddha about one feet tall which she had put in the tokonoma where we usually keep a scroll and flower arrangement. But she kept a Buddha there. That's okay, but she also put her shoes with the Buddha, side by side. I was not so concerned about those things, especially when because she was not Buddhist, but I guess it did cause me some problem, (lots of coughing) so I decided to change her way. So everyday I offered a cup of tea to Buddha and she was very much amused. She had many guests over - so she started to tease me about my offering by putting a toothpick into Buddha's hand. Then she put some matches. I think it was her. She didn't do it in front of me. Maybe one of her guests did it because she told them, "He is a very naughty boy to put tea before the Buddha." To her it was a form of idol worship so she made fun of me.

A month or so passed and I didn't stop and neither did she. She continuously teased me, but I ignored whatever she or her friends did. I didn't take off the toothpicks or matches. But I thought, there will be some chance for me to explain what Buddha is, what Buddhism is. In my spare time, I studied hard how to explain this in English. I made a special vocabulary list. And at last she asked me one day about why we worship Buddha. So I told her about Buddha and Buddhahood and she was amazed. It was not what she had in mind, you know. And ever since then she didn't tease me anymore and she started to try to understand what Buddhism actually was and what is our practice and she became a Buddhist. She asked me to buy some incense for her, incense and some other things too - a small bell and a candle, as I told her these kind of things are necessary.

That gave me some confidence in the possibility of Caucasians' understanding Buddhism. They understand quite easily, I thought, what Buddhism is. They may like Buddhism. So maybe for the first time I got the idea to go abroad or at least to Hokkaido where I would have a chance to speak to Caucasians or at least foreigners who don't know what Buddhism is.

--

MRS. RANSOM SR3

I must tell you she was my old, old girlfriend. When I was at college I studied English pretty hard to go abroad. I had no idea of America or Hawaii or anywhere. Anyway, if I am going to some country, I thought, I have to speak English and so I studied English pretty hard when I was a student. When I was at Komazawa University, Miss Ransom was teacher of conversation. Once a week Miss Ransom taught us conversation and after I finished her class I attended more English courses. Meantime Miss Ransom found me and asked me to help her in shopping or when some Japanese came or when she had some private students. Of course, I couldn't help her so well, but I tried pretty hard and, at last, she asked me to stay at her home with two more students who were helping her in shopping and conversation with Japanese people. But the other students, Kundo and I forgot the other student's name, Kundo was student of Komazawa and one more student was from Bundikadaima before that school was a normal high school and changed their system and became a university. Both Kundo and the other student were also studying English, but eventually they left Miss Ransom's home. Then I was only one student who helped her and in the meantime there were many interesting things that happened between Mrs. Ransom and me. Don't be so inquisitive.

Before she came to Japan she was a tutor of the last emperor of China, Emperor Sento, Emperor of Manchuria. At that time Japan became more and more ambitious, trying for some chance to fight with that northern part of China. Emperor Sento's [that's the Japanese for PuYi, the Last Emperor of China] capitol was in - I don't know what is the name of the city right now - at that time it was Choshun. And when the Emperor was there she was the tutor of the Emperor. And she is a daughter of a very famous naval general whose name I forget.

She was a very strict character, and at the same time she always complained about Japanese people: about what kinds of things happened at school, and what kinds of things happened in the car. She was always complaining about Japan. I was the only person who listened to her complaints. But I also had many complaints with her.

For instance, she had a beautiful sitting Buddha as big as this (a foot high) which was given to her by the Emperor. She put it in the tokonoma, which is alright, but she'd put her shoes beside the Buddha. A tokonoma is a place where we put some antiques, scrolls, or some valuable things, objects of worship [respect] or something like that. But she used to put her shoes there as soon as she came back from school. That was very embarrassing to me. I didn't say anything but I offered tea every morning in a small cup, lifting it above my eyes and putting it in front of Buddha. She started to be amused by me but she didn't ask anything. And I didn't say anything about it or about her shoes. Maybe this kind of silent cold war lasted for two or three weeks and I was waiting for a chance to start a hot war. As my English wasn't so good I had to study pretty hard preparing for the chance to speak and I studied some important words to speak about it. When one of her friends visited her they were talking about funny things about me. He's a very strange Buddhist, offering tea to that wooden figure, sometimes offering incense. They were talking about it. I could understand them. And she had a friend who put matches in the Buddha's mudra - sometimes matches and sometimes cigarettes. Still, the hot war didn't start.

And, at last, I don't know how the hot war started, but she asked me about the Buddha figure. She thought Buddhism was a kind of idol worship. So I explained it as best I could. It was very difficult, but I managed to explain why we pay respect to a wooden image of Buddha and I explained what the real Buddha is. Maybe I told her about the Dharmakaya, Sambogakaya, and Nirmanakaya Buddha.

She was rather amazed. She didn't know Buddhism was so profound. And she started to become interested in Buddhism and soon she converted to Buddhism. And she started to study Buddhism - there were many professors of Buddhism at Komazawa and some who could speak English. So in one year she had a pretty good understanding of Buddhism. One day she took me downtown to buy some incense and an incense bowl and she took it home and started to offer incense to the Buddha. I taught her how to keep her tokonoma clean and she started to keep her shoes in the entryway where they belong.

I felt very good. I developed then some confidence in our teaching, in Buddhism, and also confidence that I could make Caucasian people understand Buddhism. And I thought that for Caucasians, Buddha's teaching might even be more suitable than for Japanese. For Japanese to study Buddhism in its true sense is pretty difficult because they have so much mistaken tradition and misunderstanding of Buddhism and it is difficult for people to change their misunderstanding once they have the wrong idea of Buddhism. But for Caucasians who don't know anything about Buddhism, it's like painting on white paper, it is much easier to give the right understanding of true Buddhism. I think that the experience I had with Miss Ransom resulted in my coming to America.

As soon as I finished my schooling I asked my teacher, my master, Gyokujun Soon, if I could go to America or Hawaii or someplace, if I could go abroad anywhere. He became furious and he wouldn't allow me to go, so I couldn't go to America and I gave up my notion of coming to America for a long long time so that I forgot all about it. I told my master about my experience with Mrs. Ransom and suggested I go abroad to teach Buddhism. I said, America and he said, "No." So I asked about Hokkaido and he said, "No." I kept bringing it up and at last he became very angry and yelled at me that I should stay here. But he just used one word. He just said, "Here!" So I gave up my notion of going abroad. I completely gave up my idea of going to America. Several times after that I had a chance to go to America but I refused. But ten years ago, at last, I came to America. In 1954 - no, my age at that time was 54 - it was 1958, after I had finished doing what my teacher told me to do, I decided to go to America. So there is some truth that being with Mrs. Ransom was actually the turning point of life. My idea was of going abroad was always in my heart even though I gave up. I thought I had given up, but I hadn't.

Fifteen years ago [1954] actually I had a chance to come to America, but I didn't because I hadn't finished fixing the main building of Rinso-in, which was my duty left to me by my master. I thought I had to finish his instructions first, so I didn't come to America at that time. And then five or six years later I had a second chance to come to America and I decided to do it. It was pretty hard, but anyway I managed to come to America.

--

One day she told me to buy some daffodil bulbs. I bought some pretty big one for her but she wasn't satisfied. "Oh, these are too small. Get me some big ones." So I tried to find the best daffodils in Tokyo, at least in the Shibuya district. I visited several florists and I got the largest bulbs I could find, but she wasn't satisfied with them. That made me very angry. After a while I went out and did some more shopping. "Here, I got some very big ones. Here they are," I told her when I came back, and I left her room, carefully watching her to see what happened. She opened the bag up and saw the big bulbs I had gotten her. "Oh, these are very good!" she said and started to smell it. I felt very good, but at the same time scared of her so I ran away. "Oh, these are onions!" she shouted and started looking around for me, but I wasn't there. I knew she didn't like onions at all. I couldn't help to bursting into laughter so she found me and with the onions in her hands she started to chase after me. So I went upstairs to the second floor and from the second floor to the roof where I hid. That kind of thing happened many times.

I had to come back to her home before ten o'clock, but it was rather difficult to always get back before ten. So when I was late I knew how to open the door. Japanese doors, you know, are sliding doors. The lock is between the two sliding doors, it's like a nail that goes down a slot to hold them together. So it is not possible to open them in the usual way, but if you lift the two doors it is quite easy to take them out. In this way I sneaked into my bedroom late and slept. But one night she heard me and saw what I was doing and she didn't trust me any more after that and she didn't trust the safety of the Japanese building any more. She determined to move out from that house and I was told to find her some good, safe building, which was almost impossible. Almost all buildings then were Japanese buildings. If it were a Western building we would have to pay a lot of money. So I gave up looking for that kind of safe building. But it was good for me to have some reason to get out. Sometimes I went to the barber shop and sometimes I went to visit some friends instead of finding some good apartment for her. At last I decided to ask a skilled old carpenter to explain how to make Japanese buildings safe from thieves and how to fix the lock so no one could get in. And together we convinced her not to move out.

As she was an English women, she wouldn't throw away knives when they got old. She had some old knives and asked me to go get them polished [sharpen?]. Maybe they do that in England but in Japan no one polishes knives for anyone else. If she'd had a carpenter or a gardener, they may have done it, but she wanted me to get it polished immediately. That was a big problem for me. She said, "In England if you go to a department store you can get knives polished immediately, so go to Mitsukochi and get them polished." Her idea that someone in a Japanese store was going to polish her knives was ridiculous. One was a pretty beautiful good knife, but even so no one would polish it in a store. "Oh, this is old," they may say. "This is very old. Why don't you get a new one."

The wooden covers of traditional Japanese bathes get rotten easily, so she asked me to go get her a lid only, but that was also difficult. Unless we buy the whole thing they won't do business. They won't sell the wooden lid to the tub by itself. I think the English way may be quite different from the American way. [because she couldn't adjust to different customs].

--

SHINSANSHIKI AT ZOUN-IN

On Jan. 22, 1929, Shunryu had his shinsanshiki at Zoun-in, Morimachi, Shizuoka-ken] and officially became the head priest.

"I had Zoun-in for ten years but for five years I actually ran it. Even after I became head priest of Rinso-in, I took care of Zoun-in. I had two temples for five years." (1934-1939?)

Again Peter asked him if this is where he became a Zen master and he said just for ceremonies.

--

TEN'E

On January 14, 1930 in a public ceremony, Shunryu received Ten'e, had that ceremony, and got another Okesa. In his curriculum vitae it's described as a "public determination" and consent from the Soto-shu." In this case, when the robe is handed down, his name is listed by headquarters as one who can become chief priest of a temple. After this ceremony he went to Eiheiji to "meet" with Dogen Zenji and to Sojiji to "meet" with Keizan Zenji (founder of Sojiji temple) for "a beautiful ceremony that lasted two days - to go to vow to be a good teacher - after this ceremony he is Zen master and can teach anywhere and have a temple." That is Kobun's description I bet, because Shunryu said it was still short of being considered a Zen master, or roshi. He got Ten'e just three months before graduation from Komazawa. Shunryu said that Ten'e means "to go to, to change off."

--

My schooling was a very late one. I graduated from Komazawa University in Buddhist and Zen Philosophy. at the age of 26 on April 10, 1930.

From Sep 17, 1930 to Sep 2, 1931: Head temple Dai Honzan (Big root mountain), Eiheiji Temple

From Sep 18, 1931 to Mar 31, 1932: Daihonzan, Sojiji Temple

--

After I finished my schooling I went to Eiheiji and Mrs. Ransom came to Eiheiji and stayed for one month sitting there and practicing pretty well. Two years later I went to Kasuisai Monastery. At that time she came to Kasuisai and stayed for one month and then she went to China again, Tenshin, near Peking. And after that she went to England. Once in a while I wrote to her and she wrote to me, but since I've come to America I haven't written so often. She wanted to write something about me, about various experience we had between us and she asked me to keep some dates or events, but that was too much. So since then

I haven't written to her because it was too much. Whenever I wrote to her she asked me many things which were almost impossible to write her back about, so I didn't and she may have become very angry. At that time Petchey was in England and he started Zen group at her home. So whenever Petchey went to her home he was the one who listened to her complaints. I know her very well, you know. Even though she complains it's not necessarily so bad. I thought it may be alright not to write her, but that was my mistake. She passed away last year before I wrote to her. I trusted her very much and she trusted me so much, so I thought whether I wrote to her or not didn't make much difference - but I don't know. As long as she was alive it was alright. Now I regret a little bit about my not writing to her.

Anyway I think she was a good Buddhist. After she went to Tenshin she sent me a picture of the same Buddha who got into trouble between us. She enshrined the Buddha in the wall where there was an alcove and she said she was offering incense every day.

--

KISHIZAWA-ROSHI

I studied with Ian Kishizawa-roshi from March 1, 1932 to June 30, 1952. He was considered one of the most excellent Zen Masters at that time in Japan. He was my first teacher's friend.

--

KOSHI

From May 7, 1932 to Apr 31, 1936, Shunryu was Koshi at BanshoZenrin, Kasuisai, at Fukuroi, Shizuoka-ken. "Koshi means 'someone to give lectures.' Bansho - this is Kasuisai temple where the head of the Soto school, Takashina-roshi, lived. Later Takashina became the abbot of Eiheiji and Sojiji and head of the Soto-shu." Shunryu didn't live at Kasuisai, but just visited to give lectures. At that time he was doing it for Soon-roshi because the responsibility of koshi at BanshoZenrin was traditionally the responsibility of the abbot of Rinso-in.

--

SHINSANSHIKI ATRINSO-IN

"My master died in 1934. At that time I was too young. I was maybe about 31 or something like that. He died in 1934 or 1935. I don't know by your counting."

On Apr 23, 1936, after two years of struggle, Shunryu had the shinsanshiki at Rinso-in Temple, 1400 Sakamoto, Yaizu-shi, Shizuokaken.

According to notes on the Curriculum Vitae, he took the temple to prevent a greedy and ambitious faction from coming to power, to protect the Soto school and the danka of Rinso-in. Some families of the congregation resigned. Roshi said, "Don't criticize, wait two years - and they all came back."

"So there was a long period of confusion. Some danka supported me, saying, 'Even though he's young, it's all right.' Others said, 'No,' and in this way for two years no one succeeded my master. At last I became the head of Rinso-in.

--

WHEN ZEN MASTER 4

Peter: Did that mean that you were a Zen master? Did that make you a Zen master technically?

Suzuki-roshi: No. I don't think so.

Peter: When did you become a Zen master?

--

MORE ON RINSO-IN

Suzuki-roshi: At that time under my temple there were many famous teachers, roshi. Kishizawa-roshi would come to my temple and sometimes he would sit for a while without telling me and I didn't know he was there. There were many famous teachers. That is (cough) why I couldn't take over my (cough) master's seat (cough). Actually I didn't want to, to be the head of Rinso-in while I was so young. I didn't say so, but in my heart I felt so. My boy is in the same position so I'm very sympathetic with him. So I rather wanted him to come to America. Maybe that was too much after I'd left my temple. If my boy had left my temple they would be very furious.

--

TROUBLE AT RINSO-IN

Before I took over my master's temple, I didn't cause any trouble. I was just trying to study, but after I took over my master's temple I caused various problems for myself and for others - there was some confusion in my life. There was a lot of confusion. I knew that if I didn't take over his temple, Rinso-in, I would have to remain at Zoun-in. That would be more calm, and I would be able to study more, but because I felt some resistance from the priests near Rinso-in, I determined to take it over.

And there were two years of confusion and fighting.

The priests near Rinso-in had someone in their mind to be the head priest of Rinso-in, and that man would have been acting under their name, which would not have been so good for the danka or for the Soto school. There was too much greed for fame - they were divided in many ways (cliques), and each one of them had his own ambition, but if they did not get Rinso-in they would keep acting in the same way until they got it. But after they got Rinso-in, things would get confused. I knew that pretty well. So I determined to stop them. [Rinso-in had been turned over to Gyokujun Soon to get into shape physically and harmonically because the prior priest had fudged it up so they removed him and put Soon in and so Shunryu felt some responsibility to continue the job that had been given to Soon.]

I had a very difficult time for two years. Extraordinary things happened. Eighty of my Rinso-in members left from Rinso-in and went to another temple. That was alright with me, but others accused me of being responsible and said, "If Rinso-in is such a poor example of a temple, how will we be able to restore harmony? It is your responsibility to do so. Why did you let them to go to some other temple? If you say, 'I am sorry,' or if you ask for help we will get it, but if you don't say 'I am sorry' or ask for help, how can we help you."

Once a month we had a meeting and every time they said I had abdicated my responsibility. But I said, "just wait for two [3?] years. In two years if the eighty members who left don't come back, I will resign from Rinso-in. So let's just wait - without criticizing me for two years. Give me two years and let's see what happens. So they agreed to do that. And in two years almost all of the danka who had left came back.

The priest who was trying to take Rinso-in got his own temple, so he lost his ambition for Rinso-in. And actually, he himself did not want to be a head priest of Rinso-in so much. It was more the ambitious people around him, mostly priests and some influential lay people.

--

DHARMA HEIRS

"After I moved to Rinso-in, my older dharma brother helped me at Zoun-in and lived there. He succeeded me in the chief priest position there. His name was Okamoto. His boy is my son, my disciple, because he studied with me. My first dharma heir in Japan is my own son, Hoitsu, and Shoko, Okamoto Kendo's son, is the 2nd."

--

FIRST MARRIAGE [actually, the second]

"I wasn't married when I entered Rinso-in. And there was much discussion by members about whether I should get married or not. I was listening to them and they went to some extremes. Like if I married, some people wouldn't want family life at my temple so my wife could stay at their home and I could go visit whenever I want. That was too extreme. For awhile, not for a long time, my master's wife lived at Rinso-in. [name?] When he was quite old she stayed there. We established some custom. My master started something like that. But some opposed it, especially because I was so young, some people were critical of me wishing to have a wife in the temple. Someone said, if I get married, my wife could stay at 'my home' - if the people don't like temple life at my temple 'she can stay my home.' That was what someone said. At last they decided to allow my wife to enter my temple. We were married two years after Soon died, when I was 33 or 34, no, 31 or 32." It was in 1936. It was about six months after he became the abbot of Rinso-in. [Her name was Chie Muramatsu]

Peter: It says here, you said that a friend of your master picked your first wife. What does that mean? Did you have some choice?

Suzuki-roshi: No. I had no one in my mind and I wasn't so sure about my married side, my ability to handle both priest's side and a family side. It is very complicated, you know. I know that pretty well. So I was not firm, but I was reluctant to take a wife. I had no one in my mind to be a wife, but my master's friend thought it necessary for me to get one.

Peter: So you said yes?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Before I saw her, I said yes. At that time he had somebody in mind.

Peter: Does that usually work out pretty well, Roshi, when you don't see the woman before you marry?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, pretty well. It's amazing maybe for you. Although we do or don't like her, they are, I think, pretty superficial feelings, not so different, and they change a lot.

I had a family with her for more than 15 [16?] years. She died in 1951 (actually, 1952). My master's friend chose my wife.

--

LAY ORDINATION 1

In March of 1938 there was a lay ordination ceremony for young female Buddhists of Higashi-eki (Mashi or Masu?) ten-mura, Shita-gun, Shizuoka-ken.

--

WHEN ZEN MASTER 5

Peter: When did you become a Zen master?

Suzuki-roshi: I became - after I took my master's position. Often I had to conduct some big ceremony and whenever we had shuso ceremonies or training periods in branch temples, I had to join them, taking over my master's position. While I was doing this kind of thing they officially acknowledged me as a Zen master. I received a special robe.

Peter: How old were you then?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe I was 40, 45 or so. - [1944 to 1949]

--

BRANCH TEMPLES

Zoun-in is not a branch temple of Rinso-in. "In Shizuoka prefecture there is a big temple which has 3000 branch temples. And Zoun-in is a grandson of this temple. The big temple is Daito-in and under it there is Shoshinji and Zoun-in is a branch temple of Shoshinji. And Rinso-in and Takawazon are branch temples of Seikun-in. And both Seikun-in and Soshinji are branch temples of Daito-in.

(In margin: Sekiun-in. Bill says is funding temple)

--

Peter: I see. Okay. Now From 1936 until 1942 you just were at Rinso-in then.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Peter: This says from 1942 to 1947 you're the official teacher of the number 10th monastery of the Soto sect.

--

SHIKE

At the age of thirty-eight, from March 1, 1942 to March 31, 1947, Shunryu was Zen Teacher, shike (Official Director) (Daho) of Tokei-in which he or Kobun called "the 10th Monastery of the Soto sect - high." In answer to Peter's question he said that he formally became roshi but "only for ceremonies." Apparently it also had some connection to BanshoZenrin. He finally resigned because he was too busy - maybe at BanshoZenrin. Toke-in was a newly established temple at that time near Shizuoka.

--

WHEN ZEN MASTER 6

Suzuki-roshi: Because I was at that time already a master, a Roshi.

Peter: You were a roshi in 1942, then?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, already a roshi. Oh yeah. Because I finished building my temple completely and I attended, I acted as roshi so many times before that headquarters acknowledged me, gave me a title.

Peter: I see. In 1942?

Suzuki-roshi: On that occasion they -

Peter: - appointed you shike?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. At Tokei-in.

Suzuki-roshi: Joshike you know, it is not assistance, you know. It's a master, but not completely. What do you call? Not vice or assistant.

--

WAR YEARS

"I had young students in the thirties and forties who had the same feelings that I had. Like they did not participate in some mistaken thinking. But my youngest students, who were mostly in high school, were very kind, helped a lot, encouraged me a lot, and they, many of them, came to me because I had these feelings. Most of them were not priests but students. At that time Japan was involved in some kind of wrong idea about strength and power, some strange form, some strange pride or confidence, confidence in power, some strange idea of nationalism.

"What they said was very strange, you know. On television, in lectures, in various ways they tried to lead people in strange directions. And they didn't understand - they didn't try to understand the actual realistic situation or power of Japan. Although I didn't know anything about America or other countries, I thought I didn't know how powerful they are or how weak they all are, but I had some confidence in human nature and that human nature is the same wherever we go.

"So they called American people things like beasts or devils. I always said beasts or devils are not only American people. We have some need for these big beasts or demons and those who have that kind of idea about some other people may be our enemy or demon or devil. I always said that to them.

"And during the war they were afraid very much of American people who may land sooner or later in the Japan islands. But I was not so afraid of them. They are also human beings. Nothing will happen if we surrender. Those who don't want to surrender may die, and if they survive nothing will happen to them. But they burned their personal record or various records in city hall. They started to burn it down and they started to destroy the memorial tower, memorial tombstone of the unknown soldiers. But why do you do that? It is quite natural to have a memorial stone for the people who sacrificed their lives for their own country. There was nothing wrong with it. If we explain in that way why we have those tombstones, they may understand what our point of view is.

People were worried that if we have records in City Hall the Americans would search for each person to kill them or something - a very curious idea.

Peter: Were you ever criticized, Roshi, for your sort of pacifistic views?

Suzuki-roshi: I - Yeah, I was, but I didn't act officially. At my temple, in my lectures or when students came, I talked about this kind of thing always, and even when the war was almost finished. There still was some power or some courage to sacrifice their life for Japan. But I thought, that sacrifice is not for Japan, but for some wrong idea from someone in leadership who has a big misunderstanding.

And people were so afraid of what they had been doing, afraid to be responsible for it. They thought that if we still have still the tombstone for the unknown soldiers, showing them respect, then those who have been doing so will be punished or something. So no one wanted to take responsibility for that and they thought that if they destroyed it, that the American people would be pleased. So when they decided to destroy the big memorial stone for the unknown soldiers, I told them to carry it to my temple. I said to them I will protect it as long as I'm alive, and I will take all the responsibility for any American people who do any damage to this memorial stone.

--

"There were many farmers who went to Manchuria to start some farming village or something like that. And the world situation was very bad. When I left Japan it was just three months before the war ended. So no one accepted our headquarters plan or my appointment. So I thought I'll go anyway [maybe I may go] and I left Japan on May 14 for Manchuria. It took a pretty long time because our ship couldn't leave Hakata port because of danger from B-29 bombers. I stayed there one week waiting for the ship. There was always bombing going on. But anyway I got to Korea and through Korea went to Manchuria where I visited Japanese farmers in various places. I was not a chaplain in the Service. I just went as a priest.

[trying to get out - the Russians are coming] And when I reached to, in Japanese we say Harbin, the big city, capital city in Manchuria, they announced there were no ships bound for Japan - they had stopped - and I could hardly get back to Japan, but I thought there must be some transportation or some way to get back. Someone must be going to Japan, I thought, and if I wait at Pusan (a large Port in South Korea) I was quite sure I would have a chance to go back to Japan. So I took a steamboat from Manchuria to Korea but when I got there they also said there were no ships to Japan. They wouldn't even sell me a ticket to Japan, but I said I will pay for the ticket anyway. Whether it is available or not doesn't matter, so give me a ticket. And in the train we arrived at a small station in Korea, and the conductor announced that anyone going to Japan from Sanroshin [is this Pusan?] should get off. So I got off at that station. Sanroshin is a pretty big port created by the Chinese military, it's famous [to whom] as the port the Chinese launched from to attack Japan [when?]. As soon as I arrived at that port, a ship came, guarded by two cruisers. So I went back by a navy ship, not a battleship. They were collecting wounded soldiers and without making any zigzags we went straight back to Kyushu Island and arrived at an unknown small port near Hakata. I took the express train back to Yaizu. We were attacked several times from the air. It was July 15 and by August 15 everything was over.

--

ATOMIC BOMB

"I had no idea about the existence of the atomic bomb and how powerful it was. And when I heard of it I couldn't believe it, that it was so powerful, and that that kind of thing could happen. Most Japanese people, including me had no idea that it would happen. But most Japanese people had too much fear for their life when we lost the war. So in comparison to that atomic bomb their fears were not based on any reasonable cause. I think most of them must have thought we won't live so long, so maybe the atomic bomb is a good way to finish our life. They have no idea of righteousness, or humanity, or those problems are not their main concern. I thought - it may be very foolish for us not to surrender right now. If we surrender they will stop doing such things. So the best way may be to surrender. If they don't then it's all over, everything.

--

Peter: What happened when the Yaizu fishermen were killed by the atomic fallout?

Suzuki-roshi: Most of them, I think, accused the American people you know because of the viewpoint of righteousness, but that righteousness is very superficial righteousness. I think this kind of feeling is the feeling we have about the Okinawa problem. They talk about Okinawa in various way, but have no actual feeling in it. It is just a political game.

--

PEACE MARCH

Peter: Someone once said that you marched in a protest against something.

Suzuki-roshi: Um-hum.

Peter: What was that, Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: (long sigh)

Peter: When was that or what was that all about?

Suzuki-roshi: It was the time when Peace Corps - uh not Peace Corps -

Peter: Atomic submarine?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Peter: No, that's not it either probably. What was it Roshi? I don't want to force you.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Peter: Was it that? An atomic submarine or what?

Suzuki-roshi: Atomic submarine. At that time peace work, you know, and when the atomic submarine wanted to come to San Francisco and they had a big demonstration to express their strong desire against war. That is why I joined.

Peter: Someone mentioned that you once marched in a demonstration in Japan. Is that true?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, I did.

Peter: What was that for?

Suzuki-roshi: That was after the war finished you know. Before the war I had strong feelings against war. Before the government started some organization to organize civilians against America I organized young men in my area to have the right understanding of the situation of Japan at that time. We invited good people who actually participated in important activity in various areas of government and we would ask questions until we understood them. So later the government organized people to fight completely with America, but my purpose was to prevent - not war, but to counter people who may have a one-sided view of the situation of Japan, or in their understanding of ourselves and human nature. I didn't have any big purpose for my group, I just didn't want my friends to be involved in that kind of nationalism which I thought may destroy our Japan completely - it's more dangerous than war. We lost completely because of lack of understanding.

Peter: And wasn't this considered a very unique thing to do?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. At that time.

Peter: Did you get in trouble? Did you get in trouble for it?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, I got into various troubles.

Peter: What happened?

Suzuki-roshi: What happened? At length it helped, you know, but at first I was very much criticized. But what I was saying was right and enough people agreed with me so they decided to utilize me to help their you know - to help their idea of leading people. And they appointed me to be a head of a new organization, which was started by the government, but I resigned. I accepted once, you know, and next day I resigned from it.

This was before the war, before the militarists took over. When the army took over my voice was not loud enough.

Peter: But the army didn't come after your voice?

Suzuki-roshi: No. It was not so bad. But that was why I think I didn't get drafted. They marked me - on my name maybe there was some special mark. He's dangerous, but no reason to kill him. I was not such a big deal. But if they may have been concerned that if I were in the army that what I might say will affect morale.

Peter: Were there many priests like you who were pacifists?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Peter: Were there many priests like you who were pacifists?

Suzuki-roshi: They didn't take any stand till after the Second World War was over.

Peter: You know something Roshi, your experiences like this would be very interesting to the students.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh.

Peter: Don't you think so?

Suzuki-roshi: I think so.

Peter: Maybe you could lecture on this tonight.

Suzuki-roshi: [giggle] Oh, I think -

Peter: I think it's good if Zen is not for war in America -

Suzuki-roshi: Umhm, umhm.

Peter: And you never speak about it. Maybe you have a reason for that.

Suzuki-roshi: No.

Peter: But if you don't have a strong reason, I think it's moral, it's ethically proper to speak against war.

Suzuki-roshi: Umhm.

Peter: And (laugh) I shouldn't do this - but anyway you know the students would like to know your feelings about it.

Suzuki-roshi: I care more about the way of thinking. the fundamental way of thinking which will cause big war. That is why I didn't like nationalists in Japan. Their view was very one-sided and very unrealistic. And they accused others of faults without knowing what they were doing. They actually created problems.

Peter: Maybe this is why the government did not persecute you, because you were approaching the problem from a religious point of view.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Peter: Not political.

Suzuki-roshi: No. And after the world war I was not purged. I had no record of fighting with the military war. I had many printed matters expressing my feelings, many things about what should be the policy, what kind of danger we had then in the nation, things like that. But most of it may be difficult to understand for people. I didn't say anything about war or anything like that. I said that if we neglected to understand the situation of Japan more clearly and if we understood things just by what is printed, then we will lose the real picture of Japan. So what I put the emphasis on is to study more about what everyone was doing in his country, in the army, or in the political world. I was very much interested in that kind of thing when I was young, before the war. And because of this kind of anti-war activity, I was not purged.

Peter: Were most priests purged?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. Most priests who joined the army.

Peter: Lost their temples or were put in jail?

Suzuki-roshi: No. They couldn't join some educational programs or some official things, on education or city hall. But I wasn't purged. They tried to purge me, but I showed them the printed materials I had.

Peter: Who was they, the American soldiers in Yaizu?

Suzuki-roshi: No, the government, the new government. So they had no reason to purge me.

Peter: Did Rinso-in lose any land? Most temples lost land.

Suzuki-roshi: Most of it except the mountain. We had to sell the paddy fields or land that could be cultivated to the government.

Peter: Did you think that was a good idea?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe. I thought, to force that kind of thing on the temples is not a good idea, but the people should have land for farming.

Peter: I had heard, Roshi, I don't know where, that before the war many of the Zen temples were very rich and some of the priests were very corrupt and many priests kept concubines. Is that true? Particularly Rinzai temples.

Suzuki-roshi: Concubines, no. Not so many temples were so rich, you know, even before the war. Most of the temples were very poor. But after the war (small laugh) they lost everything and the priests started to work in city hall, as teachers, and in various ways and they became more and more rich - like the Japanese people. I'm afraid that Japanese people may have gotten too arrogant again - without knowing why they have become so rich.

Peter: This is like second Meiji Period.

Suzuki-roshi: Second Meiji, yeah.

Peter: How many people were there, about 200 people in your group? But the Japanese did nothing violent in that sort of thing. That's very calm and quiet hum?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, calm and quiet.

Peter: Like discussion group, philosophical discussion group rather than revolutionaries.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. Very calm and quiet.

Peter: It seems, Roshi, that the state of Japan in the thirties and forties limited you.

--

DOJO

From Jun 3, 1947 until he left in 1959, Shunryu was the teacher of the Zen dojo (practice place) for both monks and laymen) at Rinso-in. Here Shunryu says Takakusa (the name of his mountain) and not Yaizu. Here he established a dojo.

--

Peter: It says here that in June 1947 you became this teacher of Zen practice. That's not the title for Roshi huh? [dojo]

Suzuki-roshi: No.

Peter: Why did you wait until 1947? Why didn't you begin in 1936?

Suzuki-roshi: At that time they had no set rules for lay practice. This [1947] is more for laymen, Zen practice. And headquarters provided some rules for them to establish some Zen practice. There was Zen practice for laymen even before we have this kind of practice - before Zen Center.

Peter: Right. Okay, so this was a new idea [47] or something?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. New idea at that time, and it still continues.

--

Peter: Were you a Zen master here? [47]

Suzuki-roshi: Title of Zen master isn't necessary here or here. [1942 and 1947]

Peter: Here it is? [52]

Suzuki-roshi: Here. [1952]

--

DOKAN

From Jun 30, 1952 until he left in 1959, Shunryu was Chief Director - Dokan = Takao-gansemmonsodo at Takazoan, the Docho. (The notes mention Zenrin again and Takashina-roshi) This sodo was only for monks. This is the date that marks the end of Shunryu's study with Kishizawa-roshi. Through this period he filled out that his teacher was Ian Kishizawa Roshi, his dharma master Soon-roshi.

--

LEAVING BANSHOZENRIN

My friend [Niwa?] was at BanshoZenrin. At first Takashina-roshi was head of this temple and then he became the Kancho of the Soto-shu, the head of the Soto sect. And my friend took over his place and later Takashina-roshi wanted to come back to this monastery again. So his assistant, assistant of Kancho-roshi, put some pressure on my friend. And my friend left BanshoZenrin so I was rather angry with Takashina-roshi too. [not Takashina, right?]

Peter: So you left also?

Suzuki-roshi: I left also, but even though I left, Takashina-roshi was not so busy. Nevertheless, once in a while I had to help him. Officially though, I had already left there.

--

Peter: In 1952 then you became the Kancho of this place? What's that, Takazoan?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. Semmonsodo.

Peter: Were you Kancho there?

Suzuki-roshi: No. I was Docho. We only have one Kancho - the head of the whole Soto sect.

Peter: I see. So it wasn't until they made you Docho-roshi that you became Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

--

Peter: I see. So that means that you were then 48.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. At that time[52] I was Dokan at one more monastery [Takazoan]. At that time I became Executive Roshi or something like that.

Peter: I see. Here. In 1952.

Suzuki-roshi: Because I have to establish this one [Takazoan?] and they need me to be here. [Takazoan?]

Peter: Why did they need you?

Suzuki-roshi: Why? I don't know exactly.

Peter: They said they need you anyway. So what jobs were these? You were assigned to this monastery which was at BanshoZenrin. In 1947 they assigned you to Takakusa? Huh? [he doesn't realize that's Rinso-in - Takakusa]

Suzuki-roshi: Umhum. (not paying attention)

Peter: Teacher of Zen practice. This is bigger job than -

Suzuki-roshi: This is bigger job [Takazoan] - and this is some job just belonging to my only temple [1947 at Rinso-in].

Peter: I see. But this five year (42) - this job ends in 1947 at BanshoZenrin[42 to 47] and the job at Takakusa [begins 47], and the job here begins in 1952 [Takazoan].

Suzuki-roshi: Umhum.

Peter: What happened between 1947 and 1952? What happened between this job and this job?

Suzuki-roshi: ?

Peter: I'm not certain. Is that 60 or 40?

Suzuki-roshi: 1947 when this started.

Peter: In 1952.

Suzuki-roshi: In 1952. This is BanshoZenrin.

--

NIWA - MISSING TEMPLE (WHEN ZEN MASTER 10)

Suzuki-roshi: One is missing here. It was when Niwa-roshi established a temple, I don't know when, actually. If those are all the records Chino Sensei has, then one is missing.

Peter: When is that? 1947 or when? About when? After the war?

Suzuki-roshi: Before the war. Before this one too [47] of course. Peter: Before the war?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe here. [42?]

Peter: Well the war begins in - Suzuki-roshi: 1942 [oops - shows how accurate his numbers are]. So, before this.

(they talk off tape here)

Peter: I'm still a little confused, but apparently some time in the early forties, before the war, you officially became the Roshi.

Suzuki-roshi: Officially yeah.

Peter: Became the roshi of what master's temple? What was the master's name? The other one?

Suzuki-roshi: Niwa-roshi.

Peter: Niwa-roshi. Who wanted to have a monastery at his temple. And his disciple actually acted as roshi, as docho.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Peter: But you were docho by name.

Suzuki-roshi: By name. Once in a while when they had big ceremony I went there.

Peter: Why couldn't Niwa-roshi be the docho?

Suzuki-roshi: At that time? There was not much relationship between Niwa-roshi and myself. Niwa-roshi himself was the owner of the temple, we call him the jushoku. He's the head of the whole temple.

--

LAY ORDINATION 2

In March of 1947 there was a big ordination ceremony for lay members at Rinso-in conducted by Ian Kishizawa Roshi.

--

NURSERY SCHOOLS-YOCHIEN

On May 5, 1948, the Tokiwa Nursery School at Shin-ya (or Nii-ya)(Nie-ya?), Yaizu-shi was opened. This happened as a direct result of Shunryu's efforts though he didn't call himself the founder. He has no official title but says he was responsible for religious education there.

On April, 1954, a branch of Tokiwa Nursery School at Nishimachi, Yaizu-shi, opened.

--

ON BUILDINGS AND THEIR REPAIRING

In March of 1932. the construction of two new buildings (or wings) was completed at Zoun-in under the guidance of Shunryu - Kannon-do, where Avalokiteshvara is enshrined, and Seppin (Kuri). Neither of these were the main building, but they were important buildings for guests & practitioners in the temple. Also at Zoun-in, in April of 1944 he completed the new Kaisando (Founder's Memorial Hall) and Ihaido (Priests' and Laymen's Memorial Hall).

On March 1, 1958, Shunryu completed his work on the main structure of Rinso-in. [I think what he did was to finish putting on the new tile roof, but the notes on the CV read: "Rebuilt the main structure of Rinso-in (rebuilt = tore down old building and made new one." It was not torn down I don't think - Hoitsu said it has original beams.] Shunryu continued work repairing the Kaisando, Ihaido, Bell Tower, and Sutra Store Hall (library - kyozō) until May of 1958.

"To me it was very important to repair Rinso-in because the buildings are very old, the oldest part is maybe 300 years old. Unless the priest has a good understanding of architecture, he may make a mistake. So to me it was pretty important. I repaired many buildings as they were in ancient times. That was the difficult part. It cost more money and it doesn't look so good," he said laughing, "So no one agreed with me, with my idea. It seemed crazy. But I felt I had to do it. It took many years to rebuild Rinso-in. I worked on it the whole time I was there, constantly studying the architecture at that time, at the time when Rinso-in was built, and making an effort to get it all done."

--

DECISION TO GO TO AMERICA

The way I came to America was that Bishop Tobase asked headquarters to send someone to help him and they couldn't find anyone because maybe the position they would have here in America was not so solvent.

(as to whether he was resident, priest, assistant, or volunteer) But I didn't mind that kind of situation. My idea of coming was to turn a new leaf for myself and for the Soto way of propagating religion in America. That was rather ambitious.

In Japan I was resident priest of Rinso-in temple, of one monastery in Shizuoka-ken in Japan. I was teacher at the monastery. There were nine teachers. They didn't appoint any head teacher. Yeah, I was head teacher. Maybe 30 students. Niwa] Roshi was the founder. He was maybe 65 or 66. Soon after he died there was a celebration for his 61 birthday.

So at that time actually this temple was in confusion and the resident priest was Tobase. He was Bishop of America and no one knew what to do, it seemed. So it seemed like a good idea to send someone who could be a Bishop. Anyway, they wanted to send someone. Not many people wanted to come, or maybe people wanted to come but headquarters didn't accept them. Headquarters appointed several people but they didn't accept the position. My friend, [Yamada] who was director, didn't know what to do, and he said jokingly, "Why don't you go?" I didn't have any responsibility for the confusion. I did not cause the problems and I shall be free from it. People will understand if I cannot help, so maybe I should come and see what happens.

Anyway, Sokoji was in confusion. I was sure at that time Sokoji would give me more freedom. And in one month my friend came again I said to him I will go. When I said I'd go, he was amazed. He wasn't seriously thinking I would go. He didn't even want me to go so much because he felt some responsibility for Rinso-in which is quite near his temple and we work with the same priests. He is Bishop now. Dick met him. He speaks no English.

--

I didn't want to articulate just why I came to America because I was actually invited by the Japanese congregation of Sokoji. When I said "yes" our headquarters did not at first appoint me to be the head of this temple but as an assistant resident priest. That meant that I was not responsible for Sokoji. My duty was just to help out. But as soon as I came here headquarters wanted me to take over Tobase's position. So I had to be faithful to the Japanese members. So I didn't want to make the point too clearly that I came to America to bring Buddhism to Westerners. I never expressed my real reason for coming to America, but actually I thought if I could go to San Francisco I could do something which I really want to do - not for Japan but for the American people.

I learned most of my English at college, Komazawa. When I was young I already wanted to go abroad, but my master wouldn't allow it. I guess he wanted me to take care of his temple. I had no preference of where to go. Maybe America. Back then, there wasn't much chance for us to go to another country. At least I wanted to go to Hokkaido. It was difficult to change. And it would have been very bad if I had come to San Francisco and moved again somewhere else without having done much. If I accomplish something here, then it would be okay to move somewhere, but to move without accomplishing anything, it would not be so good. So we must stay at our temples. [implies had to do something in Japan first?]

I had no idea how long I'd stay in America when I first came. I said to the members of my temple that I'll come back in three years, but actually I had in mind to stay pretty long. You see, I had no stable position when I accepted, so it meant that for one or two years I would be a voluntary priest until I meet someone to help me.

--

STUDENTS IN JAPAN

P: Do so many students come and go in Japan also?

S: My students stayed pretty well in Japan. They are not forming any one group, but whenever I go to Japan immediately they come and they always keep in contact with each other. Even so, not all of them stay -- maybe 70. Two or three out of ten. Of course they have some reason. It is quite difficult to be always in one group. They are doing pretty well. In my temple the group I started is still practicing under my friend's instruction.

P: How much do they practice? Do they sit every day?

S: No. They come to the temple twice a month and usually they sit at home. When I was there they had more chance to come to my temple, but now of course they have new members -- there may be thirty of them or more. The other people who are helping work with my boy.

I have more than ten disciples in Japan, but they are not dharma disciples.

--

SECOND MARRIAGE

I didn't have a wife for seven or eight years before I came to America. One of the conditions to go to America, you know, to be invited by the Japanese members of Sokoji, was someone who has a wife. And she was head of the kindergarten and, at my mother-in-law's suggestion, I decided to get married with her and came to America almost at the same time.

Peter: What did she think of that? Isn't that a strange way to get married roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Strange, yes. For usual person it is very strange, but for a priest, marriage is very strange sometimes, which I don't like so much.

Peter: How do you mean that?

Suzuki-roshi: I want to do exactly what I want to do. (laughing)

Peter: Before you asked Okusan, this Okusan, did you tell her that you had to have a wife in America?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Peter: And would she like to marry you for that reason?

Suzuki-roshi: No, not that reason - you know. After my wife died, I thought I may be married with that girl, but I didn't determine to do that. But soon after my wife died - in 52 or 53, when she ran the kindergarten - there was some rumor - he will get married with her, and he likes her so much. So I thought, that is true, so I decided to get married with her.

But even though I decided so, I was too busy and she was too busy to think about it, you know. She was rather stubborn and I thought, that is alright, maybe I should wait. While I was waiting I decided to go to America and one of the conditions was that I should be a married priest. So I decided to marry her.

Peter: And Okusan's husband had died in the Second World War?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, yes.

--

U. S. Curriculum Vitae Info:

On May 22, 1959, Shunryu was appointed head priest of Soto Zen Temple Sokoji, 1881 Bush Street, San Francisco, California, U.S.

In 1967 Shunryu founded Zen Mountain Center, Zenshinji, at Tassajara Springs.

On October 1, 1969 Shunryu was appointed to the position of Gondai-kyoshi by the Shumucho. There are ten daikyoshi and the rest are gon-daikyoshi.

--

BIOGRAPHY-STRUGGLES

Peter: Do you think it would be interesting Roshi for the students to know all this, or is it best to keep your biography very simple?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe so.

Peter: Just facts? It doesn't make much sense.

Suzuki-roshi: It doesn't make much sense, I'm afraid if they don't understand what kind of things were going on [the background] (phone call - horrible background noise starts) - I don't know what to do with some things.

Peter: Yeah I'm trying to think what I do with it. How much I should put into the history. It's interesting to your students, but maybe -

Suzuki-roshi: No! Maybe for someone who is not a student! Because of these kind of experiences I decided to come to America. There's nothing interesting in it. I'm just talking to you. I'm not really interested in this kind of thing. I'm just talking to you. This is just a record, just confusion. My history, my life in Japan was spent fighting, in struggle.

Peter: Did you always win the struggles?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. But it is not the best way. It is better to surrender. If I had known the truth about American life earlier, it would have been sayonara a long time ago. Like this, you know. (waving or bowing goodbye).

Peter: It seems that many priests who came here were exiled to America, were being punished by being sent to America. They could have punished you a long time ago.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. Fortunately I knew how to handle them most times. But it just made for more difficulties - things go in circles.

Peter: Too smart again.

Suzuki-roshi: I always won.

Peter: Did you ever feel vain about it?

Suzuki-roshi: No, no. I don't feel vain-it's just like, because of I was very impatient and angry I became very patient in order to win fights and so on. Hence I always started to fight because of my impatience. And once I started to fight I had to become very patient or else I'd lose that fight and it would be endless.

Peter: In Western astrology your birth sign, Taurus, suggests stubbornness. And when you talk about yourself you say how stubborn you have been, but you don't seem stubborn to your students.

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. I have been very impatient, that is true.

Peter: But Americans are so much more impatient than you. You seem very patient. Your students are so... Japanese couldn't live with them.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm. I may have been patient with American people even earlier, long before I came to America. Recently I feel in that way very much. It may have something to do with past lives.

Peter: Some of your students think that in their past lives they were Japanese. Chinese or Japanese.

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe so. I don't know. This is a big job and I'm not interested in this kind of thing. I have no accurate record of my life and I don't want any.

Peter: Is there any meaning at all in having something about you in the Wind Bell?

Suzuki-roshi: This sort of thing?

Peter: Some sort of history, some sort of biography, not too elaborate, but some sort. Not a book though. Maybe about four or five pages? Is that a mistake?

Suzuki-roshi: Four or five!

Peter: How much do you think? One? Half a page? A paragraph? One sentence? Suzuki-roshi biography: "I do not think much of this sort of thing and have not kept any records." End biography. You have the right to decide. This is your direct concern. How do you feel about this?

Suzuki-roshi: I didn't get an answer to these kind of questions from my teacher. I don't have much interest in it.

Peter: Neither do I.

Suzuki-roshi: If my life is seen in this way, everything will be lost.

2 - Summer Sesshin: First Night Lecture

Monday, September 01, 1969

Summer Sesshin: First Night Lecture
"I Don't Know Zazen"

Tassajara

In our practice, the most important thing [is] to-to know-to know. "To know" is that we have buddha-nature. Our practice-real practice happens when realization of buddha-nature take place. Intellectually we know that we have buddha-nature, and that is what was taught by Buddha.

But to know buddha-nature-when you know that we have buddha-nature, at the same time you will know that even though we have buddha-nature, you know, it is rather difficult to accept it. At the same time, we have various evil nature. And buddha-nature is something beyond good and bad, but our everyday life is going [on] in realm of good and bad. So there is-there is two-twofold of duality. One is duality of good and bad, and the other is duality of good and bad-realm of good and bad, and realm of the world where there is no good and no bad.

And our everyday life is going [on] in realm of good and bad-the realm of duality. And buddha-nature or our absolute nature is found in the realm of absolute where there is no good and bad. Our practice is to go beyond the realm of good and bad and to realize the one absolute world-to enter the one absolute world is our practice. If I say in this way it is rather-it may rather difficult to understand.

Hashimoto-roshi,[1] the famous Zen master who passed away last year or 1967, I think, explained this point. "It is"-I think I told you once-"It is like a-to-to prepare a food," you know. We prepare food-various food-you separate: rice is here, and pickles are here, and soup is in middle bowl. We don't cook like a gruel all the time [laughs]-soup and rice and everything in one bowl. Even though, you know, to cook-to prepare food separately, you know, in each bowl is the-our usual world-world of seeming. And-but when you eat it, you know, in your tummy, you know, soup and rice and pickles and everything-goma-shio[2]-and everything [gets all] [laughs] mixed up and you don't know what is-which is goma-shio or rice. That is the world of absolute [laughter]. As long as goma-shio is goma-shio,and separately prepared on the plate, it doesn't work-like your intellectual understanding of Buddhism. It doesn't work. [Laughs, laughter.] That is book knowledge.

But, you know-so zazen practice is, you know, to mix various understanding in our practice and let it work. How to let it work is our practice. The other day, by some chance, I talked about kerosene lamp. You know, when it-when kerosene lamp is just oil, you know, kerosene oil-it doesn't work. Kerosene lamp will work when it become-when it is in a state of combustion by aid of air. And even though you have kerosene lamp and air, it doesn't work. When you using it-use matches, you know, it will work-it will start to work. And this flame of matches is our practice which is transmitted from Buddha to us. By aid of matches, and by aid of air, kerosene will start to work. This is actually our zazen practice.

You may think, you know, "You are just kerosene oil," you know [laughs]. It doesn't work. Even though you have-you say, "I have buddha-nature," you know, it doesn't work. If you have no buddha, it-it doesn't work. If you have no friend, no sangha, it doesn't work. When we practice zazen in this way, by the aid of sangha, helped by Buddha, we can practice our zazen in its true sense, and we will have bright light here in Tassajara zendo.

We will have question/answer the last day of the sesshin-last day of sesshin. Question and answer will be going this kind of question and this kind of answer. Back and forth we should discuss this point. We should know clearly what is our practice and what is our everyday life, and how to apply zazen p- [partial word]-how to extend our zazen practice in everyday life. When you are practicing zazen in this way, actually you have true practice in its true sense. But why it is difficult for you to extend our practice in city life is because of lack of precise understanding of our Zen teaching.

If you-when you know-when you know why you practice zazen and what is the most important point in our practice, you can practice our way even though your practice is not perfect. You have direction. And you know how to do it. So you will not-you will not be mixed up.

Our life, in short, should be always in complete combustion, you know. We must-we should aim at complete combustion in our life. If the flame become little bit smoky, you know, you should know how to adjust the flame, you know. If it is too long, you should make it shorter. You know, if it's too small, you should make it brighter. Actually, you know, in your practice, I think you know your practice is-what kind of practice you have-whether your practice is good or bad. You yourself know. But instead of being discouraged by it, you should know how to adjust the flame [laughs].

Before you ask questions, you know, you should know how to adjust the flame. To have a so-called-it enlightenment experience is of course important. But more important thing is to know how to adjust the flame-flame of life in zazen and in our everyday life. When the flame is in complete combustion, you know, you don't smell the oil [laughs]. When, you know, it is smoky, you will have a kind of smell. You know the, you know-you may realize there is kerosene lamp [laughs]. When, you know, your life is in complete combustion, you have no complaint. And there is no need to be aware of your practice. But, you know, we should know that if we talk about too much-like me-about zazen, it is already smoky kerosene lamp [laughs].

If I-if you see me, you may ask, "Is there lecture tonight?" Maybe I'm very smoky kerosene lamp [laughs]. I don't want, you know, to give lecture. I-I-what I want is to-just to live with you, moving stones, having nice hot-spring bath [laughs], and eat something good [laughs, laughter].

Zen is there, you know. When I start to talk about something, it is also smoky-it is already smoky kerosene lamp. As long as I [must] give lecture, I have to explain it in term of right or wrong: "This is right practice. This is wrong. How to practice zazen." It is like to-to give you recipe [laughs]. Recipe doesn't work. You cannot eat recipe [laughter]. Maybe after having a long, long practice in hot summer weather, it may be good to enjoy to say something [laughs] and to listen to something. This is, you know, our [a?] purpose of practice.

I said just now [that] to know how to adjust the flame is important. This is actually what Dogen-zenji worked so hard for-for us descendants. Not just-not-usually Zen master-a Zen master will give you: "Practice zazen! Then you will attain enlightenment. If you attain enlightenment, you will be detached from everything and you will see things as it is. So if you want to see things as it is, you have-you must practice zazen hard and attain enlightenment." That is usually [what] a Zen master will say.

But our way is "not always so." That is, of course true, but we, you know-Dogen-zenji told us how to adjust back flame-back and forth, he told us in his Shobogenzo-this point. This is one of the characteristic of Soto Zen.

In-in Soto, people say in Soto-Soto priest doesn't-Soto school doesn't use koan, and they have no koan practice. But Dogen-zenji, after studyingkoans, and he simplified all the koan in a-in a quite simple forms, as-like Tozan-zenji[3] in China did. Tozan-zenji used five ranks-five ranks of practice, or five ranks of seeming and reality. But Dogen-zenji did not use five ranks in practice or five ranks in seeming and reality because Dogen-zenji's understanding or teaching of Zen is much simpler than that. Quite simple. The point of Soto Zen-Dogen-zenji's zazen is to live on each moment in complete combustion, like a kerosene lamp or like a candle. So how to live in each moment, and how to become one with everything, and attain oneness of the whole universe, is the point of his teaching and his practice.

I don't think you have not much pain in your legs. Do you have some? It is pretty painful for you to sit now? It doesn't, you know, looks-looks like so. Pretty good, I think. Maybe some pain-some pain.

And Zazen practice is very subtle thing. When you are working, you know, something which you do not realize will mentally and physically will-will be realized if you practice zazen. You know, I have been moving stone pretty [?] [laughs]-for a long time, and I didn't know that I was tired. And I didn't realize my muscles, you know, were tired. But, you know, today, as I, you know, sit in this way calmly, so I realized, "Oh! [Laughs.] My muscles are in pretty bad condition." I felt some pain all over. Here [probably points], and in my arm, not in my back so much, but here [sounds like he is rubbing an area]. I have not much flesh here, so I haven't not much muscles to be painful. But my bone is painful, maybe [laughs, laughter].

You know, if you have no problem, you know, then you may think then you can practice your zazen very well. But actually it is not so. Some problem, you know, is necessary. Not much, but some [laughs, laughter], if possible. Then, as he said-as Dogen-zenji said, by the problem you have-by the difficulty you have, you can practice zazen. This is very, I think-very meaningful point of zazen, especially in our everyday life. He put great emphasis on this point. So he says, you know, "Practice and enlightenment is one."

Practice is something, you know, which you do consciously, which you do with effort. There there is enlightenment. Most Zen masters missed this point. They didn't know how important this point is. They were striving, you know, for-to attain enlightenment-perfect enlightenment. But actually, you know, the most meaningful point of zazen is to have enlightenment in our imperfect zazen

That is, you know, his [Dogen's] teaching, and that is how everything exist in this world actually. Things [that] exist are imperfect. Nothing [is] perfect. Whatever we see, whatever we hear. Things are not perfect. But [in] that imperfect things there is a perfect reality. This is not just, you know-this is true intellectual understanding. Intellectually it is true, but in realm of practice it is also true. It is true on paper, you know [laughs], but it is true also with our body. We can-we can realize how true it is by-through our physical practice and emotional problems.

So according to him [Dogen], you know, our practice should be established in delusion [laughs]. Do you understand? We are all deluded people, and before we attain enlightenment we should establish our true practice in our delusion.

Usually, you know, after you attain enlightenment, you may think you can establish true practice. But it is not so, according to Dogen-zenji. True practice should be established in delusion, in frustration [laughs]. If you make some mistake, you know, you should stand b- [partial word]-you should establish your practice thereby. There is no other place for you to establish your practice.

"Enlightenment," we say, but in its true sense perfect enlightenment is our-is beyond our understanding, beyond our experience. That is true enlightenment. That kind of enlightenment-if so, that kind of enlightenment is in our imperfect practice, actually-or even in our imperfect practice there is enlightenment. But-but the problem is that we don't know [laughs].

And here, again, I want [to] put emphasis on this point. People usually do not trust anything if they do not actually-if they cannot actually experience it, actually think about it.

There are two types of people. Someone-some of them cannot trust anything until they understand things in term of right or wrong, good or bad. After they analyze reality in various way, they understand things and trust things. But some of them become more uneasy, you know, if someone explain something so well [laughs], you know. If someone talk about something-analyze something eloquently and very precisely, you know, the more he explain about it, [the] more you may doubt it [laughs, laughter]. "Oh! Is that so?" That ...

[Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

There are actually two types of people. Like an artist, you know: If people say, "Oh, that's very good [laughs]," some of them will-some of the artist will be very glad if someone says, "That is very good. It may be-it may [be] worth ten thousand [laughs]-hundred thousand [dollars]." But some of them will not, you know, will not be so happy. Some of them will be happy-will be happy even though no one buy it-no one say something-anything about his art. But he can enjoy his art.

There are two kinds of people. And there may be two ways of helping people also, you know: to help people by giving something-by giving some actual help to help others. That is one way. The other way is, you know, without giving anything, without saying anything, without doing anything we can help others too.

The joy of enlightenment experience is actually-because that joy is beyond our comparison to our usual experience, you cannot say that is good experience or bad experience-but something unusual experience, that's all.

It is like a-it is like to push, you know, something-to push round ball on the top of the mountain, you know. It is very difficult, you know. When [laughs] someone who cannot [be] satisfied [with] his work until he push it up to the top of the mountain, you know, he may lose the ball, you know, because it is the top of the mountain. If he push [laughs], you know, too much, it will go [laughing] the other side of the mountain. "Oh!" [Laughter.] That will usually, you know-something what will happen to you. If you, you know, push everything, you know, up to the extreme, you will lose whole thing [laughs]. We are doing same thing over and over again. You may think, "We should not do that again." But, you know, in-within one month you will start same thing again, and you will lose whole thing [laughs].

You practice zazen, or you study Buddhism, and you help people. But if you don't know how to help people in its true sense, you cannot help people. The more you help people, if you help people in usual way, to the extreme, you will lose the friend, that's all. We say-ah-the other day, Daino-Daino Frazer [?] said, "Something too much is worse than too little." "Something too much is worse than too little." Actually what it means is to find the true meaning of practice before we attain enlightenment, not-not to try to, you know, attain enlightenment completely-not to try to have complete enlightenment. Why that is wrong is when you try to have complete-complete enlightenment, then you started your practice. It means that your practice is not real practice. Your practice is already started-you already started to analyze your practice-complete practice or [?] enlightenment, whether it is complete or not.

So complete enlightenment should be, actually-before you attain enlightenment there is complete enlightenment in its true sense. Dogen-zenji also says the more you have good practice and good enlightenment in its true sense, you may feel you haven't enlightenment-you haven't-your practice is not good enough. When-only when you-not-I cannot say "only"-but when you-most of the time, for human being, when you feel in that way, you have at least better practice and deeper understanding-actual understanding of enlightenment, which is beyond the realm of good and bad.

So enlightenment will be attained in easy time and in adversity. Wherever you are, enlightenment is there. And if you stand upright where you are, that is enlightenment. Try to stand up-up-upright. There is our practice. It means that to accept things as it is, to accept yourself as you are.

When-Soto way is also called-Soto practice is called "I don't know zazen." [Laughs.] "I don't know zazen." We don't know what is zazen anymore. "I don't know who I am." That is Soto way. "I don't know." [Laughs.] To find complete composure, you know, when you don't know who you are and where you are, what is-what are they-that is Soto way. And that is, you know, to accept things as it is. Even though [laughing] you don't know who you are, you accept yourself. That is, you know, "you" in its true sense. When you know who you are, you know, that you will not be real you. You may overestimate [laughs, laughter] yourself quite easily. That is-that is not you. When you don't know: "Oh-oh, I don't know," you know. Then when you feel in that way, you are you, and you know yourself completely. That is enlightenment.

Maybe, even though I say so, I think you feel, "He is talking something unusual, and he is fooling us." [Laughs.] But actually it is not so. Only thing I can say is you like to be fooled by me [laughs]. If I don't fool you, you know, you will not listen to my lecture. Dogen-zenji says people does not like something real [laughs], and they like something which is not real.[4] That is very true [laughs]. Why I am-if I am strict with you-I am strict-very strict with that point. Even though you make some mistake, I-I-I will not say anything. But if you have some false, you know, unreal confidence or unreal self, I shall be very strict with you because you are in danger.

I think our teaching is very good-very, very good. But if we become too arrogant, and if we believe in ourself too much, we will be lost. There will be no teaching at all, no Buddhism at all. So when we find out our joy of life or composure, when we, you know, don't know what it is, you know, when we don't understand anything, then your mind [is] said to be very great, very wide. Your mind is open to everything.

From what should we, you know, [be] relieved [laughs], you know, is this point. We should be relieved from this kind of arrogance, this kind of selfish way, this kind of immature childish, you know, way. And our mind should be big enough to know before we know something, you know. We should be grateful before we have something. Without anything, we must be very happy, you know-not after you have something, but before you have something, we should be very happy. Before you attain enlightenment, we should be happy to practice our way, or else we cannot attain anything in its true sense.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (4/4/01).

[1] Hashimoto Eko-roshi (1890-1965 {recheck 1965}) was a scholar of Dogen's Shobogenzo and an authority on the origins of the traditional okesa. He studied with Oka Sotan-zenji at Shuzen-ji and was Dainin Katagiri-roshi's second master at Eihei-ji [Wind Bell, 1971, No. 1, p. 3.]

[2] A table seasoning of ground roasted sesame seeds (goma) and salt (shio).

[3] Dongshan Liangie (Tozan Ryokai): 807-869.

[4] See also SR-71-06-05. Suzuki-roshi is probably referring to the story of Sho-kung (Jap. Seiko or Shoko) in the Hsin-hsú (Shinshi Ryaku). Sho-kung loved painted and carved dragons but was terrified when visited one day by the real thing. "Do not become so accustomed to images that you are dismayed by the real dragon" (Dogen-zenji, Fukun Zazen-gi, in Nishijima and Cross, ed., 1994, Vol. 1, p. 282).

3 - Summer Sesshin: Second Night Lecture

Monday, September 01, 1969

Summer Sesshin: Second Night Lecture
Tassajara

We have been talking about-discuss-discussing about reality, actually, and how we practice our way in our zazen and in our everyday life. And Dogen-zenji talked about the reality in-by using the Japanese or Chinese word, inmo.[1] Inmo means-inmo has two meaning. It is-it means like this, you know [probably gestures]-and also it means question: "What is that?" Or it is, you know, "it," you know. "It" means-sometime it is question mark, and sometime "it" means-pointing at something, we say, "it."

In English, you know, you say, "It is hot." That "it" is the same words-same meaning when you say, "It is nine o'clock," or "It is half-passed eight." You know, it-you use ["it" for] only time or weather, you know. Time or weather is "it." But not only time or weather. Everything should be "it"-can be "it." We are also "it," you know, but we don't say "it." Instead of "it" we say "he" or "she," or "me" or "I." But actually it means "it." So everything is-if everything is "it," you know, it is-at the same time, question mark, you know. When I say "it," you know, you don't know [laughs] exactly what I mean, so you may say, "What is it?" [laughs] you may ask.

"It" is not-it does not mean some definite, special thing, as it does not mean when we talk about time, it is not-it does not mean some special time, or meal time, or lecture time. We don't know. So "it" is-it means also ques- [partial word]-it may be question mark for everyone. If I say "it," you know, you may say, "What time is it?" you may say.

So "it" or inmo means-has-mean, you know, has two meaning: definite-some definite thing is "it," and at the same time "it" may be a question. And this is very important for us to know. "It" has always-maybe it has-it means always-it has two sides of it: "It is hot now," but it-it is-it may be sometime cold," you know [laughs]. "Right now it is hot, but it is not always hot. Sometime it will be cold."

When we say-when we talk about time, "it" means some, you know, some special time. But at the same time it means, you know, some continuous time. Time is always-time is continuous thing, and, at the same time, time is some special, definite, discontinued [discontinuous] - some certain hour. When we say it is half-passed eight, we point out at some certain time. At that time, time mean discontinue-discontinuity. And-but time, by nature, it is something continued-continuous thing, so one words has two side: continuity and discontinuity. That is the nature of reality to us.

So we have been talking about things for tonight in term of discontinued-some special discontinuous, specialized being which has form or color, you know. That is inmo. That was inmo.

But Dogen-zenji again talked-talks about our practice in term of something continuous, not special-something which is mixed up [laughs] with everything. If we are not ready to discuss things, we will not have a complete understanding of our teaching. As he says: "Those who," you know, "fell on the ground should stand up by the ground-by the earth." [2] I don't know if it makes some sense to you. What do you say? "To fell on the ground"-"to fell," or-?

Student: Fall.

Another student: Fall on the ground.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student: Fall on the ground?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. Like this [probably gestures]. Fall on the ground? Should stand up by the earth-by the ground at that place. And he also says, "If you fall on the ground," you know, "you should," you know, "stand up"-what should I say? It is rather difficult-"by emptiness [laughs], by nothing." Actually we-actually we stand up by the ground like this [probably gestures], you know, but he says we shouldn't stand up by the ground. What does it-it means is if you think, you know, you can stand up by the ground always, it would be a big mistake. If you rely on, you know, ground, if you rely on the ground-on ground and don't mind to fall on the ground, you know, you will fall on the ground quite easily. "It's all right. I can stand up by the ground." [Laughs.] So he said you shouldn't-you shouldn't think you can stand up on the ground-by the ground.

And this point is important, you know. It is like enlightenment. If you rely on enlightenment, you know, and practice zazen, it is someone who easy-who easily, you know, make mistake or fall on the ground, relying on the help of the ground. Do you understand? It is rather-do you understand? There is very subtle point. To stand up by the ground-of course we have to stand up by the ground at the time, but if you stick to the idea of help of the ground all the time, you know, you lose the true meaning of fall on the ground. In other word, we should not make same mistake [laughs] many many times. Even though you make mistake-you may think, you know, even though you make some mistake, it is all right. We know how to get up.

That is not what we mean when we say "reality." Things happen-things does not happen many times in the same way. Even it doesn't happen same way twice. But if we say, if you fell-fall on the ground, you should stand up by the ground, then you-you will have this kind of idea: "Okay, I know how to stand up, so it's all right, even though I fall on the ground by mistake." With this kind of prejudice or easy idea, if we practice our way that is wrong practice.

You recite each time in lecture, you know, "Even one hundred kalpas of time, you cannot meet with the teaching." That is the true, you know. Truth is-exist-truth is true only when you listen to, you know. And when you try to repeat what someone said, that is not truth anymore. When he said so, it is true. When someone said so, it is true because the ground is already-has two meaning. It is, you know, at that time ground, but ground can be-can be a stick sometime, can be a stone sometime, can be a water sometime.

Ground is "it," you know. "It" means everything, not just ground. It means that you should renew your way of practice. Each time you practice, you have-must have fresh new feeling. With fresh and new feeling, you should practice our way. Try not to have same experience, you know. Your experience of practice should be always new, and should be always "it." It should not be some definite particular experience.

So there is nothing to rely on in our practice. But on the other hand, there is always something provided for you, always. According to the circumstances, you will have some aid to practice our way. You know, even pain in your legs is help, you know. By the pain you have, you should practice our way. The pain is "it." It is, at that time, some definite experience or definite trouble or thing. But "it" can be drowsiness [laughs]; "it" can be hunger; "it" can be hot weather. So hot weather or cool weather-nice and cool weather, or hunger, or mosquito [laughs], or pain in your legs can be a h- [partial word]-aid of your practice by which you can stand up-establish your practice.

Not only, you know, Buddha's teaching, but also everything can be aid of practice. So we say inmo. Inmo-ji. Inmo-ji means "things." [3] And those who practice zazen is also inmo-nin. -Nin means "person." -Nin in Japanese means "person." Inmo-nin-"someone-someone practicing something." That is reality. [Laughs.] Even though you are practicing actually, right here, but in its true sense you should understand "someone practicing something." Or "someone doing something." Not only practice. "Someone doing something."

So if-if it-it is so, "doing" is not necessary, you know. "Someone" and "doing" and "someone" and "doing" and "something" is same thing, you know. Doing-someone which will practice zazen, include everything. He cannot be separated from this world. And some action cannot exist without background of whole world. Something cannot be special thing from this world, so "something, something, something." [Laughs, laughter.] Then, what is that? That is complete realization. So one thing, you know-everything happens in that way. So if you understand-stick to the idea of help or experience or enlightenment, that is already mistake.

As I am Soto [laughs]-Soto-I belong to Soto, if I say so: "Oh, he," you know, "deny enlightenment experience." [Laughs.] It is not so. We Soto student do not stick to one thing. We don't stick to anything. We should have always freedom. In Japanese we say shushin-shushin-no-katsuro: [4] complete freedom. Complete freedom of practice, complete freedom of expression. Our practice is expression-a vivid expression of our true nature or reality.

So for us it is not possible to stick to anything. So one after another, we have to practice our way in a quite renewed area and quite refreshed way. And our practice should be independent from past practice and future practice. We cannot sacrifice our practice for future attainment, because all the buddha who passed-attained enlightenment in this way, and all the buddha in future will attain enlightenment in this way. "In this way" means, you know [laughs]-"this," means "not any"-I do not, you know, mean Soto way or Rinzai way. Sometime Soto way. Sometime Rinzai way. Sometime some other school's way, according to the circumstances. The way we-how we attain enlightenment will be different. Someone will attain enlightenment when he see some flower or hear some sound like bamboo. Or someone may attain enlightenment when they take hot bath [laughs, laughter] there.

And there were many kinds of people in Buddha's sangha. There was a twelve, you know, disciples who came from a rich family. And Bhadrupala Bodhisattva, [5] who attained enlightenment in a hot bath, is [laughs] one of the boy who came from very rich family. And rich and poor may attain enlightenment in various way: in hot bath, in rest room [laughs]. There is no Soto way or Rinzai way, actually. So we say "it." And "it"-that "it" means-and that "it" ha- [partial word]-means two-two side. "It" has two side: positive side and negative side.

In short, what do we mean? You know, we-you know, we discuss very abstract way so that discussion include various way of practice. But in short, what it means is: whatever it is, we should accept. And by means of various things, we should practice our way. And there is no other way to attain enlightenment.

Do you have some question? It may be rather difficult to make question, you know [laughing], because, you know, it is like to catch fish by net, you know. We talk something, you know, in this way so that you cannot escape from it. It is lucky to catch a fish by net. After throwing net, you know: "Is there some question?" is-doesn't mean much, but, you know, you escaped from the net. Okay.

Student A: When I fall down on the ground, who is it that makes effort to get up?

Suzuki-roshi: You. Or Buddha.

Student A: I have a problem-or it feels like it. Whenever I make effort, it-it seems to come from some sense of "I," maybe some pride or some very strong sense of self. Could you tell us about effortless effort?

Suzuki-roshi: Effortless effort. Effortless effort means the effort, knowing that there is no "I" or no ground, you know, and then something which is going with everything is effortless effort. The effort you make is not your effort, because there is no "you," you know. What is that effort? That effort is-the effort comes out from-from your mother body of whole being.

You, you know-that you stand up means that everyone stand up, and everyone feel very good when you stand up. And when you st- [partial word]-when you attain enlightenment, everyone attains enlightenment with you. So if the practice does not include everyone of us, it is not true practice, we say. It is tainted practice by the idea of self. And you may have this kind of doubt or-after you do, after you do something as-like you-whether this is, you know, selfish, you know, things or not: "Why did I do this?" I think you will have this kind of-some uncertain feeling about what you do or what you did. I suffered from it [laughs] pretty much.

Especially when you do something good, you know-supposed to be good, you suffer more [laughs]. When you did some-something by mistake, you don't suffer, you know. "This is by mistake, so I will not make same mistake again." That's all, you know. But if you try to do something good, after-or you did something which is supposed to be good, because you did something with some idea of good and bad, you suffer more. Especially by the idea of good, you suffer more [laughs]-you should suffer more [laughs]. That is good experience. Okay.

Student B: Roshi, I'm walking along, and everything's intact [laughter], and then I-Suzuki-roshi: Walking?

Student B: I'm walking along, and everything seems to be okay, and then thud!-I'm on the ground. I look around, and there's a small rock. So with a roar, I can pick up the rock and throw it off into the woods. But what if the rock is so big I can't lift it? So what am I going to do?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughing.] Rock is so big?

Student B: Yeah. It's stuck in the ground and I can't pick it up.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. You-no need to take it out. [Laughs, laughter.]

Student B: But I feel some need to take it out-some strong need. [Loud laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: That's deep ego [laughing]-too big. Your ego is too big. I thought if the rock is a great big one, it is more beneficial to, you know, stand up by it, you know. Small rocks will not help you so much, but if it is too-so big, it is easy to, you know, stand up by it. If you stand up, you know, you should work [walk?] off the rock. And there is no need to take-take it away.

Actually, you know, problem-your problem is when you feel guilty, you know-when you feel guilty is the point. After you did something, you feel, you know, selfish. But before you feel selfish, you didn't feel, you know, anything. But after-after you did something, you start to feel bad. So when you did it, it was all right. But after you did it, and when you think about it, the way you think about it was not-is not right. Do you understand? When you did it, you were not selfish. But when you think about it, you became already selfish. You expect something to be good. So don't think too much about what you did. Okay? If you think too much about what you did, it is-most of the time, it is, maybe, conscientious thing, but it is sometime very selfish idea is involved in it. So one after another, you should continue your practice, you know, without thinking, without being involved in so much selfish idea or dualistic idea. Okay? [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

When I w- [partial word]-I had-I suffered a lot about it when I was at school, you know. And I was staying at dormitory, you know. And restroom was always dirty [laughs]-dormitory restroom was always dirty. So I, you know, made up my mind to clean it, you know. But I didn't want to clean it when people, you know, see [laughing]. So I get up early in the morning before they get up so that no one can find out me in cleaning, you know, restroom.

It was pretty good, you know, for several days, but even though early in the morning someone get up [laughs]. I have very difficult time to hide myself [laughs, laughter] while doing this kind of thing, you know. Sometime, you know, our dean of the-head of the college or university-whatever it is-Nukariya[6]-Nukariya is his name-and he was very strict person. And he stayed in our dormitory with student [laughs]. And Saturday night was the night when he go home. He was so strict, in summertime when all the students went home, he would stay at dormitory, taking care of things. So most people who visited the dormitory to see-to see him, thought he was a garbage man [laughs] on the dormitory. He was so, you know-he was pretty good.

And sometime, you know, I saw a light in his room, you know. I was very much scared of [laughing] him getting-coming to the restroom. So as soon as I saw the light in the dormitory, not only his room but also some room, I escaped from the restroom, and I was quite, you know, upset or, you know-I don't know what to say, you know. I was very much mixed up. At first, I-I felt very good, you know. And more and more, I had many things to think about. And I have too much to think about. So finally I-I have to think whether I should continue it or give up.

But my nature-I was pretty stubborn, you know. I didn't like to give up something so easily. So I wanted to continue it, but I-I didn't want to have that kind of silly problems. But anyway I continued it. And I had-I studied psychology, you know. And he-the professor, you know, talked about our psychology, you know.

And he said it is not possible to have same experience again, you know. Even though you think you did this kind of thing, but what you think about it and what you have experienced is not same-different, quite different. So actually you cannot have same experience again, in its strict sense. So it is not possible to, you know, to have same feeling again or same experience again. So I was enlighten [?], you know. "Okay! It is not possible to think about it, so forget about it, and I will try-I will continue to do it. Whatever happens, it's-it is all right. And whatever they may say, that is all right." I continued my practice in that way, for I don't know how long.

So don't think too much about it, you know. What you do is not selfish, but what you think-that you think about it is maybe selfish. So if you can forget all about it, you are not so selfish. Hai.

Student C [Bill Shurtleff]: I think I understand what you mean when you say that what we do is not selfish, in the way that it affects other people.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Bill: But it seems like there are some problems which cause us pain directly, and we think about them because they cause us pain directly, for example, during eating. And I have a problem that keeps happening again and again. And I think about it very often-each time that it happens, and I can see it happening even before it happens. And it still happens. And it's a problem with eating-like things-there are certain things that if I eat them, I know they will cause me suffering.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. [Laughs.]

Bill: And every time that I eat them, I suffer. I get sick. There is an "I" afterwards who says: "You should never, ever eat that again [laughter] because every time that you've eaten it you've suffered and gotten sick." And yet, another "I" sees himself approaching that plate of food, and he can say eat it anyway [previous six words are a guess-obscured by laughter]. And then afterwards, the other "I" comes along and says, "Now, you see!" Twenty times-the same thing happens every time. And every time I think about it, and think about it, and think about it.

Suzuki-roshi: That is karma. [Laughs, laughter.] Yeah, we are-we have that kind of problem always. We know that this is not good. But-I don't know why, but, you know, something makes me doing something wrong. But, you know, some people may say that is a kind of destiny-fate, or, you know-it is not so. You can improve it little by little. We have no idea of, you know, fate or karma in-karma in that way.

Bill: You emphasize accepting it, and my emphasis always seems to be on improving, and not doing it next time, rather than accepting it this time [student laughs].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. But before, you know, you try to improve yourself, you have to accept it, you know, or you have to see it clearly, you know. If you have idea of improvement first, you will miss the clear sight of the reality. So you have to see it first and try to improve it. Hai.

Student D: I get the feeling, after sitting here for the last few days [1-2 words unclear]-a habit of sitting. And as I sit, I forget about it more. So it becomes a new habit. Maybe-maybe then that's sort of like an answer to Meg's[7] question and Bill's[8] question.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student D: It becomes a habit-a new habit. And you don't think about your habits.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah. Habit. Yeah. That is-that is habit. But habit is very important, you know, in our practice. That is why, you know, we do same thing over and over again: to make some good habit. But difference between the habit, in usual sense, and our habit-good habit is we, you know, we are trying to make something a habit, you know. That something is, you know, the way to attain liberation. Usually habit is, you know, habit of smoking, habit of drinking [laughs]-something, you know-some habit directed to the other way.

So our habit is to be free from things, we have this kind of practice. By practicing, we will have habit of being relieved from everything, to have more freedom from everything. This kind of habit is-the nature of habit is different. Do you understand? We, you know, bow to the Buddha. We observe ceremonies in the same way over and over again. But this habit will result complete freedom from-for you. Zazen practice will give you the power of being free from things. So we-if I use "habit" in usual sense, we practice our way to destroy various, you know, habit in its bad sense. Okay?

Student D: Sesshin seems to break some of my habits-thinking in the past of, say, my habit of overeating.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student D: And sesshin comes and I just cut it off, and it's gone for seven days. And-but at the end, there's always-I-I guess the longer I practice, the more I will be faced with this choice between keeping the habit broken or over-reacting, you know. I think, "Well, seven days of not overeating! Wow!" [Laughs, laughter.] [2-3 words unclear.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Right. Yeah, that is very true. We say, "One hundred lecture [laughs] end in," you know, "one poo." [Laughing, laughter throughout rest of paragraph.] What do you call it? After giving you one hundred times of lecture, and you make big poo-big one, you know! That's worse-make me worse. If I haven't given-gave lect-[partial word]-given lectures, you know, to you it was all right. Because I gave lecture, you know, to-to make poo is very-makes me worse. That is not actually laughing matter [laughing].

Okay.

---

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (11/15/00). Tenshin Reb Anderson graciously recalled, from memory, Suzuki-roshi's citation of Bhadrápala.

[1] Suzuki-roshi is commenting on Dogen's Shobogenzo "Inmo" (also spelled "Immo").

[2] Quoting Dogen in Shobogenzo "Inmo," who in turn quoted the fourth Indian patriarch Upagupta in Keitoku Dentoroku (Keitoku Era Record of the Transmission of the Light), Chapter 1.

[3] Suzuki-roshi defined ji in a later Sandokai lecture: "Ji refers to the phenomenal-to something you can see, hear, smell, or taste as well as to objects of thought or ideas. Whatever can be introduced into our consciousness is ji" (Branching Streams Flow in the Darkness, p. 53; also SR-70-06-01, p. 3).

[4] shusshin-no-katsuro (Jap.): Literally, "the absolute way beyond enlightenment itself."

[5] Suzuki-roshi is referring to Bhadrápala's reply to Shakyamuni Buddha's question in the Shurangama Sutra. Shakyamuni: "Through which expedient did you enter samadhi?" Bhadrápala: "Once, when it was time for the Sangha to bathe, I followed the custom and entered the bathhouse. Suddenly I awakened to the fact that water does not wash away the dust, nor does it cleanse the body. And in that moment I became peaceful and attained the state of there being nothing at all... . The Buddha asks about perfect penetration. As I have been certified to it, touch is the foremost means" (Vol. 5, Part 1, Buddhist Text Translation Society).

[6] Kaiten Nukariya: president of Komazawa University, Tokyo. He was Suzuki-roshi's academic and thesis advisor at Komazawa. Nukariya's controversial book on Buddhism for laypeople, Shoshin Mondo (Questions and Answers about True Faith), was released in 1926, the same year that Suzuki-roshi came to Komazawa. While abroad, Nukariya wrote the first popular book on Zen in English, The Religion of the Samurai (1913).

[7] Possibly Meg Gawler.

[8] Definitely Bill Shurtleff (confirmed by voice).

4 - Summer Sesshin: Third Night Lecture

Monday, September 01, 1969

Summer Sesshin: Third Night Lecture
Tassajara

We are talking about our practice. What is the practice, and what is enlightenment, and how we practice. Someone who is practicing is a man in reality. And the practice we practice is something in reality. And place we practice-some place in reality. And the time you practice is also time in reality. So everything take place in realm of reality. That is true practice. So Dogen-zenji says: "If our practice does not include everything, it is not our practice." And not only practice, but also place you practice, and person who practice, and time to practice-include everything. That is perfect practice.

So counting-breathing practice is not just to count, you know. With all your-with all of your body and mind, you should count the-count your breathing. If you do so, the counting-breathing practice covers everything. So counting-breathing exercise include everything. That is how we count our breathing in our practice: not to count our exhaling mechanically, you know-one, two, three [laughs]. That is not our way. When we count it with all of your effort, physical and mental, that is counting-breathing practice.

Some of you find it difficult-find some difficulty in counting-breathing practice. Difficulties you may have is you tend to count your breathing just mechanically. So naturally, you know, you count, you know-if you, you know, count something: one, two, three, four, five, you know, and again and again you count, and your count-counting will be faster and faster because it is easy. One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten [laughs]. Just you, you know, recite Prajñāparamita-sutra: KAN-JI-ZAI-BO-SATSU-GYO-JIN-HAN-NYA-HA-RA-[starts slowly, then speeds up as he goes along] [laughs, laughter]. That is not our practice, you know, just to know how many times you count your breathing and how long you keep counting without mistake [laughs]. That is not our practice. With your whole mind and body you should count. How you do it is-you know, it is-how you do it is also how you take deep perfect breathing. So by counting you will help, you know, good breathing, good, smooth, deep breathing. So instead of saying some other thing like mu, you know, you count: "one, two."

When you do so, your mind and body will be completely involved in your practice. When your mind and body are completely involved in practice, that is perfect practice because at that time you are practicing counting-breathing practice with all things. How you do things with all your body and mind, and how you practice our zazen is not different. You know, to-to lift something, you know, like this [gestures]-and to have perfect breathing in your practice is same. When you do something, you have some power here.[1] If you do it with your whole body and mind without some power here, you cannot lift things. And if you want to say something, you know, you need some power here, you know. If you recite sutra also you need some power here. That is how we recite sutra. You know, this is, maybe, the difference between our reciting sutra and singing. Singing can be, you know [laughs]-"ahh" [laughs, laughter]. If you make some beautiful, you know, voice with your, you know, what do you call it? Valve? No. [Laughs.]

Student: Vocal cords.

Suzuki-roshi: Huh?

Student: Vocal cords.

Suzuki-roshi: Ah. That is, you know, singing, you know. But even so I think you need, you know, power here or else you cannot sing. You cannot put some feeling to it. Or else the singing will become like some instrument, you know. We can convey our feeling by saying something, so when you do it with your mind and body, you can convey something more than sound. So we-when we recite sutra, we recite sutra: KAN-JI-ZAI-BO [chanted slowly and deliberately]-big sound with some strength here.

So reciting sutra, and practicing zazen, or carrying something is not-we do those things in the same way. But speed may be different, you know, and duration of time may be different. Instead of doing, you know, you do, you know, smoothly and with some strength in your practice. That is actually how you practice counting-breathing practice.

And in this way we study our way. And when you do so, you have no idea of self because you are completely involved in something. You have no self. Self-selflessness is there. When you have no self you can, you know, study Buddhism. In Japanese, to study-or in Chinese also, we use two characters. It is-one is manabu.[2] Manabu means, you know, manabu or na-na-ni-nu-ne-no: it changes. Mana-manabu. Na will change into many words, many different sound. Same kind but different sound. Na-ni-nu-ne. Manabu can be manebu. Mane means-to imitate. [Laughs.] If you have a lot of self you cannot imitate. When you are only-when you are like a child, you can, you know, imitate. So manabu-or "to study," means "to imitate." "To imitate" means to be completely involved in something without self.

["WING"]

["SHU"]

Shu[3]-another character is shu. Shu is, you know-the character of shu is-upper part of the character is "wing," you know. Bird-when a mother bird teach a baby bird how to fly, you know [laughs, laughter], mother try to-like a baby, you know, try to fly like this. He can-she can fly pretty well-very well, but she imitate. [Laughs, laughter.] Teacher become like a, you know, baby bird. Mother bird become a baby bird and so baby bird, you know-that is [laughs, laughter] something possible to do, you know, for a baby bird. So baby bird will do like this [laughing], you know-mother and baby. Then they will, you know, study-baby bird will study how to fly, like this [laughter]. That is also practice, you know.

So we put more emphasis on physical, you know, practice rather than intellectual one. If you-something which is learned by your thinking mind, you know, it tend to be very superficial. It looks like very correct and exact, but actually, you know, the more something-some knowledge become accurate and exact, the more you will lose the true meaning of it. I am very much interested in your way of cooking and Japanese way of cooking. They are two extreme, you know. You mix things, you know. You-when you cook something, and you don't cook something one by one. You mix many things, and cook it, and eat it in one big bowl, like salad, you know. Oil and tomatoes and [laughs] everything is mixed up. And your soup also, you know-it consist of many things. But Japanese way is, you know-if it bean and potato, or daikon,[4] or gobo[5]-we cook separately. And if it is necessary, we put them in big dish, something like ornament, you know-ornament or decoration of the plate. We don't mix things, you know. And even shoyu sauce[6]-we use, most of the time, shoyu sauce in some special container. Goma-shio[7] is here, and shoyu sauce is here, pickles is here. So we-we make our menu, you know, with picture. And here, you know, rice which we draw a menu in white paper. Rice, soup, and [in the] middle of the tray we put otsubo,[8] in which we usually put something like bean-boiled bean, or sesame tofu.[9] And here we have ohira. So we draw a picture of tray, and we put name of the dishes, or veg- [partial word]-name of the vegetables, like this.

Your way of making menu is, you know: bean, you know, so-and-so gram. Gram or what do you call? "Pound"? Not pound. [Laughs.] What do you? Hmm? Ounces, you know. And sugar: so-and-so ounces. And you measure various things you mix, you know. And when you cook it, you mix. So you measure it by ounce-ounces-ounce. But we make our recipe by picture, you know, and by name of the vegetables. We cook it separately, so there is no need to measure, you know. But you must measure it or weigh it, because you have to mix them. To have good taste, you mix things.

And our practice also consists of two ways. When you mix, you know, that is-when you mix things, you don't know which is which, you know, which vegetables-you cannot figure out if this is bean, or shoyu sauce, or some other seasoning because you mix. But anyway, when you eat, you know, in your tummy, all what you ate will be mixed up. But before you cook it-or even Japanese dishes decorated in various way-if we eat it, it will be mixed up. But before you mix up, vegetable was vegetable, and beans are beans, and corn were corn.

So there is two side of one practice, but both is necessary. Maybe Japanese way is one extreme, and your way is another extreme. But usually, whatever the-usually Japanese way and American way is-consists of two ways: to mix up something and to separate something. But the best way to study, you know, is not by, you know, recipe but by [slaps hands], you know, intuition: this much, this much-it may be all right. The more you become skillful, the more you can do it by intuition. So actual practice will be there when you don't need any recipe, you know, when you are able to do it even without recipe. That is, you know, why we practice zazen.

For an instance, you know, if you are not good at counting breathing practice, you tend to be counting breathing, you know, mechanically. Or you may forget, you may lose your count by thinking some other things. Both are, you know, two extreme. But when-but when you are able to count your breathing as well as simultaneously having perfect breathing, that is, you know, how we practice counting-breathing practice.

Last night[10] I talked about Dogen-zenji's saying: [11] "Those who fall on the ground should stand up by ground," you know. And his interp-[partial word]-another version of Dogen-zenji about this point, saying, is: "Those who fall on the ground should stand up by emptiness." You know, this is another advanced saying. And, "Those who fall on-fall in emptiness should stand up by the earth, by the ground."

So here again, you know, "emptiness is form, form is emptiness." Earth is form and earth is emptiness-is form. Form equal emptiness. Emptiness equal form. Why we say our earth-our practice of standing up by earth is empty is-not only earth. Earth can be, you know, many things. Can be a stick. Can be a stone. Can be a diamond [laughs], you know. Can be water.

So there is no particular thing to help our practice. Whatever it is, you know, it will cause disturbance for our practice. But that disturbance will help our-at the same time, will help our practice. So there is no particular thing which will help us. So earth or some particular thing can be many things, so it is emptiness. But even though we say "emptiness," you know, when we practice something, there there is something-some particular thing. So emptiness is form. Even though we say "emptiness," whatever it is it is good, we say at that moment you need something special, some special thing.

So if we don't understand earth in that way, if we don't understand disturbance of our practice in this way, we cannot practice our zazen in its true sense. When we can practice our way, you know, in this way, with understanding of form of-"form is emptiness and emptiness is form," so anything can be aid of our practice, and anything can be a disturbance of the practice. And he says, "What will be the difference," you know, "between the disturbance and aid?"

If someone ask you, "What is the"-excuse me-"What is the-how far it is from earth to emptiness?" If someone ask you, you may answer, "one hundred and eighty miles." [Laughs.] One hundred and eighty miles. It is a long distance, you know. But, you know, he didn't-he just says in his Eihei-koroku, in his Record of Saying. But we should not think if you go to-if you drive one thousand-no, one hundred and eighty thousand miles from emptiness to earth, you know, you may reach emptiness or you may reach earth. That is wrong understanding. Because emptiness is directly-emptiness is earth, and earth is emptiness. It is two names of one reality.

So when he said, "one hundred and eighty miles-eighty thousand miles," he meant it is far away, you know, completely different thing. It is not matter of saying how far it is-the distance from one to the other. We should understand our practice and enlightenment, too. It is two names of one reality. You cannot say, "This is," you know-"if you cross this borderline," you know, "here is enlightened-world of enlightenment. And until you cross this borderline, this is practice." It is not like that. I am just talking about, you know, our actual practice, right now. But how you, you know, understand what I mean is-just practice it like a, you know, baby bird [laughs], and by experience-to experience it. That is only way.

Maybe at Tassajara, you know, you are-I have so many student. And I am not with you always. So it is difficult, you know, to show-to show all of you how to fly [laughs, laughter] like this, you know. But the point is without having much self like a baby bird, just to practice zazen, and just to bow to Buddha, and just to recite sutra, as most Zen students do, is the best way to study our way.

We have transmission, you know, from Buddha to us. And how to transmit our practice is something you should know. Do you know the-I told you something-I told you the story[12] when the Sixth Patriarch [13] visited one big monastery after he received transmission from Konin, the Fifth Patriarch.[14] The students, you know, were in dispute concerning the-seeing flag, you know, flapping or waving in the air.

And some student said, "Air is," you know, "waving".

And the other student said, "No, the banner is waving."

I told you this story already.

And the Sixth Patriarch said, "No. No. You are wrong. All of you are wrong. Your mind is waving." [Laughs.] That was what he said.

There is same story in India too. [15] When the Seventeenth, I think, Seventeenth [Indian] Patriarch-oh, Eighteenth[16]-Eighteenth Patriarch received transmission, there was the teacher, you know. The Sixth-Seventeenth Patriarch asked the disciple, seeing the-hearing-listening to the bell hanging on the far corner of the Buddha hall, asked:

"Which is ringing," you know, "bell or wind?" [Laughs.] You know, wind bell-a kind of wind bell. "Which is ringing, wind or bell?"

The Sixth Patriarch-Seven-Eighteenth Patriarch who is-who was at that time disciple of Seventeenth [?], [answered]: "None of them," you know, "ring. But your mind-our mind is ringing," he said.

That was maybe right answer, but so far the teacher was not so sure about his understanding, so the teacher asked:

"What kind of mind will it be? What kind of mind will it be?"

And the disciple answer, "The complete calmness of them."

Both are in complete calmness. Bell and wind is in state of complete calmness. That was his answer-disciple's answer. So the teacher acknowledged his perfect understanding of it. Same story, but it is easier to understand how we transmit our way from teacher to disciple. "Which is ringing-bell or wind?" Not bell or no wind, but our mind is ringing. "What kind of mind will it be?" "The complete calmness of both of them."

My teacher, you know-my teacher[17] gave [me] a big calligraphy, you know, three characters, gogyakujo: "Both are in complete calmness."

[Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

You may see the big character, gogyakujo, and my teacher's sign. Gogyakujo is: "Both are in complete calmness."

What does it mean by complete calmness, you know? Calmness is not, you know, calmness in comparative sense. At Tassajara it is calm, but city zendo is not calm [laughs]-not this kind of calmness. It means that Tassajara is in complete calmness, and city zendo [is] in complete calmness. But you may say city zendo is noisy, and Tassajara zendo is calm. But we don't mean this kind of calmness when we say "complete calmness." Calmness of Tassajara zendo include, you know-covers everything. Calmness in cosmic scale [laughs]. The San Francisco zendo also, its calmness covers whole universe. Then, you know, San Francisco zendo, when it covers everything, it is independent. And Tassajara zendo, when it covers everything, [is] also independent. Here forty-more than forty people are practicing zazen. Each one of your practice, you know, covers everything. And each one of you are in a state of complete calmness and completely independent from others' practice when you do it with your whole mind and body.

So if so, you know, we cannot say "bell is ringing" or "wind is ringing." If we cannot say bell is ringing or wind is ringing-if we cannot say so, we cannot say our mind is ringing, you know. We cannot say so. Then, "What kind of mind will it be?" will be the question.

So his teacher asked him, "What kind of mind will it be?" And the answer was, "Both are in the complete calmness." You cannot say even, you know, "Bell is ringing." Because if there is only one, you know, bell, who is listening to the bell? If all what exist is-if bell covers everything, leaving [?] anything, we cannot-there is no one to hear it, and there is nowhere to send the sound of the bell. Within big, you know, universe, bell is covering everything. Bell is there. So it is not matter of to listen to or to make a sound or to hear the sound. That is complete calmness.

So if teacher become teacher, you know, there is no disciple. Teacher include disciple, and teacher is independent. If student, you know, become really student, that student include teacher too. So he is independent from teacher. In this way everything exists. That is, you know, only way to transmit something to others without any trouble.

If I give you this book, you know, you may ask: "What is this book?" And, "This book was written by Hashimoto-roshi,"[18] if I say so [I may say?]. "Oh. He passed away a year before last year." "Oh, I know him. He was not so great teacher," or something. Something-some discussion or some complaint will arise. If you do something in term of good or bad, complete or incomplete, or enlightenment or practice, anyway you will get into trouble [laughs], and this trouble will continue forever. You have no time to sit in complete sense.

I want you to appreciate or to think about it-about this point, and practice our way with this spirit, you know. Did you understand? You know, this is-this explanation is both direct explanation and very abstract and logical way of explanation, so you may be bored by it but it can't be helped, you know.

But the point is to be like a child and to imitate something. Even though you don't know what it is, you should imitate. In short, that is best way to study. When you receive transmission, you know, you practice, actually you practice baby, you know-baby-like practice. It looks like very, you know-very foolish or very silly to practice our way in this way-in that way, but that is the most important thing when you really want to study our way. Okay?

Student A: Roshi?

Suzuki roshi: Hai.

Student A: We have some children here now. We've had some children here all summer.

Suzuki roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: But we ask them to imitate us-

Suzuki roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: -we ask them to eat our food-

Suzuki roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: -we ask them to keep silence-

Suzuki roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student A: -and-how do you explain that?

Suzuki roshi: That is-they are actually studying our way, you know. They don't-they don't think they are studying, but actually they are maybe best students [laughs, laughter].

Student A: Well, we're certainly not imitating, you know, a child's way-not the superficial child's way, anyway. And I really don't understand.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. We have to, you know-we must have some definite reason why we should imitate in that way. Or else, you know, you cannot accept it, maybe. So there-it is necessary for you to explain, you know, in some abstract way or some logic-logical or philosophical. It can't be helped. And you will not completely, you know, become selfless unless you, you know, have some chance to experience selflessness or some definite reason why you should study with such a child's way.

But children, anyway, they are studying many things. So best thing for them is let them study something right, something good. Then they will study. Without trying to study, they will study something good, something right. I think that is very important thing, point. So to teach students or child is to, you know, to study by ourselves and for ourselves. If we study right practice, if we practice right practice, they will, you know, study right practice. They are very, you know-not "smart"-very alert. So they know exactly [laughs] what we are doing. And we try not to teach something bad, something wrong. But if we, you know, actually-if we are doing actually something wrong, even though we don't want them to imitate, they will imitate instantly without trying to imitate-good or bad, they [2-3 words]. So it is our responsibility, you know, not their responsibility. When they are young, we have that kind of responsibility for our young generation.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Diana Bartle and Bill Redican (02/15/01).

[1] Possibly referring to the hara.

[2] manabu (Jap.): to learn; to study. maneru or mane suru (Jap.): to imitate; to mimic. mane (Jap.): imitation; mimicry.

[3] shu: to learn, to be taught, to take lessons.

[4] daikon: large white winter radish.

[5] gobo: burdock root.

[6] shoyu: soy.

[7] goma-shio: A table seasoning of ground roasted sesame seeds (goma) and salt (shio).

[8] tsubo: jar, pot, or urn. The prefix o- is honorific.

[9] tofu: soybean curd.

[10] SR-09-00-B.

[11] Quoting Dogen in Shobogenzo "Inmo," who in turn quoted the fourth Indian patriarch Upagupta in Keitoku Dentoroku (Keitoku Era Record of the Transmission of the Light), Chapter 1.

[12] Wu-Men Kuan (Mumonkan, Gateless Gate), Case 29: "The Sixth Patriarch's 'Your Mind Moves.'" Suzuki-roshi told this story in SR-69-08-18.

[13] DaijanHuineng (Jap. Daikan Eno): 638-713. Sixth Chinese Patriarch.

[14] Daman Hongren (Jap. Daiman Gunin or Daiman Konin): 601-674. Fifth Chinese Patriarch.

[15] Denkoroku, Chapter 19.

[16] The Seventeenth Indian Patriarch was Samghanandi (Jap.

Sogyanandai)
(d. 74 B.C.E.). The Eighteenth Indian Patriarch was Samghayathata
(Jap. Kayashata or Jayashata).

[17] Probably Kishizawa Ian-zenji.

[18] Hashimoto Eko-roshi: 1890-c. 1965. Japanese Soto Zen master.

5 - Summer Sesshin: Sixth Night Lecture

Monday, September 01, 1969

Summer Sesshin: Sixth Night Lecture
Tassajara

We discussed about the question and answer between the Seventeenth Patriarch and Eighteenth Patriarch. [1]

"Whether bell is ringing or wind is ringing?" the teacher said.

Disciple said: "Not wind nor bell ringing, but our mind is ringing."

And the teacher said: "What kind of mind is it?"

And the disciple said: "The mind of complete calmness."

And usually when we hear someone say: "No bell-or not bell or wind, but mind is ringing"-then, most people say: "Oh, that is very good answer." But that is not a complete answer. "Mind is ringing" means-if we don't hear the bell, you know, we-we can-we cannot-there is no sound. Because we-our mind hear it and our mind recognize the sound, the sound exist. That is true, but that is not perfect answer [laughs]. Why, you know?

The sound of the bell, you know, is the activity of whole universe, and blow of the-blowing window-wind is also activity of whole universe which, you know, covers everything. That we hear our activity of mind is also the activity of whole universe, not only my activity but also activity of whole universe. So one activity include everything. In this case, that mind is called "big mind" or "capital mind." My mind, you know is-our mind is our small mind. But mind which include everything is capital mind. Although the character is same, but we understand this character in two ways: small mind and big mind.

So the [teacher asked], "What kind of mind is it?" Small mind or big mind, you know. Although the teacher didn't say so, but he meant-what he meant: "What kind of mind is it? Is it the mind which hear something, which recognize something?" And disciple said: "No. That mind is big mind, which is in complete calmness." That was his answer.

Now this is, you know, how we practice zazen. How our mind work or exist is-how our-each one's own mind exist is so-called-it in "inter-relationship." You know, my mind is supported by all of you, you know, and each one's mind is supported by all of mind. So, you know, and at the same time, each one's mind is supporting, you know, supporting everyone's mind.

So, you know, arrow [?] comes from all of you, and I am receiving it. And at the same time I am giving, you know, my mind to each one of you, like this [probably gestures]. That is how our mind exist and how things exist. That is so-called-it inter-relationship. Inter-relationship does not mean just between two but between every being which exist in this world. So, you know, it is rather difficult-it is difficult to say this-"my mind" or "your mind." We cannot say, you know, exactly if this mind is mine or yours. In this way our mind exist. But actually, our mind exist in this way, but because of our karma, you know [laughs], we are doing something extra [laughs]. We have many trouble.

Originally we have no trouble between us. But [laughs] we have home-made trouble. That is so-called-it karma. And as long as we exist, everyone has karma, and from which it is not possible to escape from it all of [a] sudden. Little by little you can change your karma, but you cannot-. We should know this point, you know, also. Even though you practice zazen or attain enlightenment, on the other hand you have [laughs] your own karma. So until you are quite free from your karma, it takes time. This point also we should know [laughs, laughter]. That is why we cannot practice zazen so well, you know-because of our own karma we suffer.

If you eat too much, you know, or if you work too hard, you cannot practice so well. But those problems, you know, in your practice is also-if you think clearly, it is also exist in relationship to others-to other activity you have done.

We have been practicing counting-breathing [laughs] practice. I am sorry-very sorry for you [laughter] for putting you in such a difficult, you know, practice. I know how difficult it is, but I think unless you know-until you know how difficult it is, you will, you know, [not] find out-you will not realize how important it is to practice counting-breathing practice once in a while to check your practice.

Actually, you know, secret of counting [laughter], you know, breathing practice is, you know [laughter]-hmm-if you laugh I will not give you-I will not [tell you] [laughter]. This is rather, you know-this secret is-must be kept only for me, but [laughs, laughter] as you have-you have been practicing so hard without knowing it [loud laughter]-why I put you in this-in this practice [is] I only wanted you to know how difficult it is! [Laughs, laughter.] Not only, you know, counting-breathing practice. Just to-to have good breathing is difficult enough. And we say-Dogen-zenji say-excuse me [drinks water]: "After all, what is your inhaling and exhaling? After all, what is it? Therefore, there is no self." "After all, what is it? What is the exhaling and what is the inhaling? After all, what is it?" Therefore it is-maybe if you write this sentence, you know: "After all, what is-after all [laughs, laughter], what is it?"-you know, and question mark, and many dots. "And so there is no self." "After all," you know, "who you are?"-you know, question mark, and many dots. "So there is no self." Do you understand?

We are receiving many things from numberless-numberless people. And we are giving out many things to numberless people. We think we are just exhaling or inhaling, but where the air come and where our exhaling is going? To where is it going? So there is no self. No one knows what we are doing. What is even just one exhaling? [It] is not possible to know what is it. It is-we say it is inhaling or exhaling. That is-may be right, but actually no one knows what it is.

Everything is like this, you know. Jane's, you know, robe or dress is black, you know. But what is black [laughs]? If you dip the material six time, you know, in strong, black thing [?], it may be almost black but it-not complete, maybe. If you dip it ten times, it-it may be black, but almost-still "almost black." Then what is "black"? No one knows. But we know-as if-we feel as if we know what is black exactly. "Oh, that is black," we say, but if someone ask you: "Is that black?" you may say: "Maybe black. Looks like black."

It is almost impossible to know what is even black and what is human being, what is inhaling and exhaling. And if someone ask you what is Zen [laughs], you know, is it possible to, you know, answer for that kind of complicated, you know, big practice? It is not possible. And what is counting-breathing, you know, practice? The-most people may think that is just beginner's practice-just beginner's practice. [It] cannot be so difficult. "If you have strong willpower, we can do it. If you have enough sleep and eat properly, then you can do it." But not that easy. That you can think that is easy is wrong, completely wrong. Nothing can be so easy. If you start to practice with this understanding for [in] the first place, you know, you can practice counting-breathing practice pretty well: not complete, but pretty well.

Actually, your posture, you know, and your breathing, and your mudra is helping, you know, counting-breathing practice. So counting-breathing practice [is] also helping your posture, and your breathing, and calmness of your mind. So counting-breathing practice is not just counting-breathing practice. It is actually following-breathing practice. And it may be shikantaza too. So all those practice is actually many names of one practice. So it is wrong to think counting-breathing practice is just beginner's practice. It is not so. And just to follow your breathing is not following-breathing practice. Just like just to sit, just counting your breathing, is not counting-breathing practice.

To count your breathing will be, you know, for the beginner, will help your practice, like pain [in] your legs will help your practice. But at the same time, it will be disturbance for your practice. Sometime, you know, you feel much better to sit without counting because, you know, if you count it creates some disturbance to your-for your calmness of your mind.

But the point is, without being disturbed by disturbance, or without relying on any help, to sit properly in shikantaza. So how to, you know, practice our way without relying on something, without being disturbed by something, is the point of our practice.

You may, you know, if someone asks: "How should I do when we have too much idea in our mind? What should I do?" You may say: "Let them come in, let them go out. That is how we practice zazen." To say in that way is very easy [laughs, laughter]-very-very easy. And someone who-who asked him: "Oh, that is quite easy. If you think-even though-then it doesn't matter whatever you think in your practice," you know. "Let them come in [laughs], and let them go out. That-if that is practice, Zen is pretty easy." But actually it is not that easy [laughs].

When you, you know, add something on your practice like counting-breathing practice, naturally, in shikantaza, if you sit, you know, without being bothered by anything, without rely on something else, just to sit in shikantaza. But if you add something to it, you will realize how difficult it is to carry on our practice into our everyday life. And at the same time, if you find it difficult, then there is-there is your key to open the secret. As I told you, you know, I am not giving you the, you know, the secret of the box [laughs], but so that I can-you may have a key to open the secret of the practice, you know, I put you in counting-breathing practice this time.

In dokusan I couldn't-I am sorry I couldn't see you all, but I saw some of old students and some of comparatively new students, and I found out I am very much satisfied with your answer, you know. You gave me the answer which I expect-expected [laughs, laughter]. You came to the same conclusion. I think you have same key as mine. So the problem-next thing we should do is to open the box.

Here Dogen-zenji talks about the-what is complete calmness. The complete calmness means to-to go beyond duality. How to go beyond duality is to practice something with complete effort, physical and mental. That is why we call it complete calmness is because those activity we have include everything. So when each one of us include everything, there is no duality. Even though there is no duality, there is, you know, inter-relationship, and we are helping everyone, and we are helped by everyone. This is the final, you know, conclusion of our practice. Having this understanding always in your mind, and little by little to improve your practice is, in short, how we practice zazen.

Tomorrow we will have shosan ceremony, you know.[2] The shosan ceremony will be question and answer between student and teacher.

And there must be some, you know, common ground, you know. There must be some mutual understanding, you know, to express some certain idea in words. If possible, you know, I want you to ask question about, for an instance, the-about counting-breathing practice or about something which we discussed in our lectures. I think you must have understood something, you know, [of] how we treat things, and how we express our-something which you have in your mind, and how you solve the problem, how you work on your difficulties. Having this kind of, you know, understanding in your mind, I want you [to] put it in form of question, you know.

It does not always mean to ask question is something you ask about which you don't know, you know. Even though you know it, you put it in form of question and ask me. And expect, you know, your-my answer for the question [laughs, laughter]. That is, you know, more like question between teacher and disciple. It is a kind of a mutual training, you know. To ask question is not to ask some help, you know. But to mutual training. In this way, back and forth, ancient Zen student trained themselves.

So you can ask yourself some question. And answer for the question, back and forth, in your mind you should do that. And if you prepare for that [laughs] you can ask me some question, and see what I will say [laughs, laughter]. So question and answer is very interesting, you know. Even though you expect some answer, you know, my answer will go [in] some [laughs] other direction. Even though my answer is something you didn't expect, you should be able to follow the direction. You shouldn't be lost.

And teacher will always try [laughs] to put you in some confusion [laughs, laughter]. Sometime, you know, your teacher will give you some answer which you expect. But back-and-forth in this way we will-we will help with each other.

So if it is question and answer is just to ask something which you don't know-is not so meaningful, you know. When you don't know how you should help yourself, even though you have some answer, you know, it will not work so well because you will not understand what really teacher meant by it. You will not have ear to listen to it, you know. So i-[partial word] ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... to know how we should discuss things-way we discuss things.

I think this is-it is little bit earlier, but without having question and answer [laughs, laughter]-leaving question and answer for tomorrow, we will finish this evening's practice.

Thank you very much.

---

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (12/21/00).

[1] Suzuki-roshi is referring to SR-69-09-00.C, p. 5. This version of the story is told in Denkoroku, Chapter 19. The Seventeenth Indian Patriarch was Samghanandi (Jap. Sogyanandai) (d. 74 B.C.E.). The Eighteenth Indian Patriarch was Samghayathata (Jap. Gayashata).

[2] Lecture SR-69-09-00.E.

6 - Summer Sesshin: Shosan Ceremony

Monday, September 01, 1969

Summer Sesshin: Shosan Ceremony
Tassajara

[Beginning of ceremony was not recorded.]

Suzuki-roshi: ... it will be the foundation of the everyday activity. That is real [1 word].

Student A: Thank you very much.

Student B: Docho-roshi, if our karmic thoughts interfere with our breath counting, just as do the flies in the zendo, should we not try to rid ourselves of them, even though it is a nice aid our practice?

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me [2-3 words]-

Student B: If our karmic thoughts interfere with our breath-counting-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: -just as do the flies in the zendo-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: -should we not try to get rid of them, even though it is an aid to our practice?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Karma is actually something really exist- something you created, and something you feel [1-2 words] or something which you-or which drive you in some certain direction. That is karma. But that karma is not like flies. It is not substantial being. It is just our habit. So it is- there is no need to try to get rid of it. To have right understanding of it through right practice is to get rid of it. So when you practice zazen, you should not have any idea of karma.

Student B: Thank you very much.

Student C [Katharine Thanas]: Docho-roshi, Trudy's[1] ashes are on our altar. And she is with us in our memories and in many other ways. How does she exist for us now in form or emptiness or neither-both?

Suzuki-roshi: In both-in sense of form, she exist in front of you-in each one of you. And the emptiness-she is ready to help every one of us.

Katharine: Domo arigato gozaimasu.[2]

Student D: Docho-roshi, why is it the harder I practice, the worse I feel?

Suzuki-roshi: Because-because you feel worse, you practice hard. And because you practice hard, you feel hard and worse, that's all. So don't-even though you feel bad-worse, you shouldn't be discouraged by it. That you could-that you can overcome is-means you are practicing our true way in its true sense.

Student D: Thank you very much.

Student E: Docho-roshi, I would like to say my mind, but I have a great deal of difficulty in expressing it.

Suzuki-roshi: In-?

Student E: Expressing it.

Suzuki-roshi: Expressing your mind. You are expressing your mind fully always even though you don't know.

Student F: Docho-roshi, what question can you ask a sweet potato?

Suzuki-roshi: A sweet potato? Many question [laughter]. May I eat you? [Laughs, laughter.] When may I eat enough to be [1-2 words]? Many, many question. [Laughs, laughter.]

Student F: Thank you very much.

Student G: Docho-roshi, in counting our breath practice, you said-you told us to put our emphasis-some effort on the exhalation-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student G: -and let the inhalation come naturally. I find my inhalation is very rugged, and it seems some-some-there seems some imbalance by putting all the effort in one direction. I wondered if there's any special reason why you emphasize the exhalation.

Suzuki-roshi: Emphasize. I mean to have complete exhale. Maybe your exhaling is not complete. Even though you try to exhale fully, may not be deep enough or complete enough.

Student G: I feel my inhalation is not complete unless I make an effort. Would there be any-would it be all right to make an effort, a slight effort, on the inhalation too?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, yes. If so [?]. But we can exhale-exhalation mean to empty your chest and to make more space for your lung, pushing everything down. So if you know how to do it-how to make complete exhalation, then naturally I think you can make good inhale.

Student G: Thank you very much.

Student H: Docho-roshi, mada.

Suzuki-roshi: Mada is-mada mean "not yet." [3] Not yet is very important words. Already because we will have-never have-we will never have a chance to say "already." [4] Mada, mada, mada is very good practice.

Student H: Thank you very much.

Student I: Docho-roshi, what is there to say?

Suzuki-roshi: Nothing.

Student I: Thank you very much.

Student J: Docho-roshi, anyways, is this it?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. [Long pause before and after.]

Student J: Ah. Thank you very much.

Student K: Docho-roshi, before a mirror [?] comes it has already arrived. Counting to ten never was [?] one. Walking to, there is no approaching. Crickets are chirping, and the flies fly. You tell us to extend ourself in practice. In what direction can I extend?

Suzuki-roshi: Direction? There is no direction, but not to lose anything-to be kind to everything, one by one, is the direction of the practice. So in our practice we have no particular goal or object-special object. So whatever it is you should work on it, one by one.

Student K: Thank you very much.

Student L: Docho-roshi, even if I go [4-6 words]. Is that-how can I be with you?

Suzuki-roshi: [1-2 short sentences unclear.]

Student M: Docho-roshi, there seems to be such a difference between myself when I'm completely involved with counting my breath or in some activity, and when I have my thinking mind. I'm always hunting for some way to put the two together. Somehow it seems very dualistic to always be trying to resist my thinking mind.

Suzuki-roshi: Sometimes when you think, you should sit completely with pure thinking and not resisting thinking mind. But to rely on thinking mind is not so good. You can practice thinking, but the answer you get by thinking is not only answer you should know. You will have some direction to work on. If you have some direction to work, then you should be completely involved in the work, directed by thinking mind. That is true practice, and that is pure thinking. To think and to know the direction is two different things.

Student M: But it seems like those two minds are always battling each other beyond my control-

Suzuki-roshi: Ah-that is not thinking.

Student M: -and there's nothing I can do about it.

Suzuki-roshi: That is not thinking. That is a kind of lack of conviction. You need my stick, maybe [laughs, laughter].

Student M: Something [laughs].

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe so. Later I will give you big stick [laughs, laughter].

Student M: Thank you very much.

Student N: Docho-roshi, if zazen is to make us free of all things, how should we know the choice between one thing and another-how should we make it?

Suzuki-roshi: If the time come, you will completely know what [5-6 words] should be.

Student N: Thank you very much.

Student O: Docho-roshi, what am I asking you?

Suzuki-roshi: I know what you want to ask me pretty well. But as you don't ask me now, I also don't want to answer you [laughter].

Student O: But I'm not sure that I know. That's why I thought maybe you would know [laughs, laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: I know [laughs, laughter].

Student O: Will I know sometime to ask you?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. But not now [laughter].

Student O: Thank you very much.

Student P: Docho-roshi, I always have some question, but the question is always formless-can't limit it to ask.

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm Yeah. That is the nature of doubt or question. As Susan [Student O?] said, it is difficult to put your question into words-very difficult. That is why you study various teaching of Buddhism. And it will give you some way to formulate your question. That is why you study some teaching.

Student P: Thank you very much.

Student Q [Bill Shurtleff]: Docho-roshi, in walking, the floor seems smooth and cool underfoot. Several winters and several summers. Push brooms, and damp mops, and brush of feet, and foreheads from people who are here, and people who are not here, and people who are living, and people who are not living. Right here, in the midst of the three treasures, with all sentient beings, where is the mind that includes everything?

Suzuki-roshi: Whenever you feel in that way, wherever you go with that feeling, the big mind will be. But the great mind [2-4 words] more than that. But you are-you should be very grateful to know even a part of it.

Bill: Thank you very much.

Student R: Docho-roshi, although no one ever touches the bell, yet sound constantly issues forth from it. How is this possible?

Suzuki-roshi: That was-that happened [1-2 words] from beginningless beginning, and maybe [1-2 words] beginningless-endless end. That is how things exist. How to know-once you know how things exist, you know, [is] the most important point for us to work on rather than what will become of it [?] or how it start.

Student R: What do you mean "how things exist"?

Suzuki-roshi: How things exist is how you survive [?], and how you [1-2 words], and how to be kind to others, why don't you feel so good or feel good.

Student R: To understand the causes and the-?

Suzuki-roshi: "Causes" means not substantial causes. How it goes, you know, is what we mean by "cause."

Student R: How the process goes?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Because there is no substantial thing exist. Only thing we can know is how one whole big being goes.

Student R: Thank you very much.

Student S: Docho-roshi, on the sixth morning I stopped counting my breath.

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student S: On the sixth morning I stopped counting my breath. And when I inhaled I meditated on life. And when I exhaled I meditated on death. And sometimes I found that when I was inhaling I was meditating on death, and when I exhaled I was meditating on life. And on my cushion my life and death went tumbling over each other. And something I recognized was watching-something that keeps telling me it's happening the way it should. And when I am ready, I will be taken. But I still cannot accept my doubt and my fears. And when I get off of my zafu, I look for the way out.

Suzuki-roshi: When you count your exhaling and inhaling? Or exhaling only?

Student S: When I counted, I was counting exhalations.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student S: When I did this I was meditating "life, death, life, death."

Suzuki-roshi: Which?

Student S: Both.

Suzuki-roshi: Counting or-?

Student S: No, just the words. Life. Death. And-and-Suzuki-roshi: Is there any difference between "one" and "life and death"?

Student S: They tumbled over each other.

Suzuki-roshi: Tumbled over each other?

Student S: Yes. Sometimes-

Suzuki-roshi: [Hits kyosaku (wake-up stick) twice-possibly hitting the student.] Is this "death" or "one"? Or life or death? Which?

Your practice is-your understanding of practice is not right. Okay? Think about it. What is death, and what is life? What is one, and what is two? And is there some difference between them or not? Your practice should not be tumbling over.

Student S: Thank you very much.

Student T: Docho-roshi, how long have we been sitting together, and how long will we continue to sit together?

Suzuki-roshi: No one knows. [Laughter.]

Student T: Thank you very much.

Student U: Docho-roshi, there are many beautiful rocks in your garden. Do they follow the same breathing practice we do?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student U: How do they do it? [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: It is no wonder we can't know [?].

Student U: Thank you very much.

Student V: Docho-roshi! HO! [Shouted by student.] Not me. Not even a sound. What is it?

Suzuki-roshi: Sound.

Student V: Thank you for everything.

Student W: Docho-roshi, wind blows, bell rings, pain in the legs [laughter]. Who enjoys this?

Suzuki-roshi: You enjoy it. [Laughter.]

Student W: Who suffers this?

Suzuki-roshi: You suffer.

Student W: Then I am ignorance.

Suzuki-roshi: [1-2 words.] [Laughter.]

Student X: Docho-roshi, my mind says "yes," my stomach says "no!" and the result is "maybe." Yes! No! Maybe. What are these?

Suzuki-roshi: That is confusion. [Laughter.]

Student X: How do I clarify the confusion?

Suzuki-roshi: When your tummy says "yes", you should accept it. When your mind say ["no"?], you should accept it. If you cannot accept both, you should accept "maybe."

Student X: Thank you very much.

Student Y: Docho-roshi, everything is changing as I walk down the aisle. [Laughter.] I don't-I have no idea what to say. I had about a-I've had many questions, and they've all changed, and I-but I- [laughter]. I want to assert myself [laughter], so I feel I should say something. But it doesn't matter at all.

Suzuki-roshi: I don't mind at all about you. Is that okay?

Student Y: Sure.

Suzuki-roshi: Go to city right now. [Laughter.]

Student Y: As a matter of fact [laughter], can I wait a couple days? [Laughter.] Just for a while, though.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student Y: Thank you very much.

Student Z: Docho-roshi, the rice bowl is next to the soup bowl. [Laughter.] Hinyo-hinyan [Hinayana?] are not well-understand in our- and judgment is mechanical and censorial. Breathing practice is interrupted by the croakings of conceptual thought. What is it that will deliver us from our ignorance and bring us to the true light of perfect wisdom?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm. If you seek for perfect wisdom, in that case there is no perfect understanding.

Student Z: What will lead usto the perfect understanding?

Suzuki-roshi: When you have brown rice, you should eat brown rice. When you have soup, you should eat soup. Whatever it is, you should be ready to take it and eat [?]. I think you can [1-2 words].

Student Z: Where is our intuition?

Suzuki-roshi: Intuition? If you know where it is, that is not intuition.

Student Z: Thank you very much.

Student AA: Docho-roshi, what is that in your hand?[5] [Silence.] What can you do with it? Is that all? [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: I think you are alert enough to feel before I hit you [hits stick somewhere-sounds like table]. [Laughter.]

Sometime with laughter, sometime with tear, we could express-we could communicate our perfect practice. Now sesshin looks like over, but our actual practice started right now, like you count your breathing from one, two-and one, ten, to one. This practice will continue forever.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: Original City Center tape transcribed verbatim by Diana Bartle and Bill Redican (3/26/01).

[1] Gertrude Horton (Trudy) Dixon, one of Suzuki-roshi's students. She died at the age of 30 on July 9, 1969. (See SR-69-07-11.)

[2] Thank you very much.

[3] mada (Jap. adjective): "not yet" (with negative).

[4] It sounded like Suzuki-roshi was saying "already" in contrast to "not yet."

[5] Possibly a kyosaku.

7 - Sharp Iron, Pure Silk

Sunday, September 14, 1969

Sharp Iron, Pure Silk
Tassajara

Sunday school-a Sunday-school girl saw me in sitting, and she said: "I can do it." And she crossed her legs like this [gesturing], and then said, "And what? [Laughing, laughter.] And what?" She sit like this and said, "And what?" I was very much interested in her question because many of you have same question [laughs, laughter]. You come every day to Zen Center and practice Zen. And you ask me, "And what? [Laughs.] And what?"

I want to explain this point a little bit. I cannot-I don't think I can explain it fully because it is not something to be-to ask or to be-to answer. You should know by yourself. We-why we sit in some formal position is through your body you should experience something, you know, by doing-by formal sitting-something you yourself experience not by mind-by teaching, but by physical practice.

But to be able to sit in some form and to attain some state of mind is not perfect study. After you have full experience of mind and body, you should be able to express it in some other way, too. That happens quite naturally. You don't stick to some formal position anymore, but you can express same feeling-same state of mind, or you can convey your mind to others by some way. And even though you do not sit in some certain form-for an instance, in chair, or in standing position, or in working, or in speaking, you can-you will have same state of mind-state of mind [in] which you do not stick to anything. This is what you will study through our practice. That is the-what you will, you know-that is the purpose of practice.

Yesterday [visitor] Yasunari Kobata was speaking about something about Japanese literature. Of course, Japanese people studied Chinese culture maybe from 600-six-700 [CE], maybe. For a long long time, Japanese people are studying Chinese culture through Chinese characters. And then, as you know, Kobo-daishi[1] started kana hiragana, and then Japanese people established some [of] their own culture. You know, that is how-it is-same thing will happen in our practice. After stopping sending any students to China officially, one hundred years after stopping sending official student from government to China to study Chinese culture, at Fujiwara period,[2] especially in Michinaga's time, we had exquisite Japanese culture.[3]

Anyway, we established Japanese-beautiful Japanese culture in literature and in calligraphy too. After that period, the literature and calligraphy was not so good as we had at that time. He said some of them were too formal, and some of them is too-this is something which you may not understand-too-anyway [laughter] we could see [laughs]-we can see his ego in his writing or in his work.

Through practice we, you know, get rid of-for long long practice we get rid of our ego, you know, by training. Training means-like, you know-actually, to train in Chinese or Japanese means neru. Neru is, you know-to refine silk, you know, we wash it many times so that it can be white enough and soft enough to weave. That is neru. This part is thread, you know. To, you know, to refine the material is neru.

Or if we-sometime we use iron, you know. We-sometime the character consist of two parts. One part is just pronunciation. The other part is iron. To, you know, train-not train-how do you-what do you say? Hit iron when it is hot-while it is hot you hit iron like this. And-

Student: "Forge."

Hmm?

Student: "Forge."

Forge? No-forge is different. Forge is to-

Student: To hit the iron and you mold it or shape it-shape it.

Forge? Oh. To shape. Not to make shape. Just to make iron strong. Forge is to put something iron-melted iron in something.

Student: Temper it.

Yeah, temper. Yeah. That's the word.

We should hit it and it should-we should hit it when it is hot, you know. After [laughs] it is cold, even though you hit, it doesn't work [laughter]. Training is something like this, you know. When you are young, and when you have a lot of ego [laughs], when you have a lot of desires-evil desires, so-so to say. Even though, you know, evil desire, if you, you know, rub it, you know, and wash it, you will be quite soft, pure white silk. Even though, you know, you have various desires, and too much strength [laughs, laughter], if you hit, you know, if you temper it enough, you will have strong, you know, sharp iron like Japanese sword. This is, you know, how we training-train ourselves. He said-I was very much interested in what he said.

After that, there-after Fujiwara period, in comparison to Emperor Saga's work or Kobo-daishi's work or Tachibana Hayanari's[4] work-not so good, you know. Some of them is too-too much ego in it, you know, and some of them are too formal. You cannot see anything-any characteristic-any personality in calligraphy. The personality we see in their work should be well-trained, you know, personality-not much ego in it. The difference between-you may-I think you may understand this point: the difference between personality and ego. Ego is something to-which covers your good personality. Everyone has his own character, but when that character is-if you don't train yourself, your character is covered by ego and you cannot see-you cannot appreciate your personality. So in their work, you know, he said, we cannot completely accept-appreciate their work as he appreciate the calligraphy in Fujiwara period.

That was, maybe, because of war-civil war. Or too heavy control over people like Tokugawa government. To control people by force-by some policy or force, is not the way how to train people. The people themselves, you know, try to train themselves, not by government or force or policy.

Fujiwara period we had a lot of freedom. But at that time, there were various scholars and artist who studied arts and philosophy or religion in various way. They tried various way, and they had pretty good teachers. Anyway, this is why we practice zazen. By ourselves and for ourselves we should practice zazen. To give more pressure on yourself, you know, we say-as Dogen-zenji said: "We settle ourselves on ourselves."
[Laughs.] Actually, Dogen-zenji was born 1200-right after the Michinaga's time. And he did not care for any fame or profit. And he devoted himself just to the truth. And he thought it may not be possible for people at his time to understand his way. But some other day, in future, someone may understand his spirit and his way. And he-that is why he wrote so many books for his descendant.

This kind of thing is not something I should talk about, but something I must show you [laughs], you know, by my everyday life, which is not so good [laughs]. And I am afraid you will study only my, you know, weak point [laughs]. I think Zen Center is developing pretty well, but we are not, you know, not yet completely on the track. We should know why we should practice zazen, and we should be able to acknowledge something really good from something which looks like good [laughs]. There is a big difference something which looks like good and which is very-really good. Unless you train yourself by hard practice, you have no eyes to see; you have no feeling to appreciate something which is very good. Only when many people have this kind of eye to see or feeling-to feel something good, will we not [sic] have really good teachers and students. This is a mutual practice, as Buddha said. That Buddha was great is because people were great. When people were not ready, there will be no Buddha [laughs]. That is very true. I don't want every one of you to be a great teacher [laughs]-I don't. But most of us must have to [two?]-must have eyes to see which is good and which is not so good. This kind of mind will be acquired by practice.

Another thing he said was-no, he didn't, you know, say actually in this way, but-he said perhaps even in Fujiwara period Japanese people did not completely-were no so good as Chinese people-Chinese culture in calligraphy. He was talking about-mostly about calligraphy. As you know, Chinese people, you know, use always brush more than Japanese do. And Chinese people-in China they have various brush. And we Japanese has-have no material to make good brush. We have many bamboo [laughs], but we have not much sheep or various animal ...
[Tape turned over. Sentence was probably not finished. Original transcript continued with: from which to make brushes.]

... of it.

So our-Japanese people's training in calligraphy cannot be so good as Chinese people. That will be the reason-main reason. But before-before [Japanese] people master Chinese calligraphy completely, they started already some unique-unique calligraphy to Japanese people-Japanese-as a Japanese calligraphy. This point is very interesting point. Before Japanese people completely study Chinese way, Japanese people already started his own way too-Japanese way too. Maybe that is the destiny of the, you know, some people who was born in some particular place.

But Buddhist has been-have been very sincere about his point. That is why we have transmission. Especially Chinese master put strong emphasis on transmission. And Japanese people-Zen students or teachers-put emphasis on transmission. That is a reason why is to master, you know, teacher's way completely. And-and then you should be free from it. That is very hard practice. That is why it takes so long time to be a Zen master. It is not knowledge. It is not some power. The point is whether he is trained enough to make himself pure white material and very sharp iron. At that time, without trying to do anything, you will have-you can express your true personality in its true sense. If we cannot see any personality in his work, or in his personality, means that he is not yet eliminated his habitual way.

You know, my habit [laughs], you know, is absentmindedness [laughter]. So naturally I am very forgetful [laughs]. Something wrong with my, you know, with my brain, maybe, or this is my inborn tendency. I worked on it pretty hard. I started to work on it for-when I went to my teacher.[5] Thirty-I was thirteen years [laughing, laughter]. I was very forgetful, even when I was thirteen. It is not because of old age that I am so forgetful. Not because of my memory, you know; that is my tendency. I worked pretty hard on-on this, but I couldn't do anything about this. But while I am doing this, you know, I became more and more-I could get rid of my self, you know-selfish way of doing something. If the purpose of, you know, practice-training is just to correct our weak point, I think it is almost impossible to renew or to correct your way-habit or way. It is almost impossible. But it does not-even so, it is necessary [laughs], you know, to work on it, because if you work on it, your character will be, you know, trained and your ego will be got rid of.

People say I am very patient, but actually I am very impatient character, you know. My inborn character is very impatient. But while I am working on my forgetfulness, now I don't try to [laughing]-to correct it. I gave up. But I'm-I don't think I-my effort was in vain, because I studied many things. I have to be very patient [laughs], you know, to correct my habit. And I must be very patient when people criticize me, you know, about my forgetfulness. "Oh! He is so forgetful. [Laughing.] We cannot rely on him at all. What should we do with him?" And teachers scold me, you know, every day: "This forgetful boy!" [Laughs, hits stick on table several times.]

But I didn't like to leave him, you know. I want-just I wanted to stay with him. I-I was very patient whatever-with whatever he says-he said. So I'm-I think I am very patient with some others' criticism about me. You know, whatever they say, I don't mind so much. I am not so angry with them. Actually, if you know how important-how important it is to train yourself in this way, I think you will understand what is Buddhism. And this is the most important point in our practice.

As Buddha said: Nin-nin is patience, endurance, virtue of endurance-is greater than virtue of observing all the precepts we have. The virtue of endurance is greater than the merit of asceticism. That was what Buddha said. I think this point is very important for our practice, especially, I think, for American students.

Thank you very much.

-----

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican 8/4/00.

[1] Kobo-daishi: Posthumous name of Kukai (774-835): creator of the hiragana alphabet and founder of the Shingon school of Japanese Buddhism.

[2] The Fujiwara family dominated the Japanese Imperial Court from 867-1160 CE by means of a succession of regencies, chancellorships, and imperial marriages.

[3] Fujiwara Michinaga (966-1027): dajo daijin (chief minister of state) under whose leadership the power of the Fujiwara dynasty rose to its zenith and Japanese literature in particular flourished (e.g., The Tale of Genji and The Pillow Book).

[4] Emperor Saga (Saga-tenno, 52nd emperor of Japan, reigned 810-823), Kobo-daishi, and Tachibana no Hayanari(d. 842) were the three great brush-pen calligraphy masters (sanpitsu, "Three Great Brushes") in the early 9th century during the Heian period (794-1185 CE).

[5] Gyokujun So-on.

8 - Why I Became a Priest

Tuesday, September 16, 1969

Why I Became a Priest
San Francisco

I have not much chance to think about why I came to America or why I became a priest, but today when-while I was talking with Peter[1] about something-my personal history-I had to think about, you know, why I came to America. And right now, I am thinking about why I became a priest [laughs].

My father[2] was a priest, and his temple[3] was quite-not small, but very poor temple. We haven't not-we had very difficult time, even though he-my father wanted to give me some better clothing, he-he haven't-he hasn't-he hadn't not much money.

I know-I remember his father was making candle. When I came to America, you know, sometime I made a candle by the left-over candle, you know, with left-over candle. It is pretty, you know-usually no one make candle, you know, to sell, but he-he made a lot of-he was making a lot of candle with iron, you know, he made himself some-something to make candle, and he sold it-not near my temple, but he went [to] Oiso City,[4] maybe four, five miles from my temple.

And I think that was the time when my father [was] expelled from [laughs] another temple[5] and came to that temple.[6] I can imagine how poor we are by that-only by that story. So even children wear hakama. Do you know hakama? [7] A kind of skirt-skirt-like-ceremonial, you know. When we have celebration we would wear hakama.

But I haven't any hakama,so I have to-I would attend the ceremony[8] at-in my school without hakama, and I was, you know, very much-I didn't feel so good, you know, because I had no hakama to wear. But somehow he bought hakama and gave it to me to wear for the ceremony. And he, you know, gave [me] the hakama, and-and I-when I wear that hakama in the-as my friend did, my father said: "That is not the right-correct way to wear it. You should wear like this, and you should tie hakama this way," you know. [Sounds like he is gesturing.] No one tie hakama at that time in that way. Maybe that is too formal [laughs].

So when I almost went out of my front gate-front gate was big gate, you know. Even though temple was very poor, but that temple-once that temple was very big temple in that area, so there was a big gate. As soon as I get out of the gate, I, you know, untie [laughs] the hakama-untied the hakama, and tied it as my friend did, without knowing my father was watching me [laughs, laughter], you know. He was very angry with me, untied the hakama, and tie it in some other way.

And he-I remember he was very short-tempered. When I noticed he was running out of the temple with some-something-maybe stick or something [laughs.] He was running after me. Of course I already started to run away from the [laughs, laughter]-temple. It must be-it might be very happy for him-wearing his boy, you know, new hakama for himself and go to school as most people wear-most people do. But, you know, but he was very angry, you know. I think that is why he was so angry, you know. After a great effort, he bought a hakama for-for myself and-but at that moment, you know, I didn't appreciate his kindness so much and untied [laughs] the way he untie the hakama and change the style. And I think how he felt-I think I understand how he felt, but-

And background of this kind of difficulty for-for priest was the policy of Meiji government. At that time, almost all the-at the beginning when he was born-my father was born, most temples-Buddhist temple destroyed, and the property which belonged to various Buddhist temple was-was offered to shrine-Shinto shrine. And before Meiji period, Shinto shrine and Buddhist temple was in the same site. And Buddhist rather taking care of Shinto shrine. And-but policy of Meiji government was to make Shintoism as a national, you know, religion. But Meiji government didn't have not much-not much power to afford various shrine, so what they did is to take away the property which belonged to Buddhist temple and change the property to Shinto shrine's property. And-and so they-they lost almost all the property at that time.

There-my father told me what has happened in his time in various temp- [partial word]-in Bud- [partial word]-various Buddhist temple at that time. For an instance, there were-there is a big shrine called Hattasan near my temple.[9] But that-all the-all the property which belonged to Hatta shrine was property of small temple in-near the shrine-Hatta shrine. Or that temple, Tendai temple, was taking care of Hatta shrine. Not only the changing the title of the property to Shinto, but also they destroyed Buddhist gate for the building, you know, for Shinto shrine. Even Shinto shrine-Shint- [partial word]-had Buddhist gate which is built like a Buddhist temple. [On] both side there were, you know, guardian of Buddhist-Nio-sama-two Nio.[10] And that is not proper to-for the Shinto shrine. So they had to destroy that kind of gate. So after destroying those gates and throwing out the guardian for the temple, they made those temple into a shrine-Shinto shrine. That kind of things happened in various famous temples in Japan.

We have Hattasan-Hatta shrine, or Akiha Shrine,[11] which was not Shinto shrine. Akihasan or Hattasan was not Shinto-Shintoism. It-it was famous for Buddhist temple. But now it is Shinto shrine, and there is no Nio-sama in those temples-shrine. After throwing out those Buddhist symbols and images, the governor of the district burned it and told someone who was taking care of the shrine to make ofuro-ofuro. Do you know? Ofuro-it is "bath"-hot bath [laughs].[12] And he-he said: "It is nice to have-to make a-to have a bath made by Buddhist symbol-symbols." [Laughs.] That-the old man who was taking care of the temple for a long time said: "It may be Buddha's mercy," you know [laughs]. "Buddha"-or "Buddha is so kind to make unusually," you know, "unusual bath for you." It was so-he was-he-"I was amazed at his mercy to make," you know, "to make you a good bath."

So [laughs] that kendai-means "governor"-Hayashi-his name was Hayashi.[13] Hayashi-Governor Hayashi was scared of [laughs] that statement, or scared of him [the caretaker]. And in one week he became a blind-he became a blind man. I don't know why, but [laughs] people say that is because Hayashi the government-governor acted very severely for the Buddhist. That is why he became a blind [man]. And he believed, you know.

Since then he became afraid of power of Buddhism, and he went to Aburayama.[14] Aburayama is small-not small but pretty big old, old Buddhist temple where there is no Shinto shrine. So he went to Aburayama and to pray for his eyes. There was hot baths in that-in the shrine. Everyday he-he stayed at that shr- [partial word]-at that temple and taking hot baths there, and prayed for his eyes. I don't know what has happened to his eyes, but people remember. People-this is a famous story which people tell with each other. In this way, Buddhist temple at that time had a very difficult time.

My father told me this kind of story once in a while. As I was very young, I was very much impressed by that story-by that kind of story. As I haven't not much, you know-I-as I couldn't have usual life as my friend had, naturally, you know, my friend sometime making fun of me, you know. I have no money to, you know, to go to barber, or my father didn't have money to buy clipper, you know. So he would shave my head [laughs] with his razor, you know. This is the most-this is the less expensive way to shave. Whenever I appear in shaved head, you know, my friend making-would make fun of me, slapping my head [laughs, laughter], and feeling my head. So my life at school was not so happy. So I was rather stay, you know-I was rather to stay in classroom than play with my friend in schoolyard.

I th- [partial word]-I think that is the time when I made up my mind to be a priest, again [?] [laughs], you know. But, you know, not usual priest. I wanted to be a unusual priest to-with, you know, to tell them what is Buddhism and what is the truth, or good enough to give some lecture to-to the-to them, you know. So I determined [laughs] to be a good priest.

And my teacher would-used to tell me how to be a great man [laughs.] "Unless we have difficult time," you know, "no one can be a great man." So the people in that district-there is no-there was no great man in that area because the people in that area, Kanagawa Prefecture,[15] does not like to go to Tokyo and study hard. People at that-in that area stay always-anyway, doesn't have enough courage to go out of the country or state or prefecture.

"So if you," he said, "if you want to-want to be successful, you should go out of this state or prefecture." So I determined [laughs] go out of the Kanagawa Prefecture. So I decided, anyway, to leave my home, and I was thinking about where should I go. But once in a while, maybe twice or three times a year, a priest, my father's disciple,[16] would visit my father. So I know him pretty well. And I liked him so much. So I asked him, you know, to take me to his temple [laugh], and he was amazed. And he said yes. So I asked my father to go to my-to go to Shizuoka Prefecture, to go with him. So my father also agreed with it, and I went to my master's temple[17] when I was thirteen years old.

I had, of course, very difficult time at my teacher's temple. I was too young, you know, to follow the training of that temple. When I was there, when I arrived at my teacher's-my master's temple, one hundred days of training was going on. There were seven or eight monks, and they have-they had their special training, getting up pretty early and reciting-practicing zazen, reciting sutra.

At that time I saw famous a Zen master-Oka Sotan-and his disciple Oka Kyugaku,[18] and those famous teachers were there. I was fortunate to see them, even though I-I didn't know they were so famous. But training was very strict.

The-Oka Sotan-roshi was a-did not become a archbishop, but under him we have many noted scholars and monks and Zen masters. He is, maybe, the-one of the most important person in our Soto history in Meiji period. Yasutani-roshi's, you know, grand-teacher is Oka-roshi. And my-of course, my master's teacher is Oka-roshi. And Eto [Sokuo]-Professor Eto's teacher was Oka-roshi. And there is numberless powerful teacher under him-appeared under him. So I think I was lucky to be there. And I was encouraged by-by them.

But difficult thing is to get up-as I get up. Although they didn't say "You should get up," because I was so young-so they-they didn't say "You should get up." But I tried to get up anyway. Sometime I was too sleepy, so [laughs] I was listening to their reciting sutra in bed, you know: Kan ji zai bo satsu-[laughs] That is-was-that is the first sutra I learned by heart, you know [laughs, laughter]: Kan ji zai bo satsu gyo Hanya Haramita.

It is quite easy to recite sutra if you listen to it when you are quite young. You don't need any instruction, as you haven't [laughs], you know-you don't-you don't have-without telling you how to recite Prajñāparamita Sutra, almost all of you can recite it.

But, you know, to me, at that time, layman was my enemy [laughs], you know, who would make fun of Bud- [partial word]-monks and Buddhists, and young, you know, young Bud- [partial word]-young trainee, you know. At that time, the-as the policy of government was like-was like that, the policy of government at that time [was] how to make weaker-make Buddhism weaker, and how to make Shinto powerful as a national religion. That was the fundamental polic- [partial word]-religious policy of Meiji government. Maybe that is why in Meiji government, we have a pretty good priest, you know. They were well-trained priest by wrong policy of Meiji government [laughs]. You know, they were so-anyway, Buddhists at that time suffered a lot, directly or indirectly. But until I understand this kind of history or policy of Meiji government, I was rather angry with people, at least who treated me [laughs], you know, so badly.

I think-I think that is the reason why I became a priest, you know. And this reason also is the reason why I came to America, you know. After I studied why we had so difficult time, I could solve the-some antagonism towards people. I have no more antagonistic, you know, feeling against them. But how to, you know, make them understand Buddhist way was my next, you know, problem, which is-which I found it almost impossible. So I gave up. I almost gave up. [Laughs.]

So I decided to go abroad. Or if-if I cannot go to somewhere like America, I thought I-I would go to Hokkaido, you know, where there is not much people who knows what is Buddhism. But when I asked-after my schooling, after I finished my schooling, I asked my master to go to America. And he said no. "Then how about Hokkaido?" [laughing] I said. He was, you know, furious and mad at me. So, you know, I knew there must be some reason why. And I knew he loved me very much. So I thought I should give up my former nation-notion of going abroad.

But my, you know, heart didn't change [laughs]. So after finishing what my teacher told me, I came to America. But it was-maybe I was already too old to come. And as I gave up study of language, you know, I almost forgot all the English I-I studied at school.

But anyway, I arrived at San Francisco ten years ago. And-and so I feel very happy to be here, you know-to have many unknown [laughs] students who don't know not much about Buddhism [laughter]. You think Buddhism is something good-some good teaching, and that makes me very happy [laughs, laughter]. If you have, you know, some preconceived idea about Buddhism like some Japanese, you know, people, I-I don't think you would be a Buddhist, partly because, you know, because of misunderstanding.

So naturally I was, and I am maybe, very critical with old style of Buddhism. I was always curious about why people does not like Buddhism, you know. So I was also very critical with Buddhist way. I have had very negative feeling about Buddhis- [partial word]-Buddhist way in one side. But on the other hand I know what was, you know, true Buddhism. I s- [partial word]-

I haven't-I have not much time to study Buddhism in some scholarly way, or I haven't not much time to practice even zazen, because I was busy in everyday life of-everyday activity of-everyday activity as a priest.

So what we, you know, wanted to establish-what I want to establish here is some, you know, Buddhism in some pure form. Even though it may be difficult, but it is much-you will be happy even though it is difficult to study something pure and something original, forgetting all about bad, demoralized, so-called-it "traditional," you know, Buddhist way. The Buddhist way we have in Japan is a outcome of various element like government policy. Some, you know, people use-have used, you know, Buddhist power for himself. Some ruler of the-some of our rulers tried to ... [Sentence not finished. Tape turned over.]

... for the Buddhist. And some of the bad side of Buddhism is created by Buddhist rulers or Buddhist-they created-they destroyed Buddhism by themselves, sometime.

So there is no wonder why, you know, Japanese people has-haven't not much good feeling about Buddhism. But here not much people knows what is Buddhist way, so it is easier to restore the Buddhism in its original form. Right now I regret, you know, that I didn't study so hard-more deeply, more widely. I didn't study Buddhism. But I think you will study, you know, our way more freely and more deeply and more widely. That is my hope, you know. I -I don't think I can do it, but my successor will achieve it.

This kind of feeling is the feeling most, you know, monks and priest in my age may have. Not only me, but also almost all the priest in my age will have it. And the feeling I have, you know-I had will be the feeling the-almost all the young priest may have, even in-in nowadays.

So I-I hope you will have various supporters. If you become sincere enough and pure enough to study Buddhism for sake of Buddhism-not for sake of yourself or sake of fame or with some gaining idea. If you study it for sake of Buddhism or for sake of truth you will have, you know, many supporters. Not only American people but also Japanese people will support you. That is, I think, quite sure. Even though you are not so successful right now, in five or ten days, I think, you will have many friends. I think that is quite sure.

Do you have some question? Hai.

Student A: Is there any abstention without repression?

Suzuki-roshi: Without what?

Student A: Repression.

Suzuki-roshi: Refreshing?

Student A: Do you know the word "repression"?

Student B: Repression. Making yourself forget about something.

Suzuki-roshi: Is there-will you repeat your question?

Student A: What I am interested in is the-well, I don't know how to-well, like in this culture the Christian thing gets a little schizoid, you know, and- [Laughs, laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Without-

Student A: -because of its dogma, you know.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student A: Now my question is like-about-well, the way you see Buddhism in terms of abstention is-through the activity of abstention is there inevitably repression, so the word "repression" being a denial of a-of a rightful energy of your organism?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. [Laughs, laughter.] I think I understand what you mean. That we-we-how to do it is to know more about our organic, you know, power, or to know more about our desires or tendency. That is the study of human nature, maybe.

And you-you can say, you know, Buddhism is a kind of study of human nature, you know. That is Buddhism. To know human nature is to know-to understand Buddhism. As Dogen-zenji said: "To study Buddhism is to study ourselves-to study yourself or ourselves." So if you study ourselves you will-it means that you are studying-already studying Buddhism. And to study Buddhism, to study ourselves' human nature means, you know, to have more-deeper understanding -or deeper and more balanced-more wide understanding of each of our human nature which is analyzed in various way.

But usually we think we have, you know, so much desires and so-so many numbers of ideas, you know. But it is not so, you know. One desire will include everything, you know. To know one desire fully means to know-should be to know various desires we have. To have this kind of understanding for each one of our desires is another way of studying our desires, you know. Do you understand?

For an instance, there is nature of man and nature of woman, you know. But if you understand what is woman-nature of woman fully, you will understand what is the nature of man and what is fundamental nature of human nature. This kind of understanding is more advanced and more deeper understanding of some special nature of human being. The Buddhists understand things in that way-not only understand some special nature, but also we understand various nature in term of inter-relationship. This kind of thing is what I am talking [about] always, you know, so I think you may understand it-what I mean.

So, you know, without controlling some, you know, special desire, with, you know, more deeper understanding of it, we, you know, act, and we extend our desire-not some special desires, but all desires we have. In short, more harmonious way. And that is not-that is more than harmony of desires which you will acquire by our practice.

Tonight I wanted to talk about something like this, you know-like polishing tile, you know: story of polishing tile?[19] Or the-Nangaku[20] said, you know: "When a cart doesn't go, which is better: to hit a cart or to hit a horse?" [Laughs.] Or he said: "If you want to practice zazen-zazen has-not to sit," you know. "If you want to achieve buddhahood, there is no special-there is no special type in buddhahood." That kind of statement express the truth, you know, which we have before you analyze our activity: "this is zazen practice and this is everyday practice," or "this is zazen and this is not zazen," or "this is buddhahood and this is not buddha." I think I-we must study this point more. Do you have some other question?

Student B: Roshi, you said we should study this point more. When-when do you think we should study? How should we study it?

Suzuki-roshi: How you study?

Student B: Yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: [Whack!] [Hits table, probably with the end of the teaching stick.] Like this! [Laughs.] Do you understand? How you study is, you know-if you-if you become really a member of Zen Center, that is how you study. [Laughs.] If you are completely involved in our activity, that is how to study. I think we can do it, you know, even though we don't know what will happen to us [laughs, laughter]. We may starve to death at Tassajara. But, you know, I don't think we will starve to death in Tassajara or in new building.[21] I don't think so. So if we determine to study Buddhism, you can study it. And you will have chance to study.

Some-some questions? Hai.

Student C [Reb Anderson]: You have talked before about how we should be a obstacle to our practice-

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] It means that, you know, when you-Buddhism is not something else, you know. Buddhism is you yourself. When there is some obstacle, you will-because of the obstacle, you will see it. You will see what is right. You know, if there is no obstacle there is no right. You cannot see it. Because of something-because of the moon, you know, we can see sunbeam, you know, by-by the reflection of it. Because of the moon we can see the sunbeam. So when you find yourself as a obstacle of the truth, you know, that is rather negative expression of reality.

Maybe, you know, you feel as if you are-you cannot be a Buddhist, you know. You will be-you feel as if you are always obstacle of truth. But you-you yourself is already a part of Buddha. So-so whether you feel, whether or not you feel you are Buddha, you are Buddha. It means that.

So don't be disturbed by-don't be discouraged by your practice. Just you practice it-there is Buddhism. I cannot explain it so well, but the word [s]-that we are obstacle of truth-is very good way to express it, to understand it. One more question please. Hai.

Student D: Roshi, I understand you to say that the government policy against Buddhism is what influenced you to become a priest. Is that right? Or did it help?

Suzuki-roshi: I couldn't follow you. Excuse me?

Student D: Did I understand you to say that the government policy against Buddhism helped influence you to become a priest? Is that right?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. It helped us, you know. Because of that I, you know-Buddhist had firm confidence-or not "confidence," but fixed their mind to study it completely. And they had chance to check up what is Buddhism, you know. When we are spoiled [laughs] by people, we have no chance to study ourselves. I thought, you know, there must be some reason why they didn't like Buddhism, or something wrong with-with our way. Maybe I thought in that way. I think for Buddhism that is very good.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center transcript entered onto disk by Jose Escobar, 1997. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Bill Redican (2/12/01).

N

Zoun-in temple, Mori-machi, Shizuoka-ken: I

Hattasan temple, SE of Fukuroi-shi, Shizuoka-ken:

Source: <http://kankou.pref.shizuoka.jp/english/WESTERN/east.html>

[1] Peter Schneider interviewed Suzuki-roshi for the Wind Bell on Nov.

9, 1969 (SR-69-11-09). This reference was to a different occasion.

[2] Butsumon Sogaku Suzuki (c. 1858-1933).

[3] Shogan-ji is probably the temple Suzuki-roshi is referring to: the temple where he was born and lived until the age of eleven. It is located on a hill above the village of Tsuchisawa, on the edge of the city of Hiratsuka, Kanagawa Prefecture, Japan (D. Chadwick, Crooked Cucumber, p. 4). Hiratsuka is approximately 20 linear miles southwest of Yokohama.

[4] Oiso-machi (town) is three linear miles southwest of Hiratsuka-shi (city) on the north shore of Sagami-wan (bay), Kanagawa Prefecture.

[5] Zoun-in temple, Mori-machi, Shizuoka Prefecture, central Japan. Mori is approximately 23 linear miles west of Yaizu-shi and 12 linear miles north of the Pacific Ocean. Butsumon was abbot of Zoun-in from April 1891 to circa 1901 (ibid., p. 7).

[6] That is, Butsumon returned to Shogan-ji-circa 1901.

[7] Traditional men's full trousers in the shape of a split baggy garment.

[8] In 1912, schools observed a ceremony marking the beginning of the Taisho era, the reign of Taisho Tenno (personal name Yoshihito).

[9] Hattasan temple is located just southeast of Fukuroi, western Shizuoka Prefecture. The temple S.R. mentions is probably Zoun-in, as it is approximately 8 linear miles from Hattasan temple.

[10] Nio or Nio-sama or Nio-son ("good kings," "kings of compassion") are the two guardian figures placed on either side of a monastery or temple gate to banish evil spirits and thieves and to protect children (e.g., L. Frédéric, Buddhism, Flammarion, 1995, p. 248).

[11] Located at the foot of Mt. Akihasan (north of Mori and northwest of Yaizu in Shizuoka Prefecture, central Japan), Akiha-jinja is one of the oldest shrines in Japan.

[12] ofuro (Jap.): o (honorific) + furo, bath.

[13] Possibly a samurai family of the Shizuoka clan (E. Papinot, Historical and Geographical Dictionary of Japan, Vol. I, Ungar, reprinted 1964, p. 147).

[14] Aburayama-kannon is located near Mt. Aburayama, 5 linear miles south of Fukuoka-shi, in central Kyushu Island, Japan.

[15] S.R. is therefore referring to the years at Shogan-ji temple.

[16] Gyokujun So-on. For a discussion of his age, see SR-69-10-14.

[17] Zoun-in.

[18] Spelling is confirmed, but biographical information is not yet known.

[19] In Ching Te Ch'uan Teng Lu (Record of the Transmission of the Lamp), translated by Thomas and C. C. Cleary in The Blue Cliff Record (Appendix, p. 566).

[20] Nangaku Ejo (Jap.) or Nanyue Huairang (Chin.) (677-744): Chan master; dharma successor of Daikan Eno; master of Baso Doitsu. The exchange referred to by Suzuki-roshi took place between Nangaku and Baso.

[21] City Center, 300 Page Street, San Francisco.

1969 oktober (1)

1 - Question and Answer

Tuesday, October 14, 1969

Question and Answer
San Francisco

Suzuki-roshi: Since I resigned from Soko-ji Temple, I-my mind become more busy than before. It is ridiculous, but actually it is so.

Physically I am feeling much better. But mentally [laughs]-I'm not confused, but I'm reflecting on what I have been doing for ten years. And as I do not stay with you so long time when our members [are] increasing a lot, I feel a great distance, you know, between you and me. That is another problem for me. Anyway, I think we must find our way. And I think it is a time for us to find out some way to develop our buddha's way.

As I have nothing to talk about tonight, so I want you to give me some question. And I want especially new students to give me some questions. Whatever it is, that is all right. So please give me some questions. Hai.

Student A: I just finished reading something that said everything in life is necessary. Do you agree?

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student A: I just finished reading something that referred to everything in life as necessary: the actions, the things that happen, are all necessary. In other words, the war, peace, love, hate, they're all necessary in life. Is that right?

Suzuki-roshi: Necessary. You mean there is some reason for everything to happen? Or-

Student A: I guess you could call it that, or something that-no matter what happens, it's the individual that counts. It doesn't matter what's happening in the whole. It's just the individual that will eventually count in the end. That's what I'm referring to-that you can't do anything about the whole but you can do something about yourself.

Suzuki-roshi: That's pretty big question. It is-I think you are asking me about Buddhist view of life-human life. Is it?

Student A: I guess I'm asking a question about the way I've felt in the past months-the way I look at things. And it seems as though when I look at things in this way, everything seems to have fallen in place. Everything seems to have meaning. It doesn't seem to trouble you at all.

Suzuki-roshi: Meaning. Yeah. When we say-you know, you-your question, I think, more than, you know-actually what you mean-that question may be the question of why we practice zazen, you know, or why is it necessary to set up some rules or why is it necessary for human being to have some certain culture. The meaning of life-when we say "meaning," it is already problem of-question of some certain view of life. When you see or when you understand our life from some certain viewpoint, we say, "It is meaningful," not "It does not mean anything." But when you say, "Everything is meaningful," maybe it means we should have a wider viewpoint without sticking to some certain viewpoint. Then everything will have some-will have meaning. Everything which happens in our human life or in nature has some meaning-has meaning.

From Buddhist viewpoint, as you know, everything happens by some karma, you know, good and bad karma or good-no, excuse me, karma. Good and bad-when we say "good and bad" it is-it has already problem of morality. The karma is actually the causality. When something happens [it] has some reason why things happens. So without any reason, nothing happens. That is karma in its wide sense.

But it doesn't mean in this sense, in its wide sense, we do not have any idea of some particular being, you know. Things which we see in some form or color is a tentative form and color. But by itself there is no self-nature. But what exist is just karma. And it-karma appears in various way. That is, maybe, the ka- [partial word]-idea of karma in its wide sense.

But this kind of karmic life for us, each individual, may be good and bad karma: agree or something which we want to accept, easy-easy accept it-which could be easily accepted, or which is not so easy to accept it. In this sense, we have good and bad karma. And this karma, in its more narrow sense, will explain why we have problems in our human life.

So in its narrow sense, if you do something bad you will have bad result. And that is karma. But we should not-no one-or everyone want to be free from karma. That is-naturally we have that kind of desire to be free-how to be free from karma or how to improve our karma. When we think-when we come to this problem, that is the problem of practice, or problem of good understanding of our teaching. Teaching is provided to solve this kind of problem.

So in our-especially in Mahayana Buddhism, instead of karma, idea of karma, we have bodhisattva vow. And to be free from karma-it is not possible for us to be free from the law of cause and effect. But it is possible for us to use-to have good use of it. To help others, you know, we suffer. And to help others we [are] involved in karma. You know, that is-because there is law of karma we can improve our life, and we can-and even though we suffer, we can-by this-by suffering or being involved in karma, we can help others. So idea of the bodhisattva's way to help others even before to help ourselves is closely related to the idea of karma.

It does not mean-everything has-the point is not to understand everything, to say, "Everything is meaningful" because everything has some reason why it appears in that way. Everything has some reason why it appears. It's, you know-it's more, I think-it does not mean so much. You know, it is same thing if I drink a cup of water we will not-I will not be any more thirsty [laughs]. It doesn't mean so much. That is-that may not be the meaning of karma-all [?] the meaning of karma. But it is one of the many-one of the understanding or interpretation of karma in Buddhism.

Another, you know-when we misunderst- [partial word]-when we-there is some danger, you know, when you say, "Whatever it is, there is some reason for them to appear. So it is meaningful," you know. It-it means we must find out some reason. [For] even a stone in roadside we must find out some reason, we must [not?] ignore things, we must find the value of it. In this way, if you-someone may understand in this way, but someone may say, "Whatever we do, that is all right," you know, "because there is some reason," you know, "why I do this kind of thing" [laughs]. If you understand that way, that is not our understanding.

We say, you know, there is no natural buddha. Even buddha-if they do not practice, you know-if he didn't, you know, follow bodhisattva's way, he couldn't have-he couldn't be a buddha. So we say there is no natural buddha. Buddhahood is called kai.[1] Kai? Ka is fruit. It is, you know, "result"-no, "point," some point which he attained by some practice.

That is kai, "result." In morning service[2] we say: kakai muryo no kensho, instead of saying all the sages in religious world. Kakai is the sea of the fruit world. So fruit has some, you know, some cause or some flower, you know, result. Fruit-"sea of fruit," we say. [Kakai muryo no kensho means] "innumerable buddha-innumerable sages in the fruitful world." The-all the sage is supposed to be someone who practiced hard to attain that kind of stage.

Okay? Some question? Hai.

Student B: Roshi, before-two weeks ago, you said that you weren't altogether satisfied with our practice here.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student B: I didn't know exactly what you meant.

Suzuki-roshi: Altogether satisfied? [Laughs, laughter.] I forgot why I say so. Maybe at that time, not altogether [?]. At least I think we are, you know, making genuine effort, I think. Maybe that is why I said so. Some-some more questions?

Student C: Roshi? Could you say something about food practice?

Suzuki-roshi: Fruit?

Student C: Food.

Suzuki-roshi: Food practice-food practice, oh [laughs, laughter]. Our practice is more prac- [partial word]-special practice than just physical one. Maybe to provide some strong, good food will be important, but the more important point will be the attitude to eat, to take food.

Maybe Buddhist food practice is one extreme, but very spiritual. We emphasized spiritual side. You know, when I came to America-I think some of you already knows about it-about what I am going to say-talk about-you know, there is-there-there is Toyo market, you know. Before my wife came, that market-that store was opened, and she had not much customers. So naturally, they haven't fresh vegetables or fruits because she hasn't not much customers. And she had to throw [away] a lot of fruits and vegetables. I didn't ask her to give me the vegetables, you know, which she put them in garbage can. But I-I-I would. I couldn't help taking old, you know, apples or old-the most, you know, old green onions because I was, you know, I-it is a kind of habit, you know, to use something old first, leaving something fresh for next meal. This kind of-this is, you know-most-some people told me that is very foolish way. If you, you know, take the best one you will have best one always. So to use worst one is the most foolish way.

I thought I agree with him-I agreed with him. But actually [laughs], you know, I use-I would use something old first. My master[3] would told me, "Your father," you know-my master was my father's disciple and I went to my master when I was thirteen years old. And he would-told me, "Your master always-your father always picked up some vegetables in the-in the stream." Maybe some farmer up a river throws [away] some old vegetables. And my father-he said, "Your father would pick up old vegetables. That is our way," he said.

I think this is-I don't think this is best way, but we rather emphasize the spiritual practice rather than physical practice-which food has more power, or which food is more rich or stronger. I think this side should not be forgotten. How to make best use of food will be the point, without throwing away-without-with some respect for our food will be the most important point. Hai.

Student C: What do you mean by spiritual practice?

Suzuki-roshi: Spiritual practice? To-what I mean-to-to-to have-everything has buddha-nature, you know, so we must respect them. Everything has-because it is closely related to our practice especially. So, the-to treat food is-should be like to treat our physical body. That kind of attitude is important. This is not just vegetable. It is a part of our body. As Dogen says,[4] to-you should treat a piece-a grain of rice as you treat your eyes. That is what I mean by spiritual practice. Or without maybe-without discrimination, we should accept-we should take food, whatever it is. Whatever it is, if something I offered with respect, then we should not refuse it. This kind of practice, I mean.

Student D: Can you speak about how we can help the zazen grow stronger in everyday life, in everyday practice?

Suzuki-roshi: I think if you continue your zazen even for one month, if you don't practice, you know, you will see the difference, you know. The day you practice and the day you didn't. So-

Student D: Sometimes-

Suzuki-roshi: Some [laughs]-sometime, you know, you-yeah, that is maybe everyone's problem. Sometime you may not, you know-you may-you don't want to, you know, get up so early, or you will be tired of it. That is quite natural, you know. But to be natural [laughing] is not always right. "I should be natural, so when I am s- [partial word]-we are sleepy, we should sleepy-we should sleep." That-I don't think that is best way.

Student D: Sometimes our sitting-in our practice of sitting, is very regular. It seems to be getting stronger. And our everyday life is going in another direction. So I'm confused.

Suzuki-roshi: Reaction. [Laughs.] Confused. We have some tendency, you know. And that tendency is-all the tendency-if we follow our tendency always, we will be lost. The tendency may be based on some various desires. So I think it is necessary for us to-to have some harmony or someone said reason, you know, in our life. To keep some tone or reason or harmony, it is necessary to-to give some control over various desires, I think. So, you know, we are liable to-we are some tendency-we have various tendency. But I think if you try to-try not to-not follow your tendency, you know, you will-I think, if you try always not to follow your tendency, then you will have some-mostly you will-you can control-or not "control"-you will have some harmony in your life. Control or-that is a kind of negative expression, but that is very adequate expression although it is not complete suggestion.

You may not agree with me [laughs], but it is true. Our tendency is to have something good-to eat something good always. But if you eat always something good, your tummy will be sick [laughs]. But our tendency is to try to eat something good always. Hai.

Student E: Roshi, while you were gone, back here there was an earthquake here.

Suzuki-roshi: Earthquake, yeah. Mm-hmm. That morning I came back.

Student E: [Sentence unclear. Sounds like: Is it bad for us?]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student E: Oh. What would then is the meaning about our everyday practice if this whole community had been destroyed that night?

Suzuki-roshi: Everything swept [laughs] up?

Student E: Yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: What will be the-our practice [laughter]-

Student E: No-

Suzuki-roshi: -in that situation?

Student E: No. I guess I was reflecting. What is the meaning of our practice if at any moment we can die, as a community or as a person. It occurred to me that there was nothing protecting us from death-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student E: -ever. For the [1-3 words].

Suzuki-roshi: Ah. [Laughs, laughter.] I think that is why, you know, I don't firmly believe in our next life or, you know-I'm sorry I have to say so, you know. I have to confess [laughs], you know. I have-I haven't very strong belief in next life. But some people, you know, believe in it very firmly. And those people, you know, has-mostly, those people has good practice. I envy their practice. But at the same time, to believe in that kind of belief extremely strong, that may-that will be-that will not be so good belief.

You know, we live in the actual world. And at the same time we believe in the world which should be, you know-which we want to be like that, you know-the world which should be like that or which we want to be like that. And our next life will be the life, you know-our next world or life is the life which we want to be like that. Actually we live in this world. Without this kind of world we cannot survive. I think everyone has this kind of strong desire-not conviction, but more-more original and more fundamental desire which is more than usual desire: desire to eat or desire to survive.

[Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

... which we are aiming at. Do you understand [laughs]? To go beyond, you know, whether, you know-to go beyond the idea of our future life. To go beyond everything, that is so-called "nothingness." Hai.

Student F: Anyway I think that [?]-about this gentleman-that respect for your actions now and present actions-what you're doing now determines your existence at this very moment. That is a moment away. If that happened right now, whatever cause that made you what you are, what you are made up of, will determine your next existence. So the most important thing to remember is to carry out this philosophy of [1-2 words]. Cultivate this and you don't care when you go [laughs]. You know that your next existence will be at a higher consciousness.

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student G: Roshi, can you speak to us about the practice of silence-the value of silence in-

Suzuki-roshi: Value of silence? Value of silence, that-it will be-if your mind is not calm enough, you know, you cannot think properly. And you cannot get over the thinking mind when-especially when you should go beyond thinking mind. You should have complete calmness in your mind. That is calmness of your mind. It, you know, sh- [partial word]-not just calmness, but it express the direction of your practice-not stage but, you know, bottomless calmness. That is actually what we mean by calmness. You know, when you sit-calmness with some effort, with some power. That is calmness, actual calmness. Unperturbability is not something like this [probably gestures], you know, but continuous, you know, actual state of being which is calm and stable. So it follows some effort. Not just like stone [laughs], but, you know, there must be some strength in it. That is calmness. Hai.

Student H: Is it possible to love without attachment?

Suzuki-roshi: Without-

Student H: -attachment.

Suzuki-roshi: -attachment. I don't think so. With-but still, we know that, you know, even though we love someone, you know, we cannot love someone forever. That is what we know, you know. Actually, we know that. If you say, "I will love you forever," you are telling lie [laughs]. Still you have to love someone. Then how you-what do you say? Or, what kind of attitude do you take? If I say, you know, when you love someone, you know-if I say, or-excuse me, it may not be something which I should answer [laughs], you see? You know that, you know, without attachment you cannot love anyone. But still you have to love someone. Then what will be your love? And you should figure out that point. It is not something which I should tell you, but-which-you have to accept the teaching of detachment is [as] something Buddha told you-not something Buddha told you, but it is actual fact.

So what you should strive for is how you love someone in its true sense without fooling someone. Then the way you love someone will be nearly the same as buddha love someone. That is actual detachment, not teaching of detachment. Hai.

Student I: Is it possible to get a good understanding of Zen and develop it well without emphasizing or practicing Buddhism?

Suzuki-roshi: Is it possible?

Student I: How important is it-I'm kind of distinguishing between Zen and Buddhism.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student I: To some degree Buddhism aims to study Zen. But is it possible to study Zen quite apart from Buddhism?

Suzuki-roshi: Apart from Buddhism? Buddhist-you know, our-maybe there's no Buddhism without zazen practice, you know. All the Buddhism has zazen practice, but Zen Buddhism put emphasis on zazen practice especially because that is fundamental practice and it is because it is for every one of us. Actually, there is no difference between-not much difference between various schools of Buddhism. You know, outlook is-approach is different. But without zazen practice, Buddhism cannot be Buddhism. Hai.

Student J: Roshi, you were once, I think, talking about war, and you said about war that in our feelings about it that we should first accept that there will always be war.

Suzuki-roshi: Some war, a kind of war, some kind of war, you mean?

Student J: Yeah.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, maybe.

Student J: And then after we accept that there, I guess, will always be some kind of war, then we can go on and try to make our best effort to stop war.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. To stop war means to, you know-for someone it may be a war, you know, or-most of people making effort to fight [laughs], to me it looks like so. They may not actually [be] using a gun, but by words and by everyday activity, everyone creating a kind of, you know, war. And result of, you know, our everyday life, I think, is war in its big scale. That is a kind of karma, human karma. So, you know, how to get out of karma, or how to get out of war may be the most important point. And to accept things as it is means not to accept, you know-to have right understanding of our everyday life. Those who has-those who do not have right understanding of our life, you know, [are] creating war.

So we must have right understanding of our life, and we must strive for right-maybe we must, as a Buddhist, we must follow the Eight Holy Path or Four Noble Truths. That is, you know, our life. Where a Buddhist life, where there is no war in its true sense. So to-when you accept things as it is, we will naturally follow Eight Noble-Eight Holy Path and Four Noble Truths. Because we have-our understanding of life is not right, we create war. There must be various, you know-this is, anyway, big problem for us, the most, you know-so our traditional understanding of, you know, war is like this. But we should make this point more clear, and we should help stopping war with a great effort, I think. Maybe this kind of teaching is right but not strong enough or adequate enough in our world situation. Hai.

Student J: Do you mean that the teaching of following the Eightfold Path or the Four Noble Truths is perhaps not strong enough?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] It is, you know-it should be strong enough, but, you know, our understanding may not be strong enough or something like that. We just literally understand it, but we haven't, you know, enough strength to take it in our actual life. Hai.

Student K: Could you say something about Zen and marriage?

Suzuki-roshi: Zen and what?

Student K: Marriage.

Suzuki-roshi: Marriage? Oh. [Laughs, laughter.] That was a problem I had suffered [laughter], but-for me, you know, at that time when I got married, you know, I was thirty-thirty-one.[5] At that time, you know, that was not the problem of marriage. That was a problem whether I should be a priest or a layman [laughs]. I thought if I get married I will not be a priest anymore, or monk anymore. So I have to think a lot. But-so I don't have actual-that was not, you know-my problem was not the problem you may have, perhaps.

Student K: I think that when a man falls in, he just goes toward it all the time and it takes ahold of him and just goes wherever it leads him-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student K: [Sentence unclear. Sounds like: -right into the wall.] [Laughs.]

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. I think if you get married your life, anyway, will be more difficult. If you don't marry, your life will not be so difficult anyway. So that is also true with priest or monk. To have family is a great-we will have, anyway, great difficulty. So I don't think that is just problem of monk or you, but problem of everyone. If you don't-if you get married, your life will be more difficult in one sense. But on the other hand [laughs, laughter], you will have some advantage. That is how our human life goes. Always not sweet [laughs, laughter].

I think Buddha-what-when Buddha said, "Our life is life of suffering," that is very true, I think. Anyway, we have suffering. As long as we seek for something good, you know, we have suffering.

Do you have some more question? Hai.

Student L: I'm getting attached to the idea of transmission of mind.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh. Transmission.

Student L: Yeah. I'm getting attached to transmission of mind from you, because you came and sat down beside me, like, and I knew it before you were going to do it, and I'm attaching to it. And I find that I am one of the [1-2 words]. What should I do?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Just try hard [laughs]. That is very true. Sometime the more you make effort, you know, the more you will be far away from the goal. So-but even so, we must make our effort. It is almost a kind of fight [laughs] between teacher and disciple. [Taps stick on table three times, laughs.] Not, you know-we don't fight physically or-but we shouldn't give up. And experience I have-I had-the experience various-my teacher had and maybe Buddha had. You will reach this kind of conclusion. Buddha suffered in this way, and my teacher had same experience as me. Then you have transmission already. Actually, there is nothing to transmit [to] you [laughs]-what you have-something you have will be found out by your effort.

You may almost run away from Zen Center, you know, but then I may say, you know, "Wait! Wait! [Laughs.] Stay here! But I have nothing to give you." [Laughs.] That is why we have to suffer, you know, as a teacher. Nothing to give you. But I have to say, "Don't go away! Stay here!" But I have nothing to give you. Some people may say, "If you don't have anything, I will go away. Then that's all. No transmission." [Laughs, laughter.] Some question?

Student M: Could you speak about when you sit zazen away from Zen Center, and you sit alone? Could you speak about that?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, sit alone. By yourself? True zazen, you know, cannot be sit by yourself, you know. That you sit there means that every one of us [is] sitting with you. That kind of zazen is true zazen. Even though you are sitting in Japan or Tibet, you know, you are sitting with all the people in the world. That kind of feeling you must have in your zazen. You include-your practice include everything. That is our practice, you know. When you are you on your cushion, everyone sitting on their own cushion. That is our zazen.

When you think of someone, you know, in zazen, "Oh, there she is sitting. There he is sitting. Anyway, I am sitting with all of us," you know. That is our feeling of sitting. One more question? Hai.

Student N: Do you think it would help our practice if there were more opportunities to have private interviews?

Suzuki-roshi: More opportunity to what?

Student N: Private inter- [partial word]-dokusan?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, I think so. But, you know, we are try- [partial word]-I am-at least I am trying my best to have more time. But as we have too-maybe too many students, so that is pretty difficult. So maybe in this way, in this kind of occasion, you know, to-when I give lecture, sometime this way to ask question will be helpful, I think.

Thank you very much.

---

Source: Original City Center tape transcribed by Diana Bartle (10/10/00) and checked by Bill Redican (3/26/01).

[1] kai: the stage of fruition or effect; the stage of fulfillment of bodhisattva practices; the stage of buddhahood.

[2] Line 3 of the Second Morning Eko (dedication of merit): jippo joju no sambo, kakai muryo no kensho ("the all-pervading, ever-present Triple Treasure, the innumerable sages in the ocean of enlightenment").

[3] Gyokujun So-on, at Zoun-in temple, in 1916. In SR-69-09-16, Suzuki-roshi gives the same age: "I went to my master's temple when I was thirteen years old." Thirteen reflects the Japanese way of counting age (one at birth, two on the next New Year's Day). By Western counting, he was 11 or almost 12 years of age (1916 - 1904 = 12) [see also Crooked Cucumber, p. 14, which gives 11, almost 12 years].

[4] In "Tenzo-kyokun," a section of Eihei-genzenji-shingi.

[5] In February of 1935 Shunryu Suzuki married Chie Muramatsu.

1969 november (8)

1 - Interview with Peter Schneider

Sunday, November 09, 1969

Interview with Peter Schneider

[Tape starts with background group chatter. Then the mike is set up, and more group chatter follows. Then Peter Schneider asks Suzuki-roshi a question.]

Peter Schneider: I would like to ask Roshi a question for the Wind Bell that I was going to type-tape just with him, but I think it's a-would interest you, so-. It will appear in the next Wind Bell.[1] And the question is to have Roshi talk about Mrs. [Miss] Ransom.

Suzuki-roshi: No. [Laughter.] I must tell you she was my old, old girlfriend [loud laughter].

Peter Schneider: I'll have some water. [Loud laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Almost, but not quite [laughter]. When I was young, even from a boy, I couldn't [wasn't] satisfied with Buddhist life, you know, because of many reasons. So I wanted to-to be a good teacher when I was very young, and I wanted to [1-2 words unclear] people who-who did not priest-did not respect priests so much. But I-at that time, my ambition may be directed to wrong direction [?].

But anyway, I made up my mind to leave my home and to study to practice under strict teacher. So I went to my master's temple. And my master [Gyokujun So-on] was a disciple of my father.[2] And my father, when he was young, [was] very strict with his disciples. And my master was one of the-his-my father's disciple who [was] raised up in very, very strict way. And he was-my master was always talking about my father's strictness with him. And I-that was very, you know-that was hardest situation for me to accept, you know. My master almost blaming of my father. "Your father," [tapping repeatedly] you know, "raised me in this way." [Laughs.] That was very hard to-to listen to. Anyway, this is not what I want to talk [about]. But-

So naturally, this kind of spirit I have all the way maybe I became-until maybe thirty or more. After my master's death, I have not much feeling. That kind of feeling changed into the-into opposite way, and I became very much-I missed my master very much.

So when I was-when I was at school-college, I studied English pretty hard to go to abroad [laughs]. I have no idea of America or Hawai'i or-anyway, if I am going to some country, I thought I have to speak English. And I studied English pretty hard when I was a student. And when I was at Komazawa University, Miss Ransom was teacher of conversation.

Once a week, we-Miss Ransom taught us conversation. And after I finished her class I attended English course lecture. And meantime, Miss Ransom found me and asked me to be-to help her in shopping, or when some Japanese come, or when she had student-her private students. Of course, I couldn't help her so well, but I tried pretty hard. And at last she asked me to stay [at] her home with two more students who were helping her in shopping and conversation with Japanese people.

But the other students, Kundo and-and I don't know the-I forgot one more student's name-Kundo was student of Komazawa.[3] And one more student is from Bundikadaima before that school was normal school-normal high school. And that school changed their system and became a university. And the other students were studying English-English course students. And both Kundo and that student left Miss Ransom's home. I was only one student who helped her. And meantime I-there were many interesting stories between Mrs. [Miss] Ransom and I. Don't be so inquisitive [laughs, laughter].

No, no, no.

Student: Is it alcoholic? [S.R. may have picked up a cup of water.]

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

She was-before she come to Japan, she was a tutor of last emperor of China, Sento-Emperor Sento,[4] Emperor of Manchuria. And at that time, Japan became more and more ambitious, and trying to [for] some chance to fight with that northern part of China. Emperor Sento's capitol is in-I don't know what is the name of the city right now. At that time it was Choshun.[5] And when he-the Emperor was there, he-she was a tutor of the Emperor. And she is a daughter of very-I don't know who he is, but [he was] very famous naval general [admiral].

She was a [had a] very strict character, and at the same time she complained always about Japanese people: at school what kind of things happened, and at the car what kinds of things happened. She was always complained about Japan. I was only person who listened to her complain [laughter]. But I have also many complaint with her. For an instance, she had a beautiful Buddha-sitting Buddha as big as this which was given to her by the Emperor. But she put-it was all right for her to put it in tokonoma-on tokonoma, but she put her shoes besides the Buddha [laughs, laughter]. That was tokonoma, you see. Tokonoma is a place where we put some antique, or scroll, or some valuable things: object of worship, or something like that. But she used to put her shoes as soon as she come back from school, you know. That was very, you know, embarrassing to me. But I didn't say anything, you know, but I offered, you know, tea every morning with small cup like this, you know, putting it on-in front of Buddha, and offered tea every morning [laughs]. She started to [be] amused about me, and-but she didn't ask anything. And I didn't say anything about it or about her shoes [laughs, laughter]. Maybe this kind of, you know, silent cold war [laughs, laughter] last maybe for two-three weeks, and I was waiting for a chance to start hot war [laughs, laughter], as my English was not so good, you know.

Dan Welch: How about the matches, Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm?

Dan Welch: The matches.

Suzuki-roshi: So I have to study pretty hard, you know, preparing for the polishing the weapon, you know, to speak. And I, you know, studied some important word to speak about it [laughs, laughter]. And when one of her friend visited her, she-they were talking about my funny, you know-things, you know, about me. "She is-he is very strange Buddhist, offering tea [laughs] for the wooden figure, sometime offering," you know, "incense." They were talking about it. I could understand what they were talking about. And he started, you know-his friend started to put matches, you know, in Buddha's mudra [loud laughter]. And he left, you know, sometime matches [and] sometime, you know, in-cigarette [laughter] in incense holder.

Student: Oh, no.

Suzuki-roshi: Still, hot war didn't start. And at last, you know, I don't know how the hot war started, but she asked me about, you know, about the figure- Buddha's figure. [S]he thought Buddhism is a kind of idol worship. So I explained it, you know. It was very difficult, but I could manage to explain why we worship wooden image or Buddha or what is the real Buddha-maybe about Dharmakaya, Samboghakaya, or Nirmanakaya Buddha.

She was rather amazed, you know [laughs]. She didn't know Buddhism is so profound. And she started to become interested in Buddhism. And soon she converted to Buddhism. And she start to study Buddhism, because if she want to study Buddhism, there were many professors, and some professors could speak some English.

So [1-2 words] she had-in one year, I think, she had a pretty good understanding of Buddhism. And one day she took me to the downtown to buy some incense and some incense bowl, and she started to offer it. I felt very good. At the same time, I could have some confidence in our teaching, in Buddhism. And in that way, I thought I had a kind of confidence in-not "propagate," but-in making them-making Caucasian people to understand Buddhism. Or I thought for Caucasian, Buddhism-Buddha's teaching may be more suitable than [for] Japanese, you know. You know, when-for Japanese to study Buddhism in its true sense is pretty difficult because of the wrong tradition or misunderstanding of Buddhism. It is difficult to change their misunderstanding once they have that kind of wrong idea of Buddhism. But for Caucasian who doesn't know anything about Buddhism, like we paint in [on] white paper, it is much easier to give right understanding of true Buddhism. I think that is the, you know, that kind of experience I had with Miss Ransom resulted in my coming to America, I think.

And as soon as I finished my schooling, I asked my teacher-my master, [6] to go to America or Hawai'i or some-to go to anywhere abroad. But he became furious [laughs], and she [he] wouldn't allow me to go. So I couldn't come to America. And I gave up my notion of coming to America for a long, long time until I forget all about it. But ten years ago, at last I came to America.

And five years-fifteen years ago,[7] actually, I had chance to come to America. But because I didn't finish fixing our main building [at Rinso-in], which was my duty left by my master, so I thought I have to finish his order first, so I didn't come to America at that time. And maybe five or six years later I had second chance to come to America, and I decided to come to America.[8] It was pretty hard to come, but anyway I managed to come to America.

After I finished my schooling, I went to Eihei-ji. And Miss Ransom came to Eihei-ji and stayed for one month at Eihei-ji, and sitting there, and practicing pretty well. And when I went to-two years after, I went to Kasuisai monastery.[9] At that time, she came to Kasuisai and stayed for one month also. And she-and then she went to China again: Tientsin-Tensin-Ten?-Tientsin, yeah, near Peking. And she went to England. Once in a while I wrote to her, and she wrote to me, but since

I came to America I haven't written so often. She wanted to write something about me, you know: various experience we had between us, you know. And she asked me to give some date or event. But that is too much, you know, so since then I didn't write to her, you know, because it was too much. Whenever I write to her she asked me many things, you know, which is almost impossible to write her back. So I didn't. And, you know, she may be very angry.

At that time [Grahame] Petchey was in England, and he started-he started Zen group at her home, you know.

Peter Schneider: Her home! I didn't know that.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] So whenever Petchey went to her home, she [he] was the one who listened to her complaint [laughs, laughter]. So I- I know her very well, you know. Even though she complains, it doesn't mean so bad. So, you know, I thought it may be all right. But that was my mistake, you know. She passed away last year, before I write to her.

I trusted her very much, and he-she trusted me so much. So whether I write to her or I don't doesn't make much difference, I thought, but I don't know. As long as she is alive it is all right. But now, I think, I regret a little bit about my not writing to her.

Anyway, I think she was a good Buddhist. After she went to Tientsin, she sent me a picture of same Buddha, you know, who get into trouble between us, you know. And she made-she enshrined the Buddha in the wall where there is some-something like big hole in the wall like this [gestures], you know, and she said she is offering incense every day [laughs].

Dan Welch: What happened to the shoes, Roshi? Did she ever take them off?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes, of course [laughter]. And I taught her how to clean up tokonoma.

One day she told me to buy-to get some daffodil bulb, you know. I bought pretty big one for her, but she didn't [wasn't] satisfied with them. "Oh, this is too small. Get me some big ones," you know. I tried, you know, to find best daffodils in Tokyo, at least in Shibuya district. I visited several florists, and I got the largest bulb we can get-I can get. But she didn't [wasn't] satisfied with it. So she makes me very angry [laughs]. So I bought some onion [laughing, ongoing loud laughter]-buy. "Here, I got very big one. Here they are." And I left, you know, her room. But I was careful, you know, watching her-what did happen. She opened it and saw the big bulbs, you know. "Oh, this is very good!" she said. I felt very good, [but] at the same time scared of him [her], so I ran away from the room, you know-from outside of the room.

And at last-she didn't like onion, you know, at all. Of course, that is onion so it smells [laughter]. "Oh! This is onion!" she shouted, and looking around for me. But I wasn't there [laughter]. But I couldn't help burst into laughter-a big laughter, so she found out-she found me out. With onion in her hand, she started to chase after me. She was a big, tall, girl [?], you know. So I went to upstairs, the second floor, and from the second floor to the roof. Something-that kind of thing happens pretty many times.

I had to come back [to] her home before ten o'clock. But it was rather difficult, you know, to come back before ten always. So when I was late, you know, I-I know how to open the doors. You know, Japanese door is sliding doors. The lock is between two door, you know. Lock is go this way, you know, to-like a nail driving down, a nail for two doors. So it is not possible to, you know, open this way, but you-if you lift two doors [laughter], it is quite easy to take out two doors [laughter]. And I sneaked into the-my bedroom and slept.

And at last she found me, you know, what I was doing. And she, you know, didn't trust me any more [laughs], and she didn't trust the safety of the Japanese building any more. And she determined to move out from that-from that house, you know. And I was told to find out some good safe building, which was almost impossible, you know. Almost all the buildings are Japanese buildings. If it is Western building, we have to pay a lot of money. So I gave up to find out that kind of safe building.

But it was good for me to go out with some reason to find-finding out some good apartment. And sometime I went to barber shop, or sometime I visited my friends, you know, instead of finding out some good apartment. And at last I decided to ask some good, old carpenter to explain, you know, how safe Japanese building are from thieves and how to fix the lock you know, so that no one can get in. And I-we could convince her not to move out.

As she was a English woman, she is-she doesn't-even though rotten old knife, she wouldn't throw them away. And she-sometime she asked me to get [them] polished. But in Japan no one can polish any knife for anyone, you know. If she has carpenters or gardeners, she may-he may do it, but she wanted me to get [it] polished immediately. That was a big problem for me. And-and she said, "In England," you know, "if you go to a department store we can get them polished up immediately. So go to Mitsukoshi and ask to get [it] polished." Her idea was ridiculous for Japanese people, you know, to polish. It was pretty beautiful, good knife. But even so, no one can polish it. "Oh, this is old," Japanese store may say. "This is very old. Why don't you get new one?" You know, that is what they may say.

When-do you know Japanese ofuro? When the, you know, cover of the ofuro will easily be get rotten, so she asked me to get lid only. But that was also difficult, you know. If I-unless we buy whole thing, they wouldn't sell the wooden ofuro-bathtub-wooden bathtub. I think English way may be something quite different from American way.

That's all [laughter]. Nothing more than this.

Student A: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student A: She was the first-Miss Ransom was your first Westerner you helped to convert to Buddhism?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student A: Who was the second person-

Suzuki-roshi: Second?

Student A: -after her?

Suzuki-roshi: -after her. Maybe Jean Ross or some old students of Zen Center. Since then I had-until I come to America, I had no chance to see any Caucasian or any foreigners-gaijin.

Student B: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student B: How did you get an idea to teach Caucasian people long time before you'd met any Caucasian students?

Suzuki-roshi: How? Just, you know, I visited her home when it is very hot, just because I want to have a-some cold drink, I visited her [laughs]. It was so hot, you know. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.]

... without she will give us something, you know, some drink or watermelon or something like that. She gave me a big, you know, watermelon, cutting in two, and putting some sugar in it, and with big spoon she offered half [the] melon, big one.

Peter Schneider: And you determined to come to America [loud laughter]?

Student C: Hey, it's the watermelon, man. That's what it is.

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, maybe so because of watermelon.

Student D: "Watermelon Zen."

Suzuki-roshi: "Watermelon Zen."

Dan Welch: If I remember right, Roshi, there was another Zen master in Kyoto who got caught by a watermelon [laughter].

Student E: What's that story, Dan?

Suzuki-roshi: Dan, don't you-it may be good idea to send a picture of watermelon, you know-picture of Zen Center student eating watermelon [laughs, laughter]. Some Zen teacher like me may come [laughs, laughter].

Dan: Publish it in the Dai-horin.

Suzuki-roshi: She was very tall, maybe as tall as [Grahame] Petchey, you know. Very tall girl.

Student E: Petchey's about 6'-2", I think.

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs, laughter throughout paragraph.] She used to put white, big hat like this, and she was very tall, and I was very small. When we go to shopping, I have to almost run. Because she had no one to talk, you know, to talk with, and as soon as she come back from school, she start to talk with me in fireplace. So I was always studying in fireplace-in the corner of fireplace. I couldn't study anything, you know. I couldn't have any study-any homework, so I decided to buy big, big screen. I told her for Japanese it is necessary to use, you know, big screen. So she bought it for me, and so I was very pleased-just to prevent, you know, her talk. But she was so tall! Taller than screen-watching down. Didn't work at all. I gave up. Very big.

Another professor, Sugioka, [10] would visited our home many times-maybe twice a week or weekend. She was-she-he is-according to her, he is a big scholar in English, you know. He knows more vocabulary-he has more vocabulary than Miss Ransom herself, she said. And he was-she was very much proud of him. But he was also very short-as short as me, you know. I don't know why she liked so short people [laughter]. The man who translated Uchiyama-roshi's [11] book, you know, small book. [12] Someone said it was not so good translation.

Student E: Which book is that, Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Small.

Student E: Uchiyama-roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Palms.

Student E: With the hands?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. With hands.

Student E: Oh. Why did you leave her?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student E: Why did you leave her-did you leave her?

Suzuki-roshi: Because I, you know, because I have to finish my thesis. So five-six months before I finish my schooling, I left her. And she went to Tientsin-went back to China again. She was a good friend of Premiere Yoshida.[13] She is-he is a famous premiere who signed the treaty after the war-

Student E: Russian war [of 1905] or-?

Suzuki-roshi: -treaty of-at San Francisco, you know, treaty of complete surrender. He is the premiere who signed.

Dan: Roshi, what did you write your thesis in?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Dan: Roshi, what did you write your thesis about?

Suzuki-roshi: About Shobogenzo. Study of Shobogenzo, focusing on "Raihai-tokuzui"-the chapter of the meaning of bow.[14]

Student C: What?

Student F: "Vow" or "bow"?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student C: Bow?

Student E: Bow.

Suzuki-roshi: Bow.

Student E: Is that because your master bowed so much?

Suzuki-roshi: Maybe so. I didn't notice it. Maybe so. I was the last one who submit my thesis to the office [laughter], because I was too busy, you know. Most student finish his d- [partial word]-unit, you know. Maybe most students leave three or four units for last year, but I had twelve-I had twelve units more to go. So I was very busy in writing thesis and finishing twelve units. That was why I bought screen, but it didn't work [laughter].

Student F: Roshi, could you tell us something of what you wrote your thesis on?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student F: Could you tell us something about your thesis?

Suzuki-roshi: Study of Shobogenzo, focusing on the fascicle of bow.

Student F: Could you tell us what you wrote?

Suzuki-roshi: Too long.

Student F: In-in a capsule? In [laughter]-

Suzuki-roshi: Essence? You have to bow anyway [laughter]. That is why you have to bow nine times, you know, maybe. My thesis was very good, you know, but my oral question was not so good, you know, because I didn't study so much. Some other questions?

Student G: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student G: A few years ago, at a lecture at that-in the basement of that big church-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student G: -that big church downtown on [2-3 words unclear], you were giving a lecture-no, Dick was talking, and you were just listening.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student G: And you had your hands-your mudra upside down. The right-the right hand on top of the left hand.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student G: And then sometimes-and then I was sitting right in the front row, and I was staring at your hands. And you weren't looking at me, I don't think, but you fixed them, and you put the left back on top of the right. But then you'd be listening to Dick, and your right would go back on top [laughter]. And I-and I thought that something was strange was going on. And I looked real hard, and you put your sleeves over your hands [laughter]. My question is, what were you up to [laughter]?

Suzuki-roshi: That was your study [story?], then.

Student G: What?

Student E: "That was your study, then."

Suzuki-roshi: Usually this is-I have not much feeling on this, so-.

Student E: Why not?

Suzuki-roshi: Because I cut my finger from here to here. Sometime I don't feel so good, you know, and I do like this [laughter].

Student E: Oh. He-he-he-he's doing this. See? Like this, though.

Suzuki-roshi: You know, this finger. So if I don't feel so good, I do like this and go back to the mudra like [gesture]. Sometime I am doing like this one.

Student H: Roshi, do you still hear from some of your master's disciples, or other Zen masters?

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student H: Some of-some of your master's disciples-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: Who were studying with you. Do you still hear from them?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes.

Student H: Uh-huh.

Suzuki-roshi: My younger, you know, brother in dharma[15] was taking care of-once in a while after I left Rinso-in came to my temple and helped my boy [Hoitsu-roshi] or a priest who was there always.

Student H: There was a fire in your temple?

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me?

Student H: I didn't quite understand. There was a fire there?

Suzuki-roshi: No, no. When you know, after I left my temple, you know, there must be some qualified, you know, teacher in my temple [laughs, laughter]. Someone like me must be there. So my brother in dharma was formerly or officially responsible for my temple, but actually someone else was always there. But another-my elder brother in dharma[16] is now in the temple which I enter for the first-after I finish my schooling-Zoun-in.[17] And then as soon as my master passed away, I took over my master's temple and my elder brother, you know, took over my place.

So still we have three dharma-brother in dharma. And one is now-I don't know what he is doing. He is not priest anymore. And we-I was actually the youngest one. At that time there were four more disciples, and I-I was the youngest one. And four disciples run away from my master because he was too strict.

Student H: Could-could you give us some example of his strictness-of what he did that was so strict?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] You know, he is very, you know, unique character. And he would sit in the corner of dark room, and when someone enter his room he stares at him like this and without stopping eating [laughter]. Most people [were] scared of him very much. Just to look at him is good enough. Before he say something he would strike me-strike us-bam! [Laughter.] A little like Tatsugami-roshi also does. For Tatsugami-roshi, there is no need to speak English. His hand will speak fluently [laughter].

Student I: They'll laugh now-[laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: And he's pretty humorous, you know, sometime-very much humorous. And he was very good friend of us in some way. For an instance, when we came back from village after finishing memorial service for our members, three of our-three or four [of] our disciples-his disciples were with him, and we are coming back to my temple. When we came to dark, you know, dark slope, you know, he told us to take off-oh-told us to go ahead, you know. "As you boys [are] wearing tabi, [18] so may be better for you to go first. I will-because I have no tabi, I will follow you," he said. So we, you know, went back ahead of him. As soon as we arrive at our temple, he told us to sit in front of him. "You boys sit here and listen to me. When I don't wear tabi, why did you wear tabi?" That was his, you know, question. "Why did you wear tabi? When I don't wear-"

Student H: What-what is turby?

Students: Tabi.

Suzuki-roshi: Socks.

Student H: Oh.

Student J: White socks.

Suzuki-roshi: "Moreover," you know, "when I told you," you know, "to go ahead, you four boys went ahead of me without noticing that I have no tabi. How about that? [Thumps several times.] You goose!" you know. "You foolish boys!" He was very mad at us. You know, at that time I took him very seriously, but I think-now I think-I think apparently he was teasing us, you know. He was playing game with us. He was enjoying, you know, our innocence [laughter]. "Sit here," and we four boys sit [laughter]. We didn't know what will go on, you know. No one could figure out what is-what was wrong with us [laughter].

[One day] when he was not at temple, one chicken died [laughs, laughter throughout]. So we decided to eat it, taking off all the feathers. But it was very difficult to cut, you know, with blunt temple knife. Very difficult. So we ate only one leg. And rest of the chicken we buried. [We recited?] small, you know, sutra. Unfortunately, next morning my master found it, you know, when he was weeding. But he didn't tell anything, you know. That was the day before Obon festival. And after we, you know, prepared altar for the various soul, we had dinner [?]. Tomorrow is, you know-oh, that was August 13th when we have Obon festival. And [at] breakfast time he told us, "I had a funny-very funny dream last night. One-legged hen came to me-

Student E: "One-legged hen said to me-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. "One-legged hen came to me and said, 'It-the altar is too high for me. So please move it lower.' And the hen asked me, 'Do you have some good idea?' he asked us. All of us. All of us." We couldn't see [look at?] him either. What he meant by that?

Student E: Obon festival is the festival for all spirits.

Dan Welch: The dead spirits.

Suzuki-roshi: The dead spirits. The one-one-legged hen-hen came to the altar, but he couldn't climb up.

Student K: The spirit of one dead hen, or-?

Student E: One-legged hen.

Suzuki-roshi: One-legged hen, because we ate, you know, one leg and buried, you know, the hen around the tree. And my master found out, unfortunately. And he-he didn't say anything at that time. It was the day we have Obon festival. And after-when we have breakfast, "I had a very funny dream last night." [Laughter.] We were listening to him. One day [the hen] came [to him], he said, so-[laughs, laughter].

Student E: Where did the chickens come from? [Laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: We were raising them. We were [4-8 words unclear], and unfortunately one of them died.

Student E: They were at the temple?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. So we ate [laughter] one only. Because it is too difficult to cook it-cut it, so we gave up and buried it, you know, in the garden.

Student E: So what did he say when you were like this, Roshi? [Probably gesturing.]

Suzuki-roshi: I don't know. I don't remember, anyway, you know. We have no words.

Student L: Was that all he ever said about it?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student L: Was that all he ever said about it?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Dan Welch: Isn't that enough?

Suzuki-roshi: That's enough, you know. [Laughter.] "Do you have some idea to help him?"-that was what he said. We are not so alert students anyway-disciple, you know, because we have no words for him. Hai.

Student M: Is he the one that kept some yokan [?][19] up on a very high shelf?

Suzuki-roshi: Yes. He is the-Student M: Will you tell us about that?

Suzuki-roshi: Ohh. Whenever he had something-some special thing, you know, for guest, he would keep it in high place where we cannot reach, you know. But, you know [laughs and laughter throughout paragraph], we know how to take it, you know. So almost all the time, I-we took it down and cut a little bit corner of it-slice by slice we cut. And-and then, looking at it, when we feel-anyway he will find out, so we took [?] all of them. That is what we would do, you know.

One day, you know, it was too high for us to reach [laughter throughout paragraph]. So my-our eldest disciple asked me, who is the smallest one, to reach it. And he said, "I will carry you on my shoulders. Then you can reach for that." So I, you know-he carried me on his shoulder. And it was still-we were not still high enough. So I told him, "A little bit more." So he stood on his toe, you know, like this, and he lost balance. He throw me out on the kettle-boiling kettle.

Student: Oh God.

Suzuki-roshi: I got big, you know, burned here. Still I have some, you know, mark here. But I couldn't say anything about it [laughter].

So when mealtime come, so I, you know, enduring my pain, I sit in my seat. And we start-I started to eat, but this was pretty terrible injury. Someone told me to use some oil on it. So by oil I hardly, you know, recovered. I have still, you know, some mark here. Alm- [partial word]-we did almost all the mischievous thing, almost. But when we do it with all of us, he didn't scold us so badly.

But one day, we ate some big persimmon-four or five persimmons, which he kept it until it is-until they are good enough to eat in rice-in rice. And when someone ate it, you know-I don't know who did it-but when he found out someone ate several persimmons already, he asked me who ate it. So i-actually I didn't know, you know. "No, I don't know," I said. And he started to find out who did it. Finally he found out two of them-two of us had eaten. At that time he was very angry, you know, not because we ate it, but because he-they didn't share the persimmons with all of us. He was very angry. I think he was very-pretty kind to all of us, I think. Maybe with skillful mean.

Student: What time is it?

Student: It's 9:30.

Suzuki-roshi: Just right [laughter] [1-2 words unclear].

Thank you very much.

---

Sources: Partial transcript by David Chadwick and City Center original tape. Transcript checked against tape and made verbatim by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (2/12/01).

Kasuisai Temple

Western Shizuoka Prefecture

[1] It did not.

[2] Suzuki Butsumon Sogaku (c. 1858-1933).

[3] Komazawa University, Tokyo.

[4] Sento (Jap.): name pertaining to a former emperor-in this case Henry Pu Yi (Manchu AisinGioro, 1906-67, last emperor [1908-12] of China).

[5] In Chinese, Changchun, later renamed Xinjing.

[6] Gyokujun So-on.

[7] 1956 [see Crooked Cucumber, p. 153].

[8] Suzuki-roshi left for San Francisco, via Honolulu, on May 21, 1959, at the age of 55. He arrived in San Francisco on May 23.

[9] Near Zoun-in temple, in the city Fukuroi, western Shizuoka prefecture.

[10] Professor Kido Sugioka of Komazawa University.

[11] Uchiyama Kosho-roshi (c. 1912-1998).

[12] Kosho Uchiyama [English order of names], Modern Civilization and Zen. Administrative Office of Soto Sect, June 1967, 36 pp.

[13] Yoshida Shigeru (1878-1967): Prime Minister of Japan for most of the period between 1946 and 1954. Negotiated and signed, in 1951 in San Francisco, the Treaty of Peace between the Allied Powers and Japan.

[14] Suzuki-roshi's graduation thesis for Komazawa University was entitled "Raihai-tokuzui" no maki o chushin to seru Dogen-zenji no shukyo (Dogen-zenji's Religion as Seen Especially in the "Raihai-tokuzui" Chapter of Shobogenzo). His thesis advisor was Professor Nukariya Kaiten.

[15] That is, a fellow student or peer, not a brother by birth. This was probably Kojun Noiri-roshi.

[16] Probably Kendo Okamoto (Crooked Cucumber, p. 90).

[17] Zoun-in temple, Mori-machi, Shizuoka Prefecture, central Japan.

[18] tabi (Jap.): Thin white socks traditionally worn with sandals.

[19] Phonetic guess only. According to Chadwick, this was a cake (Crooked Cucumber, p. 24).

2 - Question and Answer

Tuesday, November 11, 1969

Question and Answer
San Francisco

Suzuki-roshi: If you-if you have some question, I am happy to answer for the question. And in that way, if necessary, I will refer to the Lotus Sutra. Hai.

Student A: What is "no outflows" mean in the Lotus Sutra?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? No?

Student A: "No outflows."

Suzuki-roshi: No outflows. "No outflows" means, you know, by-because our practice is not, you know, sincere or not complete, there are many leakage [laughs] in your life and practice. That ["no outflows"] is the opposite of to have many leakage. It means mostly desires, you know: to let your desire, you know, as it goes this way, that way. That is leakage. And to control our desires [is] like to build a big leather [?] ball [?] without any leakage. That is "no outflow." It is more, you know, more arhat kind [of] practice: very, maybe, negative practice. Some other questions? Hai.

Student B: In the Lotus Sutra they say the Buddha-seed arises from conditions.

Suzuki-roshi: Buddha's what?

Student B: The Buddha-seed-

Suzuki-roshi: Seed. Uh-huh.

Student B: -arises from conditions.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student B: Do you know what that means-what they mean there?

Suzuki-roshi: What-conditions-seed-if you, you know, sew a seed, seed will be the cause of-because of the seed, of course, plants comes out. And it will have fruits-flower or fruits or branches. But without aid of rain or manure it will not, you know, grow. It means, you know, aid or things, you know, result by seed and by aid of something. I think you-your culture put more emphasis on aid. If aid is good, you know, result will be-you have good fruits. And how to improve the social condition is the most important point in your culture. But some other culture put emphasis on seed more, maybe like Communism.

Student B: Could you explain that?

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm? Explain it more?

Student B: I don't understand how Communism puts emphasis on the seed.

Suzuki-roshi: You know, Communism is-I don't so well, so-I'm not Communist, so [laughs, laughter]-but in Soviet Union, you know, if you put emphasis on, you know-if you have some-some-whatever the study may be, sociology or anthropology or whatever it may be, if you put emphasis on aid, you know, the government will not accept your theory. But both-I think both is too one-sided, I think. Seed is important, and aid is also important.

In Communism, the social structure [is] nearly the-nearly the same to everyone. [It is] supposed to be, but actually I don't think so. Someone who has great power-great enough or strong enough to control people, they have more chance, although social structure looks like same [chance?]. So the aid is same to-equal to everyone, but there is some, you know, there should be some difference between people. Someone may be-may be a secretary, someone may be a just, you know, working by normal [?]. How-this kind of difference is original. If someone's seed, or someone has good seed, you know, he has that much chance. But in our society, we put more emphasis on how to-if we improve-if we improved politics or if we give people chance to develop, people may be happy. And we don't put emphasis on the difference of the-so-we don't put not much emphasis on who is more capable or who is not. We treat people in the same way.

So we sort of ignore the each one's-each one's original or each one's own ability. That is what I meant. Hai.

Student C: I don't understand the difference between the egg [sic: aid] and the seed-how you're using it.

Suzuki-roshi: Seed?

Student C: The basic difference, you know, between the two things.

Suzuki-roshi: Basic difference, you know-it is cause and affect. The, you know, relationship cause and affect is more seed, you know. If you sew a seed, you will have some certain kind of plants. That is seed. And seed and relationship-seed and fruit. The rain or, you know, wind or sunshine is not direct-is not real-is not seed, you know. Aid for seed-some factors, conditions which will make-which will help the relationship between cause and affect. That is what I meant. In Buddhism we say innen: [1] in is seed, en is aid. And in and aid are-[both] seed and aid is necessary for something to go or something to result.

Student C: Is the egg like the condition? The egg is something that has met certain conditions-has grown somewhat?

Suzuki-roshi: Aid is something to help, you know-to result something from seed [laughs].

Student D to Student C: Aid. "A-I-D."

Student C: Oh, I thought he said "E-G-G"-egg. [Laughs, laughter.]

Suzuki-roshi: Excuse me [laughs]. You know, egg-for egg [laughs], the, you know, temperature of mother hen is aid [laughs, laughter]. Some other questions?

Student E: In the Lotus Sutra, the Buddha seems to make a distinction between nirvana, or the stopping of pain, and complete perfect enlightenment-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student E: -which is also tathagata [1 word].

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student E: Could you talk some about the difference between these two things?

Suzuki-roshi: Nirvana is more, you know-it is same kinds of words as "no leakage," you know. Extinction of all desire is nirvana. No leakage, no outflow is nirvana. And enlightenment or anuttara-samyak-sambodhi [2] is enlightened stage more in a positive expression of same stage. But one is more Mahayana way, and the other is more Hinayana way. For an instance, arhat-before-arhat keeping various precepts and following Buddha's teaching, he may attain arhat. The practice of arhat is more passive and more negative. And the other is more active, you know, more positive-to have Buddha wisdom. And here there is many words for that. For an instance, we have term-or technical term like issai-shu-chi.[3] Issai-shu-chi is "various wisdom." The difference between our wis- [partial word]-our knowledge and Buddha's knowledge is our knowledge is accumulation of, you know, various knowledge. Not much, you know, not much relationship between one knowledge and the other knowledge. Not much system between various knowledge we have, you know.

But Buddha's knowledge is one which include-each one of the knowledge include the other knowledge-that is issai-shu-chi. So if you pick up-if you understand Buddha's knowledge-one Buddha's knowledge, you know, about-for an instance, about human nature, then the other knowledge will be included. That kind of knowledge is buddha-knowledge. And that kind of way of observing things, or that kind of practice, is enlightenment. It looks like completely different approach, but it is just two ways of expression of one knowledge. Hai.

Student F [Bill Shurtleff]: In the Lotus Sutra, the chapter "Duration of the Life of the Tathagata," this-the chapter is preceded by a building-up-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Bill: -in which we learn that we're about to hear some very, very important truth.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Bill: And after this chapter, it's emphasized again and again and again how important this truth is to keep in mind: the "Duration of the Life of the Tathagata."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Bill: And in that chapter, the Tathagata reveals that he actually attained enlightenment innumerable kalpas before-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Bill: -and that he is only making an appearance of extinction, but in fact there is no-he was not enlightened as Shakyamuni and will not obtain extinction as Shakyamuni. Is this the same thing? Is this another way of saying what Dogen says when he talks about all beings already being in enlightenment and manifesting their enlightenment from day to day-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student F: -or is this something else that is being said?

Suzuki-roshi: It is same thing, you know. It is-if we say we are all- originally we are all enlightened people, you know, to attain enlightenment just to know what we have in our sleeve [does something with his sleeve] here. But although you have it, if you don't know that you have, you know, that is same as you don't have it. So this kind of idea-all of-all of us has buddha-nature. This kind of idea is more- although Lotus Sutra has two side, but Lotus Sutra put more emphasis on everyone has buddha-nature.

So if you practice hard enough or long enough you will attain enlightenment. But that attainment is not to have something to acquire something from others-from other source. Just to find out what we have is, you know, to attain enlightenment. And when Dogen put emphasis on this point, he also put emphasis on real self, or essence of mind, or buddha-nature. Or he-he mostly use the word anuttara-samyak-sambodhi, which is something, you know, we have and something we attain by effort. It is both-it is both attainment, and it also something we have originally. When we say-when we translate it "supreme incomparable bodhi," it is something-it sounds [like] something which we attain by our effort, but it is actually something which we have. So when he explain it, he says, "Wisdom seek for wisdom," and anuttara-samyak-sambodhi is actually wisdom. "Wisdom seek for wisdom."

So wisdom we have seek for wisdom. That is actually what we are doing. Only when you discriminate your practice, you know, it looks like there is good practice or bad practice. By good-only by good practice you will attain enlightenment. That is more usual understanding. But according to Dogen, whatever we do, that is actually-actually "wisdom seeking for wisdom."

But because you discriminate it, you know, because you are involved in some ego-Peter said ego [laughs] outside of-outside of itself. That is very good, you know, short and strong way of expressing ego, you know. Outs- [partial word]-true ego is buddha-mind. And ego outside of itself is projected ego, you know, of which you will discriminate, you know, good or bad. "Good practice" or "bad practice," you say. But that, you know, good practice or bad practice or ego is not true ego. Ego [laughs] outside of itself, you know, [is] projected ego. And you discriminate about projected ego as if there is some ego-as if there is good ego or bad ego. That is actually what we are doing. But who is doing that kind of-who project, you know, our ego objectively? Somebody is doing that. Someone is true ego which is always on your side, and which you cannot tell who he is or what he is.

To realize this p- [partial word]-if you realize this point clearly, you know, we have originally buddha-nature, which is universal to everyone. Ego on your side is the same, you know. But only when it is projected there is difference between Ego 1 and Ego 2. Do you understand this point?

Student F: Could you give an example of Ego 1 and Ego 2?

Suzuki-roshi: [Laughs.] Your ego and my ego, you know [laughs, laughter]. You know, I have-I have big eg- [partial word]-small ego, and you have big ego [laughter]. We say so, you know, because I project my ego as if my ego is very small, you know, and you are [not] bold enough, you know, to say "my ego is big" because you are student, you know. Because I am teacher, you know, I must say my "ego is very small" [laughs, laughter]. But small ego or big ego is, you know, ego outside of itself. Ego is here on my side, not there. I said your eyes never can see themselves. It is not possible. That ego is, you know, true ego and big-big ego, maybe. Hai.

Student G: You said before that outflows have [are] in some sense related to desires.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student G: And it is said in Zen, a lot of times, that to do something fully-Suzuki-roshi: To do something fully.

Student G: To do something fully-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student G: -when doing something, to do it fully-that that is, sort of, one of the goals-something that we should want to do, and that we should do. Sometimes in our use of the word "passion," we sometimes refer to the kind of action that is done fully, and rapidly, and without hesitation. I wonder if you could, from a Zen point of view, explain the relationship between desire and passion?

Suzuki-roshi: Passion and desire and full?

Student G: Maybe I could just ask the question what is passion?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Passion is, you know, when you are, you know, involved in or when you are caught by outside-things which looks like exist outside, you know, and to which your mind or strength or energy is directed. That is mostly-most likely passion or attachment. Actually, that kind of thing does not exist, you know, but you think as if something exist in that way and if possible, you know, hopefully forever [laughs].

And you-that hope already will create something, you know, some passion or some desire. So what is necessary is-what we should do, or how we should act, or how we should do with things which looks like exist objectively is without, you know, being involved in-too much in the idea of being or substantial being. You should do it naturally, and that activity should be activity which you do in that moment. In that way, we continue our life that is perfect life. Next question may be, you know-actually, you know, to act in that way is possible or not will be the next question.

To answer this question, it is necessary for me to explain more on this point-on the other point, which is we say things does not exist forever, you know. Things exist just right on this moment, in this moment-does not mean to acknowledge things or to do things just for this moment because each moment-when you say "this moment," this moment has its own past and future.

So when you do it, you know, at that time if you do not try to make some excuse, or if you do not have preconceived idea, naturally you will accept-you will have feeling of past and future. And you will see some difficulty in your future-in the future of that moment. And you will see the past of that moment that is always included in each moment.

Actually you cannot do, you know, things just for that moment, forgetting all about its past and future. Do you understand? You cannot do so, bec- [partial word]-when you do something, you know, without thinking or intuitively, you have to acknowledge its own past and future. And the past of this moment and past of yesterday may be the same, you know. I th- [partial word]-I understand it may be the same, and it is same maybe, but when we say "it is same" that is too far, you know. There is some logical jump in it, because each moment-the quality of each moment can- [partial word]-no one can say it is always same. Maybe different. We should accept this point too.

And strictly speaking it is not same. Because it is not same we have some chance to make some effort more or to improve our karma. If it is exactly the same, there is no chance for us to improve our life. So it is same, but it is not same. There is two side in the truth. So if we think past-my past is always same, even though we don't know our future-my future, but past was always same. That is not, you know, perfect understanding. Future is-cannot be same, and past also cannot be same.

Student H: Isn't it confusing if you use the word-if you use the words "past and future"? To me it's confusing, because to me the way you're using them it all sounds like the present.

Suzuki-roshi: All sound like present. That's right, you know. You should understand in that way. Always present, you know. The different present. Maybe same, you know. There is some relationship-must be some relationship. But strictly speaking, you know, it is accumulation of smallest particle of time-smallest particle of present.

Student H: What do you mean when you said before, when you act in the present moment you consider the past and the future of that present moment.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student H: Do you mean there is some kind of thing or idea or concept or something that you consider? Or is it-or do you just consider the present moment? I mean, it sounds like [4-6 words]-

Suzuki-roshi: Time doesn't exist, you know. Actually time doesn't exist, you know, but things exist. And things has some continuity, you know. So we say time exist. Instead of things we say time, you know. Time include many things. It is a kind of idea, not actual thing. It, you know- instead of saying "many things," we say "time." Time include everything. When we say this moment, it include many things. And the center of it is me, you know, right here.

Student H: Do we consider-I remember Dogen talking somewhere about the fire-the wood burning becomes a log and becomes ashes. But when it's ashes we don't-do we-are we supposed to remember that it was a log or do we just consider it ashes? Or when it's a log we don't say, well [2-3 words]-

Suzuki-roshi: Log has its future and past.

Student H: Do we consider them?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Its own past and future. But we cannot say log become ash [laughs]. It is so, you know. Because, you know, here is log-wood, and here is ash, you know. Usually you say "wood become ash," you know, but ash has its own past and future, you know, and this is independent. And ash has its own past and future. Two different thing.

Student H: In a practical way-I'm trying to be practical about it.

Suzuki-roshi: In practical way it is so [laughs].

Student H: If I look at you and say you're my teacher-

Suzuki-roshi: Hmm?

Student H: If I look at you and I'm listening to your lecture trying to learn something, and if I say to myself, well in the past Roshi has been a very good teacher and I've learned a lot-

Suzuki-roshi: Past Roshi is not present Roshi.

Student H: -and now-and now-and now I'm looking at you, and if I remember that as the past, there's something wrong in that. I won't say wrong but there's a hang-up. I'm attached or caught to some other idea. But if I look at you, and I'm listening to you, and we're talking, and I just accept the now, and I don't know you as a teacher, I don't know that you're a Roshi, I don't know anything, then you're just talking to me, I'm talking to you. That includes everything without having to know anything else.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, that is so. [Sentence finished. Tape turned over.] ... understand something like me, you know. But this is just-maybe looks like logic, you know. But it is not just logic. Because we are liable to be-fall in one-sided view, contin- [partial word]-idea of continuity or idea of discontinuity. And actual being and continuous and discontinuous-that is true. Like time is continuous and discontinuous. I always say it is nine o'clock. When we say it is nine o'clock, you know, when we say so, it is-idea of time is discontinuity, you know: "nine o'clock." It is not going. But when we say time, it is something continue from this moment to the other.

So if you are too much involved in this kind of thinking, you know, you will lose everything. When we-I talk in this way, you know, more logically, you will not think in this way actually, but-but you are making this kind of, you know, mistake always when you think something objectively. So the important thing is to sit and to go beyond this kind of thinking mind. And when you act, when you do something without being involved in too much about objective world or scientific world or logical world, we should-you should do more intuitively, more freely, you know, without being involved in too much this kind of argument or too much idea of attachment. Okay?

That is what I mean. That is what I mean. "Just to sit" means don't be involved in good-idea of good practice or bad practice, how long it will take before we attain enlightenment, or what is enlightenment. You know, this kind of idea is result of thinking which is shadow of your own mind. Your mind is always on your side, watching everything, understanding everything, who-which-who knows everything, and who is able to know everything. And you should trust that, you know, kind of you. And you should prac- [partial word]-trust your practice too. And trust your intuition too. Then you will not make not much mistake.

Why you make mistake is because you make some excuse always: "Because I am Buddhist, we shouldn't," you know, "have any idea of good or bad," [laughs] you know. "Because I am Buddhist, Dogen-zenji said live on this moment. So whatever I do it doesn't matter," you know. This is just excuse and just, you know, logic or argument, you know. But actually because you don't feel good when you do something wrong, you know, when you do something which is not real, which you don't accept completely, you make some excuse. That is why, maybe, many people study religion [laughs]-to make some excuse.

You know, in Japan in family system, you know, if someone-someone's son get married with someone-some, you know, some lady, she is their family, and the old couple may go to temple everyday-not everyday, once a week or so. And what the old couple will run from in temple is "You should do this kind of thing. You shouldn't do this kind of thing." And after and they come back, they apply the teaching for the, you know [laughs], for the wife of the son. You know, I-"Today I went to temple, and priest told me so-and-so. I think that is right [laughs]. He means that you are wrong [laughs]. What priest said was right, and what you do always is wrong." That doesn't make any sense [laughs]. To authorize his, you know, egoistic idea, people may study something. That is not how to study Buddhism.

We should trust our own, you know, feeling and our own intuition. Maybe more physical one rather than-rather than some idea or some thought or some moral code or precepts. Hai.

Student I: Sometimes I have been very aware of-that the moral faculty in me or the moral part of me. I'll be doing something and-

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah.

Student I: -Doug once expressed this to me as kind of a very gray feeling, and a little voice in the back of your head saying, "Why you stupid" or-or this is-"What are you doing? This is terrible. You-you're being very bad now."

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm

Student I: It's sort of a-

Suzuki-roshi: Voice.

Student I: Yeah, a voice that when you're walking into the kitchen toward the bread box [laughter] begins as very small. Sometimes it's very small [laughter]. Sometimes it gets so big that it's actually screaming at you, "Stop!" [Laughter.] But there you go doing it anyway. It's very difficult to sit through experiences like this with any composure [laughs, laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: No composure [laughs].

Student I: I mean, except-except that the moral part of human being, because people have that thing in them that says, "This is right and this is wrong"-or I do. Most people do.

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Most people, you know-I don't know what to say, but I don't know why is-why do we have that kind of feeling. But we know, you know, pretty well. We can trust ourselves pretty well without any teacher [laughs] maybe. But if you have teacher, you know, you will-you will not be fooled by anything, and you can put more faith in yourself-in your feeling. This is very-this kind of way of thinking or way of study is very different from other religion maybe, which put more emphasis on some moral code, or something you should do, or you shouldn't, or precepts. Hai.

Student J: Could you say something about mindfulness?

Suzuki-roshi: Mindfulness?

Student J: Mindfulness on breathing?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, mindfulness-it is, you know-

Student J: Mindfulness on breathing.

Suzuki-roshi: Breathing-mostly breathing-you cannot have good breathing unless you have good posture. And good breathing means, you know, to have, in zazen practice-to take inhaling and exhaling with your whole body and mind. Do you understand?

Student J: Yes.

Suzuki-roshi: That is-that is good breathing, you know, so if you practice in this way, naturally your breathing will be deeper and deeper actually. That is good breathing. Mindfulness means to-to-to have-to obtain the oneness of mind and body. If you have oneness of mind and body, or if your mind pervade all-whole-all parts of your body, that minds pervades, you know-that mind is at the same time buddha-mind which include everything.

Student K: Roshi?

Suzuki-roshi: Hai.

Student K: If we find something that we feel helps us sit in that way, maybe with some it's he breathes through the pores and in the skin. Someone else practices not moving any muscles-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student K: -some things that we experience-I experience something as being oneness of my mind and my body. Should we sort of use what seems to us by our experimentation? I mean, can we trust ourselves? I say to myself-just afterwards I say, "Oh, that was my whole mind and body. So that's something very good to do, and I should practice that."

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, if you have that feeling that is it, you know. And you-if you-if you think your practice is not good, and if you don't know why it is not good, you should think, you know, whether your mind is fully pervaded every part of your body or not. That is so-called it shikantaza. So shikantaza-background of shikantaza is the mind, which is always include everything, which is with all things which exist.

When I say "with all things," [I mean] all things we see, strictly speaking. There must be many things which we don't see-which we cannot see. But we feel as if we are seeing everything, you know. When we see the stars, you know, I-we feel as if we are seeing all the stars which exist. Maybe actually we are seeing it. But in that case, I don't-I am not talking about the stars which we don't see or which human being never reach. What I mean is, you know, things Buddhist talk about is mind and materialistic and spiritualistic being. We don't talk about just material or just spiritual.

This is one important point when you think, you know, but actually-or when you discuss something about Buddhism. But in your everyday life it doesn't make any sense. Why I have to argue this kind of thing is, you know-sometime our mind goes too far, you know, unnecessarily goes too far. So if we go too far this way, you know, we should go, you know, pretty far this way too. That is why I have to say more, you know-I have to argue, you know. Because you go this way too far, because you make too big mistake, so it is difficult to say, "That is mistake," you know. "Why it is mistake is such-and-such," you know. So it is necessary to make everything clear. But actually there is no need if you don't go too far, you know. If you just sit-if you are able to just sit without much-making much mistake, it is all right actually.

So it doesn't-you may think what I'm saying doesn't help you so much. Without realizing you are go-you are already went too far away, you know, from reality. So to pull you back to present, you know, I have to say many things, that's all.

So what I just said is-we must-Buddhists never talk about something just material or just spiritual.

Student L: How about in the sense of practicing on our bodies-you know, forgetting about-or rather practicing in a just-material way?

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: Is that something Buddhists don't do-we shouldn't do?

Suzuki-roshi: No. We don't do that, you know. "Just material" is already wrong. The one side is missing.

Student L: If I try and sit very still, without moving at all-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: -and counting my breath-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: -and disregarding whether or not my mind is moving-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: -just concentrating on my body not moving-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: -what mistake am I making?

Suzuki-roshi: Oh, what mistake you are making at that time?

Student L: Am I neglecting something by concentrating just on the body-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student L: -if I forget?

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah, that mistake will be, you know, if you think, "This is-this is zazen," you know, "Zazen should be like this." If you say so-if you understand in that way, that is mistake. But if you just do that, you know, without much-without authorizing your practice too much, you know, just sit. Then there's no mistake there. Or if you think, you know, "I'm just-what I can do is just to sit. I don't understand his lecture [laughs]. This is," you know, "all what I can. So I may sit in this way." If you, you know, think in that way, that is also a mistake.

So what you should do is-with some understanding of Buddhist teaching and what is reality and what is real practice, you should sit. Then you have actually no-not much things to think. Just to sit is enough. Mistake will happen if you go too far, forgetting what you are doing right now. When you eat you should eat, you know. When you sleep you should sleep. When you sit you should sit. But the true understanding of it is-you should understand it in-from various viewpoint.

Student M [Peter Schneider]: Roshi, suppose someone says to us-you keep saying just to sit as if it were something that everyone does, you know.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Peter: They could say "just to sit"-that's going much too far.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Peter: That's some sort of extreme, that's some sort of abnormal behavior.

Suzuki-roshi: Just to sit?

Peter: Yeah, "that's not natural," they would say.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Peter: Like suppose-I mean, like, if you're from America, and you're from somewhere very far away from California-

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah.

Peter: If they see a Zen Center student sitting, they think that's incredibly unnatural.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Peter: They would say that that balance is off, you know.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Peter: Like, "just to sit"-that's on the other side of one dualism, of being very active.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm. Yeah.

Peter: So to keep saying "just to sit," that's like for them saying-that's like saying "be very passive."

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Peter: They say that's not the American way [laughs, laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: American way, you know [laughs].

Peter: No, what I'm trying to say is that-Suzuki-roshi: What is Zen, you know, what is American way, you know? That's, you know, just argument, you know. Doesn't much make sense. To me it is very natural, and to them it is not natural [laughs], you know. What is natural? So that is something which we cannot decide: which is natural or which is not natural. Just, you know, there is some mistake. Why I must say this kind of long talk is because we liable-we are liable to stick to one side. The-for Buddhist, the two major heresy is understanding of continuity and understanding of discontinuity. This is two major fault we make by thinking or by understanding-intellectual understanding. So intellectual understand cannot include this kind of opposite idea in one statement or in one practice.

So, you know, just to sit-that is why I have to explain what does it mean by "just to sit." When we say "just to sit," it include more, you know, actually. But why I don't say you can move, you know [laughs], is you may think "just to sit" means whatever you do that is "just to sit," and you will have completely different understanding of it. When I say "just to sit," you know, you should accept sitting posture as long as you practice zazen. When you eat you should eat, you know. We cannot do two things together. So we should do things most naturally as you can do. If we practice our way by group, you know, we cannot do different things. So when you sit you should sit. And you should be able to accept that. That is what I mean by "just to sit."

Most natural thing, you know-natural things is-most natural things has very strict rule in it, you know, or else you cannot be natural. When you-even though you think this is natural, but it may be most unnatural thing, you know, because you cannot survive so long in that way. Something wrong with the idea of naturalness. So naturalness itself has, you know-the other side of naturalness is very strict-has very strict sense of controlling things. Like, you know, you manage a ship, you know, or a car.

Student N: The word "natural" comes from nature, and nature is completely strict in that it does the same thing all of the time.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student N: The leaves fall off the tree, and the time the sun rises and sets.

Suzuki-roshi: Mm-hmm.

Student N: So to be natural is really, then, to be completely in form. "Form is form," and completely in nature-

Suzuki-roshi: Aha, yeah.

Student N: That's what "naturally" means.

Suzuki-roshi: I see. Yeah. That is, you know-so naturalness has, you know, two side: Looks like [sounds like he makes a gesture, laughs]. And when you do something like this, there's some reason. And that reason has some rules behind it. But we, you know, unnecessarily because of our thinking, you know, we push ourself-selves unnatural way. That is actually what human being does, you know, which-and which plants and animal doesn't.

Almost time. One more question, maybe? No question?

Student O: Roshi, I'm firewatch tonight, and I was thinking about what Craig [Student I] was talking about-the bread box [laughter]. Craig was talking about this thing-going into the kitchen to the bread box. Well, that's what I always do when I'm firewatch [laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: I don't understand what you said.

Student O: The bread box is in the kitchen where they put the leftover slices of bread from lunch.

Suzuki-roshi: Uh-huh.

Student O: And-

Suzuki-roshi: And-that is bread box. Okay.

Student O: Pardon?

Suzuki-roshi: Okay.

Student O: Yes. And I wanted some advice from you about how to handle that sort of situation [laughs, laughter]. I know-I guess we're not supposed to eat between meals [laughter], but I have my heart set-all week I've been thinking [laughter] that I'm going to be the only one awake, and I can go in there and have my slice [?] [laughter].

Student P: Maybe not the only one! [Loud laughter.]?

Student O: How-if you were firewatch [laughter], how would you handle yourself [laughter]?

Suzuki-roshi: You know, you should feel, you know, as if you are great Zen master [laughing, laughter]. "Oh, this is bread box" [laughs, laughter].

Student O: I'm going on vacation [?].

Suzuki-roshi: Actually, you don't-you don't, you know-when you are student you eat, you know. When you become a teacher you don't. Or when you become jisha[4] you don't.

Student O: Don't what?

Suzuki-roshi: Don't eat [laughter].

Student O: I thought that's what you would say [?].

Suzuki-roshi: When you're just beginner or just, you know, student, you may-I think you will do it. That is naturalness [laughs, laughter]. When I was a, you know, little disciple of the-of my master's temple, I ate many things, and I steal many things from my master. But when I became a temple priest, you know-you know, naturally I didn't [laughs]. Not because I [laughs, laughter]-

Student P: Look how much you brought for all of us to [1 word] [laughter]-

Suzuki-roshi: How-how did you feel?

Student O: I felt like a great Zen master [laughs, loud laughter].

Suzuki-roshi: Yeah. Say it to yourself, "I am a-the best student at Tassajara, and my future will be a great Zen master." [Laughs, laughter.]

Thank you very much.

---

Source: City Center original tape transcribed by Adam Tinkham and Bill Redican (3/19/01).

[1] innen (Jap.): "In is the inner and direct cause by which the result occurs, while en means the external and indirect one. According to the Buddhist doctrine, every action occurs in the harmony of both in and en" (Daito Shuppansha, Japanese-English Buddhist Dictionary, 1965, pp. 129-130).

[2] anuttara-samyak-sambodhi (San.): the Buddha's or the highest enlightenment or wisdom.

[3] issai-shu-chi (Jap.): one of the three types of wisdom; the wisdom of the Buddha.

[4] jisha (Jap.): attendant to a priest.

3 - Form is Emptiness, and Emptiness is Form

Thursday, November 13, 1969

"Form is Emptiness, and Emptiness is Form"

Tonight I am supposed to explain "form is emptiness, and emptiness is form." In-last night, we came to the point to make to clarify especially "emptiness is form," which is rather difficult to make it clear. But actually, form is so-to-say "big mind"-no, emptiness is "big mind." And big mind as sky, which contains-which doesn't-air or sky, empty sky. But-"empty sky," we say, but everything grow-when plants and everything grow into the sky, sky doesn't care, you know. And the sky is always ready to accept things in it.

And-but our mind is not-should be like a sky, you know, our big mind. We should accept things as it is, and we should not discriminate things, as the sky doesn't discriminate things in which many ex- [partial word]-in which many things exist. Various being is quite free in the big sky. But our mind is not so. "I like this. I don't like this. This is beautiful. But this is not so beautiful. I like him, but I don't like him. I like this part of him, but the other part is not so good." In this way, our small mind always discriminate things and sometime reject things. That is small mind. So small-in the realm of the small mind there are many objects, there are many beings, and that beings exist as if they have self-nature, good nature or bad nature-a beautiful nature or ugly mean nature.

But Mahayana-in this way, even though Theravadan teaching accept the teaching of selflessness, their way is more like small-mind way-small-minded way because they acknowledge things, various being which has-which is not empty. Dhamma[1]-when we say dhamma, you know, it include our sense organs and mind. So we have six-five sense organs and mind. That is six. And sense object, object of thinking and objects of our sense organs. And the world which sense organ and sense objects create-get [?] with and create some world-world of sight, world of sound, world of taste, world of feeling. In this way, each sense organs has world, its-their own world.

In this way, in-Theravadan canon acknowledge things-some substantial things. They count seventy-five dhammas. But that is actually-not-actually, dhamma we say, but that is actually the beings-more psychologically analyzed elements of being. So this is-it-it doesn't- instead of self, Buddha's teaching is teaching of selflessness. So actually instead of saying self, they say five senses, or five elements, or six elements, or six sense objects, or six worlds of each-for each sense organs.

So even though they do not say "self," actually they, you know, acknowledged a self which is as permanent as-as things, dhammas. The Hinayana teaching is, in one word, the teaching of existence of dhamma [and] nonexistence of self. That is Hinayana canon.

But actually, they-when they say-they-when they acknowledge objective world of objective being, it is same thing to acknowledge self which is observing objects. Do you understand this point? That, you know, to acknowledge lamp means to acknowledge my mind which is observing, you know, lamp. Moreover, you know, when you think, "I am seeing, observing a lamp," you know, as I said before, my mind, my eyes or my mind, or self of mine is projected, and you are reflecting your past experience. You say "I am observing," but actually I observed a lamp, and you are thinking about "I" which is-who is observing lamp.

So, it-it is same thing to acknowledge self. When they say, especially when they say "lamp is existence, lamp exist like this," means I exist and I am observing a lamp. So even-they say, you know, "teaching of selflessness." They never say "self." But actually they-what they mean is, when they say "here is lamp," it means that they acknowledged self which is existent and which is permanent. This is their nature of canon, or weak point of canon, or immaturity of understanding.

